HISTORY
OF BERKS COUNTY IN PENNSYLVANIA.

BY MORTON L. MONTGOMERY, MEMBER OF THE BERKS COUNTY BAR.

ILLUSTRATED.

PHILADELPHIA:
EVERTS, PECK & RICHARDS.
PREFACE.

The history of Berks County, one of the early political organizations in the State of Pennsylvania, is presented in this volume. It embraces the important facts, relating to the several affairs of the county, from the beginning of the eighteenth century until now, which the author collected during the past ten years; and, upon having arranged them in a systematic narrative, he now submits the result of his labors.

The author acknowledges with pleasure the thorough co-operation of the publishers, Messrs. Everts, Peck & Richards, in its production; for, through their enterprise and liberality, he has been enabled to issue it in a comprehensive plan much beyond his original intentions. The services of Mr. George R. Prowell, Mr. J. L. Rockey and Capt. Frank H. Cole, whom they sent into the county for the purpose of aiding him in the completion of his enlarged undertaking, are worthy of particular mention.

Many persons in every district of the county, and friends at Harrisburg, Philadelphia and Washington, encouraged the author in the course of his labors, and he recognizes their kindly attentions to him.

BERKS COUNTY, PENNSYLVANIA.

INTRODUCTION.

In the beginning of colonization in this section of the earth for several hundred miles round about us settlements were first made along the sea or prominent inlets, and afterward, from decade to decade, they gradually advanced farther and farther into the interior, being influenced in their onward movement by flowing rivers and rolling valleys. The settlers found the country open, accessible and inviting, with many valuable features, such as strong streams, fertile soil, great forests, inexhaustible beds of limestone, iron-ore, sand and clay, and numerous animals, fowls and fishes. These were conditions which gave the new country a strong character and inspired the early immigrants with hope and confidence; these were considerations worthy of especial mention to kindred and friends who remained at home in the old country, and, fortunately for Pennsylvania, these were sufficient to exert a favorable influence upon the minds of such persons there as contemplated emigration.

The early settlement of the country was slow. From its first possession till 1681 the number of inhabitants had not multiplied beyond a thousand. Accordingly, its development during this time (about a half-century) was insignificant. The chief occupations were trading and commerce. But in 1681 a new era began in its eventful history, and thence for nearly a century its growth was marvelous, even though it continued under the sway of monarchic government. The constant influx of foreigners made all things active, especially such as related to the possession of land, its improvement, etc. The people, however, did not obtain a higher plane of action in respect to motive-power. The physical forces, such as animal, wind and water, which had aided them and their progenitors time out of mind, still prevailed. Distance still separated them in their settlements, and travel and transportation remained slow; but during the next century many revelations were made. These superinduced various improvements, which brought the people into a closer relationship and elevated them to a higher standard of life. The discovery of coal, and the appreciation of its marketable value as a substance for fuel, quickened trade. It awakened genius in respect to the necessity for increased and convenient motive-power. This was supplied through steam, and iron then arose into greater prominence for its utility in connection with both. These three agents formed the great triumvirate in the increased development of the people; and the acceleration of our movements as a people, especially in respect to trade and transportation, necessarily developed a fourth agent. This was the telegraph. The results of their combined influences at the close of this century were valuable beyond computation.

In the march of improvements the district comprising the county of Berks has occupied a prominent position. The first active agent was iron. Indeed, the first forge and the first furnace in Pennsylvania for its manufacture were established and successfully conducted on its territory; and it has continued active here for over one hundred and sixty years. The next agent was coal. This valuable mineral was discovered whilst the inexhaustible anthracite fields were a part of this county. Its transportation developed the canal and the railway along the Schuylkill. The third agent, steam, was then utilized to cheapen and hasten its delivery in and through the valley from the mountains to the sea, and also to stimulate manufactures, especially in the county-seat after 1835. And the fourth agent was introduced soon after its practical value had come to be recognized.

Industry has ever been a prominent characteristic of our people. The most general employment has been in agriculture, and the next in iron manufactures. These two have constantly created demands for diversified industries, and have made us not only a prosperous but a contented people. Continuous employment has kept us, as a whole, so engaged in private affairs as to be comparatively free from those ambitions and vanities of life which develop restless energy in the direction of personal aggrandizement. It would have been better for us if a different spirit had prevailed to such an extent as to have led us into a more active zeal for the public welfare, and into a more general thinking for competent political representation. Here, as elsewhere, too few men of liberal mind and education have exercised thought for the whole community. A hope was expressed that general education would stimulate this weakness and agitate new impulses, looking to the greatest good for the greatest number. But an experience extending through the past fifty years has not improved us in this respect. It has rather licensed ambition to run wild, and permitted men, more or less inexperienced, incompetent and irresponsible, to represent us in positions of trust and responsibility.

Our people in these two important particulars—labor on the one hand and government on the other—have moved along undirected. This is a common but an unfortunate weakness in the United States; and through it the people of our county have not developed prominent, thoughtful men to lead us out of this social apathy and to agitate questions and measures relative to our common progress—that progress which concerns communities rather than individuals, and develops public enterprise and equality rather than private enrichment and distinction. This is surprising, especially when we consider the prominent territorial position which we have occupied, the large wealth which we have possessed and the high degree of business sagacity and social intelligence which we have enjoyed. It is a difficult matter to determine just what caused this condition, except it be that we have been indisposed to political thought and feeling; indisposed to express ourselves with force and fearlessness in public measures; indisposed to lead the way in some common purpose for the public good. Others round about us have created, but we have followed—we have imitated. Possibly this arose from the peculiar German element in our composition, which is so apt to be contented at labor with the certain profit that it yields. In the sense of untiring industry, of rigid economy, of pure and simple religion, our people have displayed a remarkable degree of excellence. Indeed, a long observation leads me to say that in these several respects we have seen perfection. And if we were not now, and had not been for a hundred years past, living under a system of representative government of, for and by the people, in which all tax-payers, especially freeholders, should take an active and earnest interest, I could not persuade myself to say anything else than that we have been worthy all possible commendation. But we have been existing under a political govern-
We should therefore awaken them to a sense of their political duty, so that such men shall be produced for the strong spirit that they shall develop amongst us and for the true patriotic pride that they shall have to arise from us in the time of political revolution.

With these general preliminary observations, it is my earnest purpose to present in this volume a historical narrative of Berks County from the time of the first settlements upon its territory till now. I shall detail all the matters which I could find relating to its development from a vast uncultivated wilderness, occupied by a few non-progressive and feeble Indian tribes, into a cultivated country, possessed and enriched by thousands of civilized, progressive people. Nearly two centuries have elapsed since the first settlement was made by a small but zealous colony of Swedes on the eastern bank of the Schuylkill, several miles above the mouth of the Manatantw Creek. In the history of the world this is an insignificant period; but in these years a great work has been accomplished in this vicinity for twenty miles round about our county-seat. The period is therefore of great interest and significance to us. Besides increasing from two-score of people to a thriving population which exceeds in number one hundred and thirty thousand, and advancing from a feeble association of individuals full of fear into a strong community of citizens who exhibit privilege and power in every action, we have passed from one stage to another, decade after decade, ever bringing our several districts into a closer relationship with one another, and we have realized all the material improvements which such a remarkable growth necessarily produces in the course of social progress.

The first century was signalized by a number of important events, such as the immigration of many foreigners; the founding of Reading; the erection of Berks County, with its conveniences to the people through local courts, public buildings, etc.; the French and Indian War; the Revolution, with its Declaration of Independence, seven years of costly warfare and successful conclusion; the introduction of the newspaper, stage-coach and post-office.
But the second century, till now, has been signalized to a greater degree. The first fifty years were particularly fruitful of great results from well-directed energy. Our highways were improved into turnpikes; bridges were erected to take the place of ferry-boats; canals were substituted for roads to facilitate the transportation of large quantities of materials at reduced cost; railways were then introduced, which encouraged travel, expedited traffic and increased carrying capacity to answer the demands of enterprise; steam not carrying our letters with sufficient speed, the telegraph was supplied; and the message becoming too slow for our active minds, the telephone was produced, which enables us to speak, as it were, face to face. Contrast the two extremes, then and now, in the single respect of communicating with one another, and behold the progress which we have made!

We passed through three wars, the last of which was especially costly to us in the lives that were sacrificed, the suffering that was endured and the great taxation that was borne. But I will not have any battles upon our territory to recount, no dreadful losses, no violence from desperate, invading foes to narrate,—a circumstance fortunate for our homes and families, properties and lives. Industry gave us development in every department of life. Manufactures, especially at Reading, grew wonderfully and invited thousands of strangers to settle here. Labor-saving machinery for the work-shop and then for the farm was introduced; and education was encouraged by legislation through general taxation. After the common school had become a fixed institution the English language began to obtain more extensively, and demand for English preaching in our growing community arose. Theretofore the German language was used almost entirely in the church and in the associations of life. But in the courts, English speaking prevailed necessarily, owing to a colonial law which required it, just as the laws were promulgated in the English language. I will not have a great park and fine monuments to mention, notwithstanding the Penns had set apart a fine tract of land along the western base of Penn's Mount, many years ago, for the former, and our community afforded appropriate subjects for the latter. Our situation in these two respects must be depreciated by the intelligent people of this community. The newspapers will receive particular mention. They played an important part in our growing community, especially after 1820, when they began to devote more attention to local news and the discussion of measures of a public character. Societies of all kinds, especially secret and beneficial orders, were started here with peculiar but surprising energy. They grew rapidly after 1840. The Odd-Fellows developed a strong spirit in their behalf throughout the county, and influenced the formation of a great many associations for purposes of friendship, protection and assistance. The number of different societies now is very large. Steam would seem to have been at the bottom of these also, for they began in earnest just after its introduction; and during the last forty years, strange though the coincidence may be, the one multiplied in numbers and character just as the other expanded in utility and power.

The building and savings associations must be mentioned for the prominence they have occupied and the good they have accomplished. They started with the incorporation of our city, and they have grown in number and influence with the development of the city. They have been, in this time, an important factor in building up many substantial homes for the industrious and economical working people. Their receipts and expenditures have increased from thousands of dollars into millions. The city is largely indebted to them for many improved and inhabited sections; and there is a feature in them which I cannot fail to observe—the laudable tendency to distribute and preserve property, influence and public interest in the hands of the people.

In closing this introduction I refer with pride to our patriotism. From the beginning of our history till now we have exhibited a strong love for our country. We took an active and earnest part in its trying periods of warfare, contributing many companies of soldiers and large amounts of money towards upholding the general government,—first, in defending the early settlers from the barbarous incursions of Indians; then in declaring and obtaining independence from the English, and afterward in maintaining this independence; again in recognizing the measures of the national administration against Mexico, which resulted in the annexation of Texas; and lastly, in the Rebellion of the Southern States. Our services in the first and last periods were especially noteworthy, for in them many lives of our own people were sacrificed. At least eight thousand men from the county were mustered into military service during the Rebellion. Our total population in 1860 was ninety-three thousand eight hundred and eighteen; over eight per cent went to serve the government for the preservation of the Union. The number of our electors then did not exceed twenty thousand. From this it appears that we sent one man out of every three; or, speaking more accurately, two out of every seven. We did our whole duty. Our record in this great and costly struggle is noble and shows remarkable patriotism. And we sent the first company of volunteers, uniformed and equipped, in response to the President's call for troops—an honor worthy of particular mention. In order to present this important subject with the fullness that it deserves, I will set apart a large space in this history for its extended consideration.

CHAPTER I.

GENERAL HISTORY OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Early Settlers: Dutch, Swedes, English, Germans, etc.— Provincial and Constitutional Government—Purchases of Territory from Indians—Counties Erected—Development.

EARLY SETTLERS.

DUTCH.—The Dutch were the first explorers of this section of our vast country. They discovered the great inlet from the Atlantic Ocean, now called the Delaware Bay, in 1609. In that year the Dutch East India Company sent Captain Henry Hudson, with a crew of English and Dutch sailors, numbering about sixteen men, on a voyage in search of the supposed short passage to India. Hudson entered the mouth of the bay; but finding water shallow and suspecting danger ahead, he withdrew into the ocean and proceeded northwardly. He reported this discovery to the company. Some years afterward, the Dutch East India Company was incorporated and invested with great privileges and powers, and this company, in 1623, took possession of the territory which adjoined the bay and river and called it “New Netherland.” The expedition was sent by it under the command of Captain Cornelius Jacobsen May. He and his crew had first landed at Manhattan (now New York). Some of the families were sent thence to the South (Delaware) River, where they erected a fort and carried on a peaceful and successful trade with the natives. During the summer of 1633 a commissary named Arendt Corssen bought from the Indians, under the direction of the company, a tract of land within the limits of Pennsylvania, along the Schuylkill river, and established a trading post. During these years the administration of affairs was not smooth; the directors in charge were therefore frequently changed. In the surrounding territory, especially in the northern possessions of “New Netherland,” considerable warfare was carried on between the Indians and the colonists. It was estimated that sixteen hundred Indians were killed. Nearly all the Dutch settlements were attacked and visited with general destruction. The Schuylkill settlement was not molested.

SWEDES.—Whilst the Dutch were carrying on these settlements in the New Netherland, Gustavus Adolphus, King of Sweden, was induced by William Usselincx, the person who had proposed the establishment of the Dutch West India Company, to entertain the notion of founding colonies in America. This was in 1624. But Adolphus fell at Lutzen, in 1632, before he had completed his plans. His daughter Christina, successor to the Swedish throne, and his chancellor, Oxenstiern, however, entertained the matter, and, in 1634, incorporated the Swedish West India Company. The news of this new enterprise induced the discharged director of the New Netherland colony, Peter Minuit, to offer his services, to this company. Finding him experienced, they fitted out an expedition of fifty emigrants and placed him in command. It was determined that they should settle in the vicinity of the Delaware River. They sailed from Gottenberg in the latter part of 1637, and reached their destination in April, 1638. They proceeded up the Delaware River to a creek which they named “Christina,” in honor of their Queen. There they met the Indians, made a treaty with them and succeeded in purchasing all the land which lay on the west side of the river in length from Cape Henlopen to the falls near Trenton, and as far westward in width as they wished to possess. They then established a trading post and erected a fort near the mouth of the creek, which they gave the same name. The territory they called New Sweden. This settlement awakened the opposition of the Dutch to such an extent that in May following they issued a proclamation in which they warned the Swedes to desist. But Minuit disregarded the proclamation and proceeded in the more thorough settlement of the country. The colony prospered and its trade increased rapidly. Its great prosperity and its beautiful surroundings awakened a wonderful feeling in its behalf. In 1639 new immigrants came at three different times and brought abundant supplies. In the fall of the year the vessels were so crowded with passengers that many persons who had also wished to emigrate from Europe could not be taken.

2The year 1624 may be taken as the era of a continuous civil government. May was the first Director. It had power to punish, but not with death. Judgments for capital crimes were to be referred to Amsterdam.—2 Bancroft's "Hist. of U. S.," p. 39.

From 1638 the Dutch and Swedes occupied the territory together; but in respect to trade, the Swedes were superior. In two years the Dutch trade was reduced to a small amount. This was effected by the Swedes underselling them and depressing the market. It had fallen short thirty thousand beaver-skins. In 1642 the English also tried to effect a settlement in this locality; but they were expelled by the co-operation of the Swedes and Dutch. In 1643 John Printz became the Governor of the Swedes. He was a rough, bold officer, very large and heavy, having weighed over four hundred pounds and been fond of liquor; yet, withal, he possessed many admirable qualities. His management of the Swedish interests won the entire approbation of his superiors. He built a fort on Tinicum Island, and obliged every vessel that passed it to strike her colors, and he permitted no trade without tribute. He also erected a handsome dwelling, built of brick brought by him from Stockholm, which was called “Printz Hall.” The Dutch objected to his proceedings and demands; but they hesitated to oppose his administration; and they became alarmed at the wonderful growth and progress of the Swedes. During 1644 the Swedish trade was very large. In that year two vessels were sent home with cargoes, which included two thousand one hundred and twenty-seven packages of beaver-skins and seventy thousand two hundred and forty-one pounds of tobacco. After governing ten years, he asked to be relieved, and John Claude Rysingh was appointed his successor.

Rysingh, on July 11, 1654, addressed a letter to the home government, in which he estimated the entire population at three hundred and sixty-eight persons. Of these, only seventy were Swedes. Through kindness, he renewed the treaty of friendship with the Indians. His administration dawned with bright prospects; but these were soon blighted, for after governing less than two years, he and nearly all the Swedes were driven out of the settlement. The Dutch had been much displeased in the capture of one of their forts several years before (Fort Casimir, near the mouth of the Brandywine), and therefore had determined to revenge their wrong by driving the Swedes from the river, or compelling submission. In 1655 this determination was renewed, and Stuyvesant, with over six hundred men, forced the surrender of the territory. And this was the end of the Swedish government in America, after having maintained a separate existence for more than seventeen years. Though the Swedes could not maintain their hold, they are nevertheless entitled to the credit of having effected the first permanent settlements in Pennsylvania, and of having given the territory a commercial character which it never lost. These influences certainly tended towards the rapid enrichment of the settlements and the increase of their population. The number of inhabitants then was about seven hundred.

Dutch.—After the Dutch had re-possessed the settlements on the Delaware, John Paul Jacquet was appointed vice-director, the appointment having been made on November 29, 1655. Peter Stuyvesant, a brave soldier of experience and a man of some learning, was the director, located at Manhattan, afterward called New York. The Swedes, under the promise of protection and of quiet enjoyment of their estates, remained and gave their allegiance to the Dutch government. The Dutch West India Company, in their efforts to repossess this territory, had incurred a large indebtedness. To satisfy this debt they sold to the city of Amsterdam, their creditor, all that portion south of the Delaware, from Christina Creek to the ocean. This sale was confirmed by the States-General on August 16, 1656, and the territory sold took the name of New Amsterdam. The government was then vested in forty commissioners, who were to reside in Amsterdam. They appointed Jacob Aldrichs as director, and upon his arrival the authority of Jacquet ceased. He administered affairs for nearly two years, until towards the close of 1659, when D'Hinyossa, the person recommended by him, received the appointment. Many evils existed during this period. They arose from the bad administration of Aldrichs.

The year 1659 was one of great distress to the colonists. Sickness prevailed, the affairs of the government were unsettled, the crops were short, and the winter was severe; the new immigrants arrived without supplies, and the company made new and exacting conditions. All these things caused great discontent, and many of the colonists fled to English settlements in Maryland.

The administration of D'Hinyossa was also turbulent, owing to conflicts between him as the representative of the city of Amsterdam and the collector of revenues for the West India Company. He refused to recognize the authority of Stuyvesant, and his difficulties finally obliged him to visit Holland in 1663. Through this visit the city of Amsterdam obtained the entire government of all the settlements, and upon his return Stuyvesant made a formal transfer of all authority to him. This induced the colonists to return from Maryland. He held undivided authority till the conquest of all the territory of New Netherland, in 1664, by the English, when he returned to Holland.

English.—The English had claimed the territory by right of discovery. Cromwell had planned its recovery, and similar plans had been renewed during the reign of his son, but forcible measures were not adopted. The discontent of the colonists, however, caused the English to renew their claims. They sent commissioners to demand the surrender of the territory, but the Dutch succeeded in resisting these demands, and they held it till it was taken from them by the English by right of conquest in 1664.

Soon after King Charles II. had ascended the English throne he granted by patent, dated 12th of March, 1664, all the territory between the Connecticut and Delaware Rivers and the adjacent islands, including the possessions of the Dutch, to his brother James, the Duke of York and Albany. Colonel Richard Nicholls was sent, accompanied by three commissioners, to take possession. Before they began formal negotiations with Stuyvesant they had issued a proclamation to the people, in which they offered the most liberal regulations and entire security to them and their property if they would peaceably transfer their allegiance to the English crown. This was successful. The people did not encourage Stuyvesant in his proposed resistance of these demands, and he accordingly surrendered possession on the 8th of September, 1664, when the New Netherlands passed to the English.

In May, 1667, Nicholls was succeeded by Colonel Francis Lovelace. He administered affairs till he was forced to surrender to the Dutch in the fall of 1673. Captain John Carr then became the Governor of the settlements on the Delaware.

In 1673 Louis XIV declared war against the Netherlands, and in this declaration the English united. But the Dutch were victorious over the French and English, defeating them in three great naval battles, which were fought on the 7th and 14th of June and on the 21st of August in that year. During this time the Dutch had sent a squadron to recover the territory of New Netherland. It arrived before the fort of New York on the 6th of August, shortly before the final naval battle, and a surrender was demanded. After a brief resistance the surrender was made, and the entire territory, as it had passed from Stuyvesant, was thus recovered. In honor of the Prince of Orange, it was called “New Orange.” Peter Alrichs was appointed Governor of the territory west of the Delaware, and he confiscated the property belonging to the English government. Scarcely had the authority of the Dutch on the Delaware been confirmed and settled when a treaty of peace was concluded on the 9th of February, 1674, by which the territory of New Netherland was restored to the English. King Charles then renewed his grant to the Duke of York, and Sir Edmond Andros was sent to repossess the government of the territory. On the 9th of November, 1674, he issued his proclamation whereby he reinstated affairs. Edmund Cantwell was commissioned to be captain and schout, and substantially invested with the power of a Deputy-Governor. On the 23d of September, 1676, John Collier was appointed to succeed him. Before a year expired Collier, on the 24th of August, 1677, was deposed by Andros because he had usurped the authority of a judge, and Christopher Billop was commissioned in his stead. This authority continued till 1681, when the territory, which included Pennsylvania, was granted to William Penn.

Penn had become interested in the settlements in America, and especially in the progress of civilization on the Delaware River, through the purchase of a part of New Jersey in company with eleven other persons. His father, Admiral William Penn, had distinguished himself by meritorious services under the English government, whereby he became entitled to a claim of sixteen thousand pounds. This claim he bequeathed to his son, and the son, in satisfaction thereof, made application for a large grant of territory west of the Delaware. King Charles II readily consented, for he was in great need of money, and he regarded the payment of so large a claim against him in this manner as a most desirable performance. He accordingly granted to him by patent, dated the 4th of March, 1681, the land applied for and named it “Pennsylvania.” Penn himself had drawn the patent, but it was revised and amended by Chief Justice North, “to guard the sovereignty of the King and the commercial supremacy of Parliament.” Many obstacles had been thrown in the way of its confirmation to him by Lord Baltimore, but his claims and solicitations finally prevailed. He then wrote, “God will bless and make it the seed of a nation.” On the 2d of April, 1681, the royal proclamation announced to all the inhabitants of the province that William Penn was their absolute proprietary, with all the powers necessary for its government, and Penn himself also issued a proclamation on the 8th of April. It was in the following remarkable language:

“My friends:—I wish you all happiness here and hereafter. These are to let you know that it hath pleased God in his Providence to cast you within my Lot and Care. It is a business that though I never undertook before, yet God has given me an understanding of my duty and an honest mind to do it uprightly. I hope you will not be troubled at your change and the king's choice, for you are now fixed at the mercy of no Governor that comes to make his fortune great. You shall be governed by laws of your own making, and live a free and, if you will, a sober and industrious people. I shall not usurp the right of any or oppress his person. God has furnished me with a better resolution and has given me his grace to keep it. In short, whatever sober and free men can reasonably desire for the security and improvement of their own happiness I shall heartily comply with. I beseech God to direct you in the way of righteousness, and therein prosper you and your children after you. I am your true friend,

“WM. PENN.”

Penn was not ready to visit his new province.
He therefore deputized his kinsman, William Markham, a young man, to go and take formal possession thereof and act as Deputy-Governor until his arrival. Markham proceeded directly to New York with the two declarations. There he exhibited to the Governor the King's declararion, and the Governor gave him a letter addressed to all the magistrates in the new grant, requesting them to transfer their allegiance to the new proprietor. This was on the 21st of June, 1681. Markham then proceeded to the Delaware and made known the contents of the declarations entrusted to him. He was kindly received and his authority was accordingly accepted.

Markham also had a letter addressed by Penn to Lord Baltimore in reference to a settlement of the boundary line between Pennsylvania and Maryland. By the charter the southern line of the province was on the fortieth degree of north latitude. This extended upon the territory of the province of Maryland. He delivered the letter to Baltimore, but they could not agree. The controversy about the line was kept up for over eighty years. Finally an agreement was effected, which was much to the advantage of Maryland. The line was surveyed by two surveyors—Thomas Mason and Jeremiah Dixon—who were appointed for this purpose in 1763, and located on a line forty degrees forty-four minutes north latitude. It has since been known as “Mason's and Dixon's line,” and it marked the division between the free and slave States for a hundred years.

In the fall of 1681 certain commissioners from Penn arrived, having been sent by him to treat with the Indians, purchase lands from them and lay out a great city. In his letter to the Indians he addressed them as follows:

“There is a great God and power that hath made the world, and all things therein, to whom you and I and all people owe their being and well-being, and to whom you and I must one day give an account for all that we do in the world. This great God hath written his law in our hearts, by which we are taught and commanded to love and help and do good to one another. Now this great God hath been pleased to make me concerned in your part of the world; and the king of the country where I live hath given me a great province therein; but I desire to enjoy it with your love and consent that we may always live together as neighbors and friends; else what would the great God do to us who hath made us, not to devour and destroy one another, but to live soberly and kindly in the world?"

After the management of affairs in the province by a Deputy-Governor for over a year, Penn himself arrived and assumed personal contr. He arrived at New Castle on the 27th of October, 1682. On the next day he met the neighboring inhabitants, consisting of families of various nations,—Dutch, Germans, Swedes and English. He produced before them his charter and deeds of feoffment and explained his system of government. The education of rich and poor was to be provided for; justice was to be administered without delay; prisons were to be regulated in such a manner as to lead to the reformation of criminals; and the penalty of death was to be abolished, except in the cases of murder and treason. Several days after this meeting the Assembly (which had been called by Markham to meet for the purpose) adopted his frame of government, and from that time onward the development of the province was wonderful. Philadelphia was then founded upon a plan which contemplated the growth of a magnificent city. The lands of the province were surveyed and settlements were located in various directions. Many houses were built; imigrants, mostly English and German, came in great numbers; schools were founded; a printing press was set up; a post was established, and the great outposts of civilization were erected.

Penn was particularly successful in his treaty with the natives. He won their unqualified confidence. In the following kind and remarkable language he expressed his ideas and intentions to them:

"We meet on the broad pathway of good faith and good-will; no advantage shall be taken on either side; but all shall be openness and love. I will not call you children, for parents sometimes chide their children too severely; nor brothers only, for brothers differ. The friendship between me and you I will not compare to a chain, for that the rains might rust or the falling tree might break. We are the same as if one man's body were to be divided into two parts; we are one flesh and blood."

These words made a deep impression upon the Indians, and they replied,—

"We will live in love with you and your children as long as the moon and the sun shall endure."

And such was the introduction of the English government, such the beginning of the promising settlements superinduced thereby. Its language as well as its laws was the fixed medium of intercourse. And it could not be disturbed, notwithstanding the great immigration of other nationalities, especially Germans. These were encouraged by the English, especially by the policy of William Penn; and they, acknowledging the government as they found it, conducted themselves accordingly. And this accounts for the continuation of the predominance of English in every department of life, particularly as it concerned trade, legislation and jurisprudence.

William Penn was born at London, Eng., on October 14, 1644. He obtained a thorough education at home under a private tutor and at Oxford University, and then entered Lincoln's Inn for the purpose of studying law. After prosecuting his studies for a while he, in 1665, accompanied his father, Admiral William Penn, to Ireland and took upon himself the management of a valuable estate. Subsequently he entered the army whilst visiting a prominent friend of the family in Ireland, and gained some experience as a soldier. Whilst in this service his portrait was painted, which is said to be the only genuine portrait of him ever produced. He then united with the Society of Friends, having been imbued with the principles of this sect through the preaching of Thomas Loe. His earnest preaching at Cork, in 1667, caused his arrest and imprisonment. His release was effected through the Earl of Orrery; but he began again with more vigor. His religious writings then led to his second arrest, when he was imprisoned in the Tower. Whilst there he wrote his distinguished religious work, entitled, "No Cross, no Crown." His father obtained his discharge, but he persisted in expressing his opinions and beliefs on the highways and in public places, for which he was arrested in 1670, and committed to Newgate. He was indicted and tried. During the trial he pleaded his own cause and the jury acquitted him. But he was detained, nevertheless, for a time. The jurors were fined for returning such a verdict. In Newgate he also wrote a number of religious articles, which were published in tracts. In 1674 he wrote and published an able defense of the freedom of conscience and the rights of Englishmen, which was entitled, "England's Present Interest Considered." In 1677 he accompanied Barclay and others on a mission of preaching in Holland and Germany.

In 1681 he obtained a charter from King Charles II for the province of Pennsylvania, in satisfaction of a large debt which had been owing to his father for meritorious naval services. He visited his province in 1682 and remained two years. In this time he did many things for the welfare of the province. He distinguished himself by his kindness to the Indians, who gave him in return their unqualified confidence and regard. His great treaty with them at Kensington in 1682 has been immortalized by a masterly painting by Benjamin West, the famous American artist. He prepared and published various important papers relating to the advantages of Pennsylvania for inducing emigration thither, in which he was very successful with the Germans. In 1686 he secured the liberation of over twelve hundred imprisoned Quakers, and in 1687 also the passage of the "Toleration Act." In 1688 he was tried for treason and acquitted. In 1699 he visited Pennsylvania a second time, and, after remaining two years, he returned to England. In his efforts to establish a permanent government, etc., in Pennsylvania he became heavily involved with debts; these pressed him so hard that in 1708 he was imprisoned for debt. His friends, however, united in his behalf and effected his release. He also had serious and extended litigation in reference to the province, but he eventually succeeded in maintaining his grant and the rights secured to him under it. He died of paralysis at Rushcombe, on July 30, 1718, in the seventy-fourth year of his age. His children held, governed and disposed of the province till the Revolution, when they released their rights to the commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

GERMANs.—Soon after affairs in the province had attained an acknowledged permanent character the influx of settlers was wonderful. They came over the ocean by shiploads at a time. The Germans were especially numerous. In Germany a company had formed about 1684 for the purpose of influencing emigration. It was called the "Frankfort Land Company." It was composed of ten men who lived at Frankfort-on-the-Mayne,—G. Van Mastrick, Thomas V. Wylick, John Le Bran, F. Dan Pastorious, John J. Schnetz, Daniel Behagel, Jacobus Van Dewaller, John W. Peterson, Johannes Kimber, Balthaser Jowest. They entered into articles of association on November 24, 1686, and then purchased large tracts of land from William Penn,—the Germantown patent for five thousand three hundred and fifty acres, and the Manatawny patent for twenty-two thousand three hundred and seventy-seven acres. For more than fifty years emigration was encouraged. Thousands of the emigrants were Palatines; many proceeded from the Palatinate to England upon the invitation of Queen Anne, and thence she transported them to America. Among them were people of all religious denominations,—Mennonites, Moravians, Dunkards, Schwenkfelders, Lutherans, German Reformed and Catholics.

The tide of emigration from Germany had become so great as to awaken apprehension on the part of the English, who controlled the government. In 1717, Logan, the secretary of the province, expressed his fears as follows: "We have of late a great number of Palatines poured in upon us, without any recommendation or notice, which gives the country some uneasiness; foreigners do not so well among us as our own English people." And, in 1755, Samuel Wharton said that they came in such numbers (estimated five thousand in 1754), "I see not but that they may soon give us law and language too, or else, by joining the French, eject all the English." In the years 1749, 1750, 1751 and 1752 they were especially numerous (about twenty-five thousand). Many were poor and had not the means of paying their passage. Upon their arrival at Philadelphia they were sold for a term of years. Their services under these indentures discharged the cost of transportation. In this way they redeemed their freedom, and were called "redemptioners." The Palatine redemptioners were usually sold at ten pounds for a period varying from three to five years. The influx of these was particularly large in the years 1728, 1729, 1737, 1741, 1750 and 1751. They generally proceeded northwardly and westwardly and settled in the districts now included in the counties of Montgomery, Berks, Lancaster, York and Cumberland. Some of these Germans began to settle in Oley, Berks County, as early as 1712. They were industrious, and they, by their industry, soon had the country to show marked improvement.

The Germans were chiefly farmers. Governor Thomas alluded to them when he said, in 1738: "This Province has been for some years the asylum of the distressed Protestants of the Palatinate and other parts of Germany; and I believe it may be truthfully said that the present flourishing condition of it is in a great measure owing to the industry of those people; it is not altogether the fertility of the soil, but the number and industry of the people, that makes a country flourish." 2

England encouraged the industrious Germans to emigrate to America, but she retained her own subjects; and this class was at one time feared. The influx was so great that it was thought their numbers would soon produce a German colony here, and perhaps such a one as Britain once received from Saxony in the fifth century. The personal description of the territory by Penn himself to the Germans, his kindly encouragement to them to emigrate and possess its fertile soil and his liberal promises of religious toleration and of self-government had made a deep impression upon their troubled minds; and corroborating letters to them, subsequently, from those who emigrated had inclined them to more freely entertain thoughts of emigration. And thus influenced, they came into Pennsylvania by thousands—by such a continuous tide of immigration for a period of over fifty years, that the officers of the government became alarmed for the preservation of English laws and the continuation of English control. But their fears were not realized, though the province became German in character and industry, and in general social and religious feeling.

The Dutch had discovered the country; the Swedes had effected the first permanent settlements in it, but had lost control, not so much by want of energy and enterprise as by want of encouragement and support from their government; the English had defined the rights of property and government and characterized the laws, language and associations; but it remained for the Germans to come after these, take possession of the great portion of its territory and control its destiny. This was a fortunate circumstance for Pennsylvania. Who will say that either of the other nationalities mentioned, if they had kept control of the country in all its departments, would have shown a qualification to develop it in so great a degree and in such harmonious proportions as the German in respect to agriculture, industry and population? Who will say that the people would have manifested the same general social, political and religious tendencies? Who will say that they would have caused such a general distribution of land, wealth and power? And who will say that they would have created and maintained such general social and political equality? All these developments, proportions, tendencies and equalities are found here now, after the lapse of two hundred years. In all these years the German influences predominated. Her names of persons, her language and her manners have been preserved, notwithstanding the government ordered the names changed to, and education taught, and the laws published and judicial proceedings recorded in, the English. This is an exhibition of inherent natural greatness and power truly wonderful as it is admirable.

Welsh.—The Welsh made early purchases from Penn in England, amounting to forty thousand acres of land on the west side of the Schuylkill River. Their number of settlers had multiplied to such an extent before 1692 that they settled six townships in Chester County within ten years after it had been formed. They moved gradually northwardly, and took up lands along the head-waters of the Conestoga and vicinity. Some of the lands are now included in Caernarvon, Brecknock, Robeson and Cunru townships, in Berks County. In 1686 and 1698 many Welsh families arrived. Among them were William Jones, Robert Jones, Thomas Evans, Robert Evans, Owen Evans, Cadwallader Evans, Hugh Griffith and John Humphrey. They took up lands by patent. Through them certain townships were named. And their descendants are still on the first settlements. Some of these Welsh immigrants moved to the east of the Schuylkill, into the district now included in Montgomery County, but none of them proceeded so far northwardly as to enter the district now part of Berks County. Those who entered and settled in the county remained to the west of the Schuylkill.

Irish.—Comparatively few Irish immigrants settled in Pennsylvania. They were not among the first, and their limited number could not and did not in the least affect the established laws, associations and institutions of the province. It was quite different with the Germans. The English had possession of the territory; they controlled the government and influenced the direction of all the affairs of the province. Still the Germans modified everything. This modification arose not only from their great numbers, but also their nature and enterprise.

The first Irish immigrants came into the province, about 1719. They located mostly near the Maryland line, in the territory which was then included in Chester County. In 1729 Logan was apprehensive of evil from the Irish settlers. The common fear was that if they continued to come in such numbers as they were then coming, all Ireland would be here and they would eventually make themselves proprietors of the province. The Assembly deemed it advisable to levy a tax of twenty shillings on each servant in order to discourage their immigration. He thought it strange that they continued to crowd into places where they were not wanted. Many convicts were among them. This was the alarming feature. Even the Indians feared a breach between them and the settlers, because the Irish were rough to them. And in 1730 he complained of the audacious and disorderly manners of the Scotch-Irish in forcibly taking possession of Conestoga manor. They were dispossessed and their huts were burned. Thirty-three years afterwards they figured conspicuously in the cruel massacre of the Indians at Conestoga.

In 1735 and 1740 Scotch-Irish immigrants settled in the territory beyond the Susquehanna River, in what was then Lancaster County, now in York and Adams Counties. They came from Scotland and the north of Ireland. The Germans had settled in the upper section, or York County, and the Scotch-Irish in the lower, or Adams County. Their respective nationalities preserved them distinct peoples and eventually led them to separate into two distinct county organizations. The names of the Scotch-Irish are particularly prevalent in Adams County. The settlers were principally of the better class of peasantry and the lands are to a great degree still possessed by their descendants. They were recognized for their intelligence, industry and morality. These qualities have been very successfully transmitted to the present time and have exerted a beneficent influence over the people of the district in several respects, social, industrial and political. I could not discover any settlement of this class in Berks County.

GOVERNMENT OF PENNSYLVANIA SINCE 1681.

PENN'S CHARTER.—The original charter, as prepared by Penn, supervised and amended by the crown officers, and granted by King Charles the Second on the 4th of March, 1681, is a long document. In order to avoid its entire publication in this history, to save time to the general reader in obtaining a knowledge of its contents and to make it more intelligible, I have condensed it in the following manner:

Section 1.—Recognizing the services of his father, Admiral William Penn, to the government in the war against the Dutch, in 1665, and favoring his petition, the King granted unto William Penn, his heirs and assigns, the large body of land now known to us as the State of Pennsylvania.

Section 2.—Grants all harbours, rivers, etc., fishes and ores, with free egress, ingress and regress.

Section 3.—Creates Penn proprietary, requires allegiance and the payment of an annual rent of two beaver-skins and of one-fifth of all gold and silver-ore found on the premises, and names the province PENNSYLVANIA.

Section 4.—Confers authority to make and execute laws, raise money for public use, etc.

Section 5.—Grants authority to create courts with incidental powers.

Section 6.—Grants authority to make ordinances for the government of the people, and direct the law of descent to continue as in England, until altered.

Section 7.—Directs that a transcript of its laws shall be forwarded to the privy council of England, which, if found inconsistent with the government, shall be declared void.

Section 8.—Gives the right to English subjects to emigrate to Pennsylvania.

Section 9.—Grants license to carry on trade with any English ports, subject to customs, duties, etc.
In the 17th all live stock should be marked within three months, otherwise to be forfeited to the Governor.

In the 18th every acre in five acres, in clearing off land, was to be kept in woods, especially oak-trees for shipping, and mulberry trees for silk.

In the 19th shipmasters, upon their arrival, were to give names of passengers, describe freight, etc, within two days afterwards.

And in the 20th all persons who intended to leave the province were to publish their intention.

Subsequently Penn published three frames or plans of government, a table of laws and a Charter of Privileges. The first frame, with its preface, was published April 25, 1682; the table of laws May 5, 1682; the second frame April 2, 1683; the third frame November 7, 1699; and the Charter of Privileges October 28, 1701. All these charters, frames, etc., appear in full in the first volume of the Colonial Records of Pennsylvania and cover nearly fifty pages, closely printed.

First Frame.—Penn introduces the first frame by a superior preface. In it he refers to the necessity of government through the sinfulness and disobedience of man, and he regards government not only useful for purposes of correction, but for the care and regulation of our many daily affairs which make up much the greatest part of it. Men entertained different notions about systems of government; all systems were modified in the course of time, and each system had its admirers. But he regarded that government free to the people under it, whatever its frame, where the laws ruled and the people were a party to the laws.

"Governments like clocks"—said he—"go from the motion men give them, and as governments are made and moved by men, so by them they are ruined, too. Wherefore governments rather depend upon men than men upon governments. Let men be good and the government cannot be bad; if it be ill, they will cure it. But, if men be bad, let the government be never so good, they will endeavor to warp and spoil it to their turn. I know some say, let us have good laws and no matter for the men that execute them; but let them consider that, though good laws do well, good men do better; for good laws may want good men, and be abolished or evaded by ill men; but good men will never want good laws nor suffer ill ones. It is true, good laws have some awe upon ill ministers, but that is where they have not power to escape or abolish them, and the people are generally wise and good; but a loose and depraved people love laws and an administration like themselves. That, therefore, which makes a good constitution, must keep it, namely, men of wisdom and virtue—qualities that, because they descend not with worldly inheritances, must be carefully propagated by a virtuous education of youth; for which after ages will owe more to the care and prudence of founders and the successive magistracy than to their parents for their private patrimonies."

These are certainly words of wisdom and worthy our sincere consideration even at this day, two hundred years after they were given to the first settlers.

The English laws had prevailed over the territory before the control of it passed to Penn. These are now known as the "Duke of York's Laws." They were published by authority of the State of Pennsylvania in 1789. They were considerably modified by the laws and privileges agreed upon and given by Penn. Under these provisions, privileges, etc., the government was continued till the people of the American colonies declared their freedom from English rule and enacted laws by their own representation.¹

The Continental Congress passed a resolution on May 15, 1776, recommending the total suppression of all authority under the King of Great Britain. In pursuance of this recommendation, a Provincial Conference was held in Carpenter Hall, at Philadelphia, on Tuesday, June 18, 1776, which was attended by representatives from all the counties in the province, then eleven in number. The representatives—or delegates, as they were called—from Berks County were Jacob Morgan, Henry Haller, Mark Bird, Bodo Otto, Benjamin Spyker, Daniel Hunter, Valentine Eckert, Nicholas Lotz, Joseph Hiester and Charles Shoemaker.

This conference decided that a Provincial Convention should be called to meet on Monday, July 15, 1776, "for the express purpose of forming a new government in this province on the authority of the people only." It provided the qualifications of electors, fixed the number of representatives from each county and the time of their election, ordered an address to the people to be prepared, and agreed upon a Declaration of Independence for the colony.

At the time appointed the convention assembled. The delegates who represented Berks County were Jacob Morgan, Gabriel Hiester, John Lesher, Benjamin Spyker, Daniel Hunter, Valentine Eckert, Charles Shoemaker and Thomas Jones, Jr.

Constitution of 1776.—A Constitution was adopted on September 28, 1776. It consisted of a Preamble, Declaration of Rights and Frame of Government, and it was signed by all the delegates present. There were some absentees, amongst them being two from Berks County.
John Lesher and Daniel Hunter. The Declaration of Rights was reported by a committee of eleven delegates, including one member from Berks County, John Lesher.

Representatives' Frame of Government.—The frame of government adopted by the representatives of the people provided,— "That the commonwealth should be governed by a single house of representatives, with the executive power vested in a president and council; that courts of justice should be established in every county and judges commissioned, etc.; that militia should be trained; that the electors, representatives and assembly should have certain qualifications, powers, etc.; that business should be done openly and published regularly; that representation should be rated according to inhabitants; that the council should consist of twelve members (one from Berks), for three years, with certain powers; that officers should be liable to impeachment; that trials should be by jury; that courts should be held quarterly, and be open, and administer justice impartially, without corruption or unnecessary delay, and their officers be paid adequate, but moderate salaries; that debtors should not be imprisoned after bona fide surrender of their property, and prisoners should be bailable without excessive bail; that each district should elect a justice of the peace for seven years, and a sheriff and coroner for one year; that all elections should be by ballot, free and voluntary; that all office fees, etc., should be paid into the treasury; that each county should have a register, a recorder and commissioners, all removable at pleasure; that printing presses should be free; that every freeman should have some trade or occupation, and that public offices of profit should be discouraged; that entails and penal laws should be regulated, and jails established; that officers should be qualified by oath; that taxes should alone be levied by law, with purpose expressed; that every foreigner, after allegiance, should be permitted to hold property, etc.; that inhabitants should be permitted to hunt and fish; that schools should be established in each county; that virtue and religion should be encouraged and vice prevented, and that a council of censors—two from each county—should be elected, with certain powers, etc., to meet in 1788, and every seventh year thereafter."

Censors.—By the forty-seventh section of this frame of government, a provision was made for the election of censors, who were "to inquire whether the Constitution was preserved inviolate in every part." James Read and Baltzer Gehr were chosen to represent Berks County. The council met in October, 1783. James Read was appointed on the committee to make the inquiry provided for. This committee reported in August, 1784, against a convention. Both Read and Gehr agreed to the report. There were some dissenters. Reasons for and against it were entered. Gehr signed those for it, and Read those against it; but he "would have it understood that he had sentiments as favorable to the constitution as any from whom he dissented." Remonstrances, signed by eighteen thousand citizens, were presented to the council, protesting against the calling of a convention for altering or amending the constitution. An address to the freemen of Pennsylvania was then ordered to be published. Read voted for it; but Gehr did not vote.

Convention of 1789–90.—The General Assembly of the State met on March 24, 1789. The representatives from Berks County were Joseph Hiester, Gabriel Hiester, Joseph Sands, John Ludwig and Daniel Brodhead. The Assembly determined that alterations and amendments to the Constitution of 1776 were necessary. Sands and Brodhead voted in the affirmative, Ludwig in the negative; both Hiesters were absent.

The Assembly met again on September 15, 1789. A resolution was reported by a committee of the whole Assembly, favoring the calling of a convention to amend the Constitution, which was adopted. Sands, Brodhead and Ludwig voted in the affirmative; Gabriel Hiester in the negative; Joseph Hiester did not vote. Delegates were accordingly elected by each of the districts in the State. In Berks County they were Joseph Hiester, Christopher Lower, Abraham Lincoln, Paul Groscop and Baltzer Gehr. The convention assembled in the State-House, at Philadelphia, on November 24, 1789, and a New Constitution was adopted and all the delegates subscribed it on September 2, 1790. The delegates from Berks voted generally on the same side of questions. It was then submitted to the people by a special election and adopted.

Constitution of 1790.—This Constitution comprised nine articles:

Article 1st provided for a Legislature to be composed of two houses—Senate and Assembly—and fixed qualifications, powers, terms, etc.

Article 2d vested supreme executive power in a Governor and fixed his qualifications, powers and duties.

Article 3d created elective franchise and fixed qualification of electors.

Article 4th provided for impeachment of civil officers.

Article 5th vested judicial power in various courts and fixed terms and power of judges, and created office of register and recorder.

Article 6th provided for appointment of sheriffs and coroners by the Governor for military discipline, for location of county officers, for State commissioners, for State treasurer and all other officers, State and county.

Article 7th provided for the establishment of schools, promotion of arts and sciences, and preservation of religious freedom and corporate powers.

Article 8th provided qualification of Assembly and all State and county officers by oath.

Article 9th provided a Declaration of Rights. It contained twenty-six sections, copied after the Declaration of 1776, but arranged differently, with some important amendments.

A schedule was added, by which provision was made for the alteration and amendment of the Constitution.

This Constitution was continued as the general political law of the State until the adoption of a new Constitution in 1873. In the mean time efforts were made to improve it. On March 28, 1825, an act of Assembly was passed providing for an election, at the next succeeding election, to ascertain the opinion of the people relative to the call of a Constitutional Convention; but the people decided by ballot that such a convention should not be called. The vote was: For it—44,474; against it, 59,884—a majority of 15,410. In Berks County it was: For it, 752; against it, 3757—a majority of 3005. In 1837, however, such a convention was duly assembled at Harrisburg, and amended the Constitution in various particulars, which amendment was adopted by the people at an election in October, 1838. The vote in the State was: For it, 113,971; against it, 112,759—a majority of 1212; and in Berks County: For it, 5823; against it, 3883—a majority of 1940. The delegates from Berks County were John Ritter, George M. Keim, Wm. High, Mark Darrah and James Donagan.

AMENDMENTS.—Subsequently, until the adoption of the new Constitution of 1873, amendments were proposed by act of Assembly and ratified by election.

The first amendment was made in 1850. It provided for the election of all the judges of the commonwealth. The vote was: For it, 114,578; against it, 71,982—majority, 72,596; and Berks County vote: For it, 5160; against it, 3552; majority, 1608.

This was considered a wise political movement. It is right in principle, but it is questionable whether the people were then, or even in 1873, possessed of sufficient independence in political knowledge, thought and action as to have enabled them to dispose of so important a matter by the exercise of their political franchise. This amendment transferred the matter of the fitness of the candidate for judicial power from the lawyer and prominent citizen to the politicians, and of the appointment from the Governor to the people.

The second amendment was made in 1857. It provided for—

1st. The contraction of debts owing by the State.
2d. The erection of new counties.
3d. The apportionment of Representatives; and the term of State Senator to be three years.
4th. The alteration or revocation of charters if found injurious to the people.

And a third amendment was made in 1864, which provided for the right of suffrage to electors in the military service.

Besides these amendments the State Legislature ratified the several amendments of the Constitution of the United States by Congress, relating to the abolition of slavery and to the exercise of political suffrage without respect to race, color or previous condition of servitude.

CONSTITUTION OF 1873.—The advancement of the people in wealth, of politicians in influence, of corporations in power and of legislation in behalf of special classes and localities in a period of fourscore years had rendered a new, fundamental, general law necessary. The complaints had become both loud and numerous, and they had proceeded from all quarters of the State. The selfishness of men had grown beyond their judgment and integrity. The good of the people had come to be of minor importance. Self-aggrandizement in wealth and power had been set up as the great idol of men who were at the head of the various important affairs and enterprises of the State. A general feeling had come to prevail throughout the State that political ambition and influence, corporate power and special legislation should have to be checked on the one hand, and considerably modified on the other, in order to have these important agencies to subserve the public welfare.

An act of Assembly was therefore proposed and passed in 1871. It provided for the calling of a general convention to amend the Constitution of the State. It was submitted to the people at the October election of 1871 and ratified. The vote was: For it, 331,169; against it, 71,569,—majority, 259,800. Berks County vote: For it, 5269; against it, 10,905,—majority against it, 5636.

The following delegates were elected to represent Berks County: George G. Barclay, Henry W. Smith and Henry Van Reed.

The convention first assembled at Harrisburg in November, 1872. After sitting there two weeks it adjourned to reconvene at Philadelphia on January 7, 1873. After reconvening it deliberated many weeks. It had a great work on hand, and many minds had to be satisfied in respect to many proposed improvements. Great discussions ensued. The proceedings are preserved in nine large volumes. With all the ability, time and expense of the convention, the work was generally not satisfactory. But it was the best that so large and various a body could do. The Constitution as modified was submitted to the people on December 16, 1873, and ratified. The vote was: For it, 252,744; against it, 108,594,—majority, 144,150. Berks County vote: For it, 9114; against it, 1866,—majority, 7248.

At best such a great body of laws cannot be perfect. The ingenuity of men to subserve their own ends and interests would seem to be equal to the task of discovering the weakness of the laws. In the language of Penn,—"If men be bad, let the government be never so good, they will endeavor to warp and spoil it to their turn." What the State needs more than a good Constitution is good men; for if they find it weak, they will strengthen it for the common good of all.

PURCHASE OF TERRITORY.

Immediately after Penn had obtained his charter for the province, and had begun his administration of its various affairs, he negotiated with the Indians for the purchase of their lands. He regarded them as the rightful owners of the territory by virtue of their possession. King Charles disagreed with him, and claimed the territory by right of discovery. Penn wondered then whether the King would admit title to England in the Indians if they should chance to discover it in the King's possession.

Many purchases were made by him. He gave in consideration for the land mostly articles which the Indians regarded as useful, such as blankets, coats, guns, powder, lead, etc. Comparatively little money was paid to them. Rum was occasionally given. The accompanying map shows the extent and time of the various purchases.

There are two deeds for lands, included in Berks County, in which we are particularly interested. One is dated 7th of September, 1732. It is from Sassoonon, alias Allummapis, sachem of the Schuylkill Indians, in the province of Pennsylania, Elalapis, Ohopamen, Pesqueetomen, Mayeemoe, Partridge and Tepakoaset, alias Joe, on behalf of themselves and all the other Indians of the said nation, unto John Penn, Thomas Penn and Richard Penn. The territory contained in the grant is described as follows: "All those tracts of land or lands lying on or near the river Schuylkill, in the said province, or any of the branches, streams, fountains or springs thereof, eastward or westward, and all the lands lying in or near any swamps, marshes, fens or meadows, the waters or streams of which flow into or toward the said river Schuylkill situate, lying and being between those hills called Lechay Hills and those called Keekachtanemin Hills, which cross the said river Schuylkill about thirty miles above the said Lechay Hills, and all land whatsoever lying within the said bounds; and between the branches of Delaware river, on the eastern side of the said land, and the branches or streams running into the river Susquehannah, on the western side of the said land, together with all mines, minerals, quarries, waters, rivers, creeks, woods, timber and trees, with all and every the appurtenances, etc.”

“20 brass kettles, 100 stroudwater matchcoats of two yards each, 100 duffels do., 100 blankets, 100 yards of half tick, 60 linen shirts, 20 hats, 6 made coats, 12 pairs of shoes and buckles, 30 pair of stockings, 300 lbs. of gun powder, 600 lbs. of lead, 20 fine guns, 12 gun locks, 50 tomahawks or hatchets, 50 planting hoes, 120 knives, 60 pair of scissors, 100 tobaccoongs, 24 looking-glasses, 40 tobacco boxes, 1000 flints, 5 pounds of paint, 24 dozen of garters, 6 dozen of ribbons, 12 dozen of rings, 200awl blades, 100 pounds of tobacco, 400 tobacco pipes, 20 gallons of rum and fifty pounds in money.”

Lingahonoa, one of the Schuylkill Indians, executed the deed on the 12th of July, 1742, upon receiving his full share and proportion of the several goods mentioned, he “happening not to be present when his brethren signed and executed the same.” His execution was attested by Benjamin Franklin, William Peters, Conrad Weiser and Lyndford Lardner.

The other deed is dated 22d August, 1749. It is from nine different tribes of Indians unto Thomas Penn and Richard Penn. The several tribes were represented by their chiefs, who appeared and executed the deed in their behalf, namely:

Onontagers
- Cansastegea
- Sataganackly
- Kannishiyacayon
- Canechwaderon

Sinichers (Senecas)
- Cayianockea
- Hanatsany
- Agash Taas
- Caruchianachqui

The consideration was five hundred pounds lawful money of Pennsylvania. The tract of land conveyed lay north of the Blue Mountain and extended from the Delaware on the east to the Susquehanna on the west. It included the whole of Schuylkill County.

Conrad Weiser was the interpreter for the Indians in this transfer.

COUNTIES ERECTED.

The following statement contains the counties erected in the State and arranged in chronological order:

1682.—By order of William Penn, three counties were laid out in the southeastern section of Pennsylvania, in November, 1682.—Bucks, Chester and Philadelphia. Subsequently the counties were erected by the Assembly and the Legislature, upon petition from the inhabitants.

1729.—Lancaster was formed from a part of Chester, and erected May 10, 1729.

1749.—York, part of Lancaster, August 10, 1749.

1750.—Cumberland, part of Lancaster, January 27, 1750.

1752.—Berks, parts of Chester, Philadelphia and Lancaster, March 11, 1752. Northampton, part of Bucks, same day.

1771.—Bedford, part of Cumberland, March 9, 1771.

1773.—Westmoreland, part of Bedford, February 26, 1773.

These eleven counties participated in the Declaration of Independence and in the War of the Revolution for its establishment. They comprised the entire territory of the State, though many districts were not yet settled.

The following fifty-six counties were erected after 1776. They are arranged chronologically to show the development of the State. The respective districts of the State were necessarily created into county organizations as they became well occupied by settlers. Certain counties at first included very great areas of territory, as in the case of Northumberland, which, in 1772, included about a third part of the State; but the remaining portions, which were left after the reductions had been made, generally indicated the locality of the first considerable permanent settlements. This is somewhat remarkable.

Berks County at first included all the territory which lay between the present eastern and western boundary lines extended to the northern line of the State. The first settlements beyond the Blue Mountain were quite naturally made in that part now included in Schuylkill County, but Northumberland County was erected many years before Schuylkill County, not because it possessed more settlers, but because they were so far distant from the county-seat (Reading), whereby they suffered great inconvenience and expense in attending to local affairs, requiring attendance at court, etc. The number of settlers was comparatively few, but the number of inhabitants in that district of Schuylkill, which was taken from Berks in 1811, was over six thousand. It was not set apart into a separate county at an earlier time for the reason that the several townships were not considered inconvenient in respect to distance from the county-seat.

1788.—Fayette, also part of Westmoreland, September 26, 1788.
1784.—Franklin, part of Cumberland, September 9, 1784. Montgomery, part of Philadelphia, September 10, 1784.
1785.—Dauphin, part of Lancaster, March 4, 1785.
1786.—Luzerne, part of Northumberland, September 25, 1786.
1787.—Huntingdon, part of Bedford, September 20, 1787.
1788.—Allegheny, parts of Westmoreland and Washington, September 24, 1788.
1789.—Mifflin, parts of Cumberland and Northumberland, September 19, 1789. Delaware, part of Chester, September 26, 1789.
1795.—Lycoming, part of Northumberland, April 13, 1795. Somerset, part of Bedford, April 17, 1795.
1796.—Greene, part of Washington, February 9, 1796.
1798.—Wayne, part of Northampton, March 21, 1798.

DEVELOPMENT OF STATE.

The development of Pennsylvania from a vast uncultivated wilderness in the possession of uncivilized Indians, through a period of two hundred and fifty years, into a productive country in the possession of progressive Christians has been truly wonderful. The course of improvement in this long period of time is indescribable, —a period long, very long, to us who can at best comprehend only several scores of years in our lives and by our experiences, but when compared with the march in countries whence our early settlers emigrated it is small, and when compared with ancient countries, such as Greece and Egypt, it is insignificant.

Population and Territory.—In 1681, when Penn obtained possession of the province, he estimated the population at one thousand, including all nationalities. Two hundred years afterward, by the census of 1880, it was 4,282,-891; and now it is four and a half millions. Then all the territory in the actual possession of the early settlers amounted to only several hundred square miles, and this lay along the Delaware River, in the vicinity of and below Philadelphia, and it was improved merely with ordinary buildings for domestic use; and the combined wealth could not have exceeded a million of dollars. Now, the State comprises forty-five thousand square miles—an extent of country three hundred miles long and one hundred and fifty miles wide—and this vast area is improved with buildings of every description, and roads and turnpikes, and canals and railroads, which facilitate life and intercourse and transportation to a surprising degree, and the combined wealth counts into billions of dollars.

First Century.—The first century was devoted almost entirely to rapid influx of settlers, to taking up land in tracts varying mostly from one hundred to four hundred acres and improving the same with dwellings and barns, to laying out public roads from settlement to settlement in every direction, and to organizing townships and counties and courts of justice. Agriculture was the principal employment of the inhabitants; but numerous trades and vocations were pursued to supply necessary articles. In this time the population increased to about four hundred thousand. This was certainly a large increase; and it can be said that immigration was the most marked feature during this century in the development of the province.

Second Century.—The second century began under a dark and threatening cloud. The inhabitants had grown in strength, not only in respect to number, but also in respect to industry and wealth, to social influence and to feelings for political independence and ambition for local power. And this strength was being tested in their efforts to establish representative government entirely from the people through the terrible trials and losses of war. It proved strong enough for victory. With the Revolutionary War over, in the first few years, this century then started out earnestly with grand prospects for the years to come, similar, at least, if not superior, to those foreshadowed by the liberal policy of Penn. From a single individual, who fortunately possessed exceptional views in behalf of mankind, the power of government passed to the whole community. Under the beneficent influences which proceeded from this change these prospects have been fully realized; indeed, the results have surpassed the highest expectations of the most sanguine advocates of the new system.

Government.—Government was the principal subject which engrossed the public attention for the first decade and it was a comprehensive one for the time. But how admirably the people came to master it, not by themselves, but through the fortunate selection of competent representatives! We may, indeed, ask how such men came to be selected, what sentiments led public feeling in the right direction and created such a unanimity of purpose. It was not accident. It resulted from general respect for learning and fitness, which superinduced men who were not qualified for responsible positions to show no desire for office or political preferment. Our early Governors and judges were exceptional men. In respect to prominence, they stood out above the great mass of the people just as certain high oaks appear above the surrounding trees in a wide forest. In the course of time, as decade after decade passed away, it cannot be said that we have maintained this state of political affairs. Latterly, especially, men obtain offices through accident, without any preparation for the positions which they are called upon to fill, and without any prominence to designate them as men for the times. And if recognized fitness and prominence were characteristics worthy of consideration in the early history of our representative government, when we had a population numbering only four hundred thousand, how much more should they be now, when we have a population exceeding four million, with numerous interests which involve enormous appropriations of money and require the greatest possible exhibition of wisdom, honor and courage for their directions towards subserving the public welfare.

Internal Improvements.—The next subject in point of prominence was internal improvements. When the century began we had nothing in this respect beyond public roads, not even bridges to facilitate the crossing of flowing rivers. But a decade had hardly passed before turnpikes and canals were suggested; and the half of the century had not elapsed before we had turnpikes and canals, and bridges and railroads. These were, indeed, rapid strides in advance of the closing period of the first century. They were superinduced by the energy of trade and transportation, and by the great demands of the time for all kinds of manufactured articles, through rapidly increasing population. The discovery of coal and the application of steam to motive-power encouraged the development of these valuable improvements. But in this behalf iron-ore exerted the strongest influence. These three agents placed the State foremost of all the States in respect to internal improvements, and brought her energy to such a condition of activity that her productions alone exceeded those of all the other States together. 1 In connection with this subject I must mention manufactures,—for internal improvements and manufactures in our great State have traveled together side by side. The latter necessarily preceded the former, for they required a way for convenient and rapid transportation so as to answer the demands of the growing communities. The life and wealth and progress of the State within the last fifty years are attributable mainly to them. Philadelphia is particularly indebted to them for remarkable increase of wealth, influence and population. The county of Berks has ever been active in encouraging and carrying on industries of various kinds, such as furnaces, forges, mills, shops and factories,—especially the county-seat, Reading. In this respect our county stands out as boldly as any other district in the State.

Education.—In looking over the various affairs of the State, the subject of education is prominent. Before 1834 there was legislation encouraging the education of children in the several counties throughout the State, but there was no fixed system for its regulation, and therefore its results were not successful. In 1834 a general system was devised, but it was not compulsory. The spirit of improvement labored on, and through its influences amendments of the system were made at different times. Finally, in 1854, each county was required to elect a superintendent for the purpose of supervising the system and of giving it proper direction; and when this important factor was introduced the progress of general education began in earnest. The intellectual development of the people, through the increasing liberality of the State in behalf for the last half-century, has been as remarkable on the one hand as successful on the other. In the matter of school buildings and teaching, especially in the boroughs and cities, a great improvement is apparent in every section. The contrast of the present with the past is very marked. The education afforded by means of our colleges, academies, seminaries and numerous pay-schools is worthy of notice. They are an important element in this great cause, and are entitled to much credit in the intellectual progress of the people; indeed, the greater part of the credit for thorough and advanced knowledge.

1 This has been the case at least in iron articles, coal and petroleum. Pennsylvania has always produced one-half of the pig-iron cast in the United States, and more than one-half of the iron and steel rails, and of the steel ingots. In 1888 the production was as follows:

Buildings.—The buildings throughout the State for the transaction of public business also exhibit great progress; and the private buildings, both for business and domestic uses, are particularly expressive of taste, enterprise and liberality. Some of the buildings erected by corporations, such as railroad companies, banking companies, insurance companies and publishing companies, are imposing structures which call forth our admiration. This spirit is growing so rapidly that, through active competition, we are drifting into extravagance, if we have not already reached that point in improvements of this kind. It was well for us if the structures represented so much actual wealth, clear of debt; but, unfortunately, many of them are encumbered to such an extent as to amount to a burden upon our energy, especially that part which is carried away in rents and interest beyond the limits of the State. And the church buildings can be mentioned in this connection. Many of them are truly magnificent. But their magnificence is overshadowed by extravagance and expensiveness, and, in many cases, by actual debt. We have a prevailing spirit that conceives and inculcates the idea that grand structures, with or without debts, will lead worldly people “unto the Lord,” and direct their steps into paths of Christian virtue; yet this same spirit tolerates the suffering of many poor people and the gradual degradation of many poor children. And this spirit, besides exciting generosity in behalf of costly buildings with great spires, also gathers large sums of money, in every community, for foreign missions, notwithstanding crimes and offenses and unlawful practices of various kinds blot our social life, and notwithstanding the tendency to continue them, if not to multiply them, obtains a stronger hold upon the present generation. The taxes, assessments and collections of all kinds, taken together, amount truly to an enormous sum.

Railroad corporations are improving the State in every quarter. Their enterprise and generosity excite our amazement. But do we realize the debt which rests upon these improvements,—the interest which is carried away? Municipal corporations possess a similar spirit; they have beautified towns and cities with magnificent structures. But what of the alarming debts? what of the heavy taxes upon our energy and industry? This spirit was actually running away with councilmen and legislators, and public sentiment finally arose and put a limit, if not a check, to their extravagance by legislative enactment. Insurance companies, against death and fire, display everywhere a similar spirit. What buildings, indeed, and what salaries and commissions to officers and agents! Are they not a burden, instead of a benefit, as now conducted, taking away from us more than they are returning? Their business is truly enormous. They are so successful, indeed, that from their collections they not only erect costly buildings and pay extravagant salaries, but return our money for our obligations, thus leading us into paying interest besides assessments. Theatres and public halls could also be mentioned. Altogether, we have buildings that are truly wonderful. But what of the burdens which they have occasioned? What of the strain upon our energy? What of the drain from our income? What of the tendency to elevate and empower capital and to humiliate and weaken labor?

Under all we seem to thrive. The improvements are evidence of enrichment. But who can say that this condition of our State is not really an evil. If it is, what is the remedy to cure it? We must reverse the tendency of drawing our people from the rural districts, we must direct their energy back into simple and small communities, and the results of their labor into local improvements; we must scatter the people more from the large cities into villages and towns; we must encourage numerous populous places throughout the valleys of our State rather than boast of great cities with hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of inhabitants; we must distribute wealth and political power more amongst our towns and townships and counties rather than concentrate them in one large metropolis, more amongst the people rather than in a limited number of capitalists and party leaders.

Inventions.—In referring to the several influences which have been incessantly at work in our gradual development as a State, I cannot overlook the productions of genius in respect to discoveries and inventions. A history of them in the order of their presentation to us would be not only very interesting, but also valuable. They have exerted a wonderful power over our actions. Our progress is mainly attributable to them. By comparing the situation of the people throughout the State in 1776, without the use of coal, steam, petroleum, gas and electricity, railroads and bridges, telegraphs and telephones, and labor-saving machines—such as the mower, reaper, binder, planter and thresher, the sewing-machines and the machinery of various kinds for manufacturing goods out of iron and wood, cotton and wool, etc.,—with our situation in 1876, in the possession of all these things, we can readily see and appreciate the great progress which we have made.

The wealth which we now enjoy has come to us mostly through them; and they are the things that continue from generation to generation. People come and go, wealth is unstable like water, government fluctuates with the passions of mankind; but discoveries and inventions never leave us,—they contain those eternal principles which survive the revolutions of governments and the struggle of rival nations, and they witness the change and antagonism, of progressing and succeeding religions. These governments and nations and religions have their different measures and standards and theories, providing one set of opinions for one age and another set for another age; but they, in the onward course of time, pass away like a dream. The discoveries of genius, the inventions of practical minds, alone survive.

Patriotism.—The patriotism of Pennsylvania during the several trying periods of our country, especially during the Revolution and Rebellion, stands out like a bold, grand monument above all our achievements. Her people have not only shown great ability in developing her resources, her influence and her power, but also devotion to the principles of political independence and unity. As her share of assistance to the general government in prosecuting the Civil War to a successful conclusion, she furnished millions of money and over three hundred and sixty thousand soldiers, a number exceeding one-tenth of her population. In the course of her brilliant history she has exhibited energy and liberality enough on the one hand to create a country; but, in the hour of peril, she has manifested power and devotion enough on the other to preserve it.

The population in 1860 was 2,906,215.

Agriculture.—In concluding this brief narrative of the development of Pennsylvania, I must mention a subject which, if not more important than the subjects already mentioned, is, nevertheless, equally prominent—it is agriculture.

The great majority of our people have been engaged from the time of our earliest settlements till now in this enriching department of labor. It was a necessary employment with which to begin the settlement and improvement of a new country. The immigrants came qualified to carry it on successfully. They possessed all the qualifications for pioneer farmers—physical strength and determination, industry and economy, and practical judgment and perception. Before the Revolution, everything was dependent upon them. They were the motive-power which set the whole community moving in the several avenues of life. In matters of labor, government and religion they constituted the one great element of society which was indispensable. If they had been taken away, the province would have returned to its primitive state. Hence they were the agency which elevated the country above the condition in which it had been held by the aborigines for centuries. Their improvements extended mostly throughout the eastern and southeastern sections, which lay to the east of and about the Susquehanna River, and comprised about one-fourth of the area of the province; and these were effected altogether by actual manual labor, without the aid of labor-saving implements and machinery, a fact worthy of especial mention. After the Revolution, for at least fifty years, the general condition of agriculture remained about the same in respect to influence. It was extended more thoroughly throughout the territory of the State beyond the Susquehanna River. But the genius of man then, decade after decade, began to introduce new subjects which invited capital and energy into new channels, especially for improved highways, and shops, mills and factories of various kinds. The spirit of concentration gradually led away a considerable part of this strong influence from agriculture and directed it into capital and into political and social power, and it was made to subserve the welfare of persons rather than the welfare of communities. The majority of persons still continued for some time in agriculture, and agriculture was benefited in various ways by improved transportation and by labor-saving machinery. But its real independence grew less, and it would seem to have grown less as mechanical power developed itself into greater prominence and usefulness. The tendency of legislation was gradually directed towards capital through steam and coal and iron and manufactured products, rather than agriculture through manual labor and the products of the soil—towards towns and metropolitan places rather than towards the larger divisions of territory, such as townships and counties—towards the leaders of wealth rather than towards the people. Hence, the country districts did not advance in as marked a manner in respect to population and wealth as towns and cities advanced. The total productions of agriculture have increased wonderfully during this century, especially during the last three decades. This arose mostly through the introduction of improved farming implements and machinery, the clearing of land and the increase of farms for agricultural purposes. The general live-stock and barns and dwellings have been improved in character and value. More attention has been directed latterly to the successful cultivation of fruit. The general condition of farmers has been elevated very much; but as a prominent class in the State they do not give that direction to various important affairs—political, social and religious—which they naturally should give by reason of their number and wealth.

The following statistics are submitted in this connection to show the general progress of agriculture; but they reveal also the power and profit of manufactures as compared with agriculture. The investment in farms, implements and stock is over one billion dollars, the income not two hundred million, or one-fifth; but the investment in manufactures does not amount to one billion dollars, and yet the income is nearly seven hundred and fifty million, or three-fourths of the investment.

In 1880 the total population of the State over ten years of age, was 3,203,215. The number engaged in agriculture was 301,112.

\(^1\) Pennsylvania took the lead of all the colonies in agriculture. In 1751 the exports in grain were—wheat, 86,000 bushels; flour, 129,960 bushels; Indian corn, 90,743 bushels; and the total amount of exports then exceeded one million of dollars.—Rupp.

CHAPTER II.

PHYSICAL GEOGRAPHY OF BERKS COUNTY.

GEOLOGY.

SCIENCE, in her survey of the earth, has recognized three kingdoms of nature—first, the animal; second, the plant; and third, the crystal. The animal and plant are both endowed with life. This life commences from a germ and grows by means of imbibed nutriment. In its growth it passes through a series of changes and a gradual development until it reaches the adult state, wherein it continues to death. In its adult state it evolves new germs or seeds, and thus it multiplies life after its own kind. But the crystal is a lifeless object. It begins in a nucleal molecule or particle, and it enlarges by external addition or accretion alone. Therefore it has no development. It simply exists. It does not reproduce particles after its kind.

The earth in the beginning was like a germ.

It was brought to its present condition through a series of changes or progressive formations. Like an animal or plant, it has its special systems of interior and exterior structure, conditions, movements and changes. Under the guidance and the appointed law of an Infinite Mind it passed through a regular course of growth or history, and, like the animal or plant, it has also individuality.

In the grand system of the universe, the earth holds a very subordinate position. The sun is the centre of this system, and the earth is only one of its smaller satellites. The sun is fourteen hundred thousand times larger. It is estimated that this system has a radius of three thousand million miles. The nearest star to the earth is seven thousand times farther off than the planet Neptune, and Neptune is distant two billion six hundred and fifty-five million miles. Thus it appears that the earth, though vast to us, is only a very little object in the universe. Through gravitation, light, meteoric stones and the moon, we learn that there is oneness of law throughout space. From these we can say that the laws which govern the earth are the laws which govern the universe; and, though it is but an atom in immensity, it is, nevertheless, immensity itself in the revelations of truth.

The earth is in form almost a perfect sphere. It is somewhat flattened at its poles. Its equatorial diameter is 7926 miles, and its polar 7900 miles. Its circumference is 24,899 miles. Its entire surface comprises 197,000,000 square miles. The surface is composed of land and water; about one-fourth part is land and three-fourths water. It is divided into two hemispheres—the eastern and western. The land surface of the western hemisphere comprises fourteen million five hundred thousand square miles. The whole of this hemisphere is called America. The northern portion is North America and the southern South America. The surface of North America comprises seven million nine hundred and eighty thousand square miles. The United States occupy the central part, and extend from the Atlantic Ocean on the east to the Pacific Ocean on the west, and from the British possessions on the north to Mexico on the south. They comprise two million three hundred thousand square miles. Pennsylvania is one of these States and comprises forty-six thousand square miles. It is divided into sixty-seven counties. Berks County is one of them and comprises eight hundred and twenty-two square miles, or five hundred and twenty-six thousand square acres. To us this county is a great and important tract of country; yet, by comparison, what a speck it is on the earth! But the natural laws which govern its people, its animals and plants, its waters, etc., are the same as those which govern the people, animals, plants and waters of the whole earth.

In treating of the earth as an individual existence in the universe, we must consider, first, its geology in respect to structure and development; second, its physiography in respect to surface arrangements and physical changes; and third, its relation to man in respect to the distribution of races and their progress. Geology has been divided into four sub-divisions—historical, lithological, dynamical and physiographical. The first treats of the successive stages in the formation of the earth's structure and the concurrent steps in the progress of life, through past time; the second of the constituents of this structure; the third, of the active forces and mechanical agencies which were the means of physical progress; and the fourth, of the systematic external form and feature of the earth.

The progress of the earth's development is marked by ages. These ages are not separated by distinct dividing lines. All efforts to make such divisions have been fruitless. The culminating phases of different periods are traced in the progress of development, and each culmination is the centre of a separate period. But the germ of that period was long working onward in preceding time before it finally came to its full development and stood forth as the characteristic of a new era of progress. Geologists recognize five ages. The first age is the Azoic. It is so called because it is without life. It is admitted that at one time the earth was in a state of universal fusion. The period intervening between this state and when the climate and waters had become fitted for animal life is called the Azoic age. The second is the Palaeozoic, or ancient. In this age there are three periods: 1, the Silurian or period of Mollusks; 2, the Devonian, or period of Fishes; and 3, the Carboniferous, or period of Coal Plants. The third is the Mesozoic, or middle, the age of Reptiles. The fourth is the Cenozoic, or recent, the age of Mammals. And the fifth is the Age of Man, or era of mind. 1

Professor H. D. Rogers made the First Geological Survey of Pennsylvania during the years from 1836 to 1857; and published a geological map in 1858. In the section of the State which includes Berks County, there are four principal strata. These extend through the county from north-east to south-west.

Third. The Gneiss and Primal, in the lower central section. It occupies about one-fifth part.

Fourth. The Mesozoic Red sandstone, in the southern section. It occupies about two-fifths part.

1 Dana's "Manual of Geology."
The first three are placed by him in the Lower Paleozoic Age, and the last is placed in the Upper Paleozoic.

The Azoic Age is also represented in the southern section, in the South Mountain and in the Welsh Mountain. By some geologists it is called the Laurentian system. The Paleozoic or older secondary system, beginning with No. 1 Potsdam sandstone, is represented in Penn's Mount, a spur of South Mountain, at the "White Spot." This system is magnificently developed throughout the entire State.

Dr. John P. Hiester published a Geological Map of Berks County in 1854, which was copied from the Rogers Survey. A copy of this map is presented in this chapter. The streams and creeks on the map illustrate admirably the distribution of water and the general topography of the county. At that time there were twenty-five iron-ore mines in the county, as indicated on the map. Other mines have been opened since, especially in the East Penn Valley. The construction and operation of the railroad caused them to be developed rapidly. Several mines are not indicated on the map, though they were operated, at least had been discovered then, notably Boyertown (on Ironstone Creek), Seisholtzville (at head-waters of Perkiomen Creek) and Heffner's (several miles east of Coxtown, now Fleetwood).

Mineralogy is that branch of natural science which treats of the different kinds of ores, composition of the rocks and stones, etc., and teaches us to distinguish their properties and classify them. There are sixty-eight different elements or separate substances in the material world. Everything, therefore, must be composed of one or more of these elements. Oxygen comprises one-fifth of the air, eight-ninths of the water, three-fourths of all animal bodies and about one-half of the crust of the earth; hydrogen, one-ninth of the water; and carbon is a large constituent of limestones, marbles and magnesian rocks. The other elements are less abundant; and as their abundance diminishes, their value among mineralogists increases.

Among the precious stones, the diamond is the most valuable, and among the metals, vanadium. Iron is worth one cent a pound, silver $18.60, gold $299.72, and vanadium $4792.40. To the best of the knowledge and belief of the mineralogists of Reading, vanadium has no existence within the confines of Berks County.

About one-third of the elements form the mass of the earth, and these are found in Berks County. Most of the others are found only in a few localities in the world, and in very small quantities. The few simple elements met with everywhere are compounded by the operations of nature in wonderful and astonishingly fine and exact proportions. These elements are combined in an infinite number of ways, and so minutely that it requires the highest scientific skill to separate them. The crystallization in minerals, the result of a combination of the elements, is often so small that its forms can only be seen with a powerful microscope. So varied are they that Dana (who is one of the best authorities in mineralogy) has described six thousand five hundred; and new ones are added yearly.

GOLD.—It is known to some persons, and to others it may be a great surprise, that we have gold in Berks County, in the immediate vicinity of Reading; at least so says the eminent chemist, Professor Charles M. Wetherill, Ph.D., M.D. Dr. Wetherill made an examination of rocks, and reported the results of his search to the Academy of Natural Sciences, Philadelphia, December, 1854. In his report he says,—

"In a paper upon the occurrence of gold in Pennsylvania, I alluded to an auriferous quartz in the neighborhood of Reading, Pa., and the examination of which afforded me slight, though uncertain, traces of gold. I stated at the close of the article that I had no doubt that a more careful examination of the rocks in the vicinity would yield affirmative results in an examination for this metal. . . . I have noticed this quartz scattered over the ground in various parts of Berks County, some bearing very strong gold characteristics; they are partially water-worn, but the angles are moderately sharp. On breaking them open, the inclosed masses of dark oxide of iron are apparent."

SILVER.—The most reliable information about silver in Berks County is from the pen of Dr. Wetherill. In speaking of a heap of stones at the junction of Eighth and Ninth Streets, he says,— "Eighth Street quartz—65 grammes x 130 litharge x 10 black flux gave a lead button of 14 grammes, and silver .0075, which contained gold beyond a doubt, as judged from its lustre and resistance to nitric acid.

"Another portion of quartz from the same locality—200 grammes x 400 litharge x .5 charcoal dust, gave lead 17 grammes, silver .00875, containing gold, though not as distinctly as the last.

"Quartz from Jonathan Deininger's field—185 grammes, 370 litharge x .5 charcoal gave 20 grammes of lead, containing .00825 silver, in which no gold could be detected."

By looking at the figures denoting the quantity of silver, it would, at first sight, appear to be infinitesimal; but when it is remembered that the quantity of ore from which it was taken, was only one hundred and eighty-five grammes, and that a ton of the same rock would have produced over forty pounds of silver or seven hundred and fifty dollars, it will be seen that, if there were a large body of the argentiferous quartz, yielding the same per cent. of silver, the mine would be a very remunerative one. Judging from the geological formation of North Reading, it is probable that the argentiferous quartz is not found in a body in or along the mountain, but in isolated fragments scattered over the alluvial soil in the valley.

Professor H. W. Hollenbush, who had a large experience in mineralogy and visited every "nook and corner" in Berks County, exhibited a few years ago a beautiful globule of pure silver which he obtained from a fragment of a rock found in the northwestern part of Oley township. He returned and investigated the locality for silver, but he found nothing.

Some twenty years ago, there was found in Alsace township, a mile and a half north of Fies' Hotel, a combination of the elements among which silver was supposed to be conspicuous. A small organization was formed to extract the silver from the refractory elements. The party secured the services of an expert, who had charge of the mining and smelting operations. After a large amount of labor had been expended in drilling the hard rock and getting it out of its natural bed, it was thought advisable to smelt the ore on hand and see what quantity of silver it contained. A foundry was rented at the foot of Penn Street, a crucible obtained and a quantity of the ore smelted. At the proper time the stockholders of the "Gneiss Silver Mining Company" were invited to see the shining metal poured out of the crucible, and behold! there was enough silver in it to make a half-dollar! The operator asked for more funds to purchase the necessary apparatus to carry on the operations more successfully. The stockholders paid over the required amount, but the operator went to Philadelphia and never returned. It was supposed that the operator had put a half-dollar into the crucible with the ore. No further effort was made to obtain silver from the ore.

COPPER.—Copper combines with many of the other elements, and in consequence of this combination about fifty different minerals are found in which copper forms one of the constituents; six of these varieties are found in Berks, viz.,—chalcopyrite, chrysocolla, malachite, azurite, oxyd of copper, bornite and venenite.

Copper is found at various places in the county, but there is only one locality, Jones' mine, in the eastern part of Caernarvon township, near Joanna Station, in which it has been found in such quantities as to make the mining remunerative. There being no record of the opening of this copper shaft, we give only such information as we obtained from the oldest persons still living, who spent the earlier part of their lives in the vicinity of the mine. Mrs. Lavinia Simmons (nearly eighty-four years of age) said that she could remember distinctly when the first search was made for copper. It was about seventy-five years ago (1806) when the first mining operations began there, by Captain Thomas, who had obtained the privilege from the owner of the land. Richard Trealich was the superintendent of the mine, and he was assisted by two men named Ryfert and Oldfield. These were Englishmen. A building was erected at the large excavation. The slate for the roof, some building material and the machinery for operating the mine were brought from England; and it being before the time of railroads, they were conveyed from New York in waggons.

It appears that Richard Trealich was a miner of great experience, because subsequent excavations proved that he sank a shaft near the spot where the richest copper was deposited. The miners descended perpendicularly one hundred feet, then drove a short distance northeast and sank a shaft eighty feet, making the entire depth of the shaft one hundred and eighty feet. In the bottom of the shaft a very hard rock was met, showing that the miners had struck a different geological formation. In sinking the shaft Alexander Young lost an eye and another man was crippled by an accidental blast. Shortly afterward Anthony Petz, while looking down the shaft at the pumping machinery, inadvertently got his head under the bob and had it crushed.

A considerable amount of copper-ore was taken out of the shaft. They had no furnace to smelt the ore, so Thomas erected one about midway between the present house and barn. The ore was smelted in crucibles; but the furnace and its fixtures being imperfect and the ore not yielding a very high percentage, it is believed Thomas did not obtain enough of copper to pay his expenses; at least the mining was not profitable. In 1814 the machinery was taken away. The copper-mine was then idle until 1838, when it was operated by a man named Sands, who realized a considerable amount of money from the copper. In 1840 a Mr. Simons endeavored to get a lease on the mine; but failing, after strenuous efforts, he commenced to take out ore and continued until 1854 without paying a royalty.

There were at that time only two copper furnaces in this part of the country: one at Tyson’s, in Baltimore, and the other in Jersey City. Mr. Simons hauled much, if not all of his ore, with wagons to Jersey City. With all this expense and inconvenience in transportation, he is said to have realized considerable money. He separated the copper from all the other minerals by a process called “jigging” and “bucking.” These operations were performed as follows: The ore was taken to the Conestoga Creek, and there placed into sieves which were immersed in barrels filled with water, and by a “jig” movement the dirt was washed out and the refuse worked on the top and scraped off. The copper-ore, then almost free from impurities, was put into barrels, for convenience in transportation.

From 1850 to 1854 the mine was in the hands of the American Mining Company, whose branch office was in New York. This company also sent the ore to Jersey City, and was reported to have been successful.

The mine was lying idle from 1854 till 1869, when it was operated by the Schuylkill Copper Company, of Phœnixville, under the superintendence of James Harvey. This company opened a place a little farther east of the shaft, and took out a copper clay, which yielded about six per cent. of copper. Some of this clay was sent to England and the rest to Jersey City, till the company at Jersey City broke up; then the Copper Company at Phœnixville erected a furnace and smelted all the clay which the mine produced till 1878. They then abandoned the mine, and it has been idle since. This clay runs in veins a few feet thick. It is believed by some that it is far from being exhausted.

At this mine are found fine specimens of malachite, chalcopyrite, chrysocolla, bornite and venerate.

Iron.—Iron ore has been found in the county in very great quantities. It is not known when mining for this ore began in this vicinity. The first places were doubtless in Colebrookdale and Caernarvon townships. Its rich deposits have been a source of great wealth to the county. They have caused forges and furnaces to be erected in every section, which have been worked almost constantly till now. The Boyertown Mines and the Jones Mines are particularly prominent. The East Penn Valley has supplied immense quantities of this ore. The total weight carried away cannot be estimated.

In 1882 there were over one hundred mines in successful operation, whose annual production exceeded three hundred thousand tons. They then furnished constant employment to over a thousand men and brought into our county over a million of dollars. The many improvements in Schuylkill and East Penn Valleys indicate the prosperity afforded through this single source—iron-ore.

The annual product of the county in 1880 was two hundred and fifty-two thousand nine hundred and forty tons. The Census Report placed the county third in the list of ore-producing counties in Pennsylvania—Lehigh having been first and Lebanon second. In the entire country, our county was seventh.

The following are the prominent mines in the county with the per centum of iron in the ore:

CATALOGUE OF MINERALS IN COUNTY.

The following alphabetical catalogue contains the names of all the minerals which have been found in Berks County: 1

ALLANITE is found on Haines', Rhoads' and Schreuder's farms, near Pricetown, in Rushmanor township. It is associated with magnetite and zircon. The mineral is black, and was named after T. Allen, the discoverer.

ALLOPHANE has been found, in small quantities, at Jones' mine, in the eastern part of Caernarvon township. It occurs in fine white and sky-blue mammillar and stalactitic masses.

APATITE is a phosphate of lime, and crystallizes in six-sided prisms of a greenish color. It is found in magnetite at Jones' Mine, and in serpentine in Ruth's Mine.

ARAGONITE.—(See Calcite.)

AMPHIBOLE—a hornblende rock, which extends over a large portion of the county. The best specimens are found in the vicinity of Antietam Lake. It takes different forms, according to the locality, viz., that of Actinolite, at Jones' Mine; Abestos, at Earlville, on the Manatawny, and at Antietam Lake; of Mountain Leather, at Boyertown, and on Mr. Ezra High's farm, a mile south of Reading, in a cut of the Pennsylvania Schuylkill Valley Railroad, from which specimens a foot square have been obtained; of Hornblende, a constituent of many of the South Mountain rocks, on Henry Ruth's farm, Mohnsville; and of Byssolite, at Antietam Lake and in Longswamp township.

APOPHYLLITE.—(See Zeolites.)

AURICHALCITE is reported to have been found at Jones' mine and on Fritz's Island; but it has been of very rare occurrence.

AZURITE, in fine azure-blue crystallization, was obtained, a few years ago, at Jones' Mine and on Fritz's Island.

BARITE occurs, abundantly associated with other mineral matter, at Mt. Etna (Tulpehocken township), which, when it is struck, emits an odor resembling sulphureted hydrogen, and hence it is called Petid Borgia.

BORITE is a sulphuret of copper of a brilliant red and blue color. Very fine specimens are found at Jones' Mine and on Fritz's Island.

BRUCITE, a hydrate of magnesia,—takes its name from Dr. Bruce, of New York, the discoverer. It is of a yellowish tint, and is met with on Fritz's Island, both laminar and botryoidal. A vein of this mineral was also struck in Ruth's Mine.

CALCITE,—a carbonate of lime,—is found in various forms through the extensive limestone formation of the county. Very beautiful acicular crystals and botryoidal coatings of this mineral are found at Jones' Mine, which are called Aragonite, from Aragon, a place in Spain where the crystallization was first discovered. It is also found on Fritz's Island, Ruth's and Wheatfield Mines, and in Crystal Cave. From its peculiar crystallization at the Big Dam, Fritz's Island and Luckenbill's Cave, it is called Dog-Tooth Spar. It is met with in some parts of Bern and Cumru townships, in rhombohedral crystals, and is called Calcite.

CHALCOCITE—from chalcis, copper,—is a sulphide of the mineral. It crystallizes in rhombs, and occurs sparingly at Fritz's Island and Jones' Mine.

CHALCOPYRITE—copper pyrites,—occurs at Fritz's Island, Jones' Mine and Boyertown.

CHLORITE—from chloros, green,—is found at Fritz's Island, Jones' Mine, Wheatfield and Ruth's Mine.

CHLOROPAL is a silicate of iron, and is found in the hills in the neighborhood of Longswamp Church.

CHRYSOCOLLA—from chrusos, gold, and kolli, glue,—is a silicate of copper of a blue or green color, and is met with at Jones' Mine and Fritz's Island.

CHRYSOLITE—from chrusos, gold, and lithos, stone,—is composed principally of silica and magnesia, and occurs in thin layers on Fritz's Island and Ruth's Mine.

COPPER.—Large quantities of copper-ore were taken out of Jones' Mine some years ago. The iron-ore and rocks are saturated with copper, but the percentage is too small, and the process of working the ore is too expensive, to be remunerative. Fritz's Island, Wheatfield and Boyertown also contain small veins of copper.

DAMOURITE—named after the French chemist, Damour,—is found on Jacob Fox's farm, in Rushmanor township; at the Rockland Forge of a yellowish pale-green color, with a pearly lustre, found in masses, with lilac quartz; on Levi Merkel's farm, in Oley township; at the Wheatfield Mine and in the various limonite mines in the Limestone Valley.

DATOLITE is a white mineral in small crystals, found only on Fritz's Island.

DENDRITES—from dendron, tree,—are marks or impressions on rocks on Fritz's Island, at Ruth's Mine and in Albany township, resembling trees.

DEWEYHITE—named after Professor Dewey,—is obtained in several forms in Ruth's Mine, and is a siltate of magnesia.

EPIDOTE abounds in masses and in crystals at Antietam Lake and in Longswamp, two miles southwest from Mertztown, in masses at Fleetwood, Boyertown, Pricetown, Hancock and at various places in the South Mountains.

FELDSPAR group forms the principal constituent of the South Mountain rocks and contains a variety of pyroxen, viz.: Labradorite, from Labrador, where the mineral was first observed. It is found in small crystals in the rocks at Antietam Lake; Oligoclase or

PHYSICAL GEOGRAPHY.

Albite at the Nestor and Gilbert Mines, in Washington township; at Siersholtzville, Orthoclase and other feldspar minerals at Antietam Lake.

Fluorite is composed of fluorine and calcium, and is found in the limestones on Leinbach's Hill and at the Big Dam. The crystals are cubical, and of a deep blue color.

Galenite—arsenide of lead—was found in a small vein on Fritz's Island.

Garnet—garnetese, like a grain—are found both crystallized and massive, of a rich red color, in Alsace township, east of Antietam Lake, at Hertzog's Mill, in Exeter township, and at Ruth's Mine. The lime-alumina garnets of Fritz's Island are called grossularite.

Gold.—Dr. Charles M. Wetherill analyzed several rocks found in North Reading and discovered traces of gold and silver.

Goethite is an iron ore of a peculiar crystallization found at the Udrée Mine, one and a half miles south of Pricetown. Another variety of this ore is found at the head of Walnut Street, Reading, on the farm of P. D. Wanner, Esq., and is known by the name of lepidobrosite—from lepis, scale, and krotis, fibre.

Graphite—from grapho, I write—is found in the vicinity of Boyertown, on the farms of Messrs. Fegeley, J. Bechtel and Daniel Himmelreich, and at Dr. Funk's fish-pond, on Schmeck's farm, in Longswamp, in Magnette, at Siersholtzville, and at Antietam Lake.

Gypsum.—The name of this mineral is from the Greek word gypnos, and was anciently applied to the same mineral. It is a sulphate of lime and occurs at Bushong's Mine, north of their furnace, at Boyertown and in beautiful hexagonal crystals at Jones' Mine.

Hematite is a very abundant ore in the East Penn Valley. When scratched or crushed it has a deep-red or blood color, and hence the name—haïma, blood. The micaceous and specular varieties occur at Fritz's Island, at J. F. Dum's Mine, near Fleetwood, and in masses at Lobachsville.

Kämenerite—named after Kämener, a Russian—is composed principally of silica and manganese, and is met with in small quantities only at Wheatfield.

Kaulin is derived from Kauling, a place in China, where the Chinese obtain the material for their fine ware. It is found at the foot of Mount Penn, at Boyertown, James F. Dum's mine at Fleetwood, at Mertztown, on Schmeck's farm in Longswamp, at Weaver's mine in Oley township, and at various other places in smaller bodies.

Limonite is one of the most important iron ores. It is a brown hematite, and was called limonite—from leimo, a meadow—because it was first found in bogs and low places.

Magnette.—The iron-ore at Ruth's, Wheatfield, Fritz's Island, Boyertown and other places is magnette. It is crystallized in fine octahedrons and dodecahedrons at Fritz's Island, Boyertown and Jones' Mine. It is titanniferous at Treichlersville, at Huff's Church and at Pricetown.

Magnesite is a carbonate of magnesia from Kaufman and Spang's Mine, near Spangsville, in Earl township.

Malachite is a green carbonate of copper from Jones' Mine, and Fritz's Island furnished some specimens some years ago.

Marble.—A good quality is taken from Deppen's quarry at Wernersville, Dr. Eppler's quarry at Leesport, and Hill's quarry at Shillington.

Marcasite is a term of Arabic origin and is applied to a sulphuret of iron found in Dr. Eppler's quarry and on Fritz's Island.

Mica.—Group extends in small crystals over the whole South Mountain range. The largest specimens are found near Spangsville, in Earl township, though fair specimens are found on Furnace Hill, in Rouscomb-manor township. Muscovite and biotite occur near Huff's Church.

Molybdene.—This mineral is met with on Valentine Hartman's farm, and a number of other places in the vicinity, but only in foliated crystals.

Ochre.—Small quantities of yellow and red color may be obtained at Noll's Mine, Fleetwood, Udrée's Mine and at Siersholtzville.

Prochlorite is a green foliated mineral and appears very much like mica. Very excellent specimens have been collected at Wheatfield, Jones' Mine and on Fritz's Island. Its crystals are hexagonal and some have lines parallel to the sides.

Psilomelane—from psilos, smooth, and melas, black—is a peroxide of manganese. The best specimens have been obtained near the Rockland Forge.

Pyrites.—Sulphuret of iron abounds in many of the ore-beds of the county, and especially at Wheatfield, Jones' Mine, Boyertown and on Fritz's Island. Some fine octahedral crystals are found at these places. Globular radiating specimens are found in Centre and Windsor townships.

Pyroxene.—This mineral is of a dark-green and black color. The largest crystals are found on Gottschall's farm, in Alsace township. It is abundant in the vicinity of Antietam Lake and at Rauch's Mine, in Hereford. Sakhite, a variety of this mineral, is abundant, is a frequent constituent of the syenites of the South Mountains. Augite, another variety, is found at Babb's tavern and around Antietam Lake.

Pyrrhotite is a sulphuret of iron, slightly nickeliferous. Its localities are Gottschall's Mine and other places in Alsace and at Boyertown.

Pyrolusite is an oxide of manganese and is mentioned by Dr. Genth as occurring "in small rhombic crystals in geodes, frequently associated with turgite, in fmonite beds" in the county, but he states no locality.

Quartz.—Transparent crystals are found on Lee's farm, southeast of Friedensburg, in Windsor and Greenwich townships; and fine doubly terminated crystals at Noll's Mine at Fleetwood. Smoky quartz crystals occur on Updegrove's farm in Union, on Berg's farm in Albany and on Flint Hill. Good specimens of ferruginous and drasy quartz may be obtained on Flint Hill and on Bomegratz's farm in Ruscoban-manor. Chaledony is found on Flint Hill, at Bomegratz's, Fleetwood, Fritz's Island, Friedensburg and Mertztown. Orbite Chaledony at Moselem. Chaledonie-Jasper, Jasper, Agate and Agate-Jasper are abundant at Wernerville, along the mountain, at Bomegratz's, Gottschall's, Flint Hill and in Longswamp, two miles south of Mertztown. Hornstone occurs only at Friedensburg, and floatstone at Boyertown.

Basanite, Lydianstone or Touchstone is a companion of jasper and chaledony, and is usually found in the same localities where they exist, but the largest and purest specimens are found in the Pennsylvania Schuylkill Valley cut southwest of Reading.

Retinalite—from retina, resin—is a species of serpentine of a resinos color met with at Ruth's, Wheatfield, Jones' Mine and on Fritz's Island.

Ripidolite occurs on Fritz's Island and at Jones' Mine.

Serpentine.—Very excellent specimens of this mineral were taken out of the mines at Ruth's and Fritz's Island, and among them were some fine specimens of Precious or noble serpentine. The same mineral was found associated with soapstone at Jones' Mine, Boyertown and Topton.

Siderite.—Dr. Genth found this mineral, a species of iron-ore, on Valentine Hartman's farm and at the Weaver Mine in Oley.

Sphene—from sphen, wedge, because the crystal is wedge-shaped—is a variety of titanium, and is found in small crystals in magnetite south of Half's Church, in Hereford.

Stibnite is a tarsulphide of antimony, very rare, only a few small crystals having been found on Fritz's Island.

Talc or steatite is usually associated with the serpentines of Fritz's Island and Jones' Mine.

Titanite occurs two miles northeast of Jones' Mine.

Turquoise is a common iron-ore and generally forms thin black or red layers on limonite, on P. D. Wanner's farm, at Moselem, and at many of the mines in the East Penn Valley.

Venerite is a clay of chlorite at Jones' Mine containing about five per cent. of copper.

Wad is an earthy oxide of manganese, found at Lyons, at old Oley tunnel-mine and at the Half-Way House in Maiden Creek. It is frequently associated with the limonite ores.

Wavellite, named after Dr. Wavel, has a finely-radiated structure; a few specimens were found at Wheatfield.

Xanthite is a Fritz's Island mineral of a yellow color and crystallized in cubes and hexagonal prisms.

Xanthosiderite is an oxide of iron from a brown to a brownish red color; occurs in mines in the East Penn Valley. The best specimens were from the vicinity of Fleetwood.

Zircon crystals of a deep wine color are found in the neighborhood of Pricetown, associated with magnetite.

Zeolite Family.—Thomasonite, named after Dr. Thomson, and mesolite are Fritz's Island minerals. The crystals of each are of a white or pearly color, round and radiating from a small nucleus in the centre. The Thomasonites are hard and solid, but the mesolites are generally softer and fibrous.

Chabazite, principally a Fritz's Island mineral, crystallizes in cubes of a white pearly lustre and was quite abundant at one time. It was recently found at Ruth's Mine.

Apophyllite is also found exclusively on Fritz's Island. Its color is white and it crystallizes in various forms.

Stilbite—from silbe, lustre—is so called on account of its beautiful lustre. Some years ago Raudebush's mine produced many specimens. It is found at Wheatfield, Fritz's Island, Birdsboro', and on Fegley's farm, near Bechtelsville.

Undescribed Zeolite.—A mineral belonging to this family is found on Fritz's Island; the crystals differ from all others of the same family, and since no one has ever described them, they have always been called undescribed zeolites.

BOTANY.1

Botanical research in Berks County was begun by Gerhard Gottlieb Bischoff, a native of Stadt-Im, in Thuringia, Germany, born May 18, 1775. He was a brother of the distinguished Professor G. W. Bischoff, of the University of Heidelberg. After having received a good education he studied pharmacy with his father. From 1793 to 1817 he served as apothecary's assistant in various parts of Germany and Switzerland. His brother Frederick having come to this country and settled at Reading, he decided to leave his native land and join him, and accordingly sailed from Rotterdam on July 29, 1817, arriving at Reading on the 23d day of October following. In time he established himself here as an apothecary, doing business on Penn Street, midway between Sixth and

1 The author is indebted to Dr. Daniel B. D. Beaver, of Reading, for this article on the botany of the county, he having prepared it expressly for this history.
Seventh Streets, where he resided till his death, in 1856. He left a well-preserved collection of European and American plants, which passed into the possession of Dr. Daniel B. D. Beaver. Among them are about one hundred and fifty specimens which were collected in this county.

Next in order of time came Dr. John P. Hiester, whose professional career is mentioned in the chapter on the Medical Profession. He was an enthusiastic lover of the natural sciences, to which he devoted much time, although actively engaged in the practice of medicine. He made a collection of the plants of the county, which, after his death, was presented to Franklin and Marshall College, Lancaster, Pa. He also took a lively interest in the geological features of the county, and published a colored map illustrating them.

Contemporaneous with Dr. Hiester was Rev. Dr. T. C. Porter, now holding the chair of botany in Lafayette College, Easton, whose reputation as a reliable observer and botanist needs no comment here. He resided at Reading during part of the years 1848 and 1849, and in that time collected many of the native plants. Of these a few specimens are preserved in the Bishop's Herbarium.

Another name that deserves mention is that of Hiram W. Hollenbush, a native of this county. He devoted his life to the study of the minerals of the county, and accumulated a mass of fragmentary knowledge of the subject, which, but for his lack of the distinguishing mental trait of the successful scientist—the faculty to generalize facts—and a life-long struggle with poverty, might have secured him a high position among the mineralogists of his State and day. He also took some interest in botany. He made a collection of the different kinds of wood growing in the county, and at one time gave some attention to the fungi, but, unfortunately, left nothing to indicate the extent of his labor, or point the way to his successors in the field of botany.

At present there are many amateur botanists in this county, but their work has been done without organized effort—a consideration highly necessary for obtaining the most fruitful results. The first attempt to prepare a list of the known plants of the county was made by Dr. Daniel B. D. Beaver, when he presented a list to the Reading Society of Natural Sciences. Since then no further progress has been made.

In regard to some of the conditions which determine the richness of the flora of a section of country, this county is unfavorably situated. The distribution and propagation of plant-life are largely dependent upon water-courses and the character of the soil. The former comprising the connecting links between highland and lowland, and draining large areas of territory varying in altitude and latitude, and diverse in geological character, they are the receptacles by which, during the wet season, numberless seeds and spores of plants are swept along and mixed in the surface washings and deposited elsewhere, frequently upon distant banks of the stream. In this manner the flora of lowlands is enriched, and usually in proportion to the surface drained by the streams which water them. In this respect, this county lacks the advantages of some others in this State. Its borders are on line with the water-shed between the main stream—the Schuylkill—and other streams on the east, west and south; on the east, on the divide with the Lehigh; on the west, with the Susquehanna; and on the south, with the tributaries of the Delaware. From the north it receives the waters of the Schuylkill, which drains the eastern two-thirds of Schuylkill County, and carries along a number of plants which are native in that section, the most conspicuous being Rhododendron maximum (great laurel) and Rubus odoratus (purple flowering raspberry). The former does not grow on limestone soil. Both have been found here only on the banks of the Schuylkill.

The flora of this county have received accessions by water channel from the north only; and these it has transmitted, with its own peculiarities, to neighboring sections to the southward. In so far, then, as their native characters have been modified by the distributive effects of water-courses, they do not differ much from those of Montgomer, Chester and Schuylkill Counties, while with those of the counties bordering on the Susquehanna and Delaware they are in strong contrast, lacking much of their richness.
The county may be wanting in some respects, but it is peculiarly adapted for rich flora by its geological formation. It possesses unusual variety of soil. In the older formation of South Mountain, east and west of Reading, there are the old Laurentian gneiss and Potsdam sandstone, which, by their disintegration, give a distinguishing character to the soil. Immediately to the north of this is the belt of Trenton limestone, extending east and west through the county. Northwardly from Reading these limestones are overlaid by the Hudson shales, which become continuous on the surface with the Oneida sandstone of the Blue Mountains, but southwardly the surface is composed mainly of the new red sandstone formation, with an occasional small area of trap rock. The most conspicuous trap formation is that of Flying Hill. This furnishes several plants which have not been found elsewhere in the county. With this varying soil for plants of different habits upon which to take root and flourish, the native flora of this county were probably enriched long ago by those agencies which serve to distribute the germs of plant-life independently of local conditions—such as the flight of birds, winds and the transportation of merchandise. They should therefore be expected to compare favorably with those of the adjoining counties.

The plants which form the basis of this article have been collected mainly west of the Schuylkill. A few were found on "Neversink Mountain" and "Penn's Mountain," and on the red shale in the southeastern part of the county. West of the Schuylkill they were obtained from all the various kinds of soil—on the South Mountain, on the limestone and shale in the valley, on the red sand and shale of Cumru and adjoining townships, and on the trap of Flying Hill—and may be taken to represent fairly the flora of the county, excepting that part comprising the southern slope of the Blue Mountain. They include only the phanerogamous and vascular cryptogamous plants. The mosses, fungi, liver-worts and lichens have not been studied sufficiently to warrant a report of what has been done.

The progress made with the classes here presented can be estimated only by comparison with what is known of the flora of neighboring counties. For this purpose Chester County will serve best, inasmuch as its plants have been studied more extensively than those of any other, which is shown by Dr. Darlington's "Flora Cestrica," a book devoted entirely to a description of the plant-life of that county, and recognized as one of the most complete works of its kind.

Dr. Darlington enumerates ten hundred and seventy-six flowering plants, including all those in cultivation, which have been found in Chester County. The list here given is not intended to include cultivated plants. The distinction between cultivated and wild is in some instances so difficult to make that hardly two observers would draw the line at the same place. Then, again, a plant may grow wild luxuriantly in certain localities, while in others, owing to differences of soil, it will flourish only under cultivation. To determine the relative value of our work, it becomes necessary to compare Dr. Darlington's list of cultivated plants one by one with ours.

This comparison shows his list to contain ninety-two species which are known to be in cultivation here, and which are therefore excluded from ours. Deducting these ninety-two from ten hundred and seventy-six, there remain nine hundred and eighty-four species as wild plants, according to our classification against which our list presents eight hundred and ninety-six species. Of vascular cryptogams, horsetails, ferns and club-mosses Dr. Darlington gives thirty-nine species, whilst our list contains thirty-eight. Supposing the flora of each county to contain about the same number of species, there would remain undetermined in this county eighty-eight flowering plants and one cryptogam.

The botanical work which remains to be done in this county lies chiefly amongst the trees, sedges and grasses. It is to be regretted that so little has been done with the lower forms of vegetable life. This is, probably, owing to the difficulty which the amateur encounters in the study of them. Few of them can be examined satisfactorily without the aid of a microscope.

Among the rare plants here, the following may be mentioned: Arabis patens, one of the rarest, found on the banks of the Schuylkill, near Flying Hill; _Lepidium campestre_, near Boyertown; _Viola rostrata_, banks of the Angelica; _Impatiens pallida_, banks of the Tulpehocken, in Heidelberg township; _Oxalis violacea_, Spring township; _Agrimonia pareiflora_, copse near Bethany Orphans' Home; _Rosa micrantha_, Angelica Creek; _Hydrangea arborescens_ and _Sambucus pubens_, Flying Hill; _Dio- dia teres_, hills near Fritztown; _Droser a rotundifolia_, Chamæthium luteum, near Bethany Orphans' Home; _Rhododendron maximum_, _Asplenium trichomanes_ and _Woodsi a obtusa_, Flying Hill; _Camptosorus rhizophyllus_, Flying Hill and limestone ridge near Penn Street bridge, Reading; _Aphylton reniflorum_, _Obotalaria Virginica_, _Lirnanthemum lacunosum_, _Habenaria lae rera_, _Spiranths latifolia_, _Pogonia verticillata_, _Aplectrum hymenale_, near Hertzog's saw-mill, Cumru township; _Stachys palustris_, _Arisema draconium_, banks of the Tulpehocken; _Gnaphalium polyccephalum_, Neversink Mountain.

The following list has been compiled mainly from the plants in the possession of Mr. T. J. Oberlin, at Sinking Spring,—who has probably the best collection of native plants in the county, from the Bischoff Herbarium, and from the collection of Dr. Daniel B. D. Beaver. Professor Porter supplied some species in the latter’s collection, which he and Dr. Hiester found here, and which are not in the other collections. The nomenclature used in the catalogue of plants is that of Gray, as given in his “Manual of Botany.”

MOUNTAINS.

The Appalachian chain of mountains extends through the eastern territory of the United States from the St. Lawrence River on the north, to the State of Georgia on the south. The greatest heights are in North Carolina. There they are between six thousand and six thousand eight hundred feet above the sea. This chain includes all the ridges. Two ridges of this conspicuous chain extend through Berks County. They are the “Blue Mountain” and the “South Mountain.”

The Blue Mountain, in its course south twenty-five degrees west from the Delaware, at Easton, to the Susquehanna, at Harrisburg, forms the present northern boundary line of Berks County. It was a barrier to migration in the earliest settlements of this section of the State, and it was the limit of the earliest surveys which were made northwestwardly from the Delaware River. The earliest map of surveys was prepared by Lewis Evans, and published by him on March 25, 1749, pursuant to an act of Parliament. This map is in the possession of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, at Philadelphia. Several drafts of earlier dates appear in the first two volumes of the Pennsylvania Archives, and relate to purchases of land from the Indians. The apex of this mountain undulates. Its average height above the sea is about twelve hundred feet. The distinguishing peculiarities in the formation of the mountain in Berks County are the “Pinnacle” (a deep and rugged projection in the northeastern part, of equal height, extending southeast, about two miles in length, at an angle of about forty-five degrees), the “Schuykill Gap” (a picturesque break in the northern part, several hundred feet wide at the base, through which the Schuykill River flows), the “Round Head” (a similar projection in the northwestern part, extending southwest) and numerous ravines which were washed out in the mountain-side by rolling waters in the course of time, and came to be useful to man in having marked out for him easy passes over the mountain.

A wonderful feature of this mountain is its intersection by five gaps at almost equal distances for a length of one hundred and four miles,—first, the “Delaware Gap,” at the State line on the east; second, the “Lehigh Gap,” twenty-eight miles distant; third, the “Schuykill Gap,” twenty-six miles; fourth, the “Swarata Gap,” twenty-eight miles; and fifth, the “Susquehanna Gap,” twenty-two miles. At the “Schuykill Gap” there are apparent in the outlines of the mountain ten curious hooks or coves, which were caused by geological disturbances.

In looking at the mountain from a distant point it has a bluish appearance. Hence it was and is called “Blue Ridge.” The first mention of this name appears in the printed draft of land which was purchased from the Indians in 1749. It is published in 2 Pennsylvania Archives. In the Evans map mentioned, it is called the “Kittatinny Mountain,” corrupted from the Indian word “Kau-ta-tinchunk,”’ meaning endless. It is also sometimes called North Mountain. The grand succession of mountains to the northward for many miles, in almost parallel ridges, have been named “St. Anthony’s Wilderness.”
The South Mountain extends through the county southeastwardly. It enters about the middle of the western boundary, near the corner-stone of the dividing line between Lancaster and Lebanon Counties. At this point it is distant from the Blue Mountain about fifteen miles. It is called South Mountain because it lies south of the Blue Mountain. The distance between them increases as they diverge eastwardly. At Reading it is about twenty-three miles distant. The highest point in this mountain is near the county line in Lebanon County, on a spur extending several miles southwestwardly. Its height is about twelve hundred feet. There is a prominent projection of large rocks near by in Berks County, somewhat less in height. It is called "Adler's Kupf" (Eagle's Head). Years ago many native eagles roosted there. Now they are seldom seen in the vicinity. Their departure was induced through the repeated removal of the surrounding trees. The ringing axe of the woodman, the curling smoke of the coal-burner and the cracking gun of the hunter disturbed his wild solitude.

In the southern section of the county this mountain has a greater width. It includes a succession of rolling hills, almost entirely covered with growing trees. Some porous have been cleared and converted into farming lands. This district, being thus covered and having the appearance of a forest, is called "The Forest." The "Welsh Mountain" and the "Flying Hills" are included in this range.

The "Flying Hills" extend along the southerly side of the Schuylkill River for several miles. They comprise a small ridge broken by gorges. They were given this name by the early settlers because numerous grouse were seen flying there. They are indicated on the Evans map, and also on a draft which shows the line of the Schuylkill from this point northwardly about eight miles, having been made in the year 1743, by Nicholas Scull, in a survey for a road from Reading to Maiden Creek. From that time till now they have been so known and called. They can be seen and identified for forty miles down the Schuylkill Valley. From afar they resemble great monuments, and they were famous for game until recently. Of the gorges mentioned, the "Gibraltar" is the most remarkable and picturesque. Its narrowness and steep hill-sides suggested its name.

Numerous hills are scattered throughout the county. They subserve the agricultural districts admirably in respect to wood and water. Their natural arrangement and distribution are wonderful. The capidity of man is, however, gradually breaking up this harmony of nature by cutting down the trees and tilling the land. The destruction of the woods has been considered, for some years, as impolitic; and it has become a subject of increasing concern.

In the western section the most conspicuous hills are "Stondt's Hill," located at the great bend of the Schuylkill, about six miles north of Reading (named after the owner of the land), and "Scull's Hill," distant about five miles farther to the north (named after Nicholas Scull, the surveyor-general of the province from 1748 till 1761).

In the eastern section the county is considerably broken by intersecting hills which extend in different directions, mostly, however, to the north and south. The "Oley Hills" are most conspicuous in a historic aspect. They are mentioned in patents and deeds of lands before 1720. Since 1783 the most prominent hill in that vicinity has been called "Earl Mountain," because it was cut from Oley and included in a new township of that name then erected. The "Monocacy Hill," cone-shaped, is situated several miles southwardly, near the river. The "Reading Hills" are the most conspicuous in the central section in a natural aspect. They were included in the "Manor of Penn's Mount," a large tract which was set apart for the use of the Penns before the erection of the county, and included about twelve thousand acres. The hill, known by the citizens of Reading as "Penn's Mount," adjoins the city on the east. Its elevated top commands a magnificent view of the Schuylkill and Lebanon Valleys to the north and west, which are especially rich in agriculture, manufactures and internal improvements; and it overlooks an area of territory about five hundred square miles. It has two conspicuous spots at the apex, facing the west, which are called...
"White Spot" and "Black Spot." They are visible to the naked eye for a distance of thirty miles. They were called so by the first inhabitants of Reading. Their general appearance does not seem to change any. They are bare spots on the hill-side, composed of stones and rocks. The "White Spot" is the nearer and more accessible. It has been for many years, and is still, resorted to for stones for building purposes, and it is frequently visited also by resident and stranger for the view it commands. The removal of the stones gives the spot a white appearance. Time and the weather are not given an opportunity to darken the surface of the stones. The "Black Spot" has not been disturbed till recently; hence its black appearance. Their elevation above the Schuylkill River at the foot of Penn Street is as follows: White Spot, 767.64 feet; Black Spot, 879.78 feet. The elevation of the higher point above the sea is about eleven hundred feet.

The hill known as the "Neversink" adjoins the city on the south. Its highest point is somewhat lower than Penn's Mount. It commands a magnificent view of the Schuylkill Valley to the southeast for forty miles and of "The Forest" to the south and southwest for upwards of ten miles. It overlooks the double bend in the river, which forms a large S, both projections being mostly farming land; the one extending northwardly being known as "Lewis' Neck" (from the first settler there), and the other southwardly as "Poplar Neck" (from the great poplar-trees) for more than one hundred and fifty years. The point of observation is called "Fairview." It also has been for years, and still is, frequently visited. This hill lies east and west and forms, with Penn's Mount, a large T. Its northern declivity is rather gentle, but the southern steep and rugged. It has been known by the name of "Neversink" for many years. It is mentioned in surveys of adjoining land which were made as early as 1714. An interesting, though ridiculous, tradition is connected with its origin. It was said by early settlers that an Indian had devised a "flying machine," by which he proposed to fly from the one hill to the other and "never sink."

His effort proved a failure. Instead of flying into fame he sank into shame. The word is of Indian origin, "Navesink," and means fishing-ground. The Schuylkill River in this vicinity was formerly a famous fishing-ground for shad. Fisheries were carried on successfully until the construction of the canal, about 1820.

"Schwartz-wald" is situated several miles to the east. It was included in the "Manor lands." The woods are dark and like a forest. This name was given by the early settlers in commemoration of their native place whence they emigrated.

"Irish Mountain" is near the centre of the county. It is prominent and overlooks the Schuylkill Valley from the Blue Mountain to the South Mountain, especially the fertile lands which adjoin the Maiden Creek and its tributaries. The early settlers round about were mostly Germans. They named the hill after English settlers who had located or rather "squatted" there. The language and manners of the latter were more or less objectionable to them, and they among themselves entertained contempt for the intruders, and in conversation called them the "Irish."

"Spitzenberg" is a cone-shaped hill near by the Pinnacle. Its peculiar shape makes it conspicuous. It is not as elevated as the mountain to the north.

VALLEYS.

Nature has arranged the earth's surface within the borders of Berks County in a superior manner. The arrangement is not surpassed by that of any county in the State. Its rolling character, interspersed with hills and mountains, and intersected by numerous irrigating rivulets and streams, renders it most admirable for successful cultivation with ordinary labor. The well-directed energy and enterprise of the farmers have enriched and improved it to a wonderful degree.

A depression in the central portion of the county extends from the Blue Mountain on the north to the boundary line on the southeast, a distance of thirty-two miles. It resembles an "L" irregularly drawn. It is called "Schuylkill Valley," and takes its name from the meandering river that flows through its bosom.
PHYSICAL GEOGRAPHY.

It is not distinguished for width; above Reading it is rather open, below rather confined. Valleys enter it on the east and on the west. The most conspicuous of the eastern valleys are the Maiden Creek, the Antietam, the Monocacy and the Manatawny; and of the western the Tulpehocken, the Wyomissing, the Allegheny and the Hay-Creek. All take their names from the streams which flow through them. On both sides they begin at the extreme limits of the county, excepting the Antietam and Monocacy, which begin in the central portion. Together they present a remarkable conformation; they distribute the water supply equally. Their depression is from the limits of the county towards the centre, with a southern inclination. The principal valley has the lowest points of the county from the northern limit to the southern. The limits on the east, west and south are water-sheds to a great degree; inside the waters flow inwardly; but at the lines, and outside thereof, they flow outwardly—on the east into the Lehigh River and Perkiomen Creek, and on the west and south into the Swatara Creek and Conestoga Creek, which empty into the Susquehanna River. These valleys, therefore, gather all the waters within the county and first direct them into and through its territory, for the great benefit of its industrious inhabitants, before they allow them to depart. Berks County occupies the central portion of the large district, in area forty-six hundred square miles, which lies between the Delaware and Susquehanna Rivers. The plan of distribution of valleys and waters between these rivers is marvelous. And the leaders in the movement for the erection of the county in this large body of land displayed remarkable foresight and knowledge in obtaining such boundary lines.

The "Tulpehocken Valley" forms the eastern section of the Lebanon Valley, the Swatara Valley (which extends westwardly through Lebanon and Dauphin Counties) the western section. These two valleys are, together, about fifty-four miles long, and they take the name of Lebanon Valley from the town which occupies the highest point midway.

There are other valleys, but they have only a local character and take their names from the respective streams which flow through them. The "Schuylkill Gap," in the Blue Mountain, where the Schuylkill River enters the county, is the only gap of marked features in the county.

STREAMS.

Springs are the great sources of all streams. They supply us with water for all purposes. They arise mostly in the mountains and elevated portions of country. They supply all the streams in Berks County, and almost the entire quantity flows from springs which are situated within its borders. This is exceptional; comparatively little water is drained from the adjoining counties into Berks County, but a great quantity is drained from Berks County into all the adjoining counties, excepting Schuylkill County, on the north. This indicates that the borders of Berks County are higher than the surrounding territory. Bethel township, in the northwest, is entirely drained by the Little Swatara Creek, into the Swatara, and the waters pass through Lebanon and Dauphin Counties into the Susquehanna River. Caernarvon township, on the south, is entirely drained by the Little Conestoga and Muddy Creeks, into the Conestoga, and the waters pass through Lancaster County into the Susquehanna River. A part of Union township, on the southeast, is drained by French Creek, and the waters pass through Chester County into the Schuylkill River. Considerable parts of the eastern towns—Colebrookdale, Washington and Hereford—are drained by Perkiomen Creek, and the waters pass through Montgomery County into the Schuylkill. And the greater part of Longswamp township, on the northeast, and the remaining part of Hereford are drained by the Little Lehigh into Lehigh River, and the waters pass through Lehigh County into the Delaware River.

There are numerous large springs in the different sections of the county. They are mostly situated in the valleys, though in elevated positions compared with the Schuylkill River. Those worthy of particular mention are Silver Spring and Orphans' Home Spring, in Heidelberg township; Sinking Spring, in Spring township, in the western section of the county;
Moselem Spring, in Richmond township; and Hampden Spring, in Reading, in the eastern section.

The streams of the county are numerous; they irrigate every section and contribute much to the natural fertility of the soil. The accompanying geological map illustrates the whole system.

The most conspicuous feature of the water system is the Schuylkill River. The streams flow into it from the east and from the west, and the territory on each side, thus supplied, is about equal in area. On the eastern side, beginning in the upper section, they are 1, Windsor; 2, Perry; 3, Maiden Creek, which has two principal tributaries flowing into it, both on the east, Moselem and Sacoxy; 4, Laurel Run; 5, Bernhart’s Run; 6, Rose Valley Run; 7, Antietam; 8, Monocacy, which has two principal tributaries flowing into it,—the Limekiln, from the east, and the Little Monocacy, from the west; and 9, Manatawny, which has two principal tributaries flowing into it,—the Ironstone, from the east, and the Little Manatawny, from the west. Of these, the Maiden Creek and Manatawny are especially large. The Bernhart’s Run and the Antietam (formerly, for a time, known as Ohlinger’s Creek) have been entirely appropriated by the city of Reading for a municipal water supply.

On the western side they are 1, Mill Creek; 2, Irish Creek; 3, Tulpehocken, which has four principal tributaries flowing into it on the north (Mill, North and Plum) and three on the south (Mill, Spring and Cacosing); 4, Wyomissing; 5, Angelica; 6, Allegheny; 7, Hay Creek; 8, Six-penny; and 9, Mill Creek. Of these, the Tulpehocken, Wyomissing and Hay Creek are especially large. All the streams mentioned afford valuable water-power. They attracted the attention of the early settlers of the county. The first lands taken up by warrant, survey and patent were those through which these streams flowed. Their invaluable and inexhaustible water-power was fully appreciated. It was appropriated immediately by the settlers and turned to account in running grist-mills and iron furnaces. Many of the early deeds on record relate to it.

Schuylkill. —The Schuylkill River rises in Schuylkill County. It flows generally in a southeasterly direction and traverses the State for a distance of one hundred and twenty-five miles until it empties into the Delaware River, at Philadelphia.

It has many important branches which flow into it on the east and on the west from its source to its mouth. These contribute much to the physical and productive welfare of the south-eastern section of the State. They together drain a very large area of territory.

The important branches are the following: On the east, beginning in the north, 1, Main Branch; 2, Little Schuylkill, formerly called Tamaqua; 3, Maiden Creek; 4, Manatawny; 5, Perkiomen; and 6, Wissahickon; and on the west, 1, West Branch; 2, Bear Creek; 3, Tulpehocken; 4, Wyomissing; 5, French; and 6, Pickering. Each is conspicuous for length and large flow of water, and in a general way they are about equal in these respects. This harmony in their proportions is wonderful. The earliest drafts show the Maiden Creek, Manatawny and Tulpehocken, which indicates that the surveyors regarded them of more than ordinary importance. The Schuylkill is not only the grand trunk of this system of water, but it occupies the central line of the territory in which this system is arranged.

1 These two streams have no particular names. I name them thus to identify them. The former passes through Hamburg and the latter through Mohrsville.
2 At Lenhartsville, about twelve miles from its mouth, and thence northward, it is commonly known as the ‘Ontelaunee.’
3 The creeks by this name, ‘Mill,’ have been quadrupli-cated in the western section. The inhabitants in the respective localities named them for the water-power in running grist and other mills.

4 The word ‘Schuylkill’ is of Dutch origin. It means Hidden Creek, or Stalk Creek. The Dutch named the river when they took possession of the land about its mouth. The outlet is very wide and deceiving. It appears to be a part of the Delaware River, instead of being a tributary. By some persons it is said to be of Indian origin; but this is not correct. The name given to it by the Indians was ‘Ganashowehannee,’ which means a roaring or falling stream.—Haldeman. Rupp says they called it ‘Manjung,’ which means mother.
In this magnificent arrangement nature would appear to have been wisdom herself. The subdivision of this comparatively small portion of the earth's surface in such a perfect manner cannot have been the result of chance. Some great sceptre marked out the courses for our mountains, valleys and streams. It was the finger of God! It was He who indicated, by His prescient wisdom, the ways which we should follow for our welfare and progress. And, fortunately for us, we have pursued these ways. Our roads, canals and railways are laid, as it were, in paths especially prepared for them. Nearly two hundred years have elapsed since settlements began in Berks County. In the course of events we seem to have developed in facilities for intercourse by periods of fifty years; for, in the first period our prominent roads were marked out; in the second, our canals and turnpikes; and in the third, our railways. By the end of the fourth period, 1900, all the natural ways will be fully appropriated. The tendency and the demands of the present time indicate such a result.

Latitude and Longitude.—The county of Berks lies in the lower central portion of the north temperate zone, between 40° and 41° north latitude, and between 2° and 13° east longitude, reckoning from Washington.

Relative Elevations.—The following statement exhibits the elevation, above mean ocean-tide, of the several places in Berks County and other places out of the county, as compared with Reading, in different directions, north, south, east and west. The figures to the left of the place indicate the distance in miles from Reading, and those to the right the elevation in feet above mean ocean-tide at Philadelphia.

CHAPTER III.

INDIANS.

ORIGIN.—Where the Indians of this vicinity came from and when they settled in this immediate section of country no one has yet determined. It has been generally conceded that they migrated eastwardly hundreds of years ago till they reached the "Great Salt-water Lake," the large body of water which we call the Atlantic Ocean. As a nation they were known as the Lenni Lenape.¹ This general name comprehended numerous distinct tribes which spoke dialects of a common language—the Algonquin. According to the traditions² of their ancestors, the Lenni Lenape were an unmixed and unchanged race, residing many centuries ago toward the setting of the sun, somewhere in the western part of this continent. For some reasons, not explained, they determined to migrate toward the rising of the sun. After journeying for a time they arrived at the Mississippi River³ (Namasi Sipu, meaning Fish River). There they fell in with another nation of Indians, who were also in quest of a new home to the eastward. Those were the Menwve, or, as they have been named by the French, the Iroquois. At that river both nations united their forces, because they anticipated opposition to the east of the river from the Alligewi, who were a populous race of gigantic form. Shortly after their union, and before they had advanced any distance, they realized their anticipations, for they were compelled to fight many severe battles in carrying out their determination to march onward. At last their enemy, the Alligewi, to escape extermination, abandoned the country to them, fled for southward and never returned. The victors then divided the country between themselves—the Iroquois choosing the country to the north along the great lakes and their tributary streams, and the Lendpl taking possession of the country to the south of them, from the river eastward to the ocean.

The Lendpl, on their way hither, became divided into three separate bodies. One body settled along the Atlantic Ocean and the country adjacent for some hundreds of miles to the west of the coast, comprising, it was supposed, one-half of the nation, and the other bodies settled to the east and to the west of the Mississippi River. That part of the body which was situated in Pennsylvania became known as the "Delawares."⁴

DELAWARE TRIBES.—The Delawares divided themselves into three tribes—the Unamis or Turtle, the Unalohctgo or Turkey, and the Minsi⁵ or Wolf. The first two were settled on the territory which lay nearest to the ocean, between the coast and the high mountains, and, as they increased in numbers, they extended their settlements from the Hudson⁶ River to the Potomac. The Minsi lived back of the other

²See Heckewelder's work on the "Indian Nations" (published by the Historical Society of Pennsylvania).
³It has been asserted latterly that the Indians wandered eastwardly through the lower extremity of the territory which is now known as British America to the St. Lawrence River, and thence proceeded southwardly, scattering themselves through the territory which is now known as the Eastern and the Middle States.
⁴The word 'Delaware' is unknown in the Indian language. At first the Indians thought that the white people had given this name to them in derision, but when they were informed that they were named after a great white chief—Lord de la Ware—they were satisfied.—Heckewelder's "Indian Nations," xli tribes, to form, as it were, a bulwark for their protection and to watch the actions of the Mengwe. Their settlements extended from Minisink, on the Hudson (a place named after them where they had their council-seat), to the west, far beyond the Susquehanna. Their northern boundaries were supposed to be along the head-waters of the great rivers Delaware and Susquehanna, which flowed through their territory, and their southern boundaries along that ridge of hills known in Pennsylvania by the name of Lehigh.

Many clans sprang from these three tribes. They selected distant spots as places of settlement, and gave themselves names or received names from other tribes. Their names were generally taken after simple natural objects or something striking or extraordinary. Though they formed separate and distinct clans, yet they did not deny their origin, retaining their affection for the parent tribe, of which they were proud to be called grandchildren. Many families of them, with their connections, lived by themselves. They were settled along the larger and smaller streams throughout the country. They had towns and villages, in which they lived in separate clans, with a chief in each clan ruling over them. These chiefs were subordinate to the council which comprised the great chiefs of the nation.

Minsi Clans—Lenape Sachems.—The clans of the Minsi Indians were the Schuylkils, Susquehannas, Neshamines, Conestogas, Assunpinks, Rankakos, Andastakas and Shackmaxons.

These clans were regarded as the most war-like of all the Indians in these tribes. Each clan had a chief to control its actions. The chief of the Schuylkill clan, which was settled along the Schuylkill and its tributaries in this vicinity, was, for a time, Manany; and each chief was under the command of a “Grand Sachem.” The sachems of the Lenni Lenape, from the time of the first English settlements till the Indians retreated before the onward march of civilization and eventually disappeared entirely from this part of our country, were, in succession, Kekerappan, Opekasset, Taminent, Allumapees (who was afterward also called Sassoonan) and Teedyuscung. They had their headquarters at Minisink, on the Delaware River, some miles above the Blue Mountains (now in Pike County), and also at Shamokin, on Shamokin Creek (at one time in Berks County for a period of twenty years, and since 1772 in the eastern part of Northumberland County).

Ganawese.—The Ganawese¹ were also one of the tribes of the Lenni Lenape. They had lived formerly along the Potomac River, and were permitted by the Governor of Pennsylvania to locate among the Schuylkill Indians, near Tulpehocken, in pursuance of a request from Manany—the Indian chief in this section—with a guaranty of their friendship by of the Conestoga Indians. This request was made in the year 1705, because the Ganawese had been reduced by sickness to a small number and had expressed a desire to settle here. It is not known whether they came here immediately or not; but four years afterward they were classed with the Indians in this vicinity. In 1728 they were represented at Philadelphia by their king, Manawkyhickon, who was called Shekellamy, also Winjack. He was appointed settlers, "in order to speak the minds of each other truly and freely, and to avoid misunderstandings;" and as such agents they performed invaluable services in our early history by the satisfactory and amicable adjustment of disputes. "They were universally respected for their wisdom in council, their dignity of manner and their conscientious administration of public affairs."

Five Nations.—The Five Nations were a confederacy of Indians which inhabited the territory now the State of New York. As confederates, they called themselves Aquannuschioni, or united people; and the French called them Iroquois. They comprised the following five nations of Indians: Cayugas, Mohawks, Oneidas, Onondagas and Senecas.

The language of these nations was radically the same, but it was somewhat different from that of the Lenni Lenâpé.

The Mohawks took the lead in matters pertaining to warfare, and the Onondagas in matters pertaining to the adjustment of their own personal rights and difficulties. The Senecas were regarded as the most powerful nation in respect to numbers and military energy.

The grand council-fire of the confederacy was held in the Onondaga Valley, and it was guarded by the Onondagas.

The Iroquois (as they were mostly called by the settlers) were possessed of remarkable height, strength and symmetry of personal development. These characteristics distinguished them from other nations. They were as brave as they were strong, as cruel as they were ferocious and as overbearing as they were treacherous. They effected an early alliance with the Dutch settlers on the Hudson River, in the vicinity of Albany, and thereby secured the use of fire-arms. With this powerful auxiliary they were enabled to repel the encroachments of the French, and to exterminate or reduce to vassalage other nations of Indians. It is said that they even conquered the Lenni Lenâpé, and held this great and powerful nation under subjection till 1756, when Teedyuscung forced from them an acknowledgment of their independence.

MANNERS AND CUSTOMS.—The early settlers of Pennsylvania found the Indians possessed of a kindly disposition and inclined to share with them the comforts of their rude dwelling-places. When they were guests of the Indians their persons were regarded as sacred. Penn said that they excelled in liberality; that they never had much, for they never wanted much; that their wealth circulated like the blood; that none wished for the property of another; and that they were exact observers of the rights of property. "They are not disquieted with bills of lading and exchange," said he, "nor perplexed with chancery suits and exchequer reckonings. We sweat and toil to live; they take pleasure in hunting, fishing and fowling, which feeds them. They spread their table on the ground anywhere, and eat twice a day, morning and evening. They care for little, for they want but little. If they are ignorant of our pleasures, they are free from our pains."

The Indians loved rum. Traders generally carried quantities of it in bartering with them. It was to them—as they called it—"fire-water," for it inflamed their passions and made them savage and destructive. In 1731 their chief here (Sassoonan) complained to the provincial government about its introduction and sale. He then "desired that no Christians should carry any rum to Shamokin 1 to sell; when they wanted any they would send for it themselves; they would not be wholly deprived of it, but they would not have it brought by Christians; they desired that some rum might be lodged at Tulpehocken and Paxtang to be sold to them, so that their women might not have too long a way to fetch it." In purchases of land the Executive Council at times included rum as a part payment of the consideration. Doubtless the Indians asked for it.

The Indians, in their peculiar savage life, possessed, on the one hand, certain personal virtues, a high sense of honor (according to their perceptions of duty), mutual fidelity among individuals, fortitude that mocked the most cruel torments and devotion to their own tribe, for whose welfare they were ready to make any sacrifice; but, on the other hand, they had no appreciation of domestic virtues, for they treated their wives with cruelty and their children with indifference. They were gloomy, stern and severe, and strangers to mirth and laughter. They permitted no outward expression of pain. Remarkable indifference to the good or ill of life was one of the grand elements of their character; and they exhibited no pleasure in anything, save boisterous joy in the moment of victory. They had a great aversion to regular labor, and yet they were capable of enduring the greatest possible exertions during the chase or times of war. They were extremely improvident. When they had an abundance of food and liquor they ate and drank great quantities, not thinking of the morrow and the famine they might have to endure. They recognized polygamy. They believed in the existence of a Supreme Being and of a Being in a subordinate position. The former was the Great Spirit to them which did not require prayers for aid and protection, but the latter was looked upon as hostile to them, and to this they addressed their worship. And they also believed in a future state, where the souls of brave warriors and chaste wives enjoyed a happy existence with their ancestors and friends. Their funerals were conducted with great decorum. They dressed the deceased persons in their best clothes, and buried them in various ways and in different places—some were buried in the air on scaffolds, some in the water and some in the earth. They also practiced cremation.

The general dress of the Indians in the temperate and cold parts of the country, previous to the arrival of the Europeans, consisted of three articles—a cloak of buffalo skin (which hung from the shoulder), a piece of skin used as an apron, and a pair of moccasins or loose boots, manufactured out of undressed skin. The women wore a long robe of buffalo skin, which was fastened around the waist.

Their habitations were huts or cabins, generally of a circular form, constructed of poles fixed in the ground and tied together at the top. The outer covering consisted of the bark of trees. A hole was left at the top for ventilation, or for smoke to escape. Beds and seats were made out of skins. The width of some huts was thirty and even forty feet.

The painting of their bodies was a universal custom. Tattooing was practiced; some painted only their arms, others both arms and legs; those who had attained the summit of renown in successful warfare had their bodies painted from the waist upward. This was the heraldry of the Indians. Besides this ornamentation, the warriors also carried plumes of feathers on their heads.

Their weapons consisted of the tomahawk, knife, club and bow and arrow. When the Dutch arrived they introduced the rifle to them; and then the Indians became as expert in the use of this weapon as they had been in the use of the tomahawk and bow and arrow.

They subsisted chiefly on wild game and fish. They were great hunters and fishermen. In the use of the spear in fishing they were very successful. They carried on agriculture to a limited extent in raising maize, beans and pumpkins; but the labor was performed entirely by their women.

Each tribe was governed by an elected chief and council. In matters of great importance all the warriors were consulted. In their deliberations, questions were decided by the consent of all, not by a majority. Their assemblies were conducted with great formality. Their debates were carried on by set speeches which abounded in bold figures and bursts of impassioned eloquence. The oldest chief always commenced the discussion of a question. The young men were permitted to attend, but not to speak.

They conducted their warfare in a particular and peculiar manner. They declared war by sending a slave with a hatchet (the handle of which was painted red) to the offending party.

In taking the field for action, they proceeded in small squads, and from the time of entering the enemy’s territory they killed no game, they lighted no fires, they made no disturbance of any kind; but they advanced with the utmost caution, not even speaking to one another, only communicating by signs and motions. In making an attack, they would first lie flat a whole night, and at the break of day, upon the signal of the chief, rush upon the enemy. If they succeeded—as they generally did succeed in such a quiet, but deliberate, mode of warfare—their horrifying deeds baffled description.

Purchases by Treaty. — The Indians owned this territory by right of possession. Penn’s arrival found them occupying and claiming the land, he negotiated with them by treaties and purchased their title. In this way he won their high regard. They sold him large tracts at different times, and as they sold the land they departed. The first departure from land in this section was in 1718, the district lying to the south of South Mountain; and the next was in 1732, when they left all that section lying between the South Mountain and the Blue Mountain.

Having mentioned that Penn held certain treaties with the Indians in carrying on his negotiations with them, the following description of a treaty by Penn himself in 1683 will be interesting in this connection:

“Every king hath his council; and that consists of all the old and wise men of the nation—which is perhaps two hundred people. Nothing of moment is undertaken—be it in war, peace, selling of land or traffic—without advising with them; and, what is more, with the young men too. It is admirable to consider how powerful the kings are, and yet how they move by the breath of their people. I have had occasion to be in council with them, upon treaties for land, and to adjust the terms of trade. Their order is thus:

“The king sits in the middle of an half-moon, and hath his council—the old and wise—on each hand. Behind them, or at a little distance, sit the younger fry in the same figure. Having consulted and resolved their business, the king ordered one of them to speak to me. He stood up, came to me, and, in the name of his king, saluted me. Then he took me by the hand and told me he was ordered by his king to speak to me and that now it was not he but the king that spoke, because what he should say was the king’s mind. He first prayed me to excise them that they had not complied with me the last time. He feared there might be some fault in the interpreter, being neither Indian nor English. Besides, it was the Indian custom to deliberate and take up much time in council before they resolve. And that, if the young people and owners of the land had been as ready as he was, I had not met with so much delay. Having thus introduced his matter, he fell to the bounds of the land they had agreed to dispose of and the price—which now is little and dear, that which would have bought twenty miles not buying now two. During the time that this person spoke, not a man of them was observed to whisper or smile—the old grave, and the young reverent, in their deportment. They speak little, but frequently, and with elegance. I have never seen more natural sagacity, considering them without the help (I was going to say the spoil) of tradition; and he will deserve the name of wise that outwits them in any treaty about a thing they understand. When the purchase was agreed to, great promises passed between us: 'of kindness and good neighborhood, and that the Indians and English must live in love as long as the sun gave light,' which done, another made a speech to the Indians in the name of all the Sachemakers or kings—first, to tell them what was done; next, to charge and command them to love the Christians, and particularly live in peace with me and the people under my government; that many governors had been in the river, but that no governor had come himself to live and stay here before; and having now such an one that had treated them well, they should never do him, or his, any wrong. At every sentence of which they shouted, and said amen in their way."

RETREAT OF INDIANS.—The Indians having moved north of the Blue Mountain in 1732, the "Friends" then entered and took up large and fine tracts of land in the Maiden Creek Valley. Within the previous decade, against the complaints of the Indians, a small colony of Germans had settled in the Tulpe-bocka Valley. Onward, persistently onward, along the flowing, meandering streams and and toward their wild and rich sources, the early settlers proceeded. Were these enterprising Christians bent upon ascertaining where the streams rose, in their efforts to gratify a desire for the best settlements, and, consequently, their worldly enrichment, just as the Indians—the heathen, as they were called—were bent upon ascertaining where the sun rose in their journey around the world to gratify a desire for spiritual enrichment? Before 1750 these settlers had reached and occupied points beyond the Blue Mountain, lying towards the sources of the Schuylkill. And thus, as they came and pressed forward, the Indians went. The Indians had, indeed, reached the "Great Sea;" but, for want of worldly cupidity or genius, they did not, or could not master its mighty rolling waters.
Therefore, they began to return, not because they had no more worlds to conquer, not because they had completed their great journey, but because they had met the Bible! Wonderful revelation to them, indeed! Return? No, they had to retreat! The "Armor of God" prevailed against them! Cupidity had found this great country of theirs, but persecution was peopling it. This persecution justified (?) the persecuted immigrants to take possession of their lands and homes and hunting-grounds, which they had possessed time out of mind, in order to spread the "Kingdom of God." These immigrants were forced to have a home where they could worship God freely, according to the dictates of their own consciences; and they got it. But the Indians had to lose theirs! The immigrants—moved more by cowardice than by enterprise in leaving their homes where they were born and where they expected to take affairs as they found them or improve them in the course of time if they could—reasoned apparently like the enterprising (?) men of the present generation in appropriating the property and possessions of others for the promotion of the public weal. First, the quiet possession of the Indians had to be disturbed by the Christians for the public advancement of civilization and the general improvement of morals; then, that of the Christians by corporations for the general improvement of communities in respect to convenience and wealth. This is wonderful. What agency is coming in the future to disturb the corporations? Two hundred years were required to develop the right and exercise of eminent domain. What right or rights will two hundred years more develop in the great interests of mankind, so that all men, irrespective of condition or position, will have justice pure and simple done to them in all departments of life, not through the law's delays, but by the natural and noble impulses of the whole community?
Present Location.—And having been forced, if not driven, out of the territory which we have come to occupy, where are the brave and strong Lenni Lenape now? Back again in the vast wilderness which their great progenitors had occupied years and years before them. Like locusts before the storm, they were swept by the tide of civilization westward, westward beyond the Mississippi. Centuries elapsed,—how many, no one knows,—between their march hither and thither. Their own energy and determination had brought them hither; but the energy and determination of a mighty and progressive element sent them thither. What a mistake they found that they had made in searching too persistently after knowledge, in going the way of the material world! Instead of realizing their fond hopes of finding what they wanted to know, what they yearned to see, they could only look, look to the eastward into the restless sea, there to find at last coming towards them an "armor-bearer," with the "cross of salvation" before him, directed, as it were, by the King of Day, against the motion of the world and across the wide expanse of waters. And this was, apparently, the "light" which their tradition had inspired them to look for through centuries of time.

In 1749 the Delaware Indians left the great region beyond the Blue Mountains for thousands of square miles. And they departed with the firm intention of remaining away. But, shortly afterward, having been deceived by misrepresentations of the French, they returned, not, however, to retake possession, but to murder the settlers, and in this malicious invasion they were very successful, and they kept the country in an unsettled and uncertain condition for eight years.¹ Then they fled, never to return again.

In 1789 the general government placed them on a large reservation of land in the State of Ohio. But what was a reservation in or against the onward march of civilization? It could not be firmly and certainly reserved. The Christians were too many and too powerful for them, even for the government which manifested such a generous feeling in their behalf. The poor and powerless Indians—poor in the sense of possessions and powerless in the sense of organized political combinations for influence and promotion—had to go, and they went. A generation afterwards, in the year 1818, they were located in Missouri. Numerous removals followed during the next fifty years, when, in 1866, they accepted land in severity in the Indian Territory. They then gave up tribal relations to settle down to civilized life, to do as civilized people do. And now, it is said, they are at last useful and prosperous citizens of a united people, numbering, it is estimated, one thousand. And there, it is to be hoped, after retroceding for over one hundred years from stream to stream and from mountain to mountain, toward the setting sun, they will be permitted to grow, if not a stronger, a more submissive and a more honorable people, to be, nevertheless, a wiser, a better and a more cultivated people after our own day and generation.

A popular notion prevails that the Indian tribes are disappearing and their numbers growing less. But it has been ascertained that, though certain tribes have decreased in number, and others even disappeared entirely, many of the tribes have increased; and therefore the Indian population, as a whole, in North America has not decreased very much since the advent of the Europeans. In 1880 there were in the United States three hundred and three thousand two hundred and forty-eight, and in the British possessions one hundred and three thousand nine hundred and sixty-nine—total, four hundred and seven thousand two hundred and seventeen. The general policy of our government has been, for some years past, to treat with the Indian tribes in a respectful manner, purchase their lands, place them upon certain reservations, where they are required to remain, and appropriate supplies for them in the nature of food, clothing, arms and ammunition. In this manner the government has been humbly endeavoring to civilize them after our own pattern of civilization. And it has accomplished considerable good results in respect to some tribes, but failed in respect to others.

Villages.—Some of the Minei Indians had

villages in this district of territory, now included in Berks County. These villages were numerous. They were located in different sections of the territory, more particularly, however, along the Schuylkill and its principal tributaries, and known as follows:

_Tulpehocken_—in the western section of the county, a short distance east of Stouchsburg, near the Tulpehocken Creek.

_Sakunk_—in the northern section, on the Maiden Creek, in Richmond township, at the mouth of the Sakunk Creek; now called Sacony.

_Machikilhannah_—situate some miles east of Sakunk, on the stream of the same name; now known as Moselem.

_Machkithanne_—still farther east, the place being now in Maxatawny township, near Kutztown.

_Ganshowerhannah_—in the central section adjoining the Schuylkill, near the northern base of "Neversink," at the mouth of Rose Valley Creek, the place being included in Reading.

_Angolica_—opposite "Neversink," at mouth of Angelica Creek.

_Neversink_—a short distance below the southern base of "Neversink," near the "Big Dam," on the De Turk farm, and it is believed that a village was also in "Poplar Neck," on the High farm.

_Menhaltaunk_—at a large spring now in Amity township, several miles northeast from Douglassville.

_Olink_—in Oley township, a short distance south of Friedensburg, on land included with the Bertolaet farm; and it is believed that a large village was situated several miles to the eastward, on the Lee farm, adjoining the Manatawny Creek.

INDIAN NAMES.—All the prominent streams in the county have been given Indian names; also two townships and two mountains. These names are as follows:

_Angolica._

_Antietam._

_Alegheny._—Fair water.

_Ganshowerhannah._—Roaring or tumbling stream. This is now known as the Schuylkill. In old deeds it is called Manaiunk, the signification of which word was a mother of streams.

_Gokhebing._—Place of owls; now Cacoosing.

_Kau-ta-tin-chunk._—Endless (applied formerly, now changed, to Blue Mountain).

_Lechawecki._—Place of Forks; now Lehig.

_Machkithanne._—Bear’s-path Creek; now Maxatawny.

_Machikilamahannah._—Trout Stream; now Moselem.

_Menakasse._—Stream with large bends; now Monocacy.

_Menhaltaunk._—Where we drank liquor; now Manatawny.

_Neversink._—Place of fishing; now Neversink.

_Olink._—Hole, cavern or cell; also a cove or tract of land encompassed by hills; now Oley.

_Outelumee._—Little maiden; now Maiden Creek.

_Palkhimonick._—Place of cranberries; now Perkiman.

_Sakunk._—Place of outlet, where a smaller stream empties into a larger; now Sacony; also Saucon.

_Sinne-hanne._—Stony Stream; now Stony Creek.

_Sipwas-hanne._—A plum stream; now Plum Creek.

_Tamaque-hanne._—Beaver Stream—a stream across which the beaver throws a dam; now Beaver Creek; also changed to Little Schuylkill.

_Tulpehewaki._—Land of turtles; now Tulpehocken.

_Wyoming._

*Believed.
†Present collection about six thousand.

This statement is not intended to be a correct classification of the relics found in Berks County, but to exhibit, under a few heads, the total number at the present time (1881). Some of the collectors began to gather specimens recently; a few are not ambitious to make large collections, and hence accept only the best specimens (this accounting for a few small collections), whilst others have many more than are indicated by the figures in the statement, such specimens not being from Berks County—gen-eraly from the West. The statement is confined exclusively to Indian relics of this county.

If the specimens recently carried away from the county were added, the total number would be largely increased. There are many single specimens of axes and small lots of arrow heads in the hands of farmers who do not make collections, but they cherish and hold them because they found them on their farms.

Messrs. Ezra High's, J. D. De Turek's and Isaac D. De Turek's collections have a peculiar value, because they were found on their respective farms.

Mr. Cyrus R. Yost's specimens were all found by him on the lower part of Fritz's Island, a short distance below Reading.

Mr. Charles W. Berg found his specimens on the farm of the Reading Land Improvement Company, on an area of six acres. This was also the site of an Indian village.

Major S. L. Young's collection is remarkable for its many rare specimens and large proportion of fine axes.

The collection of Mr. H. L. Illig, Millbach, Lebanon County, deserves mention here. It contains over five thousand specimens, and shows that Lebanon also had a large Indian population. Only a small portion of his collection is from Berks County.

About one-third of Prof. Brunner's collection is from the vicinity of Virginiusville, one-third from Maxatawny, and the remainder from all parts of the county where relics have been found.

CHAPTER IV.

NATIONALITIES.

Swedes.—The first permanent settlement along the Delaware, in Pennsylvania, was effected by a small colony of Swedes in 1638. Ten years before this, the subject of encouraging Swedes to settle in Pennsylvania, for purposes of trade, had been discussed by the King of Sweden; but his earnest engagement in warfare with the Germans about that time, and his death suddenly, ended the matter, till it was reconsidered and revised by his lord chancellor, in behalf, and under the patronage of, his daughter, the young Swedish Queen, Christina. The whole number of settlers then in the new country (which they called New Sweden) did not exceed fifty. The Swedes effected the most of their settlements on the western side of the Delaware River, and extended them along this river and its prominent tributary, the Schuylkill. In ten years their number did not increase to one hundred. Notwithstanding their success in carrying on trade, they could not acquire such a firm hold upon the country as to continue their government a score of years. In 1655 their Governor surrendered to the Dutch, and this ended the rule of the Swedes in Pennsylvania. But those who had settled and taken up lands along the Delaware and Schuylkill did not abandon their settlements. They remained. Penn, upon his arrival nearly thirty years afterward, encouraged them to move towards the interior. The English settlers multiplied rapidly after Penn had given a fixed government to the province. Towards the close of the seventeenth century the Swedes began to consider the propriety of accepting Penn's offer. They, doubtless, then moved up the Schuylkill and viewed the adjoining country. A small colony, under the leadership of Andrew Rudman, found suitable land along the river, several miles above the mouth of the Manatawny Creek, and they petitioned for ten thousand acres. This was in 1701. And immediately afterward, in pursuance of warrants, certain tracts, aggregating ten thousand five hundred acres, were surveyed and laid off for them. The names of these Swedes were Andrew Rudman, Andrew Bankson, Benjamin Burden, Peter Boon, Benjamin Boon, Mounce Jones, Justa Justason, Mounce Justice, John Cock, Peter Cock, Otto Ernest Cock, Jacob Culinn, Matthias Holston, Morton Morton, Richard Roads and Jonas Yocum.

All of these, excepting Rudman, remained there and made permanent settlements. A building erected by one of them, in 1716, is still standing. It is the oldest building in the county. The descendants of some of them are still in the township, which was called Amity very shortly afterward—notably the Joneses and Yecums. This was the only colony of which came into the county, and the only section of the county in which they took up lands; and they did not wander away, remaining in the township almost entirely. They were the first settlers who erected a building for religious worship in this county. They were members of the Lutheran denomination. They possessed admirable characteristics to take up and develop a new country. They remained more immediately together than any other subsequent class of settlers in this territory. The Indians must have appreciated their virtues in suffering them to remain unmolested before the land was released. Hence they were a peaceable people. The name of the township indicates the pleasant relation which prevailed between them and the Indians. There was amity between them, and so the township came to be named in 1720. They pursued the vocation of farming.

Germans.—The German immigrants were the second to enter this section of territory after the Swedes. The first settlement was effected by them, in 1712, along the Manatawany, in Oley. Many arrived within the next decade. To the east of the Schuylkill River they proceeded northwardly from Philadelphia. To the west, however, the first colony of Germans, before 1730, entered from the west, proceeding from New York southwardly and from the Susquehanna River eastwardly into Tulpehocken Valley. The total number of Germans who settled in the county previous to 1752 cannot be estimated. They were certainly more numerous than all the other nationalities taken together. In 1747 Governor Thomas wrote to the bishop of Exeter, in England, saying that the Germans of Pennsylvania comprised three-fifths of the whole population, or about one hundred and twenty thousand.

Many of these German immigrants were redemptioners, or persons who had bound themselves or one or more of their children to the masters of vessels, upon their arrival, for a term of years, to pay for their passage across the ocean. The usual terms of sale depended upon the age, strength and health of the persons sold. Boys and girls generally served from five to ten years, till they attained the age of twenty-one years. Many parents were compelled to sell the service of their own children in order to satisfy their passage-money, so that they might be released from the vessel upon which they were brought to this country. Children under five years of age could not be sold to service. They were disposed of gratuitously to persons who agreed to raise them and give them their freedom when they attained the age of twenty-one years. In this manner the redemptioners came to occupy a very humble position; but “from this class there have sprung some of the most reputable and wealthy inhabitants of the province.”

Prior to 1727 most of the Germans, who immigrated, carried with them hither considerable means. But afterward, many of them were poor and they came to be redemptioners on that account. The years in which these arrived were 1728,1729, 1737, 1741, 1750 and 1751. The principal part of them were farmers; but many were mechanics, who brought with them a knowledge of those arts which are necessary and useful in all countries, comprising weavers, tailors, tanners, shoemakers, (cordwainers) comb-makers, smiths of all kinds, butchers, paper-makers, clock-makers and bakers. These Germans became perfect mechanics and workingmen, through a custom of “Peregrination” (Wander-schaft), which, as young men, just after the close of their apprenticeship, they carried on for one or more years, in order to make themselves more proficient in their several trades. This was required of young mechanics before they were permitted to set up for themselves. By this course they were afforded opportunities of acquiring much useful general knowledge which books could not supply, besides proficiency in their trade. They were called “Traveling Journeymen” (Handwerks-Bursh). The intention of this custom was to enable them to gain experience, learn methods practiced in other countries besides their own, and acquire also a knowledge of the world. "It is nothing unusual to meet in Germany common mechanics who speak three and four different languages, are well informed as to the condition of most countries in Europe and possess a general fund of knowledge which is far superior to that in persons of the same class in England."

And many of the earlier immigrants were Huguenots, who had been encouraged by Penn and the English government to emigrate to Pennsylvania and New York. In France this name was used as a term of reproach for those who aimed at a reform of religion according to the principles enunciated by Calvin. The name attached itself to these reformers when they broke off all connection with Lutheranism and began to organize themselves both as a church and as a political body. Their churches sprang up with wonderful quickness during the middle of the sixteenth century; but they became unpopular—bitterly disliked by the court and by the majority of the French people. During the reign of Francis I. the persecutions against them gave place to a vehement desire to crush "the rising heresy." After the massacre of St. Bartholomew's day, in 1572, the subordination of their religious interests to their political interests became inevitable, and, having become followers of Henry of Navarre, heir of the French crown, their subsequent discontent obtained from him, as King Henry IV., in 1598 (April 13th), the famous "Edict of Nantes."

But the provisions of this Edict were found as helpful for Catholics as for Protestants, and they were so modified as to show a decreasing favor of the Calvinists, who had dreamed of dominance and had hoped for equality, but were put off with tolerance. This situation caused them to become dissatisfied with the Edict; and the King then expressed a determination "to reduce to nothing the Huguenot faction."

About 1590 the Huguenots carried on worship in about thirty-five hundred chateaux and two hundred towns, which were situated chiefly in the south and west of France. In most parts of the north they had a place for worship in each bailliage. In 1598 the King granted a list of one hundred and fifty places to them for their safety, the chief groups being in the generalities of Bordeaux, Montpelier and Poitou. During the next quarter of a century their history passes through a series of outbursts indicating impatience and dissatisfaction. In this time they had five hundred churches; in 1637 they had seven hundred and twenty. Richelieu and Mazarin treated them with prudence, but their synods were discouraged and their grumblings ceased. They grew in piety and purity as the political arena was closed to them; and this was the time of their material prosperity. When Louis XIV. took up his reign the tranquillity of the Huguenots began to pass away. In 1657 they were forbidden to hold colloquies, lest they might take to politics, and in 1659 they were told to hold no more synods. Soon the court went further, and conversions were undertaken. Wherever a pastor could be bribed, converted or got rid of, his temple was torn down. Their worship then became almost impossible in towns. As the King's conscience grew morbid, he became more eager to expiate his own crimes by punishing the heretics. Within twenty years seven hundred churches were destroyed. Throughout that trying period, whilst thousands of them yielded to oppression or bribery, thousands of others fled the land. The emigration began in 1666 and continued for fifty years. It is probable that in 1660 there were over two millions of Huguenots, who were regarded as the best and most thrifty citizens in that country; and of these it is said "fully a million of French subjects escaped from their inhospitable fatherland." At last the King revoked the Edict of Nantes, because he thought that the Huguenots were suppressed. This was on the 15th of October, 1685. "This revocation was the sentence of civil death on all Huguenots. It crushed more than half of the commercial and manufacturing industry of the kingdom." The preamble was as follows: "Our pains have had the end we had proposed, seeing that the better and greater part of our subjects of the religion styled the Reformed have embraced the Catholic; the execution of the Edict of Nantes, consequently remaining useless, we have considered that we could not do better for the purpose of effacing entirely the memory of the evils which this false religion has caused in our kingdom than revoke entirely the aforesaid Edict of Nantes and all that has been done in favor of the said religion.”

“Whatever difference of opinions there may be as to the numbers who fled from the kingdom at this time, there can be no doubt as to the quality of them. They were the thriftiest and readiest hands in France; they carried the arts and taste, which were till then the special gift of their country, to Spitalfields, or Amsterdam, or even to Berlin. They crowded into the armies which were arrayed against their oppressor; they helped to man the ships which destroyed the navy of France; they planted their industries in many places, and gave that wealth and prosperity to other lands which was driven from their homes.”

This was the class of Germans which settled the country along the Schuylkill and its tributaries. They were a valuable acquisition to Penn and his sons in the development of their great province. They were just what a new country needed to start it grandly in the march of material progress. Their labor, their economy, their perseverance and their stability added great and increasing wealth to the country, decade after decade. They prepared the way for the erection of a new county; and having fitted the settlements for a separate political organization, they proceeded earnestly in behalf of its establishment. Their determination towards this end extends through a period of fourteen years, from 1738 to 1752, when the county was erected. They were largely in the majority. But they did not have this preponderance to appear by the name that was given to the county. Possibly they could not have secured a German name if they had desired to. In the vast sections of territory which they inhabited, only three townships had been named with German names—Heidelberg, Bern and Alsace. The English influence is apparent. The previous counties, excepting Philadelphia, were given English names—Bucks, Chester, Lancaster, York and Cumberland.

The proprietary government was English, and an English name for the new county was to be expected; and the Penns having been at the head of provincial affairs, the name of their own shire naturally stood out with prominence as a proper name for the new organization. So it was named Berks.

Before this event the Germans had done much for the territory in improving its soil, in erecting buildings, in laying out roads. They were along every stream, excepting the Wyomissing, Allegheny and Hay Creek, in the southern section. They were in the valleys and on the hills, rather than along the Schuylkill. This singular selection of locality was not accidental. They found the best quality of land away from the Schuylkill. Our best farms in productiveness and in appearance are in the localities where they settled—in Oley, in Maxatawny, in Heidelberg. In these respective localities we find the grand-children and great-grandchildren of the first German patentees. This adherence to the soil is not only a peculiar, but also an admirable quality of the German people.

The following extract is taken from an article entitled “First Families,” which I contributed to Historical Register (published by Dr. W. H. Egle, at Harrisburg); January, 1888, and copied in Reading Times, February 6, 1888. The great majority of the names mentioned are German.

“First Families.”

“In the several quarters mentioned, east, south, west, and north, the descendants of many of the first settlers are still flourishing in numbers, in industry, in wealth, and in social, religious, and political influence. In taking a hasty glance over its broad territory, I can mention in the eastern district, along the Manatawny and its tributaries, the Baums, Bertolets, Boones, De Turkscs, Egles, Griesemers, Guldins, Hartmans, Herbels, Hocks, Hunters, Kaufmans, Keims, Knabba, Lees, Leinbachs, Lesbers, Leveys, Lincolns, Lobachs, Ludwigs, Peters, Pottses, Reiffs, Rhondess, Ritters, Schneiders, Spangs, Van Reeds, Yocums, Yoders, Weavers, and Witmans; and, on the border along the headwaters of the Perkiomen, the Bauers, Bechtels, Boyers, Clemmers, Ehats, Funcks, Gabels, Rushes, Sassenmans, Schalla, Schultzes, and Stauffers; in the southern district,

1 Guizot’s “History of France,” vol. iv, p. 334.
In the representative positions, secured to the people by our Constitution, our officials have been mostly Germans, excepting in one particular, the office of president judge. They were in Congress without interruption from 1789 till 1847; and in the State Senate till 1856, excepting one term, 1817-20.

ENGLISH.—The English entered this territory and took up lands shortly before 1720. They were, accordingly, the third class of settlers, the first having been the Swedes, and the second the Germans. Their first families were the Boones, Ellises, Lees and Lincolns. They settled in Oley,—the Ellises and Lees in the eastern section, along the Manatawny, and the Boones and Lincolns in the central and western sections, along the Monocacy and the Schuylkill. Within ten years after their permanent settlement, they established a meeting-house for religious worship. This was about 1726, at a point where the present Exeter meeting-house stands, in an elevated position near the northwestern limit of the Swedes' tracts, then called Amity township.

Shortly after 1730 they settled along and about Hay Creek and Allegheny Creek, to the west of the Schuylkill, and also farther north, along and about the Maiden Creek, immediately after the Indians had released their rights to the territory. The first families in the former settlements were the Embrees, Lewises, Humphreys, Scarlets, Harries, Prices, Webbs, Hughes, Moores, Williamses and Thomases; and in the latter settlements the Parvins, Lightfoots, Huttons, Starrs, Davises, Penroses, Pearsons, Wilies, Wrights, Willits, Harveys and Reeds, and these respective families also established meeting-houses in the midst of their settlements, about the year 1736,—the one at the cross-roads, near the centre of Robeson township, and the other near the centre of Maiden-creek township.

All these families were connected with the Friends. They exerted a strong influence in these three sections of the county. The numerous English names, given to the townships east of the Schuylkill, were suggested by them.

George Boone was particularly prominent in the lower section, and Benjamin Lightfoot in the upper section, in respect to proceedings for setting apart new townships. They were surveyors and men of more than ordinary ability. And just as these two men were prominent in their branch of service, Anthony Lee and Jacob Parvin were equally, if not more, prominent in these respective sections as justices of the several courts of the county. Indeed, for a time,

1 The Robesons have been classed with the English or Friends; but they were Swedes, having been connected with the Swedish Church at Mollatton.

2 Till the Revolution. They were at the head of affairs from forty to fifty years.
through the influence of the provincial government, the Friends exerted the most influence in the direction of our political affairs, notwithstanding their number was far less than the Germans. But during the Revolution, and immediately afterward, the natural energy of the Germans carried them forward in political matters, just as it had carried them forward in agriculture and manufactures before the Revolution. Independence elevated them into political rights, the exercise of which placed them in power. So the Friends lost their position in the community, and with it their public influence. Before the Revolution, their number was strong and their religious meetings were active and successful. But since that time they have gradually decreased decade after decade till now. Indeed, they have become so weak that they can hardly carry on their meetings. This is a matter to be regretted; for, whilst in influence and power, they conducted themselves with justice and ability. Their best men were always elevated to positions of reponsibility. The early county records are distinguished for neatness and legibility, this of itself indicating their carefulness and attention to business. This cannot be said of their successors.

In looking over the lists of men who have held representative offices for the county since the Revolution, we find only a few who are distinctively English, especially of the families mentioned. The Germans have been our representative men almost entirely. It is safe to assert that this would not have been the case if the Revolution had not terminated successfully.

During this trying period the Friends here were mostly, if not entirely, Tories. They were opposed to the war; but the Germans were extreme Revolutionists, and they encourgaged the War for Independence to the utmost of their ability. Their conduct was admirable.
When the struggle closed, with the acquisition of increased power to the people, they naturally asserted their rights and presumed to take positions and power unto themselves.

I cannot omit to add that there were English people here besides the Friends. At first, before the erection of the county, they were in the southern and southeastern portions of the county.
They manifested themselves in a religious way about the same time—between 1735 and 1740
—the one body in Caernarvon township ¹ and the other in Amity township.² They were members of the Established Church of England, called Episcopalians.³ Afterward, when the county was erected, they also appeared in Reading, though without sufficient strength to cause the erection of a church for themselves till 1824.

WELSH.—Just as the Swedes settled in the county on the eastern bank of the Schuylkill, so the Welsh settled in the county to the west of this river. They migrated through Chester County lands till they crossed the South Mountain, and, though some of them reached a point beyond the mountain before the purchase of the territory from the Indians in 1732, yet the most of them entered this district immediately afterward. The Swedes did not have a township named after any of their places in their distant home across the wide ocean. But the Welsh were more impressive; they named three townships—Caernarvon, Cumru and Brecknock.

The Welsh had purchased from Penn, in England, before 1700, a large body of land aggregating forty thousand acres, to be selected in Pennsylvanias; and these acres they selected to the west of the Schuylkill. They settled the country so numerously that, before 1698, they had named six townships in the county of Chester.

Rowland Ellis was a prominent Welshman who induced a large Welsh emigration from Wales to this country. After having induced Thomas Owen and his family to emigrate and settle in Chester County, he, in 1686, embarked with one hundred Welshmen for this province.
Some of the settlers were named Thomas Evans,
Robert Evans, Owen Evans, Cadwallader Evans,

² At Molatto, now Douglassville.
³ In the former locality I can mention especially the Morgans, and in the latter the Birds and Brookes.

The district of territory which lay to the south of the South Mountain and west of the Schuylkill was gradually settled by these Welsh people, and they migrated farther and farther up the river during the next fifty years.

Before 1740 several hundred of them had settled in the district beyond this mountain. The following persons were some of the taxables:

They were adherents of the Baptist denomination. Their lands were taken up mostly along and in the vicinity of the Wyomissing and Cacoosing Creeks, and there they were most thickly settled. In their midst they caused a meeting-house to be erected. They took up many tracts of land, aggregating twenty thousand acres, before 1752. They were enterprising, having a grist-mill along the Wyomissing before 1740. This flowing stream was appreciated by them for its superior water-power, and they accordingly erected different factories along its banks for the manufacture of gun-barrels, files, etc. Agriculture was their principal employment. Like the Swedes, they remained in their first settlement, southwardly of the Schuylkill and Cacoosing. And they did not enter politics. They attended strictly to their personal affairs. They co-operated earnestly with the Germans in obtaining a new county out of the upper sections of Lancaster and Philadelphia Counties.

IRISH.—Persons of Irish nativity did not settle in Pennsylvania for nearly forty years after Penn had obtained the province. During this time persons of other nationalities, especially Germans and English, had been encouraged to locate in Pennsylvania. Penn visited Germany in this behalf, kindling a strong interest for the province in his own country. But it would seem that he did not care for the Scotch or Irish, not having encouraged them to emigrate to his province; and, accordingly, neither of these came till after his death; and when they did arrive, they settled that portion of the province which lay mostly along the southern borders adjoining Maryland. Though some of them followed the course of the Susquehanna and settled in Lancaster County, the great body of them migrated into the country which lay west of the river. Very few, if any, proceeded up the Schuylkill Valley.

Doubtless, the German element in this direction, which composed the greater part of the population, was not agreeable to them. Hence, they directed their way to the westward from Philadelphia, immediately after landing, rather than to the northward. No settlement was effected by them in any of the districts which are now included in Berks County. Possibly, single individuals or families of them came at a time and located within the county, but I have not been able to find any data worthy of special mention.

HEBREWS.—And the same must be said of the Hebrews in this respect. Indeed, their immigration into the country has been so limited and so quiet that no notice has been taken of them. They have made no impression at all as a class of people. They have not tilled the soil; they have not built any shops; they have simply traded. Some of them have been in the county for many years, almost entirely, however, at Reading. But they did not show energy or devotion enough in this time to acquire even a church for religious worship till 1885. Their number was too small to associate together successfully for such a purpose.

A number of them settled along the head waters of the Tulpehocken, at or in the vicinity of Myerstown. Single individuals of this class wandered to Womelsdorf and even to Reading. In 1836 there were eight Hebrews at Reading—Abraham Speier, John Siegel, Mayer Siegel, Mayer Arnold, Alexander Heyman, —— Spiegel, Bernard Dreifos, —— De Young.

The Jews\(^1\) have been engaged almost exclusively in trading. They have used the German language entirely amongst themselves. Through their children and English education, the English language has made some progress with them.

In 1864, the following Hebrews were in Reading: B. Dreifos, Sol. Hirsch, Abr. Speier, Mayer Einstein, Aaron Henlein, Sol. Weil, Marcus Lyons, Henry Loeb, Isaac Mann, Isaac Hirschland, Joseph Loeb, Jacob Levy, R. Austrian, Abr'm Arnold, Jacob Einstein, Isaac Schwerin.

Negroes.—The negro is worthy of special mention in the history of this county. Though living under political disability till a score of years ago, his labor, his patience and his integrity require respectful treatment. He has had, indeed, a great struggle with destiny in this vast country for nearly two centuries and a half. It is rather surprising that two great elements should have entered the country about the same time—the one a sentiment, the other a fact, the one moved by religious enthusiasm, the other by selfishness, the one for freedom, the other for slavery—and traveled through our wonderful history in direct antagonism to each other.

Slavery existed to a very limited extent in Berks County. The slaves of which I found any notice were owned almost entirely by ironmasters. But they were few in number. This condition of servitude was incompatible with the notions of our early settlers; hence it was not encouraged. The farmers had no slaves.

Pennsylvania instituted an early movement for the gradual abolition of slavery. This was in 1780, during the progress of the Revolution. An act of Assembly\(^2\) was passed on March 1, 1780, to this end. In the preamble, the Act set forth, among other things,—

> "We esteem it a peculiar blessing granted to us that we are enabled this day to add one more step to universal civilization, by removing as much as possible the sorrows of those who have lived in undeserved bondage, and from which, by the assumed authority of the Kings of Great Britain, no effectual relief could be obtained. Weaned by a long course of experience from those narrow prejudices and partialities we have imbibed, we find our hearts enlarged with kindness and benevolence toward men of all conditions and nations, and we perceive ourselves at this particular period extraordinarily called upon, by the blessings which we have received, to manifest the sincerity of our profession, to give substantial proof of our gratitude."

And then it enacted " That all persons, as well negroes and Mulattoes as others, who shall be born in this State from and after the passage of this Act, shall not be deemed and considered as servants for life or slaves; and that all servitude for life or slavery of children in consequence of the slavery of their mothers, in the case of all children born within this State from and after the passing of this Act, shall be and hereby is utterly taken away, extinguished and forever abolished;" with the condition that such child should be a servant till the age of twenty-eight years, after the manner of indentured servants.

The Act required the owner of slaves to file a statement in the Quarter Sessions' office, giving age, surname, etc., of each slave. I could not find a statement of this kind in the office of our county.

There were some colored people in the county at an early period. They were in the service of iron men; and they were at Reading soon after it was founded. It was not, however, till after 1830 that they became sufficiently strong to form a society for religious purposes, and thence till now they have grown in number and influence. In 1860 it would seem that they reached their highest number, four hundred and ninety-seven; for in 1870 it was four hundred and twenty-four, and in 1880 four hundred and forty-nine. These were almost entirely at Reading, if not entirely. Some of them owned real estate here before 1800. As a class, long before their enfranchisement, in 1863, they were orderly, industrious and progressive.

\(^1\) They are commonly so known and called.

CHAPTER V.

ERECTION OF COUNTY.

General Situation of Territory—Petitions for County—Act erecting County—Districts—Names of Townships and Towns—Reductions of Territory, Northumberland County and Schuylkill County—New Counties Proposed.

GENERAL SITUATION OF TERRITORY.—

When the province of Pennsylvania was granted to William Penn by Charles II., King of Great Britain, in 1681, no township or county organizations existed in the province. There was no necessity for them. The settlements were limited and they were confined to the immediate vicinity of the Delaware River. And the government had no definite character. But the arrival of Penn was the dawn of government, progress and civilization. Within a month after his arrival he caused three counties to be laid out—Bucks, Chester and Philadelphia. County government then began, and county representation in the Provincial Assembly was inaugurated. During this period thousands of immigrants came into the province and effected permanent settlements; and each succeeding year found them farther removed from the county-seats of the counties named. They proceeded up the courses of streams mostly. Very few followed the streams from their sources to their outlets. Only one colony came from New York overland, and this was nearly fifty years after the settlements had begun, and the government had been given a fixed character. Very nearly all landed at Philadelphia; and thence the great majority proceeded towards the interior districts and the head-waters of streams. This is particularly the case with the Schuylkill River and all its tributaries. The settlements between the Schuylkill and Delaware Rivers were numerous before 1700. Every decade thereafter found them farther northward from the Wissahickon to the Perkiomen, from the Perkiomen to the Manatawny, and from the Manatawny to the Maiden Creek. And so they proceeded between the Schuylkill and Susquehanna Rivers.

Gradually those who had settled in the interior districts, toward the mountains, began to feel the inconvenience and expense incident to their location. They were compelled to travel, regardless of roads or weather, to the county-seat far removed from their settlements, and to haul their goods many miles to the market before they could realize any value for the product of their hard manual labor. Naturally, they felt inclined to improve their condition. A county organization was the first step towards accomplishing this object, as well to bring the county-seat into their midst as to create a market near by for the disposition of their produce. But, notwithstanding the numerous settlements and the large population in the great district of territory east of the Schuylkill and south of the Blue Mountain, no additional counties were erected before 1750. It was different to the west of the Schuylkill. The tide of emigration seems to have been greater in that direction. It pursued the Conestoga Creek. And the people, if not more energetic, were disposed to have local government more convenient. They did not have the natural facilities to enable them to reach their county-seat in Chester County, as the settlers did have in the districts to east of them, which lay in Philadelphia and Bucks Counties. In 1729 they induced the Executive Council to separate them from Chester County and erect their settlements into a new county, which they called Lancaster. This county comprised a very large area of territory. Immigration into its rich valleys continued for twenty years. It extended over and beyond the Susquehanna River. Then the settlers petitioned for another county and obtained it under the name of York. This was in 1749; and in 1750, other settlers, located to the north, also petitioned for and obtained a county under the name of Cumberland.
The territory of both these counties lay west of the Susquehanna River.

During the first quarter of the eighteenth century many immigrants proceeded to the right into Perkiomen Valley along the West Branch, and into Oley Valley along the Manatawny and its tributaries. These were mostly Germans; some were English and others Swedes. Other immigrants, mostly Welsh, proceeded to the left into Conestoga Valley. The settlements for miles on both sides of the river were mostly confined to the south of the succession of hills commonly called "South Mountain." This was especially the case to the right. In this district of territory the settlements were then known by the names "Amity," "Oley" and "Colebrookdale." But to the left a small settlement of Germans had taken place in the Tulpehocken Valley,—the enterprising settlers having come down the Susquehanna River from New York, and migrated eastwardly to the head-waters of the Tulpehocken Creek; and another settlement of English (commonly called "Friends") and Welsh had taken place along the Allegheny and Wyomissing Creeks. These settlements were known by the names "Tulpehocken" and "Robeson." An earlier settlement to the south was called "Caernarvon." Accordingly, during the first quarter of that century six distinct settlements in this vicinity had come to be formed and recognized.

During the second quarter, the way for settlements north of the "South Mountain" was opened by the purchase of the territory from the Indians. The "Friends" were the first to enter the new district to the right of the river. They took up large tracts of land along the Ontelannee, called by them Maiden Creek. Many Germans followed immediately afterward. And to the left many Germans, Friends and Welsh were added to the settlements along the Tulpehocken, Wyomissing and Allegheny Creeks. Improvements were carried on with great energy and success throughout the great valleys which lay between the South Mountain and the Kittatinny Mountain (sometimes called "North," but commonly "Blue Ridge"). These valleys extended from the east and from the west and united in the picturesque Schuylkill Valley, forming, as it were, a great cross, to symbolize the wonderful faith that directed the settlers into this new and fertile country for freedom and religious toleration. New districts were formed to encourage local government and to facilitate intercourse. To the right they were called Douglass, Exeter, Ruscomb-manor,1 Alsace, Maxatawny, Maiden-creek, Richmond,1 Longswamp1 and Allemengle; and to the left, Heidelberg, Bern, Cumru, Bethel and Brecknock. Altogether, till 1750, the districts were twenty in number.

This was the territorial situation of the settlements in this section of the province towards the close of the second quarter of the eighteenth century. The settlers in the several districts had provided themselves with meeting-houses and schools for their religious and secular education. In this respect they had exhibited commendable zeal. The German population predominated; consequently, the preaching and teaching were mostly done in the German language. But the Friends were not backward. They were prominent in Exeter, Robeson and Maiden-creek; and their schools were distinguished for excellence. Manufactures were carried on everywhere; spinning was a common, if not a necessary employment in every household. Wearing apparel was home-made; carpenters, masons, blacksmiths and shoemakers were in every locality; and iron-ore mines and furnaces and forges were in operation to the north, south, east and west. But the great highways were comparatively few. The most prominent public road was the Tulpehocken road. It extended from the Tulpehocken settlement in the west, in a southeasterly direction, via the ford across the Schuylkill (now the site of the Penn Street Bridge at Reading) and Pine Iron-Works, to Philadelphia. From this ford a prominent road extended to the north, on the eastern side of the river, called Maiden Creek road; and another to the south, on the western side, called Schuylkill road. This point of concentration naturally attracted attention towards this locality as a practicable place for a town-site. Elsewhere, for many miles roundabout, there was no town, not even a village, and there were then apparently no steps towards founding either. But just as the settlers had labored for years to establish a county out of the surrounding territory, similar efforts were expended for a town here.

Petition for County.—The first efforts for the establishment of a new county out of the upper sections of Philadelphia and Lancaster Counties, adjoining the Schuylkill, were made in the latter part of 1738. On the 13th day of the Eleventh Month (January), 1738, the Hon. George Thomas, Lieutenant-Governor of the province, \( ^{14} \) laid before the Council two petitions addressed to him—one from the inhabitants of Providence, Limerick, etc., in Philadelphia County, and the other from the inhabitants of the northeast side of the county of Lancaster, (with a Map of the Province of Pennsylvania)—praying that a new county may be bounded as by the dividing lines in the said Map, for that they labor under great inconveniences and damage by reason of their distance from the Courts held at Philadelphia and Lancaster, and for many other reasons in the said petition mentioned; which were read and ordered to lie on the table for further consideration.\(^{14}\) The petition from the inhabitants of Providence, Limerick, etc., districts (now in Montgomery County) has not been found; but a copy of the other is in the possession of the Pennsylvania Historical Society, at Philadelphia. It is as follows, including the names of one hundred and seventy-two subscribers, of which the first sixty-one were Welsh, the others Germans:

\( ^{14} \) To the Hon. Geo. Thomas, Esq., Lieut. Govr. and Commander-in-Chief of the Province of Pennsylvania and counties of New Castle, Kent and Sussex upon Delaware, etc.

The petition of the Inhabitants of the North East side of the county of Lancaster in the said Province.

\( ^{14} \) That whereas our Neighbours, the Inhabitants of the county of Philada., have petitioned Your Honor That the upper part of the said county may be made & erected into a County, We, Therefore, in consideration of our sufferings and by their approbation and consent, pray That part of this county may be Divided by a North West line at such a reasonable distance as you in your Wisdom shall think fit, upon a right angle from the river Schuylkill and added to the said proposed division and be made and erected into a County & allowed the usual privileges for the following reasons:

"1st. The Town of Lancaster, where the Courts of Justice and Publick Offices are held, is seated very advantageous for a Division, there being, according to the best account, three-fourths of the Distance between Skulkill and Susquehanna on this side of it.

"2dly. That our Trade and Commerce are equal with that of our neighbours, the Inhabitants of the Upper part of the county of Philada. aforesaid, and [we] transport our produce by the same methods, so that we have [no] business nor trade at or near Lancaster, save only to attend the administration of Justice by reason of the disadvantage of their length of land carriage [and] will not allow us a market there for our produce and for the same reasons we cannot purchase such goods as our occasions require but at a very dear rate.

"3dly. If the Seat of Justice were fixed upon Skulkill we could there cheerfully attend the Courts and dispose of our produce, or have it carried down by water for less than the fourth part of what we must pay for land carriage or store it there ready for markets, to wait the freshets, or if we travel with our wagons, having mist all the aforesaid opportunities. Yet we are still in our way to Philada.

"4thly. That many of us are divided from Lancaster by vast ridges of mountains; that the quiet and peaceable people rather choose to suffer thefts and abuses from the idle and dissolute people who always choose to resort to such places which are furthest from the Seat of Justice (Especially the Advantage of the River considered) than be at the expense and trouble of such a journey, the distance and difficulty thereof when attempted, oftentimes gives such opportunities to escape.

"5thly. That Whereas Skulkill is the principal River in the Province, We Humbly conceive that these proposed Divisions being annexed as aforesaid and the Seat of Justice fixed as aforesaid it would be a great advancement to trade and a benefit to the Province in General as well as to every particular within the proposed division and no detriment or disadvantage to any.

"6thly. That as our natural situation is such That we are a great distance from any Seaport and consequently it is with great labour & difficulty we transport the effects of our Industry, thereby yielding a benefit to the other, our neighboring Counties, through which we travel and with whom we Barter, We Therefore hold ourselves excusable if not Commandable in craving the reasonable advantages we humbly conceive belong to a people deprived of equal advantages with their neighbors, so that being fully satisfied with the Justice of our Request, and that Your Honors' care and study is for the good of the Public Weal, We Therefore Humbly pray that our cases in conjunction with our neighbours aforementioned may be equally considered.

"And your petitioners as in duty bound shall pray, etc.

Several months afterward (on 19th of Third Month [May], 1739) Lieutenant-Governor Thomas addressed a message to the Assembly in which he referred to these petitions and said: "If it shall be thought likely to conduce to the security, ease and good order of that part of the government, I shall be willing to grant the prayer of the petitions; and as a provision will be best made by a law for the establishment of Courts of Judicature, I shall also be willing to join with you in one for that or other necessary purposes."

The Assembly did nothing in the matter. The petitioners waited six years and heard nothing. They then (25th of Second Month [April], 1745) addressed another petition to the Lieutenant-Governor, and renewed their former request for a new county. It was read to the Council, "and their case being thought proper to be recommended to the Assembly, the same was done," in a message similar to the first. The Assembly ordered it to lie on the table. It was signed by John Potts, Henry Harry, William Bird, Francis Parvin and numerous other inhabitants. On the 14th of the Eleventh Month (January), 1745, a similar petition was presented, in which the petitioners (the persons named "in behalf of themselves and a great many other inhabitants") prayed "that their former petition may now be considered, and that for the reasons therein contained a new county may be laid out and erected," according to the lines drawn in a map then laid before the House, or in such other manner as to the House shall seem meet. It was read and ordered to lie on the table. The next day, (15th) it was again read, but referred for further consideration. In two weeks afterward (on the 30th) another "petition from a considerable number of inhabitants of Philadelphia and Lancaster Counties, praying to be set off into a new county," was presented, read and ordered to lie on the table. On the 28th of Twelfth Month (February), 1745, sundry persons appeared before the House and urged the matter of the erection of this new county, when a resolution was passed, "That the House will, at their next sitting, take the said petition into consideration." The matter seems to have been dropped then for five years more. Nothing is recorded in the "Votes of the Assembly." A diligent, but fruitless search was made for these petitions, in order to ascertain the names of the petitioners.

In the mean time settlements had been extended westwardly and northwardly beyond the Susquehanna River. York County had been erected on the 19th of August, 1749, and Cumberland County on the 27th of January, 1750, both out of the westerly part of Lancaster County. This successful action on the part of the German settlers west of the Susquehanna seems to have awakened a new interest in behalf of the new county between the Susquehanna and the Delaware; for, some months afterward, on the 7th of the Third Month (May), 1750, there was presented—"A petition from a great number of the back inhabitants of Philadelphia County and the adjacent parts of Chester, Lancaster and Bucks Counties, setting forth that by their remote situation from their respective county towns (where the courts and public offices are kept), they are put to such extraordinary expense of money and time in their long journeys thither, as parties in causes, witnesses, Jurymen, constables, etc., that their burthen on that account is almost double to what those bear who are so fortunate as to live within a convenient distance of their county town; that their being at a great distance from the metropolis of the province, and the charge of carriage of their produce to market, make the burthen still more heavy upon them; that as the other remote inhabitants of the province, who were lately in the same circumstances, have obtained laws to have new counties erected, they are encouraged to expect the like favor; humbly praying that this House would take their case into consideration, and grant them a law for erecting them into a distinct county of such extent and in such manner as to their wisdom shall seem meet."

It was read, but it was not effective. The House was not in the proper spirit. Its members may have thought—as their successors thought a hundred years afterwards—that counties were becoming too numerous, that the people were getting too many offices and office-holders, and that the taxes would become too burdensome. The very argument which the petitioners had so ably and truly set forth in their petition, and used in their behalf, seems to have moved the House against them. They ordered the petition to lie on the table. Here was a clear case of partiality. The petitioners must have been bitterly disappointed. What was the reason of the refusal? The settlers of the districts erected into York and Cumberland were not removed from Lancaster, the county-town, more than an average distance of thirty miles; yet the average distance of the settlers in this district, especially those situated east of the Schuylkill, exceeded sixty miles, or twice the distance from their county-towns. Had they not used enough money? Had they not first fed the politicians before asking a favor at their hands? Or were they wanting in policy? Their representatives, Potts, Harry, Bird and Parvin, who can be presumed to have taken an active interest in this petition also, were wise, as they were wealthy and influential, and the conclusion must therefore be expressed that the Assembly deemed the erection of a new county so soon after York and Cumberland as inexpedient.

If they were then disappointed, they were not discouraged. Their determination prepared them for another effort. A year afterward they tried it again. They caused their petition to be brought up before the Assembly on the 16th of Sixth Month (August), 1751, and read a second time; but it was "referred to the consideration of the next Assembly."

When the next Assembly met, these earnest petitioners were on hand. They prepared the way by presenting still another petition. This was on the 4th of February, 1752. It represented—

"That they were inhabitants of Reading-town, upon the Schuykill. That they had settled in the said town, expecting that it would be a great place of trade and business, and had put themselves to vast expenses in building and removing thither with their families, several of whom had left tolerably good plantations; that though the said town had not above one house in it about two years ago (1750), yet it now consisted of one hundred and thirty dwelling-houses, besides forty-one stables and other out-houses; and that there were one hundred and sixty families, consisting of three hundred and seventy-eight persons, settled therein; that they had good reason to believe that in another summer they would be much increased, as the chief part of the province that could be settled was already taken up, and the settling of the town would be of great benefit to tradesmen and others who are not able to purchase tracts of land to live on; that they humbly conceived it their interest, to the honorable proprietaries as well as to themselves, and that unless this House would be pleased to erect part of the counties of Philadelphia, Chester and Lancaster into a separate county, they should be entirely disappointed in their expectations, notwithstanding all the cost and trouble they had been at; they therefore prayed that this House would take their case into consideration and grant them relief by erecting such parts of said counties as they should think most proper into a new county, with the same privileges that the other counties of this province enjoyed; and that the seat of judicature should be fixed within the said town of Reading."

And on the following day (5th) another petition was presented, in which they stated that—

"Although their grievances were laid before the Assemblies of this Province several years past, and their petition again renewed at the last sitting of the Assembly, yet as they find the causes of their complaint still continue growing, they humbly beg leave further to represent that they are settled at a very great distance from the place of judicature, many of them not less than one hundred miles, which is a real hardship upon those who are so unhappy as to be sued for debts, their charges in long journeys, and sometimes in severe weather, with the officers' fees, amounting to near as much, if not more, than the debts; that the hardships on jurymen, constables, etc., in being obliged to attend when required, is also very great; that now there is a new town laid out by the Proprietaries' Order, within fifteen perches of the division line between Philadelphia and Lancaster counties, and above one hundred and thirty houses built, and near as many families living therein; it is very easy for rogues and others to escape justice by crossing the Schuykill, which has already been their practice for some years; that, though their grievances when laid before the Assembly some years past were not redressed, because of other weighty affairs being at that time under consideration, yet the prayer of their petition was thought reasonable, and the number of petitioners being since doubled by the increase of the back inhabitants; they therefore pray that this House would grant relief in the premises, by erecting them into a separate county, bounded as to the wisdom of the House shall seem best."

In pursuance of the reference, the petition was read on the 5th, and referred for the next day. The 6th arrived and it was read again and referred. On the 12th the same proceedings were had. And finally, on the 13th, the monotony of reading and reference was broken; for then the House, after having considered the petition and also the petitions from Reading, "Resolved, that the petitioners have leave to bring in a bill pursuant to the prayer of their petition."

On that day some of the petitioners presented themselves before the House "and desired leave to be heard respecting the bounds which they understood the House proposed for a new county in case it should be granted." Their objections were heard; and, after answering such questions as were put to them, they withdrew.

On the 18th the bill was read the first time and ordered to lie on the table. On the 19th it was read a second time, considered paragraph by paragraph, and, after some debate, ordered to be transcribed for a third reading. On the 20th it was read a third time, and, upon the question, "Resolved, that the Bill do pass," it was "Ordered, that Henry Pawling and George Ashbridge do carry up the same to the Governor and desire his concurrence thereto." On the 21st the gentlemen named reported that they had delivered the Bill according to Order, and that the Governor was pleased to say he would give it all the dispatch he could." On the 6th of March, the Governor, by his secretary, sent down the bill with some amendments; it was read and agreed to by the House and ordered to be engrossed; and on the 11th day of March, 1752, the Speaker reported to the House that the bill was assented to by the Governor and enacted into a law.

At last, after the lapse of fourteen years, the zealous and persistent determination of the petitioners were rewarded with success. The act fixing the boundary lines of the county, and authorizing the erection of county buildings for the public service, etc., was as follows:

ACT ERECTING COUNTY.1

"Whereas a great number of the back inhabitants of the county of Philadelphia, and the adjacent parts of the counties of Chester and Lancaster, by their petition, have humbly represented to the Governor and Assembly of this province their remote situation from their respective county-towns, where the courts of justice and public offices are kept, whereby they are frequently put to extraordinary expense of money, and loss of time, in their long journeys thither, as parties in causes, witnesses, jurymen, &c.: For remedying which inconveniences, and relief of the inhabitants in those remote parts in the premises, be it enacted by the Hon. James Hamilton, Esq., Lieutenant-Governor, under the Hon. Thomas Penn and Richard Penn, true and absolute proprietaries of the province of Pennsylvania and of the counties of New Castle, Kent and Sussex, upon Delaware, by and with the advice and consent of the representatives of the freemen of the said province, in general assembly met, and by the authority of the same—That all and singular the lands lying within the province of Pennsylvania aforesaid, within the metes and bounds as they are herein after described, be erected into a county, and the same are hereby erected into a county, named, and henceforth to be called BERKS; bounded as follows: by a line, at the distance of ten superficial miles southwest from the western bank of the river Schuylkill, opposite to the mouth of a creek called Monocasy, to be run northwest to the extremity of the province, and southeast, until it shall intersect the line of Chester county; then on one straight line crossing the river Schuylkill aforesaid to the upper or northwestward line of McCall's manor; then along the said line to the extremity thereof, and continuing the same course, to the line dividing Philadelphia and Bucks counties; then along the said line northwestern, to the extent of the county aforesaid.

"Sec. 2. The inhabitants empowered to elect one representative in the Assembly.

"Sec. 3. Taxes already laid in the county of Berks, to be paid to the Treasurers of Philadelphia, Chester and Lancaster counties.

"Sec. 4. Jurisdiction of Supreme Court extended to Berks County.

"Sec. 5. County Courts established, which shall sit in May, August, November and February.

"Sec. 6. It shall and may be lawful to and for Anthony Lee, Francis Parvin, William Maugridge, William Bird and Joseph Millard, or any three of them, to purchase and take assurance to them and their heirs, of a piece of land, situate in some convenient place in the said town of Reading, in trust, and for the use of the inhabitants of said county, and thence to erect and build a court-house and pri-on, sufficient to accommodate the public service of the said county, and for the ease and convenience of the inhabitants.

"Sec. 7. Charges for these purposes to be assessed on the inhabitants, but not to exceed three hundred pounds.

"Sec. 8. Suits commenced to be prosecuted in the counties where instituted.

"Sec. 9. John Hughes appointed collector of excise with power to collect the same, &c.

"Sec. 10. Said collector shall apply to collectors of Philadelphia, Chester and Lancaster counties for lists of excise, etc.

"Sec. 11. Collector to give bond for performance of duties.

"Sec. 12. Sheriff and Coroner of Philadelphia to officiate till the same officers be chosen in Berks County.

"Sec. 13. Boundary lines of county to be run within six months by Edward Scull, of Philadelphia County; Benjamin Lightfoot, of Chester County; and Thomas Cookson, of Lancaster County, commissioners specially appointed, etc."

The surveying commissioners surveyed the boundary lines of the county, and extended the easterly and westerly lines to the Susquehanna River, which was then the limit of settlements. The settlers having ascertained that the lines of the new county had been run extended their settlements rapidly. But complaints arose. The adjoining counties claimed the right of levying taxes on the inhabitants and their property along these lines, and this caused dissatisfaction. An Act was therefore passed on the 18th of February, 1769, which authorized commissioners (William McClay, William Scull and John Biddle) to run the lines between Lancaster, Cumberland and Berks Counties, and also between Berks and Northampton Counties, by actual survey, and extend them in a northwestwardly course as far as the lands extended, which were purchased by the proprietaries from the Indians in 1768.

The most extended limits of the county included about one-tenth part of the province, or five times the present area. As the State is at present subdivided, the vast tract of land cut away from Berks County constitutes the following twelve counties, either in whole or in part, as now bounded: All of Montour and Northumberland,\(^1\) the greater part of Schuylkill,\(^2\) Union, Lycoming, Clinton and Potter, and part of Columbia, Snyder, Tioga, Cameron and McKean.

The population of the county at the time of its erection cannot be approximately estimated. The records at Philadelphia and Lancaster were thoroughly examined for the assessments of the years 1750 and 1751 without success. It may have been about twelve thousand.

The territory which comprised the county upon its erection was taken from Philadelphia County to the east of the river Schuylkill, and from Lancaster and Chester Counties to the west. The estimated area of land contributed by the several counties named to the county, as it is at present enclosed by boundary lines, is as follows:

Names of Townships.—The great majority of the early settlers in the county were Germans. From this fact it might be supposed that the majority of the names given to the townships erected upon application to court would be German. But this was not the case; for there was only one township to the east of the Schuylkill named by the German influence, and this was Alsace, and only two to the west, and these Names of Towns.—In the county there are one hundred and twenty towns. The greater number of them are named after individuals. They are well distributed throughout the county. For convenience I have arranged them in two classes in the two divisions and four sections of the county according to my historical narrative. The names of the one class were given to the towns after the individuals who laid out the town-plans or owned the land in the vicinity, and sold off lots or first began local improvements, and are called “personal;” and the other class after localities or some feature of the neighborhood, and are called “local.”

REDUCTIONS OF TERRITORY.

NORTHUMBERLAND COUNTY, 1772.—As near as it was possible to do so, the provincial government kept the settlers from going beyond the limits of the purchases from the Indians. After the purchase of 1749, the settlers extended the settlements beyond the Blue Mountain. Within the next score of years, numerous settlements were made in that territory, especially in the district which lies between the Blue Mountain and "Schneid Berg," or Sharp Mountain,—named so from the sharpness of its apex. Many persons located beyond the purchase, in the vicinity of the great fork in the Susquehanna; and this induced the additional purchase of 1768. Within the next four years, the Governor was persuaded to feel the necessity of erecting another county, even in that remote locality, notwithstanding a much larger population existed within the limits of the purchase of 1749. Its distance—averaging seventy-five miles—from the county-seat, Reading, was the principal cause of complaint, and the prime reason to the Assembly in granting the prayer of the petitioners for a new county. Northumberland was erected on March 21, 1772. It comprised about one-third of the whole State, including the entire northwestern section. Over three-fifths part of Berks County was cut to it. No townships had been formed in that section. Immediately after the erection of the new county, townships were formed, and a county-seat was established and laid out at Shamokin. The place was named Sunbury. Names, statistics, etc., were not obtainable to show who were the first settlers, what was their number and wealth, and what amount of taxes they contributed to Berks County in 1771. Fort Augusta, at the fork of the river, was a conspicuous place during the French and Indian War. It was erected in 1756.

In the first efforts towards erecting the county of Dauphin, in 1782 a proposition was made to cut off a portion of the western section of Berks County. But the citizens of the county generally remonstrated, and their opposition was successful. It caused the political movement in behalf of the new county to confine itself within the limits of Lancaster County; and it was erected several years afterward, in 1785.

SCHUYLKILL COUNTY, 1811.—A score of years had passed by when Berks County was first reduced in area by contributing territory towards the erection of a new county. After two-score of years more elapsed there was a second reduction. In these sixty years many surprising developments were made, not only in settlements and population, but more especially in internal resources. The condition of affairs in Berks County was equal to that of any section of the State. Coal was discovered as early as 1773, along the head-waters of the Schuylkill. Its need had come to be felt. It quickened enterprise in developing new means of transportation. Agriculture had enriched the land wonderfully. Numerous furnaces and forges were carried on successfully, not only in the more populous parts of the county south of the Blue Mountain, but north of it, even in the vicinity of the coal region. The population and improvements in the county beyond the purchase of 1749, when Northumberland was erected in 1772, were comparatively trifling. But within this purchase they had grown to a surprising proportion when the second county was taken from it, for the population numbered about six thousand, and the several townships together contributed over eight hundred dollars in taxes.

(For the erection of townships in the territory beyond the Blue Mountain till 1811, the first taxable inhabitants in the several townships erected, etc., see Appendix).

New Counties Proposed. — Before a score of years more had elapsed, movements began to further reduce Berks County. They were continued with marked determination for thirty years; but, fortunately for her territory and people, fortunately for her wealth and influence and fortunately for her greatness in the family of counties which comprise our grand commonwealth of Pennsylvania, they all failed.

In 1824 three different movements were made to cut off parts of Berks County:

One, for the formation of a new county, which was to have been called Penn, out of the following territory: Albany, Greenwich, Windsor (part), Maiden-creek (part), Richmond, Mastatony, Longswamp, Rockland, Ruscombmanor (part) and Oley (part), with Kutztown as the county-seat. This met with great opposition, representations having been made that it would be impolitic and very expensive, that Reading, the county-seat, was in the central position of the county, and that the project was the result of a few ambitions, designing and speculating individuals who wanted profit in increased value of property, and who doubtless wanted place also for political power.

A second, for the erection of part of Berks, Montgomery, Chester and Lancaster into a new county. And a third for the annexation of part of Berks to Lehigh County.

In 1825 the spirit continued, and it advanced so far as to have bills presented to the Legislature:

1. To erect part of Berks into a new county, with Kutztown as the county-seat.
2. To erect part of Berks and Montgomery into a new county, with Pottstown as the county-seat.
3. To erect part of Berks, Chester and Lancaster into a new county, with Churchtown as the county-seat.

And petitions were circulated for the annexation of part of Berks to Lebanon, and thus was there "a disposition to clip old Berks in every direction." But these hills having been earnestly opposed, they were dropped.

In January, 1838, after slumbering thirteen years, the feeling manifested itself again. Petitions and remonstrances from Berks County for and against a division of the county were presented almost daily to the Legislature. And besides the new counties named, a fourth appeared, which was to be erected out of part of Berks and Schuylkill, and to be called "Windsor." If the prayers of all the petitions had been granted, Berks would have only comprised Reading and several adjoining townships. Bills were reported for all the projects, and many persons were at Harrisburg urging their passage.

In March following, the Kutztown party came very near accomplishing their scheme. Mr. Samuel Fegely, a resident of that borough, and then one of the Assemblymen, opposed the matter. His pleasing personal appearance and acknowledged good character carried great weight before the Legislature. On the 2d of March, 1838, the bill for "Penn County" was submitted to a vote; thirty-nine voted aye and thirty-nine voted nay. Fegely received much denunciation from his neighbors for his action. He was somewhat like the property-holders of Rehersburg. But his conduct won the favor of politicians at and surrounding Reading. Soon afterward he was promoted from the Assembly to the Senate, and he was kept in this office for two terms,—1841 to 1846.

In February, 1841, another bill was reported by Mr. Daniel B. Kutz (of Kutztown), then in the Assembly, for the erection of a new county out of part of Berks and Lehigh, with Kutztown as the county-seat. By this scheme fourteen townships were to have been cut from Berks. But it was tabled.
On November 15, 1845, there was a grand meeting at Pottstown to encourage a new county which was to have been formed out of part of Berks, Chester and Montgomery, and named "Jackson." The townships to have been taken from Berks were Amity, Douglass, Earl and Colebrookdale. William Johnson, from Berks, was president of the meeting, and on this occasion Dr. Andrew Bush, of Chester County, "made an eloquent address favorable to the new county." Resolutions were adopted with great unanimity and enthusiasm, in which there were expressed "the grievances and inconveniences which the people suffered from their remoteness from the seat of justice, county records, etc., and their indisputable claims to a new county by reason of their business resources, locality and population," the population of those three parts having then been estimated at thirty thousand, and capital in business upwards of three millions of dollars. This aroused great feeling and caused meetings in opposition to be held at different places for four successive weeks: in Amity, November 22d; in Earl, November 29th; in Douglass, December 6th; and in Caernarvon, December 13th. The bill for this new county of "Jackson" passed through the committee, but "it was killed on the second reading," the vote by the Assembly having been,—yeas, twenty-one; nays, sixty-one.

In December of that year there was also an application for a new county out of part of Berks, Chester and Lancaster, to be called "Conestoga," with Churchtown as the county-seat, but it was not encouraged.

In 1847 the leaders for the new county of "Jackson" were again at work before the Legislature. Their efforts stirred up opposition in all parts of the county. On the 4th of January, 1847, a large and enthusiastic meeting was held in the court-house at Reading, and resolutions were passed in which determined opposition to this movement was expressed. Citizens from all parts of the county attended the meeting. At that session also, on the 15th of January, 1847, Mr. Jacob Graeff, then in the Assembly, presented a bill for the new county of "Penn," to be erected out of a part of Berks, but it was referred to a select committee of three. A third new county was applied for, to have been formed out of parts of Berks, Chester and Montgomery, and named "Madison," with the county-seat at Pottstown. The part to have been taken from Berks comprised all of Union, Douglass, Colebrookdale, Washington, Hereford, District and Earl, half of Amity, two-thirds of Pike and half of Longswamp. The efforts for the new counties of "Madison" and "Penn" were so great and persistent at that session that fears were entertained that the bills would pass. The opponents accordingly developed a feeling against them by public meetings which they caused to be held in Windsor on the 16th of January, in Pike on the 19th of January, and in Maiden-creek on the 23d of January. The bill for "Penn County" was voted for on the 1st of March and defeated by a vote of nineteen ayes to forty-four nays; and the bill for "Madison" was voted for on the 3d of March and defeated by a vote of forty-two ayes to thirty-six nays. The leaders for "Madison" had apparently worked very hard, and, securing such a strong vote—nearly two-thirds—they must have been greatly disappointed.

In 1849, the subject of new counties was agitated with renewed vigor; but earnestly and sincerely as the one party worked for them the other party worked against them. During the winter and spring of that year, numerous opposition meetings were held at different places. The most conspicuous and enthusiastic meeting favorable to a new county was one held at Kutztown on the 16th of February, 1849. It was for the "County of Penn." Very appropriate resolutions were reported and adopted. The proposed division was to have cut off fifteen townships. But their enthusiasm passed away with general satisfaction to the county.

In November, 1849, the people of Hamburg were also seized with this ambitious feeling. They, too, wanted their borough to become a county-seat, and accordingly prepared a petition for the erection of a part of Berks and Schuylkill into a new county, to be called "Windsor," which they circulated for subscribers, in anticipation of the next meeting of the Legislature.

In February, 1850, bills were reported to the Legislature for the new counties "Madison," "Penn" and "Windsor."

And besides "Windsor," a petition for another county in the same region of territory—to have included part of Berks and Schuylkill, and to have been named "Fulton"—was presented to the Legislature; but on the 1st of May, 1850, Henry A. Muhlenberg (the State Senator from Berks County) reported adversely.

And still another new county was to have been formed. It would seem that the circle about Reading had to be completed in the numerous efforts to cut off the surrounding territory. The citizens in and about Bernville caught the spirit at last, and they, too, had a bill presented, in March, 1852, for the erection of a new county out of part of Berks, which was to have been called "Lee," with Bernville as the county-seat. No particular excitement followed this application. The intelligence from Harrisburg, communicating to the people of Reading that "there were no hopes of the passage of the bill," must have had a cheering, if not a soothing, effect upon their agitated minds.

At the session of 1854, and also of 1855, renewed applications were made for the county of "Madison," but without any progress. Suddenly, however, all these movements collapsed, as a bellows would have done from a break. What struck the wind out of them? From the adoption of the Constitution of 1790, for a period of three score years, the spirit for new counties had passed through the whole State like fire through a woods. The year 1800 was especially prolific. In these sixty years forty-three new counties had been erected. The politicians and men of public spirit at Kulztown, Hamburg and Bernville had apparently started too late. The growth of the number of counties and the consequent increase in representation, in offices and in local taxation had been gradually formulating legislation against this evil, and finally the bold genius of Charles R. Buckalew broke the storm by a constitutional amendment, which thus set the minds of ambitious, designing men at rest. The citizens of the county are to be congratulated in having had preserved for them such a magnificent natural arrangement of territory for their political existence.

CHAPTER VI.

AGRICULTURE.

General Condition and Progress—County Society and Exhibitions—Farms, Productions, etc., of County, 1870 and 1880.

GENERAL CONDITION AND PROGRESS.—When the first settlers entered this territory they found it entirely without cultivation or improvement of any kind. The land along the Schuylkill and its tributaries was in a primitive state in every respect. But it was in a good condition for farming purposes. Its location was fine, its irrigation was superior. Altogether it was very inviting to them. Labor stood out prominently before them as the one thing necessary to cause it to become fruitful. Fortunately for them, they possessed this personal quality in the highest degree; and with this quality they also possessed other qualities equally important in taking hold of an uncultivated country,—economy, perseverance and patience. They were in every way adapted to their situation. Their preparation was of the best order; and driven from home by religious persecution or intolerance, they must have rejoiced in finding such a pleasing situation, such inviting conditions. After the beginning had been made, can we wonder that immigrants came by the thousand? They knew their sufferings, their uncertain condition at home. Their sense of well-being induced them to leave. But in leaving the valleys and hills so dear to them, they came to possess and enjoy a country equally favored for beauty, for health and for profit; but more highly favored in respect to a condition which was to them more important than all the others combined—freedom. It is surprising to find in the course of time and government the development of a condition for mankind so unfortunate, so objectionable, so discouraging; but it is equally surprising to find in the same course of time and government, though in a country far removed, over a thousand miles across a dreaded sea, a condition exactly opposite, fortunate, acceptable and encouraging.

The condition of the settlers was encouraging, not only in respect to an acceptable country, but also in respect to their own constitution, physically, mentally and morally. They were strong and enduring in physical development; they were sensible and practical in thought and feeling; they were sound, hopeful and trustful in religious convictions. These fitted them admirably for their vocation.

The land was cultivated then as it is now—by manuring and enriching the soil, by turning the sod, by sowing and planting seeds, by rotating crops; but the manner was infinitely more laborious. Every act was performed by muscular exeretion and endurance, with the assistance of horse-power. The plow, the harrow, the scythe, the sickle and the rake were important then. By comparison of the past with the present, we can readily appreciate the vast difference. The farming implements were rude and simple in construction and continued so for many years. The whole of the eighteenth century passed away without any improvement. The farmer labored on earnestly and faithfully year after year, and decade after decade, with the same muscular exeretion. These rude implements required him to be at his place all the time, if he wished to be in season. His devotion was equal to the task. He was up with the sun in the morning, and he was up with the moon in season. He was never behind; he could not be, without great loss and inconvenience. His implements were satisfactory to him, because he gave them no thought beyond the assistance which they afforded; and sons followed in the footsteps of their fathers—by imitation. Half of the nineteenth century passed away without any material advancement in this vicinity beyond the days of 1700, of 1750 and of 1800. Labor-saving machinery had begun to be introduced within a score of years before 1850, and this naturally led to an improvement in farming implements. The mower came to be substituted for the scythe, the reaper for the sickle and the drill for the hand. Improved plows of various patterns were introduced. And now we have the combined reaper and binder—a machine truly ingenious.

The same slowness, simplicity, but earnest labor, followed the threshing of grain after it had been harvested. The flail and the walking of horses on the barn-floor were continued for a hundred and fifty years. Indeed, some of the poorer, non-progressive farmers in districts distant from railroads and prominent highways still carry on this laborious performance. For long straw the flail is still indispensable. But about 1850 the threshing-machine was introduced, and also the horse-power machine for running it with speed and success. Patent hay-rakes, hay-forks, corn-shellers and implements and machines of various kinds are also used in every section of our county. All these things were developed from the easy manufacture of iron into any shape. Accordingly, the model and the foundry played an important part in these improvements. And at the bottom of all this progress to and for the farmer we find iron, coal and steam.

We no longer see from ten to thirty and forty persons engaged in hay-making and harvesting on our surrounding farms as they were seen one hundred, indeed, only thirty years ago. A farmer and his own family, with the aid of his horses and improved farming machinery, can carry on all the work, from beginning to end successfully. He has little or no hired help to deal with. This is certainly a great consideration to him. His investment in improved machinery is therefore profitable; and it is always reliable and ready. During the last thirty years numerous manufacturing establishments were erected in our country. They caused a great demand for working-people, and this demand was supplied to a great degree from the farming districts. The manufacturer paid higher wages than the farmer, and limited the time of daily labor to ten hours. Towns and cities, at which these establishments were almost entirely erected, afforded the working-people more and better advantages and facilities in respect to schools, churches, pleasures and associations. These naturally inclined them to quit laboring on farms in the country and enter establishments in populous places. Accordingly, farm-laborers began to grow scarce, and farmers became alarmed, but for-fortunately for farming, whilst enterprise was drawing one way against its interests and welfare, genius was acting with equal force in the other for them. The result has actually come to be beneficial to the farmer, especially in respect to making him more self-dependent.

County Society and Exhibitions.—A society, formed for the purpose of promoting the interests of farmers through the progressive cultivation of land, may not be strictly regarded as an intellectual association. But it is certainly intended for the discussion of matters whose principal object is the improvement of farmers, as well respecting their condition as the ways by which they can conduct their operations with greater ease and success; and the process is purely intellectual—the direction of affairs through an improved understanding.

In 1823, a State Agricultural Society was suggested to the people of the State by an Act of incorporation; but nothing resulted from the legislative movement. Nearly thirty years elapsed before a successful movement was made. A public letter was addressed to the farmers of the State, in May, 1850, which suggested a convention to be held at Harrisburg, in January, 1851, for the purpose of forming a State Agricultural Society. There were delegates from the several counties in attendance,—those from Berks County having been Henry A. Muhlenberg, John C. Evans, Jacob Reifsnyder, Alexander S. Feather, William D. Robeson and Samuel Fegely. It resulted successfully, and the first State Fair was held in October, 1851. This movement having met with success, a preliminary meeting for organizing a society in the county was held at the Keystone House, in Reading, on December 20, 1851. It was attended by fifteen prominent citizens1 of the county, all from Reading excepting two, who caused a public address to be issued. A formal organization was effected at the court-house on January 13, 1852, and one hundred and eight persons subscribed the constitution. The first exhibition was held on 17th of August, 1852, in the parlors of Honsum’s new hotel (now American House), on the southwest corner of Fourth and Penn Streets, Reading. It was confined principally to grains, vegetables, fruits and flowers; and, though small, it exceeded all expectations and was an entire success, having attracted a large number of visitors from Reading and all parts of the county. This was a “horticultural fair.” The first “agricultural fair” was held in October, 1853; the exhibition of speed took place on a large lot on the northeast corner of Sixth and Walnut Streets; of farming implements, stock, poultry, etc., in the lot on southeast corner of Fifth and Elm Streets; and of grain, fruits, flowers, fancy articles, etc., in the Academy building, on northeast corner of Fourth and Court Streets. It was a great success,—the attendance was estimated at twenty thousand.

In the spring of 1854 (April) an exhibition was held with success on a lot below Laurel Street, between Fourth and Fifth Streets.

In a report to the society, made April 5, 1853, a recommendation was made that the public park and parade-ground be obtained as a suitable locality for the erection of buildings, etc., to promote agricultural science. This recommendation was acted upon, and on May 13, 1854, the county commissioners leased to the society the ground known as the “commons,” for the purpose of holding its annual fairs, for the term of ninety-nine years. The third annual fair was held there2 in October, 1854; and

1 There were present at this meeting Dr. John P. Hiester, Hon. Charles Kessler, General William H. Keim, Jacob Gehl, Peter Filbert, Augustus F. Boas, Frederick Lauer, Hon. J. Pringle Jones, George W. Oaksley, Samuel L. Young, Edward M. Clymer and Jacob Knabb.

Dr. John P. Hiester was elected chairman, and Peter Filbert, Esq., secretary of this first meeting, and a call was issued for a county meeting, which was held at the court-house, in the city of Reading, on Tuesday afternoon, January 13, 1852, at which Henry Flannery, Esq., of Union, presided. A constitution and rules of order were presented by A. F. Boas, Esq., and adopted. The election for every succeeding year till now the fairs have been conducted with increasing success on the "Fair Ground" excepting during the Civil War for three years (1862-3-4), when it was taken and held by the United States government for the purposes of a military hospital and camp.

The exhibitions of the society since its organization have been held altogether at Reading.

The annual "Fair" is one of the principal objects of the society. But beyond this, there is an important feature—monthly meetings for the discussion of topics which pertain to the agricultural and horticultural progress of the farmer. These are interesting and profitable in various ways. They have been held in the third story of the court-house for some years past. Formerly they were held at different places, prominent among them being the "Keystone House" and "Keystone Hall."

The society is collecting an agricultural library, the books now numbering several hundred.

A similar society was formed at Kutztown in 1870, and its exhibitions have been very successful. The success of this society should stimulate the residents of the county at and in the vicinity of the several boroughs, Boyerstown, Hamburg, Birdsboro', Bernville and Womelsdorf, to organize similar societies and conduct annual exhibitions for the encouragement of local interest in the progressive development of agriculture and of everything connected with its profitable direction.

The "Patrons of Husbandry" was organized into a prominent and influential association at Washington, D. C., in 1867. The first subordinate organization of this kind in Pennsylvania was called a "grange." The "State Grange" was organized at Reading, on September 18, 1873. Delegates from twenty-five granges were in attendance. Shortly afterward local granges were formed in different parts of the county.

Farms, Productions, Etc., of County.—The following statement exhibits the number, acreage, value and productions of the farms in the county at two periods. Some marked differences appear, as in value of farms, live stock and farm products, which doubtless arose from a different process of ascertaining them.

CHAPTER VII.

EARLY AND GENERAL INDUSTRIES.

EARLY FURNACES AND FORGES OF COUNTY. 2

The county of Berks was formed out of parts of Philadelphia, Lancaster and Chester Counties in 1752. In each part there were iron industries at an early period in the history of the county, especially in the lower portion of the part taken from Philadelphia County. They were scattered many miles from one another, extending from the southern boundary to the northern, and from the eastern to the western. All were located along strong streams which afforded constant water-power, and in the midst of thickly-wooded territory which furnished an inexhaustible supply of charcoal. The greater number were east of the Schuylkill. The eight following streams were occupied before the Revolution: Manatawny and its tributary,—the Ironstone, West Branch of Perkiomen, French, Hay, Allegheny, Tulpehocken and its tributary, —Spring.

South of the “South Mountain” were the following: Furnaces,—Colebrookdale, Mount Pleasant, Hopewell and Oley; Forges,—Pool, Pine, Hay Creek, Oley, Spring, Mount Pleasant and Gibraltar.

North of this mountain, however, there were one furnace; Roxborough or Berkshire, and two forges, Charming and Moselem.

The following historical facts are submitted, relating to the industries named. They conflict with and antedate numerous statements heretofore made and published. They were gathered almost entirely from the recorded deeds, etc., in the recorder’s office of Berks County. For this reason they can be generally relied upon as correct. Notwithstanding my diligent search, this narrative is incomplete. Further investigation will doubtless reveal additional facts with respect to some of the industries named, both before and after the Revolution, and these may modify certain statements made and opinions expressed.

FURNACES.

COLEBROOKDALE FURNACE. — The Colebrookdale Furnace was situated on the Ironstone Creek, an important branch of the Manatawny, in Colebrookdale township, within a mile to the south of the borough of Boyertown. A valuable deposit of iron-ore there induced its erection at that point. It is supposed to have been erected in the year 1720, “or a year or two earlier,” by a company comprising, among others, Thomas Rutter, Anthony Morris, James Lewis and Thomas Potts. Especial mention of it is made in Watson’s “Annals,” in the “Potts Memorial,” by Mrs. James, and in the able and exhaustive chapter on “Iron-Making in Pennsylvania,” by Mr. James M. Swank, in “Pennsylvania and the Centennial Exhibition,” vol. i. The transmission of title to this furnace property is complicated. The facts about its inception, operation and abandonment are involved in considerable obscurity. A correct statement of facts about it will therefore not be attempted. It is generally conceded to have been the first furnace which was erected in Pennsylvania. Thomas Rutter died in 1730. In November, 1728, he executed a last will, by which it would appear that he owned two-thirds of a furnace and of a forge; the former, it is supposed, was this furnace, and the latter “Pool Forge.” In 1731 it was owned in one-twelfth parts, as follows—the Rutter family apparently not owning any interest: Anthony Morris, one-twelfth; Alexander Wooddross, three-twelfths; Samuel Preston, one-twelfth; William Attwood, one-twelfth; John Leacock, one-twelfth; Nathaniel French, three-twelfths; George Mifflin, one-twelfth; Thomas Potts and George Boone, one-twelfth.

About that time the furnace was carried on extensively. Pig-iron was manufactured and sold in large quantities. The price was fifteen dollars a ton. “Country castings”—articles of iron used by farmers in the vicinity—were also made, the price of which was twice that of pig-iron.

A stove-plate, inscribed as having been cast at this furnace in 1763, was exhibited at the “Centennial Exhibition” in 1876. It is supposed that the furnace was abandoned soon after this cast was made.

The furnace was named after one of the same name in Shropshire, in England. The surrounding territory naturally took the same name; and, subsequently, in 1736, upon its erection into a township, it was called “Colebrookdale.”

MOUNT PLEASANT FURNACE.—The Mount Pleasant Furnace was situated on the West Branch of the Perkiomen Creek, in Colebrookdale (now Washington) township, about five miles north of Colebrookdale Furnace, at a point a short distance beyond Barto, the terminus of the Colebrookdale Railroad. It is said to have been erected by Thomas Potts, Jr., in 1738. The first blast was made on the 12th of October, 1738, and continued to the 11th of December following, during which time there were manufactured: Pig-iron, 85 tons; country castings, 6 T. 1 cwt. 2 qr. 2 p.; and forge castings, 7 cwt. 3 qr. 6 p.—altogether 91 T. 9 cwt. 1 qr. 8 p. Six blasts were made to the 20th of July, 1741—a total of four hundred and seventy days—during which time six hundred and ninety tons of iron were produced. The subsequent history of the furnace is not known; at least it has not as yet been published, perhaps not even investigated thoroughly, owing to the absence of unrecorded agreements and title-papers. Its exact locality can still be identified by the base of the stack.

HOPEWELL FURNACE.—The Hopewell Furnace is situated on French Creek, in Union township, near the county line. It is said to have been erected by William Bird in 1759. This is possible, but not probable. He died November 16, 1762. But this furnace was not then part of his possessions. And yet he then owned the Roxborough Furnace, in Heidelberg, distant at least fifteen miles from Birdsboro'. If he had owned it, why should he have sold it just before his death, inasmuch as it was only five miles distant, whereas the Roxborough was situated three times as far off? But there is no title of record from him to any one. It is more than likely that Mark Bird built this furnace after his father’s death, say about 1765. He was then twenty-six years old. He held it for twenty years. The first mention of it is made in a mortgage, dated in 1772, made by him to his sister Mary and brothers William and James to secure the payment of certain trust moneys. Becoming subsequently embarrassed, he, in 1785, was first compelled to borrow money (two hundred thousand Spanish milled dollars) from John Nixon, a merchant, of Philadelphia, on a mortgage, in which (among other properties) he described the Birdsboro' Iron-Works and eight thousand acres of land, which included the Hopewell Furnace property; and then, finding himself insolvent, he, in 1786, transferred the property to Nixon, in trust, to sell and satisfy debts, etc. Nixon accordingly exposed it to public sale, and in 1788 transferred one-third to Cadwallader Morris and two-thirds to James Old, both ironmasters. At that time the furnace lands comprised altogether five thousand one hundred and sixty-three acres. In 1790 Cadwallader Morris sold his one-third of the premises to Benjamin Morris; and in 1791 James Old sold his two-thirds to the same person. In 1793 Benjamin Morris resold the entire furnace property to James Old. After the lapse of seven years Old became embarrassed and was forced to yield up his title through the law and the sheriff to his creditor, Benjamin Morris, who bought it at the sale. This was in 1800. In August, 1800, Morris sold it to Daniel Buckley, of Lancaster County, Thomas Brooke, of Montgomery County, and Matthew Brooke, Jr., of Berks County, for ten thousand pounds. The furnace was rebuilt in that year. The Brookes subsequently sold out their interests, and Dr. Charles Clingan acquired an interest in it. Edward S. Buckley is now a joint owner with the estate of Dr. Clingan. Charcoal has been used from the beginning till now. It may be the oldest furnace in the county now in existence. The "Oley" was built about the same time. The "Hopewell" has been in the Buckley family over eighty years. The "Joanna" has been in the Smith family nearly ninety years.

OLEY FURNACE.—The Oley Furnace is situated on Furnace Creek, a branch of the Little Manatawny, in Oley township, a short distance north of Friedensburg, and near the line between Oley and Ruscomb-manor townships. It was built most probably by Dietrich Welcker, an iron-master of Skippack, between 1758 and 1768, say about 1765; and it is possible that William Mayberry was a joint owner with him in the beginning. In 1768 the furnace was certainly in existence and in active operation, for Welcker then borrowed one hundred pounds from John Lesher, an iron-master of Oley, and executed a mortgage to him, in which the furnace is mentioned and five tracts of land, together 558 acres, 110 perches. He had borrowed money from others, who sent the sheriff after him. Subsequently Daniel Udree came to own this furnace, and carried it on in connection with the "Rockland Forges," situated several miles to the northeast, till his death in 1828. It is now, and has been for years, owned by the "Clymer Iron Company." A plate, with an inscription "1770," is built in the stack of the furnace; but this must certainly relate to some other fact than the date of the beginning of the furnace. An ore-bank is near by. But iron-ore was also supplied in its early operation from the Moselem Mine, in Richmond township, distant about eight miles to the northwest.

Berkshire Furnace.—The Berkshire Furnace was situated on a branch of Spring Creek, in Lower Heidelberg township, about two miles southwest of Wernersville. It was erected by William Bird about 1760. It was part of his estate at the time of his death in 1762. The name first given to it was Roxborough. It is not known when the name was changed to Berkshire. About 1790 George Ege purchased the furnace property and carried it on for several years, when he abandoned it, doubtless owing to scarcity of water. During the Revolution cannon-balls were manufactured at this furnace. Ege carried it on under a lease with the widow of Wm. Bird—intermarried with John Patton—from 1774. She owned it from 1764 to 1790. Mr. Ege rendered an account to the "United States" April 3, 1783, in which it appears that he furnished the government, November 14, 1780, with the following shells and shot, altogether of the value of £2894 11s. 6d.:

Shells: 867, 10 in.; 714, 8 in.
Shot: 843, 24 pd.; 2187, 18 pd.; 289, 12 pd.

Forges.

Pool Forges.—Pool Forge was situated on the Manatawuy Creek, a short distance below the point where the Ironstone flows into it; and another of the same name on the Manatawuy, several miles below. The latter is supposed to have been the first of the two, and erected in the year 1717. This would be a few years before the time generally allowed as the date of the erection of the Colebrookdale Furnace. It is believed that the remarks of Jonathan Dickinson, in a letter written in 1717, related to this forge. He said: "This last summer one Thomas Rutter, a smith, who lived not far from Germantown, hath removed farther up in the country, and of his own strength hath set upon making iron. Such it proves to be, as it is highly esteemed by all the smiths here, who say that the best of Sweed's iron doth not exceed it. And we have accounts of others that are going on with iron works." It is not known when the former forge began. Thomas Rutter was interested in one, or perhaps both, of these forges. A forge is mentioned in his last will, dated 1728, in which he disposes of two one-third interests. In 1731 a "Pool Forge" was owned in one-sixteenth parts, as follows: Anthony Morris, two-sixteenths; Alexander Wooddross, two-sixteenths; Samuel Preston, one-sixteenth; William Attwood, one-sixteenth; John Leacock, one-sixteenth; Nathaniel French, one-sixteenth; George Mifflin, one-sixteenth; Thomas Potts and George Boon, one-sixteenth; Rutter's estate, six-sixteenths.

The subsequent history of this forge is unknown. It is possible that Pine Forge was built in 1740, near by, to take its place in the manufacture of blooms.

Pine Forge.—The Pine Forge was erected in 1740, by Thomas Potts. It was situated on Manatawuy Creek, in Douglass township, very near the line of Amity. One of the Pool Forges was situated a short distance above and the other some distance below. His son, John Potts, succeeded him. After the forge had been carried on for some years by him, it was sold in 1769 to David Potts, Jr. In 1783 David Rutter bought it at public sale, and he carried it on till his death in 1815, when his son John became the owner of the property. Subsequently Joseph Bailey came to own the works, and in 1845 he converted the forge into a rolling-mill. There was a "Little Pine Forge" not far distant, but its locality and history have not been ascertained.

Hay Creek Forge.—William Bird obtained land along Hay Creek, in the eastern extremity of Robeson township, in 1739, the patent therefor having been taken out three years before by Francis Hughes. In the following year he began the iron business in this locality by the erection of a forge on Hay Creek, about half a mile above the Schuylkill.
He then took up additional tracts of land by warrant and survey, and by 1756 he had secured about three thousand acres. This forge was carried on by him till his death in 1762. Subsequently his widow owned it for some years. His son, Mark Bird, carried on business there till he failed in 1788, and was sold out by the sheriff. At that time it is supposed that Mark Bird had about eight thousand acres of land in connection with his iron industries.

In 1764 the iron-works there comprised three forges, corn (grist) mill, saw-mill and about two thousand four hundred acres of land.

The pig-iron was probably obtained at Colebrookdale Furnace, distant about ten miles, for about twenty-five years, till the erection of Hopewell Furnace, five miles distant to the south.

Mr. Bird laid out a town below the forge towards the river, it is believed about 1750, and called it Birdsboro. In 1751 he erected, within the limits of the town-plan, a fine two-story, cut-stone mansion-house. This building is still standing, and is now the Birdsboro House.

At the sheriff's sale in 1788, the forge property was purchased byCadwallader Morris, James Wilson and others, of Philadelphia; and in 1796 John Louis Barde became the owner. Matthew Brooke married a daughter of Barde, and subsequently purchased the property. It has since remained in the Brooke family. Edward Brooke and George Brooke, brothers, began business here in 1837. The iron-works then comprised two forges, with a capacity of two hundred tons of bar-iron per annum. In 1846 they erected a charcoal furnace, called "Hampton;" in 1848 a rolling-mill and nail-factory; in 1851 an anthracite furnace, and some years afterward two additional furnaces. Their total annual capacity is about thirty-eight thousand tons of pig-iron and one hundred and seventy-five thousand kegs of nails. After the death of Edward Brooke in 1788, the Brooke Iron Company was instituted; and this company is now carrying on the business. The iron industry at Birdsboro, which, in the course of one hundred and forty years, has been so admirably developed out of the "Hay Creek Forge" of William Bird, was in 1878 the largest and richest personal enterprise in this section of the State.

Oley Forge.—The Oley Forge was situated on the Manatawny Creek, about ten miles from its confluence with the Schuylkill, and about a half-mile south of the "Oley Churches." It continued in active operation for one hundred and twenty years.

In 1744, John Ross, gentleman, of Philadelphia, and John Yoder and John Lesher, of Oley, entered into a joint partnership for erecting a forge for manufacturing pig-metal into bar-iron. They then purchased from Sebastian Graeff a tract of one hundred and ninety-seven acres of land, situated in Oley township, on the Manatawny Creek, adjoining lands of Robert Stapleton and John Yoder, and the "Great Road" leading to Philadelphia, and thereon erected a forge, constructed a water-pond, water-courses and the necessary buildings, and supplied the utensils for the business of making bar-iron; and they also purchased warrants for taking up land on the hills adjacent to the forge, in order to supply it with charcoal. In 1750 John Yoder sold to John Lesher his one-third interest "of said tract and of the forge, working-gears, tools, implements, dams, etc." Lesher and Ross held their respective interests in the forge till Ross' death. In the settlement of the partnership affairs, litigation arose between Lesher and the Ross estate. This was being conducted in 1784, when Lesher sold his two-thirds to his son, Jacob Lesher, an iron-master, and his sons-in-law, John Potts, a miller, and Jacob Morgan, a merchant. In 1794, Frederick Spang, an iron-master of Oley, obtained an interest in this forge property, and some years afterward secured all the interests. He and, after his decease, his son Jacob, and grandson of the same name, carried on the iron business there for seventy years, until the close of the Rebellion. During this long interval, especially for fifty years, the forge was known as the "Spang Forge." It was abandoned about 1870. Nothing is left to mark the spot excepting the dam. In the transfer by Lesher to his son and sons-in-law in 1784, mention is made of a furnace. It was situated in District township, near the headwaters of Pine Creek, a tributary of Manatawny. The Oley Furnace was then in operation several miles to the northwest. Lesher loaned money on it in 1768, and between that time and 1784 he may have come to own it, but the titles of record do not disclose the fact.

Spring Forges.—A Spring Forge was at one time in existence on the Manatawny, not far from “Pool Forge.” It was owned by Anthony Morris, and in operation in 1729. Pig-metal was supplied from Colebrookdale Furnace. No definite information in relation to it has as yet been developed.

Another Spring Forge was situate on Pine Creek, a branch of the Manatawny, in District (now Pike) township, about four miles north of the “Oley Churches.” Its early history is involved in obscurity. In 1760 Rebecca Potts purchased at sheriff's sale a one-sixth interest in it. She died possessed of this interest, and in 1773 her executor sold it, and a like interest in six tracts of land, together containing eight hundred and thirty-eight acres, to John Old, an iron-master, resident in District township. Old subsequently obtained an increased interest in this industry, and in 1778 sold seventeen twenty-sevenths parts to Mark Bird. During its later history it was owned successively by William Schall, Jacob Deysher and Francis R. Heilig. It was abandoned by Heilig about 1865.

A third Spring Forge was erected by John Schenkel Bertoelet about 1812. It was situated on the Manatawny Creek, in the southern extremity of Earl township, near the line of Amity. He carried it on till his death in 1828. Then his son, Dr. David K. Bertoelette, took the forge property under his last will and continued operations till 1840. Subsequently it passed through various hands, and was finally abandoned about 1860. It is possible that the forge first mentioned of this name was situated here or near by. But it (the first) may have been the second mentioned. And this is probable, for it existed before 1760; it occupied a superior site, ore was not far distant and wood was abundant in the immediate vicinity.

Mount Pleasant Forge.—A forge, it is believed, was connected with the Mount Pleasant Furnace; but there is no definite knowledge concerning its early history. It stood on the West Branch of the Perkiomen, about a mile above the furnace. If it was not erected and carried on by the Potts family, it is probable that it was by either Nicholas Hunter or his son-in-law, John Fisher, about fifty or sixty years afterward. Mr. Fisher, it is certain, carried it on for a number of years, till his decease in 1828, when his estate continued operations for over twenty years,—latterly by a son, J. N. H. Fisher, and son-in-law, Abraham B. Bechtel. On the 25th of March, 1854, it was sold to Samuel W. Weiss, and then operated by him till the close of the Rebellion. The dam was washed away by a freshet several years ago. The Dale Iron-Works were situated a mile above it, on the same stream.

Gibraltar Forge.—Mark Bird, it is supposed, in connection with his other enterprises, began a forge on the Allegheny Creek, about a mile from the Schuylkill, in Robeson township, and named it Gibraltar. The year of its erection is not known,—though it is supposed to be about 1770,—nor its subsequent history for many years; but this supposition is questionable.

It is more than probable that this industry was founded by Thomas Bull, John Smith and Thomas May about the time that they erected the Joanna Furnace, about six miles to the south in the same township. They were interested then in Dale Furnace, and probably prepared the way for selling it by first erecting the Gibraltar Forge, which was to be used in connection with the Joanna Furnace.

In 1827 the estate of Thomas May owned it. In 1828 his two sons, Newton and Addison, by their guardians, sold it and four hundred and forty-four acres of land to Simon Seyfert and John Schwartz, for six thousand five hundred dollars. These two iron-masters then operated it in connection with the Mount Penn Furnace, several miles to the west on Flying Hill Creek. In 1835 they dissolved partnership, Schwartz taking the furnace and Seyfert the forge. Subsequently, the forge property was transferred to Seyfert, McManus & Co.

Charming Forge.—The Charming Forge is situated on the eastern border of Marion township, on the Tulpehocken Creek, several miles north of Womelsdorf. It was erected by John George Nikoll, a hammer-smith, and Michael Miller, in 1749. Then, in pursuance of an agreement entered into shortly before, they, “at their joint expense, erected an Iron work or Forge and Dam, and dug a Race or water-course, and made other great improvements for the commencing of forging and the manufacturing of iron.” After passing through several parties, Henry Wm. Stiegel became the owner in 1763. It was known as the Tulpehocken Forge. Soon afterwards he sold an undivided half-part of the forge property and of eight hundred and fifty-nine acres of land to Charles Stedman and Alexander Stedman, merchants, of Philadelphia. By 1770 the quantity of land used in connection with the forge had increased beyond three thousand seven hundred acres. In that year Charles Stedman bought his brother’s interest in the forge property at sheriff’s sale. In the sheriff’s deed-poll to him, the forge is called, for the first time, in the title, Charming Forge. It had been so known and commonly called for some years previously. Its name arose from the picturesque, charming locality. In 1773 the sheriff of the county sold Stiegel’s undivided half-interest in the forge property (then comprising one thousand two hundred and ninety-one acres) to Paul Zensinger, merchant, of Lancaster, for one thousand six hundred and sixty pounds. Zensinger, on the same day that he obtained the sheriff’s deed-poll for the property (February 9, 1774), conveyed his interest to George Ege, iron-master, of York County, for eight hundred and thirty-eight pounds, fourteen shillings and nine pence. Nine years afterward Ege bought Stedman’s interest in the property for one thousand five hundred and sixty-three pounds, thirteen shillings and six pence. From this time onward, for nearly fifty years, Mr. Ege was very prominently identified with the industrial life of Berks County. From 1791 to 1818 he was an associate judge. In 1804 he built and operated the Schuykill Forge, which was situated on the Little Schuykill (Tamaqua Creek), a short distance north of Port Clinton. At that time he was doubtless the largest land-holder in the county. His possessions then were,—Charming Forge, with four thousand acres; Reading Furnace, with six thousand acres; Schuykill Forge, with six thousand acres; also four large and valuable farms, situated in Heidelberg and Tulpehocken townships, comprising together nearly a thousand acres, and known in the vicinity as the Spring, Sheaff, Leiss and Richard farms. In 1824 he was forced to make an assignment. His debts and expenses exceeded three hundred thousand dollars. But his estate proved entirely solvent. Through the prudent management of his estate, for a period covering fifteen years, by his acting assignee, Andrew Taylor, all the debts were satisfied, and a large balance was left for distribution to his heirs. He died in December, 1830.

This forge property then passed through a number of parties until 1855, when it became vested in Andrew Taylor and his two sons, William and B. Franklin. In 1866 Mr. Taylor died, and his interest passed to the sons named by devise. They have since held and operated the forge. They own in connection with the forge about thirty-six hundred acres of land. Five-sixths of this large quantity lie in the Blue Mountain range. The land extends from “Round Head” eastwardly in an unbroken tract for seven miles.

In 1777 Ege improved the property at the forge by the erection of a large, commodious and conveniently arranged cut-stone two-story mansion-house. It is still standing in fine order. At that time he hired from the government thirty-four Hessian prisoners, for the purpose of cutting a channel from twelve to fifteen feet deep and two hundred and fifty feet long, through a bed of limestone, in order to supply with water-power a “slitting-mill” which he had erected. The channel is still used. November 5, 1782, he allowed the United States government £1020 for their services.

In 1780 he owned ten slaves—seven males and three females—certified of record in the protonotary’s office of the county.

Moselem Forge.—There was a forge, known by the name of “Moselem Forge,” situated on the Moselem Creek, in Richmond township, probably in the vicinity of the Moselem iron-ore mine. In August, 1767, Jacob Shöffer, of Maxatawny, yeoman, for the consideration of five hundred pounds, sold one undivided fourth part of a tract of land, containing one hundred and seventy-five acres, situate on the Moselem Creek, in Richmond township, and also one-fourth part of all forges, mills, etc., thereon erected, to Christian Lower, of Tulpchoken, a blacksmith. And I found the forge referred to in the description of a road laid out in 1768, leading from the “Moselem Forge” to Reading. I could not find any additional facts in connection with this early industry. It is probable that the forge was erected some years before 1767. Iron-ore had been discovered there before 1750, and doubtless this discovery led to the early erection of a forge near by.

OTHER FURNACES AND FORGES.

Furnaces and forges were erected in different parts of the county during or subsequent to the Revolution and before 1800. Among them there were the following: Furnaces—Union, District, Sally Ann, Joanna, Dale, Mary Ann, Reading and Greenwood; Forges—Brobst’s, Rockland, Burkhart’s, Dale and District.

UNION FURNACE.—The Union Furnace is mentioned in connection with the Union or “Brobst’s Forges.”

DISTRICT FURNACE.—The District Furnace was situated on Pine Creek, in District township, about a mile from the line of Pike township. The time of its erection is not known, nor the builder, though it has been asserted that Jacob Lesher erected it previous to 1797. It was owned by John Lesher, father of Jacob, previous to 1784. He may have erected it about the time of the erection of the Oley Forge. This is possible, even probable. The distance between the two industries was about six miles. The pig metal was obtained from some furnace. He was a man of wealth, energy and enterprise; and it is more than likely that he supplied his own pig metal rather than purchase it at the Colebrookdale and Mount Pleasant Furnaces (which were situated across the “Oley Hills,” and distant from eight to ten miles), and haul it over rough and steep roads. In 1791 he conveyed it to his son Jacob, “out of love and affection,” together with a grist-mill, saw-mill and three tracts of land. The “furnace tract” in District comprised fifteen hundred and eighty-two acres one hundred and four perches. The other tracts were in Earl, and contained two hundred and thirteen acres sixty perches. Its subsequent history is not known. On a county map of 1820 it is marked as “Lesher’s Furnace.” It is supposed to have been abandoned about 1797 by Jacob Lesher, because he could not satisfactorily work up to the primitive rock-ore of that vicinity. (By a deed of record dated in 1793 it would appear that John Lesher sold one-third of this furnace to John Teysher, it having been called “German” or District Furnace.)

SALLY ANN FURNACE.—The Sally Ann Furnace was erected, it is supposed, by Valentine Eckert, an iron-master, about 1791. It is situated on the Sacoony Creek, in the northern section of Rockland township. This supposition is, however, doubtful, if not erroneous. Previous to 1811 Abraham Biever, a farmer, owned the tract of ninety-four acres upon which the furnace stands. In the year named he sold this tract to Nicholas Hunter, an iron-master. There was no furnace on then. It is, therefore, probable that Mr. Hunter erected this furnace soon after the purchase of the land. Subsequently he transferred the furnace and lands to his son, Jacob V. R. Hunter, whose estate still holds it. Active operations were discontinued about 1869. It was leased in 1879, but work was carried on for only a year.

JOANNA FURNACE.—The Joanna Furnace was erected in 1792, by Potts & Rutter, and named after a daughter of the former. It is situated on Hay Creek, in Robeson township, near the line of Caernarvon. In 1796 it was purchased by Thomas Bull, John Smith and Thomas May. Subsequently Levi B. Smith, son of John Smith, became the owner, and operated it till his decease in 1876, when it passed to his son, L. Heber Smith, who is the present owner. Nearly six thousand acres of land are connected with the furnace, lying together in a great, irregular tract, and situated in Robeson, Caernarvon and Brecknock townships. The furnace was rebuilt in 1847. It is run by water and steam-power.
DALE FURNACE.—The Dale Furnace was situated on the West Branch of the Perkiomen Creek, two miles above the Mt. Pleasant Furnace. It was erected about 1791 by Thomas Potts, Joseph Potts, Jr., and John Smith, ironmasters. In the year named they purchased from Lewis Walker a tract of one hundred and fifty acres in Hereford township (but since 1839 in Washington), and doubtless immediately proceeded to erect thereon a furnace. In 1793 it was certainly in existence, for then Joseph Potts, Jr., sold his one-third interest to Robert E. Hobart. In 1811 it was owned by Thomas Bull, Robert May, John Smith and John Thompson, iron-masters. About that time, probably soon afterward, a forge was erected near by. Then this enterprise took the name of “Dale Iron-Works.” In 1819 these works were in active operation. The furnace was abandoned about 1821. In 1822 they were owned by Dr. Jacob Loesser. In 1826 they were purchased by George Schall and David Schall for eleven thousand nine hundred dollars, comprising a forge, a large dam covering fourteen acres, a fine commodious stone mansion and tenant-houses and other buildings and over six hundred acres of land. Subsequently David Schall became the sole owner of the works and operated them till the year 1868, when he abandoned the manufacturing business.

MARY ANN FURNACE.—The Mary Ann Furnace was situated in Longswamp township, on the head-waters of the Little Lehigh. It was erected before 1797, possibly about 1789, by Jacob Lesher, and carried on by him actively till 1808. He then sold it to his son-in-law, Reuben Trexler. It was operated by Mr. Trexler till 1837, when he transferred it to his son Horatio, who carried on work till a suspension of business there was forced in 1869 by the scarcity of wood, high price of labor and the increased demand and cost of the Longswamp ore, superinduced by the introduction of the East Penn Railroad, through the East Penn Valley, from Reading to Allentown. The railway, instead of benefiting the “Mary Ann,” as it had been argued and hoped that the result would be, actually robbed her of glorious and profitable activity, and transferred the life of industry into the Lehigh Valley.

The first “stone coal” stoves manufactured in Pennsylvania were made at this furnace by Reuben Trexler. They were called the “Lehigh Coal Stoves.” The plates of these stoves were first made in the open sand about 1820; subsequently flasks were introduced. They were made here till 1857, but the development of foundries for this purpose caused the discontinuance of this branch of industry.

READING FURNACE.—Upon the abandonment of the “Berkshire” Furnace by George Ege, he, in the same year, 1794, erected a furnace several miles to the west, on Spring Creek, in Heidelberg township, and carried it on successfully till his assignment for the benefit of creditors, in 1824. In 1807 he improved the property by the erection of a mansion-house (similar to the one occupied by him at Charm-ing Forge) for the manager of the furnace, Andrew Taylor. It subsequently became vested in Robeson & Brooke, who abandoned it about 1850. They improved the property by the erection of an anthracite furnace in 1845, and another in 1858. It was then purchased by White, Ferguson & Co.

GREENWOOD FURNACE.—In 1796 Lewis Reese and Isaac Thomas erected a furnace near Schuylkill Gap, on the north side of Sharp Mountain, and carried on the manufacture of iron till 1806. They then sold it to John Pott, of District township, in Berks County. In 1807 Pott tore it down and erected in its stead another furnace which he named “Greenwood.”

Near the mouth of the Little Schuylkill, a short distance above Port Clinton, George Ege, it is said, erected the “Schuylkill Furnace” about 1804.

These two furnaces are also mentioned in this narrative because they were included in the territory of Berks County, beyond Blue Mountain, till 1811, when Schuylkill County was erected.

BROBST’S FORGES.—In Albany township, in the northern section of Berks County, on a branch of Maiden Creek, called Pine Creek, there were two forges and a furnace. It is not definitely known when or by whom they were erected. In 1780, Arnold Billig sold to Michael Brobst two tracts of land in this township, one of one hundred and fifteen acres and the other of fifteen acres, with the buildings, improvements, etc., for the sum of eleven thousand pounds. No iron-works are mentioned, as they generally are in deeds conveying property including such important improvements. But why should Brobst pay such a large consideration for one hundred and thirty acres of land if there had not been erected thereon valuable improvements, such as iron-works? Accordingly, it may be inferred that there were iron-works in this township then. Billig, however, is not described as an iron-master, nor Brobst. But Brobst was subsequently engaged in the manufacture of iron in this locality with his brother, John Brobst; and in 1818 they were sold out by the sheriff, the properties sold comprising one furnace, two forges and three thousand six hundred and forty-six acres of land. These iron-works were subsequently know by the name of "Union," and operated for a number of years by George Reagan.

Rockland Forges.—The Rockland Forges were situated in the southern section of Rockland township, on Beaver Creek, a tributary of Manatawny. One of the forges was erected by John Truckenmiller, an iron-master of Richmond township, in the year 1783; and shortly afterward he erected a second forge about one-fourth of a mile farther up the creek. In 1788 he was sold out by the sheriff of the county, and Richard Lewis, an iron-master of Robeson township, bought the forges. Ten years afterward, in 1798, he sold them to Daniel Udree, who operated them continuously till his decease in 1828.

They, in connection with a very large estate, then passed to his son-in-law, J. Udree Scheider, and were operated by him also till his death in 1834. Subsequently the Udree estate became involved by its management, and in 1841 these forges were again put under the hammer by the sheriff and sold. After passing through several hands they were finally abandoned about 1850. A third forge stood on the same creek a short distance above these forges. It was erected about 1830 by Daniel Oyster, and operated ten years. Its site was just above the "Rohrbach Mill."

Burkhart's Forge.—The Burkhart's Forge was situated in Alsace township, on Antietam Creek, about one hundred and fifty yards north of the "Stony Creek Mill." It was erected by Philip Seidel, an iron-master, resident in this township about 1792. He, in 1791, had purchased tract No. 82 of "Penn's Manor," containing fifteen acres one hundred and eighteen perches. By the record it would appear that he erected forges on this tract. On the 12th of March, 1796, he sold these forges to Samuel Burkhart, of Bern township. Burkhart operated them—at least one of them—subsequently for a number of years. In 1830 one forge was operated by Burkhart & Keen. It was known as the "Green Tree," having taken its name from the evergreen trees on the steep hillsides in the vicinity. It was abandoned about 1850.

Dale Forge.—The Dale Forge is mentioned in connection with the furnace of same name constituting "Dale Iron-Works."

District Forges.—The District Forges comprised two forges situated on Pine Creek, in District township. The first of these forges was erected about 1793, by Jacob Lesher. About fifteen years afterward he conveyed it to his son-in-law, Reuben Trexler, who carried it on till about 1830, when he demolished it, and erected in its stead a large stone grist-mill. Another was built by Jacob Lesher, a half-mile farther up the stream, about the year 1812. He built it for his son-in-law, Samuel Sands. It was discontinued several years afterward. A third was built (it is supposed) by Jacob Else about the same time, lower down the stream, in what is now Pike township. Subsequently it was operated by William Schall, Jacob Deysher and Francis Heilig. This supposition must be erroneous. This forge was known in the vicinity as the "Pott Forge," formerly the "Spring Forge," hereinbefore mentioned. A fourth forge was erected by Reuben Trexler, in 1828, a half-mile distant to the north. He carried it on till 1846, when he sold it to his son, Horatio Trexler. This also subsequently became vested in Francis Heilig. He operated both for some years, till about 1865, when he gradually discontinued active operation, and finally abandoned them. They were latterly known as "Heilig's Forges."

Speedwell Forge.—The Speedwell Forge was erected, it is supposed, by Philip Seidel, about 1800. In 1815 it was purchased by Nicholas Yocum, who operated it for some years. It was situated in Cumru township on Angelica Creek, about five miles south of Reading. Speedwell, No. 2, was built by Mr. Yocum in 1835. Moses and Daniel Yocum, his sons, then operated them separately till about 1870, when they were abandoned.

Recent Industries.—Among the more recent furnaces and forges in the county, there were the following, the date after the name indicating the year of erection:

Iron-Masters.—The iron-masters of the county comprise many men distinguished for their energy, enterprise, success and wealth. They extend through the history of the county from its earliest settlements till now. A great proportion of the material prosperity and enrichment of the county has been contributed by them. They have, to a great degree, influenced its social, political and industrial welfare. In the settlement and development of its several sections, south, east, west and north, they have been pioneers. Though their great and influential industry does not antedate agriculture in the affairs of the county, it has, nevertheless, been a traveling companion; and, like agriculture, it has been transmitted from grandfather to son and grandson. Their names reveal the fact that the great majority of them have been Germans or of German origin.

In the year 1806 Berks County was distinguished for its numerous manufacturing establishments, its trade and enterprise. The following iron industries were then in operation:

Other industries of the county:

- Powder-mills: 4
- Grist-mills: 14
- Fulling-mills: 2
- Oil-mills: 10
- Paper-mills: 235
- Hat factories (Readings): 40
- Distilleries: 212

(These were reported by assessors and published in the Reading Adler April 22, 1806.)

The county at that time was evidently a great industrial centre. In the manufacture of iron alone it contained thirty-eight establishments. In 1830 there were eleven furnaces and twenty-four forges; in 1850, thirteen furnaces and twenty-three forges; and in 1876, twenty-seven furnaces, but only four forges. The great decrease of forges is accounted for by the introduction of rolling-mills, of which there were ten in the year last named. Water-power was apparently supplanted by the introduction of steam-power; and instead of being located in many places throughout the county, as theretofore through a period of one hundred years, they were concentrated in several places.

The only industries of those named which were begun before 1800, now still in operation, are the following: Furnaces—Oley, Hopewell, and Joanna; Forges—Charming and Gibraltar.

Production, 1828–30.—The following two tables were arranged by Daniel M. Keim, to show the furnaces and forges in operation in Berks County for the years 1828, 1829 and 1830, number of hands employed, the amount of production, etc., and published in the Berks and Schuykill Journal, from which they were copied:

INDUSTRIES IN 1840.—In 1840 there were in the county eleven furnaces and thirty-six bloomeries, forges and rolling-mills; total number of iron industries, forty-seven. The production, investment, men employed, etc., were as follows:

- Tons of cast-iron: 9,165
- " bar-iron: 6,569
- " fuel consumed: 45,765
- Men employed: 1,245
- Capital invested: $367,444
- Value of mine product: $54,800
- Capital in mines: $32,100
- Other industries in county then:
  - Flour-mills: 27
  - Grist-mills: 114
  - Oil-mills: 15
  - Stores: 119
  - Saw-mills: 108
  - Paper-factories: 5
  - Potteries: 3
  - Powder-mills: 3
  - Pounds of powder: 549,000
  - Distilleries: 29
    - " product (gals.): 54,644
  - Breweries: 6
    - " product (gals.): 61,600

In 1851 there were forty-one iron-works in the county, a larger number than in any other county of Pennsylvania; and there was no county in the United States which contained more. Lancaster County had thirty; Chester County, twenty-five. The whole number in the State was five hundred and four. The capital invested in iron-works in the county then was $1,231,000.
Comparative Statement, 1850-1876.—

MEMORIAL FOR NATIONAL FOUNDRY.—
In February, 1845, 1 a “memorial” was prepared by a committee of citizens of Reading, appointed at a town-meeting, setting forth reasons why Reading should be selected as a site for one of the national foundries, and it was presented to Congress. The committee referred to the security of Reading in time of war, its central position with regard to points of defense and supply of ordnance, its facilities of transportation, its supply of iron, coal and other materials and its low wages of labor. John Banks, Isaac Hiester and Isaac Eckert were on this committee—the others not being mentioned. 2 A statement of the furnaces and forges in the county was added, including those along the Schuylkill Canal, in Schuylkill County, and also those along the Union Canal, in Lebanon County. They afforded employment to about eleven hundred hands.

The following statement 3 comprises only the furnaces and forges in Berks County in 1845:

Iron and nail-works, Reading, Whittaker, Seyfert & McManus, Total—16 furnaces and 21 forges (including nail-works).

Summary of Present Furnaces, Forges and Mills.—Statement of iron furnaces, forges and mills in county, including size, capacity, etc., as published in "Directory of 1 There had been a movement in this behalf seven years previously, the completion of the Reading Railroad having suggested the feasibility of procuring at Reading the establishment of a National Foundry, the building of which was then being agitated in Congress. A large meeting of the citizens of Reading was held in March, 1838, with this object in view, at which meeting General George M. Kem was appointed the chairman of the committee to present a memorial to Congress, and Henry A. Muhlenberg and John Ritter accompanied him to Washington to urge the claims of Reading.

2 Reading Gazette, February 1, 1845. The entire memorial appears in this issue. Fifteen members were on the committee. The committee who carried the memorial to Washington were Wm. Darling, Wm. Strong and J. Pringle Jones.

Iron and Steel-Works in United States," by American Iron and Steel Association, 1884:

ANTHRACITE FURNACES.

Bechtelsville Furnace, at Bechtelsville; now known as Norway Furnace. One stack, 58′ x 14, built in 1875; open top; one iron hot-blast stove; ore, Berks County magnetic; product, foundry and mill pig-iron; annual capacity, 16,000 net tons. Brand, "Norway."

East Penn Furnaces, at Lyons Station, owned by Philadelphia and Reading Coal and Iron Company. Two stacks, each 48′ x 12′; built by East Penn Iron Company in 1874–75; injured by fire in 1881; closed tops; annual capacity, 17,000 tons.

Henry Clay Furnaces, at Reading, owned by Eckert & Brother. Two stacks, each 57′ x 18′; one built in 1842, and blown in in August, 1844; the other built in 1855, and blown in in September, 1856; four iron hot-blast stoves; closed tops; fuel, anthracite coal and coke; ores, hematite and magnetic from Berks and Lebanon Counties; product, No. 2 foundry and gray forge pig-iron; total annual capacity, 22,000 net tons. Brand, "Henry Clay."

Keystone Furnaces, at Birdsboro', owned by E. & G. Brooke Iron Company. Three stacks; one, 50′ x 12′, built in 1853; one, 55′ x 15′, built in 1871; one, 60′ x 16′, built in 1873; closed tops; fuel, anthracite coal and coke; ores, principally magnetic, with a mixture of hematite; product, forge pig-iron; annual capacity, 50,000 net tons. Brand, "Keystone."

Keystone Furnaces, at Reading, owned by Keystone Furnace Company. Two stacks; one, 50′ x 15′, built in 1869; the other, 50′ x 14′, built in 1872–73; blown in during June, 1873; closed tops; total annual capacity, 20,500 net tons.

Leesport Furnace, at Leesport, owned by Leesport Iron Company. One stack, 55′ x 15′, built in 1852; first blown in in 1853, and rebuilt in 1871; closed top; fuel five-sixths anthracite coal and one-sixth coke; ores, three-quarters hematite from Moselem, Berks County, and one-quarter magnetic from Cornwall, Lebanon County; specialty, foundry pig-iron; annual capacity, 14,000 net tons. Brand, "Leesport."

Kutztown Furnace, at Kutztown; owned by Philadelphia and Reading Coal and Iron Company. One stack, 55′ x 15′, built in 1875, by Kutztown Iron Company; closed top; annual capacity, 8,800 net tons.

Monocacy Furnaces, at Monocacy; owned by Monocacy Furnace Company. One stack, 50′ x 13′, built at Hopewell in 1852; removed to Monocacy in 1854; specialty, foundry pig-iron; annual capacity, 10,000 net tons. Brand, "Monocacy." Formerly called Theresa Furnace.

Moselem Furnace, at Moselem, owned by Leibrandt & McDowell. One stack, 49′ x 12′, built in 1823 for charcoal, and rebuilt several times; two Ford hot-blast stoves; closed top; fuel, anthracite coal; ores, three-quarters Moselem hematite and one-quarter Cornwall magnetic; specialty, foundry pig-iron; annual capacity, 8,000 net tons. Brand, "Moselem."

Mt. Laurel Furnace, one mile east of Temple; owned by Clymer Iron Company. One stack, 50′ x 11′, built in 1896, rebuilt in 1847; changed to anthracite in 1873, but not blown in afterwards until February 1, 1880; closed top; annual capacity, 5,000 net tons; two hot-blast stoves; ore principally hematite; product, foundry pig-iron.

Reading Iron-Works Furnace, at Reading; owned by "Reading Iron-Works." Two stacks, 55′ x 15′ and 55′ x 16′, built in 1854 and 1873, respectively; closed tops; ore, principally hematite from Lehigh and Lebanon Counties; product, foundry and mill pig-iron; total annual capacity, 20,000 net tons.

Robesonia Furnace, at Robesonia; owned by Ferguson, White & Co. One stack, 80′ x 18′, built in 1858, and rebuilt in 1874, and again in 1884; three Whitwell hot-blast stoves; closed top; fuel, anthracite coal and coke; Cornwall ore is exclusively used; product, red-short pig-iron for Bessemer steel and bar-iron; annual capacity, 25,000 net tons. Brand, "Robesonia." A furnace, built here in 1845, was abandoned in 1880.

Topton Furnace, at Topton; owned by Topton Furnace Company. One stack, 55′ x 16′; built in 1873, by Topton Iron Company.

Temple Furnace, at Temple; owned by Temple Iron Company. One stack, 55′ x 14′, built in 1867, and rebuilt in 1875; two iron hot-blast stoves; closed top; ores, from Lehigh, Berks and Lebanon Counties, and from New Jersey; specialty, foundry pig-iron; annual capacity, 12,000 net tons.

CHARCOAL FURNACES.

Hampton Furnace, at Birdsboro', owned by E. and G. Brooke Iron Company. One stack, 30′ x 8′, built in 1846, and rebuilt in 1872; closed top; cold blast; ore, principally hematite, obtained in the vicinity of the furnace; product, car-wheel iron; capacity, 1,500 net tons.

Hopewell Furnace, in Union township, south of Monocacy, owned by Edward S. Buckley. One stack, 30′ x 7′, built in 1765, and rebuilt in 1800; cold blast; water and steam-power; ores, hematite and magnetic, obtained in the neighborhood; product, car-wheel pig-iron; annual capacity, 1,200 net tons.

Joanna Furnace, at Joanna, owned by L. Heber Smith. One stack, 30′ x 8′, built in 1792 by Potts & Rutter, and rebuilt in 1847; cold blast; water and steam-power; open top; ores, local magnetic and hematite; specialty, car-wheel pig-iron; annual capacity, 1,200 net tons. Brand, "Joanna."

Mary Ann Furnace, in Longswamp, owned by Horatio Trexler. Built in 1798. Out of blast since 1869.

Maiden-creek Furnace, at Lehartsville, owned by Jacob K. Spang. One stack, 33′ x 9′, built in 1854; cold and warm blast; water and steam-power; open top; annual capacity, 1600 net tons.

Mount Penn Furnace, in Cumra township, owned by W. M. Kaufman & Co. Built in 1836. One stack, 30 x 84. Abandoned in 1883.

Oley Furnace, in Oley township, near Friedensburg, owned by Clymer Iron Company. One stack, 30 x 8, built in 1772; open top; cold blast; steam and water-power; ores, three-quarters hematite and one-quarter pyrite; specialty, No. 1 dead gray iron; annual capacity, 2000 net tons.

Sally Ann Furnace, latterly called Rockland, in Rockland township, owned by Hunter estate. Built in 1791, rebuilt in 1879, and burned in 1881.

Mills.

Birdsboro' Nail-Works, at Birdsboro', owned by E. & G. Brooke Iron Company. Built in 1848; 2 single and 11 double puddling furnaces, 2 scrap and 4 heating furnaces, 118 nail-machines, and 5 trains of rolls; steam and water-power; product, nails; annual capacity, 250,000 kegs. Brand, "Anchor."

Blandon Iron-Works, at Blandon, owned by Maiden-creek Iron Company. Built in 1867; 11 single puddling furnaces, 2 heating furnaces and 3 trains of rolls; product, round, square, flat, hoop, band and skelp-iron; annual capacity, 8000 net tons.

Gibraltar Iron-Works, at Gibraltar, in Robeson township, owned by S. Seyfert & Co. Built in 1846, and completely rebuilt in 1883-84, and new machinery erected; 2 heating furnaces and one 18-inch train of rolls; product, boiler-plate and boiler-tube and pipe-iron; annual capacity, 3000 net tons.

Keystone Iron-Works, at Reading, owned by J. H. Craig and Jacob Snell. Built in 1854; 1 double and 5 single puddling furnaces, 2 heating furnaces and one 18-inch train of rolls; product, boiler-plate, skelp, tank, chuk, stack, pipe, boat and car-iron and muck-bars; annual capacity, 3600 net tons.

Mcfteain & Sons' Boiler-Plate Mill, at Reading owned by Wm. McIlvain & Sons. First put in operation in 1857; 2 double and 4 single puddling furnaces, 3 heating furnaces, 2 trains of rolls (breakdown rolls, 52 by 25 inches, and finishing rolls, 51 by 25 inches) and one 3-ton hammer; product, every variety of plate-iron; annual capacity, 6000 net tons. Brand, "McIlvain."

Philadelphia and Reading Rolling-Mill, at Reading, owned by Philadelphia and Reading Coal and Iron Company, built in 1868; 12 single puddling furnaces, 10 heating furnaces and 3 trains of rolls (one 12, one 23 and one 24-inch); product, rails, splice-bars, and muck-bars; annual capacity, 50,000 net tons. Specialty, reheated iron rails. Bessemer steel rails are rolled from purchased blooms. Brand, "P. & R."

Reading Bolt and Nut Works, at Reading, owned by J. H. Sternbergh. Established in 1865; enlarged in 1872 and 1881; 4 heating furnaces, 3 trains of rolls (one 9, one 10 and one 12-inch,) and 1 hammer; product, refined merchant bar, band and skelp-iron; also, bolts, nuts, washers, rivets, etc.; annual capacity, about 8000 net tons.

Reading Iron-Works, at Reading, owned by "Reading Iron-Works." Flue-iron mill built in 1886; 12 single puddling furnaces, 4 heating furnaces, 1 rotary squeezer, 3 trains of rolls, 28 nail-machines and 1 spike-machine; product, cut nails, bar, hammer, hoop and skelp-iron; annual capacity, 7000 net tons. Plate mill built in 1883; 8 double puddling furnaces, 4 heating furnaces, 1 hammer and 4 trains of rolls; product, sheet, plate and bar-iron; annual capacity, 10,000 net tons.

Seyfert Rolling-Mills, at Seyfert Station, W. & N. R., in Robeson township, owned by Samuel R. Seyfert. Built in 1880-81, and started in March, 1881; 4 double puddling furnaces, 4 forge fires, 3 heating furnaces, one 4-ton hammer and 2 trains of rolls; product, boiler-plate, boiler-tube and pipe-iron, blooms, and puddled bar; annual capacity, 5000 net tons.

Bloomeries (Forge)

Charming Forge, in Marion, near Womelsdorf, owned by W. & B. F. Taylor. Built in 1749; 5 forge fires, 1 heating furnace, 1 refinery and 1 hammer; water-power; product, charcoal and coke blooms for boiler-plate and sheet-iron, made from pig-iron; annual capacity, 1000 net tons.

Gibraltar Iron-Works, at Gibraltar, in Robeson, owned by S. Seyfert & Co. Built in 1846; 1 coke run-out, 4 charcoal forge fires and 2 hammers; water-power; product, charcoal blooms for flue-iron and boiler-plate; annual capacity, 500 net tons.

Mount Airy Forge, on North Kill, in Tulpehocken Upper, near Shartlesville, owned by Robert C. Green. Built about 1840; 2 forge fires, one 4-tuyere run-out and 1 hammer; water-power; product, run-out anthracite, charcoal and scrap blooms and billets for boiler-plate, sheets and wire; annual capacity, 450 net tons.

Moyer's Forge, on Antietam Creek, in Exeter, south of Jacksonwald, owned by Morgan J. Althouse. Built in 1825; 3 fires and 1 hammer; water-power; product, charcoal blooms for steel, made from pig-iron and steel scrap. Abandoned in 1883, and converted into a chipping-mill.

North Kill Forge, near Shartlesville, on North Kill, owned by M. B. Seyfert & Co. Built in 1830, and repaired and started in 1879 after a long idleness. Product, run-out anthracite blooms.

Schuylkill Steam Forge, at Douglassville, owned by B. F. Morret. Completed in 1878; 8 fires, 1 double run-out and 1 hammer; product, charcoal blooms for boiler plate and sheet iron, made from charcoal pig-iron and scrap-iron.

GENERAL INDUSTRIES.—The industries previously mentioned were prominent in their several sections on account of the capital invested and the men employed to carry them on successfully. But besides these there were many other industries in the several townships. Blacksmith-shops and wheelwright-shops were located and conducted in every community. They were necessary for the accommodation of the settlers. They were not large. Only a few individuals worked together—mostly a master-workman and his apprentice. Grist-mills for flour and feed were situated along all the large streams. The mill of George Boone, Esq., on the Monocacy, is the earliest one of which I found any notice—it having been referred to in 1727; and the Price Mill, at the mouth of the Wyomissing, was one of the earliest, having been erected about 1735. The Welsh were mechanics who conducted their trades in small factories along the Wyomissing. Rope-makers were common in every section. Ropes and cords were largely used in the daily affairs of life. This industry was conducted for many years by individuals at their homes; but improved machinery and steam caused its decline, and small ropewalks were compelled to discontinue. Carpenters and builders were numerous. They were finished workmen, preparing every article out of wood by hand. Some of the old buildings, still in a good state of preservation, attest the excellence of their workmanship. Doors and windows and frames of all kinds used in building operations were hand-made. This custom amongst them continued till the introduction of the planing-mill about 1833, and then it began to decline. The country saw-mill, run by water-power, was active then in preparing lumber; but great steam mills in the lumber regions have caused them to become less and less active. Great rafts of logs are no longer towed down the canals to Reading, especially the Union Canal from the Susquehanna River, to afford employment to our saw-mills. The railroads instead deliver finished lumber.

Every community had a weaver, who conducted his business at his home. He wove carpets and coverlets (plain and fancy) and linen and cotton stuffs for domestic use. He did not carry a large stock on hand; he manufactured articles to order. And so with other trades.

Fulling-mills, paper-mills, oil-mills and distilling-mills were conducted for cloths, paper, oil and whiskey, but they were limited in capacity.

CHAPTER VIII.

FRENCH AND INDIAN WAR.

Military Periods.—Cause of War—Officers, Supplies, etc.—

Indians—Numerous Letters on Sufferings of Early Inhabitants—Peace Declared—Persons Murdered, Taken Prisoners and Missing.

MILITARY PERIODS. — Like every other country, ours has also its military periods. They are very interesting to us, and the interest is not of an ordinary kind. Its nature is more or less thrilling. Nothing in the progress of our country is more so. Our growth in population and wealth, its fluctuations from different causes, losses by storm and fire, and death by famine and pestilence, awaken in us great interest. As we advance step by step in our researches, from interest we grow into eagerness, and from sympathy we are carried into a sort of terror at the wonderful power of an apparently inexplicable and uncontrollable law. But when we get beyond the agency of natural forces, study the actions of man against man, tribe against tribe or nation against nation, incited by interest or hate in the onward movements of our social organization, and see that at times they result in war, bloodshed and death, our interest becomes intense and thrilling sensations move us into inexpressible pity or revenge.

The citizens of Berks County participated in the following five wars, in which our country was engaged during its eventful history, from the beginning till now: French and Indian War, 1755 to 1762; Revolution, 1775 to 1783; English War, 1812 to 1815; Mexican War, 1846 to 1848; War of the Rebellion, 1861 to 1865.

At present we have a strong feeling of security in the enjoyment of life and property. This is a great blessing. It is both inspiring and ennobling. It conduces to the persistent direction of labor in the various channels of industry, and to the development of our general life as a free people. This feeling did not exist one hundred and thirty years ago. Then, for some years, our people were in constant alarm and great dread of loss and death. Our county organization had just been established after repeated efforts in the Colonial Assembly running through a number of years. Before this the prospects for rapid improvement were bright and promising. But these prospects were darkened by a cruel foe. The inhabitants had confidence in themselves, but they needed protection. The colonial government was weak. It could not extend its power effectively over the entire State. They were, therefore, discouraged. Driven by dread, and suffering from loss, they were obliged to petition the Governor for protection. In pursuance of their petitions, forts were erected along the Blue Mountain, and small detachments of soldiers were stationed in them to guard the neighboring settlers from the atrocious cruelties of the Indians. Formerly the Indians and settlers were on the most friendly terms. They associated and dealt with each other in the most satisfactory manner. The change from friendship and peace to hate, revenge and war was most surprising. It was produced by the wicked misrepresentations of the French, and terminated in what is known in our history as the "French and Indian War."

CAUSE OF WAR.—Whilst the Penns were endeavoring to locate a town on the eastern bank of the Schuylkill at the "Ford," war was being carried on between England and France, and the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle was formed between them in the same year in which the town was laid out. But this treaty of peace did not settle the controversy between them in respect to territory on the American continent. The English colonies were originally planted along the sea-coast. But they advanced westwardly. The English, therefore, claimed the right to extend their settlements across the continent, from ocean to ocean. The French, however, had possessed Canada to the north and Louisiana to the south. They, too, claimed the intervening territory which lay along the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers. Both parties claimed the same country, and, in order to maintain their respective rights, they "rushed into a fierce and bloody war for lands which belonged to neither, and which, in twenty years after the termination of hostilities, passed away from both and became vested in a new power whose national existence, by a mysterious Providence, in a great measure, grew out of their contentions."

It was accelerated by a large grant of six hundred thousand acres of land in that disputed territory by the English to certain persons who associated under the title of the "Ohio Company." This great company agitated a scheme for the settlement of the land granted to them, which alarmed the French. Remonstrances and complaints having proved fruitless, each party seized and plundered the subjects of the other; and hostilities ensued which resulted in the defeat of Braddock in the western section of the province in 1755.

The Indians, having united with the French through misrepresentation, and finding the frontier open, proceeded eastwardly to recover and repossess the territory which had formerly been theirs, and out of which they believed they had been swindled. On their way they committed

1 Ramsay's "History of United States," 276.
2 The declaration of war was published at Easton by the Governor, on the 30th of July, 1756, and at Philadelphia in August following. It was issued by King George on the 17th of May, 1755. See 2 Penn. Arch., 735.
3 In a message to the Executive Council on the 3d of November, 1755, Governor Morris said, "This invasion was what we had the greatest reason to believe would be the consequence of General Braddock's defeat and the retreat of the regular troops, and had my hands been properly strengthened, I should have put this province into such a posture of defence as might have prevented the mischiefs that have since happened."

It seems clear, from the different accounts I have received, that the French have gained to their interest the depredations and cruelties which resulted in a great loss of life and property. Notwithstanding forts were erected by the provincial government along the Kittatinny Mountain, from the Delaware to the Susquehanna, to afford protection to the settlers in the vicinity, and were garrisoned with twenty-five companies, comprising one thousand four hundred men, they even crossed the mountain and carried their wickedness, arson and murder into the counties adjoining. Berks County was entered. Numerous persons, including men, women and children, were killed, and many dwellings and barns were burned. This naturally spread consternation throughout the county. The settlers along the mountain fled and abandoned home and property. The enemy extended their incursions to a point near Reading. The inhabitants of the town became alarmed for their safety. They armed and organized themselves to defend the town, and even marched to the mountain to assist in driving the cruel foe out of the county. Many letters have been published which describe the wretched state of the people who lived in the townships to the north and west of the town.

The cruelties of the Indians and the unsettled condition of the inhabitants of the upper section of the county continued during the years 1755, 1756 and 1757. During these years the English were unsuccessful in their campaigns against the French and Indians. Their affairs here were in an alarming situation. Their efforts had produced only expense and disappointment. But in 1758 the tide turned in their favor through the vigorous administration of a new leader, William Pitt. The Indians retreated and victory crowned the British armies everywhere during the succeeding years till 1760, when the French were dispossessed of all the territories in dispute and forced to surrender Canada. Peace was declared in 1763.

The town of Reading had just been fairly started when this terrible shock fell upon the inhabitants. Though discouraged, they did not abandon their new settlement and its bright prospects, as the settlers were forced to do along the mountain. They remained, they persevered, they succeeded. It is probable that the unsettled condition of affairs during that period in the townships bordering on the mountain, which arose from the incursions and cruelties of the Indians, contributed much towards the rapid growth of the town.

the publisher of a German newspaper, at Germantown, induced the German settlers to co-operate with them. They persuaded them to believe that the Provincial Council intended to enslave them, enforce their young men to become soldiers and to load them down with taxes. These representations induced the Germans to travel to Philadelphia from all parts in order to vote, and they carried all the elections. Almost to a man, the Germans refused to bear arms in the French and Indian War.

Officers, Supplies, etc., in County.—The provincial military officers of Berks County in 1754 were: Lieutenant-Colonel, Conrad Weiser; Captains, Christian Bussé (at Fort Henry), Frederick Smith, Jacob Orndt, Jacob Morgan (at Fort Lebanon); Lieutenant, Philip Weiser; Ensigns, — Harry (at Fort Lebanon), Edward Biddle; Sergeant, Peter Smith; Corporal, — Schaeffer.

Weiser was lieutenant-colonel of the Second Battalion of the Pennsylvania Regiment, which consisted of nine companies. This was a portion of the troops which were ordered by the Governor and provincial commissioners to be raised for the purpose of repelling the invasion by the Indians, the total force to comprise twenty-five companies, numbering fourteen hundred men. Of the nine companies under Weiser, one and one-half companies were at Fort Henry, and one company was at Fort Williams.

In March, 1756, an independent company of grenadiers, in General Shirley's regiment, was stationed at Reading on duty. Upon receiving orders to march to New York, twenty-five men, under the command of a lieutenant, were ordered to Reading to remain on guard till further orders.

In June, 1756, the town was occupied by a company of men, under the command of Conrad Weiser. It was composed of two sergeants and twenty-eight privates. Shortly before, an independent company of grenadiers, from General Shirley's regiment, had been stationed here on duty. The ammunition at Reading then consisted of twenty-five good muskets, twenty-five muskets out of repair, eleven broken muskets, nine cartridge-boxes, two hundred and forty pounds of powder, six hundred pounds of lead. In August, 1757, "fifty men, from Cumru and other townships near Reading, set out in expectation of bringing in some Indian scalps."

In February, 1758, Fort Williams was garrisoned by Captain Morgan and fifty-three men; and Fort Henry was garrisoned by Captain Bussé with eighty-nine men, and Captain Weiser with one hundred and five men; and Fort Augusta with eight companies, numbering three hundred and sixty-two men.

The whole number of men receiving pay then in the province was one thousand two hundred and seventy-four.

In June, 1758, Berks County had in the service fifty-six good and strong wagons. Each wagon was completely furnished with four able horses and an expert driver. These wagons were formed into two divisions,—the first division containing twenty-six wagons, and the second thirty wagons. A deputy wagon-master, appointed by Colonel Weiser, was over each division. Their names were John Lesher and Jacob Weaver, who were reported to be freeholders and able to speak the English and German languages and to understand smith and wheelwright work.

In 1761 the inhabitants of Tulpehocken and Heidelberg townships raised one hundred and fifty men as rangers to guard the county lines of Berks and Lancaster Counties.

The following is from a return of troops, commanded by Major Asher Clayton, stationed on frontiers of Lancaster, Berks and Northampton Counties, dated June 1, 1764:

In Berks County.

At Fort Henry, Bethel township, Captain John Philip De Haas; one sergeant, eighteen men.

(Cornard) Rehrer's, Bethel township, Lieutenant Christopher Seeley; fourteen men.

Christopher Young's, Tulpehocking township, Ensign William Wild [Wiles]; one sergeant, thirteen men.

Kauffman's Mill, Bern township, Captain Jacob Kern; one sergeant, fourteen men.

Hagabaugh's, Albany township, Lieutenant John Sitzhoup; fifteen men.

John Overwinter's, Albany township, Ensign George Nagle; twelve men.

— —, Bern township; one sergeant, ten men.
Colonial Forts.—When the officials of the provincial government learned that the Indians and French had united for the purpose of cooperating against the English on this continent, they decided to afford protection to the settlements near the frontiers by the erection of forts; and the number of settlers who had gone beyond the Blue Mountains till this time having been small, they determined to locate these forts along this natural boundary line from the Delaware on the east to the Susquehanna on the west.\(^1\) The object of these forts was simply for refuge, as places to which the inhabitants could retreat when danger was imminent. They were erected hastily to serve a temporary purpose. Unfortunately for the people, they were too few in number and too far apart to serve the purpose for which they were intended, especially to those who were somewhat removed. The Indians did not march over the mountains in large numbers together, and they did not attack the forts. They came quietly and in small parties. Without any warning they fell upon the unprotected families like a thunderbolt, and after murdering men, women and children indiscriminately and setting fire to dwellings and barns, they departed like a flash. And their success in these wicked incursions was truly wonderful.

The following forts were erected in the territory which was embraced in Berks County, the first four having been along the Blue Mountain, and the last at Shamokin (now Sunbury): Fort Henry, Fort Dietrich Snyder, Fort Northkill, Fort Lebanon, Fort Franklin and Fort Augusta.

Fort of 1754.—The house within the stockades was built of logs, and often crowded uncomfortably by the neighboring inhabitants in times of danger. The stockades were logs, about eighteen feet long, cut in the woods where the forts were built, and planted in the ground as closely as possible. They were intended to protect the house and prevent the Indians from shooting its occupants when they stepped out of the house.

Fort Henry was situated in Bethel township, in what was, and still is, commonly known as "The Hollow," about three miles northwardly from the present village of Millersburg, some fifty yards to the east of the "Old Shamokin Road," which leads over the mountain. The spot was somewhat elevated, to enable the guard to look out some distance in every direction. There is no particular mention of this fort in the Colonial Records, which omission induces the belief that it was a fort erected by the people of that vicinity for their protection. It was sometimes called "Dietrich Six's," doubtless because it stood on the land of Dietrich Six. The records mention several times that the people fled to Dietrich Six's, but the place was not indicated as a military post. The field where it was situated has been under cultivation for many years. Not a single mark remains to indicate where it stood. It was erected some time before June, 1754.

In the beginning of June, 1757, the Governor of the province visited Fort Henry, having been escorted thither by sixty substantial freeholders of the county on horseback, completely armed. "They presented a very dutiful address to his honor, in which they expressed the warmest loyalty to the King and the greatest zeal and alacrity to serve His Majesty in defense of their country."

Michael La Chauvniere, a French officer, was captured at Fort Henry, and examined in Reading, October 16, 1757, by Conrad Weiser, James Read and Thomas Oswald, but nothing of any particular importance was developed except that he had been in this part of the country once before and that his party killed and scalped a German and took seven children prisoners. He stated that the Indians had a great number of prisoners which they would not part with.

Fort at Dietrich Snyder’s.—A fort was situated on the top of the Broad Mountain, north of Fort Northkill. It occupied one of the most prominent spots on the mountain. Being within two miles distant from Fort Northkill, it is supposed that this fort was designed for an observatory or watch-house. It is mentioned in the “Historical Map of Pennsylvania.”

Fort Northkill was situated in Upper Tulpehocken township, near the Northkill—a branch of the Tulpehocken Creek—about two miles east of Strausstown and about a mile south from the base of the Blue Mountain. It was built in the early part of 1754.

With regard to the dimensions of the fort Commissary Young says, June 20, 1756: “The fort is about nine miles to the westward of the Schuylkill, and stands in a very thick wood, on a small rising ground, half a mile from the middle of Northkill Creek. It is intended for a square about 32 feet each way; at each corner is a half-bastion of very little service to flank the curtains—the stockades were ill fixed in the ground, and open in many places—within is a very bad log-house for the people; it has no chimney and can afford but little shelter in bad weather.”

Ensign Harry had command of the fort in June, 1754. “Harry marched out of the fort about 12 o’clock with his men to Fort Lebanon, according to orders. Provisions I found in the fort as follows: 5 pounds of powder, 198 pounds of flour, 10 small bars of lead, 15 pounds of beef and pork, 3½ pounds of candles.” 1

In 1879 there was a heap of ground close by.
This was caused by the excavation of the cellar or underground chamber into which the women and children were placed for security. Some of the ground has fallen into the opening, and the autumn leaves have been blown into it for one hundred and twenty-five years, so that now it is nearly full. Mr. Jonathan Goodman, of Strausstown, a man nearly eighty years of age, who was born and who lived all his lifetime in the neighborhood of the fort, said then that he remembered that the stockades were still in position, higher than the ceiling of a room, and that the form of the fort could still be seen in his younger days. 2

There was an attack in the neighborhood of Fort Northkill on the 1st of October, 1757.
Application was made to Conrad Weiser (who was in Reading at the time) for immediate assistance. Captain Oswald (who commanded the guards about Reading) sent two lieutenants with forty men to their relief.

Fort Lebanon was situated “on the forks of the Schuylkill,” in that section of the county beyond the Blue Mountain, near the outlet of the “Little Schuylkill.” This was at a point just above Fort Clinton. It was erected in the beginning of the year 1754. In 1758 it was known as “Fort Williams;” and it was also called sometimes “Fort Schuylkill.” It is frequently mentioned in the Pennsylvania Archives. Two years after its erection it was described as follows: “Fort Lebanon, about 24 miles from Gnadenhutten, in the line to Shamokin. Fort 100 feet square. Stockades 14 feet high. House within built 30 by 20, with a large store-room. A spring within. A magazine 12 feet square. On a barren, not much timber on it. One hundred families protected by it within the new purchase. No township. Built in three weeks; something considerable given by the neighbors towards it.”

Fort Franklin.—The fourth and last fort on the frontier of Berks County was situated several miles above the Blue Mountain, on Lizard Creek. It was built about two years later than the other forts. It was sometimes called Fort Allemangael, or Fort above Allemangael, or Alle Mangel (all wants), afterward changed into Albany.

The first information of this fort is from Benjamin Franklin, who (while superintending the fort to his successor on the 15th of June, 1754; the name of the commander is not mentioned.

erection of Fort Allen, where Weissport now stands) wrote to Governor Morris after it was finished, and said: "Foulk is gone to build another between this (Fort Allen) and Schuylkill Fort (Lebanon), which I hope will be finished (as Texter is to join him) in a week or ten days. As soon as Hays returns I shall detach another party to erect another at Surfas' witch I hope may be finished in the same time, and then I hope to end my campaign." This letter was written January 25, 1756. A "Block-House" and several other buildings stood between Fort Franklin and Fort Allen, in which soldiers were stationed, and Surfas was evidently the name of a man upon whose property one of the forts was located. The fort was named in honor of its projector, Benjamin Franklin.

James Young, "commissary of ye Musters," visited the fort on June 21st. He reported the road from Fort Lebanon "a narrow path, very hilly and swampy; about half-way we came through a very thick and dangerous pine swamp; very few plantations on this road, most of them deserted and the houses burnt down; half of a mile to the westward of this fort is good plantation; the people retire to the fort every night. This fort stands about a mile from the North Mountain; only two plantations near it. This fort is a square of about forty feet, very ill stockaded, with two log houses at opposite corners for bastions; all very unfit for defence; the stockades are very open in many places; it stands on the bank of a creek, the woods clear for 120 yards; the lieutenant (Igle) ranges towards Fort Lebanon and Fort Allen about four times a week; much thunder, lightning and rain all night."

Fort Augusta.—The first allusion to this fort is in a letter by Governor Morris, on 1st of February, 1756, in which he states that he proposed to build a fort at Shamokin, at the forks of the Susquehanna, as soon as the season would admit a passage of that river. And in a letter dated July 20th following, he stated that a fort was then building at Shamokin (where a camp was stationed for some time) by Colonel Clapham, who had five hundred men with him. Shortly afterward (August 14, 1756), the colonel addressed a letter to the Governor, dated at "Fort Augusta," in reference to a necessary supply of military stores. This fort was therefore built during July and August, 1756. No dimensions are given. But it was large and commodious, affording room for many men and a large quantity of military stores at a time. Frequent reports of the supplies on hand and of the forces stationed there appear in the records and archives; and cruelties by the Indians were committed in the vicinity. These matters are not included in this narrative. Though the fort was within the territorial limits of the county, it was many miles beyond the settlements of its inhabitants.

In order to give some idea of the activity of the soldiers in the northwestern part of the county, the journal of the commander¹ at Fort Northkill is presented in this connection. It begins June 13, 1754, and ends on August 31st. It contains an account of what was done every day during this time, and it also furnishes the first information relating to the actual invasion of the county by the Indians so far as to and even on this side of the Blue Mountain, and to the murders committed upon our inhabitants.

The commander says in his journal²—,

"Accordingly I set out from Reading by break of day on the 14th, and arrived at Lieut.-Colonel Weiser's, where I received orders to march with the company, or detachment, to Fort Henry, and from there take a detachment of twenty men and continue till to Fort on Northkill. Accordingly, on the "15th.—In the morning I took the said twenty men from Fort Henry of the new levies, and marched straitway to the said fort (Northkill), accompanied with Captain Busse and Captain Smith. As soon as I arrived, I gave ensign Harry (then commander at Fort Northkill) notice of my orders, and sent off two men immediately to Col. Weiser with a report of the condition I found the fort in, and sent him a list of the new levies who were detached from Captain Busse's fort (Henry) with me to this fort.

"16th.—Captains Busse and Smith set off about 10 o'clock with a scout of ten men, which Captain Busse had ordered of his company on the 15th. [Here a description of the fort appears, quoted before].

"17th.—I, with a corporal and twenty men, according to orders from Lieut.-Col. Weiser, went a scouting and ranging the woods till to Fort Lebanon, where we arrived at 2 o'clock in the afternoon. We staid there all night, being not able to scout any farther or return home because of a heavy rain.

"18th.—Set off from Fort Lebanon in the morning, being rainy weather, and ranged the woods, coming back, as before, with the same number of men, and arrived at Fort on Northkill about 4 o'clock in the afternoon.

"19th.—Gave orders to Sergeant Peter Smith to scout to Fort Lebanon and to bring me report the next day of his proceedings. Accordingly he arrived on the 30th about 3 o'clock in the afternoon and reported that he had done according to his orders, and that he had made no discoveries. Received a letter from Captain Morgan, informing me that he had no news, &c.

"20th.—Sent off Corporal Shafer to scout as before.

"21st.—Minister Shumaker came and preached a sermon to the company. The scout arrived from Fort Lebanon. The corporal reported that nothing strange had come to his knowledge. A scout of Captain Busse's arrived about 11 o'clock, and returned about 4 towards their fort, but upon the Indian alarms, they immediately returned back to my fort and gave me notice; in the midst of the rain I sent on the first notice Sergeant Smith with eighteen men, and ordered them to divide themselves in two parties.

"23d.—Sergeant Smith returned and made report that he arrived at Dietz's house about 10 o'clock in the night, where they heard a gun go off at Jacob Smith's, about a mile off. They immediately set off again from said Smith's towards the place where the gun went off, and surrounded the house (according to my orders). They searched all the house but found no marks of Indians. From this they marched to Falk's house in the Gap, and surrounded it, but found no Indians. From there they went to the mountain, and arrived there at 2 o'clock in the morning, where Sergeant Smith, according to orders, waylaid the road in two parties, and as soon as it was day went back and buried the man that was killed, to wit: Peter Geisinger, who was shot and killed the day before.
At burying him, they heard five guns go off about two miles from said place, whereupon Sergeant Smith immediately repaired to the place, and divided themselves into two parties. (I have sent off Corporal Shafer with eight men, on the 22d, to their assistance).
Sergeant Smith also makes report that this morning, about 7 o'clock, a girl about 15 years, daughter of Balser Schmidt, was taken prisoner by two Indians, whose tracks they saw and followed, but to no purpose. A party of Captain Busse's company went along from this and remained with my men all the time. Fifteen or sixteen of the inhabitants came to me and applied for assistance. I ordered out several detachments to assist them.

"June 24.—I set off with twenty men from this to Captain Busse's fort, along the mountain, and called at the place where the murder was committed. Went up as far as the gap of the mountain, but as I found no tracks there I thought the Indians would be on this side the mountains, therefore I went up along the mountains without opposition, till to Captain Busse's fort, and as it rained very hard all day and we went far about, we arrived there towards the evening.

"June 25.—Set off in the morning with the same number of men, and scoured the woods nearly the same way back again, and arrived towards evening in the fort, being rainy weather.

"June 26.—Received in the morning a letter for me, positively not to neglect my scouting toward Fort Lebanon; accordingly, immediately called in my de-tachements. This afternoon a woman living about one and a half miles from here came to the fort and said she had seen an Indian just now in her field, almost naked, and had a gun, but said she did not stay to look long. I immediately sent off Sergeant Smith with two parties, consisting of about 20 men. They searched the place and found nothing, but saw two bare foot tracks. They divided into small parties, and scoured the woods till evening and then returned to the fort, and as I had to-day but men sufficient to guard the fort, I sent out no scout. This evening intelligence came to me from the Colonel [Weiser] informing me that he had notice from Captain Orndt of fifteen going to fall on this settlement on hereabouts.
He ordered me therefore immediately to send notice to Captain Busse's fort, in order that it might be from there conveyed to Fort Swatara. I did accordingly.

"June 27.—Gave orders to Sergeant Smith to go scouting the woods between this and Fort Lebanon, and, if Captain Morgan thought that it was serviceable, to range some way up Schuylkill (as that gap is their common rendezvous).

June 28.—A scout of Captain Busse arrived in the forenoon, and set off again this afternoon.

"June 29.—In the evening there came two men to the fort, and reported that the Indians had invaded about six miles from this, about nine o'clock this morning. I was somewhat concerned that I had no sooner intelligence of it; however, I immediately sent off twelve men under two corporals.

"June 30.—About noon the two corporals returned and made the following report: That yesterday they could not reach the place, as they were tired, but staid at a house till nigh break of day, and then set off again.
He did not immediately go to the place where the man, etc., were killed, but went somewhat further down towards the Schuylkill, thinking that the Indians had invaded lower down, but as it was not so he took another route towards the place where the murder was committed, and as he came there he found the man's wife (Frederick Myers), who had been at a plough, and shot through both her breasts and was scalped. After that he went to look for the man, whom they found dead and scalped some way in the woods. They took a ladder and carried him to his wife, where the neighbors came and helped to bury them, after which they went towards the mountain, and scouted along the same and arrived here about four o'clock in the afternoon. It is reported by the farmers who saw the deceased a short while before, that he was mowing in his meadow, and that his children were about him, which makes them believe that the man, after he had heard the shot which killed his wife, went to run off with only the youngest child in his arms, as the man was shot through his body, and the child is one and a half years of age and is scalped, but yet alive, and is put at a doctor's. The other three, who were with their father, are taken prisoners; one of them is a boy about ten years old, the other a girl of eight years and the other a boy of six years. There was a baby, whom they found in a ditch, that the water was just to its mouth. It was lying on its back crying. It was taken up, and is like to do well. A boy of one Reichard, of eight years, was taken prisoner at the same time. This was all done within half an hour, as some neighbors had been there in that space of time.”

A squad of soldiers were ranging the woods daily between Forts Henry, Northkill and Lebanon, but no Indians were seen for three weeks. On the 23d of July the commander of Fort Northkill marched along the mountain as far as to the east side of the Schuykill, and remained at Fort Lebanon during the night. Then he continues in his journal,—

“July 24th.—Returned, and as soon as we came over on this side of the mountain (it being yet early in the day), I took quite another route through the woods, but made no discovery, so we arrived at Fort Northkill in the evening. I had not been there one-half an hour before three farmers came and informed me that this morning the Indians had taken a boy of about 14 years prisoner, but had done no other damage. I immediately sent off a party, but as it happened, the boy being taken prisoner in the morning, night came on before my men could get there.

“25th.—In the morning I heard that the boy had escaped, and that he made report, and that there were four white men and four Indians with him, and that at night he escaped; they had tied him and he was obliged to lie between them, but as they all got drunk and fast asleep, he untied himself and ran off. He further says that when he was taken prisoner he made a noise, and that they struck him and told him to be silent. I imagine they saw me with my men go over the day before yesterday. The Indians were this night about the fort, but it was very dark, therefore I did not sally out.

“26th.—This morning sent out Sergeant Smith with five men to search about the fort for tracks, but he only found one which was in a muddy place. But it being nothing but stones, he could not follow the tracks. It rained all day, therefore I could send no scouts.

[Scouts were sent out every day, but nothing was seen of the Indians for a week.]

“August 4th.—A scout of Captain Busse arrived and returned the same day. The inhabitants desiring assistance to bring in their harvest, I gave them some men, and went scouting, but as I left few men in the fort I returned this evening.”

[The soldiers often guarded the fields while the farmers took off their grain and hauled it away, because when they were engaged in this work, the Indians could approach them more closely without being observed.]

“7th.—This being Sunday, I took a party and went to church, as the church lies near the mountain and the minister could not come without a guard.

“8th.—The sentry fired at a Indian. The Indian stood behind a bush about 300 yards off, and was viewing the fort. I went off with eighteen men, and parted them in six parties, and went after the Indians, but could not come up with them. Went to clearing about the fort, it being thick of bushes.

1 This heart-rending tragedy occurred about a mile and a half north of Shartlestone, in Upper Bern, on the farm owned by Frederick Moyer, the grandson of the little child that had such a narrow escape from cruel death.

Tradition says that the child found in the ditch was scalped and otherwise hurt, and died afterwards.

The child Frederick, who was scalped and put to a doctor, was also shot through the arm, probably pierced by the bullet that killed the father, but recovered and in due time became the owner of the farm and died at the age of seventy-eight years. The property then came into the possession of his son, Jacob M., and after his death into the possession of his grandson, Frederick, who is the present owner.

The Reichard mentioned in the report belonged to a family living on the farm owned by Mr. Daniel Berger. Tradition says that the Reichard family was murdered, except one of the boys, whom the Indians had intended to take prisoner. Mr. Reichard used to tell his children that if the Indians should come and attempt to take any of them alive they should resist to their utmost. This young boy, wishing to carry out his father's request, resisted the Indians who, after conveying him as far as to Moyer's, and, chafed by his insubordination, killed him with their tomahawks and scalped him.

It was also about this time that the Hostetter family was killed near the forge west of Shartlestone.—Brunner's "Indians of Berks County," p. 29-30.

"Fort Northkill.—June 20, at 2 p.m. I set out from Reading, escorted by five men of the town, on horseback, for the Fort at Northkill; at half-past 6 we came to the fort, it is about 19 miles from Reading, the road very hilly and thick of woods. When I came here the Sergeant, who is commander, was absent and gone to the next plantation, half a mile off, but soon came when he had intelligence I was there; he told me he had 14 men posted with him, all detached from Captain Morgan's company, at Fort Lebanon, five of them were absent by his leave, viz., two he had let go to Reading for three days, one he had let go to his own house, ten miles off, and two more this afternoon, a few miles from the fort, on their own business; there were but eight men and the Sergeant on duty. I am of opinion there ought to be a commissioned officer here, as the Sergeant does not do his duty, nor are the men under proper command for want of a superior officer; the woods are not cleared above forty yards from the fort; I gave orders to cut all down for two hundred yards; I inquired the reason there was so little powder and lead here, the Sergeant told me he had repeatedly requested more of Captain Morgan, but to no purpose. Provisions here, flour and rum, for four weeks; Mr. Seely, of Reading, sends the officer money to purchase meal as they want it. Provincial arms and ammunition at Northkill Fort, viz., eight good muskets, four rounds of powder and lead, per man, fifteen blankets and three axes.

"June 21.—At eight o'clock, A.M., Captain Busse, from Fort Henry, came here with eight men on horseback, he expected to meet Conrad Weiser here, in order to proceed to the several forts on the northern frontier, but Colonel Weiser wrote him that other business prevented him, and desired Captain Busse to proceed with me, and return him an account how he found the forts, with the quantity of ammunition and stores in each, of which I was very glad, as the escort on horseback would expedite our journey very much, and be much safer.

"Fort Lebanon.—Accordingly, we set out for Fort Lebanon; all the way from Northkill to Lebanon is an exceedingly bad road, very stony and mountainous. About six miles from Northkill we crossed the North Mountain, where we met Captain Morgan's lieutenant with ten men, ranging the woods between the mountains and Fort Lebanon; we passed two plantations, the rest of the country is chiefly barren hills; at noon we came to Fort Lebanon, which is situated in a plain; on one side is a plantation, on the other a barren, pretty clear of woods all round, only a few trees about fifty yards from the fort, which I desired might be cut down. . . . The fort is a little too much crowded on that account; I acquainted Captain Morgan that the Sergeant at Northkill did not do his duty, and I believed it would be for the good of the service to have a commanding officer there, on which he ordered his Lieutenant, with two men, to go and take post there, and sent with him four pounds

1 2 Penna. Arch. 676-677.

"9th.—Continual clearing and burning bush.

"10th.—Sent off a scouting party who returned and brought no intelligence. This night the sentry about an hour after dark perceived that a fire which had been kindled to burn brush, but was before night gone out, began to burn afresh, upon which he called the Sergeant of the guard, who, perceiving the same, ordered the guard to fire, on which the Indians ran off. The dogs pursued them and kept barking after them about half a mile. I had the men all under arms, but everything being now quiet, dismissed them, ordering them to be in continual readiness with their accouterments on. In about an hour the Indians returned and took a fire-brand out of the fire and ran off. They were immediately fired on, but in vain.

"14th.—Being Sunday, Minister Shumaker came here and the soldiers being fatigued with continual scouting, there was no scout to-day.

"20th.—Sent a scout of fifteen men to range the woods towards Schuylkill, into Windsor township, and with orders to call in some detachments lying in the said township, according to Lieut.-Colonel's order.

"23d.—A scout of Captain Busse arrived. The sentry heard the Indians distinctly whistle this night.

"26th.—Ensign Biddle returned from his scout having been at Captain Morgan's Fort [Lebanon], and thence scouted over the mountains into Albany, and thence along the foot of the mountain till here."

In June, 1756, James Young, “commissary general of ye musters,” was sent “to examine into the state and condition of the forts, arms, ammunition, provisions, blankets, accoutrements, tools and other stock and things belonging to his majesty or the province,” and report to the Governor. He rendered his report July 2, 1756. That part of the journal 1 which relates to the forts of Berks County is as follows:

"Reading, June 19.—At 11 o'clock in the morning I came to Reading. I sent an express to Lieut.-Col. Weiser, to acquaint him of my intended journey to the northern frontier, that I inclined to must this company here, and that I should want some men to escort me to the next fort. Ammunition at Reading, 25 good muskets, 25 muskets want repairs, 11 broken muskets, 9 cartouch boxes, 250 pounds of powder and 600 pounds of lead.

"At 6 p.m., Col. Weiser came here, I mustered his company that is posted for a guard to this place. They consist of 30 men, viz.: two sergeants and twenty-eight private soldiers; two of them were absent at Col. Weiser's house.
of powder and ten pounds of lead. Provincial arms and ammunition: 28 good muskets, 10 wanton repair, 9 rounds of powder and lead, 4 pounds of powder, 24 pounds of lead, 30 cartouch boxes, 40 blankets, 1 axe, 1 wall piece.

"By Captain Morgan's journal, it appears he sends a party to range the woods four or five times a week, and guard the inhabitants at their labor. At 1 P. M. I mustered the people and examined the certificates of enlistments which appear in the muster roll, after which I ordered the men to fire at a mark; 15 of 28 hit within two feet of the centre and at the distance of 80 yards. Provisions here—flour and run for a month; the commissary sends them money to purchase meal as they want it.

"FORT ABOVE ALLEINGA (Albany).—At one-half past three p. m. we set out with the former escort and two of Captain Morgan's company for the fort above Alleinga, commanded by Lieutenant Engle. Provincial stores—28 good muskets, 8 wanton repair, 16 cartouch boxes, 8 pounds of powder, 24 pounds of lead, and twelve rounds for 36 men, 36 blankets, 1 axe, 1 adz, 1 auger, 2 planes, 1 hammer, 2 shovels, 9 small tin kettles.

"June 22—At 6 A.M. I ordered the people to fire at a mark; not above 4 in 25 hit the tree at the distance of 85 yards; at 7, mustered them; found 25 present, 2 sick, 2 absent on furlough, 2 sent to Reading with a prisoner, and 5 at Fort Allen on duty. Provisions—one cask of beef, exceedingly bad, flour and rum for three weeks."

In 1758 the number of men in the pay of the province was one thousand two hundred and seventy-four men. These were employed in garrisoning the forts and ranging. In the limits of Berks County, there were at Fort Henry two companies, comprising one hundred and five men; at Fort William (Forks of Schuylkill), one company, fifty-three men; and at Fort August, eight companies, three hundred and sixty-two men. These were reported at Philadelphia, on the 9th of February, 1758, by James Young, commissary of the musters.

Burd's Journal.—During the month of February of that year Colonel James Burd visited the fords between the two rivers. That part of his journal which relates to the fords in Berks County is as follows:

"Tuesday, 21st February.—March'd at 1 P. M. for Fort Henry (from Fort Swatara); at 3 P. M. got to Souder's (7 miles); left Lieutenant Broadhead to march the party 4 miles to Sneevly's, there to hault all night, and to march to Fort Henry in the morning (6 miles). The roads being very bad, marched myself with Adjutant Thorn and 8 men on horseback; arrived at Fort Henry at 5 P. M.; found here Captain Weiser, Adjutant Kern and the ensigns Biddle and Craighead doing duty with 90 men. Ordered a review of the garrison to-morrow at 9 A.M.

"Wednesday, 22d.—Had a review this morning at 9 A.M.; found 90 soldiers under good command, and fine fellows; examined the stores and found about 2 months' provision in store, and am informed by the Commanding Officer there is 2 months' more about 6 miles from hence, at Jacob Myers' Mill; no powder; 224 lbs. of lead; no flints; about 80 province arms, belonging to these two companies, good for nothing; ordered Ensign Craighead, with 18 men of this garrison, to march to-morrow morning to Fort Swettarrow, and there to apply to Captain Allen, and to receive from him 7 men, and with this party of 25 men to march from thence to Robertson's Mill, there to take Post, to order from thence a Serg't, Corporal & 8 men to the house of Adam Road, Esq., and to employ his whole party in Continuall ranging, to cover these Fronteers. This I found myself under a necessity of doing; otherwise several townships here would be evacuated in a few days. Ordered Ensign Haller to march back my escort to Hunter's Fort to-morrow morning, and Captain Weiser to continue to range from this to Forts Northkill & Swettarrow; to employ all his judgment to waylay the enemy & protect the Inhabitants. This is a very good stockaded fort, & everything in good order, & duty done pretty well; marched to-day at 11 A.M., & arrived at Conrad Weiser, Esgr.'s, at 3 P.M. (14 miles), where I found 4 quarter-casks of powder belonging to the province, 3 of which I ordered to Fort Henry, and 1 to Fort Swettarrow; no lead here; very bad roads & cold weather; stayed all night.

"Thursday, 23d.—Marched this morning, and arrived at Reading at 3 P. M., found Capt. Morgan here; this is 14 miles from Mr. Weiser's. Examined the stores here and found 77 blankets, 8 pounds of powder, 300 pounds of lead, and half a cask of flints. Ordered 56 blankets to be sent to Capt'n Patterson's Co. and 11 to Capt. Lieut. Allen's; 200 pounds of lead to Fort Henry, and 100 pounds to Swettarrow; gave the 8 pounds of powder to Capt'n. Morgan, and 400 flints to each company.

"Before I came to Reading, Adjutant Kern had sent by Lieutenant Engle blankets for four companies, viz: Orn, Weatherholt, Davis and Garaway, 224, and one-quarter cask of powder, 300 bars of lead, and 1600 flints.

"Friday, 24th.—This morning set out for Fort William, arrived at Peter Rodermill's at 2 P.M., 15 miles from Reading; it snowed and blew so prodigiously, I stayed here all night.

"Saturday, 25th.—Marched this morning, the snow deep, for Fort William, arrived at Fort William at 12 m.; here was Lieut. Humphreys and Ensign Harry; ordered a review of the garrison at 2 P.M.; at 2 P.M. reviewed the garrison and found 53 good men, but deficient in discipline; stores—3 quarter casks of powder, 150 pounds of lead, 400 flints and 56 blankets, no arms fit for use, no kettles, nor tools, nor drum; two months’ provisions.

"Here I found a target erected, ordered the company to shoot at the mark, set them the example myself by wheeling round and firing by the word of command. I shot a bullet into the centre of the mark, the size of a dollar, distance 100 yards. Some of them shot tolerably bad; most of their arms are very bad.

"Ordered Captain Morgan to continue to patrol to Northkill and Allemangel."

Invasion of County by Indians.—The English, under General Braddock, were defeated by the French and Indians on the 9th of July, 1755, in the western part of the province. This victory encouraged the Indians to move eastward, and it was this movement by them which threw terror into the quiet rural districts of this vicinity. The news of their shocking cruelties to the inhabitants of the province on their way had been carried before them. We cannot appreciate the excitement that prevailed. Preparations for defense were made, but these were feeble. The forts along the frontier were either too distant from the settlers or too far apart to be serviceable. The community were not organized to carry on vigorous measures against the approaching foe. Arms and ammunition were scarce. Weakness was apparent on every side, and, conscious of this weakness, all the inhabitants trembled with fear and many fled from their homes.

Letters on Sufferings of Early Inhabitants.

The following important and interesting correspondence by prominent persons is submitted to show the state of affairs which existed during this trying period of our early history.

The earliest information on the subject of departing residents of Berks County, who feared the Indians, is contained in a letter addressed to the Pennsylvania Gazette, dated 25th of August, 1755. It stated that there were then several families in Reading on their way to New Jersey, who had left their habitations on the frontiers, and that forty more were expected some time during the same week, thinking that it was not safe to stay any longer on account of the scalping Indians.

Weiser, Letters.—The first remarkable letter from a resident of this county—which related to the approaching Indians and their cruelties—was by Conrad Weiser to Governor Morris,—

"Honored Sir,—

"I take this opportunity to inform you I received news from Shamokin that six families have been murdered on John Penn’s Creek, on the west side of Susquehannah, about four miles from that river, several people have been found scalped and twenty-eight are missing; the people are in a great consternation and are coming down, leaving their plantations and corn behind them. Two of my sons are gone up to help one of their cousins with his family down. I hear of none that will defend themselves but George Gabriel and — —. The people down here seem to be senseless, and say the Indians will never come this side of Susquehannah River, but I fear they will since they meet with no opposition nowhere. I don’t doubt your Honor heard of this melancholy affair before now by the way of Lancaster, perhaps more particularly, yet I thought it my duty to inform you of it, and when my sons come back I will write again if they bring anything particular. I have heard nothing of the Indians that are gone out to fight against the French on Ohio. Their going I fear has been the occasion of this murder. I have nothing to add, but am,

"Honored Sir, Your very humble servant,

William Weiser.

"Reading, October 22, 1755."

Several days afterward Weiser’s two sons returned. He then addressed another letter to Governor Morris, as intimated in his previous letter to him. It was as follows:

"Heidelberg, in the County of Berks.

Oct. 26, 1755, at 5 o’clock in the evening.

"Sir:—Just now two of my sons, to wit, Frederick and Peter, arrived from Shamokin, where they have been to help down their cousin with his family. I gave them orders before they went, to bring me down a trusty Indian or two to inform myself of the present circumstances of Indian affairs, but they brought none down; they saw Jonathan but he could not leave his family in this dangerous time. Whilst they were at Geo. Gabriel’s, a messenger came from Shamokin, sent by James Logan, one of Shickelamy’s sons, and Cacachpitol, a noted Delaware always true to the English, to let Geo. Gabriel know that they had certain intelligence that a great body of French and Indians had been seen on their march towards Pennsylvania at a place where Zinaghton river or rivers comes out of the Allegheny hills, and that if the white people will come up to Shamokin and assist, they will stand the French and fight them. They said that now they want to see their brethren's faces, and well-armed with smooth guns, no rifled guns—which require too much cleaning. They in particular desired the company men gathered at George Gabriel's, Captain McKees' and John Harris', they being informed that people had gathered there, and that they are extremely concerned for the white people's running away, and said they could not stand the French alone. This message was delivered to George Gabriel, and about ten whites more, among them were my two sons, by a Delaware Indian named Enoch, and a white man called Lawrence Bork, who came with the Indians as a companion. The Indians' messenger that brought the news to Shamokin from the Indians living up the river Zinachow (the North West Branch of the Susquehanna) arrived at Shamokin at midnight before the 23d of this instant. The Indians are extremely concerned, as my sons tell me, people are coming away in great hurry, the rest that stay plundering the houses and make the best of other people's misfortune. The French want to see Jonathan taken prisoner, etc. All this in great hurry. I pray, good sir, don't slight it. The lives of many thousands are in the utmost danger. It is no false alarm.

"I am, Honored and Dear Sir, your very obedient,"

"CONRAD WEISER.

"P. S.—If a body of men would go up they could gather plenty of Indian corn, beef and other provisions; now everything is in the utmost confusion. I suppose in a few days not one family will be seen on the other side of Kittatinny Hills."

On the same day, at eleven o'clock at night, he addressed the following letter to James Read, Esq., at Reading, whereby he communicated the first intelligence pertaining to the arrival of the Indians across the Susquehanna River.

"Loving Friend:—This evening, about an hour ago, I received the news of the enemy having crossed the Susquehanna and killed a great many people, from Thomas McKee down to Hunter's Mill. Mr. Elder, the minister at Paxton, wrote this to another Presbyterian minister in the neighborhood of Adam Read, Esq. The people were then in meeting, and immediately desired to get themselves in readiness to oppose the enemy, and to lend assistance to their neighbors. Mr. Read sent down to Tulpehocken, and two men—one that came from Mr. Read—are just now gone, that brought in the melancholy news. I have sent out to alarm the townships in this neighborhood, and to meet me early in the morning at Peter Spicker, to consult together what to do, and to make preparations to stand the enemy with the assistance of the most high. I write you this that you may have time to consult with Mr. Seely and other well-wishers of the people, in order to defend your lives and others. For God's sake, let us stand together and do what we can, and trust to the hand of Providence. Perhaps we must in this neighborhood come to Reading, but I will send armed men to Susquehanna, or as far as they can go, for intelligence. Pray let Sammy have a copy of this, or this draft for his Honour, the Governor. I have sent him about three hours ago express to Philadelphia, and he lodges at my son Peter's. Dispatch him as early as you can. I pray beware of confusion. Be calm, you and Mr. Seely, and act the part as fathers of the people. I know you are both able; but excuse me for giving this caution—time requires it.

"I am, Dear sir, Your very good friend and humble servant,"

"CONRAD WEISER.

Mr. Read received this letter the next morning (Oct. 27th), and he immediately addressed the following brief letter on the same sheet of paper to Governor Morris:

"Sir:—I must not detain the bearer a moment. I have sent the original letter from Mr. Weiser, that no mistake may arise by any doubts of the justness of a copy.

"I shall raise our town in an hour, and use all prudent measures for our defense. I could wish that your Honour could order us two or three swivel guns and blunderbusses, with a few muskets, and some powder and swan shot. Nothing shall be wanting in me—who has the misfortune of being Major of two associated companies; but I know not how my people will behave, as they are under an infatuation of an extraordinary sort.

"I am, May it please your Honour, Your Honour's most obedient and most humble servant,"

"JAMES READ.

"[P. S.] Many wagons that are got thus far are bound back again immediately upon hearing the news."

On the 30th of October, which was four days after he had addressed the foregoing letter to Read, Weiser communicated additional news to the Governor in a letter, which was as follows:

"Reading, October 30, 1755.

"May it Please Your Honor:—Since the date of my last letter, which I sent by express, by Sammy Weiser, dated last Sunday evening, 5 o'clock, and about 11 o'clock the same night, I sent a letter to Mr. Read in this town, who forwarded it to your honor, by the same opportunity.

ordered it to the care of the officers, to divide it among those that wanted it most. On the 28th, by break of day, we marched, our company increasing all along. We arrived at Adam Read's, Esq., in Hanover township, Lancaster County; about ten o'clock. There we stopped and rested till all came up. Mr. Read had just then received intelligence from Susquehanna, by express, which was as follows: 'That Justice Forster, Capt. McKee, John Harris and others, to the number of forty-nine, went up to Shamokin to bury the dead bodies of those that had been killed by the enemy on John Penn's creek, and, coming up to George Gabriel's, about five miles this side of Shamokin and on the west side of Susquehanna, they heard that the dead bodies had been buried already, and so they went along to Shamokin, where they arrived last Friday evening and were seemingly well received, but found a great number of strange Indians, though Delawares, all painted black, which gave suspicion, and Thomas McKee told his companions that he did not like them, and the next morning—that is, last Saturday—they got up early in order to go back, but they did not see any of the strangers; they were gone before them. Andrew Montour was there, painted as the rest; advised our people not to go the same way they came, but to keep this side of Susquehanna and go the old road; but when they came to the parting of the roads a majority of them was for going the highest and best road, and so crossed the Susquehanna contrary to Andrew Montour's council, in order to go down on the west side of that river as far as Mahoning. When they came to John Penn's creek, in going down the bank they were fired upon from this side by Indians that had waylaid them. Some dropped dead; the rest fled and made towards Susquehanna and came to this side, and so home as well as they could. Twenty six of them were missing and not heard of as yet (last Monday evening).'

'Upon this we had a consultation, and as we did not come up to serve as guards to the Paxton people, but to fight the enemy, if they were come so far, as we first heard, we thought best to return and take care of our own townships. After I had given the necessary caution to the people to hold themselves in readiness, as the enemy was certainly in the county, to keep their arms in good order, and so on, and then discharge them—and we marched back with the approbation of Mr. Read. By the way, we were alarmed by a report that five hundred Indians had come over the mountain at Tolheo to this side, and had already killed a number of people. We stopped and sent a few men to discover the enemy, but, on their return, proved to be a false alarm, occasioned by that company that I had sent that way the day before, whose guns getting wet, they fired them off, which was the cause of alarm—

this not only had alarmed the company, but the whole townships through which they marched. In going back, I met messengers from other townships about Conestoga, who came for intelligence, and to ask me where their assistance was necessary, promising that they would come to the place where I should direct.

"I met, also, at Tulpehocken, about one hundred men well-armed, as to fire-arms, ready to follow me; so that there were in the whole about five hundred men in arms that day, all marching up towards Susquehanna. I and Mr. Adam Read counted those who were with me—we found them three hundred and twenty.

"I cannot send any further account, being uncommonly fatigued. I should not forget, however, to inform your Honor that Mr. Read has engaged to keep proper persons riding between his house and Susquehanna, and if anything material shall occur, he will send me tidings to Heidelberg or to Reading, which I shall take care to dispatch to you. I find that great trouble has been taken at Reading to get the people together, and nearly two hundred were here yesterday morning; but upon hearing that the people attending me were discharged, the people from the country went off without consulting what should be done for the future, through the indiscretion of a person who was with them and wanted to go home; and near the town they met a large company coming up, and gave such accounts as occasioned their turning back. I think most of the inhabitants would do their duty, but without some military regulations we shall never be able to defend the province.

"I am sure we are in great danger, and from an enemy that can travel as Indians. We may be surprised when it would be impossible to collect any number of men together to defend ourselves, and then the country would be laid waste. I am quite tired and must say no more than that.

"I am your Honor's most obedient servant,

"CONRAD WEISER."

PARSONS' LETTER.—On the 31st of October, 1755, William Parsons wrote to Richard Peters, at Philadelphia. His letter communicated the first direct intelligence of murder within the borders of Berks County, in the year 1755, after it was apparent that the Indians had determined to invade the county for the certain purpose of committing as many outrages upon the inhabitants as possible. It was as follows:

"When I wrote last to you, I informed you that I was engaged in laying out the road from Easton to Reading. . . . On Monday (whilst at Reading

I heard a rumor of Thomas McKee's engagement with some strange Indians. I had heard before of some murders having been committed by them on the west side of Susquehanna, near Shamokin. Monday evening I received an express from Mr. Weiser, informing me that he had summoned the people to go and oppose the Indians, and desired me to meet a large company near the foot of the mountain in the Shamokin road; while he went with about 300 to Paxtang. When I came to the company at the foot of the mountain, about 100 in all, I found one-half of them without any powder or lead. However, I advised them to go forward, and those that had no ammunition I advised to take axes, in order to make a breastwork of trees for their security at night; and the next day advised them to go forward to the Upper Gap of Swaratawkro, and there to make another breastwork of trees, and to stay there two or three days in order to oppose the enemy if they should attempt to come that way; which, if they had done, I am inclined to think what has since happened, would have been prevented. I promised them to go to Tulpehocken, and provide powder and lead, and a sufficient quantity of lead to be sent immediately after them. But they went no further than to the top of the mountain, and there those that had ammunition, spent most of it in shooting up into the air, and then returned back again firing all the way, to the great terror of all the inhabitants thereabout, and this was the case with almost all the others, being about 500 in different parts of the neighborhood; there was another company who came from the lower part of Bern township, as far as Mr. Freme's Manor. So that when I came to Tulpehocken I found the people there more alarmed than they were near the mountain. For when they saw me come alone they were overjoyed, having heard that we were all destroyed, and that the enemy were just at their backs, ready to destroy them. At Tulpehocken there was no lead to be had; all that could be had from Reading was taken to Paxtang. I therefore sent an express over to Lancaster to Mr. Shippen that evening, desiring him to send me some lead. He sent me seven pounds, being all that the town people were willing to part with, as they were themselves under great apprehensions. I also procured 20 pounds of powder, papered up in one quarter pounds, and ordered out a quantity of bread near the mountains, but when I returned home I learned that my people had given over the pursuit, in the manner above mentioned. I have since distributed a good deal of the powder and lead, and the bread I ordered to the poor people who are removing from their settlements on the other side of the mountain, from whence the people have been removing all this week. It is impossible to describe the confusion and distress of those unhappy people. Our roads are continually full of travelers. Those on the other side, of the men, women and children, most of them barefooted, have been obliged to cross those terrible mountains with what little they could bring with them in so long a journey through ways almost impassable, to get to the inhabitants on this side. While those who live on this side near the mountain are removing their effects to Tulpehocken. Those at Tulpehocken are removing to Reading, and many at Reading are moving nearer to Philadelphia, and some of them quite to Philadelphia. This is the present unhappy situation of Pennsylvania.

"Yesterday afternoon I was informed that Adam Reed was come from over the mountain and reported that he had been at the house of Henry Hartman, whom he saw lying dead, having his head scalped. I sent for him, and before five o'clock this morning he came to me and told me that between eleven and twelve o'clock yesterday—being then at home on his plantation on the west side of Swatawro, about nine miles from my house and about five miles from the nearest settlement on this side the hills, he heard three guns fired toward Henry Hartman's plantation which made him suspect that something more than ordinary was the occasion of that firing. Whereupon he took his gun and went to Hartman's house—being about a quarter of a mile from his own, where he found Hartman lying dead, with his face to the ground, and all the skin scalped from his head. He did not stay to examine in what manner he was killed, but made the best of his way through the woods to this side of the mountain. He told me further that he had made oath before Adam Reed, Esq., of the whole matter. This day I set out with some of my neighbors to go and view the place and to see the certainty of the matter and to assist in burying the dead body. Mr. Reed had appointed the people about him to go with him for that purpose, and we intended to meet him at the place by way of Shamokin road. When we got to the top of the mountain we met with seven or eight men who told us that they had been about two or three miles further along the road and had discovered two dead men lying near the road about two hundred or three hundred yards from each other and that both were scalpt, whereupon I advised to go to the place where these two men were, and with great difficulty we prevailed with the others to go back with us—being then twenty-six men strong. When we came to the place, I saw both the men lying dead and all the skin of their heads was scalpt off. One of them we perceived had been shot through the leg. We did not examine further, but got some tools from a settlement that was just by and dug a grave and buried them both together in their clothes just as we had found them to prevent their being torn to pieces and devoured by wild beasts. There were four or five persons, women and children yet missing. One of the dead men had been over on this side of the mountain with his family and was returning with his daughter to fetch some of their effects that were left behind. She is missing for one. It is not for me to describe the horror and confusion of the people here and of the country in general. You can best imagine that in your own mind. But where will these proceedings end? For myself I do not know whether I shall stay where I am or leave all that I have to be destroyed by those barbarians, or to be plundered by wicked people amongst ourselves."

A letter dated November 3, 1755, stated that two men had been lately killed and scalped near the first branch of the Swatara, on the road to Shamokin, one being named Odwall, the other unknown; that both had families and that it was supposed that their missing families had been carried off by the Indians.

On the 31st of October, at eight o'clock, at Reading, five of the county justices (John Potts, Conrad Weiser, William Maubridge, Jonas Seely and James Reed) prepared a paper of intelligence, in which they stated, among other things,—

"We are all in uproar, all in disorder, all willing to do, and have little in our power. We have no authority, no commissions, no officers practised in war, and without the commissariat of our friends in Philadelphia, who think themselves vastly safer than they are. If we are not immediately supported, we..." must not be sacrificed, and therefore are determined to go down with all that will follow us to Philadelphia, and quarter ourselves on its inhabitants and wait our fate with them."

This was addressed to the Executive Council and read at a meeting on the 2d of November, 1755, whence it was sent by expresses from township to township, into all parts of the western counties, in order to put the inhabitants upon their guard.

On the 16th of November, 1755, a party of Indians crossed the Susquehanna, and fell upon the county of Berks. They murdered thirteen persons, burnt a great number of houses, destroyed vast quantities of cattle, grain and fodder, and laid waste a large extent of country.

Morgan Deposition.—The following deposition (relating to certain murders which were committed in Berks County, but not mentioned by Weiser or Parsons) was taken at Reading, on the 18th of November, 1755, and published in the Pennsylvania Gazette, on the 20th of November, 1755:

"BERKS COUNTY, PENNSYLVANIA, SS.

"Jacob Morgan, a captain in Col. Weiser's regiment, being sworn on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, doth depose and say, that on Sunday, the 16th November, 1755, at about five o'clock P.M., his, the deponent, Mr. Philip Weiser and Mr. Peter Weiser, set out from Heidelberg towards Dietrich's, to get intelligence of the mischief done at Tol-ho, or thereabouts, and to get a number of men to join them to go and seek for the persons scalped by the Indians; and to help in the best manner they could, the poor distressed inhabitants. That about nine miles from Mr. Weiser's they found a girl about six years old scalped, but yet alive, and a vast number of people there; but he knows not at whose house it was nor the name of the child. That at the request of the people there, Mr. Weiser's son and deponent, went back to Mr. Weiser's for powder and lead. That at or about two o'clock yesterday morning they were alarmed at Mr. Weiser's with an account that the Indians had beset George Dollinger's house, and his family were fled; whereupon Philip Weiser, and the deponent, and a person whose name deponent does not know, set off immediately, and at Christopher Weiser's overtook a large company, consisting of about one hundred men, and with them proceeded to George Dollinger's, and surrounded his house, where they found a good deal of damage done, and in the garden, a child about eight years old, daughter of one Cola, lying dead and scalped, which they buried.

"That the whole company went on to a plantation of Abraham Sneider, and found in a corn-field the wife of Cola, and a child about eight or nine years old, both dead and scalped, and in the house they found another child of the said Cola's about ten years old, dead and scalped; but the deponent knows not what sex either of these two children was. That while they were preparing the grave, they were alarmed by the firing of a gun, and flying to their arms, they went (a few staying to take care of the dead) to the place from whence the sound came, and about half a mile from the place they came from, they met the company, one of whom had indiscreetly discharged his musket, and then went back to bury the def; on their return they found the scalp of a white person. That having buried the woman and children, they went to Thomas Bower's, in whose house they found a dead man, scalped, whose name the deponent thinks was Philip, by trade a shoemaker, but knows no more of him.

"That the company increased fast, and were now about one hundred and thirty men, who marched on the Shamokin road to near Dietrich's; about half a mile from whose house they found Casper Spring's dead and scalped, and having buried him, they marched about one hundred rods and found one Bes-linger dead and scalped—they buried him. That at the same distance from Beslinger's they found an Indian man dead and scalped, which Indian, it was generally believed, was a Delaware. Mr. Frederick Weiser scalped him the day before.

"That twenty of their body, who had gone a little out of the road, about two miles from Dietrich's, found (as the deponent and the rest of the company were informed, and as he believes without any doubt) a child of Jacob Wolf—he cannot say whether a boy or a girl—which was scalped! Its age the deponent does not know, but the father carried it in his arms to be buried, as they were informed. That the deponent was informed by Mr. Frederick Weiser, that a company, with whom he had been the day before, had buried John Leinberger and Rudolph Candel, whom they found scalped.

"That the deponent and company finding no more scalped or wounded, they returned, being then by the continual arrival of fresh persons, about three hundred men, to George Dollinger's. That Casper Spring's brains were beat out; had two cuts in his breast; was shot in his back, and otherwise cruelly used, which regard to decency forbids mentioning; and that Beslinger's brains were beat out, his mouth much mangled, one of his eyes cut out, and one of his cars gashed, and had two knives lying on his breast.
That the whole country thereof was deserted their habitations, and send away all their household goods.
The horses and cattle are in the cornfields, and every thing in the utmost disorder, and the people quite despair. And further that he heard of much mischief done by burning houses and barns; but not having been where it was reported to have been done, he chooses not to have any particulars thereof inserted in this deposition.

BIDDLE LETTER.—The following letter, written by Edward Biddle, of Reading, to his father in Philadelphia, expresses the perturbed state of feeling in the city of Reading. There is no date attached to it, but it is supposed to have been written on the 16th of November:

“My Dearest Father—I am in so much horror and confusion I scarcely know what I am writing. The drum is beating to arms, and bells ringing and all the people under arms. Within these two hours we have had different though too certain accounts, all corroborating each other, and this moment is an express arrived, dispatched by Michael Reis, at Tulpehocken. Eighteen miles above this town, who left about thirty of their people engaged with about an equal number of Indians at the said Reis’. This night we expect an attack; truly alarming is our situation. The people excite against the Quakers, and some are scarcely restrained from burning the houses of those few who are in this town. Oh, my country! my bleeding country! I commend myself to the divine God of armies. Give my dutiful love to my dearest mother and my best love to brother Jimmy.

“I am, honored sir, your most affectionate and obedient son,

WEISER LETTERS.—The following letter describes the condition of the settlements beyond the Blue Mountain during this exciting period; and it also shows to some degree a want of patriotic feeling on the part of the inhabitants, notwithstanding their perilous situation. It was addressed to Governor Morris by Conrad Weiser, from his home, on 2d of November, 1755, at night:

“I am going out early next morning with a company of men, how many I can’t tell as yet, to bring away the few and distressed families on the north side of Kittidany Hills yet alive (if there is yet alive such). They cry aloud for assistance, and I shall give as my opinion to-morrow, in public meeting of the townships of Heidelberg and Tulpehocken, that they few who are alive and remaining there (the most part is come away) shall be forewarned to come to the south side of the hills, and we will convey them to this side. If I don’t go over the hills myself, I will see the men so far as the hills and give such advice as I am able to do. There can be no force. We are continually alarmed; and last night I received the account of Andrew Montour. . . . My son Peter came up this morning from Reading, at the head of about fifteen men, in order to accompany me over the hills. I shall let him go with the rest; had we but good regulations, with God’s help we could stand at our places of abode, but if the people fail (which I am afraid they will, because some go, some won’t, some mock, some plead religion and a great number of cowards), I shall think of mine and my family’s preservation and quit my place, if I can get none to stand by me to defend my own house. But I hope you will excuse this hurry, I have no clerk now, and had no rest these several days nor nights hardly.”

And two weeks afterward he addressed the following two letters to the Governor in reference to the murders committed upon the settlers in the county south of the Blue Mountain,— “Honored Sir: On my return from Philadelphia, I met in Amity township, Berks County, the first news of our cruel enemy having invaded the county this side of the Blue Mountains, to wit: Bethel and Tulpehocken. I left the papers as they were in the messenger’s hands and hastening to Reading, where the alarm and confusion was very great, I was obliged to stay that night and part of the next day, to wit: the 17th inst., and set out for Heidelberg, where I arrived that evening. Soon after my sons, Philip and Frederick, arrived from the pursuit of the Indians, and gave me the following relation: That on last Saturday, about four o’clock in the afternoon, as some men from Tulpehocken were going to Dietrich Six’s place, under the hills on the Shamokin road, to be on the watch appointed there, they were fired upon by the Indians but none hurt nor killed (our people were but six in number, the rest being behind), upon which our people ran towards the watch-house, which was one-half of a mile off, and the Indians pursued them, and killed and scalped several of them. A bold, stout Indian came up to one Christopher Ury, who turned about and shot the Indian right through his breast. The Indian dropped down dead, but was dragged out of the way by his own companions (he was found next day and scalped by our people). The Indians divided themselves into two parties. Some came this way, to meet the rest that were going to the watch, and killed some of them, so that six of our men were killed that day and a few wounded. The night following the enemy attacked the house of Thomas Brown, on the Swatara Creek. They came to the house in the dark night, and one of them put his fire-arm through the window and shot a shoemaker, that was at work, dead on the spot. The people being extremely surprised at this sudden attack, defended themselves by firing out of the windows at the Indians. The fire alarmed a neighbor who came with two or three more men. They fired by the way and made a great noise, scared the Indians away from Bower's house, after they had set fire to it, but by Thomas Bower's diligence and conduct it was timely put out again. So Thomas Bower, with his family, went off that night to his neighbor, Daniel Schneider, who came to his assistance. By eight o'clock parties came up from Tulpehocken and Heidelberg. The first party saw four Indians running off. They had some prisoners, whom they scalped immediately; three children they scalped yet alive, one died since and the other two are likely to do well. Another party found a woman just expired, with a male child on her side, both killed and scalped; the woman lay upon her face; my son Frederick turned her about, to see who she might have been, and to his and his companion's surprise they found a babe about fourteen days old under her, wrapped up in a little cushion, his nose quite flat, which was set right by Frederick, and life was yet in it and it recovered again. Our people came up with two parties of Indians that day, but they hardly got sight of them. The Indians ran off immediately. Either our people did not care to fight them, if they could avoid it, or (which is more likely), the Indians were alarmed first by the loud noise of our people's coming, because no order was observed. Upon the whole, there were fifteen of our people killed, including men, women and children, and the enemy not beat but scattered off. Several houses and barns are burned. I have no true account how many. We are in a dismal situation. Some of these murders have been committed in Tulpehocken township. The people left their plantations to within six or seven miles from the house. I am now busy putting things in order to defend my house against another attack. Guns and ammunition are very much wanted here. My sons have been obliged to part with most of that which was sent up, for the use of the Indians. I pray your Honor will be pleased, if it is in your power, to send us up a quantity upon any condition. I must stand my ground, or my neighbors will all go away and leave their habitations to be destroyed by the enemy or our own people. This is enough of such melancholy account for this time. I beg leave to conclude, who am, sir,

"Your very obedient,

"Conrad Weiser."

"Heidelberg, Berks County, November 19, 1755.

"P. S. — I am credibly informed just now that one Wolff, a single man, killed an Indian at the same time when Ury killed the other, but the body is not found yet. The poor young man since died of his wound through his belly."

"May it please the Governor: That night after my arrival from Philadelphia, Emanuel Carpenter and Simon Adam Kuhn, Esqrs., came to my house and lodged with me. They acquainted me that a meeting was appointed (of the people of Tulpehocken, Heidelberg and adjacent places,) in Tulpehocken township, at Benjamin Spicker's, early next morning. I made all the haste with the Indians I could, and gave them a letter to Thomas McKee, to furnish them with necessaries for their journey. Scourajade had no creature to ride on. I gave him one. Before I could get done with the Indians, three or four men came from Benjamin Spicker's to warn the Indians not to go that way, for the people were so enraged against all the Indians, and would kill them without distinction. I went with them, as also the gentlemen before named. When we came near Benjamin Spicker's I saw about four or five hundred men, and there was a loud noise. I rode before, and in riding along the road (and armed men on both sides of the road), I heard some say, Why must we be killed by the Indians and we not kill them? Why are our hands so tied? I got the Indians to the house with much ado, when I treated them with a small dram, and so parted with them in love and friendship.

"Captain Dieffenbach undertook to conduct them (with five other men,) to the Susquehanna. After this a sort of a council of war was held by the officers present, the gentlemen before named and other freeholders. It was agreed that 150 men should be raised immediately, to serve as out scouts, and as guards at certain places under the Kittatinny Hills for 40 days. That those so raised to have two shillings per day, and two pounds of bread, two pounds of beef and a gill of rum, and powder and lead. Arms they must find themselves. This scheme was signed by a good many freeholders and read to the people. They cried out that so much for an Indian scalp they would have (be they friends or enemies) from the Governor. I told them I had no such power from the Governor or assembly. They began, some to curse the Governor; some the assembly; called me a traitor to the country, who held with the Indians, and must have known this murder beforehand. I sat in the house at a low window. Some of my friends came to pull me away from it, telling me that some of the people threatened to shoot me. I offered to go out to the people and either pacify them or make the King's proclamation. But those in the house with me would not let me go out. The cry was: The land was betrayed and sold. The common people from Lancaster County were the worst. The wages, they said, were a trifle, and said somebody pocketed the rest, and they would resent it. Somebody has put it into their heads that I had it in my power to give as much as I pleased. I was in danger of being shot to death. In the meantime a great smoke arose under the Tulpehocken Mountain, with the news following that the Indians had committed murder on Mill Creek (a false alarm) and set fire to a barn. Most of the people ran, and those that had horses rode off without any order or regulation. I then took my horse and went home, where I intended to stay and defend my own house as long as I could. There is no doings with the people without a law or regulation by Governor and Assembly. The people of Tulpehocken have all fled; till about six or seven miles from me some few remain. Another such attack will lay all the country waste on the west side of the Schuylkill. I am, sir, "Your most obedient, "CONRAD WEISER.

Heidelberg, Berks County, Nov. 19, 1755.”

Spicker Letter.—Three days before these letters were addressed to the Governor, Conrad Weiser received the following letter from Peter Spicker (who resided on the Tulpehocken road, near the western boundary line of the county), detailing the great anxiety of the community in that vicinity, and the losses which the people suffered:

"TULPEHOCKEN, Nov. 16, 1755. "CONRAD WEISER, Esq.

"John Anspack and Frederick Read came to me and told me the miserable circumstances of the people murdered this side of the mountain yesterday. The Indians attacked the watch, killed and wounded him at Dietrich Six’s, and in that neighborhood a great many in that night. This morning our people went out to see; came about ten o’clock in the morning to Thomas Bower’s house, finding a man dead, killed with a gun-shot. Soon we heard a firing of guns; running to that place and found four Indians sitting on children scalping; three of the children are dead; two are alive; the scalps are taken off; hereafter we went to the watch-house of Dietrich Six, where the Indians first attacked, finding six dead bodies, four of them scalped; about a mile this side of the watch-house as we went back the Indians set fire to a stable and barn, where they burned the corn, cows and other creatures, where we found seven Indians, five in the house eating their dinner and drinking rum, which was in the house, and two outside the house; we fired to them but in vain; the Indians burned four plantations more than the above account told me. Peter Anspack, Jacob Caderman, Christopher Noacro, Leonard Walborn told me in the same manner; George Dollinger and Adam Dieffenbach sent me word in the same manner.

“Now we are in a great danger to lose our lives or estates, pray, therefore, for help, or else whole Tulpehocken will be ruined by the Indians in a short time, and all buildings will be burned down and the people scalped, therefore you will do all haste to get people together to assist us. The Assembly can see by this work how good and fine friends the Indians are to us, we hope their eyes will go open and their hearts ten-der to us, and the Governor’s the same. They are true subjects to our King George the Second, of Great Britain; or are willing to deliver us into the hands of these miserable creatures.

“I am your friend, "Peter Spicker.

“N.B.—The people are fled to us from the hills. Peter Kryger and John Weiser are the last.”

Report of Cruelties.—On the 24th of November, 1755, Conrad Weiser, Emanuel Carpenter and Adam Simon Ruhn subscribed and addressed a communication to the Governor, which set forth to him the result of their deliberations upon the “miserable condition of the back inhabitants of these parts,” and the means which should be adopted in order “to withstand our cruel Indian enemy.”

“First.—Since the last cruel murder committed by the enemy, most of the people of Tulpehocken have left their habitations; those in Heidelberg moved their effects; Bethol township is entirely deserted.

“Second.—There is no order among the people; one cries one thing, and another another thing. They want to force us to make a law, that they should have a reward for every Indian which they kill; they demand such a law of us, with their guns cocked, pointing it towards us.

“Third.—The people are so incensed, not only against our cruel enemy the Indians, but also (we beg leave to inform your Honor) against the Governor and Assembly, that we are afraid they will go down in a body to Philadelphia and commit the vilest outrages. They say they will rather be hanged than to be butchered by the Indians, as some of their neighbors have been lately, and the poverty that some are in is very great.

“Fourth.—Yesterday we sent out about seventy men to the mountain to take possession of several houses, and to range the woods along the mountain in Berks County, on the west side of Schuylkill. The same number are sent to the back part of Lancaster County, we promised them two shillings per day, two pounds of bread, two pounds of beef, and a gill of rum a day, and ammunition, and that for forty days, or till we shall receive your Honor’s order. We persuade ourselves your Honor will not leave us in the lurch; we must have such a thing done or else leave our habitations, if no worse; and all this would not do, we and others of the freeholders have been obliged to promise them a reward of four pistoles for every enemy Indian man that they should kill. Many things more we could mention, but we don’t care to trouble your Honor any farther.”

"I cannot forbear to acquaint your Honor of a certain circumstance of the late unhappy affair: One —— Kobel, with his wife and eight children, the eldest about fourteen years and the youngest fourteen days, was flying before the enemy, he carrying one, and his wife a boy, another of the children, when they were fired upon by two Indians very nigh, but hit only the man upon the breast, though not dangerously. They, the Indians, then came with their tomahawks, knocked the woman down, but not dead. They intended to kill the man, but his gun (though out of order, so that he could not fire) kept them off. The woman recovered so far, and seated herself upon a stump, with her babe in her arms, and gave it suck; and the Indians driving the children together, and spoke to them in high Dutch, be still, we won't hurt you. Then they struck a hatchet into the woman's head, and she fell upon her face with her babe under her, and the Indian trod on her neck and tore off the scalp. The children then ran: four of them were scalped, among which was a girl of eleven years of age, who related the whole story; of the scalped, two are alive and like to do well. The rest of the children ran into the bushes and the Indians after them, but our people coming near to them, hallowed and made a noise. The Indians ran and the rest of the children were saved. They ran within a yard by a woman that lay behind an old log, with two children; there were about seven or eight of the enemy."

The onward movement of the Indians and the terrifying reports of their barbarity excited the settlers to such a degree that the sections of the county near by and beyond the Blue Mountain became almost entirely deserted. Even the inhabitants of Reading, though they were a considerable body together, manifested much anxiety for their welfare. Conrad Weiser stated in a letter from Reading, dated 13th of December, 1755,—

"The people of this town and county are in very great consternation. Most of this town are but day-laborers, and owing money, are about to leave it, they have nothing at all wherewith to support their families. All trade is stopped, and they can get no employment, and unless the Government takes about thirty or forty of them into pay to guard this town, they must go off and the rest will think themselves unsafe to stay, and the back inhabitants will have no place of security left for their wives and children, when they are out either against their enemy, or taking care of their plantations and cattle, and when things should come to extremity."

The massacres by the Indians continuing month after month, the Governor visited Reading in the latter part of December, for the purpose of acquainting himself with the situation of the people, and, after an examination, he found that the policy of defense was not satisfactory, and that new measures had to be taken to subdue the Indians. Whilst at Reading he also consulted with the Executive Council and the commissioners in respect to a proper distribution of the regular troops which had arrived at Carlisle from New York. The Grenadiers were ordered to be quartered at Reading. Their rations were three pounds of pork, three pounds of beef, one pound of fish, ten and one-half pounds of bread or meal for a week, and one gill of rum per day.

Premium for Scalps.—In pursuance of this spirit of carrying on active measures against the Indians, the board of commissioners decided on the 9th of April, 1756, to recommend to the Governor that bounties, or premiums, be paid for prisoners and scalps,—

For every male Indian prisoner above ten years old, that shall be delivered at any of the government forts or towns............................................. $150
For every female Indian prisoner or male prisoner, of ten years old and under, delivered as above.................................................................................. 120
For the scalp of every male Indian above ten years old............................................................................................................. 120
For the scalp of every Indian woman............................................. 50

Probst Letter.—By the foregoing letters and others, it would seem that the Indians confined their invasions into the county beyond the Blue Mountain before 1756, to the west of the Schuylkill. But in the beginning of 1756 they reached the district along the mountain to the east of the river, and committed similar outrages upon the unprotected settlers. Valentine Probst, a resident of Albany township, addressed the following letter to Jacob Levan, (one of the justices of the county, who resided in Maxatawny township,) on the 15th of February, 1756, in which he mentions the horrible murders committed upon the Reichelderfer and Gerhard families:

"Mr. Levan—I cannot omit writing about the dreadful circumstances in our township, Albany. The Indians came yesterday morning about eight o'clock, to Frederick Reichelderfer's house, as he was feeding his horses, and two of the Indians ran upon him, and followed him into a field ten or twelve perches off; but he escaped and ran towards Jacob Gerhard's house, with a design to fetch some arms. When he came near Gerhard's he heard a lamentable cry, 'Lord Jesus! Lord Jesus!' which made him run back towards his own house; but before he got quite home, he saw his house and stable in flames, and heard the cattle bellowing, and thereupon ran away again.

"Two of his children were shot; one of them was found dead in his field, the other was found alive and brought to Hakenbrook's house, but died three hours after. All his grain and cattle are burned up. At Jacob Gerhart's they have killed one man, two women and six children. Two children slipped under the bed; one of which was burned; the other escaped, and ran a mile to get to the people. We desire help, or we must leave our homes."

Muhlenberg Letter.—The Rev. Henry Melchior Muhlenberg described this shocking affair as follows:

"In New Hanover (Mont. Co.) I had confirmed two grown daughters of Frederick Reichelsdorfer. This man subsequently bought a tract of forest land near the Blue Mountains, which he cultivated successfully, with much toil and great sacrifice, to enable him to support his family. But fearing the Indians, who scouted the region, sacking, burning and murdering, he removed his family back to New Hanover, whilst he journeyed to and fro to attend to his place. In the month of March, after he and his daughters had threshed out his wheat, on a Friday morning, they suddenly felt an uncomfortable presentiment of fear. Entering upon their evening devotions, they joined in singing the old hymn, 'Wer weiss wie nahe mir mein Ende.' Committing themselves to God, they retired. On the following Saturday morning, as the father had gone upon the open field to bring in his horses, and on the eve of starting for home, he was surrounded by Indians. From sudden fright, in view of his great peril, he could neither utter a cry, nor move a limb. As the savages were within twenty paces, he turned his thoughts to God, and was enabled to cry: 'Jesus! I live by Thee! Jesus! I die in Thee!'

In the moment of this exclamation, he felt himself at once endowed with superhuman energy, in virtue of which he turned, became swift-footed as a deer, and winged, like the ostrich. He escaped from their sight and reached his home; but, alas! his hut lay in ashes; the cattle were bellowing in a sheet of flame, his eldest daughter lay a crisp, and the younger, partly alive, scalped and horribly mutilated, had barely strength to relate the harrowing circumstances, and to impress a dying kiss upon the distracted brow of her father, bending over her."

Gerhart Murder.—The Gerhart murder was committed on a farm in the extreme northwestern section of Albany township, owned by George Bolich. A house was immediately afterward built on the spot where the original house stood. It was torn down by Mr. Bolich, who erected a handsome dwelling in its stead. The traditional account of the murder, one hundred and twenty years after it occurred, as given by Mr. Bolich, was as follows:

"While the whole family was in the house, quietly enjoying the comforts of a rural home in the wilderness of Albany in the month of February, an unusual noise was heard in the vicinity of the house. Nothing was known of the presence of the Indians or of any other person, until they heard a suspicious noise which excited their fears at once that a sad fate was awaiting them. Mr. Gerhart, solicits about the safety of his beloved family, opened the door and peeped out, but saw no one. He quietly stepped outside of the door to make a closer inspection of his premises, when a concealed Indian shot him and he fell dead at the door. The women dragged Mr. Gerhart into the house. The Indians knowing that the head of the family was killed, had less to fear, approached the house and set it on fire. The women and children knew that a horrible death was staring them in the face—that they must either be burned alive, or leave the house and submit to a death fully as revolting. They chose the first alternative. A boy of about twelve years of age, whose hair had already been burned off his head, and had seen suffering among his mother, little brothers and sisters, which no pen or human tongue can portray, jumped out of a window on a side of the house opposite the Indians. He ran to a family over a small hill south of this place to give the alarm, but when assistance came the house was consumed by the flames and the Indians had made their escape."1

This occurrence naturally alarmed the neighborhood and many of the settlers moved away to places where they could feel secure in the enjoyment of life and property. A letter dated 24th of March, 1756, describes the fatal consequences to a party in an attempt at removing:

"Ten wagons went up to Allemaengel to bring down a family with their effects; and as they were returning, about three miles below George Ziesloff's, were fired upon by a number of Indians from both sides of the roads, upon which the wagoneers left their wagons and ran into the woods, and the horses frightened at the firing and the terrible yelling of the Indian, ran down the hill and broke one of the wagons to pieces. The enemy killed George Ziesloff and his wife, a lad of twenty, a boy of twelve, also a girl of fourteen years old, four of whom they scalped. Another girl was shot in the neck and through the mouth and scalped, notwithstanding all this she got off. A boy was stabbed in three places, but the wounds were not thought to be mortal. They killed two of the horses and five are missing, with which it is thought the Indians carried off the most valuable goods that were in the wagons.”

In March, 1756, the Indians burned the house and barn of Barnabas Seitel and the mill of Peter Conrad, killed Balser Neytong’s wife and took a son eight years of age captive. Captain Morgan sent seven men in pursuit; but they failed to overtake the Indians.

Kluck Murder.—On the 24th of March, the house of Peter Kluck (about fourteen miles from Reading) was set on fire by the savages, and the whole family killed; while the flames were still ascending, the Indians assaulted the house of one Linderman, in which there were two men and a woman, all of whom ran upstairs, where the woman was shot dead through the roof. The men then ran out of the house to engage the Indians, when Linderman was shot in the neck and the other through the jacket. Upon this, Linderman ran towards the Indians, two of whom only were seen, and shot one of them in the back, when he fled, and he and his companion scalped him and brought away his gun and knife.

The report of the several preceding massacres is not definite with regard to the locality; but it is probable that they occurred within the limits of Albany township.

At the same time! the Indians carried off a young lad, named John Shoep, about nine years old, whom they took by night seven miles beyond the Blue Mountain; but where, according to the lad, the Indians kindled a fire, tied him to a tree, and took off his shoes and put moccasins on his feet; that they prepared themselves some mush, but gave him none. After supper they marched on further. The same Indians took him and another lad between them, and went beyond the second mountain; having gone six times through streams of water, and always carried him across. The second evening they again struck up fire, took off his moccasins, and gave him a blanket to cover himself; but at midnight, when all the Indians were fast asleep, he made his escape, and at daybreak had traveled about six miles. He passed on that day, sometimes wading streams neck deep, in the direction of the Blue Mountain; that night he stayed in the woods. The next day, exhausted and hungry, he arrived by noon at Uly Meyer’s plantation, where Charles Folk’s company lay, who wished him to remain till he had regained strength, and they would conduct him to his father. He was accordingly sent home.

The eastern part of the county was disturbed only once by the Indians during the French and Indian War. They would not, in their invasions, go any distance into a country settled by the white people where it was possible to intercept their retreat. In March, 1756, they ventured as far south as Hereford. On the 22d of that month (March) one John Krausher and his wife, and William Yeth and his boy about twelve years old, went to their place to find their cattle, and on their return were fired upon by five Indians, who had hid themselves about ten perches from the road, when Yeth was mortally wounded in the back; Krausher’s wife was found dead and scalped, and had three cuts in her right arm with a tomahawk. Krausher made his escape, and the boy was carried off by the enemy.

Indian Treaty.—During the war, messengers were sent by the Governor to the chiefs of the Indians, and the Indians sent representatives of their tribes to Philadelphia or some place midway between Philadelphia and the council fires of the Indians. One of the most important treaties was held at Easton in the latter part of July, 1756. Teedyuscung, with fourteen other chiefs, was present. He said he was an ambassador appointed by ten nations, and authorized to treat with the Governor of Pennsylvania. In attempting to palliate the breach of former treaties and the numerous massacres of settlers upon lands bought of them, he assured the Governor that the “present clouds” owed their origin to the custom of their ancestors from having a “multitude of kings.” He made strong professions of friendship, de-explored the hostile feelings between the white people and the Indians, and said that all the harm inflicted upon the white people was committed by the French Indians who lived on the Ohio. After faring well for a week at the expense of the government, and receiving a large quantity of presents, the chiefs took "some of that good tobacco that the Six Nations put into our pipe," and all parties smoked the pipe in turn; and, according to their custom, a lasting peace and friendship was to be maintained. But the fumes of "that good tobacco" had scarcely disappeared when the Indians again fell upon the settlers of Berks County, burned their buildings and cattle, lurked behind the thickets and shot men at work in their fields, scalped women and children alive and captured others, many of whom were subjected to great hardships and cruel sufferings.\(^1\)

Two Women Scalped.—Three months afterward, Conrad Weiser addressed the following letter (dated at Heidelberg, 19th of October, 1756,) to Governor Denny:

> "HONORED SIR: Last night about 10 o'clock I received the melancholy news that the enemy Indians had again made an invasion in Berks county, and killed and scalped two married women and a lad of fourteen years of age, and wounded two children of about four years old, and carried off two more; one of the wounded is scalped and like to die, and the other has two cuts on her forehead, given her by an Indian boy in order to scalp her, but did not; there being eight men of Fort Henry posted in two different neighbors' houses about one and a half miles off, when they heard the noise of the guns firing they made towards it but came too late.

> "The people are moving away, leaving their barns full of grain behind them; and there is a lamentable cry among them. It is with submission a very hard case that so many men are taken away to protect Shamokin (a wilderness) and the inhabited part be without it. I have ordered eighteen men out of the town guard of Reading to re-enforce Fort Henry immediately, of which I hope your honor will approve. . . ."

Culmore and Fell Murder.—On the 4th of November, 1756, Jacob Morgan, the commander at Fort Lebanon, addressed the following letter to the Governor in reference to outrages committed in Albany township:

> "Yesterday morning at break of day one of the neighbors discovered a fire at a distance from him; he went to the top of another mountain to take a better observation, and made a full discovery of the fire, and supposed it to be about seven miles off, at the house of John Fincher; he came and informed me of it; I immediately detached a party of ten men (we being about 22 men in the fort) to the place where they saw the fire, at the said Fincher's house, it being nigh Schuylkill, and the men anxious to see the enemy, if there, they ran through the water and the bushes to the fire, where to their disappointment they saw none of them, but the house, barn, and other out-houses all in flames, together with a considerable amount of corn; they saw a great many tracks and followed them, and came back to the house of Philip Culmore, thinking to send from thence to alarm the other inhabitants to be on their guard, but instead of that found the said Culmore's wife and daughter and son-in-law all just killed and scalped; there is likewise missing out of the same house Martin Fell's wife and child about one year old, and another boy about seven years of age, the said Martin Fell was he that was killed, it was just done when the scouts came there, and they seeing the scouts ran off. The scouts divided in two parties, one to some other houses nigh at hand, and the other to the fort (it being within a mile of the fort) to inform me. I immediately went out with the scout again (and left in the fort no more than six men), but could not make any discovery, but brought all the families to the fort, where now I believe there are upward of sixty women and children that are fled here for refuge."\(^2\)

Ten Women and Children Rescued.—On the 14th of the same month, Lieutenant Samuel Humphreys, who was stationed at the fort above Northkill, wrote to Conrad Weiser as follows:

> "May it please the Colonel:—Yesterday we were alarmed by a number of Indians who came and took a child away. Immediately upon hearing the news, I, with nine men, went in pursuit of them, leaving a number of farmers to guard the fort till we should return. But we found nothing till this morning, we went out again; and, in our return to the fort, we were apprized of them by the firing of several guns; when I ordered my men to make what speed they could. We ran till we were almost out of breath, and, upon finding Nicholas Long's house attacked by the Indians, the farmers who were with us to the number of twenty, deserted and fled, leaving the soldiers to fight. We stood in battle with them for several minutes till there were about sixty guns discharged, and at length we put the Indians to flight.

2. Pa. Arch. 30. Subsequently, in September, 1768, Fincher and his family were murdered by the Indians.
"We have one man wounded, and my coat was shot through in four places. The number of the Indians was twenty. Our number at first was twenty-four. But they all deserted and fled except seven. Two old men were killed before we came, one of whom was scalped. Ten women and children were in the cellar and the house was on fire; but we extinguished it and brought the women and children to the fort. I desire the Colonel to send me a reinforcement, for the men solemnly say they will not go out with the farmers, as they deserted in the battle and never fired a gun. The Indians cried the hallow during the battle. We have one of their guns and a blanket which had two holes with a bullet in it, and is bloody. The Indians had all red hats and red blankets."

Girl Taken Captive.—A letter was addressed to the Governor from Bethlehem, on the 30th of November following, stating the commission of another murder in Albany township:

"John Holder came here this evening from Alleman and informed me that last Sunday evening, the 28th instant, three Indians came to the house of a certain man named Schlosser and knocked at the door; the people within called who is there. Answer was made, a good friend; they within not opening the door, they knocked again; they within asked who is there; no answer being made from without, then one of the men named Stonebrook looked out of the window, when an Indian discharged a gun and killed him on the spot. They then opened the door, the woman and two children endeavored to escape, and the Indians pursued and took both the children. One of the men fired at the Indians and saw one of them fall, when one of the girls he had possession of made her escape from him, but the other they took away. The Indian that was fired at fell, cried out very much, but in a short time he got up and made off."

About this time the Indians also appeared in this township and carried off the wife and three children of Adam Burns. The youngest child was only four weeks old.

Petition for Fort.—At a meeting of the Executive Council, held on the 7th of May, 1757, a petition, addressed to the Lieutenant-Governor, was read, setting forth,—

"That your petitioners are informed that Fort Franklin is to be removed to this side of the Blue Mountains, and a considerable way into Albany township.

"That, if in case the said Fort is to be removed, your petitioners will be obliged to desert their plantations, for their lives and Estates will then lay at stake, and a great part of this province will lay waste, and your petitioners will become a burden to the other inhabitants."

"That your petitioners humbly conceive that it would be the safest way to have the said Fort continued and rebuilt, as it is very much out of order and repair."

"Therefore your petitioners humbly pray your Honor to take the premises into consideration and issue such orders as will prevent the removal of the said Fort, and order a sufficient number of men in it, and to grant your petitioners such other relief as to you in your wisdom shall deem meet."

"This petition was signed by George Gilbert and Adam Spittlemeyer, at the request and in behalf of the following persons, 'all inhabitants of Berks County, within four miles of and about Fort Franklin over the Blue Mountains':

Adam Spittlemeyer. Anthony Krum.
Casper Langeberger. Jacob Kein.
Nicholas Kind. John Frist.
George Merte. William Gable.
Henry Norbeck. Philip Kirebaum.
Widow of Mark Grist John Wissember.
(deceased). George Wartman.
Widow of Geo. Krammer Jacob Richards.
(deceased). Christopher Sprecher.
William Ball. John Scheefer.
Philip Annes. George Sprecher."

Peter Gersinger was shot and scalped about the middle of June, 1757, while plowing in a field. The place of this murder is not named, but the report of it seems to indicate Bethlehem township.

Trump Murder.—James Read, Esq., addressed the following letter from Reading on the 25th of June, 1757:

"Last night Jacob Levan, Esq., of Maxataway, came to see me, and showed me a letter of the 22d inst., from Lieutenant Engel, dated in Alleman, by which he advised Mr. Levan of the murder of one Adam Trump, in Alleman, by Indians that evening, and that they had taken Trump's wife and his son, a lad of nineteen years old, prisoners; but the woman escaped, though upon her flying she was so closely pursued by one of the Indians (of which there were seven) that he threw his tomahawk at her, and cut her badly in the neck, but 'tis hoped not dangerously. This murder happened in as great a thunder-storm as has happened for twenty years past; which extended itself over a great part of this and Northampton Counties—for I found much mischief done, as I came from Easton, Northampton County, to this town, the length of fifty-two miles—the day before yesterday, and which I hear has broken down the dams of seven forges and six grist-mills on Maxatawney Creek, chiefly in this county, the rest in Philadelphia County.

"Mr. Levan told me that at the same time that the Indians did the mischief in Allemangel, another party killed and scalped a man near Fort Henry, in this county, and the next day carried off a young woman from the same neighborhood. I am told too—though I cannot tell what credit is to be given to it—that two persons were killed and scalped near the Fort at Northkill, in this county, Wednesday evening last, at the time of the thunderstorm.

"I had almost forgot to mention (for I am so hurried just now, 'tis no wonder) that the Indians, after scalping Adam Trump, left a knife and a halbert, or a spear, fixed to a pole of four feet, in his body."

In a letter from Tulpehocken, dated 4th of July, 1757, to the Pennsylvania Gazette, it was stated,—

"If we get no assistance from the county all the inhabitants of Tulpehocken will move away. The county should rise and send a large body to drive the Indians off, and keep a strong guard in the houses on the frontiers besides the soldiers, or all will be lost."

On the 4th of July, 1757, two Indians were seen near Reading.

SEVEN PERSONS MURDERED.—On July 5, 1757, "seven persons (three men and four children), who had been murdered and scalped all in one house, were brought to our burying-ground for burial. They were killed by the Indians yesterday, about sun-down, five miles from here." This was at Tulpehocken church.¹

MOTHER'S DEFENSE OF CHILDREN.—The following extract is taken from a letter dated at Heidelberg, on 9th of July, 1757:

"Yesterday, about three o'clock in the afternoon, between Valentine Herchelroad's and Tobias Bickel's, four Indians killed two children—one about four years old and the other five. They at the same time scalped a young woman of about sixteen, who, with proper care, is likely to live and do well. A woman was terribly cut with the tomahawk; but she was not scalped—her life is despaired of. Three children were carried off prisoners. Christian Schrenk's wife—who was among the party—bravely defended herself and her children for a while. During an assault upon her, she wrested the gun out of the Indian's hands, and also his tomahawk and threw them away; and in the meantime, whilst saving her own life, two of her children were taken captive. In this house there were also twenty women and children who had fled thither from their own habitations to take shelter. The men belonging to them were distant about one-half a mile, engaged in picking cherries. They came as quickly as possible and went in pursuit of the Indians, but to no purpose, for the Indians had concealed themselves."

APPEAL FOR AID.—It would seem that assistance was asked generally from the people of the province by the inhabitants of Tulpehocken township during their terrible sufferings and losses. A notice to this effect was advertised in the German newspaper, published at Germantown by Christopher Sauer, in July, 1757. It was as follows (being translated from the German):

"The distant inhabitants of Tulpehocken would pray for assistance to enable them to give more attention to their security, inasmuch as the forts lay so far from one another, and the persons therein do little service. Whoever may be willing to give anything, can inform Reverends Otterbein and Goreck, Lutheran ministers in Lancaster; Revs. Muhlenberg and Leydig, at New Hanover and Providence; Dr. Abraham Wagner in Modetsbe; Mr. Michael Reyer, in Goshenhoppen; Christopher Sauer, Sr., at Germantown; and Rev. Handschuh, in Philadelphia, and write also how much they may have given. And these persons can forward the same to Col. Conrad Weiser or Peter Spycker, or Rev. Kurtz, as each may be pleased to do. FOUR KILLED AND SIX SCALPED.—A letter from a place in Lynn township (now included in Greenwich) reported the following cruelties:

"Adam Klaus and his neighbors were surprised by a party of Indians on the 9th of July, whilst they were engaged in reaping rye; two men, two women and a young girl escaped; Martin Jaeger and his wife were killed and scalped; John Kraushaar's wife and child, Abraham Secker's wife and one of Adam Clauss's children were scalped, but they still lived, though badly wounded; one of the women is wounded in the side and the other in the hip; two of Kraushaar's children were killed, and one of Secker's and one of Philip Eschton's, but these were not scalped. The alarm being raised, a party went in pursuit of them, and, overtaking nine, fired upon them. But they soon eluded the pursuit of the whites."

Conrad Weiser, whilst at Easton for the purpose of conferring with the Indians, detailed the circumstances connected with a murder of ten people, in a letter to the Governor on the 15th of July, 1757:

"In coming along through Maxstawn I heard a melancholy account of ten people being killed by the enemy Indians. They passed by two or three plantations on this side of the mountain before they attacked. A certain woman ran off towards her place and told her husband of the attack, who cut the gears off his horses then in the plow, and rode as fast as he could to Lieut. Wetherholt, about three miles off. Lieut. Wetherholt, with a small detachment, I am told seven in number, came away immediately, and came to the place where the murder was committed, where by that time a number of people had gathered. Wetherholt proposed to pursue the enemy, but none would go with him, so he took his seven men and pursued the enemy a few miles from the house and found the place where they rested themselves, and in about three miles he overtook them in thick bushes, at a very little distance. It seems they saw one another at once. One of the Indians was beforehand with Wetherholt and aimed at him, but his gun flashed. Wetherholt, a moment after, fired at the Indian, and thinks he hit him, but is not sure. Several guns were fired by our people, but did no execution, and the Indians' guns missing fire, they ran off and left two horses behind them, one belonging to the man they killed, laden with the best of his household goods."

Morgan Journal.—A monthly journal, kept by Jacob Morgan, for the month of July, 1757, indicates that considerable vigilance was exercised in this vicinity, and yet the outrages just mentioned were committed by the Indians. The journal records the following circumstances:

"July the 1st.—Sent a corporal with 11 men on a scout to Clingaman Hausabough's, at Allemingle, who staid all night.

"2nd.—The scout returned from Allemingle and reported that they had made no discovery of the enemy.

"3d.—Sent a party to range to Allemingle.

"4th.—Our men returned from Allemingle and reported that some of the inhabitants, who were afraid near the mountain, were removing downwards.

"6th, 6th and 7th.—Was exceeding heavy rain and waters very high.

"8th.—Being a day of humiliation we applied ourselves thereto.

"9th.—Rainy weather, we could not scout.

"10th.—I sent out a party to range to Allemingle. This day Sergeant Matthews returned from Colonel Weisler's with orders for me to station 10 men in Windsor township, and to keep 10 men in readiness to go to Easton.

"11th.—The scout returned. I prepared the men in readiness according to orders; and sent some men to guard the farmers in their harvest.

"12th.—I went with ten men to Windsor township and stationed them there, where I found the most proper. In the evening very heavy rain and thunder, obliged me to stay all night; we sent some parties to guard the farmers.

"13th.—I returned in the morning to the fort. . . . Parties went to guard the farmers, and this day in my return I met the scout which I had posted in Windsor township, ranging about the farmers' houses.

"14th.—Parties ranged and guarded the farmers.

"15th.—Being all day heavy rain, and the creeks so high that the Schuykill rose perpendicularly fifteen feet in nine hours' time, being considerably higher than ever was known in these parts; the guards could not return, and we remained in the fort with only eight men to guard."

During the remainder of July soldiers were sent out daily to guard the farmers in their agricultural work, but no Indians came to molest them.

On the 27th of July, 1757, James Read, Esq., at Reading, wrote to the Governor stating that white men had appeared in Bern township and were co-operating with the Indians. His account is as follows:

"It is with great uneasiness I must inform your honor that the day before yesterday four white men took away from a plantation in Bern township, about thirteen miles from this town, one — Good (I think that is the surname), a lad about sixteen years old, and carried him to four Indians about eight miles from the place where he was taken. The white men and Indians all got very drunk, and the lad happily made his escape in the night. Of his being taken I heard the evening it happened; of the rest I was informed by Robert Smith, a sergeant, who came yesterday from Fort William (Lebanon), and on his road was told by one Peter Rodermel, a farmer of very good credit, who had seen and conversed with the lad. Monday, in the afternoon, an Indian was seen near Sinking Spring, five miles from the town, by Peter Rood, a person of as high credit as is in the county. Some of the inhabitants went immediately in pursuit of the Indian, but returned without having overtaken him. I have taken care ever since the 9th of this month to keep a patrol of ten of the inhabitants every night about this town; and, as our people are very uneasy upon hearing that white men are among the Indians, we propose to have a guard tonight of twenty-one,—seven at either end of the town and seven in the centre,—who will keep out a patrol all night. In this service I am cheerfully assisted by Mr. Seely and Mr. Biddle. We hope our very dangerous condition will be considered and some measures will be taken for our security. . . . I am sorry to have occasion to assure you that if our defense be committed to the soldiers now in these parts, our people will be still as uneasy as they are now.”

By the latter statement it would appear that the soldiers were not thoroughly patriotic, having doubtless done something to sacrifice the confidence of the people. There is no published information on the subject. Read added in his letter that he would not then assign reasons, though he might “some time next week acquaint him with the principal grounds of their objection to such a protection.”

In August, 1757, fifty men from Cumru and other townships near Reading set out in expectation of bringing in some Indian scalps.

ALARMING CONDITION OF PEOPLE.—The following earnest, pathetic letter was addressed by Conrad Weiser from his home in Heidelberg on the 4th of October, 1757, to the Governor’s secretary. It narrates the alarming condition of the people at that time, showing that the Indians were still active in their cruelties, notwithstanding treaties or the protection afforded by forts and scouting-parties:

“Sir:—I did not think of the post till he entered my door, else I would have written particularly to the Governor, though I have been very busy with writing to the commanding officers of the several forts under my care. It is now come so far that murder is committed almost every day; there never was such a consternation among the people; they must now leave their houses again, with their barns full of grain; five children were carried off last Friday; some days before a sick man was killed upon his bed; he begged of the enemy to shoot him through his heart, which the Indian answered, I will, and did so. A girl that had hid herself under a bedstead in the next room heard all this; two more families were about that time destroyed. Inclosed is the journal of last month of my ensign at Northkill. Captain Busse lies dangerously sick at John Harris’. I hear he is tired of everything. I have neither men nor a sufficient number of officers to defend the country. If his honor would be pleased to send orders to recall all the men belonging to my battalion from Fort Augusta he would justly bring upon him the blessings of the Most High. I cannot say any more. I think myself unhappy; to fly with my family in this time of danger I can’t do. I must stay if they all go. I am now preparing to go to Fort Henry, where I shall meet some officers to consult with what may be best to be done. I have ordered ten men, with the Governor’s last order, to Fort Augusta; I shall overtake them this evening at Fort Henry and give them proper instruction. For God’s sake, dear sir, beg of the Governor, press it upon him in my behalf, and in behalf of these distressed inhabitants, to order my men back from Fort Augusta. I will give my reason afterwards that I am in the right. I conclude with my humble respects to his honor.”

PETITION FOR SOLDIERS.—In March, 1758, Conrad Weiser forwarded to the Lieutenant-Governor a petition subscribed (in German) by a number of the inhabitants of Bern township, with the recommendation that they be favored with soldiers, to be stationed for their defense in some of the most exposed farm-houses. The petition set forth—

“That from the beginning of the Indian incursions into this province, the neighborhood wherein your petitioners live hath been frequently harassed by the enemy, and numbers of their neighbors cruelly murdered, others captivated, and many of your petitioners obliged to fly from their dwellings to avoid the same unhappy fate, to their unspeakable terror and distress. That during this winter the severity of the weather had prevented those barbarians from committing their wonted cruelties; but, as the snow is now melting and the weather is growing fair, your petitioners are every moment dreading an attack from the enemy, and find themselves less secure than heretofore from their attempts, as the block-house at Northkill is destroyed and no garrison kept in those parts.

‘Your petitioners, in the deepest distress, implore your honor’s protection, and most earnestly beg that they may not be left a prey to the savage enemy, protesting that, without assistance from the public, they are utterly unable to defend themselves, and must, on the first attack, abandon their habitations and rather embrace the most extreme poverty than remain subject to the merciless rage of those bloody murderers. And that they have the greatest reason to expect an attack is obvious from the many former successful attempts of the enemy—three or four Indian-paths leading into their neighborhood.”

In the following month, (April, 1758,) the people of Reading were likewise alarmed, and they, too, sent a petition to the Governor, setting forth their dangerous situation and praying for assistance. The Governor, in pursuance of its earnest representations, said, in a message to the Assembly on the 27th of April, 1758: “We have just received a petition from the distressed inhabitants of the town of Reading; their unhappy situation seems to be more easily conceived than described, occasioned by the want of a due exertion of the military force in that quarter." He therefore entreated the Assembly to order provincial forces to be sent to their immediate relief. Their prayer was granted and a hundred men were sent.

LIEBENGUTH MURDER.—About this time the Indians again divided themselves into small parties and surprised the settlers unawares. At Tulpahocken they killed and scalped a man by the name of Liebenguth and his wife; and at Northkill they killed and scalped Nicholas Geiger's wife and two children and Michael Ditzeler's wife.

The following correspondence in German is added, relative to the murders just mentioned: 1

"Wichtige Nachrichten aus Sauer's 'Pensylvanische Nachrichten,' von dato isten April 1758.

"Am vernichten Montag sind abermahl bei zwanzig ganz fremde Indianer zu Bethelehem angekommen, welche auch willens sind mit den Englischem in Frieden und Freundschaft zu leben. Wie man versteht hat sie der Tidusking's Söhne herednet zum Frieden, und haben sie mitgebracht. Sie mel- den auch, dass der Tidusking sei angeagt werden dass der so sehr berühnte Indianer Captain Schingas auch kommen wollte, und wieder mit den Englischem in Fried und Freundschaft leben. Darauf habe Tidusking fuer Freiden einen hohen Luft-Sprung gethan, welches er kaum vermutet hat.

"Und also dörften die Forsten an der Grenze mit ihren Garisionen von wenig Nutzen sein, und viele von unserm Landes-Leuten aus ihrer Gefangenschaft losz und wieder heim kommen.

out. I suppose, according to the tracks, that there are about twenty in the country. I believe that our very good allies at Wyoming have done this service to us, as all the tracks over the mountains come from the east.

"The farmers of Tulpehocken have brought up some men toward the Hole, and desired me to join them with a part of the garrison, whereupon I have sent them a sergeant with eight men."

A letter from the same place about the same time mentions that the wife of John Frantz and three children were carried off by the Indians, and that the woman was murdered a little way from Frantz's house, she having been weakly and not able to travel. Also, that the son of Jacob Snavely, a shoemaker, was killed and scalped about the same time. From the tracks of the enemy, their number was supposed to be about twenty. (Penna. Gazette, June 29, 1758).

"The Indians burnt a house on the Swatara and killed one man. Three men are missing. Two boys were found tied to a tree and released. We are alarmed in the fort almost every night by a terrible barking of dogs; there are certainly some Indians about us."¹

After General Forbes had taken possession of Fort du Quesne, 25th of November, 1758, many of the soldiers were marched to and quartered at Lancaster and Reading. They were quartered among the inhabitants, and their conduct caused grievous complaints. To remedy the evils, the Assembly caused a barracks to be erected at Lancaster, in 1759, large enough to accommodate five hundred men.

HORSES STOLEN.—In the middle of September, 1759, three Delaware Indians were hunting near Tulpehocken, and whilst there stole six horses. The owners pursued them as far as Fort Augusta and there informed Major Orndt of their loss. Upon making inquiry the major discovered the thieves. In their confession they expressed themselves sarcastically that when any of their property was taken very little was said about it, but when they took a few horses a great noise was made. An order was given that they restore the horses to the owners; but they went away without compliance.

the terrible excitement which prevailed in the county during the years 1755, 1756, 1757 and 1758, there would seem to have been no invasions or losses in life and property worthy of mention. No letters have as yet come to light indicating that the Indians had been on this side of the Blue Mountain. But, whilst all was quiet with the settlers along the frontier, and they were busily and hopefully carrying on their daily labor on their farms and in their shops, how they must have been shocked by a sudden invasion over the mountain and into Albany township during the month of September, 1763, when a party of Indians fell upon and murdered John Fincher and his family, and this, too, within a mile from the place where a small body of soldiers were stationed under the command of Ensign Shaffer! The following letter from Jonas Seely (one of the justices of the county), at Sinking Spring, dated 10th of September, 1763, communicated the sad intelligence to the Governor, John Penn:

"HONORED STR: I am sorry I have to acquaint your honor of the following melancholy account which I received from Captain Kern last night: On the eighth instant a party of Indians came to the house of one John Fincher, about three-quarters of a mile distant from Captain Kern's men, commanded by Ensign Shaffer; they killed Fincher, his wife and two of his sons, his daughter is missing; one little boy made his escape from the savages and came to the ensign, who immediately went to the place with his party. But the Indians were gone, and finding by their tracks which way they went, pursued them to the house of one Nicholas Miller, where he found four children murdered; our party still pursued, and soon came up with the enemy and fired on them. They returned the fire, but the soldiers rushed on them so furiously that they soon ran off and left behind them two prisoners, two tomahawks, one hanger and a saddle; the Indians were eight in number, and our party seven; three of the enemy were much wounded. The two prisoners that our party recovered were two of said Miller's children that they had tied together and so drove them along. Miller's wife is missing; in all there are eight killed and two missing in that neighborhood."

And on the following day he addressed another letter (then at Reading) to the Governor, relating to an attack upon Frantz Hubler's house, in Bern township—the premises being now in Upper Bern. It was as follows:

“HONORED SIR: This moment, at Reading, as I was sending off the express, certain intelligence came that the house of Frantz Hubler, in Bern township about 18 miles from here, was attacked Friday evening last by the Indians; himself is wounded, his wife and three children carried off, and three other of his children scalped alive, two of whom are since dead.”

SMALL-POX.—During November, 1763, the small-pox prevailed at Fort Augusta. James Burd, stationed there, informed the Governor that volunteer parties had brought the disease there, and that sundry of the soldiers were down with it; that a great number of the men never had it, and he expected all would be infected; and having no medicine, Nature would have to effect a cure.

THREE MEN KILLED.—On the 25th of November, 1763, Jonas Seely addressed a third letter to the Governor, in which he stated that three men were murdered by the Indians on the north side of the mountain, in the forks of the Schuylkill, about twenty-two miles from Reading. These men were on their way returning to a plantation, which they had deserted. Captain Kern, immediately after hearing of the murder, marched in pursuit of the enemy for two days, but, a very heavy snow having fallen and the Indians having fled a considerable distance, he desisted from further pursuit upon reaching the place where the murder had been committed. This is supposed to have been the last murder committed in the county.

PEACE DECLARED.—After the French had receded into Canada before the advancing army of English soldiers, the Indians naturally followed their allies. Hence the cruelties here ceased after 1758. And when Canada was surrendered in 1760, the peace and safety of our community were assured. The declaration of peace was delayed for three years. When it was published in 1763, only a few Indians remained in the eastern section of Pennsylvania. A small settlement of them, who were friendly to the government and the inhabitants, remained at Shamokin; and some families were scattered in different parts of the county, where they remained for many years afterward.

Before the war considerable trade had been carried on successfully between the settlers and the Indians, continuing indeed without inter-ruptation from the time of the first settlement till 1744, and even a decade afterward. The relations had become so pleasant and firm that certain Indians remained in the county unmolested during the war, and carried on their peaceful vocations, such as basket-making, beadwork, etc.; and after the war traveling parties of them frequently visited the county and sold articles of their handiwork.

During the French and Indian War the Indians killed about one hundred and fifty, and captured thirty inhabitants of the county. Several of those who were taken captive returned after the war. But, strange to say, during these eight years, only four of the Indians were killed in the county. We may well ask what enabled the Indians to be so successful in their warfare against the colonial government. The protection afforded by the government was wholly inadequate. The forts were too few in number for the one hundred and forty miles of frontier which they were designed to protect; they were too far apart to render assistance to fleeing, terror-stricken people when danger was upon them. But the Indians were cunning, fleet and enduring. They approached settlements stealthily, committed outrages, arson and murder, and then departed speedily. They were always in small parties of three, four or six. Being thoroughly acquainted with the mountains, they were enabled to escape pursuit by various routes.

PERSONS MURDERED, TAKEN PRISONERS AND MISSING.—The following persons were murdered by the Indians in the county during the “French and Indian War,” the number being about one hundred and fifty. The exact number cannot be stated, because in four instances a man and his family were killed—but the number was not mentioned in the report. Twenty-seven persons were taken prisoners and eight were reported as missing. Many persons were wounded, some of whom doubtless died from their wounds:

October, 1756.—Two married women and two boys, Bethel.

Possibly these two and the two immediately before are the same.

1 Near by an Indian was found dead and scalped—of Delaware tribe—scalped by Frederick Weiser. Another was shot and scalped several weeks afterward.

2 Supposed to have been soldiers.

3 Two others also scalped, who doubtless recovered.

4 Under this woman her babe only fourteen days old was found. It was alive, wrapped up in a little cushion.

5 Four of their children were scalped at the same time. They had eight children with them. Two probably died. The father was wounded.

6 All killed at house of Jacob Gerhart, situate in the upper section of the township, commonly known as the ‘Eck’ (corner). Eight of them were burned.

7 One of them reported as likely to die from scalping.

November, 1756.—Wife, daughter and sou-in-law of Philip Culmore, Albany.
November, 1756.—Martin Fell, Albany.
November, 1756.—Two old men, Bethel.

June, 1758.—Son of John Snabele, Tulpehocken.
October, 1758.—A man, Bethel.
September, 1763.—John Fincher, wife and two sons, Albany.
September, 1763.—Four children at house of Nicholas Miller, Albany.
September, 1763.—Two children of Franz Hubler, Bern.
November, 1763.—Three men near forks of Schuykill.

9 Ten women and children were rescued at this place from the cellar of a burning building.

10 Found with a knife and a spear (fixed to a pole four feet long) in his body.

11 All murdered and scalped in one house.

12 John Krausser’s wife and child, Abraham Sechler’s wife, and a child of Adam Clause were scalped at the same time and badly wounded.

13 Alluded to in Weiser’s letter. Probably he referred to party killed in Greenwich.

14 No number mentioned.

15 Two of Miller’s children were prisoners, but were rescued. When rescued they were tied together, in which manner they had been driven along.

16 These are supposed to have been the last persons killed by the Indians at this time. But during the Revolutionary War, in August, 1780, John Negman and his two young children were cruelly murdered by the Indians thirty-three miles from Reading on road to Shamokin; and at the same time a little girl was carried off. CHAPTER IX.
REVOLUTION AND INDEPENDENCE.

Stamp Duty.—The Parliament of Great Britain passed an act on March 22, 1765, which required all instruments of writing, such as deeds, bonds and promissory notes, to be written on parchment or paper and stamped with a specific duty, otherwise they were to have no legal effect; but this measure met with such general opposition in Great Britain and throughout the American colonies, and was found to be so unpopular, that the act was repealed in the following year, February 17, 1766.1 This opposition, however, led the Parliament to pass a declaratory act—which accompanied the repealing act—asserting the power over the colonies "in all cases whatsoever.” And then an act was passed which imposed a tax on tea, glass, paper and painters’ colors imported into the colonies. “Legislation without representation,” as this was, awakened in the colonies a great spirit of resistance; and this grew year after year till it finally culminated in a violent demonstration at Boston in December, 1773, when certain men in the disguise of Indians went upon three vessels loaded with tea at the wharf in the night time and threw the tea overboard. This act led to the passage of the “Boston Port Bill” on the 14th of March following, which provided that after the 18th of June, 1774, no person should load or unload any ship in that harbor. In this manner it was thought that the customs and commerce would be transferred from Boston to Salem. And other acts were passed in reference to the government of Massachusetts, the trial of the offenders, etc. Through these acts the people of Boston were visited with suffering and loss. But their situation won the sympathy of all the colonies. The colonists expressed themselves with disgust and rage at this treatment, and formed associations for their relief.

Patriotic Spirit at Reading.—When the news reached Reading, in Berks County, the citizens manifested great excitement and sympathy. Meetings were held at which the action of the British government was condemned. These meetings were called by notices headed “Boston Port Bill” and posted throughout the town. The following report of one of these meetings at Reading has been preserved, and is presented in this connection to show what action the people of the town were inspired to take, and what expressions they were led to make in the matter:

“At a meeting of a very respectable body of freeholders and others, inhabitants of the county of Berks, at Reading, the 3d of July, 1774, Edward Biddle, Esq., in the chair.

1 Edward Biddle was born in 1732. He entered the provincial army in 1764 and became an ensign. In 1759 he was promoted to lieutenant, and in 1760 he was commissioned captain. Resigning from the army, he studied law, and, after the usual course of study, established himself as a lawyer at Reading. He represented Berks County in the Assembly of Pennsylvania from 1767 to 1781—having been Speaker in 1774. During his service he was placed upon the most important committees. In July, 1774, he, with seven others, was elected to represent Pennsylvania in the First Continental Congress. He was re-elected to Congress in December, 1774, in November, 1775, and in November, 1778. In January, 1775, on his way to Philadelphia from Reading in a boat, he fell overboard. Through this accident he contracted a weakness from which he never recovered. He died at Baltimore, September 6, 1779. “Love of country, benevolence and every manly virtue rendered him an object of esteem and admiration to all that knew him.” He had two sons, Nicholas and Charles, the latter having represented Berks County in the General Assembly in 1788. (See “Autobiography of Charles Biddle,” pp. 74, 127, 288–291.)

This assembly, taking into their very serious consideration, the present critical situation of American affairs, do unanimously resolve as follows, viz.:

1. That the inhabitants of this county do owe, and will pay due allegiance to our rightful Sovereign, King George the Third.

2. That the powers claimed, and now attempted to be put into execution, by the British Parliament are fundamentally wrong, and cannot be admitted without the utter destruction of the liberties of America.

3. That the Boston Port Bill is unjust and tyrannical in the extreme. And that the measures pursued against Boston are intended to operate equally against the rights and liberties of the other colonies.

4. That this assembly doth concur in opinion with their respective brethren of Philadelphia, that there is an absolute necessity for an immediate congress of the deputies of the several advises, in order to deliberate upon and pursue such measures as may radically heal our present unhappy disturbances, and settle with precision the rights and liberties of America.

5. That the inhabitants of this county, confiding in the prudence and ability of the deputies intended to be chosen for the general congress, will cheerfully submit to any measures which may be found by the said congress best adapted for the restoration of harmony between the mother-country and the colonies, and for the security and firm establishment of the rights of America.

6. That as the people of Boston are now suffering in the grand and common cause of American liberty; Resolved,

“That it is the duty of all the inhabitants to contribute to the support of the said sufferers, and that the committee hereafter named do open subscriptions for their relief. And further, that the said committee do lay out the amount of such subscriptions in purchasing flour and other provisions, to be sent by them to our said suffering brethren.

7. That Edward Biddle, James Reed, Daniel Brodhead, Henry Christ, Esqs., Christopher Schultz, Thomas Dundas and Jonathan Potts, gentlemen, be, and they are hereby appointed a committee to meet and correspond with the committees from the other counties of the Province."

The thanks of the assembly were unanimously voted to the chairman, for the patriotic and spirited manner in which he pointed out the dangerous situation of all the American colonies, occasioned by the unconstitutional measures lately adopted by the British Parliament with respect to Boston; expressing, at the same time, the greatest loyalty to our sovereign, and the most warm and tender regard for the liberties of America.

There never appeared to be greater unanimity of sentiment upon any occasion than in the resolves made by the freemen of this county, all cordially agreeing to sacrifice every temporary advantage for the purpose of securing liberty to themselves and their posterity.

From this meeting to the close of the Revolution, the people of the town and of the county participated actively in all the affairs of the province which were conducted towards the establishment of independence. They were represented by delegates at the several conferences held; and they contributed their quota of men, money and supplies in the successful prosecution of the war.

VARIOUS COMMITTEES CHOSEN.—The deputies chosen to represent the county at the provincial meeting, held at Philadelphia, on July 15, 1774, were Edward Biddle, James Read, Daniel Broadhead, Thomas Dundas, Jonathan Potts and Christopher Schultz.

Pursuant to advertisements scattered throughout the county, a respectable number of the inhabitants met on the 5th of December, 1774, at the court-house, in Reading, and proceeded by ballot to the election of a committee, as recommended by Congress, when the following gentlemen were duly chosen: Edward Biddle, Christopher Schultz, Dr. Jonathan Potts, William Reeser, Baltzer Gehr, Michael Bright, John Patton, Mark Bird, John Jones, John Old, Sebastian Levan, George Nagel, Christopher Witman, Jacob Shoemaker and James Lewis.

The Committee of Correspondence for the county appointed in reference to the safety of the colonies, etc., met at Reading on January 2, 1775, and unanimously agreed to the proposed Provincial Convention, to be held at Philadelphia on January 23, 1775, and they appointed the following delegates to represent the county at the convention: Edward Biddle, Mark Bird, Baltzer Gehr, Sebastian Levan, John Patton, Jonathan Potts and Christopher Schultz.

And they also then appointed a Committee of Correspondence for the county,—Edward Biddle, Mark Bird, Jonathan Potts, William Reeser and Christopher Witman.

This committee addressed a letter to the committee of Lancaster County, dated January 5, 1775, in which, among other things, they said:

"When we consider that our disputes are drawing fast to a crisis, and that the most cordial unanimity is absolutely necessary for our preservation, we cannot doubt but that your respectable committee will without hesitation appoint deputies to attend the provincial congress. The neglect of any one county may have the most fatal consequences. And we well know the pleasure it would give our enemies to see even the appearance of disunion at this very important time."

The following letter, in reference to sheep and wool in the county, was circulated throughout the county during January, 1775:

"To the Farmers of Berks County:

"Reading, January 16th, 1775.

"The Committee of the County of Berks having considered the association of the butchers of this town not to kill any sheep whatsoever till the first day of May next, take the liberty earnestly to recommend to the inhabitants of this county not to sell any sheep whatsoever to any butcher from Philadelphia or elsewhere till the first day of May. The preserving of wool being an object of the greatest consequence, the committee flatter themselves that the farmers will cheerfully observe this recommendation, and as the committee will meet in Reading, on Tuesday, the 14th day of February, if any inhabitants have any objections to make to the measure hereby recommended, such inhabitants are requested to attend the committee, to make their objections, that the same may be maturely considered.

"Any person having wool which he cannot dispose of in the country, may bring it to the house of Mr. Mark Bird, in Reading, who will give fourteen pence per pound for any quantity.

"By Order of the Committee.
"Jonathan Potts, Secretary." ¹

From the patriotic spirit that prevailed, this recommendation was doubtless observed.

BATTLE AT LEXINGTON AWAKENS COUNTY.

—The battle of Lexington was fought on the 19th of April, 1775. When the news of the battle reached Reading, about a week afterward, a company of men was formed, who wore crape for a cockade in token of the sorrow for the slaughter of their brethren. Each township in Berks County resolved to raise and discipline its company. On the 25th of April, a town meeting was called at Philadelphia, when thousands of the inhabitants assembled, and agreed to associate for the purpose of defending with arms their lives, their property and their liberty.1 This patriotic feeling prevailed at Reading and in the county. The following extract of a letter from Reading, dated 26th of April, 1775, presents it forcibly:

"We have raised in this town two companies of foot under proper officers; and such is the spirit of the people of this free county, that in three weeks time there is not a township in it that will not have a company raised and disciplined, ready to assert at the risk of their lives the freedom of America." 2

COMPANIES FROM BERKS COUNTY.

A number of companies from Berks County were enlisted and served in the great struggle of the colonies for independence. A record of their respective services has not been published, and I have not been able to ascertain satisfactorily what they did or where they served. This will account for the want of an introductory narrative with the several rosters. The companies, so far as I have been able to ascertain them, were the following. I made diligent search amongst the records of our county in order to ascertain what companies were furnished by the county in this period, but I could not find any statement or evidence of any kind relating to this subject.

Captain George Nagel, Thompson’s Battalion of Riflemen.

Captain Jonathan Jones, D. Haas’ First Pennsylvania Battalion.

Captain Henry Christ, Miles’ regiment Pennsylvania Riflemen.

Captain John Spohn, Magaw’s Fifth Pennsylvania Battalion.

Captain Peter Decker, Magaw’s Fifth Pennsylvania Battalion.

Captain John Lesher, Patton’s regiment.

Captain Jacob Moser, Harmar’s Sixth Regiment Pennsylvania Continental Line.

Captain Jacob Bauer, Von Ottendorff’s corps Pennsylvania Continental Line.

Captain Benjamin Weiser, Hausegger’s regiment.

NAGEL’S COMPANY OF RIFLESMEN.—On June 14, 1775, the Continental Congress passed resolutions requiring twelve companies of expert riflemen to be raised for the purpose of joining the army near Boston. Eight of these companies were to be raised in Pennsylvania, formed into a battalion, and commanded by officers recommended by the Assembly or convention of the province. The officers were recommended and commissioned; and the command formed of these companies was called “Colonel Thompson’s Battalion of Riflemen.” Each company consisted of one captain, three lieutenants, four sergeants, four corporals, a drummer or trumpeter and sixty-eight privates. The pay was as follows: Captain, $20 a month; lieutenant, $13 3/4; sergeant, $8; corporal, $7 1/2; drummer, $7 1/2; private, $6 3/4.

They supplied their own arms and clothes. The term of enlistment was one year.

One company in this battalion was from Reading. It was Captain George Nagel’s.

A return of March, 1776, states the strength of the company as follows: One captain, three lieutenants, four sergeants, four corporals, one drummer and sixty-five privates present.

In Massachusetts Campaign.—Within three weeks from the time of their enlistment some of the companies took up their line of march to the Hudson River on their way to the army at Cambridge, Mass. During July and August, 1775, they passed through New Windsor—on the Hudson several miles above West Point. Nagel's company, from Reading, reported at headquarters, at Cambridge, on the 18th of July. The last of the battalion arrived on the 18th of August. The appearance of the men was described as follows:

"They are remarkably stout and hardy men, many of them exceeding six feet in height. They are dressed in white focks or rifle-shirts and round hats. These men are remarkable for the accuracy of their aim, striking a mark with great certainty at two hundred yards distance. At a review, while on a quick advance, a company of them fired their balls into objects of seven inches diameter at the distance of two hundred and fifty yards. They are now stationed in our lines, and their shot have frequently proved fatal to British officers and soldiers who expose themselves to view even at more than double the distance of common musket-shot." 2

"Each man bore a rifle-barreled gun, a tomahawk or small ax and a long knife, usually called a 'scalping-knife,' which served for all purposes in the woods. His underdress—by no means in military style—was covered by a deep ash-colored hunting-shirt, leggings and mocassins—if the latter could be procured. It was the silly fashion of those times for riflemen to ape the manners of savages.”

The battalion was first actually engaged and sustained its first loss in killed and wounded on the 27th of August, whilst covering an intrenching party. Captain James Chambers, of Cumberland County, described the engagement in a letter, dated 29th of August, as follows:

“On the evening of the 26th instant (Saturday) I was ordered to draw fifty men out of each of the Cumberland companies and to be ready to march at sunset. I did so, and marched, without beat of drum, to Prospect Hill, and thence proceeded with the riflemen stationed there (in all about four hundred) to Ploughed Hill and then to the hill within three or four hundred yards of the enemy’s strongest works, to cover a party of about two thousand musketmen, who were at the same time to entrench on Ploughed Hill. They labored hard all night and at daybreak had the redoubt nearly completed. The English began a heavy cannonading, which continued all day. They killed one adjutant and one soldier with cannon and wounded three others with musket-balls. William Simpson, of Paxton, was struck by a shot and his foot carried away.”

Simpson was a young man in Captain Smith’s Company, from Lancaster County. During his illness he was visited and consoled by General Washington, in person, and by most of the officers of rank belonging to the army. Every exertion was made to save him, without avail. He died on the 29th of August, 1775, and his death became a theme of common sorrow in an army of twelve or fourteen thousand men. He was the first Pennsylvania soldier who fell in the War of the Revolution.

JONES’ COMPANY.—The campaign for the conquest of Canada was conducted during the year 1776. The company of Captain Jonathan Jones, of Berks County, participated in it. In January, 1776, he and his company, numbering eighty-three men, set out upon the long march of six hundred miles to Canada, proceeding by way of Easton, the Hudson River and Albany, and arriving at Quebec in the latter part of March. They suffered much cold and sickness and endured many hardships.

After their retreat from Quebec, they returned, at the risk of capture, and secured valuable papers which had been left behind. They participated in the battle of Three Rivers, on June 8, 1776, and accompanied the army in its disastrous retreat to Ticonderoga.

Jonathan Jones was a son of David Jones, one of the earliest settlers of Caernarvon township. He was born in this township in 1738. Upon the breaking out of the Revolution he raised a company of Associates in that locality, and was appointed a captain in the First Pennsylvania Regiment of the regular Continental army, October 25, 1775, and ordered with his company to the “British Barracks,” at Philadelphia. He acted as part of the escort of Martha Washington into Philadelphia, and in December was ordered into Northampton County, Va., to protect it against Lord Dunmore. The alarming state of affairs in Canada led to the revocation of this order, and, by command of Congress, he marched with his company of eighty-three men for Quebec, over the snow and “frozen lakes.” This terrible mid-winter march consumed two months. After the precipitate retreat from Quebec, he voluntarily returned, at the risk of capture, and recovered valuable papers. He was with Arnold in his pursuit of the British, after the battle of the Cedars, and took part in the battle of “Three Rivers,” June 8, 1776. He shared the terrible and distressing sufferings of the army in its disastrous retreat to Ticonderoga, and underwent at that post the severe and exacting routine of military duty incident to its fortification and defense to resist the attack of General Carleton. He was stationed there from July 9 to November 15, 1776. On October 27th the time of enlistment of his men ran out, but through his exertions they consented to remain as long as the enemy was in their front. After a year's active service he was promoted to the rank of major, October 25, 1776, and to lieutenant-colonel of his regiment, which had become the second under the new arrangement, March 12, 1777. His constitution was so shattered by the hardships and exposure of the campaign against Canada that he was obliged to return home to recruit his health in the winter of 1776–77. Having partially recovered, he rejoined his regiment in the spring of 1777, the command of which devolved upon him after the resignation of Colonel James Irvine, June 1, 1777. Two companies of the regiment were then on duty in Philadelphia and the remainder were guarding the upper ferries of the Delaware. Increasing ill-health, however, obliged him to resign his commission in the latter part of July. In December, 1778, he was appointed by the Assembly a commissioner under the test laws, and he was a member of the General Assembly of Pennsylvania from Berks County from October, 1779, to October, 1780. His health continued steadily to decline, and he was shortly afterward stricken with paralysis, of which he died, after a lingering illness, on September 26, 1782, at the early age of forty-four. He was buried at Bangor Church, Churchtown, of which members of his family had been wardens and vestrymen from its earliest foundation.

CAPTAIN JOSEPH HIESTER'S COMPANY.—Joseph Hiester raised a company of eighty men at Reading about June, 1776, and commanded it in the battle of Long Island. No record of this company has been preserved.

CAPTAIN JACOB MAURER'S COMPANY.—Jacob Maurer also raised a company of men at Reading, and it was also engaged in the battle of Long Island, but no roll of it has been published.

CAPTAIN JACOB LIVINGOOD'S RIFLEMAN.—By the colonial records it would appear that Jacob Livingood, of Middletown (Womelsdorf), had formed a company of riflemen in Heidelberg township during the latter part of September, 1781, who were enlisted to serve till the succeeding January. He was appointed captain of this company. I could not find the roster. They performed service, and the Executive Council passed orders in January, 1782, to satisfy them.

Other Troops from County.—On November 18, 1777, Morgan reported that he had sent to camp four hundred militia, out of the Fifth and Sixth Classes, under the command of Colonel Henry Spyker.

In January, 1778, General Washington recommended that Captain Edward Scull recruit one hundred and fifty men in Berks County for the battalion of the State in the Continental army.

Jacob Morgan reported to Council, on the 16th of August, 1778, that he had sent from Berks County, pursuant to orders, one hundred and eighty men, including officers, to Sunbury, and one hundred and twenty-three to Easton. He also reported, on the 26th of June, 1780, that he had sent to Philadelphia a company of twenty-five men with a muster-roll,—these having been raised as volunteers in Berks County.

The Fifth Regiment of Infantry in the Pennsylvania Line was ordered on the 23d of January, 1781, to be recruited at Reading. And on the 30th of January following an order for five hundred pounds was drawn to Henry Christ for enlisting men into this regiment.

Valentine Eckert (lieutenant of Berks County) reported to President Reed, on the 8th of October, 1781, that he had sent to Newtown, Bucks County, upwards of three hundred men, exclusive of officers. Three companies were composed of Berks County men—two of which were armed, the other was not armed—and three more companies were then forming.

In August, 1782, the Indians invaded Berks County, and the lieutenant of the county was required to call into service a lieutenant and ensign with twenty-five men for the defense of the frontiers of the county. Shortly afterward he was ordered to send fifty men to defend the frontiers of Berks County in parts adjacent to Northumberland County, and thence to march to Sunbury, where they were to be placed under the command of Colonel Samuel Hunter. And in September following he was ordered to call into service immediately one hundred and twenty-five of the county militia, who were to march to Northumberland, and rendezvous at Muncy. On the 2d of October, 1784, a detachment of fifty men out of Berks County militia was ordered to be sent to Wyoming to quiet the disturbances there and support the civil authorities.

Daniel Broadhead was born probably in Albany, N. Y., 1725. In 1738 his father migrated to Pennsylvania, and settled in Monroe County, now East Stroudsburg. He grew up in a frontier settlement. Their house was attacked by Indians in 1755. In 1771 he removed to Reading, and soon afterward was appointed deputy-surveyor under John Lukens, surveyor-general. In July, 1775, he was appointed a delegate from Berks County to the Provincial Convention at Philadelphia. In March, 1776, he was appointed lieutenant-colonel of Miles’ rifle regiment; and in October following he was transferred to the Third Pennsylvania Battalion, known as Shee’s. He was then promoted to colonel of Eighth Pennsylvania Continental Line, March 12, 1777, to rank from September 29, 1776. He joined this regiment in April, 1776; and in January, 1781, he was transferred to the First Pennsylvania Line, and he was still colonel of the regiment in September, 1783. Upon the capture of Colonel Miles, at the battle of Long Island, the command of the remainder of the battalion devolved upon him; and he was, in fact, after the battle, in command of the whole Pennsylvania contingent, being then the senior officer remaining in the army; shortly afterward he went home on sick-leave, and when he rejoined the army it was as colonel of the Eighth Regiment. He made some important treaties with the Indians, and for this he expected to be ordered to move into the Indian country, but he was disappointed, the command having been given to Colonel Clark, a Virginia officer. The war having then been virtually ended he was not assigned to any command. It is believed that he received the appointment of brigadier-general before the close of the war. In 1789 he represented Berks County in the General Assembly and participated in the important discussion relating to the alteration and amendment of the Constitution of 1776. He voted in the affirmative. Subsequently, in the same year, when the Assembly reconvened, he voted for the calling of a convention to amend the Constitution. In 1789 he received the appointment of surveyor-general of Pennsylvania, which he held for eleven years. He then removed to Milford, Pike County, Pa., where he died November 15, 1809. He was twice married, his first wife having been Elizabeth Depin, and his second the widow of Governor Thomas Mifflin.

Peter Withington, captain, Twelfth Pennsylvania Continental Line, October 1, 1776; took sick in Philadelphia, December, 1776, and sent home to Reading and died May 11, 1777.

William Witman, second lieutenant, Ninth Pennsylvania Continental Line, February, 1777; shot through the body with a musket-ball at Germantown; taken prisoner and paroled; left out in arrangement in 1778; resided in Berks County in 1789; died October 12, 1808.

Michael Youse, private, from Lowden's company in Thompson's Rifles to First Pennsylvania Continental Line, 1776–88; resided in Maxatawny, Berks County, 1817.

Henry Ziegler, Reading, private, Von Heer's dragoons, Continental Line.

Conscientious Scruples against War.

A meeting of deputys of divers inhabitants of the county, who were conscientiously scrupulous against bearing arms, was held at Reading, on September 1, 1775. They passed certain resolutions, which, briefly stated, were as follows:

1. Agreeing to voluntary subscriptions for the uses pointed out by the recommendations of the Assembly, on June 30, 1775, and of the Continental Congress, on July 18, 1775.

2. Ordering accounts of moneys received and expended to be kept by a treasurer.

3. Submitting the moneys to the disposal of the Committee of Safety as a part of the share to be accounted for by Berks County.

4. Agreeing to answer requisitions on them by the Committee of Safety.

These resolutions were signed by Wm. Reesser, as president of the meeting. On September 11, 1775, he sent a copy of them to the Committee of Safety, stating in his accompanying letter that they were conscientiously scrupulous of taking up arms, though fully sensible of the justice of our cause, but that they were willing to contribute to its support. He acknowledged to have received in hands the sum of one hundred and fifty-two pounds for the Committee of Safety, and assured the committee that they would ever cheerfully contribute their proportion towards the safety and welfare of the public.

On the 20th of January, 1776, the people of the county were asked by the Committee of Safety to sign the Articles of Association.

Tory Feeling in County.—About this time it would seem that certain persons in the county possessed the “Tory” feeling, and, under its influence, endeavored to depreciate the “Continental currency.” Two men were apprehended for doing this, but they were discharged, having, on 30th of January, 1776, at Reading, publicly acknowledged their error, begged the pardon of the community and promised to conform to the rules and regulations that existed. Their acknowledgment was then published “so as to deter others from following the same shameless and wicked practice."

ENGLISH PRISONERS AT READING.—The Committee of Correspondence at Reading addressed a letter to the Pennsylvania delegates in Congress, dated 4th of February, 1776, in which they stated that "a number of English soldiers, lately taken prisoner in Canada, arrived at Reading with their wives and children. The committee were surprised at the arrival of so large a party by order without notice to them, and without any attending person to supply them with necessaries; but they immediately appointed Henry Haller one of the committee to provide houses, firewood and provisions for the party, who must have otherwise suffered much at this severe season." They asked Congress for instruction. In this communication they recommended that Haller be retained as the commissary for the soldiers stationed at Reading.

Some months afterward, 10th of July, 1776, Congress ordered that the privates who were prisoners in the town of Reading should be removed to Lancaster.

A number of prisoners of war were stationed at Reading in September, 1776. Their conduct and late hours excited the citizens to such an extent that a meeting of the committee of Berks County was called on 3d of September, and resolutions were adopted praying the Council of Safety to require the prisoners to disarm themselves and to repair to their respective lodgings at a seasonable hour—eight p.m. every evening. Captain John Witman, Thomas Warren and Michael Graus were appointed to take possession of the fire-arms, etc.; and, on the 4th, Daniel Rose, Philip Kremer and Krauff Hiner were appointed to assist. On the 5th they reported that General Prescott had refused to deliver up his pistols until he had first broken and rendered them useless, and that he had declared they acted like robbers. He admitted his conduct. The committee resolved that he had misbehaved himself, and "that he be committed to the Common Goal till the opinion of the Council of Safety be known." James Reed, chairman, reported this action to the Council, and made request that "a Guard be kept as a security from any attempts which may be made by the prisoners in our present defenseless situation." The Council heard the matter on the 10th of September, and ordered guard to be kept as long as the prisoners remained, at the Council's expense.1

James Read wrote to the Council of Safety, on December 27, 1776, the letter having been induced by the delivery at Reading of seven prisoners from Northampton County,—

"Reading, being the nearest place, we, who have already more prisoners (French and Scotch) than we have men-at-arms (old and young together) in this place, shall have all the Tories that Northampton can find, whereby the Ruin of this Town is justly apprehended. Lancaster has Barracks, and neither that town nor York has any prisoners in it. But, if the people of Northampton have their choice of three places, they will always send to the nearest of them. Thus Reading must be endangered and, at best, burdened. Our Prison is small; that of Lancaster large; and that Town is three times as large as this. Pray, sir, let these things be immediately considered. We are distressed. . . . We have heard that a Hospital is to be made in this place. Strange, this! when we have not one house in town unoccupied. Many families have come hither from Philadelphia."

ASSOCIATORS.—A Provincial Conference was held at Carpenter's Hall, in Philadelphia, during June (18 to 25), 1776, for the purpose of taking the necessary steps towards the formation and adoption of a Constitution for the government of Pennsylvania.2

In the proceedings of this conference provision was made "for raising 4500 militia, in obedience to resolutions of Congress of the 3d and 4th of June, 1776, for establishing a flying camp, to consist of 10,000 men, in the middle colonies," and a direction given for the preparation and publication of an address to the Associates of the province on this subject. The address was as follows:

"To the Associates of Pennsylvania.

GENTLEMEN,

"The only design of our meeting together was to put an end to our own power in the province, by fixing upon a plan for calling a convention, to form a government under the authority of the people. But the sudden and unexpected separation of the late As-some misrepresentation of the intention of Congress has arisen amongst the Associates of this State and the Officers who were appointed to form the Flying Camp, with respect to the March and Arrangement of the Associates and militia who were to compose the said Camp, and in order that it may be better understood, it is,—

"Resolved, That all the Militia who may be furnished and equip’d agreeable to the Resolve of Congress do march to such place as they have been respectively ordered by Congress, and that the persons who have been appointed Captains in the Flying Camp and have not Inlisted 25 men for that service, do return them to their respective Corps of Associates to which they formerly belonged, and continue with them; the appointment of the officers for the Flying Camp still to continue, and the men already enlisted to be considered as bound by their enlistment, and to be continued in service when the militia may be permitted to return, and subject to further orders of the Convention or this Board. And it is further recommended that those Companies which have been raised to form the Flying Camp, which already consists of 25 privates and upwards, do immediately proceed to Trenton or Brunswick, as heretofore directed.

"Resolved, That this Board will allow the Officers who were appointed to command the Flying Camp all such reasonable expenses as have accrued in the recruiting service.

The Following Letter was written to the Committee of Berks County, and signed by the Chairman:

"Gent’ns:"

"Your letter, 22d Inst., to the Hon’ble B. Franklin, Esq’r, Presid’t of the Convention, was referred by the Hon. Convention to the Council of Safety. They must acknowledge the Laudable zeal with which your Committee has, at all times, carried into execution the recommendation of such powers as acted under the People; But, particularly, your ready & cheerful Obedience to the ordinance of Convention for disarming of non-Associators.

"The embarrassments you Labor under in consequence of Resolves of Congress and others, which, from the confused state of the times, appeared somewhat Contradictory, appears to us excusable. In order to render the intentions of Congress more plain & Comprehensive and to their expectations, The Council of Safety have inclosed you their resolution upon the matter, requesting that you will take such Measures to publish it through your district as will be most Effectual & Expeditious, and that you would encourage the Associates to turn out on this very important Immergency.

"By order of Council of Safety."

A letter from the Committee of Berks County was laid before the Board, and the same being considered, and it being therein represented to this Board that BRIGADIER-GENERALS Elected.—A public meeting was held at Lancaster on July 4, 1776, for the purpose of electing two brigadier-generals to command the battalions and forces in Pennsylvania. The meeting consisted of the officers and privates of fifty-three battalions of the Associators of Pennsylvania. A full ratio of men was sent by the military of Berks County. The following delegates represented the county at the meeting:

First Battalion: Officers—Major, Gabriel Hiester; Lieutenant, Philip Cremer; privates, John Hartman, Peter Filbert.

Second Battalion: Officers—Colonel, Mark Bird; Major, John Jones; privates, David Morgan, Benjamin Tolbert.

Third Battalion: Officers—Lieutenant-Colonel, Nicholas Lutz; Captain, George Rheam; privates, Henry Spoon, Matthias Wenrich.

Fourth Battalion: Officers—Major, Michael Lindemut; Captain, George May; private, Mich’l Moser.

Fifth Battalion: Officers—Colonel, John Patton; Lieutenant-Colonel, John Rice; privates, Jacob Selser, Christ’n Winter.

Sixth Battalion: Officers—Major, Conrad Leffler; Lieutenant, John Miller; privates, John Hill, Henry Lark.

Seventh Battalion: Officers—Colonel, Sebastian Levin; Adjutant, Samuel Ebey; privates, Philip Bisters, Casper Smack.

Colonel Mark Bird, of the Second Battalion, was one of the judges of the election. Daniel Roberdeau was elected the first brigadier-general, and James Ewing the second. Mark Bird received seven votes. Eight candidates were placed in nomination.

QUOTA OF COUNTY EXCEEDED.—The Committee of Correspondence of Berks County addressed a letter to Congress, dated 13th of July, 1776, in which they stated that they had raised a company more than the quota of the county for the Flying Camp of four thousand five hundred men, in order to complete the battalion, concluding as follows: “Our conduct is dictated by the warmest attachment to the cause of our country, and we trust it will be considered in that light by the honorable Congress.”

PATRIOTISM OF JOSEPH HIESTER.—Among the many men of Reading who were actively engaged in the Revolution, Joseph Hiester occupied a prominent position. When the excitement began, which disturbed all the elements in the community, he was a young man, twenty-three years of age. But he was not too young to rally to the call of the country for independence. He was first selected as one of the delegates of the county to the Provincial Conference, which was held at Carpenter Hall, in Philadelphia, during June, 1776; and this conference, in its proceedings, provided for raising certain militia to form a part of the “Flying Camp,” and ordered an address to be issued to the Associators. Upon the adjournment of the conference, he carried the spirit, which had been developed there, back to Reading and acted promptly in behalf of the provision for troops to constitute part of the “Flying Camp.” On July 10, 1776, he called together, by beat of the drum, twenty-five or thirty of his fellow-citizens and asked them to take into consideration the alarming state of the country. He explained the situation and said that there was a necessity for action.

Having aroused their patriotism, he expressed a desire to raise a company of volunteers and march with them to the assistance of General Washington, who was then in a perilous situation in New Jersey. He was listened to with great respect. At the conclusion of his remarks he said (laying forty dollars in money on a drum-head): “I will give this sum as a bounty and the appointment of a sergeant to the first man who will subscribe the articles of association to form a volunteer company to march forthwith and join the commander-in-chief; and I also pledge myself to furnish the company with blankets and necessary funds for their equipment and on the march.”

Matthias Babb was the first to step forward. He took the money from the drum-head after signing the articles. This example induced twenty others to sign also. Notices were sent out into the neighborhood and meetings were held. In ten days afterward Hiester had enrolled ninety-six men. They were promptly organized. This success led him to determine to raise a regiment. His liberality and popularity paved the way for promotion to the highest office over these troops that were to be raised. Notwithstanding their preference for him, he used all his influence for the election of Henry Haller to the office of colonel, and Edward Burd, major. This he did at their request. He assured his fellow-soldiers that he was satisfied to serve as captain, and even declared a willingness to serve in the ranks if he could there better serve the country. He then marched his company from Reading to New Jersey, and they became a part of the Flying Camp in the regiment commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Nicholas Lotz.

At Elizabethtown they learned that General Washington had marched to Long Island. Some of his company, and the company commanded by Captain Graul, declared their determination not to march any farther, and said that they had proceeded farther than they could have been compelled to go. He called the men into line and addressed them in bold, impassioned patriotic language, and asked them to fall in with him and march forward to join Washington and fight for freedom. All responded nobly excepting three. When the drums began to beat and the men to march, these three could not resist the feeling, and they, too, joined. They then marched to Long Island. There some were killed and others wounded. The concentration of the British troops resulted in the capture of many of the American troops. As prisoners they were treated with great cruelty. Along with other officers, Hiester was confined for six weeks on board of the prison-ship "Jersey." Thence he was removed to another prison-ship. Shortly afterward he was confined on board of the ship "Snow Mentor," and there similar bad treatment was inflicted upon him. He became very sick with fever, and very weak under such imprisonment, so feeble indeed that he was compelled to crawl on hands and knees to get up and down-stairs. Whilst there he was plundered of all his clothing and money. He was exchanged in December, and then returned to Reading. During his imprisonment he was elected a major, and upon his return home he was elected a colonel. He received both commissions at the same time. At home he soon recovered his wasted strength. Feeling it his patriotic duty, he left home and friends and rejoined the army of General Washington in Philadelphia (now included in Montgomery County), remaining with his troops until his term of service expired, when he returned home. Soon afterward an attack on New York was apprehended. General Joseph Reed commanded the Pennsylvania troops. In sending out circulars for troops, he sent one to Colonel Hiester asking him to raise volunteers for service. Hiester responded promptly, raised six hundred and fifty men and joined Reed's army in New Jersey. For this patriotic action Reed gave him a highly complimentary recognition. He remained in the army until the close of the war, and, after his honorable discharge, returned home. His unselfish conduct and his devotion to the country in the great struggle for freedom made him a most popular man and prepared the way grandly for him in his successful political life in after-years. 1

Battle of Long Island.—Eight battalions of Pennsylvania troops in the "Flying Camp" were sent to the army at New York. Three of them were incomplete, and of these, two were composed of Berks County militia, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonels Nicholas Lotz and Peter Kachlein. Lotz's major was Edward Burd, and his colonel was Henry Haller, of Reading, who did not join the army till after the opening of the campaign. The commands of Lotz and Kachlein comprised each two hundred men and were in Stirling's brigade. On the 24th of August, 1776, Washington was in doubt as to the intentions of the enemy. He found the British sixteen thousand strong, but they had been estimated at only eight thousand. He ordered more reinforcements over on the Brooklyn side, and among these was Lotz's command. The battle of Long Island was fought on August 27, 1776. In the engagement part of Lotz's command, under Major Burd, was stationed at the coast-road, at and around the "Red Lion Tavern." Burd was at the lower road with Hand till he was relieved. The British in numbers exceeded the Americans on the island three to one. The advance-guard of the British, under Grant, marched up the Narrows and struck the American pickets in the vicinity of the "Red Lion" about two o'clock in the morning. The pickets retreated before the enemy without checking their march. There was hardly more than an exchange of fire with Major Burd's detachment when he and many others—about eight hundred—were taken prisoners. This skirmish took place on the "Narrows Road," between Thirty-eighth and Fortieth Streets. The Americans were defeated because the British had completely outflanked and surprised them on the Jamaica road. Among the prisoners there were ninety-one officers. The killed were six officers and fifty privates, and less than sixteen officers and one hundred and fifty privates were wounded. The total loss of the British was reported at three hundred and sixty-seven officers and men. No official report of the losses in Lotz's and Kachlein's detachments can be found. Lotz had six officers taken from him, all prisoners, none killed or wounded, and Kachlein not more. The following appeared among the list of prisoners: Lieutenant-Colonel Nicholas Lotz, Lieutenant-Colonel Peter Kachlein, Major Edward Burd, Captain Jacob Granl, Captain Joseph Hiester, Captain Jacob Maurer. Hiester and Maurer were exchanged in December, 1776. Lotz was admitted to parole within certain bounds on April 16, 1777, and exchanged on September 10, 1779. He returned to his home in Reading, where he must have died shortly after, for it does not appear that he ever called on the commissaries of prisoners for anything that may have been due him during his imprisonment and parole.

DESMERTERS.—Henry Haller was on duty at Reading in December, 1776, with his battalion. On the 16th of December he left, and on the 30th of December he wrote to the Council of Safety:

"That the greatest number of the men of my Battalion deserted on the 13th and 14th, a thing that might, in my opinion, have been prevented had the officers taken proper steps; but some of them were as willing as the privates to break up the Battalion; took no pains to get their men, and this conduct encouraged others. Since that I have been here waiting to get the pay-rolls, that money might be drawn to pay off the men, that they might be encouraged to re-enter the service. But some of the captains give me all the delay in their power. Therefore, I pray your attention to the matter. I think it a paymaster was ordered up here to pay off the Battalion, it would have a good effect."

The Executive Council, on the 18th of January, 1777, took the following action in reference to the refusal of the associators in Hunter's Battalion to march to the seat of war in New Jersey:

"Whereas, This Council is informed that many of the principal associators of Colonel Hunter's Battalion, of Berks County, refuse to march to join General Washington's army at this Important Crisis, when so glorious an opportunity offers of crushing the enemy, and thereby have prevented and discouraged the rest, and proceeded even to dare them to enforce the resolves of this Council upon them; therefore,

"Resolved, That Colonel Hunter be directed forthwith to collect all the well affected in his Battalion, and seize upon the ringleaders in this defection and send them under guard to Philadelphia, and that he do execute the Resolve. The resolve of this Council of the seventh of December last upon all who refuse to march without favor or affection, and that they do collect blankets and other necessaries of those who are to march, paying a reasonable price for the same; and should any person refuse to deliver such necessaries as they can spare, the Colonel is directed to take and pay for the same. Those that turn out are to march the most direct road to Head Quarters."

And three days after this (21st of January, 1777,) General Israel Putnam addressed a letter from Princeton to the Council of Safety of Pennsylvania, saying that "Captain Echard and Captain Fisher, of Berks County, had just informed him that their companies had run away to a man, except a lieutenant, sergeant and a drummer." He added, "I hope, gentlemen, no pains or cost will be spared to apprehend these men and bring them back to their duty. I think it is of the last importance that this spirit of desertion should be crushed in its infancy, and the militia taught that there is a power that can and will detain them."

HESSIAN PRISONERS.—In 1775 the king of Great Britain obtained by treaty from the German princes seventeen thousand men for the purpose of sending them to America to assist in subduing the American colonies. These men were sent early in 1776. Many of them (Hessians) were taken prisoners at the battle of Trenton on December 26, 1776, and conveyed to Lancaster. Some of these prisoners were afterward stationed at Reading. Their first quarters in the town were in the southern section, and, after remaining in that locality several years, they were removed to the southern declivity of Penn's Mount. This removal was caused by the frequent disturbances which arose between the prisoners and the citizens of the town. In May, 1779, a proposition was made to send them to New Jersey. On the 27th of June, 1781, President Reed wrote to Valentine Eckert, "that it was the desire that the prisoners should be encamped in huts at some small distance from Reading, where wood and water were convenient, that Colonel Morgan had mentioned a piece of ground which had belonged to the proprietaries, which would be convenient

1 The Continental troops took the following prisoners, arms, etc., at the battle of Trenton: 750 Hessians, 1 lieutenant-colonel, 2 majors, 4 captains, 15 subalterns, 3 standards, 6 brass field-pieces, and near 1000 stand of arms. Two days afterward General Washington commanded them to be forwarded to Lancaster.

The following letter was addressed to Daniel Clymer, Esq., at Lancaster, in 1777, in reference to the removal of prisoners from that place to Reading:

"Dr. Sir,—The Board have directed me to write to William Atlee, Deputy Commissary of Prisoners, to whom you'll please to render all the assistance in your power in the removal of the Prisoners of War from Lancaster towards Reading and Lebanon. Congress having just been informed by Express that the Enemy are landing in Maryland above Baltimore, & its being past a doubt the rescuing their Prisoners & the destruction of our Stores are the objects they have in view. On this important occasion, anything in your power, the Board are well satisfied will be done. You'll please to have an eye to the Prisoners at York, & if Mr. Atlee can do the Business by himself at Lancaster, it is the desire of the Board you proceed thither, & the Committee are hereby earnestly requested to furnish such a number of Militia as shall put it out of the power of the Prisoners to effect an escape. We are unacquainted with the Number of Prisoners at York; you will, therefore, act as your own good sense may dictate. I am with all due Respect and proper." Three persons were appointed to select a location.—Valentine Eckert, lieutenant of Berks County; Major Bayley, and Colonel Wood, Lancaster. On the 17th of July, following, Colonel Wood wrote President Reed, "that he could not decide where to locate the prisoners, that certain persons who thought they did not have a legal title to the commons, had paid the taxes and claimed the land." He, therefore, referred the matter to him for a decision. He also alluded to the Continental stable at Reading, which, he thought, might be converted into barracks. This stable was in dimensions, twenty by one hundred and seventy-five feet, and a store-house, twenty by sixty feet. The "Commons" was not selected; but the committee went half a mile to the eastward, and selected a spot on the hill-side, where they caused huts to be erected, and in which they stationed the prisoners. At the close of the Revolution many of the prisoners remained and settled permanently in Berks County, mostly in Alsace and Oley townships. The place has since been known as "Hessian Camp." The greater part of these huts were standing in 1841. In July, 1780, the prisoners at Reading numbered one hundred. On 16th of June, 1781, a large number of convention prisoners of war, ten hundred and fifty, all Germans, excepting sixty-three Britons, arrived in Reading under guard of the York County militia. Valentine Eckert called out two classes of companies from the Sixth Berks County regular militia to guard the encampment. They were under the charge of Major Bayley. During the week following, additional prisoners were brought, so that the whole number was near eleven hundred. They were encamped on the east bank of the Schuylkill, near Reading. It is not known whether they were taken along to "Hessian Camp" or not. On February 23d, 1782, the lieutenant of the county was ordered to call out the first class of the militia to guard the military prisoners at Reading; but only forty men were wanted at a time for this purpose. The order was as follows:

"Ordered, That the Lieutenant of the county of Berks be directed to call out a class of the militia of the said county, for the purpose of guarding the military prisoners of that county; that as forty men are only wanted at one time for the said purpose, the lieutenant be directed to call out no more than that number, and that the battalion be called up in their numerical order, beginning at the first, for the said one class, so far as may be necessary to furnish the said number; and when the time of the first forty shall expire, he then call on the next battalion or battalions for the like number, so as to have the succeeding numbers ready to take charge of the said prisoners when the time of the first shall expire, and so on until the said one class shall have served their tour of duty, or until further orders from this Council."

Some of the Hessian prisoners at Reading, during the course of their imprisonment, were hired out to service, notably to George Ege at Charming Forge and to John Patton at Berkshire Furnace.

Hessian Camp Surprised.—The following interesting incident transpired at the Hessian camp on Christmas-Day, 1781. The Hessian prisoners and their guard were suddenly alarmed by certain soldiers in the disguise of Indians, which caused them to fly from the encampment. A court-martial was afterwards held, but no one was punished:

"Van Campen, whilst at McClure's Fort, which was on the Susquehanna River, above Sunbury, upon the service of conducting scouts around the line of the settlements, was ordered with his company to Lancaster, late in the fall of 1781. He descended the river in boats as far as Middletown (a place ten miles below Harris's Ferry), where the order was countermanded by another, directing him to march to Reading, Berks County, where he was joined by a part of the Third and Fifth Pennsylvania Regiments, and a company of the Congress Regiment. Their principal duty, while here, was to take care of a large body of Hessians that had been taken prisoners with General Burgoyne. These had been under the guard of a company of militiamen, whose time had not yet expired. The march which Van Campen's soldiers had performed was, on account of lateness of the season and bad roads, extremely fatiguing, and, as the time for which the militia were engaged continued them in service a little longer, he allowed them the space which intervened as a season of rest. This proved grateful to the soldiers, and it no doubt served to invigorate their spirits, for, in the approaching Christmas holidays, they were found to be sufficiently recruited to engage in the exercises of sport. Some of those belonging to Van Campen's company determined to have a frolic with the militiamen before they should be discharged from their posts. These were stationed at a little distance out of the village, near the direct road from Reading to Philadelphia, on the side of a hill, around which the way turned, and which hid the view to the road before reaching the place. When Christmas came, twelve or fifteen young soldiers set out, with music in their heads, for the militiamen's camp. Just before they came to where the road turned around the hill, and while they were yet out of sight, they arrayed themselves in Indian dress and crept along up the ascending ground until they came in sight of the militiamen's camp. There they fired their guns, which contained an unusual charge of powder, and followed the discharge of these by loud and continued yells. They presented themselves to the view of the soldiers, and began to jump from tree to tree so as to produce an enlarged idea of their numbers. Their unexpected appearance produced the intended effect. The soldiers were startled by the sudden roar of the rifles, which echoed through the deep forest like the terrible thundering of cannon. The loud yells, too, from the supposed Indians, were enough to have startled them at a time of peace, much more when the savage was looked for at any moment to commit his deeds of violence. The soldiers conceived an instantaneous alarm; fear was scattered throughout their ranks, and, with a sudden bound, they started from their encampment. The sentinels fled without firing a single gun and the whole company deserted their posts, leaving the poor Hessians (whom they were placed to guard) without a man to prevent their being retaken. But these, too, apprehensive that they might be mistaken for rebels, were infected with the universal panic and showed their heels to the enemy. The camp was entirely deserted in a few moments after the first alarm had been given. No sooner had the militiamen deserted their camp than they began to spread the alarm, saying, 'that all Niagara was let loose; that a party of several hundreds of Indians had attacked their camp, and that they had just escaped with their lives.' The intelligence was soon brought to the troops at Reading, who were immediately placed in the order of defence, and who began forthwith to march, with Van Campen at their head, towards the enemy. They had not gone far, however, before they were met by some of their own soldiers, who assured them that they had started out upon a false alarm, at the same time giving them a history of the secret of the attack and of the brave defense which had been made by the militiamen. They returned to their quarters, very much amused and with the laugh upon the poor soldiers who had made such a display of their bravery.

"But this little event (which had been conceived only in sport, like many others of the same origin) was the occasion of serious difficulty. To one party it afforded the highest amusement, but to those who had committed their valor to their heels it was a subject of constant annoyance. They could not endure the chagrin that was brought upon them by having been put to flight by a few boys who had been disguised as Indians, and who had so successfully played off their wits upon them of a Christmas holiday. The militia officers, whose bravery was somewhat implicated in the affair, declared that they would be satisfied with no reconciliation short of the punishment of those who had been concerned in creating the alarm.

"A court-martial was held, in which Lieutenant Van Campen sat with the militia officers, to decide the point at issue. These affirmed it to be but right, —that those who had occasioned the mischief should be whipped; while Van Campen, whose soldiers were implicated, unwilling that his men (who belonged to some of the most respectable families of that part of Pennsylvania,) should suffer such a disgrace, would allow of this only upon condition that the sentinels, who had fled from their posts without firing, should be punished as the martial-law required—with death. These terms were not agreeable to the minds of the officers, and Van Campen, who declared that he would sooner see his men shot than whipped, continued to sit in court-martial for the space of three weeks. A compromise was finally made between the two, it being proposed that the sergeant, who had been one of the leaders in the affair, should be broken of his rank. This was allowed, and harmony was again restored between the two parties. The sergeant was broken of his rank at night and restored the next morning; so that his punishment, after all, was more nominal than real. Immediately after, Van Campen and his men entered upon the care of the Hessian soldiers and remained in this service until the next spring, when they were relieved by the militia, who again took them under charge.1

Hessian Officer Drowned.— During the time that the Hessian prisoners were at Reading, a Hessian officer of rank was fishing from a canoe one day in the Schuylkill, and fell overboard. A servant on the shore saw the accident, but, instead of alarming the occupants in a house near by, he ran and informed the commanding officer. When the officer arrived, he found the Hessian at the bottom of the river, drowned, and his efforts to resuscitate life were fruitless.

During the winter of 1776–77 there was much sickness amongst the prisoners. Many of them died. The burials were made in "Potter's Field," which comprised two lots of ground, numbers 398 and 399 on the west side of North Sixth Street, south of Walnut, in Reading. The deaths were so numerous at times that it became necessary to bury two, and even three, in one grave. I heard this statement made frequently by some of the older residents.

Militia Refuse to March.—About January 1, 1777, some of the militia at Reading refused to march under orders given. Daniel Brodhead,2 by direction of General Mifflin, took a company of Northumberland County militia, stationed at Reading, and compelled them to march. In a letter to Owen Biddle he said he believed "the remainder were so much alarmed that few will think of staying at home."

The Council of Safety was informed, on January 18, 1777, that "many of the principal associates of Colonel Hunter’s Battalion of Berks County refuse to march to join General Washington’s army at this Important Crisis, when so glorious an opportunity offers of crushing the enemy, and thereby have prevented and discouraged the rest, and proceeded even to dare them to enforce the resolves of this Council upon them." It was then decided that the Colonel should forthwith collect all the well affected in his Battalion, seize the ring-leaders in this defection and send them to Philadelphia.

Militia Returns of County.—Jacob Morgan and his sub-lieutenants met at Reading on April 25, 1777, for the purpose of receiving returns of the inhabitants of Berks County, between the ages of eighteen and fifty-three years. The number then returned was about four thousand. These were divided into six districts, and meetings were ordered to be held on the 5th and 6th of May following, for the purpose of electing officers and of forming companies. Morgan reported that he had forwarded to the Executive Council an exact list of the field officers, captains, subalterns and court-martial men, comprising the six battalions of the Berks County militia. But this list was lost, not having been included in the Archives. It has not been discovered since.

On August 17, 1777, Morgan reported that two classes of militia had marched from Reading on their way to West Chester. They consisted of twelve companies. They left mostly in the beginning of August; the last company on the 16th. The whole number of officers and men was six hundred and fifty-six. The two battalions were commanded by Daniel Hunter and Daniel Udree. “In the opinion of every one here they were hearty and able men, fit to take the field against our inveterate enemies.”

In the State returns of the militia, dated September 6, 1777, these two battalions included the following officers and men:

The total number of the State was two thousand nine hundred and seventy-three.

Army Supplies.—In the beginning of the Revolution, Reading was selected as a place, adapted by its situation, for storing army supplies. It was capable of easy defense in the event of an attack from the enemy; and it was not far distant from the operations of war in the State. Large quantities of provisions were stationed here. In April, 1780, the Executive Council was directed by General Washington to furnish the State out of the supplies at Reading, with the following articles: Two hundred barrels of flour; five hundred and sixty gallons of rum; one hundred and eighty tons of hay; and fourteen thousand bushels of corn.

At this time Nicholas Lotz was the commissioner of purchases for Berks County. Two years before, there were two commissioners, Valentine Eckert and John Lesher. In 1778 the supplies at Reading were large and valuable; and then Congress requested the State to station two hundred militia at this point to defend the magazines of military stores, and keep communications secure from sudden incursion of the enemy. Colonel Cowperthwaite was the storekeeper. The Executive Council made such an order. In May, of this year, Jacob Morgan reported that he had reduced the guard in Reading to fifty men, rank and file.

In November, 1777, in pursuance of orders received, three hundred and fifty wagons were sent from Berks County to Philadelphia; also a wagon master-general and wagon masters. When they reached Philadelphia, the enemy had left. The wagons got nothing. Twenty were taken into service. The men returned and demanded pay. Henry Christ, Jacob Shoemaker and John Ludwig requested the president of the Executive Council to forward money for this purpose. The sum required was between twenty-five hundred and three thousand pounds.

The quota of articles, etc., from Berks County to the State in July, 1780, was—six hundred barrels of flour per month; six hundred bushels of forage per month; twenty wagons and two hundred horses; and three hundred militia; and there having been then a great want of teams in the army, a requisition was made on the county to furnish twenty wagons. In September, 1778, the quota of wagons was one hundred and ten, and these were then ordered to be sent to Philadelphia. On June 14, 1779, Jacob Morgan, Jr., reported that he had sent to camp at Middle Brook, thirty-six good Continental teams and fifty-four spare horses, and on the next day twelve teams properly equipped.

Nicholas Lotz, as commissioner of forage, reported on June 5, 1780, that he had purchased forty tons of flour, one hundred and seventy-two bushels of oats and nineteen bags; and on the 19th of June, following, he reported the purchase of ten head of cattle and forty sheep, which he was obliged to take under the law. Cattle and sheep he reported to be scarce, because many butchers and drovers had come from Philadelphia and other places and bought them up. He was appointed commissioner on April 3, 1780.

It was reported to Council on August 12, 1780, that John Patton by agreement with Captain Jay, agreed to supply the Board of War with ninety tons of shell and shot; for which purpose he put his Berkshire Furnace in blast. He was then at work; but how long he would continue he could not tell because his workmen were not exempted from military duty. Then they were ordered out, and unless they were released he could not keep his works going. At this time he also had some Hessian prisoners employed. These were demanded from him; and if they were not returned his bond would be put into suit.

In May, 1776, Mark Bird offered to buy or have made in Berks County, one hundred muskets, provided he were supplied with the necessary funds. This offer was accepted by the Executive Council and an order to him for four hundred pounds was drawn. And in August, 1776, the committee of safety also drew an order in favor of Samuel High, a county commissioner, for six hundred dollars, on account of arms making in the county.

On July 8, 1776, the Council passed a resolution:

"That the Iron Masters employed in casting cannon or shot for the public service in the counties of Chester, Lancaster and Berks, be permitted to employ any of the soldiers, prisoners of war at Lancaster and Reading, as laborers in the said business, giving an account to the committees of Lancaster and Reading of the time of such soldiers as they shall so employ.

"This permission was given in view of the public exigency which required additional artillery and war materials to repel the invasion of the country by the army of General Howe, who had recently appeared at New York with the British fleet."

On January 10, 1777, Captain Daniel Jay reported to Councils from the Reading Furnace that Mr. Old was casting different sizes of shot and expected to have by January 12, 1777, four tons of shot,—3-lb., 2½-lb., 2-lb., 1½-lb., 1-lb. and ½-lb., with a quantity of canister shot. But he anticipated difficulty in getting teams to haul them down.

That week he sent down to Philadelphia two tons of shot,—62 18-lb. shot; 250 3-lb. shot; 400 1-lb. shot; 300 ½-lb; shot; 1350 1½-lb. shot; 815 pounds canister shot.

Owing to the aid given by divers inhabitants of the State to the enemy, the Council of Safety appointed a committee in the several counties to seize upon and dispose of all the property of such offenders and make an inventory and return of their proceedings under oath. This was in September, 1777. The following committee was appointed in Berks County: Thomas Parry, David Morgan, Peter Nagle, Henry Haller, Daniel Udree, Henry Spycker and Joseph Hiester.

And about that time the Council also appointed a committee to collect arms, clothing, etc., from the inhabitants of the county who did not take the oath of allegiance, or who aided the enemy, and deliver them to the clothier general. The committee in Berks County was Henry Christ, Henry Haller, Thomas Parry, Daniel Udree, Philip Miller, Nathan Lewis, John Lower, Godfrey Ream, Jacob Seltzer and Nicholas Shauffer.

Jacob Morgan was qualified on September 3, 1777, as a councillor from Berks County in the Supreme Executive Council of the State, and he then took his seat. On May 25, 1778, an order was drawn to him for three hundred and one pounds and five shillings for attending Council one hundred and eighty days, including mileage. James Reed succeeded him as the councillor from Berks County and was qualified on June 30, 1778.

The following interesting miscellaneous items are added to this chapter.

Aug. 15, 1776.—The Committee of Safety appointed two persons in each district of the county to make provision for distressed families whose husbands and fathers were in actual service. Henry Hahn and Peter Feather were appointed for Reading.

December 4, 1776.—Order to pay expense of removing public papers to Reading.

June 9, 1777.—Order to Colonel Jacob Morgan (lieutenant of Berks County) for one hundred and fifty stand of arms and one thousand five hundred flints and order on treasurer to Colonel Morgan for £500.

August 26, 1777.—Henry Spyker appointed pay-master of militia of Berks County in place of Colonel Hunter, to whom inconvenient.

September 12, 1777.—Ordered that Bucks County militia be employed as a guard to conduct the British prisoners to Reading, and such others as may be necessary to be added and ordered that the third and fourth class of militia of Berks County be called into immediate service.

October 23, 1777.—Ordered that sixth and seventh class of Berks County be immediately called out.

January 1, 1778.—Order to pay expenses for removing Quaker prisoners to Reading—£159 3s. 4d.

January 9, 1778.—Leonard Reed was wagon-master of Berks County. Subsequently the appointment of wagon master-general was tendered to him. Henry Haller was appointed wagon-master in 1778, and he held this appointment till 1780. In June, 1779, he was wagon master-general.

January 10, 1778.—Ordered that Val. Eckhard and John Lesher, of Berks County, appointed to act as commissioners for purchasing forage, supplies and fire-arms.

February 20, 1778.—Ordered that the sum of £4000 be sent by Jacob Morgan to Val. Eckhart and John Lesher for purchasing supplies.

Order to treasurer for $150 for recruiting, etc.

March 24, 1778.—Ordered that two hundred militia of Berks County, for guard at Reading.

March 28, 1778.—Order drawn on treasurer in favor of Henry Spyker, paymaster of militia of Berks County for £5,000.

July 13, 1778.—Letter of Colonel D. Hunter to several colonels of Berks County militia for immediate assistance, laid before Congress.

July 23, 1778.—Order of one-third ton of gunpowder, etc., be delivered to lieutenant of Berks County militia.

June 1, 1779.—Letter from Reading to Mr. Haller, inclosing sundry papers—respecting prisoners at Reading, and disturbances between them and the inhabitants of the town. Ordered that papers be sent to Board of War and request that prisoners be sent to some other place.

June 29, 1779.—Congress authorized a loan of $200,000,000, and suggested the appointment of persons to take subscriptions for loans. The Executive Council, on the 14th of July following, appointed Henry Haller a commissioner for this purpose in Berks County.

July 14, 1779.—Henry Haller, Esq., appointed to receive subscription in Berks County for loan of $20,000,000 on interest.

July 15, 1779.—Letter from Henry Haller as to sugar and rum, sent to John Witman, tavern-keeper at Reading.

March 13, 1780.—Letter from commissioners of Berks County as to obstructions, in way of executing their office, and answer.

May 19, 1780.—Petition of Christian Schultz, assessor of county of Berks, complaining of commissioners; read and referred to judge of the Supreme Court.

August 14, 1780.—Jacob Morgan, Jr., was appointed superintendent of the commissioners of the State for purchasing supplies, and also of the wagon-masters, at a salary of £1,000 per annum, and an order was then drawn in his favor for £20,000, which he was directed to forward to the commissioners to enable them to purchase supplies.

November 25, 1780.—John Witman appointed collector of excise for Berks County.

November 30, 1780.—Order on treasurer drawn to Henry Spyker, paymaster of Berks County, for £163,000 to pay militia of said County, if so much in treasury for militia fines.

December 13, 1780.—Resolved that Jacob Morgan pay off militia who marched on late tour of duty.

December 13, 1780.—A petition from divers inhabitants of Berks County who were convicted of misdemeanor, in associating together, to oppose the collector of the public taxes in said county was read, setting forth that they are unable to pay fines laid on them by court, and pray remission. Resolved that they be remitted.

January 26, 1781.—Petition of Inhabitants of Bern, praying for remission of fine of £300 sentenced for misdemeanor in confederating against payment of taxes.

July 1, 1781.—Letter from Henry Christ and Henry Haller. Ordered that secretary do answer that council understand the tract of land, on which the town of Reading stands, to be an estate held by the proprietors in their public capacity, and accordingly devolves to the State; but that if any advice respecting construction of law be necessary to Christ and Haller, that it is proper they should state the question to the Attorney-General, who will, of course, give his opinion.

Affairs at Reading in 1777.—The steady advance of the English upon Philadelphia during the Summer of 1777 had thrown the city into a great panic. Many persons went to Reading as a place of safety—the fugitive families having been estimated at a score or more. The ensuing winter (1777–78) at Reading was gay and agreeable, notwithstanding that the enemy was in possession of the metropolis. The society was sufficiently large and select; and a sense of common suffering in being driven from their homes had the effect of more closely uniting its members. Besides the families established in this place, it was seldom without a number of visitors, gentlemen of the army and others. The dissipation of cards, sleighing parties, balls, etc., were numerous. General Mifflin, at this era, was at home—a chief out of war, complaining, though not ill, considerably malcontent, and apparently not in high favor at headquarters. According to him, the ear of the commander-in-chief was exclusively possessed by Green, who was represented to be neither the most wise, the most brave nor the most patriotic of counsellors. In short, the campaign in this quarter was stigmatized as a series of blunders; and the incapacity of those who had conducted it was unspARINGly reprobated. The better fortune of the northern army was ascribed to the superior talents of its leader; and it began to be whispered that Gates was the man who should, of right, have the station so incompetently sustained by Washington. There was, to all appearance, a cabal forming for his deposition, in which it is not improbable that Gates, Mifflin and Conway were already engaged, and in which the congenial spirit of Lee on his exchange immediately took a share. The well-known apostrophe of Conway to America, importing “that Heaven had passed a decree in her favor or her ruin must long before have ensued from the imbecility of her military counsels,” was at this time familiar at Reading. And I (Graydon) heard him myself—when he was afterwards on a visit to that place—express himself to this effect: “That no man was more of a gentleman than General Washington, or appeared to more advantage at his table or in the usual intercourse of life; but, as to his talents for the command of an army (with a French shrug), they were miserable.” Observations of this kind continually repeated could not fail to make an impression within the sphere of their circulation; and it may be said that the popularity of the commander-in-chief was a good deal impaired at Reading.1

CONWAY—CABAL. — The “Conway-Cabal” was a secret movement by which it was intended to remove Washington and put Gates in his place. Conway spent the winter of 1777-78 at York intriguing with Mifflin, Lee and some members of Congress to bring about the removal of Washington. The correspondence between Gates, Mifflin and Conway, reflecting upon Washington, became known through the indiscretion of Wilkinson, who had seen one of the letters and repeated its purport to Stirling. The unfavorable impression produced by this discovery was not removed when Gates, with some bluster, first demanded of Washington to know who had tampered with his letters, and then denied that Conway had written the letter whose words had been quoted.2 Mifflin had written to Gates, informing him that an extract from Conway’s letter had been procured and sent to headquarters. This perplexed Gates and caused him to suspect that his portfolio had been stealthily opened and his letters copied, and in a state of mental trepidation he wrote to Washington on the 8th of December, in which, among other things, he said: “I conjure your Excellency to give me all the assistance you can in tracing the author of the infidelity which put extracts from General Conway’s letter to me in your hands.” Washington replied with characteristic dignity and candor on the 4th of January following,—saying, among other things:

“I am to inform you then, that Colonel Wilkinson, on his way to Congress in the month of October last, fell in with Lord Stirling at Reading and—not in confidence that I ever understood— informs his aide-de-camp, Major Williams, that General Conway had written this to you: ‘Heaven has been determined to save your country, or a weak general and bad counsellors would have ruined it.’ Lord Sterling—from motives of friendship—transmitted the account with this remark: ‘The enclosed was communicated by Colonel Wilkinson to Major McWilliams.’ Such wicked duplicity of conduct I shall always think it my duty to detect.”

Attempts to influence State legislatures proved3 equally abortive, and when the purpose of the “Cabal” became known to the country and to the army, it met with universal condemnation. It has been said that this “Cabal” was conceived at Reading, one tradition locating the place of meeting in a low one-story log building on the south side of Penn street sixty feet above Eighth, (which was torn down several years ago), and another tradition in a two-story stone building on the south side of Penn street, one hundred and twenty feet above Tenth, called for many years the “Fountain Inn.” But these traditions are not correct. Conway was not at Reading at any time. Wilkinson was on his way from Saratoga to York, where Congress was then assembled, with dispatches from Gen. Gates concerning the surrender of Burgoyne’s army on the 17th of October. Accordingly the people of Reading knew of the surrender before Congress.

DUEL AT READING.—Col. Richard Butler’s regiment was quartered at Reading during 1780-81. Most of its officers were very worthy men. It was commanded by Lieut.-Col. Metzger, in the absence of the Colonel, who was not at Reading most of the winter. Metzger was one of the very few foreign officers who were valuable to the colonists. There was a Captain Bowen in the Regiment. He was recognized as an excellent officer; but he had a warm temper which occasioned some disturbances at Reading about that time. On one occasion he took offense when none was intended, and on that account, fought a duel with the major of the regiment. The duellists each fired a shot, and Bowen had a button shot from his coat. Their seconds then settled the matter between them. An investigation of the cause of the difficulty was then made. “It appeared the major was walking with some girls on the night before, and they burst out laughing just after Bowen had passed them. Their laughter was caused by the major telling them of his and Bowen’s being at a dance on the evening before, when the blind fiddler broke one of the strings of his fiddle and the landlady took a candle and held it for him while he was fitting a new string.” This story even set the seconds to laughing and they all returned in good humor. Upon another occasion, soon afterward, whilst Bowen and Charles Biddle (who was then residing at Reading) were playing backgammon, at a certain place, Captain Bowen—an officer in the same Regiment, came into the room and, addressing himself to Bowen, said: “I hope you are very well, Major.” Bowen immediately started up and replied to him: “Don’t major me, sir! None of your majors! You know I am not a major, sir! What do you mean, sir?” Bower declared that he had not intended to give any offense. Bowen then took Biddle into an adjoining room and inquired if he should not challenge Bower. Biddle replied to him that “a man who would not fight on some occasions was not fit to live, nor was a man fit to live who was always quarreling.” They returned, and Biddle made the captains shake hands, and so avoided a second duel. Bowen held the appointment of Town-Major for a time. 1

INDEPENDENCE WON AND PEACE DECLARED.—The surrender of Lord Cornwallis, at Yorktown, on the 19th of October, 1781, was virtually the end of the war between England and America. The news of the surrender reached London on the 25th of November, following. Several months afterward, the warfare in the American Colonies was discussed and its continuance discouraged in the House of Commons, a resolution having been passed, declaring that they who advised the continuation of the war were enemies of their country. These discussions were continued with earnestness till they culminated in a preliminary treaty of peace on the 30th of November, 1782. In the first article of this treaty, “the independence of the thirteen United States of America” was recognized. The treaty was not made final then, owing to the three allied powers—Great Britain, France and Spain—having been pledged to one another not to conclude a treaty except by common consent; and the consent of France and Spain was to be obtained. This occasioned further delay and obliged the United States to await the adjustment of the differences between them. The final treaty of peace was concluded at Paris on the 3d of September, 1783, and thereby the United States were acknowledged to be “free, sovereign and independent.” 2

During these two years of negotiation and delay there were no general military operations.

But great anxiety was felt over the prospects for a permanent peace. Through the inactivity of the army, the officers and soldiers became restless; also discontented because they were not rewarded for their patriotic services. An attempt was made by anonymous and seditious publications to inflame their minds and to induce them to unite in redressing their grievances whilst they had arms in their hands. But Washington succeeded in quieting them. His wisdom and eloquence elicited from the officers the unanimous adoption of a resolution by which they declared "that no circumstances of distress or danger should induce a conduct that might tend to sully the reputation and glory they had acquired; that the army continued to have unshaken confidence in the justice of congress and their country; and that they viewed with abhorrence and rejected with disdain the infamous propositions in the late anonymous address to the officers of the army."

In order to avoid the inconveniences of dismissing a great number of soldiers in a body, furloughs were freely granted. In this way a great part of the unpaid army was disbanded and dispersed over the states without tumult or disorder. The soldiers returned to labor. As they had been easily and speedily formed out of farmers and mechanics and laborers, in 1775, so with equal facility did they throw off their military character and resume their former occupations. They had taken up arms earnestly for the purposes of self-defense and political freedom, but when these were no longer necessary they laid them down peaceably to become again good industrious citizens as they had been for eight years devoted and patriotic soldiers.\(^1\)

The manner and the time of the return of the Berks county troops from the seat of war have not as yet been ascertained. There was no record here or elsewhere; and, at that time, there was no newspaper publication in the town to report the arrivals. No written or printed statement has been prepared or published, showing the companies and men which were supplied by the county, the men killed or wounded, or returned. Doubtless the citizens of the town rejoiced with all the people of the country when the struggle was over and peace declared.

REVOLUTIONARY SURVIVORS.—The following survivors of the Revolution, who were residents of Reading, are presented in this connection, though not strictly a part of this period.

In 1823 there were thirty-nine survivors. They held a public meeting on the 19th of August, of that year, for the purpose of endorsing Andrew Gregg as a candidate for Governor of the State. Peter Nagle was chairman of the meeting and Michael Madeira secretary. Appropriate resolutions were adopted,—

Peter Nagle.

In 1840 the census reported nine surviving Revolutionary soldiers in Reading who were then drawing pensions from the State Government, viz.:

Michael Spatz, aged seventy-eight years.
Peter Stichter, aged seventy-eight years.
Aaron Wright, aged seventy-eight years.
William James, aged seventy-nine years.
Sebastian Allgaier, aged eighty-three years.
John P. Nagle, aged eighty three years.
Henry Stiles, aged eighty-four years.
Joseph Snable, aged eighty-four years.
Christian Miller, aged eighty-five years.
In 1846 two still survived—Michael Spatz and William James.

CONTINENTAL PAPER MONEY.—During the progress of the Revolution the government of the United States was compelled to resort to the emission of "bills of credit" with which to purchase army supplies, etc., and to satisfy the demands of carrying on the war. Gold and silver was not then known to exist in the country in any quantity equal to the demands of war; nor could they be procured. Direct taxation, though practicable, was deemed impolitic. The only plausible expedient in the power of Congress was the emission of bills of credit which were to represent specie under a public engagement of redemption through taxation, or of exchange for gold or silver. This practice had been familiar from the first settlement of the colonies; and, under proper restrictions, it had been found highly advantageous. Congress, therefore, resolved, in June, 1775, to emit such bills to the amount of two millions of dollars; in July, ordered a million more, and in November, three millions more; and for their redemption congress pledged the Confederated colonies. Subsequently other emissions were made; and, such was the animation of the times, that these several emissions, amounting to twenty millions, circulated for some time without any depreciation, and commanded the resources of the country for public service equally with gold or silver. For a considerable time the Government derived much benefit from this paper creation of their own, though it was without any established funds for its support or redemption. Whilst the ministry of England were puzzling themselves for new taxes and funds on which to raise supplies, congress raised theirs by resolutions directing paper of no intrinsic value to be struck off in the form of promissory notes. But there was a point both in time and quantity beyond which this process ceased to operate; that time was about eighteen months from the date of first emission and that quantity twenty millions. The rulers thought it still premature to urge taxation, and they therefore resorted to the expedient of further emissions. The ease with which the means of procuring supplies were furnished by simply striking off bills of credit and the readiness with which the people received them, prompted congress to multiply them beyond the limits of prudence; and a depreciation of their value was the unavoidable consequence. At first this depreciation was scarcely perceptible, but it increased daily, till finally the currency became worthless. The depreciation began at different periods in different states; but in general about the middle of the year 1777, and then increased progressively for several years.

In the latter part of 1777 it was two dollars in currency for one in specie; in 1778, five for one; in 1779, twenty-seven for one; in 1780, fifty for one. After this year the circulation was limited to certain localities; but where the currency passed it depreciated to one hundred and fifty dollars for one. In Pennsylvania the executive council resolved, as late as February 1, 1781, that continental money should be received for public dues at the exchange of seventy-five dollars in currency for one in specie. But an act provided that after June 1st, following, only specie or equivalent bills of credit should be received for taxes or other public dues; and this rendered the currency worthless in the State. This extraordinary depreciation brought great loss to many of the people who had aided the government in the grand struggle for freedom. In this respect the soldiers suffered most. The people of Reading, and especially of the county, met with considerable losses thereby. Some of them had large quantities which were transmitted for some time till lost or destroyed. It was not redeemed.

CHAPTER X.

Whiskey Insurrection of 1794.—As early as 1756 the province of Pennsylvania had looked to excise on ardent spirits for the means of sustaining its bills of credit. The original law was limited to a period of ten years; but it was extended from time to time as necessities pressed upon the treasury. During the Revolution the law was generally evaded in the western part of the State by considering all spirits as for domestic use, such having been excepted from excise. But, when the debts of the Revolution began to press upon the States, the government officials became more vigilant in the enforcement of the law. Congress, after a long debate, passed a law in March, 1791, increasing the duty on imported spirits and levying a tax on distillation, and this went into operation in July following. The Legislature of Pennsylvania had instructed their representatives in Congress to vote against the law. Opposition arose at once in the western counties of the State, and resolutions were adopted at public meetings demanding an unconditional appeal. Liberty poles were erected, and people even assembled in arms to resist officers in the enforcement of the law. Various public excitaments continued till 1794, when an insurrection ensued. Governor Mifflin, of the State, on various excuses, declined to call out the militia to suppress the insurrection, and, as a consequence, the spirit extended into contiguous States. President Washington, who feared that successful resistance to one law might be the beginning of rebellion against all law, called on Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Maryland and Virginia for fifteen thousand men, and sent commissioners to the scene of the disturbance, with power to arrange for peaceful submission any time before September 14, 1794. But the commissioners returned to Philadelphia ten days after that date, having failed to obtain a satisfactory settlement. The troops were promptly put in motion, the governors of the several States named commanding their respective quotas. Governor Lee, of Virginia, had chief command of the army. On the appearance of the troops, in November, the insurrection subsided. There was no opposition and no bloodshed. Among the Pennsylvania troops there was a company from Reading under the command of Captain Daniel de B. Keim. This company was formed from certain survivors of the Reading Battalion in the Continental Army, which had been commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Nicholas Lotz, and was called the "Reading Union Volunteers." It was afterwards known as the "Reading Artillerists." This insurrection cost the government eleven hundred thousand dollars.

The proportion of troops, which was to be supplied by Berks County towards the quota of Pennsylvania militia under the requisition of the President of the United States, was four hundred and thirty four officers and privates, and twenty-six cavalry. The four hundred and thirty-four men were placed under the command of Brigadier-General Francis Murray, in the second brigade. The Adjutant-General of the State issued an order on September 11, 1794, requiring "the quota for the counties of Bucks, Northampton and Berks to assemble at Reading, where they will be furnished with arms and equipments and camp equipage, and march from thence by way of Harrisburg to Carlisle."

The quartermaster-general of Pennsylvania, Clement Biddle, arrived at Reading on Sunday evening, September 28, 1794. In a letter by him to Governor Mifflin, dated the day following, he remarked about the Berks County troops: "Colonel Cowperthwaite had collected four hundred men in the encampment at Peters's farm, who were fully furnished with everything they required. The drafts from the county continued to come in and he proposed marching tomorrow." And he reported that Captain For-rest's troops had moved from Reading on Saturday (27th); that he expected the Bucks County Militia here on 30th; and that the Militia of Berks County would assemble on October 1st; also that the rear of the Jersey troops would march from here on 30th under General White.

Washington at Reading.—In another letter to Governor Mifflin, dated at Reading, October 2, 1794, he stated that—“The President (Washington) was here last night, and went on this morning to Carlisle.” He also reported then that “the cavalry of this county (Berks) are by this time at Carlisle. Captain Spade has a fine company of infantry ready to march, and I shall hasten the drafts from the county off to-morrow.” The cavalry mentioned was Moore’s, and contained—one captain, one lieutenant, one cornet, four sergeants, four corporals, one quartermaster, one surgeon and twenty-five privates.

The militia of Berks County responded promptly on the requisition of the President to suppress this insurrection.

House-Tax and Liberty-Poles, 1799.—During the early part of Adams’s administration, Congress passed an act requiring a direct tax to be levied upon houses. This tax was called the “house-tax,” also “window-tax.” The federal government, in collecting it in the eastern counties of Pennsylvania, caused a considerable excitement and opposition, which eventually broke out in an insurrection in 1799. “In some townships associations of people were actually formed in order to prevent the officials from performing their duty and more particularly to prevent the assessors from measuring their houses. This opposition was made at many public township meetings called for the purpose; and in many instances written resolutions were entered into, solemnly forewarning the officers, and accompanied many times with threats.” The leader in this insurrectionary proceeding was John Fries, of Bucks County; who was tried and convicted of high treason and sentenced to be hanged. But President Adams, against the advice of his Cabinet, pardoned Fries and also issued a general amnesty for all the offenders. It was reported that “great men were at the bottom of the business.” Thirty-one persons were arrested in Northampton County, fifteen for high treason. The excitement—if not actual opposition—about the direct “house-tax,” extended into the northeastern border of Berks County.

Excitement at Reading.—The insurrection—though not directly active in the county—was indirectly the cause of a considerable commotion at Reading. Certain troops were called out to suppress the insurrection; and among them was Captain Montgomery’s company of Light Dragoons from Lancaster. Their way to the scene of excitement was through Reading. Upon arriving here they cut down certain “Liberty Poles,” insulted the people, etc.; and these unwarranted performances induced an anonymous correspondent of the Adler to publish a letter, criticising their conduct. He subscribed it “A Friend of Truth.” This appeared whilst the company was on the way to Northampton County. But upon their return they heard of it. Naturally it developed in them as soldiers a spirit of revenge. So they went to Jacob Schneider, the senior proprietor of the Adler, and demanded from him the name of the person who had written the letter condemning and ridiculing them. He was bold enough to refuse compliance. His refusal led the soldiers to spend their anger on him by taking him forcibly to the market-house and giving him a certain number of lashes. The letter which caused the trouble was as follows:

“On Monday afternoon, April 1, 1799, Capt. Montgomery’s troop of Light Dragoons arrived here on their march from Lancaster to Northampton County, in order to apprehend the ‘rebels,’ and to quell the insurrection. But their determination will be more likely to create an uproar than to restore order. . . .

“Upon their arrival here, their first undertaking was to go quietly and unnoticed to a citizen of the town who had erected a Liberty Pole upon his own ground and cut it down. But not satisfied with this they were desirous of disturbing this man’s family, before whom they flourished pistols and drawn swords and took with them the instrument with which they had cut down the symbol of true freedom. Then they went upon a second expedition. At a particular place children had raised a pole with some patches attached; but when they observed the troops coming, they took it down and carried it into the house. But these troops went into the house with pistols and drawn swords, struck the owner of the house upon his breast and threatened to shoot him if he said one word. They broke the pole in pieces, took up the patches and other articles which did not concern them at all and carried them away. They sought a third adventure a short distance away and found a single small boy whom they commanded not to throw a certain tree (already cut down and lying near the river), into the water, and clubbed him unmercifully without the slightest reason. Thence they went to numerous other places and committed offenses not any less shameful and cruel. By this time night had come when they were forced to discontinue.

"On the following morning they arose very early for new adventures. But they were so unfortunate as to find one immediately. Why unfortunate? Yes, it appeared dreadful to them, for these adventurous cannibals feared to approach within eighty steps of a well-guarded Liberty Pole, . . . which appeared to be surrounded with explosive pipes. They hesitated, stood still and gaped at this wonderful thing, as a cow at a newly painted stable door. They were asked to come nearer; but they were afraid; they would not move a step, till a messenger was sent informing them 'they might come a little nearer in order to be able to see the emblem of Liberty, for no harm should be done to them.' Upon this one of them took courage and rode along; when the others saw that nothing was done to him, another followed. They were then asked what they wanted. They replied: 'Nothing more than to see the country and this Liberty Pole and to give their horses a little exercise.' They were asked further whether they had not intended to cut down this Liberty Pole, and they answered 'No.' Still another question was put to them whether they had a right to cut down such a Liberty Pole and to abuse the people. They answered: 'They did not in reality have the right then, but they might perhaps obtain it, in which case they would not only cut down all the Liberty Poles but also burn and destroy everywhere where such poles stood and were erected.' Upon this they were asked to examine this Liberty Pole particularly to see if anything objectionable was upon it, and if so they were welcome to cut it down; but they replied that they could not see anything and would not give it the slightest injury. Then three cheers were shouted, and we saw that the caps of the Dragoons could flourish in the air as well as the round hats. . . ."

"The troops which left here to arrest the disturbers of the peace in Northampton County returned to Reading on April 20, 1799—Saturday afternoon. On the following Monday afternoon and Tuesday morning all, excepting the regular troops, marched to their respective homes. . . . A party of them (Captain Montgomery's Company of Light Dragoons) came into my printing establishment, not as men of good character, but as scoundrels and rascals, tore off my clothing and dragged me before their fine captain, who is not a particle better than any of his company. He immediately commanded them to give me twenty-five lashes on my back at the Market House, and this would have been done, if one of Captain Leiper's company, from Philadelphia, had not interfered, and said that they should be ashamed of their performance. Through this interference I did not receive the whole number. . . ." [An editorial in Adler, 23 April, 1799, subscribed by the proprietor, Jacob Schneider.]

Mr. Schneider made complaint before a justice of the peace and caused the criminals to be arrested, but Captain Montgomery denied the authority to make the arrest. The matter was then referred to General Macpherson, who said he would look into it; and so they rode away on Sunday evening. [Adler, 7th May, 1799.]

By the time that Montgomery's troops returned to Reading on their way home, Strohecker had erected a liberty-pole in the place of the one erected by his children. Hearing this, the soldiers went to Strohecker's place and there attempted to compel a common laborer to cut down the "offensive wood," notwithstanding that he protested against doing so, declaring at the same time, on the most solemn asseveration, that he also was a Federalist. They succeeded in divesting the pole, and with it appended as a trophy, they rode through the streets of Reading to their quarters. In a few days they left, but on the 24th of April an army, under the command of Brigadier-General W. Macpherson, arrived at Reading. They apprehended some of the insurrectionists, who were afterwards tried before Judge Peters; some of them were found guilty, some were fined and imprisoned and others condemned to be capitaly punished; but none atoned with their lives—they were pardoned through executive clemency."

persons were added who suffered from their cruel treatment. These persons were,— Isaac Feather, a landlord, and his family, treating him in the most cruel manner [Adler, 21st of May, 1799].

On the 18th of May, 1799, the following persons appeared before Peter Nagel, Esq., a justice of the peace of Reading, and made complaint against the Lancaster troops:

1. Jacob Gosiin, had treatment of himself and family and larceny of an ax.
2. John Strohecker, had behaviour and the taking of a flag from a Liberty Pole which his children had erected and of other things which did not belong to them.
3. Jacob Epler, assembling and resolving to cut down a certain Liberty Pole which stood near his house (in Bern township) [Adler, 21st of May, 1799].

Captain Dewees narrates the following account in relation to the cutting down of Epler's liberty-pole and the cow-hiding to Schneider [Hanna's Life of Dewees, p. 329]:

"There was a farmer of the name of Epply, who lived about three miles from Reading, who was an influential and wealthy man. Epply stood in the front rank of the 'Liberty Boys,' in that section of the country. The insurgents rendezvoused on his farm and erected a 'Liberty Pole' in front of his house. There was a company of Light Horse, commanded by Captain Slow, sent on from Lancaster with orders to cut it down. When this company arrived on the farm of Epply, and within sight of the Liberty Pole, Captain Slow was surprised to find upwards of one hundred Riflemen under arms and guarding the pole; and finding that he had too few men to contend against this force, he retired without making any effort to fill the measure of his orders. He returned to Reading with his company and obtained a reinforcement and moved on a second time to execute his orders. When he arrived within sight of the Liberty Pole a second time, the insurgents finding that Slow's force was augmented and too strong for them to contend against, gave way and dispersed in all directions. Captain Slow and his force then moved up to the pole, which was immediately cut down. These prompt measures put an end to the Liberty Boys in the neighborhood of Reading. After Captain Slow returned to Reading the second time, a printer in town, whom I knew very well, published an article in his newspaper derogatory to the character of Slow as a gentleman and as a soldier. Slow, who was a large and powerful man, no sooner beheld it than he went and bought a cow-hide and went to the printing-office and took hold of the printer and dragged him across the street to the Market-house, which was opposite the printing-office, and cow-hided him severely. There was not any person interfered, nor did any person say anything against it, for the printer was looked upon as the aggressor."

Keim's Company Complimented.—Upon the breaking-up of the head-quarters at Reading, on April 22, 1799, Brigadier General W. Macpherson addressed the following interesting letter to Captain Daniel Keim:

"While I congratulate you and the company you command on their return home, I take an additional pleasure in expressing my complete satisfaction with every part of their steady and soldier-like conduct during a very fatiguing though short expedition. It is much to be regretted that in a country blessed as this is, by an excellent constitution faithfully administered, there should be found any portion of its inhabitants so ignorant, or so wicked, as to oppose laws peculiarly adapted to the ease of the mass of the people, since the burden falls immediately upon the opulent. But it is a great consolation to see gentlemen, such as compose your company, come forward and brave fatigue and danger in support of the honor and happiness of their country. Accept, sir, my sincere thanks for this instance of your patriotism and be pleased to convey to every individual my particular acknowledgments, best wishes and affectionate farewell."

Embargo of 1807.—Congress passed an act on December 22, 1807, laying an embargo on all the ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States in pursuance of the recommendation of President Jefferson. It prohibited the departure of all American vessels and of all foreign vessels, except those in ballast. No merchandise whatever was to be exported. The act was not simply to save American ships from danger, as Jefferson suggested in his message; but it was a measure of aggression against England. It was unpopular in proportion as men were or were not engaged in commerce. The maritime states thought that the agricultural states took a special satisfaction in a quasi war, of which all the burden fell at first upon commerce. But the burden at length became universal. The men, whose tobacco, corn and cotton could not be sent to market, soon learned that they also, as well as the carriers of those products, were paying a heavy tax by this interdiction of commerce. Under the pressure of public opinion, this act was repealed on March 1, 1809, and Another act was then substituted which interdicted the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and forbade imports from Europe. From this policy of non-intercourse and from other difficulties, which in a state of war hindered importations from Europe, there was born unexpectedly that gigantic system under which the United States has become a great manufacturing nation.¹

During this interdiction, the people of Berks County began to feel the evil effects of this policy of non-intercourse. A number of millers and other citizens met at the public house of Valentine Brobst, in Reading, on April 11, 1812, "for the purpose of taking into consideration the late measures of Congress, the perilous situation of our common country, and of consulting and devising such means or measures as may tend to relieve us from the distress which impends over us;" and passed the following resolutions:²

1. Resolved, That we disapprove of the late measures of Congress, particularly the act establishing an Embargo, which will induce great hardship and oppressions to the millers and farmers of the State of Pennsylvania, and to the citizens generally.

2. Resolved, That a committee be appointed to draught a memorial to our representatives in Congress, praying for a repeal of the act establishing the Embargo.

3. Resolved, That the friends of the peace and prosperity of our country be requested to assemble generally throughout the union, and express their disapprobation by remonstrance or otherwise of the said act of Congress and solicit the repeal, to save our country from the evil with which it threatens to overwhelm her.

4. Resolved, That a remonstrance be prepared and transmitted to the Representatives of Congress from this district, disapproving of their conduct in supporting by their votes the late obnoxious law establishing an Embargo in the ports of the United States, with instructions calling on them to use their endeavors to have the same repealed at the expiration of sixty days or sooner.

5. Resolved, That committees be appointed in the different townships in the County of Berks, to obtain the signatures of such of our citizens to the memorial as are unfriendly to the continuance of the Embargo.

6. Resolved, That the following persons be appointed a committee to obtain signatures to the memorial to Congress in the different townships as follows: In Albany, Jacob Risler; Alsace, Henry Leiss, Martin Rothermel; Bern, Joseph Conrad and Samuel Bell; Cumru, Henry Van Reed and David Hemmig; Colebrookdale, Daniel Boyer and John Thompson, Esq.; Exeter, Peter Howsemen and Isaac Broome; Amity, Thomas Boone, Esq., John Schrack and Valentine Boyer; Douglas, William Long and Henry Keely; Heidelberg, William Addams and Frederick Bechtel; Greenwich, Jacob George; Longswamp, Peter Trexler; Maxatawny, Benjamin Levan and Motheral Wilson; Maidencreek, John Wily, John Stichter and John Gerich; Oley, John Knabb and Frederick Spang; Reading, Jacob K. Boyer and Benneville Keim; Robeson, Daniel Hartzel and Christopher Thomson; Ruscomb-manor, Benjamin Parks and Jonathan Price; Rockland, Benjamin Klein and John Hoch; Richmond, Solomon Eckert and Thos. Dunna; Tulpehocken, John Furry, Christopher Leiss and George Ege, Jr.; Union, John Smith, Esq., John Brown and Daniel Kerst.

7. Resolved, That the proceedings of this meeting be signed by the chairman and secretary, and published in the German and English papers in Reading.

English War of 1812–15.

The Revolution of the United Colonies was carried to a successful termination. The independence, which they had declared in 1776, was thereby established. But though peace was declared to exist between the two nations, the British government continued itself persistently in an offensive manner towards the people of the United States, their commerce, etc., and to their great injury for thirty years. The United States government passed naturalization laws whereby foreigners could be naturalized and become citizens. But the British government contended that a British subject could not be naturalized, and claimed the right of stopping United States vessels, searching for seamen of English birth, and impressing them into their service. In exercising this right they stationed ships at harbors of the United States and searched every departing and arriving vessel. They were so vigilant that within a period of eight years they captured nine hundred vessels and impressed over six thousand seamen into their navy. All this humiliation was borne with patience, superinduced by an admitted inability to carry on war. But finally the complaints became too loud, and the injuries too grievous to be endured any longer, and President Madison made them the subject of a message to Congress on June 1, 1812. It was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations; and this committee, after giving its contents a serious consideration, reported a bill, declaring war between the two governments.

 Causes of War.—The following is a summary of the manifesto of the causes which impelled this declaration:

"1. Impressing American citizens, while sailing on the highway of nations; dragging them on board their ships of war and forcing them to serve against nations in unity with the United States, and even to participate in aggressions on the rights of their fellow-citizens when met on the high seas.

"2. Violating the rights and peace of our coasts and harbors, harassing our departing commerce and wantonly spilling American blood within our territorial jurisdiction.

"3. Plundering our commerce on every sea, under pretended blockades, not of harbors, ports or places invested by adequate force, but of extended coasts, without the application of fleets to render them legal, and enforcing them from the date of their proclamation, thereby giving them virtually retrospective effect."

"4. Committing numberless spoliations on our ships and commerce under her orders in council of various dates.

"5. Employing secret agents within the United States with a view to subvert our Government and dismember our union.

"6. Encouraging the Indian tribes to make war on the people of the United States."

This bill was passed by both houses, and approved by the president; and the proclamation of war was made on June 19, 1812.

Anticipating this "Declaration of War," Governor Snyder issued an "Order" dated May 12, 1812, requiring the quota of troops from Pennsylvania, fourteen thousand, to be promptly raised and formed into two divisions. The first division—which included the troops from Berks County—was placed under the command of Major General Isaac Worrell. A noble response was made to this call. The troops tendered exceeded three times the quota requested. The destruction of the Capitol and public buildings at Washington, in August, 1814, and the threatened attack on Baltimore by the enemy shortly afterward, brought the war near to Pennsylvania. The march of the enemy towards the interior by way of the Potomac River and Chesapeake Bay naturally stimulated the military spirit in the State, and a great number of men came forward in her defense.

The following notice for volunteer troops appeared in the Weekly Advertiser, of Reading, on May 30, 1812:

"FAME AND FORTUNE!"

To men of patriotism, courage and enterprise:

"Every able-bodied man, between the age of 18 and 45 years, who shall enlist in the service of the United States, for the term of 5 years, will receive a bounty of 16 dollars; having faithfully served the term of his enlistment, and obtained an honorable discharge, he shall be allowed three months additional pay and 160 acres of land, to be designated, surveyed and laid off at public expense. Should he die in the service, his heirs or representatives will be entitled to the aforesaid 3 months of pay and 160 acres of land. Apply at the Recruiting rendezvous at Reading to JAS. F. McELROY, Captain U. S. Infantry.

"May 25th, 1812."

The companies enrolled at Reading, in the beginning of the war, could not be obtained. They have not been published. A record of the military companies of Berks County for the years 1812 to 1815 is deposited amongst the county records in the Prothonotary's office at Reading; but there are no dates attached to signify the time or even the fact of their enlistment. Those companies which do appear in it, correspond with the companies included in the following statement, excepting Elder's company. The company of Captain Moore was composed entirely, and the companies of Captain Marx and Captain Marshall mostly, of men from Reading.

Local Preparation for War.—After Washington was taken, and the news of its destruction by the enemy reached Reading, the military spirit of this community was thoroughly aroused. The following notice from the Weekly Advertiser, September 10, 1814, indicates the action which was taken by the people of Reading:

PUBLIC NOTICE.

"At a large and respectable meeting of the inhabitants of the borough of Reading, convened agreeably to public notice, to take into consideration the very alarming situation of our beloved country, and particularly the city of Philadelphia, it was resolved, after first appointing John Spayd, Esq., chairman, and Henry Betz, secretary, that we, the subscribers, should be a committee for the purpose of collecting and calling upon our fellow-citizens of Berks County for all Public Arms now remaining in their hands. We hope, therefore, every patriotic citizen will promptly and immediately forward to either of the said committee any musket or muskets in their hands, so that they may be immediately repaired and delivered to the different volunteer companies now forming in this town, to march for the defence of Philadelphia, etc., etc. It was further resolved, that the citizens of the borough generally, will meet every evening on the common of this borough at four o'clock in the afternoon, to train themselves and go through the different evolutions necessary for a military corps—and all young men from the county are invited to attend those exercises if they think proper.

"JACOB SNYDER,
"LEWIS REESE,
"JOHN POTTER,
"CHARLES SNOWDEN,
"CURTIS LEWIS,
"Reading, September 6th, 1814."

The companies, which were organized here, had left Reading shortly before to take an active part in the military service of the country.

The naval battle on Lake Erie was fought on September 10, 1813, with brilliant success. Commodore Perry then sent his famous despatch to General Harrison: "We have met the enemy, and they are ours." The news reached Reading on the 27th of September following, and a grand illumination of the town took place in the evening from seven till ten o'clock, to signalize the glorious event.

ENGLISH FAMILIES, COMPelled TO LEAVE PHILADELPHIA, LOCATE AT READING.—During this period a number of foreign English families, resident at Philadelphia, left the city for the interior parts of the country, owing to a law which required them to move away from the sea-coast and ports at least fifty miles. Some of these families came to Reading, and took quarters at the Tyson Inn, at the head of Franklin Street (now Bechtel's Hotel). Whilst here, the City of Washington was captured by the English, who wantonly destroyed the government buildings, excepting the patent office. This was in August, 1814. This news caused them to rejoice, and to express their joy they carried on dancing, with the assistance of music; but they misconceived the temper of the German people of this inland borough, who were thoroughly patriotic and in sympathy with the government, and they soon found that their conduct wounded the national pride of the people. In the midst of their demonstrations of joy, they were suddenly attacked by a party of citizens, and the attack was made so earnestly as to require the building to be closed and the performance to be stopped. And it is said that if certain prominent English-speaking men of the borough had not interposed in their behalf, they would have been driven out of the town. These men invited and took the women and children to their homes. The names of these men were John McKnight, John Spayd, Marks John Biddle, Charles Evans, Dr. James Diemer, Collinson Read, Rev. John F. Grier and Hon. Robert Porter. The names of the families have not been preserved, excepting possibly two of them,—Wood (father of the late Archbishop Wood, of Philadelphia, and a small boy) and Hood Irvin. I examined the papers published here during this time; but they contain no notice of such a local event, and I interrogated a number of persons without obtaining any definite information beyond the facts mentioned.

OFFICERS AND COMPANIES.—The following officers and companies from Berks County were enlisted in the service during this war:—

The following were the staff officers of Second Brigade:

Major-General, Daniel Udree, 1812-14.
Brigadier-General, David Hottenstine, 1812.

READING WASHINGTON GUARDS.—Another company from Reading was enlisted in this war. It was the "Reading Washington Guards," under the command of Captain Daniel De B. Keim. The company was raised, uniformed and equipped within fifteen days. On the 16th of September, 1814, previous to departure it was paraded and then formed in a circle on Penn Square where the Rev. J. F. Grier (pastor of the Presbyterian Church) deliv-eran an appropriate and pious address. A band of music, under the leadership of Colonel ——. Simons, escorted the company to the Schuylkill where boats were taken. Upon its arrival at Philadelphia, its services were not required for the defense of the city. But it was ordered to join the army near Wilmington, and thence it marched to “Camp Dupont.” It was afterward attached to the “Advance Light Brigade,” Eleventh Company, First Regiment, Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, under the command of General Cadwalader and served till the close of the war. The following is the roll:

Daniel De B. Keim, captain.
Henry Betz, first lieutenant.
Jonathan Good, second lieutenant.
Samuel Baird, ensign.
Samuel Conner, first sergeant.
James D. Biddle, second sergeant.
Nathan P. Hobart, third sergeant.
David Medary, fourth sergeant.
John C. Neidly, fifth sergeant.
Henry W. Pearce, first corporal.
John W. Roseberry, second corporal.
Charles A. Bruckman, third corporal.
J. R. Thomas, fourth corporal.

Peace Declared.—Peace was concluded at Ghent on December 24, 1814. But it was not till February 22, 1815, that the event became known at Reading. During the day, the citizens of the borough signalized it by shooting off cannon, and at night by a grand illumination in which sixteen hundred pounds of candles were consumed.

The following extract of a letter, dated at Reading, on February 23, 1815, written by Mrs. Mary Keim to her husband George De B.

George DeBenneville Keim

Keim, who was then at Philadelphia, describes the manner in which the people of the borough received the news:

"With pleasure did I peruse your affectionate epistle and the preparations for last night's illumination have alone prevented my answering it sooner. As the wife of a true American, I felt disposed to enter patriotically into it, and I exhibited a few emblematic pieces from my chamber windows, which attracted crowds of gazers, who, by loud shouts, evinced their admiration of our house, which was said to excel all the others. But to do justice to the people, the town was brilliantly lighted up and the utmost order prevailed during the early part of the evening. But we unfortunately have two classes of beings; one who considered it a day of privileges, and not even the blessedness of peace to our country could restrain them. By this the Laws of Heaven are violated, the peace of society broken, religious duties and morality ridiculed. Vice alone ruled, and this urged them to destroy a great deal of harmony by breaking windows, lamps, etc."

CHAPTER XI.
MEXICAN WAR.¹

Cause of the War—Reading Artillerists—Departure for Mexico—Participation in War—Battles Engaged In—Return of Artillerists—Brilliant Reception.

CAUSE OF THE WAR.—The Mexican War arose out of the question relating to the annexation of Texas to the United States. The constitution of Mexico prohibited slavery in Texas, and this provision was a sufficient reason why the Southern States of the Union should wish to control it. President Adams and also President Jackson made fruitless efforts to buy the province; and subsequently for some years the scheme of annexation was considered. One of the last acts of Jackson's official life was the appointment of an official agent to Texas, thereby acknowledging the independence of the province. This was looked upon as the first step towards obtaining possession of territory large enough for five new slave states. Henceforward the project was urged with persistence, but little success till about 1842, when President Tyler gave it his encouragement. It was argued that if slavery were abolished in Texas the ruin of the Southern States was inevitable; but if the province were annexed to the Union, the future of the slave States would be brilliant. Van Buren having declined the request of Texas for admission into the Union, he was "killed politically;" and subsequently Webster was removed from Tyler's cabinet because he was not willing to encourage the scheme. In 1844, Calhoun became Secretary of State, and he "believed in annexation at any cost," and President Tyler justified Calhoun's invitation to Texas to join the United States because he thought Great Britain was engaged in a diplomatic intrigue to abolish slavery in Texas. Calhoun then made a treaty with Texas in reference to annexation without the consent of Mexico, but offered Mexico $10,000,000 as an indemnity. But the Senate rejected the treaty; it was not even supported by the Democratic party. Yet, in the Presidential election of 1844, Polk was elected as a Democrat, because he favored annexation, whilst other Democrats, such as Van Buren and Benton, were retired from political favor because of their opposition,—the opposition of the former closing his public career. At the close of Tyler's administration, a joint resolution was passed annexing Texas; and Tyler acting under this resolution the annexation was carried. But as Tyler went out of office with the scheme carried through Congress, Polk came into office with the certainty of war with Mexico. In the beginning of May, 1846, the regular troops under General Taylor were intercepted along the Rio Grande by the Mexican troops under General Arista, and the battles of Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma ensued. Before the news of these events reached Washington, Congress had declared war on the 13th of May, and authorized the President to call for 50,000 volunteers for one year. After carrying on war for nearly two years, the Mexicans were conquered, and a treaty of peace was signed in February, 1848, at the City of Mexico, whereby the United States acquired not only Texas, but also Arizona, New Mexico and California.

During the excitement throughout the country incidental to the declaration of war, a great patriotic feeling was developed at Reading. On the 20th of May, 1846, a large town meeting was held, presided over by Chief Burgess William Betz, at which the national government was sustained. A second meeting was held on the next day, at which appropriate resolutions were adopted, approving the course of President Polk. A prominent prevailing sentiment was—"Our country, our whole country, our country right or wrong." And during this week the volunteer companies of Reading,—Reading Artillers, Washington Grays and National Grays—held meetings and tendered their services to the President.

READING ARTILLERS.1—The following officers and privates comprised the Muster Roll of the "Reading Artillers" when the services of the company were tendered to the President, and accepted with marching orders to proceed to Pittsburg:

Captain, Thos. S. Leser.
First Lieutenant, William Wunder.
First Sergeant, Lewis H. Wunder.
Second Sergeant, Henry Beldinger.

Smith, William Walters and John White.

At a town meeting held in the court-house on December 19, 1846, for the purpose of devising means to aid the volunteers, a committee of prominent citizens was appointed to escort the company to Philadelphia. At the meeting, G. A. Nicolls, in behalf of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company, offered the company a free passage over their railroad to Philadelphia. The meeting recommended to Town Council that one thousand dollars be appropriated towards the comfort of the soldiers and the relief of such of their families as needed assistance.

Subsequently, on December 22, 1846, the Town Council authorized a loan of one thousand dollars for the purposes mentioned. A similar appropriation was recommended by the grand jury of the county on the 5th of January, following, to be made by the county commissioners.

DEPARTURE FOR MEXICO.—The company left Reading for Philadelphia on the 29th day of December. The following interesting description of their departure was published in the Berks and Schuylkill Journal, issued on the 2d of January, 1847:

"The departure of this fine corps of Volunteers, on Saturday morning last [26th December, 1846], for the theatre of war, exhibited one of those scenes which occur but once in a life-time. At an early hour our streets were crowded with citizens of the town, and people and military from various parts of the country.
At eight o'clock the gallant little band formed into line on Fifth street, near Penn, and, preceded by the Committee of Escort and the corps of 'Washington Grays,' they were paraded through our principal streets, followed by crowds of people anxious to take a last look at those who had so nobly volunteered their services to defend the honor of our flag on the plains of a distant country. As they passed through the town, the windows were crowded, and many a fond bosom throbbed with anguish and many a bright eye moistened at the idea of parting for an indefinite time, perhaps forever, with those endowed by them by the ties of kindred and affection. The scene was solemn—so solemn, indeed, that not a cheer rose from the thousands who accompanied them through the streets. The feeling was too deep, too sad; the reflection which their departure excited too melancholy to enliven the spirits of the most enthusiastic.

"At half-past nine o'clock the company reached the Depot and took their station in the cars provided for their accommodation by the liberality of the railroad company. Here a thrilling scene ensued. The last farewell was to be said—the last words spoken. The separation of wives from their husbands, mothers from their sons, sisters from their brothers and friends from one another was touching in the extreme. We noticed many a stout heart, that would scorn to waver on the field of battle, heaving with emotion while going through the feeling ceremony of leave-taking. The crowd around the Depot was one of the largest we have ever seen collected in this borough, and when the signal was given and the cars moved off, they rent the air with a shout that seemed to well up from the bottom of every heart, in one unanimous "God bless you." Most heartily do we hope that every one of this glorious little band of patriotic soldiers may live to return and enjoy the reward of their gallantry for many years yet to come."

The Artillerists arrived at Philadelphia in the afternoon of the same day. After their examination by Dr. Wurts, United States Surgeon, he pronounced them the finest body of men he had yet passed into the service.

On the day previous to their departure, the officers were the recipients of numerous testimonials of regard. The workmen of the railroad company's shops distinguished themselves in this respect. The Captain and the Second and Third Lieutenants were in the company's employ. The officers were presented with swords. Sergeant McMichael was presented with an elegant sword, revolver, sash, belt and accoutrements by his friends and shop-mates engaged at Johnston's foundry. And numerous Colt's revolving pistols and Bibles were also presented.

The Artillerists left Philadelphia by railroad on Monday morning, December 28, and arrived at Harrisburg, December 30, the afternoon of the same day. After dining at Colonel Herr's, they proceeded by railroad to Carlisle and Chambersburg, where they arrived on Tuesday morning at two o'clock. After breakfast, they immediately proceeded afoot on their way to Pittsburgh. That day they walked to McConnellsburg, twenty-two miles. Wednesday they walked to Bloody Run, twenty-six miles. The distance was arranged so as to reach Pittsburgh by Tuesday, January 4th. Three large six-horse baggage teams accompanied them, having been supplied by Joel Ritter, who was sent by the citizens of Reading to pay their expenses to Pittsburgh. They arrived on January 5th. On the same day, the company was mustered into the service of the United States, as Company A, in the Second Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers, under the command of Col. William B. Roberts. Two regiments of volunteers from Pennsylvania were mustered into the service; and two companies of men from Pennsylvania volunteered to make up the quota of New Jersey, which were mustered in and attached to the Second Regiment from Pennsylvania, as Companies L and M.

Participate in War.—The company, with other companies, left Pittsburgh on the 8th of January in the boat "Anthony Wayne," and proceeded by way of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers to New Orleans, arriving there on the 15th. They encamped on the old battle-ground of 1812-15, seven miles below the city. "And there they laid all night in the rain without tents; and, owing to the negligence of certain government officials, they were without provisions for thirty-six hours. This caused much dissatisfaction in the ranks, and, as a consequence, twelve men of the company deserted." Such was their beginning in active military service.

1 "The ten persons last named in the muster roll were not mustered in with the "Artillerists," though they went with the company for that purpose, owing to the military regulation as to the number of each company. They, however, enlisted in other companies, and were mustered into the service. In the election of staff officers for the regiment, at Pittsburgh, on January 6, 1847, Richards McMichael was elected sergeant-major.
The company served with distinction throughout the war and was particularly recognized for its bravery. The following highly complimentary mention was made of the company by Colonel Geary, of the Second Regiment, in his report to General Scott:

"Company A, commanded by Captain T. S. Leser, allowed no one to surpass them in the performance of their duty: in crossing the swamp, ascending the hill, and, in fact, during the whole day, they maintained their position well. I would here beg leave to call to your recollection the gallant conduct of Captain Leser and Lieutenant McMichael, of this company, in crossing from the Garita to the breastwork near the citadel during the afternoon. The great coolness with which they acted in an unusually exposed position will, I hope, receive your particular attention."

The following extract was taken from a letter dated May 20, 1847, at Jalapa, and published in the Philadelphia Ledger; in reference to the brave conduct of Richards McMichael at the battle of Cerro Gordo:

"After we had received the first round of grape and canister, our company fell back with the rest of the ten, when Richards McMichael sprang forward, crying to us to come on. We immediately followed. He led us through the thickest of the fire, the men falling on each side of him, but he, undaunted, still encouraged the wavering and reprimanded the cowardly. Such conduct has gained him the esteem of this regiment. Words I find insufficient to express our admiration of this brave young man . . . ."

Battles Engaged In.—The company was engaged in the following battles: Vera Cruz, March 19th to 28th; Cerro Gordo, April 18th; Chapultepec, September 12th; Belen Gate, September 13th.

Return of Artillerists.—The City of Mexico was taken on the 14th of September, the Mexicans having evacuated the capital during the previous night, owing to the capture of the San Cosmo Causeway and the Belen road. The troops, including Company A, were stationed in this famous city till the 18th of December, when they were removed to San Angel, at which place they continued till peace was declared. They were ordered home about the middle of June, 1848. They then marched to Vera Cruz—consuming about a month in the march—where they took transportation on the bark "Florida" for New Orleans. Thence they proceeded up the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers to Pittsburgh, and were mustered out of service there on the 21st of July. The company then were composed of the following officers and privates:

- Thomas S. Leser, captain.
- Richards McMichael, first lieutenant.
- William Graeff, Ellis L. Aker, 2d lieutenants.
- Jefferson Alocher, first sergeant.
- Charles Leader, second sergeant.
- William Herbert, third sergeant.
- Peter Hogan, fourth sergeant.
- John Frymire, second corporal.
- John E. Arthur, third corporal.
- Nehemiah Bean, fourth corporal.
- Thomas McGee, Musician.

Samuel Burns, drummer, Danville; Adam Bumberger, Philadelphia; Patrick Coldricht Pittsburg; Leopold Hass, York; Edward Lay, York; Augustus Myers, Holidaysburgh; David Welsh, Philadelphia. [These seven men joined the company in December, 1847, and January, 1848.]

Brilliant Reception.—The company then took packets and traveled by canal to Harrisburg, and thence by railroad to Philadelphia.

and Reading. Some of the men went by stage to Reading. Upon their arrival, on the 29th of July, they were given a brilliant military reception. Numerous buildings and streets were handsomely decorated with flags and wreaths. The military procession was under the command of Gen. William H. Keim. The troops numbered over eight hundred men. The battalion consisted of two companies of cavalry under the command of Gen. William High, viz.: — National Troop and Reading Troop — and of eight companies of infantry under the command of Major H. A. Muhlenberg, viz.: — Reading Artillers, Washington Grays, Hamburg Artillers, Womelsdorf Legion, Moselem Blues, Washington Rifle Blues, Friedensburg Light Infantry, Cadets of Military Institute.

After parading through the principal streets of the city, the procession was taken to “Independence Island,” where an appropriate oration was delivered by Charles Davis, Esq.; with which the demonstration ended.

DEATHS.—The following twenty-seven men of the company died in Mexico, mostly from sickness contracted there:

Abraham Roland, April 27, 1847, at Jalapa Hospital, from wounds received at Cerro Gordo in head at right ear; ball lodged under his tongue.

John Sheetz, April 29, 1847, at Jalapa Hospital, from wound received at Cerro Gordo, in calf of left leg.

Charles Dunbar, April 29, 1847, at Jalapa Hospital.1

John Kutz, May 16, 1847, at Vera Cruz Hospital.

William Van Thiel, June 11, 1847, at Perote Hospital, from diarrhoea.

William Patterson, June 17, 1847, at Perote Hospital, from diarrhoea.

Israel Kaercher, July 14, 1847, at Perote Hospital, from rheumatism.

Henry Kaercher, July 30, 1847, at Perote Hospital, from diarrhoea.

James Eason, August 19, 1847, at Perote Hospital, from diarrhoea.

John Fisher, August 25, 1847, at Puebla Hospital, from diarrhoea.

Napoleon Merceron, August 27, 1847, at Perote Hospital.

William S. Diehl, August 29, 1847, at Puebla Hospital, from diarrhoea.

George L. Moss, August 30, 1847, at Perote Hospital.

Henry Beldinger, September 1, 1847, at Puebla Hospital, from diarrhoea.

John Donnelly, September 1, 1847, at Perote Hospital, from diarrhoea.

Daniel L. Forney, September 5, 1847, at Puebla Hospital, from diarrhoea.

Peter Moyer, September 13, 1847, killed in storming of Chapultepec.

Lieutenant William Wunder, September 14, 1847, at Miscoac.2

Sylvester McCaragan, September 27, 1847, at Puebla Hospital, from diarrhoea.

Nathan Metz, October 17, 1847, at City of Mexico, of wound received at Chapultepec.

William Flickinger, November 3, 1847, at Puebla Hospital, from diarrhoea.

Sergeant J. G. Hambright,3 November 7, 1847, at Mexico Hospital.

Bernhard Vaux, November 16, 1847, at Mexico Hospital.

George Henry, November 29, 1847, at Mexico Hospital, of wound received at Gate of Belen.

Daniel Graeff, February 16, 1848, at San Angel.

DISCHARGED.—The following men were discharged during their term of service on account of sickness:

Sergeant L. H. Wunder, April 4, 1847.

Private William M. Smith, from Vera Cruz Hospital, April 4, 1847.

Private John Q. Anderson, from Vera Cruz Hospital, May 17, 1847.

Private William Frey, from Vera Cruz Hospital, May 17, 1847.

Private Albert Myers, from Vera Cruz Hospital, May 17, 1847.

Private William Trayer, from Vera Cruz Hospital, May 17, 1847.

Private Edwin Fritz, from Vera Cruz Hospital, May 17, 1847.

Lieutenant Levi P. Knerr, June 1, 1847.

Private Charles W. Horrell, from Castle of Perote.

Sergeant William W. Diehl, wounded in arm at Puebla de los Angelos.

1 Charles Dunbar fell a victim to camp-fever and died of medical neglect. The sick soldiers were badly treated, and loud complaints were made.

2 Fell sick at Jalapa. His body was sent to Reading. It lay in state in the court-house. On May 13, 1848, an oration was delivered by J. Glancy Jones, Esq., after which the burial was made in the Charles Evans Cemetery. The funeral procession was very large, including military, municipal officers, and Councils, judges, lawyers, physicians and secret organizations. The city generally was crowded with people from the country. After the burial appropriate services were also held in Trinity Lutheran Church.

3 Promoted April 1, 1847.
THE MEXICAN WAR.

Lieutenant H. A. M. Filbert, November 1, 1847 (resigned).
Private Lewis Monzert, from Puebla Hospital, November 5, 1847.
Private Joseph Alexander, from Puebla, where he was sick.

THOMAS S. LEOSER was one of the best-known citizens of Berks County from 1845 to the time of his death.

He was born in the lower part of the county May 27, 1818, and was the son of Dr. Jacob Leoser and Sarah Bull Leoser, the daughter of John Smith, of Joanna Furnace.

He was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania at an early age, and, on the 7th of November, 1838, was married to Mary Hillegas Rheem, the daughter of Jacob Rheem, Esq. of Philadelphia.

He always took an active interest in military matters and commanded a company of militia called the “Reading Artillerists” for some years previous to the Mexican War.

At the breaking out of that war the company volunteered, and was mustered into the service of the United States as Company A, of the Second Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, with him as the commissioned Captain. The Regiment joined Scott’s column at Lobos Island and took part in the work of his army until the occupation of the city of Mexico, participating in the siege of Vera Cruz, the battle of Cerro Gordo, the engagements at Jalapa, Perote and Puebla, the battles of Contreras and Cherubusco, and the storming of Chapultepec.

On the return of the company to Reading, the enthusiasm of its reception was unbounded, and the citizens so far forgot their accustomed phlegmatic demeanor that some of them carried Captain Leoser from the station to his residence on their shoulders.

Before the war began, he had received from Governor Shunk a commission as brigade inspector for Dauphin, Lebanon, Berks and Schuylkill Counties for four years. During his absence in Mexico the duties of this office were performed by a substitute.

After his return from the war, Captain Leoser enjoyed the greatest popularity among his fellow-citizens, and, when he died, September 12, 1849, of an affection of the stomach and liver contracted in Mexico, his loss was universally mourned by the community. He left to survive him two sons—Charles McKnight Leoser and Christopher Leoser—and a daughter, Sidney H., married to Morton C. McIlvain; a third son, Thomas S., having died in infancy.

The Civil War in our country broke out in April, 1861. The direct cause was the agitation of the great subject which related to slavery. In 1820 religion started the movement for freedom in the northern part of our country, and about the same time trade started the movement for slavery in the southern part. These two agents in the development of our people moved, as it were, westwardly from the Atlantic Ocean, side by side in the onward course of time, the one in the northern section and the other in the southern section, without any substantial interference for two hundred years. When independence from the British government was agitated on account of burdensome taxation, all the States north and south united in the one common purpose of establishing a free, representative government, separate and apart by themselves, of, for and by the people, and through this union they were enabled to carry on successfully the Revolutionary War, which, after a severe trial of eight years, resulted in their favor. In 1787 delegates from these several States assembled together for the purpose of formulating a Constitution for their general government and protection as a nation, and in this they were entirely successful. In the interest of harmony and progress, large concessions were made to the Southern States on the subject of slavery. The two agents, religion and slavery, were able to move along successfully side by side for a number of years afterward by reason of their separation. But as education developed greater notions of liberty and equality, and as steam brought the people of the several sections of the country closer together, and as manufactures and traffic induced them to trade with one another more intimately and more frequently, these two agents began to antagonize each other more and more, and statesmen of the North and of the South anticipated the danger of an inevitable conflict between them. Increasing liberality in religion introduced many improvements, directly and indirectly, amongst the people of the North. Population and wealth increased rapidly over an enlarging area of territory, and these gave the northern section more States and a stronger political influence and power. But slavery was stationary in the South, new political rights were not awakened, progress in any direction was not developed, though new States were erected and political representation was increased to preserve the balance of power between the two agents. After 1850 the extension of slavery on the one hand, and its restriction on the other, became thoroughly national questions and their animated discussion resulted in a terrible struggle for the supremacy. Till this time the South had the general control of political affairs through leadership and legislation. But the Southern statesmen then saw that their political power was in reality passing away through the wonderful growth of the North in population and wealth, and in political representation in the national government. A similar growth could not be effected in the South; so its leaders desired to extend the rights of slavery. This was particularly apparent upon the admission of Kansas as a State. The Republican party—the exponent of restricting slavery to territory then occupied—became an active political factor in the country in 1856; but its Presidential candidate was defeated. Threats of secession by the Southern States had been made about that time, and it was thought that if the Republican party had been successful, secession would have been attempted.

For four years this question was prominent above all other questions. Buchanan preserved the peace during his administration, but he could not preserve the balance of power. Public opinion grew more favorable towards the Republican party, and in 1860 this party appeared before the people with renewed strength. During that time the Democratic party agitated the question of slavery to such an extent that two branches of the party were created,—one, the Douglas branch, for submitting the question to the people of a new State upon its erection; and the other, the Breckenridge branch, for submitting it to the Supreme Court for adjudication under the national Constitution,—and in the Presidential campaign of 1860 their political power was divided. The party was still strong enough, as a whole, to elect a candidate; but it was not strong enough to bear a division, especially such a division as Douglas was able to create by the support which he had won through public discussion. Lincoln, the Republican candidate, was elected. From the sentiments of his party—especially from the sentiments of its ultra-leaders, who were styled “Abolitionists”—the Southern leaders felt constrained to take earnest steps towards secession; and these steps were taken between the day of the election, in November, and the day of Lincoln’s inauguration, in March, not only vigorously, but successfully, without the slightest hindrance on the part of the national government. Prominent Cabinet officials, Senators and Representatives withdrew from their respective positions and caused their several States to pass ordinances of secession, declaring the contract between them and the national government broken. When Lincoln took possession of the government, the status was not only discouraging but very alarming. In his inaugural address, he stated that apprehension seemed to exist among the people of the Southern States that, by the accession of a Republican administration, their property, peace and personal security were to be endangered, but that there never had been any reasonable cause for such apprehension; and he declared that he had no purpose, directly or indirectly, to interfere with the institution of slavery in the States where it existed. He had no inclination to do so on the one hand, and on the other he had no lawful right. Those who had nominated and elected him did so with the full knowledge that he had made these declarations, which he had never recanted; and, besides, his party had placed in their platform the clear and emphatic resolution:

“That the maintenance, inviolate, of the rights of the States, and especially the right of each State to order and control its own domestic institutions, according to its own judgment exclusively, is essential to that balance of power on which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric depend; and we denounce the lawless invasion of the soil of any State or territory by armed force, no matter under what pretext, as among the gravest of crimes."

He then reiterated these sentiments and pressed upon the public attention the most conclusive evidence of which the case was susceptible, that the property, peace and security of no section were to be in any wise endangered by his administration. Notwithstanding his plain and direct language, to perform the duties of his office according to the Constitution and laws, without any mental reservations or any purposes to constrain them by hypercritical rules, and his expressed sentiments for peace and inseparable union of the States, the Southern leaders persisted in secession and disunion; and when he endeavored to protect national property they rose up in arms and committed positive acts of treason.

In April, 1861, Fort Sumter was bombarded from the fortresses and batteries at Charleston in such a furious manner that the commander was forced to surrender it. This was the signal for war, and the people in the North rose with a grand, patriotic impulse to punish the outrage. The President issued a requisition for seventy-five thousand troops, in order to quell the disturbance in the insurrectionary States, and the response was prompt and noble. The national government had not, as yet, done anything to cause the South to feel alarmed, but this hostile demonstration required it to show some positive action towards defending its property and enforcing its laws. The excitement at Reading, as everywhere else in the North, was intense. Captain James Mc Knight offered his company of Ringgold Light Artillery, and it was the first military organization that responded to the call and moved to the defense of the country. This historical fact is worthy of especial mention, for in it our people take a just, patriotic pride, and it is a distinction in this great crisis of our country which no other community enjoys. It was hoped that this simple manifestation of executive authority would restore peace; but the organization at the South was too thorough, and its purpose to establish, if possible, a confederation by itself, was too premeditated. Men rushed to arms and were forced into dreadful warfare, call after call for troops was made, and thousands of lives were sacrificed, and millions of dollars were expended, in the two sections, for a right which each claimed,—the one to establish a confederation and the other to maintain constituted authority,—and this terrible contest continued four years before peace was restored.

It is not my purpose to write a history of the war. I simply desire to record the patriotism which our county displayed upon this occasion by narrating the more prominent events which transpired in our community during this period.

Patriotism of County.—The feeling here for maintaining the Union and upholding the Constitution was strong and continuous during the entire period from the beginning to the close of the war; and this was exhibited by Democrats and Republicans alike. Breckenridge had received a majority over Lincoln, exceeding two thousand votes, but the sentiment for the Union was general in all our districts, especially at Reading. Companies were raised rapidly and mustered into service—numbering eighty-seven, almost entirely enlisted in and from the county. They went to the rescue freely, moved by the highest patriotic impulse. Public meetings were numerous and earnest sympathy for the cause was manifested at all of them. The prominent men took the lead. Our judges, lawyers and merchants, and business men generally, without respect to party affiliations, united to encourage and sustain the national administration. Their pronounced opinion in the matter created and preserved a proper spirit in the community. The county and city governments were constantly liberal in appropriations of money towards encouraging volunteer enlistments. But the methods of conducting the war received a degree of criticism amounting to condemnation. This was natural from partisans who entertained political opinions opposed to those of the administration in power. A disposition to criticise and condemn was shown even in small local matters; how much more was it to be expected in national matters of such enormous proportions, involving the appropriation of millions of dollars and the exercise of extreme legislative and executive authority over the people! Certain measures, which were resorted to during the progress of the war, such as the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, the issue of paper money, the conscription of men for military service, the proclamation of emancipation, the enlistment and disfranchisement of negroes, etc., were particularly objectionable, but they were consequences that were unavoidable under the trying circumstances in which the country was placed; and, if they were not exactly within the letter of the Constitution, the preservation of the country, its property, its government and its people justified them entirely. A national Constitution and all the laws growing out of it could not be paramount, in such an extreme emergency, to national existence, inasmuch as they were particularly designed to preserve it; and this was certainly no time for "sympathizers,"—a class of individuals which prevailed here as elsewhere. Further indulgence of the South—after it had taken national property and carried on destructive warfare, and especially after its army had invaded Pennsylvania, not for the purpose of defending its property and political rights, but for the purposes of vengeance, of destroying our property and of jeopardizing the peace and security of our political existence—ceased to be a virtue; and those who were not for the Government were against the Union. These two were one and inseparable. For them extraordinary measures were enacted, not promptly and hastily, but only after much discussion and delay. They were forced upon the people as justifiable war measures.

Our country contained a large majority of people who were against the war, if we interpret their opinion from the exercise of their political suffrage at elections; but they were submissive—they caused no trouble, no riotous demonstration. This reflects great credit upon them as a law-abiding community. Our national and State governments, by enactments, required these things of them, and therefore they bore them. They went to the war by the thousand, they endured conscription without opposition and they permitted the assessment of burdensome taxation. They encouraged appropriations of money, amounting to nearly a million of dollars, expressly for the enlistment of men, and they invested large sums of money in the national securities. These, taken together, truly constitute significant evidence of devotion to their country and to the administration of its affairs by an opposite party,—a party whose principles were not only different from theirs, but, in fact, objectionable, if not repulsive, to them. Their general conduct of co-operation under such circumstances is therefore commendable and worthy of this prominent mention.

During this period, the excitement throughout the county was ever active, and several times, when the State was invaded by the revengeful, destructive rebels, and our own county was threatened with the horrors of war, it became alarming. This was particularly the case at Reading. Penn Square was daily, more or less, in commotion with the enlistment of men, the formation and exercise of companies and their departure to the seat of war or their return from it. The music of fife and drum and the marching of men—fathers, husbands, brothers and sons—thrilled the entire community time and again. These were, indeed, events that made a lasting impression upon that generation. Two encampments—one in the northern part of Reading in 1862, and another in the eastern part in 1863—attracted much attention. They afforded the people an opportunity of forming a proper conception of camp-life and military discipline. If our peaceful inhabitants did not realize the actual terrors and horrors of warfare by the booming of cannon, the explosion of shells and the destruction of property in their midst; if they did not see blood and death in their highways and upon their fields as the evidence of bitter opposition and revenge, they saw officers and soldiers in uniforms and witnessed military exercises with the weapons of war, and they knew by their own personal observations that earnest preparations were made for encounters with the enemy. How they looked at these military cities, with tents and streets under strict regulation! how they watched the men in drill, by Platoons and companies and battalions! how they pointed out generals and colonels and captains as the men who had been in war and passed safely through the jaws of death! But when the wounded, the dying and the dead were brought home to them, then they felt that the curse of rebellion was in the land. Did they catch the true spirit with these things about them? Yes; they sprang to the rescue,—they either went themselves or urged others to go to preserve the Union,—they raised money and endured burdensome taxation, amounting to the millions; their mothers, wives and daughters prepared flags for the men, and said, "Go, defend these banners; let not a star be torn away. You have our prayers. Your patriotism must win the crown of victory." With such inspirations our men, as men everywhere throughout the North, went to this war.

The religious services during this time were intensely interesting. Oh, what praise, what sermons, what tears, what prayers! The souls of this great community in the numerous churches were as one in earnest efforts to win the favor of God,—the God of our fathers who had been blessed in their Revolution and struggle for independence and freedom,—so that the Union could be preserved as it had been transmitted unto them. Every minister was eloquent, and he could well be eloquent upon such a subject with an excited audience before him.

The "Union League," a Republican association at Reading, organized after the great "Union League" at Philadelphia, was very active in enlisting men for military service; and so were the various secret societies, especially the "Junior Sons of America."

In the midst of the great excitement incident to the general feelings for war and the necessary preparations to carry it on successfully, our local energy displayed itself to a remarkable degree in every department of business. Trade was both active and profitable, and it stimulated various enterprises. Railroads were projected and substantial improvements were made in every section of the county, especially at Reading; and matters pertaining to education and religion were directed with earnestness and success. The prices of all kinds of material were high; but money was abundant and a spirit of increased liberality kept it moving about actively from hand to hand, from store to store, from bank to bank and from place to place.

War-Meetings and Appropriations.—After the election of Lincoln, a sentiment of fear for the preservation of the Union of our several States developed more and more rapidly with each passing day. This was more especially caused by the action of certain Southern States on the subject of secession. This fear obtained at Reading; and in order to express the opinion of this community on the subject of "preserving the integrity of the Union," a large meeting, including prominent men of both political parties, was held in the court-house on December 13, 1860. Hon. John Banks was chosen president. Appropriate resolutions were adopted, favorable to the Union, but particularly recommending non-interference with the rights of property in slaves guaranteed by the Constitution to the Southern States. John S. Richards and Hiester Clymer delivered most effective and highly appreciated speeches.

On the 10th of December (three days before) the Democratic City Club had met and reported a "Memorial to Congress on the State of the Union," prepared by a committee of thirty-three prominent Democrats, in which similar sentiments of non-interference and compromise had been expressed.

In July, 1862, when there was a threatened invasion of Pennsylvania, our people became very much alarmed for the safety of their lives and property. Large and enthusiastic meetings were held in the court-house to devise means for protection. They included all the prominent and influential citizens of Reading, such as Hon. W. J. Woodward, J. Pringle Jones, John Banks, J. Glancy Jones, Wm. M. Hiester and George D. Stitzel, Drs. H. H. Muhlenberg, Diller Luther and C. H. Hunter, and Messrs. Jacob Knabb, J. Lawrence Getz, A. F. Boas, John McManus, G. A. Nicolls, John S. Richards, Isaac Eckert, Levi B. Smith and William M. Baird. Their public expressions were thoroughly patriotic; and, in pursuance of their earnest recommendation, the county commissioners—Paul Wendich, George K. Lorah and Jacob Donahower—offered a bounty of fifty dollars to every officer and private mustered into the service from the county. In September following, the commissioners again offered the same bounty for every volunteer soldier; and the City Councils appropriated ten thousand dollars additional for the purpose of encouraging volunteer enlistments; and in June, 1863, similar meetings were held.

The city of Reading appropriated altogether for war purposes, in bounties, relief, etc., $373,179, as follows: 1861, $500; 1862, $804; 1863, $2,509; 1864, $258,760; 1865, $110,606. And the County of Berks the sum of $432,389, as follows: 1861, $12,319; 1862, $45,082; 1863, $19,788; 1864, $347,750; 1865, $27,450.

The total amount, for the city and county, was $825,568. Besides this sum, the boroughs likewise appropriated and raised moneys for the same purpose: Kutztown, $16,005-21; Bernville, $6953.81; Boyertown, ______; Hamburg, ______; Womelsdorf, ______.

LADIES’ AID SOCIETY.—The men of our community are presented very prominently in this period of our history. But the women are also worthy of respectful mention for their patriotism. They did not enlist in practical military service; but they gave the national administration a moral support which is truly praiseworthy. Just as the “Ringgold Light Artillery” were preparing to take the Lebanon Valley railroad train on the afternoon of April 16, 1861, to proceed to Harrisburg in answer to the call of President Lincoln for troops, certain influential ladies of Reading assembled in the parlor of Mrs. Dr. Diller Lather, on Penn Street (No. 530), and formed a society, which they entitled “Ladies’ Aid Society.” Its object was to supply the soldiers with clothing and materials useful whilst in military service away from home. It was actively engaged during the entire period of the war, collecting and forwarding tons of materials. A “depot” was established at Reading, to which all the goods were carried and from which they were consigned. This was in a small frame building situate on North Fifth Street, No. 116. The country districts were encouraged to cooperate in this benevolent work, and the ladies there responded nobly by forwarding materials to Reading. The meetings of the society were held for a time in the “Pearson Building,” No. 432 Penn Street, on the second floor, the room for this purpose having been generously given by Mr. John S. Pearson, free of rent; and afterward in the building occupied by the provost-marshal of this district, No. 520 Penn Street.

This was the first society of the kind organized in the country; and as we take a just pride in having furnished the military company which was the first to respond to the call for troops and to report at Harrisburg for service, so do we take a similar pride in having organized this Ladies’ Aid Society, which was the first to take active and successful steps towards providing for the comfort and welfare of the soldiers.

This society participated actively in the matters pertaining to the Sanitary Commission at Philadelphia, and it was represented by a number of ladies at the great “Sanitary Fair,” which was held in that city for the purpose of raising funds to relieve the wants of the soldiers.

The officers of the society were Mrs. Rosa C. Nicolls, president; Mrs. Catharine Hause, vice-president; Mrs. Annie H. Muhlenberg, treasurer; Mrs. Maria W. Brooke, secretary.
In July, 1866, a general review of its charitable work was published by the treasurer, Mrs. Annie H. Muhlenberg (widow of the Hon. Henry A. Muhlenberg). It was as follows:

"A statement of money and supplies received and forwarded during the war:

"Cash received from:
- Individuals: $1541.30
- Church collections: 1265.12

Reading Hospital.—A “Military Hospital” was fitted up at Reading during the middle of June, 1862, in the main exhibition building of the Agricultural Society, on the “Fair Ground,” with cots sufficient to accommodate one hundred and thirty patients, and successfully conducted till the spring of 1863. The “Ladies’ Aid Society” of Reading took an active interest in the welfare of the sick and wounded soldiers, and performed admirable service during the continuance of the hospital. The regularly commissioned surgeons in attendance were Dr. Martin Luther and Dr. John B. Brooke.

Draft and Quotas of Berks County.—During the progress of the war, requisitions for troops became so frequent that the government was compelled to resort to the conscription of men for the purpose of enabling it to prosecute the war with success. Numerous volunteers enlisted from Berks County, and the citizens of this district responded nobly to the several calls for troops. But here, as elsewhere, the draft had to be made.

There were four drafts, one in each of the years 1862, 1863, 1864 and 1865. The provost-marshal of this district were, in succession, Henry I. Kupp, Jacob C. Hoff and George W. Durell.

The first draft was conducted in October, 1862. By the following table, the total enrollment of men in the county numbered 17,809; the volunteers, 3,186; and the quota, 2,719. The number of men who volunteered in lieu of draft was 345; and the substitutes who enlisted for three years numbered 146. The total number of men drafted in the county was 1,242. These men were encamped on the “Deininger Farm,” adjoining the Evans’ Cemetery on the north, formed into companies and placed under the command of Colonel Charles Knoderer. They were mustered into service as the One Hundred and Sixty-seventh Regiment.

A second draft was made August 26-29, 1863. The quota of men to be furnished by the county was 1,554—this number having been fifty per cent. in excess to provide against exemptions.

The draft was made on a platform in front of the marshal’s office, southwest corner of Fifth and Cherry Streets, Reading, by a blind man (George Phillippi), who was blindfolded in the presence of the following committee of prominent citizens specially appointed to be present upon the occasion:

Charles Kessler, editor of Adler; J. Lawrence Getz, editor of Gazette; Jacob Knabb, editor of Journal; Arnold Pwuelle, editor of Beobachter; A. S. Whitman, editor of Times; H. J. Moore, editor of Press; Hon. W. J. Woodward, president judge; H. R. Hawman, county commissioner; Hon. J. S. Hoyer, mayor; Rev. C. A. Pauli; Rev. F. A. M. Keller; Rev. Francis O’Connor; Hon. George D. Stitzel; Hon. S. E. Ancona; Hon. Hiester Clymer; Daniel Ermentrout; Richard Boone; Isaac Eckert; Peter Hoch.
The third draft proposed in March, 1864, for Berks County, was postponed for a time. The quota in the call for two hundred thousand men was 767; the deficiency of the county under former drafts was 298; total number required, 1,065, and the credit of the county on April 15, 1864, for men supplied to the government, 1036. This deficiency of 20 men was more than supplied by re-enlisted veterans. Subsequently, however, in May, a draft was ordered, upon finding a deficiency in certain sub-districts in the county. Each sub-district was required to fill its own quota. The total number drawn was 172.

Northern Men in Service

A call for 500,000 men was made on July 18, 1864. The quota for Berks County was 1887 —for Reading, 480. On August 1st, the deficiency in the county was 1,625—in Reading 212. A draft was made on September 22d, but only for one sub-district—Ruscomb-manor, fifty-two men—all the other sub-districts having supplied their deficiencies.

A fourth draft was made February 23–25, 1865. Reading, Upper Bern, Bernville, Cumru, Douglass, Spring, Upper Tulpehocken, and Womelsdorf had supplied their quota of men by volunteers. The call was made in December, 1864, for 300,000, the quota of which for Pennsylvania was 49,563, and of Berks County, 1560.

Total Enrolled

The aggregate number of men furnished by Pennsylvania was three hundred and sixty-six thousand three hundred and twenty-six; reduced to three years' standard, two hundred and sixty-seven thousand five hundred and fifty-eight. It is estimated that during the war fifty-six thousand national soldiers were killed in battle, and about thirty-five thousand died in hospitals of wounds, and one hundred and eighty-four thousand by disease. The total casualties, if we include those who died subsequent to their discharge, were about three hundred thousand. The loss of the Confederates was less in battle, owing to the defensive character of their struggle; but they lost more from wounds and by disease, on account of inferior sanitary arrangements. The total loss of life caused by the Rebellion exceeded half a million of men, and nearly as many more were disabled.

Summary of Battles.—In the four years of service, the armies of the Union—counting every form of conflict, great and small—had been in twenty-two hundred and sixty-five engagements with the Confederate troops. From the time when active hostilities began until the last gun of the war was fired, a fight of some kind—a raid, a skirmish or a pitched battle—occurred at some point on our widely-extended front nearly eleven times a week, upon an average. Counting only those engagements in which the Union loss, in killed, wounded and missing, exceeded one hundred, the total number was three hundred and thirty. From the northermost point of contact to the southermost, the distance by any practicable line of communication was more than two thousand miles. From East to West the extremes were fifteen hundred miles apart. During the first year of hostilities—one of preparation on both sides—the battles were naturally fewer in number and less decisive in character than afterwards, when discipline had been imparted to the troops by drill, and when the material of war had been collected and stored for prolonged campaigns. The engagements of all kinds in 1861 were thirty-five in number, of which the most serious was the Union defeat at Bull Run. In 1862 the war had greatly increased in magnitude and intensity, as is shown by the eighty-four engagements between the armies. The net result of the year's operations was highly favorable to the Rebellion. In 1863 the battles were one hundred and ten in number,—among them some of the most significant and important victories for the Union. In 1864 there were seventy-three engagements, and in the winter and early spring of 1865 there were twenty-eight.1

Paper Money.—Before the Civil War, it had been the uniform practice of the different States to allow banks to be established for the issue of notes, payable in specie on demand. These banks were established by acts of the local Legislature, which limited the liability of the shareholders. Banking then was quite free, and all individuals could carry it on, provided they pursued the requirements of the law. But under this system there was great fluctuation in value, which produced an unprecedented amount of bankruptcy and ruin. Between 1811 and 1820 many banks became bankrupt; and twenty years afterward another financial panic occurred. The inflation of the bank-notes was wonderful between 1830 and 1837. But just as the amount had then increased, so it decreased during the following six years till 1843; and this caused the ruin of many moneyed institutions. Among them was the Bank of the United States, the renewal of whose charter had been denied by President Jackson.

The loss in the value of stocks and property of all kinds was enormous. But great as the loss was, it was trifling compared with the injury which resulted to society in disturbing the elements of social order and in causing the utter demoralization of men by the irresistible temptation to speculation which it afforded and by swindling to retain riches dishonestly obtained. Another crash took place in 1857.

At the beginning of the war the paper money in circulation amounted to $200,000,000, of which three-fourths had been issued in the Northern or loyal States; and the coin amounted to $275,000,000. The early necessities of the national treasury in this trying period compelled the government to borrow money, and in this behalf, in February, 1862, Congress authorized the issue of treasury notes amounting to $150,000,000, and declared them to be legal tender except for customs duties and for interest on the national debt. This action was taken after a full, if not a bitter, discussion of the question. Its constitutionality was contested vigorously, but unsuccessfully.

A premium on gold naturally followed, causing it to be drawn entirely from circulation, and this increased as the treasury notes multiplied. Then the National Banking system was introduced to supply a circulating medium. This was created on February 25, 1863, and amended June 3, 1864, whereby a Bureau and Comptroller of Currency were appointed in the Treasury Department, with power to authorize banking associations, under certain provisions, for public security. The existing State banks were rapidly transformed into national banks under this system and their previous notes were withdrawn from circulation. The currency of the country in this manner came to consist of treasury demand notes, which in 1865 amounted to $450,000,000, and of national bank notes, which approached the limit of $300,000,000. The latter circulated as freely as the former, because their ultimate redemption was assured by the deposit of an adequate amount in United States bonds at the national treasury. This system was found superior in the protection against loss which it afforded; but it could not prevent a financial crisis from sweeping over the country, especially when other causes, such as excessive manufactures and enormous losses from fire, contributed greatly towards the result.

Congress also authorized small notes for five, ten, twenty-five and fifty cents to be issued for the purpose of supplying the loss of the small denominations of coin money from circulation. This was commonly known as "currency." It was all redeemed after the war.

During this period our merchants at Reading issued and circulated for a time their own fractional demand notes for the purpose of encouraging trade amongst one another. But it was gradually redeemed as the national currency was supplied.

List of Companies from Berks County in Civil War.—The following eighty-seven companies of men were enlisted from Berks County and mustered into the service of the National Government in the Civil War. Eleven of the companies included men which were accredited to other counties. Reckoning all the men together in the companies named and in the unclassified alphabetical arrangement following them, it can be asserted that at least eight thousand five hundred men of our county were engaged in the great and successful struggle for the preservation of the Union:

PRESIDENT'S CALL FOR TROOPS.—The Civil War was begun on the morning of the 12th of April, 1861. The military forces of South Carolina, under the leadership of General Robert Beauregard, then began to fire upon Fort Sumter, which was under the command of Major Robert Anderson. The President of the United States, finding the laws of the country opposed and the execution thereof obstructed in seven Southern States1 "by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings or by the powers vested in the marshals by law," issued a proclamation on the 15th day of April, 1861, calling for seventy-five thousand militia of the several States of the Union, "in order to suppress said combinations and to cause the laws to be duly executed;" and therein he appealed "to all loyal citizens to favor, facilitate and aid this effort to maintain the honor, integrity and existence of our national Union, and the perpetuity of popular government and to redress the wrongs already long enough endured." A call was made on Pennsylvania for sixteen regiments. Two regiments were wanted within three days, inasmuch as the city of Washington was entirely unprotected and a sudden dash upon it was strongly threatened.

FIRST COMPANIES.—Among the first troops to respond to this call were the Ringgold Light Artillery (Captain James McKnight) of Reading, the Logan Guards (Captain J. B. Selheimer) of Lewistown, the Washington Artillery (Captain James Wren) and the National Light Infantry (Captain McDonald) of Pottsville, and the Allen Rifles (Captain Thomas Yeager) of Allentown.

On January 21, 1861, Major-General Wil-lieutenant H. Keim (then surveyor-general of Pennsylvania, from Reading), with characteristic sagacity, advised Captain McKnight that the services of his company 1 would probably soon be needed, 2 and counseled him to hold them in readiness for immediate service. From that time till April 16th almost daily drills were practiced. On the 22d of February they were in readiness to obey marching orders. The dispatch announcing the attack on Fort Sumter found the company at drill at some distance from the city. The effect was electrical. All were impatient to move to the defense of the flag.

On the morning of the 16th of April, marching orders were received from Governor Curtin; and, on the afternoon of the same day, the company moved by the Lebanon Valley Railroad to Harrisburg, where it arrived at eight o'clock in the evening. 3 The company numbered one hundred and eight men, fully armed and equipped as light artillery. On reporting at the Executive Office (the Governor being absent in Washington) orders were sought from the Secretary of War (Simon Cameron), who telegraphed that the company be forwarded by the earliest train. This order was, later in the day, countermanded by the Secretary of the Commonwealth. 4

The five volunteer companies named were mustered into the service of the United States at Harrisburg for three months, and departed for Washington by railroad, on the 18th of April, at nine o'clock A.M. They arrived at Baltimore at one o'clock P.M. They were under the necessity of marching about two miles through the city, from Bolton to Camden Station. On leaving the cars, a battalion was formed in the following order: Fourth Artillery (regulars); Logan Guards; Allen Rifles, of Allentown; Washington Artillery and National Light Infantry, of Pottsville; with the Ringgold Artillery bringing up the rear. As the column was forming near Bolton Station, the police of Baltimore appeared in large force, headed by Marshall Kane, and followed by a mob, who at once commenced an attack upon the volunteers, countenanced by a portion of the police, who had been sent to give safe conduct through the city. Orders were given to the men to preserve their temper, and to make no reply to anything that should be said to them. At the command “forward,” the mob commenced hooting, jeering and yelling, and proclaimed, with oaths, that the troops should not pass through their city to fight the South.

Arriving near the centre of the city, Pemberton, with his regulars 5 filed off toward Fort

1 The Ringgold Light Artillery of Reading, a volunteer company, was organized and equipped under James McKnight, captain. It was armed with four six-pounder brass field-pieces and caissons, with full equipments of artillerymen, including sabres. The muster-roll included ninety men. It was composed of good material, and was well drilled, and was the pride of the city of Reading. It had participated in several volunteer encampments, one at Easton, of a week’s duration, where it was entertained by ex-Governor Reeder and other leading citizens.

2 At this time Captain McKnight recommended to Major General Keim three other companies in Berks County—one at Friedensburg (Schroeder’s), a second at Womelsdorf (Clouse’s) and a third at Hamburg. Immediately after their departure Jacob Knabb (senior editor of the Berks and Schuylkill Journal) sent the following telegram to the Associated Press:

   “Reading, April 16, 1861.—The Ringgold Flying Artillery (Captain James McKnight), with 108 men and four field-pieces, having received a requisition from the Governor this morning, set out this evening for Harrisburg, the place of rendezvous. They are the first Pennsylvanians in the field.”

4 “HARRISBURG, April 16, 1861.

   CAPTAIN JAMES MCKNIGHT:

   “Dear Sir,—You will please delay your march to Washington until ordered by the Governor.

   “Respectfully yours,

   “ELI SLIFER.”

If this order had not been given the company would have reached Washington before daylight on the morning of the 17th of April, or before any of the other Pennsylvania companies left their homes. It was the first organized volunteer company in the United States to offer its services to the government—an offer having been made to General Scott a month before the President’s first call for troops. It was the first company to leave home after the call, and the first to reach Harrisburg and report for duty.

A long article was prepared by Hon. William M. Hiester and published in the Berks and Schuylkill Journal on June 18, 1870, proving these assertions. But similar assertions were made before in the Journal (see issue of June 16, 1866; also May 7, 1870).

5 The regulars were under the command of a sergeant. Pemberton was not with them, he having been in the passenger train. Captain McKnight met him there.
McHenry, leaving the volunteers to pursue their way through the city as well as they could. At this juncture the mob were excited to a perfect frenzy, breaking the line of the police, and pushing through the files of men, in an attempt to break upon the column. Every insult that could be heaped upon the troops was offered, but no word of reply was elicited. The officers and men marched steadily on toward Camden Station. At every step the mob increased till it numbered thousands of most determined and desperate men.

As the volunteers were boarding the train at the station, the angry mob hurled a shower of bricks, stones and clubs into their disorganized ranks, fortunately, however, inflicting only slight injuries. In the midst of the confusion, an attempt was made to detach the engine from the train and run it away. This was only prevented by the determined character of the engineer and his assistants, who drew revolvers and threatened to shoot any who dared to make the attempt. At length, amidst the demoniac yells of the crowd, the train moved off, carrying the volunteers safely beyond the reach of their desperate assailants. They arrived in Washington at seven o'clock in the evening. Arms, ammunition and equipments were furnished and the work of barricading the Capitol was commenced immediately. Squads of the rebel soldiers were then drilling on the opposite side of the Potomac River in full view of the Capitol. It having been ascertained on the 23d of April that an attempt would be made to capture Washington by way of the arsenal and the navy-yard, the "Ringgold Artillerists" were ordered to report to Captain Dahlgren, at the navy-yard. Three twelve-pound howitzers were assigned to them, with which they were expected to defend the place. Excepting a detachment of twelve men, detailed to guard the "Short Bridge," the entire command was required to man these guns. On the 25th a sergeant and six men were detailed to serve as a guard on the steamer "Powhatan," which was dispatched to make a reconnoissance down the Potomac for the purpose of searching for obstructions and of ascertaining if forts were being erected along the river. On the 26th the company were ordered to duty at the Capitol; and on the 15th of May the Secretary of War assigned them to duty at the Washington Arsenal, where they remained till the expiration of their term of service, excepting a short interval, when they were detailed to mount guns in the forts about Washington. They were mustered out at Harrisburg.

These first five companies were justly entitled to the first place in the First Regiment of the Pennsylvania troops; but they were not organized till after twenty-four regiments, which succeeded them in the service, had been organized and fully equipped, when they became part of the Twenty-fifth and last regiment for the three months' service. Henry L. Cake, of Pottsville, was elected colonel of this regiment. But these companies, serving in Fort Washington, did not see their regiment or colonel. Nearly two months of the three for which they had enlisted passed by before they received adequate clothing or camp equipage from either the State or the national government; and many of the men were excused from duty because of their partial nakedness.

1. The House of Representatives passed a resolution on 22d of July, 1861, tendering thanks to these companies for passing through the mob of Baltimore and reaching Washington on the 18th of April, for the defense of the national capital. Such a resolution is rarely passed and only to signalize great and distinguished service.

2. The Washington Chronicle, in publishing a chronological list of the troops which arrived in Washington, stated that these companies were the very first to arrive in the city after the publication of the President's proclamation.

3. When the company left Harrisburg they were ordered to leave behind their field pieces and equipments, with the exception of sabres, and these were not restored to them till the 16th of May.

4. This statement is made by Bates, in the "History of the Pennsylvania Volunteers." But it is erroneous. The Ringgold Artillery was the only company that was regularly uniformed and equipped when these companies reached Washington. The other companies were in citizens' dress, but received uniforms and equipments several days after their arrival. The Ringgold Artillerists retained their uniform and drew none from the government. The companies without uniforms were not recognized in the mob at Baltimore; and only a dozen or fifteen men inSelheimer's company carried rifles.
RINGGOLD LIGHT ARTILLERY (THE FIRST COMPANY).

At a military celebration held at Philadelphia on July 4, 1866, the post of honor in the parade was not given to the Ringgold Light Artillery, as the first company from Pennsylvania in the War of the Union; on which account the company refused to participate in the parade. Its place in history having been unjustly given to another company, the Hon. William M. Hiester prepared a paper to prove that the Ringgold Light Artillery was the first company, and read the same before the Historical Society of Berks County on June 14, 1870. In it he sustained the claim by incontrovertible evidence. I submit the following extracts as a valuable part of the chapter in this history to the Civil War:

President Lincoln issued his proclamation for seventy-five thousand men, April 15, 1861. On that morning, the Ringgold Light Artillery were drilling with full ranks, armed and equipped, on their parade-ground, a short distance from the city, when telegraphic news of the proclamation of the President reached the company on parade. The following dispatch was forthwith sent to Governor Curtin and appears in the record of dispatches in the office of the adjutant-general at Harrisburg:

"Reading, April 15, 1861.
"Governor A. G. Curtin:

"The Ringgold Light Artillery are parading this morning with their guns for practice, have ninety men on parade, every one of them expecting to be ordered on duty for the U.S. service before they leave their guns.

"H. A. Lantz."

The deputy secretary of the commonwealth, as appears by the first dispatch recorded on that day as sent, answered,—

"Harrisburg, April 15, 1861.
"H. A. Lantz, Reading:

"Dispatch received. Will answer more fully as soon as possible.

"S. B. Thomas, Deputy Secretary."

This was followed by another dispatch from the secretary of the commonwealth, omitted in the record of dispatches at Harrisburg, but found transcribed in the minute-book of the company.

"Harrisburg, April 15, 1861, Captain James McKnight:

"Bring your command to Harrisburg by first train. If any of the men need equipments, they will be provided here by the General Government. Lose no time.

"By order of the Governor, Eli Slifer."

This dispatch was received by Captain McKnight at 11.20 A.M., April 16th. By the first train after its receipt, the Ringgold Light Artillery, one hundred and one men, took passage, fully uniformed, armed and equipped, for Harrisburg, and reached there at eight o'clock P.M. They at once reported for duty to the secretary of the State, (the Governor being absent at Washington,) who, by telegram to the Secretary of War at Washington, reported the Ringgold Light Artillery at Harrisburg, awaiting orders. The Secretary of War telegraphed in answer,—

"Push forward the company by first train."

This telegram, conveying orders to march, was transmitted by the secretary of the commonwealth to Captain McKnight. Orders in obedience thereto were then issued to the command, to take the train for Washington at three o'clock A.M., April 17th. If these orders had not been countermanded, the Ringgold Light Artillery would undoubtedly have reached Washington safely in advance of all troops from Pennsylvania and elsewhere, and before the Logan Guard and the companies from Pottsville reported at Harrisburg. At midnight, however, the order to march was countermanded in the following counter-order:

"Harrisburg, April 16, 1861.
"Captain James McKnight:

"You will please delay your march to Washington until ordered by the Governor.

"Respectfully yours, Eli Slifer."

This order fixes so indisputably the time of the arrival and the report for duty at Harrisburg by the Ringgold Light Artillery that any 1I asked Major McKnight if he knew why this was done. He said that Governor Curtin was punctilious about his authority, he wanting to order the troops as commander of Pennsylvania.

cumulative evidence is wholly superfluous. If any be needed, it will be found in the following extract from the Pennsylvania Daily Telegraph of April 17, 1861, an evening paper published at Harrisburg:

"Last night about eight o'clock, the Ringgold Artillery, Captain James McKnight, numbering one hundred men, arrived. They took up quarters at Herr's Hotel. They are a fine body of men and are fully prepared and determined to do their whole duty in the present crisis. Our citizens welcomed them with cheers."

It is stated in Bates' "History of Pennsylvania Volunteers:

"On the afternoon of the day of the President's proclamation for seventy-five thousand men, the Secretary of War telegraphed the call to the Governor of Pennsylvania, and it was telegraphed to all parts of Pennsylvania. Among the first to respond was the Ringgold Artillery, Logan Guard, Washington Artillery, National Light Infantry and Allen Rifles. On reporting at the Executive office—the Governor being absent in Washington—orders were sought from the Secretary of War, who telegraphed to push company forward in earliest train. That order, for prudential reasons, was almost immediately countermanded by the Secretary of the Commonwealth."

The Logan Guard did not reach Harrisburg till midday of the 17th, and the Pottsville companies till the evening of the 17th.

[From Pennsylvania Daily Telegraph, April 17, 1861.]

"MORE MILITARY.—The Logan Guard of Lewis-town arrived here this morning."

[From Pennsylvania Daily Telegraph, April 18, 1861.]

"We give below a list of the companies that arrived last night: Washington Artillery, Pottsville, Captain Wren, one hundred and ten men; National Light Infantry, Pottsville, Captain McDonald, one hundred and four men; Allen Infantry, Allentown, Captain Yeager, sixty-four men."

[From Bates' "History of Pennsylvania Volunteers."

"The Logan Guard were in line and ready to march at 10 P.M. of the 16th of April, and move to the station, but for lack of transportation did not reach Harrisburg till the morning of the 17th.

"The two Pottsville companies under marching orders left Pottsville on the 17th, and arrived in Harrisburg at eight o'clock in the evening.""

STATEMENT OF CAPTAIN McKNIGHT.—"I commanded the Ringgold Light Artillery from the year 1850 until June 14, 1861, when I was appointed to a captaincy in Fifth United States Artillery.

"On or about the 21st day of January, 1861, I was visited by William H. Keim, then surveyor-general of the State of Pennsylvania and major-general of the Fifth Division Pennsylvania Militia.

"The general first meeting me in a public place at my residence, stated that he had a subject of much importance and great secrecy in regard to which he desired to advise me, and requesting at the same time that I would suggest some place to which we could both retire, where the nature of the communication which he was about to make to me would be unheard by others. We then both withdrew to a private apartment.

"The general then proceeded to state that the government was in possession of facts tending to develop an intention on the part of the rebels to seize Washington on the 22d of February, and not, as was at first supposed, upon March 4, 1861. He came to me, (he further stated,) by direction and under the orders of Governor Andrew G. Curtin, commander-in-chief of the Pennsylvania Militia, who had commissioned him to select from the best volunteer organizations of the State such companies as could be relied upon, if the emergency should arise and who would be ready to move upon twenty-four hours' notice.

"Upon satisfying the general, not only of the willingness but also of the ability of my command to start whenever desired, he then and there directed me to consider myself and command as under orders.

"The general about the same time imparted similar information to other volunteer organizations of this county.

"My orders, coming as they did from the commander-in-chief of the Pennsylvania troops, were so imperative in their nature and admitted of so little delay that I immediately set about perfecting and equipping my command for active field duty. The same day upon which my orders were received, the company was divided into squads for the purpose of more effective drilling, which was continued uninter ruptedly, (save on Saturdays and Sundays,) up to the day before we left for Harrisburg, April 16, 1861. The drills were not confined to the service of the guns and the duties incident to drivers and the care of horses; the men were also well instructed in the use of the sabre, the only legitimate arm of defense of an artilleryman when dismounted and away from his guns.

"During the month of January, a number of the leading citizens having been apprised of the secret orders under which my command was placed, purchased for the use of the men one hundred overcoats, which were worn on the 22d of February at a general parade of the company. On the 15th day of April,

1 Union Bank Building. He resided in the rear part.

2 The meeting comprised the following gentlemen, who then raised a fund for that purpose: John McManus, G. A. Nicoll, David McKnight, Edward Wallace, Horatio Trexler, H. H. Muhlenberg, William M. Hiester, James Millholland and C. H. Hunter.
1861, whilst at drill some three miles from the city, intelligence was received of the proclamation of the President of the United States calling for seventy-five thousand men.

"The Governor of the State was immediately telegraphed that the Ringgold Light Artillery was ready to move without any delay whatever. I then suspended drill, returned to the city, and, after directing a certain signal to be sounded upon receipt of orders, dismissed the command.

"At twenty minutes after eleven o'clock A.M., April 16, 1861, the following telegram was received by me:

"HARRISBURG, April 16, 1861."

"To Captain James McKnight:

"Bring your command to Harrisburg by first train. If any of the men need equipments and arms they will be provided here by the General Government. Lose no time."

"By order of the Governor.

"Eli Slifer."

"At noon of the same day, forty minutes after the receipt of the order, the command declared itself ready to move at one o'clock P.M."

"A committee having been appointed to make all arrangements for transportation, reported that after conferring with G. A. Nicolls, general superintendent of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad, they were advised by him to take the regular passenger train at six o'clock P.M., as a special, being subject to unavoidable delay, would in all probability not reach Harrisburg until after the arrival of the regular train.

"Acting upon this advice, I left Reading with my command, numbering one hundred and one men, fully armed and equipped, on the evening of April 16, 1861, at six o'clock, reaching Harrisburg at eight o'clock."

THREE MONTHS' SERVICE.

FIRST SOLDIERS FROM BERKES COUNTY IN CIVIL WAR.—The following eight companies comprise the men from Berks County who, as volunteers, offered their services to the government in answer to the call of the President for troops, and were mustered into military service for three months:

Co. H, 5th Regt., Capt. Frank M. Cooley.
Co. C, 7th Regt., Capt. Isaac Schroeder.
Co. A, 14th Regt., Capt. David A. Griffith.
Co. E, 14th Regt., Capt. John C. Shearer.

RINGGOLD LIGHT ARTILLERY.—This company was recruited at Reading, and mustered into service at Harrisburg April 18, 1861.

James McKnight, captain.

Henry Nagle, first lieutenant.

William Graeff, second lieutenant.

George W. Durrell, first sergeant.

Daniel Kreisher, second sergeant.

Henry Rush, third sergeant.

Jeremiah Seiders, fourth sergeant.

Levi J. Homan, first corporal.

F. W. Folkman, second corporal.

Jacob Womert, third corporal.

Horatio Leader, fourth corporal.

John A. Hook and George B. Eckert, buglers.

MAJOR JAMES MCKNIGHT was the son of John McKnight, cashier of the Pennsylvania Branch Bank at Reading. He was born in the bank building March 20, 1820, and received his higher education at Princeton College. Upon his return from college he entered the hardware store of Daniel M. Keim & Co. as a clerk. In 1841 he became associated with Joseph L. Stichter, and they together, under the name of Stichter & McKnight, conducted the business till he retired in 1858. During that time he was actively interested in military affairs. When the Civil War broke out in 1861, he was the first captain to offer the services of his company, the Ringgold Light Artillery, to the government and to report for duty at Harrisburg. He served with this company for three months. Then he was commissioned a major of artillery in the regular army and served till the close of the war. He has since lived in retirement.

FIRST REGIMENT.

The First Regiment was organized at Harrisburg on April 20th. In pursuance of orders, it performed duty at several places in Pennsylvania, Maryland and Virginia till July 23d, when it returned to Harrisburg, and was there honorably discharged. During its service it did not participate in any battles; but it accomplished much good by checking any movement on the part of the rebels in arms along our borders. It included the following company, which was recruited at Reading, and mustered into service on April 20, 1861:

COMPANY G.

George W. Alexander, captain.
William A. H. Lewis, first lieutenant.
Thomas M. Richards, second lieutenant.
William McNall, first sergeant.
William Eisenhower, second sergeant.
Patrick Bloomfield, third sergeant.
Samuel G. Boone, fourth sergeant.
Diller G. Groff, first corporal.
Daniel Kelly, second corporal.
George Ashenfelter, third corporal.
Henry Beckhart, fourth corporal.

Richard H. Fisher and D. H. Snyder, musicians.

FIFTH REGIMENT.

The Fifth Regiment was organized at Camp Curtin (Harrisburg) on April 21st. It performed guard duty mostly at Baltimore, Washington and Alexandria. It was at the latter place during the disastrous battle of Bull Run, in which the brigade, to which it had been transferred, participated. It was discharged at Harrisburg on July 25th.

COMPANY H.—The following company was recruited at Reading. It was mustered into service on April 20, 1861.

Captain, Franklin M. Cooley.
First Lieutenant, Thomas B. Brenholtz.
Second Lieutenant, Charles Parker.
First Sergeant, Henry A. Flickinger.
Second Sergeant, James B. Boyer.
Third Sergeant, William D. Clemens.
Fourth Sergeant, Howard Potts.
First Corporal, John R. Stettler.
Second Corporal, Joseph Goodhart.
Third Corporal, Madison Suttledge.
Fourth Corporal, William E. Van Reed.

Musicians, John Reed, Theodore Hertman.

SEVENTH REGIMENT.

The Seventh Regiment was organized at Camp Curtin on April 22d. It was encamped for over a month at Chambersburg. On June 8th it moved southwardly. It was stationed at Williamsport on the 19th, and whilst there, late in the evening of that day, an alarm was raised which caused the whole brigade (Third) to be called to arms and formed into line of battle; but, beyond distant picket-firing, nothing further was heard. On July 2d it began the march to Martinsburg. On the way it confiscated the contents of an extensive flour-mill, (a large amount of grain and flour and one hundred and fifty barrels of whiskey), the owner having been a captain in the rebel army. Shortly afterward it was encamped at Charlestown, where it remained, without special incident, until ordered to Harrisburg, where it was mustered out of service in the latter part of July. The following three companies were recruited in Berks County:

COMPANY C.—Recruited at Friedensburg, Berks County, and mustered in April 23, 1861:

Isaac Schroeder, captain.
Henry R. Myers, first lieutenant.
Peter Y. Edelman, second lieutenant.
Franklin B. Lancks, third sergeant.
Henry S. Boyer, second sergeant.
William C. Baker, third sergeant.
Reuben Kaufman, fourth sergeant.
Isaac Pott, first corporal.
George Foos, Jr., second corporal.
Jeremiah H. Hauck, third corporal.
John C. Steckline, fourth corporal.
Peter H. Hauck and George A. Eltz, musicians.

COMPANY D.—Recruited at Pleasantville, Berks County, and mustered in April 23, 1861:

George S. Herbst, captain.
Samuel Baus, first lieutenant.
Joel Ruppert, second lieutenant.
Charles G. Kline, first sergeant.
Abraham Ruppert, second sergeant.
Peter Shafer, third sergeant.
Edward F. Reed, fourth sergeant.
John J. Nash, first corporal.
William Hassler, second corporal.
Jacob Shafer, third corporal.
Lenhard Swizhard, fourth corporal.

Joel Frederick and Elias Angstadt, musicians.

COMPANY G.—Recruited at Reading, Berks County, and mustered in April 23, 1861:

Albert F. Rightmyer, captain.
Cornelius Wise, first lieutenant.
Jacob H. Worth, second lieutenant.
John G. Ulrich, first sergeant.
Anthony Heller, second sergeant.
Abraham Latshaw, third sergeant.
William Runyon, fourth sergeant.
Jacob Egg, first corporal.
William H. Dehart, second corporal.
Thomas Craton, third corporal.
George Hart, fourth corporal.

Gideon Ginder and Henry Benneville, musicians.

HISTORY OF BERKS COUNTY, PENNSYLVANIA.

FOURTEENTH REGIMENT.

The Fourteenth Regiment was organized at Camp Curtin on April 30th. Richards-Michael was elected lieutenant-colonel, and Joseph A. McLean major of the regiment. Both were from Reading. It was encamped at Camp Johnston, in Lancaster, till June 3d, having been thoroughly drilled during this interval; and subsequently it marched to Chambersburg, Hagerstown, Sharpsburg, Martinsburg, Bunker’s Hill and Harper’s Ferry, doing picket and guard duty, and making various expeditions to encounter the enemy. Whilst at the latter place the term of enlistment expired and it was accordingly ordered to Harrisburg. On its way it encamped and remained two weeks at Carlisle, where it was mustered out of service. Harrisburg was then full of returning troops. A large proportion of this regiment re-enlisted in various military organizations of Pennsylvania. It included two companies from Berks County.

COMPANY A.—Recruited at Reading and mustered in April 27, 1861:

D. A. Griffith, captain.
J. A. McLean, first lieutenant.
E. J. Ranch, second lieutenant.
J. Phillipi, first sergeant.
Amos Arnold, second sergeant.
H. Missimer, third sergeant.
F. W. Berg, fourth sergeant.
Thomas Gabriel, first corporal.
G. W. Rapp, second corporal.
S. Dampman, third corporal.
Bentley Smith, fourth corporal.
H. Goighthart and Francis Bauer, musicians.

COMPANY E.—Recruited at Womelsdorf, Berks County, and mustered in April 24, 1861:

John C. Shearer, captain.
John T. Schoener, first lieutenant.
William G. Moore, second lieutenant.
George N. Steach, first sergeant.
Cyrus Oberly, second sergeant.
Henry Weighman, third sergeant.
William Weinhold, fourth sergeant.
James Gaul, first corporal.
Henry Gutwald, second corporal.
Levi Bennethum, third corporal.
Eli Dougherty, fourth corporal.
John Daniels and Cyrus Heffelfinger, musicians.

GENERAL WILLIAM H. KRIM was born at Reading on June 13, 1813. He was the eldest son of Benneville Keim, the President of the Farmers' Bank for a number of years, Mayor of Reading for three terms, and a prominent and enterprising business man of the county. His mother was Mary High, a daughter of General William High, a wealthy farmer of Cumru township, at "Poplar Neck," and a man prominent in the military affairs of the county.

[1] For further account see 194th Regiment.

At the age of twelve years he entered the store business, he encouraged enterprises generally for the development of Reading.

His early military training gave him a natural taste for military affairs, and he found a field for its gratification in the volunteer service of the State Militia. Before the age of seventeen years, he was an Orderly Sergeant of the "Washington Grays," and in 1837 he became Captain—succeeding his cousin, Captain Daniel M. Keim. He was promoted rapidly till 1842, when he was elected Major-General of the Fifth Division of Penna. Vols., which was composed of Berks, Lebanon, Dauphin and Schuylkill Counties. In that year he took a prominent part in the Military Encampment held at Reading, which was an eventful occasion in the history of military affairs in this county. Among other distinguished military men, General Winfield Scott was in attendance. In 1844, during the terrible religious riot at Philadelphia, he was ordered to assist in quelling the disturbances, which resulted in loss of life and property. He was under Gen. Robert Patterson, Senior Major-General in the State. The good opinion, which General Keim's command had won, was justly expressed in the following extract from General Order, No. 30, issued by General Patterson, when the detachment of the Fifth Division was relieved until further orders:

"The Major-General further desires to express his knowledge of their exemplary and soldier-like deportment while under his command. He will at all times be happy to serve with such troops. Berks County may well be proud of her volunteer soldiers."

His services in organizing our local militia and in bringing them under proper discipline were both untiring and successful, thereby placing them in the front rank of the volunteer soldiers of the State.

In 1848 he was elected to the office of Mayor of Reading for one term. He was the second Mayor of the city. He had been nominated and run as the Whig candidate in the previous year, but a third candidate in the field, who ran independently, caused his defeat. Several years afterward, he took great—if not the principal—interest in establishing at Reading the "Pennsylvania Military Institute," for the purpose of enabling young men to obtain education in military matters. In November, 1858, he was elected to represent Berks County in Congress, to fill the vacancy till March following, caused by the resignation of Hon. J. Glaney Jones. In October, previously, Jones had been defeated in a campaign for re-election by John Schwartz, through a coalition of Republicans and Independent Democrats. When Jones resigned to accept the mission to Austria, this political feeling was still active, and it resulted in the election of General Keim as the Republican candidate against Joel B. Wanner, the Democratic candidate. He was the first and the only Republican elected to represent this district in Congress. In 1859 he was elected Surveyor-General of the State for the term of three years. At that time he also held the office of Major-General of militia.

In 1860, whilst at Harrisburg, after the result of the Presidential election in favor of the Republican party had become known, General Keim suggested to Governor Curtin that the commonwealth be put in a condition of defense, inasmuch as the signs of discontent indicated civil strife; and he recommended in that behalf a general encampment of the militia of the State. Governor Curtin accepted this timely suggestion, and, in pursuance of an order by him, an encampment was held at York, in the beginning of September, 1860, with General Keim as the chief in command. In January following, upon visiting his home at Reading, he called upon Captain James McKnight, who commanded the Ringgold Light Artillery, a company of volunteers in his brigade, and asked him to keep his company in readiness so as to be able to respond promptly to any order that might be given. Through this notice, the Ringgold Light Artillery came to be the first company that responded to the President's call for troops and reported for duty at Harrisburg in April, 1861. General Keim offered his services when the crisis arose, and Gov. Curtin appointed him to a command of State troops under the first requisition of the President.

Major-General Robert Patterson commanded the Pennsylvania line, which was composed of two divisions, and served for three months in the campaign on the Upper Potomac. The headquarters were at Chambersburg, and General Keim was in command of the Second Division. On June 15th, this army was encamped at Hagerstown, and on July 2d, it crossed the Potomac into Virginia.

A force under "Stonewall" Jackson was met shortly afterward at "Falling Waters," but after a skirmish it fell back, and its camp at Hoke's Run was occupied. On July 15th, the army advanced from Martinsburg to Bunker's Hill, and on the 17th Charlestown was reached. By that time the term of service of many of the regiments expired and orders for their muster out were issued. The column was so much weakened thereby that it withdrew to Harper's Ferry.

After the campaign on the Upper Potomac, General Keim received from the President the appointment of Brigadier-General of National troops; and then resigning the office of Surveyor-General, he was ordered to join the Army of the Potomac. His brigade was attached to General Casey's division of General Keyes' corps, and was sent to Fortress Monroe, where, under the command of General McClellan, it advanced towards Richmond. At the battle of Williamsburg, (one of the most severe contests of the war), General Keim distinguished himself. Although too sick to be on duty, he could not be prevented from leaving the hospital, mounting his horse and leading his brigade on the field. His coolness, judgment and great bravery during the action were conspicuous. Though under fire nearly the whole time, he was perfectly calm. A bomb fell almost under his horse. Every one about him turned pale from fear. The explosion covered him with mud. After the battle, General McClellan called on him, complimented him for the great service which he had rendered, and ordered him to the post of honor in advance of the army. But the excitement incident to this battle aggravated his illness and he was obliged to ask for a furlough. This was granted and he returned to Harrisburg, where his family had taken up a temporary residence. Unfortunately, his health was too far gone, and he died on May 18, 1862, in the very prime of life and usefulness, aged forty-eight years. The news of his death produced a profound sensation of regret throughout the Army of the Potomac. General McClellan was deeply affected by the loss of this faithful commander, and he, on May 26th following, issued a General Order announcing his death and complimenting his faithful, patriotic services to his country, which was read to every regiment in the army. His remains were brought to Reading, and buried with military honors in the Charles Evans Cemetery.

A public meeting of citizens was held on May 20, 1862, for the purpose of expressing regret over General Keim's death. A committee—of which Hon. J. Pringle Jones, ex-president judge of the county, was chairman—reported appropriate resolutions, including, among truthful sentiments, the following high tribute:

"For long years, a prosperous merchant, we knew him as one whose praises were on all men's tongues, as well for enterprise in business and liberality in promoting the good of the community, as for indulgence to those who were his debtors, and for the exercise of a wide charity to the poor. We knew him, too, when misfortune overtook him, and we know with what honor and honesty and with what fortitude he passed through the dark days of adversity. In the varied relations of his private life he was greatly beloved; and in his death our city and county have lost a citizen whose modest deportment, exemplary conduct, public spirit and sterling integrity endeared him most deservedly to the people."

THREE YEARS' SERVICE.

The insurrection having been too powerful to be suppressed by the first display of military authority, the President issued a second proclamation, calling upon the States to furnish two hundred thousand men who were to be enlisted for three years. The response was prompt and vigorous. The quota of men from Pennsylvania was soon filled by the patriotic impulses of her people.

The following companies comprise the men from Berks County who enlisted as volunteers for three years:

Company A, 32d Regt., Capt. Jacob Lenhart, Jr.
Company D, 32d Regt., Capt. William Briner.
Company L, 44th Regt., Capt. J. C. A. Hoffeditz.
Company E, 46th Regt., Capt. Cornelius Wise.
Company B, 50th Regt., Capt. Hervey Herman.
Company H, 50th Regt., Capt. Thomas S. Brenholz.
Company G, 70th Regt., Capt. George E. Clymer.
Company G, 74th Regt., Capt. William J. Bart.
Company L, 80th Regt., Capt. Charles C. McCormick.
Company A, 88th Regt., Capt. George W. Knabb.
Company H, 88th Regt., Capt. David A. Griffith.
Company K, 93d Regt., Capt. David C. Keller.
Company D, Capt. George W. Durell.
The Thirty-second Regiment included companies A, D and F, from Berks County, the other companies being from Bucks and Philadelphia Counties. It was mustered into the United States service at Harrisburg, on July 27, 1861, after an experience of two months in drilling in camp near Easton.

It was immediately ordered to Washington; and after remaining there till August 2nd, proceeded to Tennallytown, a village six miles northwest from the Capitol, and was there encamped with other troops. While in camp the regiment was drilled, and assisted in erecting Fort Pennsylvania, which was a formidable and very important earthwork. On October 9th it moved over the Potomac and encamped near Langley in the army line stretching nearly twenty miles along the Virginia shore. Here they did skirmishing, picketing and drilling.

On March 10th, 1862, it moved with the "Army of the Potomac" in search of the enemy. On April 10th it was taken by rail to Manassas Junction with the brigade (second), and thence proceeded to a point opposite Fredericksburg. Whilst there the troops were reviewed by President Lincoln. From this point they marched down the Rappahannock, arriving at the White House on the 11th of May, where the 2nd brigade checked the enemy's movements, and repulsed an attack upon the train of the Reserves. On May 13th they were within a few miles of Richmond, occupying the extreme right and in advance of the main line; there they were attacked by the enemy, and held their ground against vastly superior numbers, resting upon the field at night. At 2 a.m. on the following morning the regiment was relieved. In withdrawing from the field, it passed under a heavy fire from the enemy by which it suffered some loss. At Gaines' Mill, the division, including this regiment, was held in reserve; but the enemy soon broke through the first line, and for two hours the regiment was left to bear the brunt of the fierce assault of the enemy, when it was relieved by other troops. Its conduct in this battle was highly praised by General Meade upon the field. On May 15th the regiment was withdrawn across the Chickahominy, and in June following it was engaged in the battle of Gaines' Mill, which was fought by McClellan to save the material of his army. On June 29th it was posted on picket duty toward Richmond. In an engagement there, the regiment was sent forward to feel the enemy, and was received with a withering fire of musketry.

While the whole line was engaged a supporting regiment mistook the 32nd Regiment in the smoke of battle for the enemy, and opened fire upon its ranks, throwing the men into disorder and causing them to break; but they did not leave the field. At 11 o'clock in the night of that day the division was withdrawn and marched to Malvern Hill, and afterward to Harrison's Landing, where it was encamped until August 1st following.

After the Army of the Potomac was ordered to evacuate the Peninsula, the 32nd Regiment moved to Warrenton after passing other points, and there, on August 24th, was formed in line of battle, but without entering an engagement. Subsequently the regiment was engaged in a battle at Hall's Hill, near Manassas Junction, and its loss was severe; and at Antietam, on the 16th and 17th of September, where they fought for hours until relieved by other troops. Fifty-one of their number were killed and wounded in this battle. In October, November and December they moved toward Fredericksburg, where they were engaged in battle on the 13th of December. During the charge upon the enemy the regiment maintained its position with great firmness, and was among the very last to retire. It lost there in killed, wounded and missing, one hundred and twenty-eight men.

After marching to several places without an engagement it moved to the defenses of Washington on February 8th, where it was attached to the 22nd Army Corps. There it was given an opportunity to rest and recruit its ranks, having been greatly reduced by severe fighting and by long and fatiguing marches. It remained here until January 6th, 1864, when it was ordered to duty in West Virginia, under General Sickel. The regiment was then commanded by Major William Briner, and with other troops (Fourth Reserves) did picket duty on the roads in the vicinity of Martinsburg during January; and after marching and counter-marching for about a week for the purpose of finding the enemy and guarding against surprise, in which the men were completely exhausted by loss of sleep and much exposure, they again performed picket duty on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad near Martinsburg until March 29th, when they moved to Harper's Ferry. In the beginning of April they proceeded across the Allegheny Mountains to Grafton and thence to the Kanawha Valley; there this regiment was placed under the command of Captain Jacob Lenhart, Major William Briner having been sent to the hospital at Grafton, on account of severe injury on his right hand. On the 6th of May they had a lively skirmish with the Sixtieth Virginia troops at Princetown and during the next two days had a long march of thirty miles to the gap in Walker (or Floyd) Mountain, near Shannon bridge. On May 9th they had an engagement near by, in which the enemy was routed; there Captain Lenhart was wounded and the command of the regiment devolved upon Captain Robert Johnson. In the charge upon the enemy’s works the regiment had three color-bearers shot down. After considerable marching they halted at Meadow Bluff on May 19th. In this time they had much skirmishing with the enemy; and every night a strong guard was posted around the camp to avoid surprise. The men suffered much from hunger, and many were without soles on their shoes. On May 22d they moved to Millville, near Louisburg, and while there their term of service expired. In pursuance of orders they proceeded via Pittsburgh to Philadelphia, where they were mustered out of service on June 17, 1864.

Company A.—This company was recruited at Reading, and mustered out June 17, 1864, except where otherwise mentioned.

THIRTY-SIXTH REGIMENT.

The Thirty-Sixth Regiment was composed of companies recruited in several counties east of the Allegheny Mountains. Company I was made up of men recruited in Berks and Lebanon Counties. The regiment was mustered into service July 27, 1861. It was not engaged in any fighting until the latter part of June, 1862, when it was engaged in the battle of Gaines’ Mill. It occupied the left of the line. Its next engagement was at Charles City Cross-Roads, June 30, 1862. It passed through seven days of fighting, and upon mustering the regiment only two hundred men were present to answer to their names. It was also engaged in the battles of Antietam, Fredericksburg and the Wilderness. Nearly the entire regiment was captured in the latter battle, and the men were imprisoned at Andersonville. The regiment was mustered out of service June 16, 1864. The following men in Company I were from Berks County, recruited at Reading:

FORTY-FOURTH REGIMENT (FIRST CAVALRY).

The Forty-fourth Regiment, or First Cavalry, was recruited in a number of counties—Company M in Berks County, and Company L in Berks, Lebanon and Lancaster Counties. Company L was mustered into service as an independent company on July 30, 1861, and was stationed at Baltimore for five months, and Company M was mustered into service August 5, 1861, and was stationed at same place until October 3d. On January 7th these companies joined their regiment and moved with the army towards Manassas. They were engaged in the battles of Strasburg, Woodstock, Harrisonburg and Fredericksburg during the year 1862; and afterward, in 1863, in the battles of Brandy Station, Beverly Ford and Aldie. They were also concerned in Sheridan’s raid upon Richmond, during the spring of 1864, in which they encountered the enemy in a number of engagements, and in the following summer they were engaged in fighting with the enemy at Saint Mary’s Church, Malvern Hill, Gravel Hill and Ream’s Station. On August 29, 1864, they were encamped on the Jerusalem Plank-Road, near the left of the army. Their term of service having expired, an order was issued for their relief from duty. They withdrew from the front September 1st, and proceeded to Philadelphia, where they were mustered out of service September 9, 1864.

COMPANY L.—This company was recruited at Reading, and was mustered out September 9, 1864, except where otherwise mentioned.

CAPTAIN J. C. A. HOFFEDITZ is of German descent. His father was the Rev. Theodore L. Hoffeditz, D.D., who was born near Karls-hafen, in Germany, in 1780. He there obtained an education, learned the trade of a pianomaker and emigrated to America when eighteen years of age. He located at Reading and carried on his trade for some years, when he took up the study of theology at Philadelphia. Several years afterward he was duly ordained as a minister in the Reformed Church, and then receiving calls to preach for five congregations in Northampton and Monroe Counties, he proceeded to the former and there fixed his residence. He preached with great success in those counties for forty-six years, till his decease. He died in 1856, aged seventy-six years. Some years before he died, the degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred upon him by the Synod of the German Reformed Church. He was a well-known and distinguished minister of the Gospel. He acted as the first presiding officer of the meeting of the United Synod of this church, which was held at Mifflinburg, Pa. He was married to Julia Roth, of Northampton County, and had thirteen children, of whom eight survive him,—Louisa, Theodore (who became a minister), Maria (married to Rev. George Weber), C. W. Lorenzo, Pauline, John Christian A., William B. and Emma J. (married to Rev. Eli Keller).

John C. A. Hoffeditz was born April 5, 1826, in Upper Mount Bethel township, Northampton County. After having been sent to school in that township till his twelfth year, he became a pupil of the Moravian school at Nazareth, familiarly known as the "Nazareth Hall." Upon completing his studies there he removed to Carbon County and devoted four years to acquiring the trade of a tanner. He then pursued this vocation at Easton for a year, after which he settled at Reading and carried on the mercantile business. In 1880 he associated with his son, J. Calvin Hoffeditz, in the manufacture of carriages, they together erecting for the purpose an extensive four-story brick factory and warehouse, and continued in this enterprise for several years.

Several months after the Rebellion had begun, and just after the disastrous battle of Bull Run, when the whole country was alarmed over the defeat of our army, he raised a company of cavalry, called the "Reading Troop," and became its captain. He offered the services of his company to the national government by telegram to General Simon Cameron, Secretary of War, and it was the first company of cavalry from Pennsylvania accepted by him for military service in the Civil War. He reported for duty and it was attached to the Forty-fourth, or First Cavalry Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers, as Company L. He continued in command of the company till sickness obliged him to resign his commission. His resignation was accepted April 6, 1862. Upon returning to Reading he acted for some time as deputy provost marshal of the Eighth Pennsylvania District, comprising the county of Berks.
In politics he is an ardent Republican, frequently taking an active part in the conventions of this party. The school affairs of the city have received his earnest attention. He is now representing his ward (the Seventh) in the school board. His enterprise in behalf of the city improvements led him to organize the "Reading Electric Light and Power Company," this extensive and influential organization. He is a charter member of McLean Post, No. 16, and also of Keim Post, No. 76, of the Grand Army of the Republic. He is connected with St. Paul's Memorial Reformed congregation at Reading, having been a member of the church for many years.

On July 24, 1853, he was married to Emma for the purpose of supplying Reading with a light superior to gas, and he filled the office of president of the company for the first year.

Captain Hoffeditz is a prominent and highly respected member of the Masonic fraternity in this community. He is connected with four lodges of the Free and Accepted Masons,—Chandler Lodge, No. 227; Reading Chapter, No. 152; De Molay Commandery, No. 9; and Reading Council, No. 16. He has received the Thirty-third Degree, "Right of Memphis," in H., daughter of Michael Reifsnyder, of Reading.

They had four children,—John Calvin, Theodore M., William C. and Rosa M., all of whom have died excepting the first.

FORTY-SIXTH REGIMENT.
The Forty-sixth Regiment was organized at Harrisburg on Sept. 1, 1861. It included one company, E, which was recruited at Reading. Soon after organization it was ordered to Harper’s Ferry and placed under the command of General Banks, in First Brigade of Second Division. The regiment was engaged in drilling and camp duty till the opening of the spring campaign. Its first conflict was at Winchester, where for five hours it held its position with great coolness and bravery whilst retreating toward the Potomac before Stonewall Jackson.
On August 8, 1862, it was in the battle of Cedar Mountain. Its position fell opposite the enemy's advanced pieces, and upon these the men charged with desperate valor; and on Sept. 17th following, it was engaged in the battle of Antietam. In May 1863, it participated in a fierce engagement near Chancellorsville; and in July following it took a prominent part in the battle of Gettysburg. On the 3d it occupied the extreme right of the line. After the withdrawal of Lee it was attached to the Army of Tennessee, under General Rosecrans. Its first service there was in guarding the Nashville Railroad from Tullahoma to Bridgeport. In January, 1864, the Regiment proceeded to Pennsylvania on a veteran furlough, the greater part of the officers and men having re-enlisted for a second term of three years.

Among the re-enlisted men in the regiment was a young man, Henry Weidensaul, a native of Morgantown, in Berks County. He entered the regiment in his fourteenth year and participated in the battles of Winchester, Cedar Mountain, Chancellorsville, Gettysburg, Resaca, Dallas, Kenesaw and Peach Tree Creek. He was first wounded at Cedar Mountain, where he was taken prisoner and confined in Libby Prison for five weeks. He received wounds also at Peach Tree Creek and Atlanta. On July 1, 1863, he was seventeen years old. The Keystone State claimed him to be the youngest veteran soldier in the service.

Upon recruiting its ranks it rejoined the army at Chattanooga, and participated in the Atlanta campaign under General Sherman in his great march to the sea. After nearly four years of faithful service it was mustered out on July 16, 1865, near Alexandria, Va.

Birdsboro' Band.—Mustered into service for three years on August 27, 1861, as the regimental band of the Forty-sixth Regiment; but discharged on August 16, 1862, in pursuance of an order dispensing with regimental bands.

The Fiftieth Regiment included three companies from Berks County,—B, E and H. It was organized at Harrisburg on September 25, 1861. Captain Brenholtz, of Company H, was selected as lieutenant-colonel. The regiment proceeded to Washington on October 2d, and on the 9th to Annapolis, where it was assigned to Stevens' brigade, which was then fitting out for an expedition to South Carolina. On October 19th the regiment embarked upon transports, Companies B and E, with right wing, on the "Winfield Scott" and Company H, with left wing, on "Ocean Queen." On the night of November 1st, a heavy gale was encountered off Cape Hatteras, and the "Winfield Scott," an unseaworthy craft, was in imminent peril. Her masts were cut away, the freight and camp equipage were thrown overboard, a portion of her officers and crew deserted her and everything was given up for lost. She was finally saved through the superhuman efforts of the soldiers, who had been left to their fate without food or water. The regiment went into camp on the island at Hilton Head and was employed for a time in building fortifications. On December 6th it proceeded to Beaufort and there experienced its first skirmish with the enemy. It participated in the battle of Coosaw on January 1, 1862. In General Hunter's demonstration against Charleston, Lieutenant-Colonel Brenholtz and six companies took a prominent part. They drove the enemy from a railroad bridge which spanned a stream near Pocotaligo. The planks on this bridge had been removed and a crossing could only be effected by running the gauntlet of the causeway and walking the stringers, which still remained. For some time firing was kept up from the opposite side of the stream, and it became evident that the enemy could only be dislodged by crossing. At this juncture Captain Parker of Company H, volunteered to brave the danger of the causeway and lead his men over upon the stringers. The feat was accomplished and the bridge replanked. But Captain Parker was killed. "His gallantry in crossing the frail bridge at Pocotaligo cost him his life. He was pierced by three rifle-balls, and fell while cheering his men on the perilous passage." This expedition was not successful.

The regiment then remained near Beaufort till July 12th; then it proceeded to Fortress Monroe and became part of the Ninth Corps. This corps was ordered to support Pope on the Rapidan. Subsequently it was engaged in the first and second days' fights at Bull Run. Brenholtz commanded the regiment. He was one of the wounded in the second day's fight. On August 1st it participated in the battle of Chantilly, where its conduct was not excelled for gallantry; and several weeks afterward also in the battle of Antietam. In this latter engagement Major Overton fell severely wounded, and the command devolved upon Captain Diehl, of Company E.

The regiment witnessed the battle of Fredericksburg on December 13th, but was not actively engaged. Subsequently it was moved to Kentucky and then participated in the siege of Vicksburg. In the great battle for the occupancy of that place, the regiment had been deployed as skirmishers in a very exposed position. There Brenholtz, whilst gallantly leading his men before the enemy's works, was mortally wounded. His fall was greatly lamented. Much of the credit which the organization had acquired was due to his excellent qualities as a soldier. No braver man ever led in battle, and upon his fall the service lost one of its most valued leaders. In August only eighty of the regiment were present for duty, and nearly all of these had chills and fever. The other men of the regiment were in hospitals suffering from wounds or malaria.

On October 10, 1863, it took part in an engagement at Blue Springs, in East Tennessee, and in November at Lenoir Station, on Tennessee Railroad, and at Knoxville, which was unsuccessfully besieged by Longstreet. Nearly the entire regiment re-enlisted on January 1, 1864. For several months previously the men endured intense suffering from cold and hunger without a murmur. On Christmas they had nothing to eat till evening and then only a part of a ration. During January they marched to Nicholasville, a distance of two hundred miles, in ten days. Many of the men were barefooted and walked thus through the snow. In February they proceeded to Harrisburg on a veteran furlough, and visited their homes. In March the regiment encamped at Annapolis, and in May, on the 6th, it was heavily engaged in the battle of the Wilderness. In moving from the field it was designated as the rear guard to the corps. On May 9th it was again engaged in battle near Spotsylvania Court-House. The brigade carried the heights in its front. With fixed bayonets the regiment charged up the steep ascent and routed the enemy greatly superior in number. But the cost was fearful. Among the killed was Captain Cleveland, of Company H. Three days afterward the regiment had another desperate encounter, in which the men had a struggle hand to hand. Adjutant Kendall, three sergeants and twenty-five privates were taken prisoners. From the Ny river to the North Anna, and thence to Cold Harbor, the regiment was engaged almost daily. At Cold Harbor, on June 2, 1864, it occupied the front line and suffered severely. Shortly afterward it lay in line before Petersburg. On June 18th, Captain Lantz of Company E, and several men were killed. It then performed picket duty during July and participated in the siege and great explosion of the mine; and during August it was engaged in continuous fighting, with but little interruption. It remained in the front during September, October and November, when it went into winter-quarters immediately in front of Petersburg.

The Union lines began to close in on the rebel works on April 1, 1865. The regiment was engaged during the operations of the 2d and 3d, and it was among the first regiments to enter Petersburg upon its fall. It moved to City Point on April 15th, and thence by boat to Washington, where it remained till June 30th. By order of the Secretary of War, upon the recommendation of Lieutenant-General Grant, this regiment was ordered to represent the infantry of the army upon the occasion of laying the corner-stone of the national monument at Gettysburg on July 4, 1865. From Gettysburg it went into camp near Georgetown, where it was mustered out of service on July 31st.

Colonel Thomas Brenholtz was the son of Isaac Brenholtz, a master-machinist of Reading. He was born in 1834. He taught school for some years at Reading very successfully, and then, studying law, was admitted to practice on September 20, 1860. When the Rebellion broke out he enlisted as a lieutenant in Company H, Fifth Regiment, three months’ service. This term expiring, he raised one of three companies in the three years’ service, which were recruited at Reading for the Fiftieth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, and upon its organization was elected lieutenant-colonel. As such officer he served for nearly two years with great gallantry. His regiment participated in the first expedition against the coast of South Carolina, and subsequently in a number of engagements, prominent among which was the costly battle of Fredericksburg, in all of which he displayed the courage of a true soldier. He had chief command of the regiment upon several occasions. He was wounded at Jackson, Miss., and, from the effects of the wounds, died at Evansville, Ind., on August 19th, 1863, leaving to survive him a young widow and two small children. He was a highly respected and promising young man, recognized for his exemplary life and marked ability. His remains were brought to Reading and interred in Charles Evans’ cemetery. The funeral was largely attended. Major-Gen. Franz Sigel, his staff and other military officers were present upon that occasion.

Captain Henry A. Lantz was a native of Reading, having been born at this place on May 26, 1825. He was a grandson of Peter Aurand, sheriff of Berks County from 1815 to 1817. He carried on a book-store at Reading for a number of years, and then became the publisher of the Reading Times, which he conducted with great ability till the breaking out of the Civil War. Its successful establishment was attributable to his energy and good management. He then sold it to Whitman & Haas, and enlisted in the fall of 1861 as a private in Co. E, Fiftieth Regiment P. V., for three years' service. Shortly afterward he received the appointment of sergeant-major, and accompanied the first expedition to South Carolina. There he displayed much bravery and was promoted in consequence to first lieutenant; and upon the resignation of Capt. William Diehl he was made captain, in February, 1863. He was shot before Petersburg on June 17, 1864, and instantly killed; and his body was decently interred under a large oak-tree near where he fell. He enjoyed the confidence of his entire company for his ability, bravery and exemplary life.

Company H.—This company was recruited at Reading, and was mustered out July 30, 1865, except where otherwise mentioned.

FIFTY-FIFTH REGIMENT.
The Fifty-fifth Regiment was recruited during the summer and autumn of 1861, and included Co. B from Berks County. It was organized at Harrisburg, and in November proceeded to Fortress Monroe. There it was drilled and disciplined several weeks; then moved to Port Royal. It experienced some service near Frampton in October, 1862. For a year afterward it performed picket duty at Port Royal Ferry, ten miles from Beaufort.

January 1, 1864, the major part of the men re-enlisted for a second term of three years, and were given a furlough. In March the regiment returned to South Carolina, and in April it was stationed at Gloucester Point, opposite Yorktown. Here it was assigned to the Third Brigade, Third Division in Tenth Corps, Army of the James, and participated in the movements and engagements of this corps under the command of General Butler. It reached Richmond on April 25th, and encamped near by, performing fatigue and guard duty till the latter part of July; then it was stationed at different points surrounding Petersburg till it was mustered out of service on August 30, 1865.

EIGHTIETH REGIMENT.

The Eightieth Regiment, or Seventh Cavalry, included some men who were recruited in Berks County, and mustered into service with Company L. It participated in various engagements with the Army of Tennessee, where it had been ordered to service. In March, 1865, it marched under Gen. Wilson across the Gulf States, and in the beginning of April participated in the battles of Plantersville and Selma, Ala. At the latter place the regiment led in the assault upon the work, and the conduct of the men was highly meritorious. Its last engagement was near Columbus, on April 16, 1865. It was then stationed at Macon, Ga., from April 20, to August 13th, when it was mustered out of service. Not being able to designate the men who were from Berks County, I publish the entire company.

COMPANY L.—This company was recruited in Berks and Northumberland Counties, and was mustered out August 23, 1865, except where otherwise mentioned:

EIGHTY-THIRD REGIMENT.
The Eighty-third Regiment was composed of men mostly from western counties in the State. Company I of the regiment included some men who were recruited at Reading. It was mustered into service near Erie, on September 8, 1861. After thorough preparation it participated in the Peninsula campaign and its several battles, and afterward was engaged at Gettysburg, in the Wilderness, and in the several battles preceding the surrender at Appomattox. It was mustered out of service at Washington June 28, 1865. The regiment was engaged in twenty-five battles, two more than any other regiment of Pennsylvania Infantry. Not being able to designate the men from Reading, I present the entire company.

Company I.—This company was recruited at Harrisburg and Reading for one year, and was mustered out June 28, 1865, except where otherwise mentioned.

EIGHTY-EIGHTH REGIMENT.

The Eighty-eighth Regiment included three companies—A, B and H—from Berks County. It was organized about October 1, 1861, at Wissahickon, near Philadelphia. Then it was ordered to Washington, where it remained till October 12th, when it was assigned to guard duty at Alexandria. It was continued on guard duty at different places thereabout till the 25th of May following. Then it marched to Front Royal, and thence by rail to Manassas, Warrenton and Culpepper. On the 9th of August it was marched hurriedly towards Cedar Mountain. There it was in Tower's brigade and occupied the extreme right of Banks' corps, placed in this position to relieve troops which had been actively engaged during the afternoon of that day. Whilst moving into position it was under two fires, one from Second Maine Battery and the other from the enemy's artillery. The enemy's guns were silenced in a short time. The regiment then marched to Pony Mountain and Warrenton. On the 27th of August a forced march was made and a portion of the division (Ricket's) encountered the enemy at Thoroughfare Gap, where a fierce fight was conducted. This brigade was not engaged in it. The regiment formed into line and was ordered to advance, but finding the enemy too numerous, withdrew with the whole corps to a position near Gainesville. Thence it moved to Manassas Junction and Bull Run. At the latter place, on the 30th of August, it was engaged in battle. Lieutenant-Colonel Joseph A. Me-

Lean was left on the field and never recovered. The brave conduct of the brigade was complimented by General Pope. Thence the regiment proceeded through Fairfax, Washington and Frederick City to Antietam Creek, where, on September 17th, it engaged in a hot and fierce engagement with the enemy. Subsequently it crossed the Potomac and engaged in a conflict near Bowling Green road on the 13th day of December. At this point the Eighty-eighth kept in position, though the other part of the brigade had gone to the rear. Soon afterward it went into winter-quarters at a point near Fletcher's Chapel. During the middle of January, 1863, it participated in the famous "Mud March." On the 28th of April it participated in an engagement on the Rappahannock, below Fredericksburg, and on the 29th a forced march was made from the extreme left to the extreme right of the line at Chancellorsville, a distance of thirty miles. During May it was encamped at White Oak Church. On the 12th of June it started for the Gettysburg campaign, reaching the field after forced marches, on July 1st, and participated in this memorable battle. It was in Reynolds' corps. On the 6th of July the regiment joined in the pursuit of the enemy. After marching to and through various places, it went into winter-quarters at the town of Culpeper in the beginning of December. Whilst there a large proportion of the regiment re-enlisted. It remained at Culpeper till May 3, 1864. On the 8th of May it participated in an engagement near Spottsylvania Court-House, and also on the 12th at the same place. On the 23d it crossed the North Anna and took part in a severe engagement, and in a slight engagement at Bethesda Church on the 26th. Thence it co-operated in the movements of the army towards the James River. On the 12th of June it stood an artillery fire at White Oak Swamp. On the 16th it crossed the James River and halted in front of Petersburg. On the 18th it drove the enemy's skirmishers into their main line of works, and, with the corps, charged upon the entrenchments. The regiment was in advance, and, after getting within sixty yards of the enemy's first line, was compelled to lie flat upon the ground, a terrific fire of artillery being centred upon that portion of the line. It was so far in advance of the rest of the division that it could not be withdrawn or re-enforced. During the night entrenchments were thrown up and the next afternoon the regiment was relieved. On its way to the left of the brigade it was exposed to the sharpshooters of the enemy. Shortly afterward it was again engaged in this section before Petersburg. The next serious fight was near Danby's Mill, on February 6, 1865, where it was repulsed, and on the next day, at Hatcher's Run; near that point it went into camp and remained till the 29th of March. Then it participated in active operations and hot engagements till Lee surrendered, on the 9th of April. The homeward march was then made to Washington, where it was mustered out of service on June 30, 1865.

Lieutenant-Colonel Joseph A. McLean was born at Philadelphia in 1823, and there learned the trade of a machinist. In 1848 he removed to Reading, found employment with the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company, and continued in its employ till 1861. In this time he took an active interest in the local affairs of Reading. He represented the Spruce Ward in Common Council for one year, 1855-56, having been selected as its presiding officer; and he was also a member of the school board for a time.

At the breaking out of the Rebellion he was prompt in recruiting troops, and was commissioned adjutant of the Fourteenth Pennsylvania Regiment, in the three months' service under General Patterson. At the expiration of this term of service, with his brother, George B. McLean, he began actively recruiting for the Eighty-eighth Pennsylvania (Three Years') Regiment, of which he was commissioned lieutenant-colonel August 9, 1861. With his regiment he participated in the battles of Cedar Mountain, Rappahannock Station, Thoroughfare Gap, Freeman's Ford, Gaines' Mill and second battle of Bull Run. In this latter disastrous engagement he was ordered with his regiment to support a battery which held the enemy in check, whilst the army was retired. Three times he charged with his command under a fierce fire, and in a fourth charge was mortally wounded and left upon the field, where he died and was buried.

Regimental Band.—The regimental band was the famous "Ringgold Band" from Reading. It was discharged from service by General Order dispensing with bands, issued on June 21, 1862.

CAPTAIN GEORGE B. RHOADS was the son of Henry Rhoads, Esq., an attorney and for a time associate judge of Berks County. He was a native of Reading, born in 1840, and received his education in the city schools. He left the High School to join the army, but was rejected, being under size. Through the intercession of Colonel Charles McKnight, however, he was accepted as a private, and made a corporal at Washington, having enlisted in April, 1861, as a private in the Ringgold Light Artillery for three months. Afterward he entered the three years’ service in the Eighty-eighth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, and was commissioned second lieutenant in Company B. For uniform good conduct and intrepidity in the field, he was appointed captain of Company F, in the same regiment. Whilst skirmishing at White Oak, in command of his regiment, he was shot and killed on June 13, 1864, aged only twenty-four years.

COMPANY H.—This company was recruited in Berks County, and was mustered out June 30, 1865, except where otherwise mentioned:

NINETY-THIRD REGIMENT.

The Ninety-third Regiment was organized in October, 1861, at the Fair-Grounds near Lebanon, Pa. It included two companies, B and G, and part of Company K from Berks County. In November it proceeded to Washington, and afterward into Virginia. On the 5th of May, 1862, it participated in the battle of Williamsburg. Colonel McCarter, of this regiment, said in his official report among other things,—

"For three hours the answering fire of the regiment was incessant, commanding from its position the openings of two roads, on either side of which were felled trees and bushes. At the end of this time the right and centre had expended forty-five rounds and were out of ammunition. The two companies on the left—Company B, Captain Arthur, and Company G, Captain Maitland—had been posted by me in the rear of the Fifty-fifth, when the enemy made three attempts to flank them, but was as often driven back. The firing of the enemy on this flank having ceased, and these companies having still thirty rounds of unexpended ammunition to the man, I conducted them to a position on our extreme right, upon which the fire of the enemy was still hotly kept up. Here our silence for some minutes had induced the belief that we had retreated, and these two companies had scarcely been posted when the enemy was seen charging up the road at the distance of about one hundred yards. One volley from Company G, deliberately delivered and aimed low, checked his advance, but he continued to fire rapidly and with fearful effect. At the end of thirty minutes he had been repulsed here and along the whole front."

The regiment was engaged in the battle of Fair Oaks on the 30th of May following, and displayed "sterling soldierly qualities on this sanguinary field." Captain Maitland, of Company G, was mortally wounded. At the battle of Malvern Hill, on July 1st, it occupied the extreme right of the line. It was in no engagement till the following spring, when it participated in the battle of Chancellorsville, and two months afterward in the memorable battle of Gettysburg. Then it moved southward with the army and went into winter-quarters at Harper's Ferry. In February, 1864, three-fourths of the regiment re-enlisted, and it was given a veteran furlough. Returning, it entered upon the Wilderness campaign on May 4th. The first engagement was on the Gordonsville and Fredericksburg Plank-Road, which continued for two days, and shortly afterward (on 12th) at the right of the famous "Angle," advancing within fifty yards of the rebel works, and enduring a destructive fire. In the progress of the army to the James River, the regiment participated in fierce fighting, losing men almost daily. From May 4th to June 12th it marched three hundred and fifty miles, twenty-six marches being in the night, and fought in eight distinct battles. It reached the front of Petersburg on June 15th. In July it was taken to Washington to defend the capitol, and it arrived just in time to drive back Early's skirmishers. On July 17th it was engaged in a sharp battle; then it pursued the enemy into Virginia, and had an engagement on September 13th, near Opequon Creek, and on September 19th, at Winchester. By October, Company G had become so much reduced that a new company had to be formed with recruits, and placed under command of Captain Kuhn. On October 19th it was engaged in battle at Cedar Creek, when the Union army was driven back four miles. But General Sheridan rallied the troops and routed the enemy. On October 28th most of the men re-enlisted. In November, for a time, it performed duty at Philadelphia, and in December it returned to the front of Petersburg, where it went into winter-quarters. On March 25, 1865, the brigade advanced, but finding the enemy too strong, withdrew, after enduring a severe fire. Early on April 2d the regiment charged the enemy's works and carried them after an obstinate struggle, planting its colors first on the ramparts. On April 6th it participated in the battle of Sailor's Creek. After the surrender of Lee, on the 9th, it marched to Danville to co-operate with Sherman for the defeat of Johnston. It remained in camp at this place for several weeks, and then proceeded to Washington via Richmond, where it was mustered out of service on June 27, 1865.

Colonel David C. Keller is the grandson of Conrad Keller, who was an early resident of Berks County. Among the children of Conrad Keller was John Keller, born in the county named and by occupation a tailor, serving also at times as school-teacher and musician. He married Esther Clouser, daughter of William Clouser, of the same county, and left the following surviving children: William C., Sarah (Mrs. William Yous), Daniel C., Caroline (Mrs. Alfred Brombach), David C., Samuel C., Jeremiah C. and Jacob C.

David C. Keller was born on July 25, 1839, in Rockland township, Berks County, and remained during his boyhood on the farm of his father, meanwhile pursuing his studies at the public school. At the age of seventeen years he removed to Danville, Montour County, Pa., for the purpose of learning the miller's trade. He spent two years at this business and then returned to Berks County, locating at Friedensburg, Oley township, as a clerk and remaining thus employed for three years. The firing upon Fort Sumter by the rebels aroused his patriotic zeal, and he then enlisted in Company C, Seventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers. He was mustered into service April 22, 1861, for three months and served for the entire period. He re-enlisted on October 21, 1861, as first lieutenant of Company K, Ninety-third Regiment, and on November 8, 1862, was promoted to captain. November 23, 1864, he was commissioned as major. He was brevetted lieutenant-colonel August 1, 1864, for distinguished services in the campaign before Richmond, Va., receiving his commission from the Governor of Pennsylvania on December 18th following. He was brevetted colonel on April 2, 1865, for gallant and meritorious service in the assault before Petersburg. He was assigned to the Second Brigade, Second Division, Fourth Corps Army of the Potomac, Peninsular campaign. He participated in the following engagements: Siege of Yorktown, April 15 to May 4, 1862; Williamsburg, Va., May 5, 1862; Chickahominy River, Bottoms Bridge, May 20 to 23, 1862; battle of Fair Oaks, May 31, 1862, where he was twice wounded; Chancellorsville, September 1, 1862; Antietam, September 17, 1862, where his regiment was transferred to the Third Brigade, Third Division, Sixth Corps; Fredericksburg, Va., December 11 to 15, 1862; Marye's Heights, May 3, 1863; Salem Heights, May 4, 1863; Gettysburg, Pa., July 2, 1863, where he was wounded. He re-enlisted February 7, 1864, and his regiment was transferred to the Second Division, Sixth Corps, where he was engaged in the battle of the Wil-was mustered out June 27, 1865. Colonel Keller then returned to Reading, where he has since resided.

He is in politics an active Republican. He was for four years a member of the Common Council of Reading and is now serving his second term as county commissioner. He was appointed by Governor Hartranft inspector-general, with the rank of lieutenant colonel, on the staff of Major-General William J. Bolton, Second Division National Guards Pennsylvania. He is a director of several building associations and member of the Grand Army of the Republic, having formerly been commander of General Keim Post, No. 76. He is a member of Teutonia Lodge, F. and A. M., No. 365, of Excelsior Chapter, No. 237, and of the Reading Commandery. Colonel Keller was married to Rosa, daughter of Conrad Krebs, of Reading, on June 21, 1865. They had six children, only one son surviving,—Daniel Franklin, born May 5, 1872, in Reading.

Colonel John E. Arthur.—John Arthur, the father of Colonel John E. Arthur, was of worthy Scotch-Irish ancestry. He emigrated from county of Tyrone, North Ireland, to America in 1810, and engaged in the profession of teaching in Chester County, Pa. He was married, in 1813, to Rebecca Parker, who was of English descent. They soon after moved to Lycoming County, Pa., and he there continued his chosen occupation until his death, in 1830. Mrs. Arthur survived her husband forty-eight years, and died in 1878, at the advanced age of ninety-two years. The subject of this sketch was born in Muncy Creek township, Lycoming County, April 25, 1826; attended the public schools, and then was apprenticed to learn the blacksmith's trade. He came to Reading when nineteen years old and secured employment as an apprentice at blacksmithing in the Reading Railroad shops. When the war began between United States and Mexico, he enlisted in Captain Thomas Leser's company, at Reading; went with it to Philadelphia; was transferred by railway to Chambersburg; marched from thence to Pittsburgh, the place of rendezvous, where they were assigned to the Second Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers, and were taken down the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers on steamboats. This regiment joined General Scott's army at his place of rendezvous, on the Island of Lobos, in the Gulf of Mexico. With his regiment, he participated in the siege of Vera Cruz, and after its surrender joined the triumphant march of General Scott's army to the city of Mexico; on the way he took part in the battle at the mountain pass of Cerro Gordo, and was garrisoned for a time at the city of Jalapa, to keep the road open to furnish supplies for the army above. He joined the army again at the city of Pueblo; assisted in storming the fortress of Chapultepec, two miles from the city of Mexico, and at the Belen Gate, one of the entrance-ways to the city, he was wounded in three places by pieces of a rifle, shattered by a cannon-ball. There were five men near him killed at the same instant. After the capture of the city he remained there six months in the hospital, during which time his wounds were dressed by a Mexican surgeon.

He returned to Reading with his company after an absence of one and a half years. Of this company, twenty of its members are living in 1886. In 1884 he became assistant foreman of the blacksmith department of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company's shops.
At the outbreak of the Civil War, in 1861, he recruited Company B, of the Ninety-third Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers, which was assigned to the Army of the Potomac, and he participated with it in the siege of Yorktown, battles of Williamsburg and Fair Oaks, and in the terrible fighting for seven days before Richmond. All of these were memorable engagements in the Peninsula campaign of 1862.

At the battle of Fair Oaks he was commended for his coolness and bravery by his brigade commander, General Peck, after which event for several months he had command of the regiment, and in July, 1862, was promoted to lieutenant-colonel. Later in the year 1862 he was engaged in the battle of Chantilly and was present at the battle of Antietam. After about two years' service, owing to physical debility, caused from a chronic disease, contracted in Mexico, he was discharged from the service on a surgeon's certificate.

He then returned home, recuperated his health, and in 1863 became foreman of the blacksmith department of the railroad shops at Reading. During the second Confederate invasion of Pennsylvania he recruited a company for the emergency, composed of prominent business men of Reading. This company was assigned to the Forty-second Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers, of which he was chosen lieutenant-colonel. After a term of about three months' service, he again resumed his duties at the railroad shops, in which position he rendered very efficient service for several years.

In 1870 Colonel Arthur was chosen city treasurer for the term of two years. At the next election he received the unanimous nomination of both political parties, and owing to fidelity of purpose and integrity of management of the finances of the city, was re-elected six successive times, serving in all fourteen consecutive years. He retired from that position in 1885.
On May 3, 1851, Colonel Arthur was married to Rebecca P. Moyer, daughter of Amos Moyer, of Reading. Their children are Mary, married to John H. Keppelman, of Reading; Frank M., draughtsman for the Lehigh Valley Railroad Company, at Easton; Amos A., a Methodist clergyman, stationed at Port Clinton, Schuylkill County; John E., a practical machinist; and Emily.

CAPTAIN ALEXANDER C. MAITLAND—Was born in Reading about the year 1832. He removed to Ohio when a young man. Whilst there he enlisted in the three months' service, and participated in the Virginia campaign under General McClellan. Upon receiving his discharge, he returned to Reading and recruited a company for the three years' service, which he called the "Coleman Rifles," after Dawson Coleman, who had generously assisted him in equipping the company. It was accepted by the government, and assigned to the Ninety-third Regiment as Company G. He was in the battles of Williamsburg and Fair Oaks, having been wounded in the latter. He was removed to St. Joseph's Hospital, Philadelphia, where he died on June 10, 1862, aged thirty years. His remains were brought to Reading and buried in Charles Evans' Cemetery.

NINETY-SIXTH REGIMENT.

The Ninety-sixth Regiment was recruited mostly in Schuylkill County. Some men from Hamburg and Berks County were included in Company G. It was mustered into service on September 23, 1861, at Pottsville, and participated in various engagements in the Peninsula, at Gettysburg and then in the Wilderness campaign. It was also engaged in the Shenandoah Valley. It was mustered out of service in West Philadelphia on October 21, 1864.

COMPANY G.—This company was recruited at Pottsville, in Schuylkill County. The following men were from Hamburg, in Berks County:

Jonathan C. Bear, sergt., must. in Oct. 16, 1861; pro.

Samuel Williams, must. in Oct. 29, 1861; died at Harrisburg, Pa., Dec. 17, 1862.

ONE HUNDRED AND FOURTH REGIMENT.

The greater part of Company H in this regiment was composed of men from Berks County; and among the field officers was John M. Gries, from Reading, chosen as major. During 1862 the regiment participated in the siege of Yorktown, and in the battles of Savage Station and Fair Oaks, in the Peninsula campaign. In the beginning of 1863 it was ordered to South Carolina, and there took part in the siege of Charleston and the capture of Fort Wagner. During August, 1864, it was stationed in Florida, guarding a line of railroad from Jacksonville to Baldwin. Thence it proceeded north to Alexandria, where it performed duty in the fortifications on the southern side of the Potomac River, till its term of service expired. It was mustered out of service at Philadelphia on September 30, 1864. Some of the men from Berks County re-enlisted in this regiment. There were veterans and recruits sufficient to form a battalion of five companies. Its principal service afterward was in the siege of Petersburg, participating in the assault on the city, April 3 and 4, 1865. It was mustered out of service at Portsmouth on August 25, 1865.

Major John M. Gries was the son of Dr. William Gries, for seventeen years a successful physician at Reading. He was born at Worms, about 1827, and accompanied his father to Reading when a boy. After having been educated here he adopted the business of an architect, and then traveled in Europe for the purpose of perfecting his knowledge of architecture. Upon returning, he located at Philadelphia, and pursued his vocation for some years with distinguished success. He designed the chapel of Charles Evans' Cemetery. In the fall of 1862 he entered the United States service as a volunteer for three years, and was chosen major of the Ringgold Regiment, afterward the One Hundred and Fourth, which was recruited in Berks, Bucks and Montgomery Counties. He served gallantly with the Army of the Potomac. He received a fatal wound at Fair Oaks, on May 31, 1862, while rescuing the colors of his regiment, which had been inadvertently left upon the field of battle unguarded. He was removed to Philadelphia, where he died on June 13th following, aged thirty-five years. His remains were brought to Reading, and buried in Charles Evans' Cemetery.

COMPANY H.—The following enlistments were from Reading and Berks County. When not otherwise mentioned, the date of muster out was August 25, 1865.

Jacob W. Glase, capt., must. in Sept. 12, 1861; pro. from 1st lieut. to capt. Dec. 17, 1864; captured at Fair Oaks, Va., May 31, 1862.

DURELL'S INDEPENDENT ARTILLERY, BATTERY D.—This battery was recruited in Berks and Bucks Counties. It was organized at Doylestown on September 24, 1861. On November 6th it proceeded to Washington and there received four ten-pound Parrott guns and horses and equipments for a six-gun battery. It was encamped east of the Capitol. On December 18th it moved to Munson's Hill, where it was assigned to McDowell's division and two additional pieces were provided. It was in the march upon Manassas on March 10, 1862, with the leading column; and upon its return encamped between Alexandria and Bailey Cross-Roads. Thence it moved to Falmouth, opposite Fredericksburg, on April 18th. When Jackson raided Shenandoah Valley this battery made a forced march with the corps to Thoroughfare Gap to intercept him on his retreat, but arrived too late and so returned to Falmouth, where it continued two months. On August 12th it was assigned to the Second Division of the Ninth Corps, and marched to the assistance of Pope. It was brought into action for the first time at Kelly’s Ford on August 21st. The left section became first engaged and exchanged rapid shots with the rebel guns for half an hour. The whole battery went into action (flanked by a regiment of Buford’s cavalry) and drove the enemy from his position after delivering about forty rounds. It crossed the river at night and moved towards Warrenton next morning, the centre section supporting Buford’s cavalry for a day and night. On the 27th it was assigned to Hooker’s division. At Bristoe Station, aided by a Rhode Island battery, it drove the enemy from three successive positions. One horse was killed here. On the morning of the 28th it moved to Manassas Junction and at night to Centreville. On the 29th it advanced across Bull Run, and, when the battle began to rage with great violence, it went into position a half-mile to the right and front of the Stone Hospital. It remained in this position until near night of the 30th, when the left of the line was forced back and the enemy’s shots began to tell upon its left flank. One gun was dismounted, two horses killed and one man wounded. It was ordered to retire upon learning that the ground was untenable. A new position was taken a few hundred yards to the rear and fire opened at long range, but at the end of twenty minutes it was again ordered back and it retired to Centreville. During the 31st it remained in the fortifications and on the evening of the next day it participated in the short but bloody battle of Chantilly, in which it was one of only two batteries engaged.

On September 2d it proceeded to Washington Arsenal and was refitted and fully equipped; and shortly afterward it moved on the Maryland campaign. It went into position near the top of South Mountain at three p.m. on the 13th. It was successful in this engagement, having fired from the six guns about two hundred and fifty rounds. The next day it moved after the enemy toward Antietam. On the 17th it was shelled out of camp at daylight, and going into position opened fire in reply. At nine A.M. it was ordered to the rear of Stone Bridge No. 3, nearly opposite Sharpsburg, and just before General Hartraft took the bridge its centre section moved near the bridge and crossed it closely after his infantry. This section was joined by the remainder of the battery soon afterward and the whole battery went into position about nine hundred yards from the opposing rebel guns. These guns were engaged at short intervals for two hours whenever they opened, and the battery only retired after the projectiles were spent. This was the most desperate engagement and at shortest range in which the battery participated. Two men were dangerously wounded and several horses dropped in their harness from exhaustion, which had to be left on the field.

When the army returned to Virginia the battery was engaged at Sulphur Springs on November 15th. For more than an hour it answered a hot fire of the enemy, expending over three hundred rounds. Lieutenant McIlvaine was mortally wounded and one man severely. In December the battery participated in the battle of Fredericksburg at long range and sustained no loss.

Near the close of March, 1863, the battery accompanied the Ninth Corps West and was stationed for some time at Paris, Mount Sterling and Crab Orchard, Ky. On June 6th it embarked at Lexington for Vicksburg to support Grant’s army, and then took a position twelve miles in the rear of Vicksburg, facing Jackson, to intercept the enemy if any attempt should be made at raising the siege.

Immediately after the fall of Vicksburg the battery moved towards Jackson, arriving before the town on July 10th. The battery took a position there, and kept up a steady fire upon the place for several days, sending a shell every ten minutes. Johnston retired, and the battery returned to camp upon the Yazoo. When the battery left for Vicksburg it was in a fine condition, numbering one hundred and twenty strong, and having arms, accoutrements and horses well supplied,—all in the highest state of efficiency. Upon its return, after an absence of a little more than two months, ten men had died, forty were sick in the hospital, and only twenty or thirty of those in camp were fit for duty. About half of the horses had died, and only a small number of those that remained were serviceable.

The battery remained at Covington till the spring of 1864. It was sent to Johnson’s Island, in Lake Erie, to prevent a threatened rescue of prisoners there, and in April it went to Washington to be refitted. Recruits were received to give the battery its original strength, and an entire new battery of ten Parrott guns. It marched with the Fourth Division of the Ninth Corps, and covered the wagon-train during the Wilderness campaign. It arrived before Petersburg about the middle of June, 1864, and was at once put upon the front. It was posted at Fort Morton, and kept up a ceaseless fire when the mine was exploded on July 30th. A month later it was engaged at Pegram’s Farm, and during the subsequent operations occupied various works before the beleaguered city. In September, 1864, Captain Durell was honorably discharged, and Lieutenant Rhodes succeeded him. When the final attack was made on the defenses of Petersburg, on April 2, 1865, by Hartranft’s command, the entire battery of six guns was brought to bear upon the rebel works, and when these were carried, detachments from the battery turned the captured guns upon the flying enemy. After the evacuation of the city, it moved along the South Side Railroad as far as Wilson’s Station, and upon Lee’s surrender proceeded to Alexandria, via City Point. It was mustered out of service, at Philadelphia, on June 13, 1865, except where otherwise mentioned.

CAPTAIN GEORGE W. DURELL was born at Wilmington, Del., on November 25, 1816. He learned his trade of painter at Philadelphia, and then removed to Reading, finding employment with the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company. After serving for several years, he was elevated to be foreman painter, and continued in this position till he enlisted in the Civil War.

In April, 1861, he was mustered into service with the Ringgold Light Artillery as first sergeant, for three months. Afterward he raised an independent battery of artillery, which was mustered into service September 21, 1861, as Durell's Independent Battery D. He was commissioned captain, and continued in active service till September 23, 1864, when he was obliged to resign his commission on account of sickness. Upon his return home, he was appointed provost-marshal of this district, and served this office till it was discontinued. He then resumed painting in the employ of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company, as foreman. He died November 9, 1883. He was an ardent Republican in politics, and in religious belief a devoted Baptist. He took an active interest in the Odd-Fellows and Masons. He possessed a fine musical education, having been a superior tenor singer. In his associations he was very highly esteemed.

NINE MONTHS' SERVICE.

The following volunteer companies from Berks County were enlisted in the nine months' service:

Company A, One Hundred and Twenty-eighth Regiment, Captain L. Beber Smith.

Company B, One Hundred and Twenty-eighth Regiment, Captain William McNall.

Company E, One Hundred and Twenty-eighth Regiment, Captain William H. Andrews.
Company H, One Hundred and Twenty-eighth Regiment, Captain John Kennedy.
Company I, One Hundred and Twenty-eighth Regiment, Captain Richard H. Jones.
Company K, One Hundred and Twenty-eighth Regiment, Captain George Newkirk.
Company E, One Hundred and Fifty-first Regiment, Captain Jacob S. Graeff.
Company G, One Hundred and Fifty-first Regiment, Captain Levi M. Gerhart.
Company H, One Hundred and Fifty-first Regiment, Captain William K. Boltz.
Company I, One Hundred and Fifty-first Regiment, Captain William L. Gray.
Company K, One Hundred and Fifty-first Regiment, Captain James W. Weida.

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-EIGHTH REGIMENT.

This regiment was recruited in response to the proclamation of the Governor calling for troops to serve for nine months, issued July 21, 1862. Companies A, B, E, H, I and K were recruited in Berks County. The regiment rendezvoused at Camp Curtin, and was there mustered into the service of the United States from the 13th to the 15th of August. The majority of the regimental officers were selected from the companies named. On the 16th of August it was ordered to Washington, moving under the command of Captain William H. Andrews, of Company E, because no officers had been as yet commissioned. Soon after its arrival at the capital it crossed the Potomac, and was encamped on Arlington Heights for a week. On the 21st it moved to Fairfax Seminary, and on the 29th to Fort Woodbury, where for a week—during the fierce fighting at Bull Run and Chantilly—it was incessantly engaged in felling timber and erecting fortifications. In this time Captain Samuel Crossdale, of Bucks County, had been appointed colonel and the staff selected.

On September 6th the regiment, in light marching order, recrossed the Potomac and entered upon the Maryland campaign. At Frederick City, on the 14th, it was assigned to Crawford's brigade, of Williams' division, Mansfield's corps. The command, moving forward rapidly, arrived in front of South Mountain by evening, where it was held in position during the night in expectation of a renewal of the battle. But the enemy retired, and late in the evening of the 16th it arrived at Antietam Creek. At eleven P.M. of same evening it was led across the stream to the support of Hooker's troops, and at two A.M. on the 17th it bivouacked in a ploughed field close to the hostile lines. At early dawn the battle opened, and the brigade was immediately advanced in close column. At half-past six A.M. the regiment was ordered into the fight, and it made a most gallant charge through the wood and into the memorable cornfield where the enemy lay concealed. Unfortunately the charge was made by the flank, and before the regiment could be formed into line the fire of the enemy had become very hot. Colonel Croasdale was instantly killed while in the act of giving orders and bringing his command into position; and soon afterward Lieutenant-Colonel Hamersley was severely wounded and borne from the field. This caused the men to fall into confusion for a time, but being soon restored to order, the command then held the ground where the struggle had been most desperate, and where the regiment had lost some of its bravest and best men, and was afterward relieved, when it rested on the field until nightfall. The loss was thirty-four killed and eighty-five wounded, of whom six died subsequently of their wounds. Captain William H. Andrews was among the killed, he having in the fight exhibited the most daring courage. After the battle the regiment was encamped at Sandy Hook, and afterward on Maryland Heights, being employed at the latter place in constructing fortifications. Much needed clothing was obtained here, and Major Wanner resigned to resume the duties of his office as mayor of Reading, he having left to assist in recruiting this regiment. Major Matthews was commissioned as colonel and Captain Dyer as major. The regiment was then thoroughly drilled. On December 16th it arrived at Neabsco River, where it halted, and on the 17th it turned back to Fairfax Station. With the exception of some toilsome marching after Stuart's cavalry on the 28th, it remained in camp until January 19, 1863, when it proceeded to Stafford Court-House, and went into winter-quarters, doing guard and picket duty till the opening of the spring campaign, under Hooker. Captain L. Heber Smith was here commissioned to succeed Hamersley as lieutenant-colonel, on account of Hamersley's permanent disability from wounds received at Antietam. On May 1st the brigade was ordered to intrench on the plank-road leading through the Wilderness, and later in the day the regiment was moved out to the United States Ford to open the way over the Rappahannock, but returned to the intrenchments at evening. During the night it was ordered out to the fort. There it remained until morning, and during the day participated in the fighting upon the left centre. At evening the enemy succeeded in breaking the right wing of the army, and, coming in upon the flank, occupied the Union works. The night was very dark, and in retiring to its original line the regiment suddenly found itself surrounded by the enemy. Colonel Matthews, Lieutenant-Colonel Smith, Captains McNall, Newkirk, Jones, Yeager and Huber, Lieutenants Obold and Anthony, and two hundred and twenty-five non-commissioned officers and men were taken prisoners and marched to Richmond. The remainder of the regiment, under the command of Captain Kennedy, succeeded in reaching its position in the line which it held with the utmost tenacity, in spite of the battle raging on this part of the field with great violence. It lost Captain Richards and a number of men wounded. On the afternoon of May 3d the brigade was ordered to the rear as a guard to prisoners, on account of having suffered severely during the preceding two days, and crossed the Rappahannock at United States Ford, but in a few hours afterwards was ordered to return and again summoned to the front. At the close of the battle the regiment, reduced to one hundred and seventy-two men, returned to Stafford Court-House. Its term of service having expired, it was relieved from duty on May 12th, when it proceeded to Harrisburg, and there it was mustered out of service on May 19th. The officers and men who had been taken prisoners were held in captivity only a short time. They returned in time to be mustered out of service with the regiment. Upon its return to Reading it was honorably received by the authorities and citizens, and then it disbanded.

CAPTAIN WILLIAM H. ANDREWS was born at Reading on March 27, 1835. He received his education at home and then entered the freight depot, in the employ of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company, where he continued for a number of years.

When the call for troops was made in 1862, in anticipation of a raid by the rebels into Pennsylvania, he raised a company of volunteers and was appointed captain. It was attached to the One Hundred and Twenty-eighth Regiment, as Company E. His company, with the regiment, participated in the battle of Antietam. He was killed in this engagement, on September 17, 1862, at the age of twenty-seven years. He was a very genial man, highly esteemed for his superior qualities.

COMPANY H.—This company was recruited at Reading. Unless otherwise stated, the men were mustered out May 19, 1863.

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY-FIRST REGIMENT.

Companies E, G, H, K and part of I were recruited in Berks County, the remaining part of Company I in Schuylkill County. They rendezvoused at Camp Curtin during September, where a regimental organization was effected.

On November 26th the regiment moved for Washington, and, upon its arrival, proceeded to Arlington Heights. Rations in haversack had become exhausted, and the commissary train had failed to come up. In this extremity the men of the Twenty-fifth Maine (encamped near by) proffered a share of their own rations to the famishing troops, early affording a lesson of generosity which the One Hundred and Fifty-first was not slow to improve on subsequent occasions. On the following day the train arrived, bringing abundant rations and one hundred rounds of ammunition to the man, filling cartridge-boxes and loading down knapsacks. On December 3d the regiment marched, in conjunction with the brigade of Colonel F. G. D'Utassay, to Alexandria, and thence proceeded by rail to Union Mills, twenty-two miles out, were it was placed on duty, relieving a Vermont brigade. It was here in an enemy's country, infested by Mosby's guerrillas, where every inhabitant was an informer and every visitant a spy. Unceasing vigilance and unquestioning obedience to orders were exacted, and the lessons there learned served it in many a trying hour. Colonel D'Utassay, who had been a Hungarian officer, and General Alexander Hayes, who succeeded him, were both strict disciplinarians, and were uniting in their efforts to have the command well instructed and drilled.

About the middle of February the regiment was transferred to Belle Plain, where it formed part of the First Brigade of the Third Division of the First Corps, General Doubleday commanding the division and General Reynolds the corps. Arriving at night, without tents or rations, the men were obliged to lie down hungry upon the cold ground, without protection from the cold weather. During the night several inches of snow fell, and soon afterwards a cold rain set in, during which a part of the regiment was ordered out upon the picket line. Privation and exposure induced sickness, from which some died and many were sent to the hospital. Caleb C. Parvin, second lieutenant of Company E, was among the victims that died of diseases contracted while in the line of duty. Just previous to the opening of the Chancellorsville campaign the Third Division was sent to Port Conway, on the Lower Rappahannock, for a diversion in favor of the operations soon to commence. The movement was successful, inducing Stonewall Jackson to move, with his whole corps and train, to a point on the opposite bank. The division was out forty-six hours, during thirty-six of which rain fell incessantly. This made marching difficult. Upon its return to camp General Doubleday sent a communication to Colonel Allen, through his adjutant-general, in these words: "The general commanding the division desired me to express his appreciation to Colonel Allen, of the good order and compactness which marked the march of the One Hundred and Fifty-first, both in going to and returning from Port Conway. He desires me to say that the same circumstances attracted the attention and commendation of Major-General Reynolds and staff, who wished this compliment tendered."

Before marching to the battle-field at Chancellorsville the First Corps moved down to Franklin's Crossing, where it was twice subjected to a vigorous shelling from the enemy posted on the opposite shore. On May 2d the corps made a forced march to United States Ford, and, having crossed, was about to encamp, when it was summoned to the front to occupy the line on the right of the army, from which the Eleventh Corps had been driven. During Sunday, the 3d, and Monday, the 4th, the regiment occupied a position on the picket line, between the Ely’s and Germania Ford roads, where it confronted the enemy, who sought every favorable opportunity to dispute the ground. On Wednesday the army withdrew, and the regiment went into camp near White Oak Church. Considerable sickness prevailed here, the morning report at one time showing one hundred and sixty on the sick list.

The march to Gettysburg commenced on the 12th of June. The right wing of the army (composed of the First and Eleventh Corps, under General Reynolds) made a forced march of one hundred and five miles in three days, throwing itself suddenly between Lee’s army (which was moving down the Shenandoah Valley) and Washington. At Broad Run they halted for the enemy to develop his plans. His cavalry having been defeated at Aldie and Upperville, and he having crossed the Potomac above, Reynolds hastened forward to Middleburg, where he again interposed between the enemy and the cities of Baltimore and Washington. As the enemy pushed on into Pennsylvania, Reynolds followed, and on the 1st of July his cavalry, under Buford, met the head of the enemy’s columns, and immediately commenced the battle. The brigades of Cutler and Meredith came up soon afterward and continued the fight. The First Brigade (now commanded by Colonel Chapman Biddle) arrived upon the field at half-past ten A.M., and took a position on the extreme left flank of the corps, the One Hundred and Fifty-first, under command of Lieutenant-Colonel McFarland, in the absence of Colonel Allen, holding the left of the brigade line. As it moved into position it was saluted by the booming of cannon and the rattle of musketry.

Without delay it was pushed forward, by order of General Rowley (now in command of the division, General Reynolds having fallen in battle), the men unslinging knapsacks as they went, and advancing obliquely to the west of the Theological Seminary, on a ridge, where it remained some time. All firing ceased then for nearly an hour. The enemy was driven back, and General Archer was captured with some eight hundred of his men. About noon the enemy opened again on both front and right. The brigade having been exposed to a flank fire, it was ordered back into the hollow, where, supporting Cooper’s battery and being subjected to a constant fire of shot and shell, it maintained its position for two hours and a half, only varying its line to avoid the destructive cross-fire of the enemy. At half-past two the One Hundred and Fifty-first was detached from the brigade by General Rowley, to be held as a reserve, and was posted behind a fence along the south end of Seminary Grove, facing north. A few moments later it changed front forward on the left company, and occupied a temporary breast-work erected by the Second (Robinson’s) Division earlier in the day, just in rear of the Seminary, facing west. By this time the enemy had concentrated in large force and began to close in. With only this single regiment in reserve, and with but a single line, Doubleday was opposing thrice his numbers, coming on three lines deep, and reaching out far beyond him on either flank. This pressure soon began to tell upon the Union line. A gap, occasioned by severe losses, was soon manifest between the brigades of Biddle and Meredith, and this was threatening to prove fatal to the entire left wing. Into this gap, by order of General Rowley, the One Hundred and Fifty-first was thrown to stay the tide which was fast sweeping on,—the last reserve thrown into action. In perfect order it moved forward, and closed up the broken line, Company D standing directly in front of, and about twenty-five yards distant from, the point of woods where General Reynolds was killed. Men began to fall before it had gained its position, and fire was not returned until the word was given, and then only deliberatley, not by battalion, but as each could deliver an effective shot. The fighting was now terrific, and the losses of the enemy in front of the position where the regiment stood were most grievous. "I know not," says Colonel McFarland, in his official report, "how men could have fought more desperately, exhibited more coolness or contested the field with more determined courage." But the contest was too unequal to continue long. The one attenuated line, with the last reserve thrown in, became shattered. The Iron Brigade, having borne the brunt of the battle for five hours, was finally withdrawn, thus exposing the right of the One Hundred and Fifty-first. The regiments on its left were, likewise, overborne, and one after another was forced back, until this regiment was left alone to resist the enemy's front and flank fire. Finally, when more than half its number had fallen, and seeing that it was being flanked by powerful masses, and that it would certainly be engulfed if it stood longer, the order was given to retire. Deliberately the order was obeyed, and the enemy followed with caution. At the barricade of rails in the edge of the grove back of the Seminary it again took position, where fragments of other regiments had assembled, and as the enemy's lines came on in front, a deadly fire was delivered upon them, which again checked their mad advance. But here a new danger threatened. Finding that he could not walk over even the remnants of the First Corps by direct advance, the wily rebel leader had sent a heavy force to the Union left, by a stealthy movement upon that flank. Before a warning of its presence had been given, the regiment received a heavy enfilading volley, by which Lieutenant-Colonel McFarland was shot down, receiving severe wounds in both legs, and large numbers of the men were disabled. The moment had come when it could no longer stand, and, with remnants of other commands, it retreated rapidly towards the town. General Early (who had closed in on the extreme Union right) was already in the streets, having flanked the Eleventh Corps, and here, the way being impeded by trains and retreating troops, a number of the regiment fell into the enemy's hands.

Upon its arrival on Cemetery Hill it mustered but ninety-two men. This number was increased, by the arrival of men who had been cut off from the column in passing through the town, to one hundred and thirteen. Captain Owens assumed command, and took position in support of a battery in rear of the Cemetery, where it remained until five o'clock of the evening of the 2d. It was then moved at double-quick to the support of the troops of Sickles, on the extreme right of the line. In marching down the Taneytown Road, and when it approached Round Top, the line of the brigade was broken by troops moving in a diagonal direction across its path, and the One Hundred and Fifty-first, with the Twentieth New York State Militia, became separated from the rest of the brigade, and, amidst the confusion consequent, failed to regain its position. Finding themselves thus separated, Colonel Gates and Captain Owens decided to act as an independent command, and moved up upon the front line, taking position on the left of the Second Corps, where it remained during the night. When the enemy made his grand charge on the afternoon of the 3d, these two regiments hastened to the right to support the troops at the menaced front, loading and firing as they went. Reaching a knoll where a battery of the Second Corps was posted, and in front of which the enemy was advancing, they made a stand, and for a short time maintained a sharp fire, driving the enemy from a slashing in which he had taken refuge from a flank attack of Stannard's (Vermont) brigade. The enemy was finally driven at all points, many throwing down their arms and surrendering, and the dear-bought victory was won. At this point Adjutant Samuel T. Allen was severely wounded. After the fighting was over, these regiments moved back near General Meade's headquarters, and on the morning of the 4th rejoined the brigade.

The heroism displayed by the One Hundred and Fifty-first in this battle is unsurpassed. It went into the fight with twenty-one officers and four hundred and sixty-six men. Of these, two officers and sixty-six men were killed, twelve officers and one hundred and eighty-seven men were wounded, and one hundred were missing, an aggregate loss of three hundred and sixty-seven—upwards of seventy-five per cent. "At Gettysburg," says General Doubleday, who commanded the First Corps, "they won, under the brave McFarland, an im-with the army in pursuit of Lee, coming up with his rear-guard at Funkstown on the 12th, and his main body near Williamsport on the 14th. That night the enemy escaped. Its term of service had now nearly expired. It was, accordingly, relieved from duty on the 19th, and returned to Harrisburg, where, on the 27th, it was mustered out.

perishable fame. They defended the left front of the First Corps against vastly superior numbers; covered its retreat against the overwhelming masses of the enemy at the Seminary, west of the town, and enabled me, by their determined resistance, to withdraw the corps in comparative safety. This was on the first day. In the crowning charge of the third day of the battle the shattered remnants of the One Hundred and Fifty-first Pennsylvania, with the Twentieth New York State Militia, flung themselves upon the front of the rebel column, and drove it from the shelter of a slasher in which it had taken shelter from a flank attack of the Vermont troops. I can never forget the services rendered me by this regiment, directed by the gallantry and genius of McFarland. I believe they saved the First Corps, and were among the chief instruments to save the Army of the Potomac and the country from unimaginable disaster." The encomium here awarded by General Doubleday (a general who never shunned hard fighting) was won at a fearful cost, and it was by the stubborn fighting of this regiment, and other fighting like it, that the great battle was finally won. Lieutenants Aaron S. Seaman and George A. Trexler were of the killed, and Lieutenant-Colonel McFarland, Adjutant Samuel T. Allen, Captains George L. Stone and James W. Weida, and Lieutenants Benjamin F. Oliver, Thomas L. Moyer, Henry H. Merkle, William O. Blodget and Albert Yost were of the wounded, and Captains William K. Boltz and William L. Gray, and Lieutenants James L. Reber and Charles P. Potts were taken prisoners. Lieutenant-Colonel McFarland submitted to the amputation of one leg on the field, and for want of suitable medical attention, the operation had to be repeated, and the other leg was left terribly mangled. For many weeks his life was despaired of, but he finally recovered. The captured officers and men suffered all the horrors of long imprisonment.

Colonel Allen, who had been granted a furlough, as soon as he learned that a battle was imminent, hastened to the front, arriving on the 3d, and resumed command. At six o'clock on the morning of the 6th the regiment moved

When the rebel army achieved its triumphs in the second battle of Bull Run, it hastened northward and commenced crossing the Potomac. The southern border of Pennsylvania lay unprotected in close proximity, and its rich harvests invited invasion. The Reserve Corps, which was originally organized for the State defense, had been called away to the succor of the hard-pressed army of McClellan upon the Peninsula, and was now upon the weary march, with ranks sadly thinned in the hard-fought battles of Mechanicsville, Gaines’ Mill, Charles City Cross-Roads and the second Bull Run, to again meet the foe, but powerless to avert the threatened danger. The result of the struggle on the plains of Manassas was no sooner known than the helpless condition of the State, which had been apparent from the first, became a subject of alarm. On September 4th, Governor Curtin issued a proclamation, calling on the people to arm and prepare for defense. He recommended the immediate formation of companies and regiments throughout the commonwealth, and, for the purpose of drill and instruction, that after three p.m. of each day all business houses be closed. On the 10th, the danger having become imminent, and the enemy being already in Maryland, he issued a general order, calling on all able-bodied men to enroll immediately for the defense of the State, and to hold themselves in readiness to march upon an hour’s notice, to select officers, and to provide themselves with such arms as could be obtained, with sixty rounds of ammunition to the man. He tendered arms to such as had none, and promised that they should be held for service for such time only as the pressing exigency for State defense should continue. On the following day, acting under authority of the President of the United States, the Governor called for fifty thousand men, directing them to report by telegraph for orders to move, and adding that further calls would be made as the exigencies should require. The people everywhere flew to arms, and moved promptly to the State capital. One regiment and eight companies were sent forward during the night of the 12th, and others followed as fast as they could be organized. On the 14th the head of the Army of the Potomac met the enemy at South Mountain, and hurled him back through its passes, and on the evening of the 16th and on the 17th a fierce battle was fought at Antietam. In the mean time the militia had rapidly concentrated at Hagerstown and Chambersburg, and General John F. Reynolds, who was at the time commanding a corps in the Army of the Potomac, had assumed command. Fifteen thousand men were pushed forward to Hagerstown and Boonsboro', and a portion of them stood in line of battle in close proximity to the field, in readiness to advance, while the fierce fighting was in progress. Ten thousand more were posted in the vicinity of Greencastle and Chambersburg, and about twenty-five thousand were either at Harrisburg, on their way to Harrisburg, or in readiness and waiting for transportation to proceed thither. The Twenty-fifth Regiment, under command of Colonel Dechert, at the request of General Halleck, was sent to the State of Delaware, to guard the Dupont Powder-Mills, whence the national armies were principally supplied. But the enemy was defeated at Antietam, and retreated in confusion across the Potomac. The emergency having passed, the militia regiments were ordered to return to Harrisburg, and in accordance with the conditions on which they had been called into service, they were on the 24th mustered out and disbanded. The train on which the Twentieth Regiment was returning over the Cumberland Valley Railroad collided, upon nearing Harrisburg, with a train passing in the opposite direction, by which four men were killed and thirty injured.

In a letter addressed to Governor Curtin by General McClellan, thanking him for his energetic action in calling out the militia, and placing them in the field, the general adds,—

"Fortunately, circumstances rendered it impossible for the enemy to set foot upon the soil of Pennsylvania, but the moral support rendered to my army by your action was none the less mighty. In the name of my army; and for myself, I again tender to you our acknowledgments for your patriotic course. The manner in which the people of Pennsylvania responded to your call, and hastened to the defense of their frontier, no doubt exercised a great influence upon the enemy."

In an order issued by Governor Bradford, of Maryland, soon after the battle, he says,—

"To Governor Curtin, of Pennsylvania, and the militia of his State, who rallied with such alacrity at the first symptoms of an invasion, our warmest thanks are also due. The readiness with which they crossed the border, and took their stand beside the Maryland brigade, shows that the border is, in all respects, but an ideal line, and that in such a cause as now unites us, Pennsylvania and Maryland are but one."

Alonzo B. Turner, second lieutenant.
Anthony Bickel, first sergeant.
Sergeants: Henry Rorke, Harrison Fix, Mahlon Fox.

CAPTAIN SAMUEL HARNER gave seven years of his life to the service of his country. He was five years in the regular army, having in this time passed through the Mexican War; and at the outbreak of the Rebellion he enlisted as a volunteer and served one year in Kentucky. He commanded Company H in the Twentieth Regiment of the State Militia from Reading, during the rebel invasion of 1862, and Company B, Forty-second Regiment, during the invasion of 1863. He died at his residence in Reading on February 11, 1865, aged thirty-seven years. He was a native of Reading and a highly-respected, exemplary man.

COMPANY I.

Frederick S. Boas, captain.
Samuel Robinson, first lieutenant.
Henry Schroeder, second lieutenant.
Samuel Hamilton, first sergeant.
Sergeants: Henry Fleck (accidentally killed, Sept. 26, 1862), George S. Rowbotham, Daniel M. Weidner, Frank Dundore.
Musicians: Henry Redmond, Jacob Hamilton.

CAPTAIN FREDERICK S. BOAS is of German extraction. He is the great-grandson of Rev. William Boas, who emigrated from Württemberg, Germany, and settled at Reading, where he became one of the first pastors of the German Reformed Church. He continued to officiate as a pastor until old age compelled his retirement from active service. He was married to Barbara Epler, of Bern township, Berks County, and had eight children—John, Jacob, Frederick, William, Daniel, Barbara (intermarried with Jacob Levan), Catherine (intermarried with Abraham Wanner) and Elizabeth (intermarried with Frederick Rapp). He died November 28, 1814, aged seventy-five years. His son John was born March 17, 1774, at Reading, and died August 8, 1860, having followed during his early life the trade of a hatter. He was married to Susanna Herbine, of Bern township, whose children were John, Daniel H. and Catherine (intermarried with —— Sallada). Daniel H., the father of Captain Boas, was born September 28, 1800, at Reading, in the dwelling now occupied as a residence by his son, where he died October 6, 1852. He was married to Elizabeth, daughter of Jacob Shearer, of Reading, born January 13, 1800, and died December 30, 1858. Their children are Mary Ann, born in 1824 (wife of George W. Goodrich); Catherine, in 1828 (now deceased); Eliza E., in 1827, who was intermarried with Daniel B. Kerper, deceased; Susan A., in 1828, deceased; Frederick S.; Albert D., in 1838; and Clara E., in 1840, intermarried with —— Austin.

Frederick S. Boas was born November 10, 1834, at the homestead in Reading. He received a thorough rudimentary education. In 1830 his father abandoned his trade as a manufacturer of hats, and then embarked in the lumber business. His son, upon finishing his studies, became associated with him in this business, and in 1852 succeeded him as the sole proprietor. Although interested at various times in other enterprises, he has since 1848 been thoroughly identified with the lumber trade in Berks County, and the various building operations incident to that business. On the 30th of November, 1858, he was married to Rosa, daughter of Joshua Keeley, of Reading. Their children are John K., married to Margaret Cressman, of Reading; Mary M., and Caddie S. John K. Boas is actively engaged in the lumber business in Reading.

Mr. Boas was formerly much interested in the State militia, having in 1855 become captain of the “Reading Rifles.” This company, by its perfect equipment and excellent discipline, acquired a high reputation as a military organization. During the Civil War, he organized a company of volunteer militia, numbering one hundred and ten men. It was Company I, in the Twentieth Regiment, mustered into service September, 1862. Military service was performed nearly two weeks. The regiment was discharged in the latter part of September, when the company returned to Reading.

The Boas family have for many years advocated the principles of the Democratic party. Captain Boas represented the Southwest Ward in the select branch of City Council from 1858 to 1861, having been president during the last year. He was for a time secretary, and one of the building committee, of the South Reading Market-House Company, and also secretary of the West Reading Railroad Company until it became merged into the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company. In June, 1856, he became a member of Lodge No. 62, of Free and Accepted Masons, and afterward filled various official positions. He aided in organizing St. John's Lodge, No. 435, in which he filled the office of first Worshipful Master. He is a member of Reading Chapter, No. 152, and also of Reading Commandery, No. 42, being now Past High Priest in the former. He is the present representative of St. John's Lodge, and one of the managers of the Home for Free and Accepted Masons of Pennsylvania.

The father of Captain Boas was one of the organizers of the Universalist Church of Reading, and the captain himself has been a member of the church since 1851. He has filled the office of secretary of the church vestry since 1854. He has taken an active and prominent part in the Sunday-school since his boyhood. As a delegate and representative from the church, he attended many of the conventions held by the Universalist denomination.

DRAFTED MILITIA OF 1862.

During the year 1862 the military operations were conducted with such energy, and so many men were required, that volunteer companies were not sufficiently numerous to supply the increasing demands for troops. The government was therefore driven to the extreme measure of impressing men into service by drafting them for that purpose. This was repugnant to the people; but the perilous situation of the country justified the proceeding, and it was therefore borne with submission. The following companies were composed of drafted men from Berks County, who were mustered into service for nine months:

Company H, 167th Regt., Capt. Abr'm H. Schaefler.
Company I, 179th Regt., Capt. Amos Drenkel.

ONE HUNDRED AND SIXTY-SEVENTH REGIMENT.

This regiment was exclusively from Berks county, and was organized with the following field officers: Charles A. Knoderer, colonel; De Puy Davis, lieutenant-colonel; Gustavus A. Worth, major. Colonel Knoderer was a graduate of the Polytechnic School of Carlsruhe, and had served as captain in a regiment of the patriot Landwehr in the Baden struggle of 1849. He also served on the staff of General Sigel, in Fremont's campaign in Missouri, and was a learned and accomplished officer. Soon after its organization the regiment was ordered to Suffolk, Virginia, in the Department of the James, under command of General Dix. The forces at Suffolk and vicinity were commanded by General John J. Peck, who was charged with holding the line south of the James, to cover the approaches to Portsmouth and Norfolk. In this service the regiment was actively engaged, being employed in fatigue duty upon the fortifications (in the planning of which Colonel Knoderer was an adept), in reconnoitring and out-post duty, and in drill, preparatory to active campaigning. Late on the evening of January 29, 1863, General Corcoran, who commanded a division under General Peck, moved with his column towards the Blackwater, and at Deserted Farm, seven miles out, encountered a strong force of the enemy, under General Roger A. Pryor. Corcoran immediately made an attack, and a fierce night engagement ensued. The fighting was principally with artillery and the One Hundred and Sixty-seventh was fearfully exposed to the enemy's fire. At the opening of the battle Colonel Knoderer ordered his men to lie down, and fortunately few were injured; but the horses of the officers, with the exception of that of the adjutant, were all killed, and the colonel himself received a mortal wound. The enemy was finally driven, and the command returned again to camp. Lieut.-Col. Davis succeeded to the command of the regiment, and was subsequently commissioned colonel. It participated in the desultory operations, which were kept up until the beginning of April, when the right wing of the rebel army, under General Longstreet, numbering some forty thousand men, advanced upon the place, and attacked, but failed to carry it. He then laid siege to it, and constructed elaborate works for its reduction. For nearly a month these operations were vigorously pushed, and for many days the bombardment of the fortifications was almost incessant. But so skillfully had they been planned, and so well constructed, that General Peck, with a force of only about a third of the number of the invading army, successfully repelled every attack, and finally compelled Longstreet to raise the siege. The One Hundred and Sixty-seventh was actively employed in the defense throughout the entire siege, and rendered efficient service. Towards the close of June, and during the time of Lee's invasion of Pennsylvania, the regiment formed part of the command which was sent to demonstrate in the direction of Richmond, and upon its return was ordered to join the Army of the Potomac, then in pursuit of Lee's army in Maryland. It formed junction on the 15th of July, the day after the escape of the enemy across the Potomac, and was assigned to the First Brigade, First Division, of the First Corps. With that corps, it participated in the pursuit of Lee to beyond the Rappahannock, when, its term of service being about to expire, it was relieved at the front, and ordered to Reading, where, on the 12th of August, it was mustered out. The conduct of the regiment during its short service in the Potomac army is shown by the following note addressed to Colonel Davis by General Cutler, division commander: "As you are about leaving the service with your command, I desire to express to you, and through you to your command, my entire approval of the manner in which they have discharged their duty as soldiers since they joined this division. The regiment has been a pattern of order and promptness on the fatiguing marches of the last month."

Colonel Charles A. Knoderer was a native of the Grand Duchy of Baden, and educated in the Polytechnic School there for the profession of a civil engineer. After graduating he served the government as a civil engineer, and then as a lieutenant in the army. When the Revolution broke out in Germany in 1848, he resigned his commission and united with Sigel and other patriots in a struggle for constitutional liberty. But this effort proving a failure, he and many others fled to America. He came to Reading in 1849, and in 1850 entered the service of the Schuylkill Navigation Company, remaining in its employ till 1861, when he was appointed chief of engineers on the staff of General Franz Sigel, and participated in the Missouri campaign under General Fremont. He then returned to Reading, and after a short employment with the Navigation Company re-entered the military service. In September, 1861, during the rebel raid into Pennsylvania, he served as colonel of the Eleventh Regiment Pennsylvania Militia, having gone from Reading as a private and elected colonel at Harrisburg. And shortly afterward he was elected colonel of the One Hundred and Sixty-seventh Regiment of drafted men from Berks County. He was wounded at the battle of Blackwater, on January 30, 1862, and died on February 15, 1863, aged thirty-six years. His remains were brought to Reading and buried in Charles Evans’ Cemetery.

CAPTAIN JONAS M. SHOLLENBERGER is descended from German ancestors. His grandfather was Lawrence Shollenberger, a farmer, residing in Greenwich township, Berks County, who married Mary Correll, of the same township, and had two sons, John and Jacob, and four daughters. John Shollenberger, the older son, was born in Greenwich township and after his marriage removed to Albany township, in the same county. He learned the trade of blacksmith, but in this township he became and followed the pursuits of a farmer. He married Elizabeth, daughter of Daniel Merkle, of Richmond township, who was descended from an old and established family in this section of the county, and had twelve children,—Sarah, Daniel, Catherine, John, Lacy, Nathan, Jonas M., Elizabeth, Edwin, Malinda, Lydia and Fianna.

Jonas M. Shollenberger, the subject of this biographical sketch, was born in Albany township on February 27, 1831. In the year 1847 he accompanied his parents to Richmond township. His earliest advantages of education were received at the schools in Albany township. Afterward he attended the Amityville Boarding School, and then for two winters engaged in teaching.

He married Mary, daughter of David Dry, of Rockland township, Berks County, on October 23, 1853. The children of the marriage are Catherine (deceased), Calvin D., Milton service for nine months, commanding Company I of this regiment, and participating in various engagements. After his discharge, on August 12, 1863, he resumed farming. He still resides on and conducts the same farm. He is in politics an active Democrat, and in 1881 he was elected to the office of county register and clerk of the Orphans' Court for one term of three years, serving from 1882 to 1884, inclusive. He is a member of Huguenot Lodge, No. 377, of F. and A. M., of Kutztown, also of Reading Commandery, No. 42, and of Excelsior Chapter, No. 337. He is a member of the Reformed Church of Fleetwood, in which he has filled the offices of deacon and trustee.

ONE HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-NINTH REGIMENT.

This regiment included two companies—I and K—from the county of Berks. It was organized in companies at periods ranging from the 23d of October to the 6th of December, 1862, and on the 8th of December a regimental organization was effected. Soon after its organization it proceeded to Fortress Monroe and thence to Yorktown, where it formed part of the garrison at the fort, and was encamped within its walls. Upon assuming command, Colonel Blair commenced a thorough discipline of his men, with the most flattering results. It did little else than garrison duty until the last of July, when it was called out to join in the movement made by General Dix up the Peninsula. “When the movement upon Richmond was made,” says Colonel West, in the document above quoted, “by General Dix, in the summer of this year, I was in command of the ‘Advanced Brigade’ of the forces that moved up the Peninsula. It became necessary to strengthen my brigade with an additional regiment, and the commanding general authorized me to designate any one I chose. I immediately named the One Hundred and Seventy-ninth, and, accordingly, Colonel Blair reported to me with his regiment and became a part of my command. During the march to White House and thence to Baltimore Cross-Roads, where my brigade was engaged upon two occasions, Colonel Blair’s regiment was prompt and ready, and always well in hand. A peculiarity about his command was that it never had a straggler. During the return march—the most severe, on account of a drenching storm, of any I ever performed—the One Hundred and Seventy-ninth crowned its reputation as a first-class organization by being always closed and promptly in its place, whilst other regiments were scattered for miles along the road.”

Upon its return to camp it was ascertained that Lee had invaded Pennsylvania, and though its term of service was about to expire, by the unanimous vote of the men, by companies, their further services were tendered to Governor Curtin as long as he should need them for the defense of the State. This offer was accepted; but by the time the regiment had reached Washington, en route to the front, the rebel army had retreated to Virginia. It was, accordingly, ordered to Harrisburg, where, on the 27th of July, it was mustered out of service.

Emergency Troops of 1863.

The triumph of the rebel army at Fredericksburg in December, 1862, and its success at Chancellorville in May, 1863, emboldened its leader to again plan an invasion of the North. As a precautionary measure, two new military departments were established by order of the War Department on June 9, 1863—the one called Monongahela, comprising the western part of Pennsylvania and parts of Virginia and Ohio, with headquarters at Pittsburgh; and the other called Susquehanna, comprising the remaining portion of Pennsylvania, with headquarters at Harrisburg. And to aid in this work, Governor Curtin issued a proclamation on June 12, 1863, inviting the attention of the people to this matter, and urging upon them the importance of raising a sufficient force to defend the State. It becoming daily more evident that the enemy intended to cross the Potomac in force, the President on June 15th called for one hundred thousand men from Pennsylvania, Ohio, Maryland and West Virginia, to serve for a period of six months, unless sooner discharged; and of this number Pennsylvania was to furnish fifty thousand. Governor Curtin then issued a proclamation calling upon all men capable of bearing arms to enroll themselves in military organizations and to encourage all, others to afford assistance towards protecting the State. In pursuance of this call many troops were raised throughout the State. The citizens of Berks County re-responded promptly and raised fifteen companies of men—ten of which were formed into one regiment, called the Forty-second.¹ They were mustered into service and moved to the front. But so rapid were the movements of the armies, and the decisive battle of Gettysburg was fought so soon after the call for the militia, that the men had scarcely arrived in camp and been organized before the danger was over. The rebel army made its escape on the 13th and 14th of July, and then the campaign was ended. But the militia was, however, held for some time after this, having been employed on various duty.

With the close of this raid the rebel invasion of 1863 ended. Further service was no longer required of the militia, and during the months of August and September the majority of the men were mustered out. With few exceptions, they were not brought to mortal conflict. But they, nevertheless, rendered most important service. They came forward at a moment when there was pressing need. Their presence gave great moral support to the Union army.

The following volunteer companies from Berks County were in the emergency service of the State during the summer of 1863. The entire Forty-second Regiment was composed of companies from the county:

- Co. E, 42d Regt., Capt. John McKnight.
- Co. K, 42d Regt., Capt. Jacob Deppen.

ONE HUNDRED DAYS' SERVICE.

The following four companies from Berks County were in the one hundred days' service, having been enlisted in July, 1864:

Company B, 190th Regt., Capt. Harrison Maltzberger.

ONE HUNDRED AND NINETY-FOURTH REGIMENT.

This regiment was recruited in ten counties of the State—Company I having been from Berks County. It was organized at Camp Curtin on July 22, 1864, with the following field officers: James Nagle, colonel; Richards McMichael, lieutenant colonel; Oscar D. Jenkins, major. On the day of its organization it moved for Baltimore, and upon its arrival there it went into camp in Mankin's Woods. About the 1st of September the regiment moved to Camp Carroll, a mile southwest of the city, on the line of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. Company I and five other companies of the regiment were stationed at various points in the city for provost duty. Details from the remaining companies, to serve as escorts and guards to rebel prisoners on their way through the city to places of confinement, and for recruits destined for the front, were being constantly made as long as the regiment remained in service. At the expiration of its term the scattered detachments were called in, and it proceeded to Harrisburg, where, on the 6th of November, it was mustered out.

Col. Richards McMichael is of Scotch-Irish ancestry. His grandfather emigrated from Ireland and settled in Berks County over one hundred years ago. His father, John McMichael, was born in this county August 27, 1775, and in 1799 married to Ann Mackinson, who was born November 12, 1779. They had issue,—James, born 1800; Naomi, 1801; Isaac, 1803; Alfred, 1805; Andrew, 1810; Richards, February 21, 1816; and Obad, 1818.

Richards McMichael is a native of Robeson township, Berks County. He passed his youth... at home till his fifteenth year, going to school and assisting occasionally at farming, and then entered the carpenter-shop appurtenant to Joanna Furnace, in the township named, as an apprentice. After continuing there for some years he removed to Lancaster County, and at the Conowingo Furnace carried on his trade for several years. In 1837, and for a short time afterwards, he was employed at the Schuylkill Furnace, near Hamburg, and then at the Joanna Furnace. In 1839 he settled at Reading, and here he has resided since. His first employment was with Dotterer & Darling, founders, etc., as a pattern-maker, and afterwards with Adam Johnson, in the same vocation, till 1846. The Mexican War having then been begun, and he having been a member of the Reading Artillerists, commanded by Captain Thomas Leoser, a company which had offered its services to the national government, he enlisted and went with his company to Mexico. The company was mustered into service January 5, 1847, at Pittsburg, as Company A, Second Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers. On January 7th he was appointed sergeant-major, and in September following he was promoted to second lieutenant. He participated with his company in every engagement from the surrender of Vera Cruz to the taking of the Gate of Belen, when the victorious army entered the famous capital of Mexico, having distinguished himself upon several occasions by remarkable courage in fierce and destructive hand-to-hand conflicts with the enemy. After the severe engagement which occurred just before the capture of the city of Mexico many of his comrades lay sick and wounded in a hospital. He was a daily visitor, carrying fruit to them and ministering in various ways to relieve their wants and make them comfortable. In this he showed the true nobility of a brave heart. And his kindness was highly appreciated, for the members of the company presented him with a sword as a testimonial of their regard. On November 5th he was elected major of his regiment by a very complimentary vote, but owing to misrepresentations he was never commissioned. He was mustered out of service with his company at Pittsburgh, on July 5, 1848, and returned with it to Reading.

Upon his return home he was employed at Johnston's foundry till 1851, and then in the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Co.'s pattern-shop till 1861. Shortly after his return he was elected brigade inspector of militia, and filled this office very creditably for nine years. When the Civil War began he at first assisted generally in organizing volunteer companies at Reading, and then proceeded to Harrisburg with the Ringgold Light Artillery, his duty as brigade inspector requiring him to see that all the companies in his brigade were at the place of rendezvous, where he was placed in command of the arsenal as chief of ordinance. He held this position until the latter part of April, when the first quota of Pennsylvania (fifteen regiments) was filled, and in the organization of the Fourteenth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers he was elected lieutenant-colonel. He served with the regiment three months. At the close of this service he was appointed lieutenant-colonel by Governor Curtin for the three years' service and mustered in with the Fifty-third Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, and he continued with this regiment for nearly three years, when, owing to sickness, he was obliged to resign his commission, and he was honorably discharged upon a surgeon's certificate May 19, 1864. Whilst with this regiment its officers presented to him a fine sword and sash as a mark of their esteem for his kindly, courteous disposition, and for his ability and bravery in the performance of his duties. Shortly afterward, July 24, 1864, upon regaining his health, he joined the One Hundred and Ninety-fourth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers in the one hundred days' service and was elected lieutenant-colonel. His superior officer was Colonel James Nagle, who had been in the Mexican War as captain of Company A, First Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers. After the expiration of this term he was mustered out, and upon his return to Reading appointed deputy provost-marshal of this district. He served this position till the close of the war and then resumed his trade as a pattern-maker in the employ of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company. He has continued in this vocation till now, having held the position of foreman since.

In politics Colonel McMichael was formerly a Whig. He became a Republican upon the inception of the Republican party, and he has continued his identity with this party ever since. In 1878 and again in 1880 he received the nomination of his party for the Assembly from the district of Reading. He is a member of the McLean Post, No. 16, G. A. R. By nature he is modest and retiring. He has been a resident of Reading for nearly fifty years, and his upright deportment throughout this period has won the high respect of his fellow-citizens.

He was married, November 11, 1849, to Martha Reppard, with the following issue: Winfield Scott, Alfred Henry and Naomi, the latter being now deceased.

One Hundred and Ninety-Fifth Regiment.
This regiment was principally recruited in Lancaster County in July, 1864, to serve for a period of one hundred days. It included two companies, A and B, from Berks County. It was organized at Camp Curtin, on the 24th of July. Oliver C. James, of Company B, was elected major. On the day of its organization it proceeded to Baltimore. After a halt of three days there it moved on to Monocacy Junction, where, for a period of two months, it was engaged in guarding the bridge which spanned the creek, and the lines of railway; and it was thoroughly drilled and instructed—for many of the officers and men had no previous military training. On the 1st of October it proceeded to Berkeley County, West Virginia, and was posted along the line of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, with headquarters at North Mountain Station, where it remained till the expiration of its term of service. Three hundred of the men re-enlisted to serve for one year, who were consolidated in three companies and remained on duty under the command of Captain Henry D. Markley, of Company A; subsequently seven other companies were recruited, and they together were re-organized as the One Hundred and Ninety-fifth Regiment, with Captain Markley.
as major. It performed guard duty at Kable-town, Berryville and Staunton. At the latter place the three veteran companies were mustered out in the middle of June, 1865.

ONE HUNDRED AND NINETY-SIXTH REGIMENT.

This regiment was recruited under the auspices of the Union League, at Philadelphia, to serve for one hundred days, and it was known as the Fifth Union League Regiment. It included Company I, of Berks County. It was organized at Camp Cadwalader on July 20, 1864, and a week later proceeded to Camp Bradford, near Baltimore. About the middle of August it moved by rail to Chicago, Ill., where it performed guard duty at Camp Dougliss, a large number of prisoners of war having been confined there. Early in November it returned to Philadelphia, and was thence ordered to duty at Fort Delaware. It was mustered out. of service at Philadelphia on November 17, 1864.

ONE YEAR'S SERVICE.
The following six volunteer companies were from Berks County in the one year's service, having been enlisted in August, 1864:
Co. H, 205th Regt., Capt. Franklin Schmehl.

TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTH REGIMENT.
Companies B, E and H of this regiment were recruited in Berks County. They rendezvoused at Camp Curtin, where, on September 2, 1864, field officers were selected, including William F. Walter, captain of Company E, as lieutenant-colonel. Lieutenant-Colonel Walter had served in the One Hundred and Fourth Regiment. On the 5th the regiment left Harrisburg, proceeded to Washington, crossed the Potomac, and went into camp at Fort Corcoran. At the end of a week it moved to Camp Distribution, and taking in charge thirteen hundred recruits and drafted men there, proceeded with them by transports to City Point. It was engaged in picketing from the left of the army line to the James, and in building forts and earth-works for the defense of City Point, nearly the entire regiment being called to duty daily. On October 9th it was ordered to the Army of the James, and at the end of twenty days, during which it was employed on picket duty, it returned and proceeded to join the Army of the Potomac. With five other new Pennsylvania regiments, it formed a provisional brigade, commanded by General Hartranft, and was attached to the Ninth Corps. Early in December this brigade moved to the relief of the Second and Fifth Corps, which were threatened with an attack by the enemy, while out upon a demonstration on the left. On December 15th the six regiments composing this brigade were organized into a division, which became the Third of the Ninth Corps, composed of two brigades. The Two Hundred and Fifth was in the Second Brigade. General Hartranft commanded the division, and General Parke the corps. With the exception of occasional marches to the left, in support of aggressive movements, the regiment remained in camp, near Fort Prescott, on the Army Line Railroad during the winter, where it was engaged in drill and fatigue duty.

Before daylight, on the morning of March 25, 1865, the regiment was summoned to arms, and ordered to stand in readiness to move upon the first signal, the enemy having broken through the line on Wilcox's front, and captured Fort Steadman. General Hartranft was quickly upon the ground where further disaster threatened, and gathering in the regiments of his division, attacked and checked the victorions onset of the enemy. The Two Hundred and Fifth was ordered to move down a ravine which ran in the rear of the captured line, and opposite Fort Haskell, halted under cover, holding in support the rest of the line, which was hotly engaged. For nearly an hour it was forced to stand in waiting. Finally, when all his plans for a combined assault had been perfected, General Hartranft gave the signal to charge, and with a united front, and with the greatest determination and daring, the lines moved on, sweeping everything before them, and regaining all that was lost. The Two Hundred and Fifth moved at once to the support of the charging column, and held a large number of prisoners, small arms and one battle-flag. The loss, fortunately, was but slight, being but ten wounded.

Of the part taken by the Two Hundred and Fifth, in the final assault upon the works before Petersburg, on the morning of the 2d of April, an idea will be best gained by the following extract from Captain Holmes' official report: "On the night of the 1st instant, at eleven o'clock, the regiment was ordered to form on the color line in front of the camp, Major Morrow in command. At one o'clock A.M., of the 2d the regiment was moved towards, and on the Plank Road in rear of Fort Sedgwick, halted some time, and then advanced by the right of the fort in the covered way and formed in line of battle, with the Two Hundred and Seventh in front, directly in rear of our picket line. The order was given to charge the enemy's works at daylight, which was gallantly accomplished. The regiment captured Battery 30, with a number of prisoners. A battle-flag was also captured by Private John Lilly, of Company F, who acted very gallantly throughout the engagement. This flag was forwarded to General Hartranft's headquarters with a statement of its capture. Our colors were planted on the works, and remained there until the regiment was relieved. At this time Major Morrow received a severe wound in the foot, and was taken off the field. I then assumed command, and remained with the regiment in the works, repulsing several charges made by the enemy during the day, and at night assisted in placing the abatis in front of our works, under a severe enfilading fire from the enemy, remaining upon the line until two o'clock on the following morning, when I was ordered to move with the regiment to the rear of our picket line." In the advance upon the hostile works, and in driving out the enemy and holding the line when captured, the regiment was exposed to a fearful fire of infantry and artillery, from the effect of which it suffered heavy losses. Two officers, Lieutenants Henry A. Lower and David B. Roberts, and twenty-two enlisted men were killed, six officers and ninety-one enlisted men were wounded, one officer, Lieutenant Samuel L. Hughes, of Company E, mortally, and five men were missing,—an aggregate loss of one hundred and twenty-six.

At daylight the regiment was ordered to advance towards Petersburg, but everywhere the evidences of a general evacuation were observable, and, on arriving within the city, it was found that the enemy had fired it in several places. By the aid of the fire companies the flames were subdued and the bridges crossing the Appomattox were saved. At noon the regiment returned to its former camp, and, striking tents, started with the division to follow up the advantage. The progress to Burkesville Junction was slow, the command being charged with the repair of the South Side Railroad as it went, and with keeping open this line of communication with the main body of the army. The regiment remained at Burkesville until after the surrender of the rebel armies in the east and hostile operations were at an end. It then proceeded via City Point to Alexandria, and encamped at Seminary Hill, where it was mustered out of service on June 2d.

ONE HUNDRED AND NINETY-EIGHTH REGIMENT.

This regiment was recruited at Philadelphia during the summer of 1864 under auspices of the Union League to enter service for one year. It included Companies D and G from Berks County. It was organized September 9, 1864, and September 19th following it proceeded to join the Army of the Potomac in front of Petersburg. Upon its arrival it was assigned to the First Brigade, First Division of the Fifth Corps.

The battle of Peeble's Farm opened on the 30th, and here the regiment had its first baptism of fire. It had scarcely got into position, when incessant volleys of musketry and artillery opened upon it from a wood in front, where the enemy was posted. Advancing at once to the attack, the regiment opened fire, and, though little accustomed to the terrible ordeal to which it was subjected, succeeded, by hard fighting, in driving the enemy from the first line of works, inflicting a severe loss upon him. Breast-works were immediately thrown up, and the regiment continued heavily engaged until October 2d, when it moved up near the enemy's works. Here for five hours it held its ground under a severe fire. It was then withdrawn a short distance, and again threw up works, and on the following day went into camp half a mile to the rear. On the 27th it moved with the corps for a demonstration upon the South Side Railroad. With four days' rations and forty rounds of ammunition to the man, it moved at daylight, and after five hours' toilsome marching, through dense timber, arrived in front of the enemy's formidable works, where it was exposed to a severe artillery fire. At sunset a strong picket line was thrown out and engaged nearly the entire night. Until noon of the following day the pickets were kept busy; then the entire regiment was withdrawn two miles to the rear. Here comfortable quarters were erected. On December 6th it marched with the corps for the destruction of the Weldon Railroad. Until the evening of the 9th the work of destruction was vigorously pushed, the ties being burned and the rails twisted for a considerable distance beyond Bellefield. Upon the return march there was much suffering, the weather having been intensely cold. Winter-quarters were again erected.

On February 5, 1865, the Fifth Corps, in light marching order, moved for an assault upon the enemy's works, and came upon them near Hatcher's Run. At three in the afternoon the advance of the column encountered, and after a desperate struggle, carried a portion of his fortifications. Soon afterwards the First Division, commanded by General Griffin, was sent for a diversion towards Dinwiddie Court-House. This feint was a complete success. A large force of the enemy followed it, thus weakening the lines in front of the main body of the corps, which assaulted when this force was well away, and carried his works. Upon the return of the division, it was placed in the captured works, and a heavy skirmish line was thrown out. At three on the afternoon of the 6th it was attacked by a heavy force of the enemy and driven in, a general engagement ensuing. General Sickel, seeing that the Second Brigade was hard pressed, led his command to its support. The One Hundred and Ninety-eighth moved at double quick, through mud and water, and wheeling sharply to the right into an open field, charged with shouts upon Mahone's rebel forces. Sickel, with sword in hand, led the charge, and with desperate valor his men fell upon the foe. After a sanguinary struggle, in which General Sickel received from a rifle-shot a painful flesh wound in the left thigh, the brigade succeeded in driving him from the field and re-establishing its lines. Determined to regain his lost ground, the enemy attacked in the darkness with overpowering force. For a time he gained possession of a part of the Union works. At the first signal of alarm the One Hundred and Ninety-eighth rushed to arms, and delivering a volley, sprang upon the foe with the bayonet. The struggle for a time was hand-to-hand, muskets being clubbed, and bayonets freely used. He was finally beaten back, and amidst the fiery flashes of the musketry and of bursting shells, the works were regained and made secure. Strong lines of works were erected in the rear, on the opposite side of Hatcher's Run, for the more ample protection of the position, and on the 14th, when the defenses were completed, the regiment moved half a mile to the rear, and for the third time built winter-quarters and a chapel.

On the 25th of March, the enemy having pierced the Ninth Corps' lines at Fort Steadman, the regiment was early put in motion, and during nearly the entire day was kept upon the march for the support of portions of the line where active operations were in progress. Late on the evening of the 28th it was ordered to strike tents and rest upon its arms in readiness for an early march, the whole army awaiting the signal to deliver a decisive blow. At three o'clock on the morning of the 29th the One Hundred and Ninety-eighth marched at double quick, leading the corps in a southerly direction, and crossing Rouanty Creek below the junction of Gravelly and Hatcher's Runs, pursued the road to Dinwiddie Court-House as far as the Quaker road, into which it turned, and again crossing Gravelly Run, encountered the enemy near the Old Saw-Mill, where he was strongly posted behind earth-works. A cleared field stretched out in front of his fortifications, which were flanked on either side by heavy timber, in which his sharpshooters were posted. Across this space of a thousand yards the regiment, in conjunction with the One Hundred and Eighty-fifth New York, and led by Sickel, dashed with determined bravery, and though receiving murderous volleys from front and flanks, reserved its fire until near the works, when, pouring in a well-directed shot, it rushed upon the foe with the bayonet. The struggle for a few moments was at close quarters and desperate; but the firm bearing of the men of this brigade was triumphant. On reaching the Boydton Plank-Road, unable to withstand the steady pressure brought to bear upon him, he broke and fled in confusion. In this action, known as the battle of Lewis’ Farm, the regiment sustained grievous losses. Jeremiah C. Keller was among the wounded. The entire loss was three hundred and eleven, of whom twenty-eight were killed and one hundred and seventeen wounded.

The regiment bivouacked upon the field, where it remained for thirty-six hours, exposed during a part of the time to a driving storm. On the morning of the 31st it again moved off, leading the column, and came upon the enemy at White Oak Swamp. Quickly forming, it was led to the attack, and after a spirited action drove him from the field. The loss was six killed and forty-six wounded. Captain Isaac Schroeder was mortally wounded. Soon after the conclusion of the battle the regiment moved forward towards Five Forks, and bivouacked for the night. On the following day it greeted with hearty cheers Sheridan’s cavalry, and when he had passed, joined in the movement, plunging into a dense thicket of pine which lay before it.

Scarcely an hour had elapsed, when the stillness of the forest was broken by the sharp fire of the skirmishers, followed by heavy volleys. Hastening forward, the regiment soon reached the scene of conflict, encountering the enemy’s skirmishers, and driving them in upon his heavy defensive works. As the Union line emerged from the timber, an assault was ordered and gallantly made, but failed to dislodge the enemy. As the troops were falling back, General Chamberlain, who was in command of the division, dashed up to Major Glenn, quietly awaiting orders, and exclaimed, “Major! can you take those works, and hold them?” Turning to his men, the major asked, “Boys, will you follow me?” With a wild cheer they answered, and pressing with their standard close upon the footsteps of their brave leader, dashed forward in the face of a terrific fire of musketry. Thrioe was the standard beaten down, but it was caught up and borne bravely forward, until finally, blood-stained and torn, it floated in triumph over the works. The enemy was driven and his ground held. Filled with a soldier’s pride, General Chamberlain, who had witnessed this gallant and triumphant charge, rode forward to congratulate the leader, and order his promotion on the field. But, alas! at the moment when the triumph was assured, and Major Glenn had seized one of the enemy’s colors from the hands of a rebel standard-bearer, he was pierced by a bullet, which inflicted a mortal wound. The evidences of rout and confusion were visible on every hand, and prisoners, guns and battle-flags fell into the hands of the conquerors. The loss in the One Hundred and Ninety-eighth was one killed and fifteen wounded. That night the regiment slept upon the field and at eleven on the following morning moved on one of the most tiresome marches of its entire service, extending far into the night, being resumed at the light of the following day. On the 8th the joyful tidings was received that Richmond had fallen, and that Lee was retreating with his whole army. Late on the evening of the 8th, overcome with exhaustion, the troops threw themselves upon the ground and slept soundly. On the morrow they were early on the march, and passing through a narrow curtain of wood, suddenly came upon a grand spectacle. There, on the wide fields stretching far away, and surrounded by heavy timber, completely hemmed in by the Union forces, was Lee’s entire army. The skirmishers advanced, and the enemy withdrew to his main line; but soon a white flag was displayed, and the news of the surrender quickly spread from rank to rank through the Union army. On the 11th the enemy stacked arms and furled flags, and on the 15th the regiment commenced the homeward march.

At Arlington Heights it went into camp and was there mustered out of service, on June 3, 1865.

CAPTAIN ISAAC SCHROEDER.—When the call for troops was made in 1861, Captain Isaac Schroeder responded promptly. He raised a company of men at Friedensburg, which was known as the "Washington Grays," and mustered into the three months' service as Company C, in the Seventh Regiment Pennsylva,nia Volunteers, under General Patterson. He also served as a private during the rebel invasion of 1863; and in September, 1864, he raised a company for one year. It was mustered into service as Company D, of the One Hundred and Ninety-eighth Pennsylvania Volunteers. He participated in engagements at Hatcher's Run and before Petersburg, and whilst in battle on the Weldon Railroad, on March 31, 1864, he was wounded in the abdomen, from the effects of which he died on April 2d following, in City Point Hospital, aged forty-five years. He had been, previous to the war, prominently identified with the militia affairs of the county for many years, having commanded for a time a battalion composed of companies in Oley and Exeter townships. His remains were buried in the Friedensburg Cemetery, in this county.

COMPANY G.—Unless otherwise stated, the men of this company were mustered out June 4, 1865.

ONE HUNDRED AND NINETY-SECOND REGIMENT.

In July, 1864, a regiment was recruited in Philadelphia, for a service of one hundred days, and mustered in as the One Hundred and Ninety-second. It was mustered out of service in November following. One of the companies re-enlisted for one year, and in February, 1865, nine new companies united with it, which, together, were mustered in as a second regiment of the same number (One Hundred and Ninety-second). One of the nine companies was Company F, recruited at Reading. The regiment was organized at Harper's Ferry, and when the spring campaign opened, it moved up the valley to Staunton and Lexington. But few of the enemy were met, for the fighting there was substantially at an end. It was retained in the department and engaged in various duties till August 24th, when it was mustered out of service.

Company F.—This company was recruited at Reading and, unless otherwise stated, the men were mustered out of service August 24, 1865.

MISCELLANEOUS ENLISTMENTS FROM BERKS COUNTY.

Numerous men from Berks County were enlisted in the Civil War, for which the county received no credit. The following statement contains the names of those that I could ascertain. It is not complete.

PORT CLINTON ARTILLERY.

The following volunteers from Berks County were enlisted and mustered in with the company of "Port Clinton Artillery," commanded by Captain D. B. Kaufman, in May, 1861, accredited to Schuylkill County:

Joseph Maurer,* Joseph Bridgeman,* Henry Hyne-

Note.—Those marked with a star were from Reading.
The greater part of the others were from Leesport.

BERNVILLE BAND.

This band was mustered into service at Bladensburg, Md., on the 16th of September, 1861, as a regimental band, with Twenty-sixth Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers (three years' service), and attached to Hooker's First Brigade. It remained at Bladensburg about two months in camp; then it moved to Budd's Ferry, in Lower Potomac, on Maryland Shore, and continued there all winter in camp. During the latter part of April it joined McClellan's army at Fortress Monroe, and was engaged in Peninsula campaign, commencing at Yorktown and ending at Harrison's Landing. It was mustered out of service at Harrison's Landing, on August 8, 1862, by reason of an act of Congress passed to dispense with regimental bands. The men returned to Philadelphia, where they were paid off and sent home.

TWENTIETH CAVALRY.

The following veterans were enlisted for three years in Company H of the Twentieth Cavalry, One Hundred and Eighty-first Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers. They had been enlisted in the nine months' service, and upon the expiration of their term of service re-enlisted, and were assigned to the company named. This was in January, 1864. The company had been enlisted in the six months' service, and also re-enlisted upon the expiration of its term.
They were in the Shenandoah Valley campaign, under Generals Sigel, Hunter and Sheridan, and participated in numerous battles, including New Market, Piedmont, Quaker's Church, Liberty, Salem, Snicker's Gap and Gordonville, and they were also in various battles during the concluding campaign before Petersburg—the regiment occupying the extreme left. It was mustered out of service in July 13, 1865. (See 5 Bates' "Penna. Vols.," 65-66.)

Francis C. Rhode, sergeant.
Edward C. Eben, first corporal.
Thomas G. Hill, commissary-sergeant.

COMPANY B, FIFTY-THIRD REGIMENT.

The following men from Birdsboro' were enlisted in Company B, Fifty-third Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers:

Lewis R. Bland, second lieutenant.
William W. Millard, sergeant.
Musician, Caleb H. Bland.

And the following men from Boyertown were in Company A of this regiment:

CAPTAIN J. BOWMAN BELL was the son of Hon. Samuel Bell, and born at Reading January 20, 1825, where he was educated. After remaining at home till about 1860, he removed to Philadelphia. When the Rebellion broke out he was commissioned a captain in the Fifteenth Regiment of Regular Infantry, and spent the summer of 1861 at Erie and Philadelphia as a recruiting and mustering officer. In October following he was transferred to the Western army, under General Buell, and participated in the battle of Pittsburgh Landing. Whilst gallantly leading his company against the enemy's works, in the battle of Murfreesboro', on Dec. 31, 1862, he was struck in the head by a musket-bullet and instantly killed. His remains were brought to Reading and interred in Charles Evans' Cemetery.

Society of Ex-Prisoners of War.—Certain enlisted men from Berks County, who were prisoners in Confederate military prisons during the Civil War, formed an association for mutual protection and social intercourse, at Reading, and became an incorporated body on July 10, 1884. They have had an active organization since. The following roll of members includes most of the men in service from Berks County who were prisoners of war. The members, including the officers of the society, are—

GRAND ARMY POSTS.

The McLean Post, No. 16, Grand Army of the Republic, was organized at Reading, and chartered December 12, 1866, having been named after Lieutenant-Colonel Joseph A. McLean, of the Eighty-eighth Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry. It has been maintained since, with a gradually increasing membership. In 1885 the roll included three hundred and fort -two members. Forty members have died since its organization.

Officers for 1886.—Commander, William T. Gorrell; Senior Vice-Commander, Henry J. Richards; Junior Vice-Commander, Owen Hamilton; Adjutant, William H. German; Quartermaster, H. M. M. Richards; Surgeon, Dr. Charles T. Reber; Chaplain, Edward C. Eben; Officer of the Day, William Still; Officer of the Guard, Augustus Lessig; Quartermaster-Sergeant, Henry Beckhardt; Ordnance-Sergeant, Calvin B. Reed; Sergeant-Major, Mahlon Shaaber; Trustees, Jonathan S. Ebling, John Scheffley, Oliver L. Edes; Auditing Committee, J. General William H. Keim Post, No. 76, G. A. R., was chartered February 22, 1878, with twenty-nine members. It was named after General Keim of Reading. In January, 1886, its membership was one hundred. Died since organization, five.

Officers for 1886.—Commander, Dr. S. C. Ermentrout; Senior Vice-Commander, Abram Briel; Junior Vice-Commander, Isaac W. Bowers; Quartermaster, H. J. Fink; Surgeon, Dr. H. M. Nagle; Chaplain, William Strawbridge; Officer of the Day, H. D. Boone; Officer of the Guard, R. H. Savage; Adjutant, George W. Heilig; Trustees, R. H. Savage, P. M. Zeigler and Abram Briel.

General George G. Meade Camp, No. 16, Sons of Veterans, was instituted October 30, 1881, and chartered November 11, 1881, with twenty-seven charter members. It is a branch of the Sons of Veterans, an organization which has its headquarters at Philadelphia. It is under the command of Colonel H. H. Hammer. The object of this association is to keep active the memory of the sacrifices of their fathers in the battles of the Civil War.

The roll of the camp numbers two hundred and seventy-seven members. This is a large increase since its organization. The present officers of the camp are,—

Captain, C. E. Deifenderfer; First Lieutenant, L. S. Ramsey; Second Lieutenant, Samuel Bechtel; Chaplain, G. W. Augee; Orderly-Sergeant, E. G. Cake; Quartermaster, Robert McLean; Sergeant of Guard, J. McK. Durell; Color-Sergeant, N. Rothenberger; Corporal, E. L. Riffert; Picket-Sentinel, J. G. Watt; and Camp-Guard, U. Reading Loyal Ladies’ League, No. 6.—This organization is an auxiliary of the “Grand Army of the Republic.” It is founded on and governed by the same principles of “fraternity, charity and loyalty,” and has gained the kindly sympathy and affection of every soldier through the country. Only mothers, wives, daughters and sisters of honorably discharged soldiers or sailors of the Civil War are admitted into membership.

This league was instituted April 17, 1884, by Mrs. Laura McNeir, department president and Mrs. Annie E. Grubb, department secretary of William B. Hatch League, No. 2, of Camden, N. J. There were twenty-one charter members. It has now fifty active members.

Officers.—President, Anna M. Waid; Senior Vice-President, Lizzie Hammer; Junior Vice-President, Rebecca Reber; Secretary, Mary A. Shaaber; Treasurer, Ellen Golding; Chaplain, Lucretia Root; Conductor, Clara Hecker; Guard, Mary Lott.

McLean Women’s Relief Corps, No. 10, was chartered October 1, 1884, with one hundred and thirty-one members, as an auxiliary to McLean Post, No. 16, G. A. R. The object of the organization is to establish a permanent association for aiding and assisting Post No. 16.

Charter Officers.—President, Emma Moore; Senior Vice-President, Sarah Millet; Junior Vice-President, Susan Dougherty; Secretary, Emma G. Wineland; Treasurer, Emma Richards; Conductor, Lizzie Lissig; Chaplain, Adeline Fry; Guard, Malinda Sands.

Since being chartered this relief corps has held several fairs, bazaars and camp-fires for the benefit of McLean Post, rendering thereby valuable pecuniary assistance to the post. Since its organization it has turned over to McLean Post over four hundred dollars to be added to the Post Memorial Fund.

Membership in January, 1886, was one hundred and sixty.

Legislative Provision—County Battalions of 1783—County Militia pretty Services to President Adams in 1788—County Military Division—Encampment at Reading in 1842—Battalion Day of 1843—County Militia Companies in 1856—State National Guard—Reading Artillerists—Military Cadets.

The Revolution closed successfully, but the military spirit of the people continued to prevail. It was encouraged by the State government. Legislation required it to be exercised for the purpose of maintaining familiarity with its affairs. This was not only sensible, but also prudent. Companies, regiments and brigades were organized and drilled at certain fixed times and places within the county. The meeting was commonly called "Battalion Day." It preserved a strong general interest in public affairs, especially in public defense. "This interest enabled the several organizations to respond promptly to calls for their services. Their promptness was a distinguishing characteristic. And it has ever been so. Fortunately for them and especially for the country, their services were not needed frequently. Not to mention the "Whiskey Insurrection" and "Northampton Affair" as of any military consequence, there were but two occasions for a period covering over sixty years in which their services were required, one having been the English War of 1812-15, and the other the "Mexican War" of 1846-48, each, by a strange coincidence, successively apart about thirty years. These military exercises were continued till the beginning of the Rebellion, when they were put to practical account; but this outbreak of the southern section of the country against the northern was of such a serious, long-continued and costly nature, in respect to loss of property and life, that the spirit for a return to military exercise had come to be entirely exhausted. But, as an institution during the history of the county previous to 1860, it is worthy of special mention. It was a conspicuous feature from 1783 till that time—a period covering nearly eighty years. It certainly relieved the monotony of political, commercial and social life, and afforded the citizens much merriment, if not much practical benefit.

Legislative Provision.—The Convention of 1776, in framing the first Constitution of the State, made provision for the establishment of a military system. The Constitution provided as follows: "The freemen of this commonwealth and their sons shall be trained and armed for its defense under such regulations, restrictions and exceptions as the General Assembly shall by law direct, preserving always to the people the right of choosing their colonels and all commissioned officers under that rank." The Revolution was then raging; and a State system was not necessary, owing to the general system provided by the government of the United States. Without any training in the "military art," the freemen were at once thrown into actual practice, in which they met an enemy face to face. Their encounters were not "sham battles," and they afforded no "fun and frolic." In this practice many paid the price of life for liberty. After the close of the Revolution, the State adopted a system in order to keep the freemen trained, the Constitution of 1790 having made the following provision: "The freemen of this commonwealth shall be armed and disciplined for its defense. Those who conscientiously scruple to bear arms shall not be compelled to do so, but shall pay an equivalent for personal service."

This system was modified by repeated legislation, and its provisions were carried out year after year till the Rebellion, which, owing to its serious character, suspended their operation during its continuance. By it, the State was divided into sixteen military divisions. Each division comprised two brigades, and each brigade as many regiments as could be arranged within the bounds of the division.

County Battalions.—Immediately after the conclusion of the Revolution, the system of militia throughout the State was thoroughly organized. It was active and successful in Berks County. It embraced six battalions, the officers and location of which were as set forth in the following statement. The regimental officers were appointed on April 19, 1783, excepting Jacob Bower, major of First Battalion, who was appointed on January 3, 1784, and also the officers of the Fourth Battalion, who were uncommissioned in September, 1784:

COUNTY MILITIA PROFFER SERVICES TO PRESIDENT ADAMS.—The militia of the county were always ready to offer its services to the national government for the purposes of maintaining its dignity and enforcing its authority. In 1798 a misunderstanding arose between our government and the French government. The representatives of the latter, whilst at Philadelphia, were arrogant and insulting in their deportment, and a blow was given to our commerce on the sea by seizing and detaining many of our vessels (said to have been nearly a thousand) for examination to ascertain whether or not we, as a neutral government, were carrying any English commodities. Such vessels were regarded as good prize, and all French ports were ordered to be closed against all neutral vessels which had touched ports under the English flag. President Adams appointed three envoys to visit France and adjust the difficulties; but, instead of being properly received, they were unofficially met by three agents, who assured them that they would not be received until they had offered suitable bribes to the officers of the government. They rejected the humiliating proposal, and were ordered to leave the country. Upon their return they presented their report, which was published in this country and republished in England and France. This treatment of our envoys aroused the country to indignation, and Congress ordered an enlargement of the standing army by twelve regiments. Some conflicts arose on the sea, but Napoleon, upon taking control of the French government, soon established a cordial understanding between the two countries, American vessels were no longer molested, and two years afterwards Louisiana was ceded to the United States. During this excitement the officers of the Berks County Brigade met at the courthouse in Reading on June 30, 1798, and addressed a patriotic letter to President Adams, offering their services to assist in resenting the insult of the French to our government. The President gave them the following reply:

"To the General of the Division composed of the Berks and Dauphin County Brigades of Pennsylvania Militia, and the officers of the Berks County Brigade.

"Gentlemen:"

"This vigorous address from a long list of respectable Officers is the natural Consequence of your abhorrence of French Principles and indignation at the infamous Conduct of the French Republic towards this Country.

"I thank you for your assurance that you will be incessant in your endeavors to put the Berks County Brigade of the Militia of Pennsylvania in such a Situation as will enable it to turn out with Promptitude and Effect, and for your engagement that you will march with alacrity against either Foreign or Domestick enemies whenever called upon, and defend your Constitution and Independence or perish in the Attempt; The Solemnity with which you promise this will admit no doubt of your Sincerity—your Enemies will do well to consider it.

"I return with Gratitude your Sincere wishes for my temporal and eternal Welfare.

"Philadelphia, July 13th, 1798."

COUNTY MILITARY DIVISION.—In 1807 Berks
and Dauphin Counties comprised the Sixth Division. In 1814 two new counties, Schuylkill and Lebanon, were added to this division, Dauphin and Lebanon forming the First Brigade, and Berks and Schuylkill the Second; and in 1849, Dauphin, Lebanon and Berks comprised the Fifth Division. The last act before the Rebellion was passed in 1858, by which Berks was still a part of the same division.

Every free, able-bodied, white male citizen who was a resident in the State for six months previous to the time of his enrollment, of the age of eighteen years and under the age of forty-five years, was required to be enrolled in the militia—certain official and other persons excepted.

The militiamen were paraded and trained in May of every year, first in companies, on the first Monday, and then in battalions, on the second Monday. These services and parades were very useful. But beyond their utility, they provided great amusement for the people. Many persons set apart this day as a “holiday,” if they did not set apart any other in the entire year. This day was held at the several boroughs, even at certain prominent towns in the county, but especially at Reading.

ENCAMPMENT AT READING.—A large and successful encampment of militia was held at Reading during May, 1842. It was arranged along the base of Penn’s Mount, and continued from May 18th for one week.

The following officers and troops attended:

Officers.—Commander-in-Chief, Major-General John Davis, Bucks County; Aid, Colonel David Marple; Commander Berks County Brigade, Brigadier-General Wm. High, Berks County; Brigade-Major, Colonel J. K. Murphy, Philadelphia; Brigade-Adjutant, Colonel C. F. Jackson, Reading; Brigade-Quartermaster, Lieutenant Joel Ritter, Reading; Assistants, Colonel W. M. Haddy, Phila.; Lieutenant W. F. Small Phila.; Brigade-Surgeon, Dr. John G. Marshall, Reading; Assistant, Dr. Eichholz; Commander Reading Battalion, Major W. H. Keim; Commander Hamburg Battalion, Major J. A. Beitenman; visitor, General Gratz, of Lancaster.

Troops.—Reading Troop, Captain J. W. Burkhart, 30 men; National Troop, Oley, Captain Henry Shaffer, 45 men; Schuylkill County Cavalry, Pottsville, Captain George C. Wyncoop, 28 men; Hamburg Troop, Captain Wm. Miller, 30 men; Reading Artillerists, Captain Thomas Leeser, 52 men; Hamburg Artillerists, Captain Reeser, 52 men; Washington Leg... survivors with a twenty-dollar gold-piece. This generous act made a deep impression upon the community.

Battalion Day of 1843.—"The Battalion Day" of May, 1843, received the following expressive notice: 1

"This glorious assemblage of heroes made their annual appearance yesterday at Reading. There was lots of fun, beauty and broomsticks, run, flying-horses, fights with the guards, fancy military movements, finesses, dances, dice and pitching of pennies, and all the elegant amusements peculiar to the bill and day. The officers appeared to particular advantage and gave the words of command with remarkable emphasis and cadence. The movements of the troops, were, we are compelled to say, not quite so elaborate as we had anticipated from the known abilities of the commanders."

County Militia Companies in 1856.—In 1856 there were twenty-four companies of militia in Berks County. These were arranged in six battalions, and comprised the First Brigade of the Fifth Division of Pennsylvania Volunteers. The officers, companies and force were as follows:

Fifth Division Pennsylvania Volunteers.

Major-General, William H. Keim, Reading; Aide-de-Camp, Major S. L. Young, Reading; Aide-de-Camp, Major A. Jordan Schwartz, Reading; Division Surgeon, Major John H. Seltzer, Reading; Division Engineer, Major William A. Sands, Reading.

The division comprised three brigades—1, Berks County; 2, Lebanon County; 3, Dauphin County.

Officers of First Brigade.—Brigadier-General, Chas. H. Hunter; Brigade Inspector, Major Richards McMichael; Brigade Major, Charles B. McKnight; Aide-de-Camp, Henry R. Hawman; Quartermaster, William A. Sands.

MILITIA.

Obtaining the name of a military organization which had first been organized at Reading in 1794, and continued in active existence till the Civil War, in which it was enlisted in the three months' service in 1861, as Company G, First Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers; most of the men re-enlisted in different companies and served till the close of the year.

This company was reorganized and mustered in on May 2, 1881, as Company G, Fourth Regiment of National Guard of Pennsylvania, with Robert H. Savage, as captain, Wm. H. Souders as first lieutenant, and Abel H. Beyer as second lieutenant; and it numbered fifty-six men. Its organization is still maintained, numbering fifty-five men, with Henry J. Christoph as captain, Elmer A. German, first lieutenant, and William O. Scull, second lieutenant.

Captain Daniel de B. Keim, the oldest son of John Keim, a prominent merchant at Reading, was born on September 8, 1772, and educated in the place named. He became interested in military affairs at an early age. When twenty-two years old he raised a company of infantry, called the "Reading Union Volunteers," and as captain marched with them under General Henry Lee to assist in quelling the "Whiskey Insurrection" that had arisen in the western part of Pennsylvania. This company was detailed at Carlisle as the bodyguard of President Washington, and continued to perform that duty as long as the President remained with the army. In 1814 he commanded a company of volunteers, called the "Reading Washington Guards," which was stationed for a time near Baltimore during the English War in this country. He organized the "Reading Artillerists" in 1794, and succeeded in obtaining for their use from the national government a battery of five field-pieces which had been captured at Yorktown. The name of this company has been transmitted by various military organizations till the present time. It participated, under the command of Captain Keim, in the grand reception given to General Lafayette at Philadelphia in 1824.

Captain Keim manifested an earnest interest in the military organization of his county and actively participated in its activities. He was a member of the National Guard, and served as a volunteer in the Whiskey Insurrection. Later, he organized the "Reading Artillerists" and continued to support military organizations throughout his life.
in our local history. In 1833 he contributed a valuable article to the “Ladies’ Garland,” relating to the early settlement of Reading, and including other matters of historical interest. It was the first description of our immediate locality which was published in a printed form. He died in 1833.

General George de Benneville Keim, second son of John Keim, a successful merchant at Reading, and Susan de Benneville (the daughter of Dr. George de Benneville), his wife, was born at Reading, December 16, 1778, and educated in the old “Friends’ Meeting-house.” He was then sent by his father to Philadelphia, where he remained for some years in the large and well-known hardware store of the Messrs Chancellors, to acquire a knowledge of that business. In his twentieth year, upon his return to Reading, he was taken into partnership by his father, who was conducting the same business which had been established in the property generally known as the “old white store.” This building was the first business place at Reading, and was conducted by Conrad Weiser for some years, and came to be owned by Nicholas Keim (the grandfather of the subject of this sketch) in 1769. Here Mr. Keim carried on business for many years. He also engaged in the manufacture of iron, having interests in the Reading Furnace and various forges. When the difficulties occurred in 1794 known as the “Whiskey Insurrection,” he volunteered and served in the forces which were collected to sustain the government. From 1809 to 1814 he carried on business in Philadelphia, in connection with the export of bread-stuffs. He was largely engaged in the development of our county and county-seat. He was one of the first to give attention to the cultivation of the grape and the manufacture of wine; and he contributed his means and efforts to improve the character of the live-stock of the county. At that period Mr. Keim was largely interested in the cultivation of the soil, and was owner of a number of farms in Exeter township and that locality. He took an active interest in the erection of bridges, as demanded by the requirements of the county, and promoted by his efforts the Perkiomen turnpike and that of the Reading and Sunbury, which were the earliest public improvements in this section, in both of which companies Mr. Keim was a manager for many years. Mr. Keim was greatly interested in promoting the cause of education and took an earnest interest in the establishment of the “Reading Academy” and the “Reading Female Seminary,” each of which institutions was of great service in educating the young people of the community.

Military affairs received his attention from an early period, and in 1821 the appointment of aid on the staff of Governor Heister, with the rank of colonel, was conferred upon him. In 1830 he was elected major-general of the Sixth Division of Pennsylvania Militia, succeeding his brother-in-law, the Hon. Samuel J. Franks, and upon his retirement, after holding this position for five years, he was succeeded by his son, George M. Keim, who, in turn, was succeeded by General William H. Keim, cousin of the latter.

Mr. Keim also, among other positions, filled that of president of the Branch Bank of Pennsylvania for upwards of thirty years; was the chief burgess of Reading and president of the Town Council for many years; and was one of the promoters of the Reading Water Company and its first president, occupying the latter position for a long period of time.

In all benevolent institutions and objects Mr. Keim took a prominent part. He was actively engaged in the building of Christ Church, the lot upon which the same was erected having been donated by a member of the Price family for that purpose, who was a relation of his wife. On February 4, 1799, Mr. Keim was married to Miss Mary May, one of the daughters of James May, a well-known citizen of Reading, and who, in the act of 1783, incorporating Reading into a borough, was named, together with Mr. Keim’s father, John Keim, as one of the assistant burgesses.

James May was born March 2, 1749, of Quaker origin, his grandfather, Robert May, having come to the province before the year 1700, and intermarried with a daughter of John Brooke, who, coming from England, located at a very early day in the neighborhood of Limerick, where he had a large body of land. Mr. May married Bridget Douglass, a daughter of George Douglass, who was the son of Andrew Douglass from Scotland, and settled at the place now called Douglassville, where his mansion still remains and is in the ownership of one of his descendants in the female line. George Douglass was an Episcopalian and actively interested in the Molatton Church, being one of the vestry for a period long prior to the Revolutionary struggle, and his daughter, who married James May, having been reared in the faith of that church, led Mr. Keim to take a warm interest in the erection of Christ Church. Mr. James May, who had a birthright in the Society of Friends, lost the same by his marriage outside of his sect to Miss Douglass, who, as heretofore said, was an Episcopalian.

Three brothers, Archibald, James and Andrew Douglass, settled in 1718 in the “back parts” of the province, the portion of Chester County which subsequently was cut off to form the county of Lancaster, near the fertile valley of Pequea. They left Scotland, having been engaged in the rebellion of 1715 in favor of the Pretender, and for that cause were obliged to retire. They were of good family, and George Douglass, the son of Andrew and the grandfather of Miss Mary May, wife of Mr. Keim, removed from Pequea to what is now Douglassville when a very young man, having lost by death both of his parents. Shortly after the arrival of the Douglasses they donated the land upon which the Episcopal Church at Pequea, “St. John’s,” one of the early churches, was erected—their plantations adjoining the same.

General Keim had seven children: three sons—John M., George M. and Daniel M.—and four daughters,—Ann, Susan, Catharine and Rebecca, the latter of whom alone is living, being the widow of the eminent civil engineer Mr. Wirt Robinson, of Richmond, Va. Mr. Keim died August 20, 1852.

Military Cadets.—The following persons were admitted to the United States Military Academy at West Point, N. Y., from Berks County, Pa., the list having been supplied for this history by L. C. Drum, adjutant general, Washington, D. C.:

CHAPTER XIV.

RELIGIOUS DENOMINATIONS.

The territory which is included in the county of Berks was a conspicuous portion of the province of Pennsylvania to emigrants who were encouraged to leave their homes and settle in a country where they could enjoy and develop religious freedom. This sentiment being the prominent consideration which moved them in their travels and enterprise towards the selection of a new country, it is natural to find it in continued prominence after they had fixed their habitations. The several nationalities showed the same zeal in this respect. The first settlers, the Swedes, would seem to have been slow in establishing a church for themselves convenient to their settlements, for they came here permanently in 1701, but did not erect a church till about 1720. In this time, however, they were connected with the church at Wicaco (now in Philadelphia, at a place near the Navy Yard), whither they went occasionally to carry on religious worship.

The Huguenots were not any more energetic in Oley, for the first of them arrived from 1712 to 1720, but they did not cause a church to be erected in their midst till 1735, and these, it is said, proceeded to the Trappe for attending church services till they came to possess a church of their own. The Friends, however, were more energetic—a decade not having elapsed before they established a meeting-house for themselves. This was the situation to the east of the Schuylkill. To the west of the Schuylkill, the German settlers—Huguenots as they are generally called—erected a church within several years after their permanent settlement on and in the vicinity of the Tulpehocken Creek.

A number of churches were erected in different sections of the county before 1752, not only in the southern or more populous parts, but in the northern near the Blue Mountain. This public or general action on the part of the settlers displays their affection for their religion. Their religious feelings were convictions which they obtained through experience abroad or through inheritance and education here, and these were enduring.

LUTHERANS.1—The Lutheran religion was predominant in the county, both with the Swedes and Germans to the east of the Schuylkill and with the Germans to the west. Some of the Germans were adherents of the Reformed religion. The churches built by these denominations were mostly "union" churches. In nearly every instance the members of the two denominations united in bearing the cost jointly—they having appointed separate committees to co-operate in conducting the building operations. And the church services alternated every two Sundays.

This harmony between these denominations in such a peculiar and jealous matter as religion displayed the singular excellence and liberality of the Germans. These people were alike in general affairs, in dress, in speech, in labor, in manners and customs; and a difference in their religious notions did not develop any antagonism between them. Indeed, the one denomination frequently visited the church services of the other denomination. Each was the equal of the other in every respect.

The religion of these settlers would seem to have been exactly adapted to them in their pioneer life as farmers and mechanics. It was not demonstrative or enthusiastic in the sense of winning them away from necessary and profitable labor; it was not disposed to lead them into extravagant habits. It was rather quiet and unpretentious, and inclined them to practice self-denial and economy. I may be thought to attribute too many fruits as results from the religions which prevailed to such a large extent; but when the subject is examined closely it will be found to lie at the bottom of the real general stability and progress of the early settlers.

The early German settlers were without a regular minister till the arrival of Rev. Henry Melchior Muhlenberg, in 1742.2

Rev. J. C. Stoever and Rev. John Peter Miller had preached at the Tulpehocken Church before 1735. But before 1750, Muhlenberg

1 Immediately after Penn had arrived in Pennsylvania a number of Germans emigrated to the province. Among these there were Lutherans. But the tide of their immigration began in earnest in 1710. Then about three thousand, chiefly Lutherans, settled in New York, having been encouraged to do so by Queen Anne, after leaving the Palatinate on account of religious intolerance there, and arriving in England. In 1713 one hundred and fifty families settled in Schoburie, in New York, some of which ten years afterward came to Tulpehocken, Pennsylvania. In 1727 a large number of them came into Pennsylvania from various parts of Germany, chiefly from the Palatinate, Wurttemberg and Darmstadt; and it is believed that many of these settled in this section of territory, along the Mantsawny and Tulpehocken Creeks. They caused a church to be erected at the former in Oley, about 1735; and at the latter about 1727.

2 Rev. Henry Melchior Muhlenberg is regarded as the father of the Lutheran Church in America. He was born at Emsbeck, in Hanover, Germany, September 6, 1711. He was thoroughly educated in the school of Franke, at Halle, and qualified to preach in different languages—German, Dutch, Swedish, English, French and Latin. He left his native country early in the year 1742, and arrived at Philadelphia in November following. The Lutheran Churches were then in a deplorable condition, and few in number. He was stationed at the Trappe, whence he visited different Lutherans as far north as the Blue Mountain. "He preached in season and out of season, in churches, barns and the open air, until at last that Divine Master, whom he so faithfully served, received him into the company of apostles and prophets at His right hand. He died at the Trappe, October 7, 1787, where his remains lie buried. During his ministerial journeys he made the acquaintance of..."
visited the Lutherans regularly who were scattered through the upper sections of Philadelphia and Lancaster Counties, now included in Berks County. The prominent settlements which enjoyed the benefits of his preaching were in the vicinity of the Swedes’ Church, Oley Church, Hill Church, Alsace Church, Longswamp Church, Richmond Church and Albany Church to the east of the Schuylkill, and of the Heidelberg Church (Hains') Northkill Church and Tulpehocken Church to the west of the Schuylkill.

Amongst the German immigrants there were some ministers and also school-teachers. The latter taught the children and read sermons; and, it is said, that some of them, after reading awhile, presumed themselves qualified and assumed to carry on the sacred office of ministers.

A history of the Lutheran Church as a body in Berks County will not be attempted in this chapter, for it is not the design of this work. A historical narrative of the several churches of this denomination is presented in the districts in which they are respectively situated, including the ministers who officiated.

In 1884 the pastors, congregations and membership of the Lutheran denomination in the county were as follows:

Reformed.—Persons attached to the Reformed faith were amongst the early settlers. They were known as “Calvinists” or “German Calvinists.” Their first churches were in Oley and in Heidelberg. In meeting-houses, however, they were mostly connected with the Lutherans. The early Reformed ministers in Pennsylvania, before 1740, were Goetsch, Weis, Rieger, Boehm and Dorstius. They were assisted by the church in Holland. In 1741 a number of German Bibles (one hundred and thirty) were sent here for their use. In 1746, Rev. Michael Schlatter, the great Reformed missionary from Switzerland, arrived. In September of that year he visited Oley and Tulpehocken. At the latter place, on the 25th, he “preached with much divine assistance and not without a blessing to a congregation of more than 600 persons who were assembled in a wooden building. The congregation listened to the publication of the word of God with much devout attention. The ardent desire for edification, and for a regular organization, and the hope of obtaining a stated preacher, might have been read in their countenances. They could not conceal the joy and surprise which they felt upon seeing three preachers together, a circumstance which they had not seen there before. The old and the young people shed tears of joy. I can only say that this was to me and to my brethren a day of much refreshment. I thought of the blessed Netherlands, where the company of heralds of the Gospel is numerous, whilst this extensive country is perishing for lack of teachers. This large church has never had a regular pastor. Mr. Boehm has administered the communion here annually twice—traveling eighty miles from Philadelphia for this purpose. After preaching, I, with his assistance, dispensed the holy communion to upward of a hundred members. I then informed them of my commission from the mother-country and made the same proposition to them which I had made to the churches in Philadelphia and Germantown. They obliged themseleves to support a preacher in the two churches situated five miles apart and consisting of about five hundred members, and they promised to raise in money and produce about £50, as will appear by the Call forwarded on the 13th of October to the Reverend Committees of the two Synods and to the classis of Amsterdam. I also chose Elders and Deacons, with the approbation of the church and ordained them.”

1 Schlatter, Boehm and Weis.
2 I think these two churches were the “Host” and the “Hain,” the preaching upon this occasion having been in the “Host.”
3 Schlatter’s Journal; and see Rupp’s “History of Berks County,” pp. 443 and 444.
In 1748 Rev. Bartholomew took charge of the congregation at Tulpehocken.

Historical sketches of the several Reformed Churches throughout the county appear in the districts in which they are situated.

In 1840 it was estimated that there were in the county about thirty-five Reformed Churches; and the ministers then were L. C. Herman, A. L. Herman, J. Sassaman Herman, Philip Moyer, David Hassinger, David Bossler, Chas. Schultz, Thomas H. Leinbach, Charles G. Herman, William Pauli, Angustus Pauli, John Conrad Bucher, Isaac Miesse, William Hendel.

In 1874, the congregations and total membership of the Reformed denomination in the county were as follows:

First Reformed at Reading, Rev. Henry Mosser.
Second Reformed at Reading, Rev. C. F. McCauley.
St. Paul's at Reading, Rev. Benjamin Bausman.
St. John's at Reading, Rev. John W. Steinmetz.
Schwartzwald charge, eight congregations.
Bermville charge, five congregations.
Tulpehocken charge, five congregations.
Sinking Spring charge, four congregations.
Allegheny charge, three congregations.
Shartlesville charge, three congregations.
Kutztown charge, four congregations.
Zion charge, six congregations.
Lenhartsville charge, four congregations.
Friedensburg charge, four congregations.
Hamburg and Leesport charge, three congregations.
Bermville charge, one congregation.
Congregations, 54; membership, 10,330; communicants, 5094.

FRIENDS.—The Friends were the third sect of people who settled in the county, the Swedes and Germans having anteceded them. The Swedes were the first to erect a meeting-house at Molatto about 1720; but the Friends were the next, having erected a meeting-house in 1726 near the Monocacy, along the western line of the Swedes’ settlement, then called Amity township. Within the next score of years they erected two more meeting-houses, one in Maiden-creek township and the other in Robeson township. They built a fourth at Reading, supposed in 1751, three years after the town had been laid out and just as the building improvements began to be active. They had four meeting-houses before 1752, when the county was erected. But they did not get beyond this number.

This may seem strange when we consider their intelligence, earnestness and enterprise; but it is not so strange when we consider the wonderful influx of Germans, who spoke, lived, thought and acted differently from them.

The encouragement of the Germans to emigrate and settle in Pennsylvania was certainly a wise policy on the part of Penn and his sons, on account of their industrious and economic habits, and their skill and energy as farmers and mechanics. It has shown itself to have been also vastly beneficial. But the encouragement of this nationality acted against the interests and developments and influence of their own class. It would seem that they were most active about the time when the county was erected and for a score of years afterward. They then exerted the most political influence through the proprietary government, which was in the hands of Friends. And their religious influence was large and wide in their several communities. But they remained where they first settled. They did not extend beyond Oley and Exeter, along the Manastawny and Monocacy Creeks, Maiden-creek and Richmond along the Ontelaune, and Robeson along the Hay and Allegheny Creeks. And yet their families were numerous and their population was considerable.

In this time it was estimated that they numbered about two thousand. Their principles were superior and their habits admirable. Simple, unostentatious, earnest and clever, with good education and large means, they possessed a foundation adapted for development and permanency. But what were these compared with a class which then numbered at least twenty thousand, which had a fair education and considerable means and which was possessed of similar habits and virtues. The conditions were not equal in respect to strength, though they were in respect to quality. It was therefore natural for the former not to maintain their hold upon the community which they had when the county was erected and continued to have till the Revolution. Hence their churches did not increase in number, their people did not extend into adjoining townships.

2 Now at Douglassville.
3 Rupp’s “History of Berks County,” p. 422.
Some of the most eminent ministers who preached to the Friends in the county before 1800 were the following: Samuel Hugh, Ellis Hugh, Job Hugh, Enos Ellis, Abel Thomas, Moses Embree, James Iddings, Amos Lee, Peter Thomas and Judah Thomas.

Baptists. — The major part of the early Baptists who settled in Pennsylvania were Welshmen. The principles which William Penn proclaimed as the basis of his intended colony were such as to attract all pious people who were persecuted on account of their religion. This was the case in Wales, where dissenters of all shades of opinion were to be found, but they were chiefly Baptists and Friends. Among the first settlers in the counties of Philadelphia, Bucks and Chester were large colonies of Welshmen, who purchased immense tracts of land, and when townships were formed they gave to many the names of the places from which they had emigrated. Among these may be named Radnor, Haverton, Merion, Gwynedd, Uwchlan, Tredyffrin, Caernarvon, Cumru and Brecknock, these last three being now included in Berks County, although they were formerly in Lancaster County.

The first Baptist Church in the colony was formed in the year 1688 at Pennypack, now called Lower Dublin, and it still has a vigorous existence. This was followed by the Great Valley, in Tredyffrin township, Centre County, in 1711, Brandywine in 1715 and Montgomery in 1717. The services were frequently and for many years conducted in the Welsh language. This was also the case among the Welsh Friends, and also members of the Church of England who had settled in Radnor and founded St. David’s Church, Bishop William S. Perry, in his work entitled “Papers Relating to the History of the Church of Pennsylvania,” says the Rev. Evan Evans wrote to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel that the Welsh at Radnor and Merioneth had addressed a letter to the Bishop of London for a minister who understands the British language, and that a hundred persons had signed the letter.

Until the year 1738 no other regular Baptist Church was organized west of the Great Valley Church in Pennsylvania, but in that year the following persons removed from the Valley and the Montgomery Church and settled near the banks of the Tulpehocken Creek, in what is now Berks County, and founded the Tulpehocken Baptist Church, viz.: Thomas and Martha Jones, David Evans and wife, James James and wife, Evan Lloyd and wife, George Rees and wife, John Davis and wife, Thomas Nicholas and wife, James Edwards and wife, Rees Thomas and wife, Henry Harry, David Lewis and Thomas Lloyd. This organization took place August 19, 1738, and in 1740 Thomas Jones was ordained the pastor. The church had two meeting-houses. The first was built in 1740 on a lot of three acres, the gift of Hugh Morris, Evan Lloyd and Evan Price, in the township of Cumru. The house was only twenty-six feet by sixteen. Another house of the same size, about three miles west from the first, was built the same year on a lot of one acre, the gift of Thomas Bartholomew and Hannaniah Pugh. Both were near Reading, and of course the preaching was in Welsh, and so it was not likely that the Germans who began to settle Berks would attend worship at the Baptist Churches. The records of the Philadelphia Baptist Association, called The Century Minutes, show that the church with Mr. Jones as pastor reported annually until 1774, when its name disappears. About that time Mr. Jones removed to Chester County, either to Tredyffrin or Willistown township, where his son Griffith lived, and the few Welsh Baptists of the Tulpehocken Church were as sheep without a shepherd, and, if they desired Baptist preaching, were compelled to go to the Great Valley Church, where Mr. Jones was called to officiate when the regular pastor

1 This was on Wyomissing, about three miles from its outlet. A burying-ground was appurtenant to it.
3 This was at a point on the “Old Tulpehocken Road,” very near the “Sinking Spring.” The building is still standing. It is built of brick, octagonal in shape. A grave-yard lies at the rear of the building with a number of graves marked by head-stones, now illegible.
was absent. The Lutheran and Church of England ministers had become by that time very active in Berks County. In 1763 Rev. Alexander Murray, the Episcopal minister at Reading, says that his people then numbered about forty-eight souls, of whom twelve were under seven years of age, and there were twenty unbaptized “Anabaptists” in town, who now and then made up a part of his congregation, and he had baptized four of them the previous Easter. In 1764 he says he had eighteen families, and of the new members some were Presbyterians, Baptists and Quakers, and of the latter two denominations he had christened thirteen on the last Christmas Day. In June, 1765, he writes that since January 24, 1764, he had baptized thirty-nine children and three adults, besides an attorney-at-law here with his children, who were bred among the Baptists and Quakers. He then adds that the Baptists were in 1764 supplied by their former preacher, who thought it advisable to return to them, when he saw them generally disposed to conform to the church, whose service he punctually observed at the times they invited him. As their preacher was an old man, it was probable, upon his death or removal, that all the younger people would readily unite with his church. No doubt Mr. Murray refers to Rev. Thomas Jones, but he was not then over sixty-four years of age.

Of Rev. Thomas Jones I have been able to gather some facts which may prove of interest to those who are fond of reading about the early settlers. He was born at Tre newyd y Notais (in English, Newton Notage), in the vale of Glamorganshire, Wales, about the year 1701, and married Martha Morris and began to preach when quite young. In 1737 he emigrated with his family to Pennsylvania and in the following year settled on or near the Tulpehocken Creek.

A letter from him, in Welsh, is dated Heidelberg, October 6, 1742. It is now in my collection and in it he says:

"Myself, wife and children are all well and comfortable. By the mercy of God we make a good living, if we could exclude homesickness. We have five sons and two daughters. I hope my dear mother is still alive. I finally consented to be ordained again in order to show my willingness to comply with the opinion of others. I am very thankful for the book you sent me, although the Welsh is not of much use here. Concerning the Cygordiad (the Concordance of the Scriptures by Rev. Abel Morgan), I intend to send some over as soon as I can. . . . I am under great obligation to you for your kindness, but I have nothing to send you unless I send wheat or black walnut boards. I have probably two hundred bushels of the first, and about two thousand feet of boards. The wheat is selling for three shillings a bushel, and is likely to be lower still."

After removing to Chester County he did not become pastor of any church, but during the Revolution, lived in the parsonage of the Great Valley and while there, the British army, after the battle of Brandywine, stole the communion service. Mr. Jones died March 22, 1788, in his eighty-seventh year, and was buried in the grave-yard of the Great Valley Church. His widow died June 9, 1799, at the age of ninety-three years. Mr. Jones by all accounts was a very pious and eminent Christian and bore through life a most amiable and exemplary character, dying, as he had lived, with a hope full of immortality. He left a number of children; among them, a son Samuel, who, in 1762 was graduated at the College of Philadelphia, and became pastor of the Baptist Church of Lower Dublin. He was a sound divine, a good preacher and a learned man. He was, with Rev. Morgan Edwards, one of the organizers of Rhode Island College, now called Brown University. In 1786 the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred upon him by Brown University, and in 1788 the University of Pennsylvania conferred the same honor.

Another son of Rev. Thomas Jones, bearing his name, remained in Berks County and left a number of descendants, now representing some of the most prominent families in the county.

The grave-yards attached to the meeting-houses of this Tulpehocken Baptist Church are still in existence, and some of the tomb-stones have Welsh inscriptions on them. The rest of the land was sold by authority of an act of Assembly passed March 28, 1799, and amended on January 30, 1801. The preamble states, that by deaths and removals, the membership of the church had been reduced to a single person, viz., Thomas Jones, a son of the first pastor. The minutes of the trustees of the Philadelphia Association for October 8, 1801, show that the lots were sold, and that the money received, clear of all expenses, amounted to two hundred dollars, which was paid to the treasurer of the Association.

From this time onward, till now, no church organization of this denomination has been in existence in the county, outside of Reading. A congregation was formed in Reading in 1828. Its history appears in the chapter relating to the churches of Reading.

Dunkards. — A religious denomination known as the "Dunkards" existed at an early day in the county. This class was also called "The Brethren," and sometimes "German Baptists." Certain persons of this denomination emigrated from Germany in 1719. They were numerous in Oley from 1730 to 1745. In 1724, October 24, they held a large general convention in this district; and upon that occasion they took sacrament. Thence they proceeded to "their recently baptized brethren at the Schuylkill," took sacrament and baptized two persons. 2

Another convention was held in Oley in 1742, which was attended by "four priests of the congregation at Ephrata." A meeting-house of this denomination was erected in Ruscomb-manor (at Pricetown), and another in Bethel (north of Millersburg), before 1752.

The first persons of this denomination in the county were settled in Oley township. Amongst them were Ritters, Shiberts, Blauhues and Planks; Elder Martin Gauby, Elder John Yoder, Elder Conrad Price, David Price, David Kinsey, Jacob Becker, Christian Kinsey, Daniel Klein, and their wives, Peter Klein, Eliza Ellis, Margaret Harpine and Catharine Plank. The elders named were the first local preachers. About the year 1730 they effected an organization through the assistance of Elder Peter Becker, of Germantown, and shortly afterward erected a church. For about ten years it was in a flourishing condition; then many of the members left for other settlements, and the congregation was almost abandoned.

Another congregation was formed in the northwestern section of the county, and comprised settlers in Bethel and Tulpehocken townships. They erected a church in the former township, along a branch of the Little Swatara Creek, about the year 1745. The families of George Booshore, Michael Frantz, John Frantz and Peter Heckman were some of the active members who caused the meeting-house to be erected. And with them were also the following named persons: Jacob Heckman, Nicholas Gerst, Jacob Moyer, David Merkey, Simon Menich, Christian Frantz, Jacob Smith, Philip Ziegler, Jacob Breeneiser, David Klein, Leonard Seabalt, Jacob Deal, Hans Stoeler, Jacob Booshore, and their wives; Adam Heinrich, John Grove, Rose Schnable, Eliza Kenzel, Widow Cyders, Widow Benedict, Elizabeth Benedict, and Sophia Kish. These persons were baptized by Elder George Klein, of New Jersey. They associated together and increased their number till 1857, when they were formally organized into a congregation by the elder mentioned, and had the Lord's Supper administered to them. Then Peter Heckman was ordained as an elder, having previously been an exhorter.

There was also a third congregation in Beru and Upper Tulpehocken townships, along the Northkill, several miles above the confluence of this stream with the Tulpehocken. A church was erected in 1748; and in that year the Lord's Supper was administered by Elder Michael Pfautz, of Lancaster County. In 1750 Elder George Klein came from New Jersey and settled amongst the members. Through his energy the congregation flourished for twenty years. Then settlements in the western part of the State influenced most of the members to withdraw from the church and move away. This left the congregation without sufficient support, and it naturally ceased to exist. In 1770 it had only eleven resident members, prominent among them being Elder Klein, 3 John Stohner, Valentine Long and their wives.

1 The author is indebted to Rev. Abram H. Cassell, of Harleysville, Pa., for information relating to this denomination.

2 They stopped here on their way to "Conestoga." I cannot locate the place on the Schuylkill, in Berks County.

3 Elder George Klein was born at Zwey Brücken, Germany, on October 9, 1715. He emigrated to America in 1788, and settled near Amwell, in Hunterdon County, MORAVIANS.—The Moravians were among the early settlers of the county. This peculiar sect was represented here by Count Zinzendorf, who came to Pennsylvania in 1741. In February, 1742, he conducted a synod in Oley, and in August following he visited the inhabitants of Tulpehocken. Shortly after this visit a congregation of Moravians was organized in Bethel township. Between 1742 and 1750 two churches of this denomination were erected in Heidelberg and one in Oley.

In 1741, Count Zinzendorf came to Pennsylvania for the purpose of seeing the success of the Brethren of the Moravians in effecting establishments here, and of observing the fruits of their labor among the heathen.

In February, 1742, he visited Oley, where he held a synod. The following account is given of this meeting:

"The 11th of February was the day appointed for this solemn act; and it was a day never to be forgotten in the annals of missions. The awful presence of Him who has promised to meet with His own, was powerfully felt; the greatest solemnity prevailed. The Spirit of God was sensibly felt during the morning exercises—these consisting of prayer and praise. Here, as in days of yore—when the sons of God met—Satan was also present, especially in His devoted servants, for, whilst the humble believers were engaged in preparatory exercises to baptize the contrite Indians, some ill-disposed people came from the neighborhood and raised such a disturbance that the whole company was upon the point of dispersing and postponing this transaction for the action. Peace was restored and there was held a solemn meeting in the afternoon, in which Rauch and Buettner were ordained deacons by the two Bishops, David Nitchman and Count Zinzendorf. After this act, preparations were made in a barn belonging to DeTirk. There was then no church in Oley; and in this barn the Indians (Shabash, Seim and Kiop) were baptized by Rauch, a missionary. The whole assembly having met, these three catechumens were placed in the midst, and with fervent prayer and supplication devoted to Lord Jesus Christ as His eternal property. Rauch then, with great emotion, baptized these three firstlings of the North American Indians into the death of Jesus, and called them Abraham for Shabash, Isaac for Seim and Jacob for Kiop. The powerful sensation of the grace of God, which prevailed during this sacred transaction, filled all present with awe and joy, and the effect produced in the baptized Indians astonished every one. Their hearts were filled with such rapture that they could not keep silence, but made known to all the white people who came into their hut, what great favor had been bestowed upon them. They preached a whole night to a party of Delaware Indians, who were in the neighborhood, and by the providence of God were just at that time led to return back to Oley. When one ceased the other began, and their animated testimony of Jesus filled their hearers with admiration. Soon after this they set out with Rauch and arrived at Bethlehem, where they spent some days with their brethren for mutual edification, and then proceeded on their journey in the company of their beloved teacher, full of spiritual life. When they arrived home, they testified to all their relations and friends of the grace bestowed upon them; and their words made an abiding impression upon the minds of the heathen."

In September, 1742, Zinzendorf visited Shamokin with the company of Conrad Weiser, who, it is said, co-operated with the Moravians for several years. Whilst there an interesting event occurred, which nearly resulted in Zinzendorf's death.

"Zinzendorf and his little company pitched their tent a short distance below Shamokin, on the banks of the Susquehanna. This caused no small degree of alarm among the Indians. They assembled a council of their chiefs and considered his declared purpose. To these unlettered children of the wilderness it appeared altogether improbable that a stranger should brave the dangers of a boisterous sea for the sole purpose of instructing them in the means of obtaining happiness after death, and that, too, without requiring any compensation for his trouble and expense. And as they had observed the anxiety of the white people to purchase lands of the Indians, they naturally concluded that his real object was either to procure the 4 New Jersey, where he became acquainted with the Brethren and was baptized in their faith in 1739. He was soon afterward chosen an assistant in the ministry, having been ordained by Elders Pfautz and Martin Urner. He went to Northkill, Berks County, in 1750, and was resident elder there for twenty years, when the congregation became too weak to support him and he left. He continued to preach for some years afterward, and died at an advanced age. He was regarded as an influential minister in this denomination. He was married to Dorothea Rehman, and had seven children. Several of his grandsons are now worthy elders of the Brethren.

succeeded him in January, 1744, having resided at first with Tobias Beckel. Meanwhile, George Frederick Beckel removed from the Schuylkill into the limits of what is now North Heidelberg township, and there, on land which was donated by his brother Tobias, a building, comprising a church and parsonage, was erected for the Moravians in the summer of 1744. On the 4th of November following, the building was dedicated to its legitimate uses during the opening sessions of a Synod at which Henry Antes presided.

The first Moravian congregation in the rural districts of the province was organized on April 9, 1745, in Heidelberg township, by Bishop Augustus G. Spangenberg. Its members were Tobias Beckel and Christiana his wife; G. F. Beckel and Ann Elizabeth his wife; Stephen Brecht and Elizabeth his wife; John Fischer, Sr., and Sybilla his wife; John Fischer, Jr., and Ann M. his wife; Frederick Gerhard and Barbara his wife; Nicholas Glas and Ann Mary his wife; Jacob Graeter and Barbara his wife; John Keller, widower; John Mayer and Margaret his wife; George Minier, widower; John Zerbe and Elizabeth his wife.

At the date of this register, Daniel Neubert and Elizabeth his wife occupied the parsonage in Heidelberg. ³

"Heidelberg was one of the rural districts in which the Brethren [Moravians] labored in the Gospel with marked success. Zinzendorf preached here frequently. In the spring of 1742 he recommended Gottlieb Battner, of Bethlehem, and the settlers accepted him as their minister. They then built him a church. Philip Meurer succeeded him in the autumn of that year. After the Lutheran Church was organized there, in 1743, the Brethren lost influence. They were then regarded with distrust, and afterwards displeasure; and finally, in January, 1747, they were deprived of their building in which they worshipped. Meurer was then recalled to Bethlehem." ⁴ in the year 1737, visited the German settlements of Oley, and preached at Jonathan Herrbein's and at Abraham Bartolei's. Andrew Aschenbach was, however, the Moravian pioneer in this inland district of the province.

Immediately upon his arrival in Pennsylvania, in October, 1740, he made Oley the central point of his Gospel ministry, in which he labored for upwards of two years with untiring industry, with persuasive eloquence and remarkable success. He was assisted for a time by Anna Nitschmann and Johanna Sophia Molther. During his residence in Oley, the so-called Synod of Pennsylvania convened at John de Turek's farm-house in the month of February, 1742; then three Mohegans, attached to the Moravian Mission at Sheecomoco, were admitted to church fellowship by the rite of baptism. At the same time steps were taken towards organizing the attendants on his ministry into a religious society; and the erection of a place of worship was recommended. A log church was accordingly completed before the expiration of the year. Zinzendorf was deeply interested in the prosperity of this domestic mission, and devoted much of his time and personal attention to its concerns. Nevertheless, in consequence of disagreement between the pastor and his people, which engendered partisanship, and the appearance of new claimants at this time for spiritual sway in Oley, the Moravians lost influence, and eventually, in 1765, withdrew altogether from the field.

The succession in the ministry between Eschenbach's recall, towards the close of 1742, and the date of the following register was thus: Henry Antes and Jacob Kohn, in 1743; Abraham M. Meinung, in 1744; John W. Michler, from 1745 to 1748; Richard Utley, in 1749 and 1750; John C. Francke, in 1751; John W. Michler, in 1752; and John Schneider, in 1753.

The Moravians, during their settlement in Oley, erected two dwellings on land donated to them by John de Turek. The first was completed and occupied early in 1745; the second was completed in 1748, and thereupon occupied upwards of three years by a flourishing boarding-school, into which were incorporated the Moravian schools of Germantown and Frederick townships.1

On July 31, 1750, a beginning was made to dissolve the Moravian School in Frederick township, by transferring pupils to other schools. In the last week of August, 1750, the following were transferred to Oley: David Beck (Berlin); Alvin and John Bibighausen (Muddy Creek, Lancaster County); Geo. M. Graaf (Lancaster); Abram Haller (Lancaster County); Israel Horsfield (Long Island); Isaac, Jonathan and Peter Jones (Montgomery County, New Providence township); Frederick Klemm (Philadelphia); Michael Kraemer (Lancaster); Abram Leinbach (Oley, son of John and Catharine); Isaac Noble (New York); John Riehm (Lancoster County); Peter Vetter (Oley, son of Jac. and Magdalene); John Walton, John Weber (Lancaster County).

Roman Catholics.—The early settlers of the county were entirely Protestants. They composed the different denominations till about 1740. Then the Roman Catholics appear. Their number was very small compared with the number in the Protestant denominations. The Protestants were mostly driven here by religious persecution, which was caused by the Roman religion; and feeling the terrors and sufferings of this persecution, it was natural for them to discourage this religion from obtaining a foothold in their midst. This accounts for the strength of the one class and the weakness of the other.

In 1741 the Roman Catholics had a congregation and meeting-house in "Gnadenhutten" (which included Washington township) and in Maxatawny. It is not known what membership they had. Some years afterward it would seem that their number had grown so as to awaken public concern. The matter was forced upon the attention of the justices of the county, who, being Protestants, imbibed the feeling of insecurity entertained by the surrounding community. The excitement incident to the "French and Indian War" was sufficient to arouse their jealousy and suspicion.

It was believed that the Roman Catholics manifested sympathy for the French in their cruel warfare against the colonies. The justices therefore addressed a letter to the Governor of the province, from Heidelberg, on July 23, 1885, which was as follows:

"As all our Protestant inhabitants are very uneasy at the behavior of the Roman Catholics, who are very numerous in this County, some of whom show great joy at the bad news lately come from the army. We have thought it our duty to inform Your Honour of our dangerous situation, and to beg Your Honour to enable us by some legal authority to disarm or otherwise to disable the Papists from doing any injury to other people who are not of their vile principles. We know that the people of the Roman Catholic Church are bound by their principles to be the worst subjects and worst of neighbours, and we have reason to fear just at this time that the Roman Catholics in Cassahoppen, where they have a magnificent Chapel, and lately had large processions, have bad designs, for in the neighborhood of that Chapel it is reported and generally believed that thirty Indians are now lurking, well armed with guns and swords or cutlasses. The Priest at Reading, as well as at Cassahoppen, last Sunday gave notice to their people that they could not come to them again in less than nine weeks, whereas they constantly preach once in four weeks to their congregations; whereupon some imagine they've gone to consult with our enemies at Du Quesne. It is a great unhappiness at this time to the other people of this Province that the Papists should keep arms in their houses, against which the Protestants are not prepared, who, therefore, are subject to a massacre whenever the Papists are ready. We pray that Your Honour would direct us in this important business by the return of the bearer, whom we have sent express to Your Honour." 3

This letter was read before the Executive Council on the 15th of August, 1755, and the following proceedings will indicate the action taken upon it:

"The Governor acquainted the Council that Mr. Weiser, in conjunction with the Justices of the County of Berks, had presented to him a representation setting forth an increase of Roman Catholics in their County, and particularly in the neighbourhood of the Town of Reading, and the apprehensions the people were under of some danger that might arise in this time of war, and praying that the same might be taken into consideration in order to prevent any ill consequences; that he had laid the same before the House, who had, on the 8th instant, sent him their answer in the following verbal message, namely,—

'The House have this afternoon examined Conrad Weiser, and some of our Members have had an opportunity of speaking with another of the Justices of Berks County, who signed the letter, representing the state of the Roman Catholics in that neighborhood, from which and what further inquiry we have made, we apprehend there is very little foundation for that representation. Nevertheless, if the Governor upon further information should find any assistance of ours necessary, we shall always be willing to contribute what lies in our Power for the public tranquility, and in the mean time we request to do therein what he shall think necessary and right, consistent with the Charters and Laws of this Province and the safety of the People.'"]4

In 1757 the Roman Catholics of the province were enumerated, with a total result numbering thirteen hundred and sixty-five—six hundred and ninety-two men and six hundred and seventy-three women.

In Berks County they were as follows: Under Rev. Theo. Schneider, sixty-two men and fifty-five women; under Rev. Ferdinand Farmer, forty-six men and forty-two women (of which there were eight Irish people—five men and three women).

All these were over twelve years of age and had received the Holy Sacrament.

The number in the county (two hundred and five) was rather small to have occasioned any excitement. The people were not in one place; they were scattered in three localities.

At Reading they had an association, if not a church, soon after the town was laid out; and this association they maintained, notwithstanding the smallness of their number and the opposition of the Lutheran and Reformed people, who comprised the great majority of the inhabitants.

About 1790 (probably some years earlier) they succeeded in establishing a church at Reading. In 1846 they dedicated a fine, commodious structure and called it “St. Peter’s.”

The families of this denomination at Reading, before 1820, were—

Amish.—The Amish denomination is a branch of the Mennonites. It was never in a flourishing condition in the county. The members were not ambitious to have a church until 1881, when they erected a building in Lancaster County, near the Berks County line, several miles west of Morgantown. Religious services were always conducted at private houses. The first bishop of the denomination in this vicinity (comprising Berks, Chester and Lancaster Counties) was Jacob Mast, who settled here in 1750, when a boy about twelve years old, and began to exhort and preach about 1765. He continued in active and faithful service for many years. The second bishop was Peter Plank, who moved from Oley and settled in Caernarvon. He was regarded as an able minister, and preached the gospel with great earnestness and success. And the third is John P. Mast, who has now officiated as a faithful and devoted minister in this denomination for over thirty years. His father, Daniel Mast, was a minister for fifty years—from 1830 till 1883.

The Conestoga Church has a membership numbering ninety persons. Only eleven families of this denomination are now living in this county.

At one time there were three other congregations in the county—one in Cumru, another in Maiden-creek and the third in Bern township (called Northkill). The latter was the oldest in this State. The latest service in Maiden-creek was in 1874, at the dwelling of Mrs. Plank.

Other Denominations.—The Episcopalians, or members of the Established Church of England, were in two sections of the county before 1740; one was in the southeastern part, in Amity township, at Molatton (Douglassville) and the other in the southern part, in Caernarvon township (near Morgantown), and in each locality they caused a church to be erected. They were amongst the first inhabitants of Reading. They had regular preaching there for a time, during ten years before the Revolution. The officiating minister was Rev. Alexander Murray. But they did not establish a church till 1826.

The Presbyterians began to collect a society in Reading about 1810, and from that time onward they increased in religious activity till they erected a church in 1824. In this time they were earnest in instituting a general Sunday-school.

The Baptists, Methodists and Universalists followed. These denominations were instituted at Reading, and being confined almost entirely to Reading, the historical narrative relating to them and their churches will be included in the chapter on the churches of Reading.

The history of the numerous churches in the several sections of the county will be narrated in the townships where they are situated.

I endeavored to collect statistics on the strength and growth of the several denominations in the county, but I was not able to obtain them, on account of the peculiar arrangement of territory, different from our political division, for which general reports were made.

Religious Excitement — Heidelberg Meeting. — In 1829 a religious excitement was caused by the agitation of questions relating to Sunday-schools, Sunday mails, etc. It awakened considerable feeling throughout the county; and the people, especially in and about Heidelberg and Exeter, expressed a decided opposition.

Pursuant to public notice, a numerous and respectable meeting of citizens was held at the house of George Gernand, in Heidelberg township, Berks County, on Thursday, May 21, 1829, to deliberate and consult upon the causes and tendency of the religious excitement which then prevailed in the county. Joseph Hain was chosen president; Henry Bennetsch and John Gerhart, vice-presidents; John Sohl, Jr., and Daniel Wenrich, secretaries. A committee of five (John Shitz, Jacob Zeitzinger, Henry Shoner, Martin Texter and John Hain) was appointed to report resolutions for the consideration of the meeting. They reported an address and resolutions, which were unanimously adopted. They apprehended that the existing religious excitement was not calculated to promote the interests of genuine rational piety, but tended eventually, if not arrested in its progress, to abridge the civil and religious liberties of the people. The excitement was caused by the extraordinary conduct of certain ecclesiastical professors, who appeared to have undertaken a crusade for spreading religious opinions and advancing church establishments. They alarmed the weak-minded and youthful part of the community with unusual and vehement denunciations of divine wrath, and thus obtained an influence over minds, not by rational conviction, which was destined to elevate the clergy to a degree of authority inconsistent with the people's welfare and with the spirit of free institutions. After condemning the clergy as ambitious, and the different societies as unnecessary, and the attempted prohibition of transporting mail on Sunday as fanaticism, and endeavors to procure legislation in religious matters as infringements on the rights of conscience, etc., resolutions were adopted regarding Sunday-school Unions, Bible Societies, etc., as unnecessary; religious zeal as false pretense and enthusiasm; Holy Scriptures as setting forth plainly the religious and moral duties, which consisted in visiting the sick, feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, honoring parents and showing charity for all, and that no amount of mortification or prayer could justify omission of any of them; Sabbath, as a day of worship and temporal repose, was not calculated to prohibit innocent recreations; the different societies, etc., as not worthy their support, being disposed to elevate clergy over the people; disseminators of such principles as hypocrites; beggars in broadcloth as impostors, too lazy to earn their bread by the sweat of their brow; and expressing readiness to reward upright, unassuming ministers for their services; but, if no such could be found, to carry on simple service themselves. They also approved of the proceedings at Cocalico Meeting, in Lancaster County, March 19, 1829, and ordered their own proceedings to be published in all papers friendly to the cause of the people.1

These proceedings were severely criticised by a "Christian Freeman," in an article published in the magazine of the German Reformed Church.2

"MEETING OF FREEMEN IN EXETER TOWNSHIP."

"A large and respectable meeting of the Freemens of Exeter township, Berks County, was held on the 27th of June, 1829, pursuant to public notice, at the house of John Mellon, inn-keeper, at which John Guldin was chosen president; William Reiter and Abraham Brumbach, vice-presidents; and Daniel Esterly and Jacob Brumbach, secretaries.

"The following-named persons were chosen a committee to draft a suitable address and resolutions: William Reiter, Jacob Maurer, Daniel Ritter, C. F. Egelman and Daniel Guldin. The committee having retired for a short time, returned and presented the following address and resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

"FELLOW CITIZENS: In the course of human events various vicissitudes will take place, some for the better, others for the worse. These changes are not unfrequently brought about by a part of our own citizens. Yes, by those who profess to promote the interest and happiness of their fellow-beings among whom they dwell, or over whom they preside as protectors. But how often are these resolutions or changes effected with any other view than that of self-aggrandizement? We are not without precedent on precedent, instance on instance. When was it that America groaned under the oppression of her mother-country? It was when Britain professed an anxious solicitude for our welfare. But our fathers were not even then insensible of the ponderous burden, and the duration of that oppression; being inspired by a love of country and liberty, they looked forward with a pitting eye; their bowels moved with compassion towards us, and most wistfully desired that we should not inhale the air of bondage; they made every laudable, though mighty effort, to evade the impending thraldom; they sacrificed all, save conscience and honor, to secure and promote our native rights. And, fellow-citizens, why should we not perpetuate the same to our children and children's children? Shall we remain passive on the present occasion? Shall the inheritance bequeathed us by our fathers be neglected? Shall our children be denied the liberties we enjoy? Let us watch with a jealous care, be vigilant "in season and out of season," to shield our rights from encroachments.

The present is a crisis unparalleled in the annals of America; such vigorous exertions were never made in the United States to connect church and State. What are some of those doing who assume to themselves the name "Spiritual," claiming the prerogative of dictating to others in religious matters, framing traditions, and to enforce which, powerful attempts are made to gain the sanction of the civil and national power. As soon as the civil power interferes, more or less, so soon will church and state be united. How many are the attempts made, on several occasions, to incorporate Synods, Theological Seminaries, Sunday-school unions, &c.

"At the close of the second century, no sooner had the number of the faithful increased, than the priests discovered that an advantage would result from forming a closer union of their interests and designs; they adopted provincial Synods; their deliberations were assisted by the advice of a few distinguished prebendaries, and moderated by a listening multitude. Their decrees were styled sermons, confession of faith and church discipline, which regulated every important controversy of faith. These institutions were very well suited to the private ambition and public interest of the clergy. That in a very short time they were received in the whole Roman empire. A correspondent was established between these synods or councils, which mutually communicated and approved their respective proceedings, and the church immediately assumed the form, and acquired the strength of a great federative republic,—church and state were united! bloodshed and carnage maturated the hands of the pious priests and priest-ridden!"

"We are fearful, if we let the "monster," "Union of Sabbath-schools," &c., stalk our country, that our government will be placed into the hands of those who have been trained in these "disciplined armies." "In ten years," says one of the Board, "or certainly in twenty, the political power of our country would be in the hands of men whose characters have been formed under the influence of Sabbath-schools" (see second Report of the American Sunday-school Union, page 89). This is a candid confession of one who is an active member of the Board, a correspondent of the Sunday-school Union. These are not surmises, they are facts on record.

"And did not even Dr. Ezra Styles Ely, the grand representative, as he calls himself, of the Presbyterian church, propose a new union, a Christian party in politics? Therefore,

"1. Resolved, That in the opinion of this meeting, it is highly important that public disapprobation should be freely expressed as to the numerous societies now existing or about being originated under the pleasing pretext of Christian benevolence; but in reality possessing no views other than private gain, personal ambition and the political ascendency of the priesthood.

"2. Resolved, That we view education as the first principle of our liberty, and therefore approve of Sunday-schools disconnected with the union, as conducive to the best interests of mankind; but that we view in the Sunday-School Union an alarming evil about to desolate our land, by instilling into the youthful mind bigotry, superstition and fanaticism, and thus controlling the infant, they secure the man, to crouch and cower beneath the mitre and crosier of ecclesiastical tyranny.

"3. Resolved, That we consider the distribution of the Bible as laudable and beneficial, but that we view the extensive establishment of the Bible Society, controlled as it is by priestcraft, as a dangerous and horrible machine, capable of being perverted to the accomplishment of the vilest purpose, the destruction of civil and religious liberty.

"4. Resolved, That we admit that those romances called tracts may benefit when they contain gospel precepts and doctrines compatible with reason and common sense. But that the millions disseminated by the American Tract Society are so much fanaticism and bigotry to lead the thoughtless into the snare of priestcraft.

"5. Resolved, That we view missionary societies as totally useless, connected as they are by auxiliaries and branches throughout the country, and that, whatever may be their avowed object, their real purpose is to collect funds to make sectarians and not Christians. Our Saviour and his disciples, when on earth, taught us to seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and that all other things will be added, but these missionaries bow first to mammon, to the obvious neglect of all other more important objects.

"6. Resolved, That we disapprove of Theological Seminaries as not within the spirit of Republican Institutions, inasmuch as they generate a progeny of idle metaphysicians, trained to the absurdities of their teachers, and ever prepared, by unity of action, to further the most extravagant designs.

"7. Resolved, That we are determined not to countenance the above-named institutions, but rather aid in their decline; and that we will support no minister in connection with them. That we respect and have due deference for Christian teachers, and that we feel rejoiced to acknowledge that many of this class among us disapprove of the measures we have attempted to expose.

"8. Resolved, That we condemn the measures of the German Reformed Synod, convened last year at Mifflinburg, Union county, as recorded in the publication of their proceedings, and particularly as to their supererogation in indicating what Almanac should be used, and their views as to enforcing a more strict observance of the Sabbath.

"9. Resolved, That we approve of the proceedings of the meeting held May 21, 1829, at Gernaut's, in Heidelberg; that we join with them in supporting our religious rights and-guarding our Civil Liberty.

"10. Resolved, That we instruct our representatives in the National as well as in the State Legislature, to suppress, with their most earnest exertion, every measure calculated in the least to curtail the rights of conscience.

"11. Resolved, That the following-named persons be a committee of correspondence, with power to call meetings whenever, in their opinion, the exigency of the case may require: Oley township, Peter Knabb, Jr., Jacob H. Reiff; Exeter, Isaac Ritter, John Esterly, Col. W. Reiter, Daniel Guldin; Robeson, George Focht, John Westly; Brecknock, Nicholas Lesher, John Ziemer, Esq.

"Resolved, That the proceedings of this meeting be signed by the officers of the day, and published in such papers as have at heart the rights of conscience and, of course, the liberty of the people.

"John Guldin, President.

'Abraham Brumbach,' Vice-Presidents.

'William Reiter,' 'Daniel Esterly,' Secretaries.'

Among the members present, the following subscribed their names to be published with the proceedings:

SUNDAY MAILS.—During the winter of 1829–30 similar excitement prevailed throughout the county respecting the transportation of mail on Sunday. Attempts had been made, by petitions of certain religious societies to the Congress of the previous year, to induce legislation on the subject, but the general remonstrance was so earnest that the committee of reference reported adversely to the prayer of the petitioners, intimating in their report that Congress ought not, and could not legally, exercise the power of legislation on questions which involved religious observance and the rights of conscience; and these attempts were being renewed before the Congress then sitting. These caused the development of great feeling everywhere on the subject. A large meeting of the citizens of the county was held in the courthouse, at Reading, on the 23d of January, 1830, for the purpose of uttering a protest against interference on the one hand or legislation on the other. John Klopp, of Heidelberg, was president of the meeting; General William High, of Alsace, vice-president, and Dr. William Palm, of Cumru, and Samuel S. Jackson, of Reading, were secretaries. In pursuance of the object of the meeting, a committee, distinguished for men of great ability and influence, was appointed to draft appropriate resolutions. It was composed of David F. Gordon, George M. Keim, George Fox, Isaac Ritter and Dr. William J. C. Baum. In the resolutions reported, the attempts to induce legislation prohibiting the transportation of mail on Sunday were disapproved, because it was believed that such attempts were incipient steps towards the attainment of an object fatal to religious freedom—the union of civil and ecclesiastical authority in the same individuals. The institution of Sunday as a day of civil repose and religious worship was recognized for its importance and utility too obvious to be questioned; but “while we acknowledge the obligation of the Christian world to employ it in worship and works of benevolence and charity, we regard all endeavors to fetter the conscience of men and to force them to worship God in a prescribed mode as impious, tyrannous and illegal.” The laws restricting worldly employment on Sunday are the limit of human authority. And it was considered “the imperative duty of citizens, as often as attempts shall be made by ill-advised individuals to procure legislative enactments in restraint of the rights of conscience, to assemble together and publicly express their sentiments in reference thereto, so that their representatives may be instructed as to the views of their constituents and not mistake the outcry of zealots for the voice of the people.” A committee of three was appointed from each district to procure “remonstrances to Congress against legislation relating to the carrying of mail on Sunday.” Appropriate petitions were circulated and subscribed by many persons. These were forwarded to Congress. And this expression of public sentiment caused the religious movement to cease its agitation and finally pass away. The transportation of mail on Sunday was not prohibited, but continued as a work of necessity.

COUNTY BIBLE SOCIETY.—A “Bible Society” having been in successful operation at Philadelphia, a similar society was deemed useful for the county of Berks. Accordingly, after having agitated the subject here, certain prominent citizens held a meeting in the “Public Building” on Wednesday, November 24, 1819, and organized a society for the county. Every person was allowed to become a member upon the payment of one dollar; a life member, ten dollars. The following officers were elected for the first year: President, Rev. H. A. Muhlenberg; Vice-Presidents, Rev. John F. Grier and Rev. William Pauli; Treasurer, John McKnight; Secretary, Samuel Baird, Jr.; Managers, Francis Swaine, George De B. Keim, William Bell, George Getz, John Birkinbine, Peter Stichter and Benjamin Davies.

It would seem that this organization was allowed to “slumber,” for nothing was heard of it or from it for nearly ten years afterward.

In 1827 the Bible Society of New Jersey resolved to supply every destitute family with a copy of the Bible before January 1, 1828. This resolve was actually accomplished.

This example encouraged the Bible Society of Philadelphia to make a similar effort, and nearly all the counties in the State resolved to co-operate with the Philadelphia Society. The “Berks County Bible Society” was not backward. Committees were appointed in the different boroughs and townships, and through them it was learned that upward of two thousand families in the county were without the Bible.

Twenty-four years elapsed before the society began its operations again. On September 22, 1851, it organized with Dr. H. H. Muhlenberg as president; and on October 27, 1852, the first annual report was submitted. The labor of the society was mostly in the eastern and southern portions of the county.

Families visited in the county, 5474, estimated one-third of all. Of these, 1166 families were without a complete copy of the Bible, though most of them had a copy of the New Testament.

The society sold 1738 Bibles and 2581 Testaments, and donated to destitute families 65 Bibles and 75 Testaments; sold at depository, 40 Bibles and 82 Testaments; whole number distributed during first year of society’s operation, 4582.

A “Female Bible Society of Reading” was also organized in the same year (1851). During the first year of its existence it sold and donated one hundred and seventy Bibles and Testaments. The population of Reading was then about sixteen thousand, and comprised about three thousand families. The supply was therefore very small. And this is an indication that the religious work in the city had been done quite effectively by the several religious denominations. The district of Reading does not appear in the following table, owing evidently to this society.

In December, 1853, the Berks County Society presented its second report. It showed the entire result of its labors from beginning to end, in the matter of exploring the whole county of Berks and supplying the people with Bibles. In the aggregate, one family in every five and a quarter families was found not to possess an entire copy of the Bible. Eight thousand nine hundred and one Bibles were added to the number previously in the county.

CHAPTER XV.

GENERAL EDUCATION.

Early Encouragement—Charity Schools—Common-School Education—County Institute—Pay Schools—Comparative Table of Schools and Scholars.

EARLY ENCOURAGEMENT.—Our first settlers appreciated the great importance of education, and encouraged it as a means of promoting the general welfare. They were not slow in erecting churches wherever they had effected a considerable settlement, and in them they caused their children to be taught the common branches of knowledge, such as spelling, reading, writing and arithmetic, so as to enable them to conduct their daily affairs with success. This teaching was influenced to a great degree by the religious spirit that prevailed amongst them; indeed, religious principles were considered a vital part of their education. By this, it is apparent that the school was regarded as of equal importance with the church. The two were therefore conducted together, the one for the younger folks, the other for the older, the one for secular knowledge, the other for spiritual.

In the first settlements, and, indeed, till the passage of the common-school law of 1834, the education that prevailed throughout the length and breadth of the county was almost entirely German, the Friends having had several schools in different parts of the county, in which they encouraged and carried on English education. The prevalence of German education was a natural consequence from the great predominance of German settlers over all other nationalities. In Exeter, Maiden-creek and Robeson districts the Friends were rather numerous, and they established English schools at an early period, and continued them for many years. Both the Germans and Friends had the spirit of education; they knew its advantage; they felt its necessity; they, therefore, encouraged it from the beginning. And they had the energy and good sense to give it proper direction.

The first German settlers brought along their teachers and ministers. These were recognized before emigration. If there were no minister, the teacher officiated in both capacities. Some teachers even practiced their trades, such as tailoring or shoemaking, whilst teaching.

A notion has obtained that education was not carried on to any considerable extent in the county at an early day, and till the adoption of the common-school system. This is a mistaken notion. A good idea can be obtained from the following extract of a letter, dated Reading, April 9, 1763, addressed by Rev. Alexander Murray to the secretary of the venerable Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts, stationed in England:

"The county for miles around this town is thick peopled, but what few else than Germans and Quakers, the former being computed twelve to one of all other nations together, and seem to be abundantly well provided in teachers of one denomination or another, and as long as they are so blindly attached to their native tongue, as they are at present, an English minister can be of no great service to them. For this they might be at no loss for English school-masters, yet they choose to send their children rather to German schools, which they have everywhere in great plenty."

This was the condition in 1763, eleven years after the county had been erected. But it will not be presumed that this condition did not prevail—in proportion to the number of the inhabitants—for many years before. Schools and school-teachers were not only in the lower and central sections of the county before its erection in 1752, but they were also in the upper, miles to the northwest, near the Blue Mountain.

CHARITY SCHOOLS.—A charitable society was established early for the relief and instruction of poor Germans and their descendants in Pennsylvania. Previous to 1751 certain Reformed ministers who had settled among the German emigrants in Pennsylvania found them in distress. They entreated the churches of Holland to commiserate their unhappy fellow-Christians, and contributions were, therefore, sent to these remote parts. In 1751 Holland and West Friesland granted two thousand guilders per annum for five years towards instructing the Germans and their children in Pennsylvania. Great encouragement was given to this scheme by persons of the first rank in Great Britain. King George III. contributed one thousand pounds towards this object, and the Princess Dowager of Wales one hundred pounds; and the proprietaries engaged to give a considerable sum every year to promote the undertaking. The society then adopted certain resolutions for the management of the scheme, and proposed a plan for establishing schools. The Governor of the province recognized the utility of the scheme and appointed a board of trustees for its proper direction. Conrad Weiser was one of the members of this board, and Rev. Michael Schlatter was appointed general supervisor. Petitions from Reading and Tulpehocken were addressed to the board in the early part of 1755 for the purpose of obtaining the benefit of these contributions in establishing some of these schools here, and Schlatter accordingly organized a school at each of the places named.

The charity schools proved an utter failure. Schlatter was personally the chief sufferer. His official position as superintendent of these schools rendered him the main object of popular hatred. For a time the Lutheran and Reformed ministers sustained him. But the people (especially Germans) lost confidence in this enterprise through the denunciation of Christopher Saur, who, in his German newspaper, represented that these schools were intended to prepare the way for the establishment of the Church of England. And in this way Schlatter’s influence was entirely destroyed. 2

The force of German energy and devotion manifested itself thoroughly wherever it found a resting-place. Samuel Wharton, in 1755, imputed the wrong bias of the German settlers against the proprietary government to their stubborn genius and ignorance, which, he proposed, should be softened by education, so as to give them right views of public interests. He suggested that faithful Protestant ministers and schoolmasters should be supported amongst them; that their children should be taught the English tongue; and in order to incline them to become English in education and feeling quicker, the English language was to be used in all bonds and legal instruments; and no newspaper or almanac was to be circulated amongst them unless accompanied by an English translation. Even such rigid measures could not hinder the exercise of this peculiar force. It grew, nevertheless. It caused schools to be erected and German education to be carried on successfully. And legislation could not direct it into a different channel.

Common-School Education.—Various and repeated legislative attempts were made, in pursuance of the constitutional provision, towards general education throughout the State. The reformers apparently labored hard to develop a satisfactory system, and, fortunately for the people, their earnest purpose prevailed against arguments, obstacles and prejudices of all kinds. We must admire their persistence, for they continued their exertions through a period of sixty years. A generous, noble spirit accompanied them. This aided them in their progressive course. It gave them true, moral courage, when courage was necessary; it developed a public sentiment gradually in their behalf; and, finally, it established the compulsory system provided by the act of 1849, improved by the act of 1854.

A great weakness in the early history of this good cause was the incompetency of teachers. Educated, experienced men and women could not be obtained; duty to their families and themselves obliged them to labor in vocations which afforded a fair remuneration for their services. Pronounced opposition discouraged those who may have felt inclined to teach. A general tax for the purpose was considered burdensome and unjust. The less paid then the better. The levy of an appreciable amount would certainly have caused a loud, perhaps a costly, demonstration. The seed had to be sown, and the plant therefrom had to grow, however slowly the growth. A little was better than nothing. We cannot, at this day, understand the feeling that prevailed previous to 1834. The change in fifty years has been truly wonderful.

But a greater weakness than incompetent teachers existed. This was the distinctive feature of the schools and the children attending them. They were called “pauper schools.”

1 See Rupp’s “History of Berks County,” pp. 99–109, for a long statement of the scheme prepared by Wm. Smith, secretary of the society at Philadelphia in 1755.
2 Dubbe’s “Historic Manual of Reformed Church,” pp. 203, 204.
and "pauper scholars." This was odious to the poor; therefore the poor shunned them. The system, as a creature of legislation, was erroneous. It developed a separation of the people, and thereby the very object of a generous Legislature was naturally frustrated. Hence, it was a failure. In 1833, when the State contained about eight hundred thousand children, less than twenty-five thousand attended the common schools,—just one in thirty-one, or about three percent,—notwithstanding the offer of education at the public expense. In 1883 the State contained about two million children; the number attending common schools was 957,680—nearly one-half or forty-eight per cent. This shows an increase of sixteen-fold in fifty years.

The general system of education "free to all," provided by the act of 1834, is attributable to a society which was organized at Philadelphia in 1827. The express object of this society was general education throughout the State, and its efforts, after laboring in this behalf for seven years, culminated in the passage of the act mentioned.

In 1835 a great effort was made to repeal this act, but it failed. The credit of preserving the system at that time is generally given to Governor George Wolf and Hon. Thaddeus Stevens.

The subject of education was discussed as a public question of importance immediately after the "Declaration of Independence," and for nearly eighty years afterward, till the adoption of a compulsory scheme which came to be regarded as generally satisfactory and worthy of enforcement. It was, in fact, discussed from the beginning of the provincial government. William Penn recognized its importance and encouraged it. He declared that "that which makes a good constitution must keep it, viz.: men of wisdom and virtue, qualities that, because they descend not with worldly inheritance, must be carefully propagated by a virtuous education of youth." In his "Frame of Government," he provided that the Governor and Provincial Council should erect and order all public schools.

In 1682 the Assembly made the following provision:

"And to the end that Poor as well as Rich may be instructed in good and commendable learning, which is to be preferred before wealth, Be it enacted that all persons in this Province and the territories thereof, having children, and all the Guardians or Trustees of Orphans, shall cause such to be instructed in reading and writing, so that they may be able to read the Scriptures, and to write by that time they attain to twelve years of age; and that then they be taught some useful trade or skill, that the poor may work to live, and the rich, if they become poor, may not want; of which every County Court shall take care."

The Constitution of 1776 provided that "a school or schools shall be established in each county by the Legislature for the convenient instruction of youth, with such salaries to the masters paid by the public as may enable them to instruct youth at low prices;" and that of 1790: "The Legislature shall, as soon as conveniently may be, provide by law for the establishment of schools throughout the State in such manner that the poor may be taught gratis." This provision continued in the fundamental law of the State unchanged till the new Constitution of 1873, when it was modified as follows:

"The General Assembly shall provide for the maintenance and support of a thorough and efficient system of public schools wherein all the children of this Commonwealth above the age of six years may be educated, and shall appropriate at least one million dollars each year for that purpose."

Professor John S. Ermentrout, in his historical sketch of Kutztown and Maxatawny, expressed himself in reference to the early encouragement of education in the county, and to the opposition of the people to the common school law as follows:

"Early Interest in Education.—How earnestly both Reformed and Lutheran preachers, during the earliest periods, labored to elevate the standard of education; how by letter they importuned their friends in the Fatherland to send on money and works; and how by crossing the ocean, they in person pleaded the cause of their poor brethren in the colonies; how they interested not only influential Germans on the Continent, but Englishmen also of the highest distinction, to establish Societies for the diffusion of knowledge in the New World; how Rev. Mr. Schlatter collected funds in Europe which now form a part of the endowment of Franklin and Marshall College, at Lancaster—all this, and much more, we must pass by, and turn our attention to what more directly concerns our own community.

"The original founders of the Reformed and Lutheran denominations held that the true idea of education required that the young should be taught not only how to read and write and cipher, but also how to pray, and how to exercise themselves in habits of personal piety. They vehemently protested against the separation of a religious from a secular education, and if the alternative had been presented, would cheerfully have sacrificed the latter on the altar of the former. From Luther has come down to us the maxim, 'Bene orasse est bene studuisse.' This adage, in all its applications, may be taken as an epitome of the educational view which controlled the actions of the first German settlers. At home, in the Fatherland, every congregation was regarded as an ecclesiastical corporation, whose duty it was to provide for the training of the young. The pastors, accordingly, established parochial schools, and set over them teachers, who, in addition to the needed secular branches, taught also Christian doctrine, and played the organ during Divine service. Such teachers received not only a stated salary, but also house accommodations for their families and schools. The rich were required to pay a certain sum for the education of their children, while the children of the poor were taught free of charge.

"In the earliest efforts for the elevation of the German colonists, these educational views were treated with high regard. In 1751, through the exertions of Mr. Schlatter for the diffusion of knowledge among the Germans, was formed a society in England. To this, His Majesty himself subscribed one thousand pounds. Among its rules we find, that 'the children, English and German, shall be instructed in catechism of sound doctrine approved of by their own parents and ministers, and that the several catechisms now taught among the Calvinists, Lutherans and other Protestant denominations will be printed in English and German.' Of those schools the Rev. Michael Schlatter, a Reformed preacher, was appointed visitor or supervisor.

"OPPOSITION TO COMMON-SCHOOL LAW.—This tendency to withdraw education from the supreme control of the clergy was not confined to Kutztown and Maxatawny, but cropped out in every section of our country. It bloomed into ripe fruit in the passage, by the Legislature of Penna., April 1, 1834, of the Common-School Law. Now began a fierce conflict between the advocates of the educational theory our forefathers brought over from the Fatherland and the advocates of a purely secular theory.

"That the child ' belongs first of all to God, as its Creator; secondly, to the parents, as being second causes of the child; and thirdly, to the State, as guardian and protector of the temporal interests of the family and society, but to the State only in the way of subordination to parental and divine rights;' that to every religious society belonged the right of prescribing what education should be given to its baptized children; and that parents could not be forced against their consciences to send their children to any school that did not meet with their approval,—this in general was the educational theory that prevailed among our original German settlers. The State now stepped forward and declared that, whilst it pretended not to interfere with the religious freedom of the people, it desired that in every county there should be supported by taxation a system of schools, in which a solid elementary instruction in the secular branches might be imparted to every child in its broad domain.

"In the conflict which ensued, the State gained the victory. Under the circumstances, a different result was not to be expected. The descendants of our forefathers were not true to their own principles. They allowed their 'theory of education to become a dead letter, whilst their religious leaders failed to discern the intellectual wants of the times, and made no provision for the overgrowing desire of the young for a more liberal education than that which mere 'Writing, Reading and Ciphering,' implied. If both people and preachers had co-operated in the establishment of such schools as would have fairly represented the progress of culture, and met the needs of the hour, there is every reason to believe that the State would have encouraged their efforts, and allowed them full scope for the working out of their educational plans. The time for such broad action had passed by. Already defeated within their own fortress, through their own supineness and want of discernment, and by reason of their failure to carry out their own system when things were wholly in their own hands, preachers and people went into the battle only to be utterly routed and driven off the field.

"Now came to pass a complete divorce of secular from religious education, and the religious societies no longer held the reins of power over their own children. For some years the battle against the Common-School Law raged furiously in Berks County. Only the most inveterate prejudice will continue to assert that the people of this county are or ever were opposed to education as such. The passage of the school law suddenly woke them out of their lethargy; and they opened their eyes to see at one full view, as they supposed, that the educational views and practices of their fathers, that the ecclesiastical traditions of their past history, that their natural and parental rights, that their view of the Church as a society divinely established for the education of their children, were now seriously threatened. For these reasons they rose up in opposition against the scheme prepared by the State. Justly did the Hon. H. A. Muhlenberg, in a letter to the workingmen of Philadelphia, dated January 26, 1836, say: 'The Germans of our State are not opposed to education as such, but only to any system that to them seems to trench on their parental and natural rights.' Animated with these feelings, it is not to be wondered at that the people of Kutztown and Maxatawny waged stout war against the School law. At a meeting held in the Court-House, in Reading, to consider the School Act, at which twenty-five townships were represented by delegates, but one, Elias Moore, of Caernarvon, voted to accept it. At an election for School Directors, March 18, 1836, in Kutztown, were chosen Daniel Bieber, Daniel Graff, Daniel B. Kutz and John S. Grim. These all, as also those selected in adjacent townships, were known to be against the accepting of the School law. At a convention of School Directors in Reading, May 2, 1836, it appeared that of the fifty districts in the county, Reading, Womelsdorf, Caernarvon, Robeson, Ruscumb-manor and Union had accepted the law.

TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.—An institute, composed of many of the school-teachers of the county, was held March, 1851, in the courthouse at Reading, for the purpose of encouraging the general work of education by a discussion of improved methods of teaching, an organization having been effected in January preceding. The meeting was largely attended, and it was very successful. The address of welcome was delivered by Rev. George Printz. Institutes were held for several years in succession and then discontinued.

In 1867 the State Legislature passed an Act of Assembly requiring the county superintendent of common schools "to call upon and invite the teachers of the common schools and other institutions of learning in his county to assemble together and organize themselves into a teachers' institute, to be devoted to the improvement of teachers in the science and art of education, and to continue in session for at least five days." In conformity with the provisions of this law, the county superintendent, Prof. John S. Ermentrout, held a county institute, in 1868, at Reading. It was largely attended by teachers from all sections of the county, and great interest was manifested throughout the whole of its proceedings. Since that time annual institutes have been held with increasing attendance and success. New and improved systems of teaching are thoroughly explained and illustrated and interesting lectures are delivered. These have been valuable aids in simplifying the art of teaching and in developing its standard as one of the great professions. The wisdom of the law in this behalf has become apparent in various ways, especially in respect to the creation of a stronger interest in teaching as a respectable and responsible occupation. The last county institute was attended by all the teachers in the county excepting four.

In 1869, when Prof. D. B. Brunner became county superintendent, he inaugurated the system of local institutes, and during that year he held eight institutes in different sections of the county which proved very successful. This enabled the teachers in remote districts to attend an institute and become familiar with its proceedings, and also to take a part in its discussions, an opportunity being afforded and an inclination to do so being encouraged. This latter feature was particularly appreciable, for in a local institute the teachers were thoroughly acquainted with one another, and, not being so numerous, they were enabled to participate practically in its exercises. Each succeeding year till now has shown an ever-increasing interest in them.

PAY SCHOOLS.—Various pay schools have been conducted in the county, out of the limits of Reading. They are particularly mentioned and described in the several districts in which they were or are still carried on. The Keystone Normal School and the Oley Academy are worthy of special mention.

WILLIAM A. GOOD was born in the city of Philadelphia on the 15th of July, 1810. In early infancy he was brought into the covenant by baptism and, subsequently, whilst a youth, was confirmed as a member of the Reformed Church. Feeling himself called to the ministry, he pursued his classical studies in the Reading Academy, under the direction of Rev. J. F. Grier, D.D., and studied theology under the supervision of Lewis Mayer, D.D., in the Theological Seminary of the Reformed Church, located at York, Pa. On completing his studies he was regularly ordained into the ministry and licensed by the Classis at Lebanon, Pa., in 1833. Soon afterward he accepted a call from the Reformed Church at Hagerstown, Md., where he officiated as pastor with great success.
for several years. From that congregation he was called to Mercersburg, Pa., to serve as rector of the Preparatory Department of Marshall College. He continued in this responsible position for six years. He then returned to Hagerstown, became principal of the Hagerstown Academy, and for five years directed and supervised the education of pupils in that institution. He was then called to the pastorate of the Reformed Church at York, Pa., and, accepting it, he removed thither and labored earnestly in that field for a period of six years.

He next removed to Reading and assumed charge of a select school for young ladies. At the expiration of the fifth year he became principal of the Reading Institute and Normal School, and remained thus occupied for three years. He was in the mean time elected superintendent of the common schools in Berks County, being the first to fill that office. The people of the county were chiefly members of the Reformed and Lutheran Churches and averse to the new order of things. It was feared that in the rural districts the superintendent would encounter much opposition. Mr. Good understood the peculiarities of the people, having been reared among them. Besides, he was a thorough and practical educator, having made the subject of teaching a specialty, both theoretically and practically, for many years. He organized the system throughout the county, and, instead of raising a storm of opposition, won the confidence and support of the people. He was re-elected for a second term, thus holding this important office for a period of six years. Whilst successfully and earnestly engaged in organizing and conducting the school affairs of the county he also officiated as pastor of the Bernville, North Heidelberg and Pricetown congregations, having served these churches altogether for a period of eight years. Subsequently, for a time, he supplied the Reformed congregations at Tremont and Donaldson, in Schuylkill County, Pa.

Reverend Good was one of the most zealous Sunday-school workers in Berks County. While superintendent of the common schools he endeavored, in his private intercourse with the people, to interest them in the cause of Sunday-schools. This he regarded as a step in the right direction, and a measure of great practical wisdom and importance. The parochial or church schools were then being carried on in the several sections of the county, and if they were stopped, some other provision had to be made for the religious education of the children. He thus became instrumental in founding many of the Sunday-schools of the county, and these still exist and are accomplishing a vast amount of good in the direction of moral education.

During the last eight years of his life, Reverend Good frequently held service in the Reformed Churches in the city of Reading. He was one of the founders of St. John's Reformed Mission Sunday-school, and this he conducted, with the aid of his wife (a woman highly esteemed for her devotion to religious and charitable work), for nearly six years. This school eventually became a self-supporting and flourishing congregation, with a fine, large brick church at the corner of Ninth and Chestnut Streets, under the care of a pastor. Without any compensation, he performed as much labor as many a regular pastor. The Teachers' Association of the Reformed Churches of Reading indicated their appreciation of his earnest and disinterested labors in behalf of the cause of Sunday-schools, and their high regard for his Christian character, by attending his funeral in a body.

Mr. Good was recognized as a fine scholar. He had a thoroughly disciplined mind. He was a close student and an acute observer. Reading and study afforded him much pleasure. For a number of years he took Professor Ullmann's "Studien und Krüten" at a time when there were not twenty subscribers to this foreign scientific and theological periodical in this country. Besides devoting much time to the science of teaching, he was greatly interested in the study of philology. He frequently imported rare works on favorite subjects, when not procurable in America. Though not latterly engaged in teaching, his earnest investigations were not discontinued, but rather increased. He was a genuine German, who sought and loved the truth for its own sake. He was particularly fond of fruit and of the planting of trees for the production of choice varieties—this diversion giving him great delight.

One of Mr. Good's distinguishing characteristics was great kindness of heart. He was known to address a friendly word to every one who met him, and having had a natural friendliness with children, and understanding their natures, he was well fitted for the educational and Christian work in which he was for years successfully engaged.

Reverend Good was married to Susan B., daughter of Peter and Susan Eckert, of Womelsdorf, Berks County, in 1840. He died on February 9, 1873, in the sixty-third year of his age. He left two surviving children—William Eckert Good, manager of the Philadelphia and Reading Coal and Iron Company's shops at Reading, and James Isaac Good, pastor of Heidelberg Reformed Church, Philadelphia.

John Silvis Ermentrout, eldest son of William and Justina Silvis Ermentrout, was born at Womelsdorf, Berks County, Pa., September 27, 1827. At the age of two years his parents removed to Reading, and there he was reared, successively attending the select schools taught by Mr. Middlemiss, Rev. Mr. Goodman and Mr. John Kelley. Developing a great aptitude for study, he was sent to Marshall College, Mercersburg, Pa., from which he was graduated in 1845, the first-honor man of his class, though not yet eighteen years of age. He remained in the college as a tutor, teaching the languages and lecturing on history. At the same time he was a student of the Theological Seminary connected with the institution. From this seminary he was graduated in 1848 and then ordained a minister of the Reformed Church.

For a time he was editor of the "Reformed Messenger," the organ of the church, at Chambersburg; and he also had charge of a congregation in the neighborhood. On December 26, 1852, he was installed pastor of the Reformed Church at Norristown, Pa., where, after serving most acceptably for six years, his resignation, after repeated tenders, was regretfully accepted and he retired from the ministry. His thoughtful, studious mind brought him to the conviction that there was but one church and that he was not in it; and feeling that he could no longer conscientiously serve as the pastor of a Protestant congregation, he tendered his resignation. The final step into the Roman Catholic Church was taken twelve years later.

In the mean time he returned to Reading and in the beginning of 1859 opened a select school. One year afterward, he was elected superintendent of the common schools of his native county, and he was twice re-elected, serving from 1860 to 1869. In 1865 he founded the Keystone State Normal School at Kutztown, Berks County, became its first principal and so continued until 1871, when he resigned, preparatory to making a public profession of his faith in the Roman Catholic Church, thus ending a mental conflict which had endured for more than twenty years. He at once removed to Baltimore and there edited a Catholic journal. Subsequently, he taught in the St. Charles Borromeo Seminary, at Overbrook, near Philadelphia.

In 1873, by the unanimous action of the board of trustees of the Keystone State Normal School, he was recalled to that institution, but he was unwilling to accept its presidency. Agreeing to take the chair of Mental and Moral Science and English Literature, he was cordially welcomed back to the scene of his most effective labors, where he continued until his death.

He died, unmarried, after a short illness, July 21, 1881, at the residence of his widowed mother in Reading, and was buried in Charles Evans’ cemetery, friends and representative bodies from all parts of the county and State attending his funeral.

Mr. Ermentrout was a man of strong mental powers, a profound thinker, an able theologian and a fine logician and scholar. As a speaker he was polished and forcible, and as a writer of pure, terse English a model. He made innumerable addresses before the County Institutes, and he was a frequent contributor to newspapers and periodicals. Among other things, he was the author of an able pamphlet against compulsory education, and also of the Centennial Memorial of Kutztown and Maxatwany Township—the latter an extremely interesting history of that region from its earliest settlement. As an educator and moulder of intellect he stood in the foremost rank in Pennsylvania.

He was a representative Pennsylvania German and labored assiduously to increase in that element of our population a proper sense of their own worth, dignity, ability and responsibility. His life was spent among them and his efforts accomplished most marked results, particularly in the growing youth of both sexes in Berks County. The vast influence he exerted in educational matters can hardly be overestimated, and the flourishing institute he founded at Kutztown will always constitute an enduring monument to this exemplary Christian scholar.

In manner, Mr. Ermentrout was modest, quiet and unassuming and was possessed of such great tact that, notwithstanding his strong convictions and his fearlessness in expressing and following them, he seldom, if ever, made an enemy. He was perfectly honest, temperate in all things, social in disposition and pleasing in conversation. His life was pure and spotless and his example and speech of a standard worthy of imitation. These qualities, combined with his ability and learning, greatly endeared him to the people of his native county, and caused his death, at the age of fifty-four years, to be universally regretted.

David B. Brunner was born March 7, 1835, in the upper section of Amity township. His father was John Brunner, a carpenter in that township, and a descendant of Peter Brunner, a Palatine, who emigrated to this country previous to 1736, and settled in Douglass township, Berks County, about 1765. In 1805 his son William moved into the vicinity of Pottstown, and in 1819, to the western part of Amity township, where he had purchased a farm. In 1827, William’s only son, George, bought a farm in the same neighborhood and lived there until he died, in 1855. George had four children—Mary, John, Samuel and David. John had seven children—Mary Ann, David, John, Frederick (who died in Pennsylvania College in 1862, while a senior), William, Amos and George.
David B. Brunner, one of the sons last named, and the subject of this sketch, during his boyhood, attended the common schools in the township till the age of twelve years, when he learned the trade of carpenter under his father. At this occupation he continued until the age of nineteen years, attending school during the winter. This township was favored with teachers well qualified, who taught advanced mathematics—such as algebra, mensuration and surveying—besides the common branches of education and practical teaching, he located at Reading in 1862, having purchased the Reading Classical Academy, an institution which had been founded by the Rev. William A. Good in 1854. He was liberally encouraged from the beginning, and conducted this institution, with increasing success year after year, till 1869, when he was elected to the office of county superintendent of common schools of Berks County. his first election he continued the classical academy with the aid of assistants; but, upon his re-election, finding that the institution required his personal supervision, which he could not give, he closed it, so as to be able to devote his entire attention to the schools of the county, in whose welfare he became thoroughly interested and with which he was prominently identified. At the end of his second term as county superintendent he re-opened the institution under the name of Reading Scientific Academy. This change was made to signify that the study of the sciences was an important part of the course of education under him. Besides the daily study of scientific branches, frequent lectures were delivered by him to the scholars, illustrating his subjects by philosophical experiments, etc., with the aid of instruments manufactured by himself.

In 1875 and 1876, he conducted a business college at Reading, with the assistance of Chester N. Farr, Esq., and in 1880 and 1881 he acted as city superintendent of the common schools in Reading.

For a number of years Prof. Brunner manifested a thorough interest in the history of the Indians of Berks County, having visited numerous localities of the county in this behalf. He collected many relics and valuable facts, and then narrated the results of his investigations for the Reading Society of Natural Sciences. His essays were first published in the Spirit of Berks, and then, in 1881, reproduced in book-form. In the course of his labors he made many wood-cuts to show the size, form and appearance of Indian relics, such as arrow and spear-heads, axes, knives, hammers, plates, pottery, beads, shells, pestles, mortars, ornaments, etc. In this work he displayed zeal on the one hand and genius on the other.

Prof. Brunner is a thorough mineralogist. He has investigated our entire county also in respect to its minerals with great success. He prepared a catalogue of the names of the minerals found in the county specially for this history, which is included in the chapter on Physical Geography. And the birds of our county have also received his earnest attention, he having collected and stuffed a number of fine specimens. His collection now includes one hundred of the rarest specimens. He has also given much attention to microscopy, using in his researches a fine, large microscope, with lenses magnifying from ten diameters to twelve hundred diameters. His intervals from school-teaching are largely devoted to the production of scientific apparatus and the addition of natural curiosities. With the aid of a lapidary’s mill, he has polished a large variety of our best and most beautiful minerals, which he has mounted upon glass slides for microscopic examinations. His extensive cabinet includes about a thousand mounted specimens, consisting of minerals, animal and vegetable tissues, insects, etc. These enable him to carry on the study of this branch of knowledge with the most satisfactory results. They exhibit the wonderful operations of nature not perceptible to the naked eye.

Two degrees—Bachelor of Arts and Master of Arts—have been conferred upon him by Dickinson College, the former at the time of his graduation, and the latter in 1863.

In 1877, he published a small but superior elementary work on English grammar, of which, in 1882, he issued a second and revised edition. Many thousand copies of it have been sold, being used throughout this county and also in adjoining counties.

In religious belief Prof. Brunner is a Lutheran, having been for many years and being still a consistent and devoted member of Trinity Lutheran Church, at Reading. In politics he is a Democrat.

Prof. Brunner was married, in 1861, to Amanda L. Rhoads, a daughter of Abraham Rhoads, of Amity township, and a descendant of one of the earliest settlers in the county. They have five children—Daniel Edwin, Elizabeth, Edgar Alfred, Mary, and Henry Philemon.

Samuel A. Baer was born November 28, 1846, in Greenwich township, near the place known as Schafer’s Mill. His father was John Baer, whose father moved from Weisenberg, Lehigh County, to Maxatawny in 1812. He was only ten years old when his father died, and he was thrown upon his own resources. For four years he worked upon a farm in Albany township for board and clothes, after which he was apprenticed to learn the tailoring trade. He was determined, however, to obtain an education, and through the aid of friends he was enabled to prepare himself for the profession of teaching. He received his first certificate from Professor John S. Ermentrout, in 1864, and taught his first term in Maxatawny township, in what is known as Hinterleiter's school-house. The term was four months, and the salary twenty-six dollars per month.

He continued teaching during winter, and in the spring and fall attended the Maxatawny Seminary, under Professor H. R. Hicks, and later, the Keystone State Normal School (into which the former school had merged) until he was prepared for the junior class of Franklin and Marshall College. He was graduated from the latter institution in 1869. Immediately after his graduation he was elected professor of Latin, Greek and history at the Keystone State Normal School. This position he held until the summer of 1872, when he married, and removed to Lehighton, Carbon County, where he became principal of the Lehighton Academy, and borough superintendent of public schools. In 1874 he took charge of the Oley Academy, and in May, 1875, was elected superintendent of public schools of Berks County.

As county superintendent he served for six years, with credit to himself and benefit to the schools. He was known as a faithful worker. He paid particular attention to the subject of the English language, without disparaging the mother-tongue. He prepared for the use of the teachers “A Course of Study for Ungraded Schools,” to which were appended “Suggestions on Teaching German Children the English Language.” These were distributed throughout the entire county, and aided the teachers in instructing the German-speaking children in a rational and intelligent manner.

Whilst county superintendent, he also won considerable reputation as an educator outside of his county. In August, 1877, he read a paper before the Pennsylvanian State Teachers’ Association, on the “Educational Problem among the German Element,” which was extensively published, especially by the German press of Pennsylvania and other States. In recognition of its merits he was elected a member of the Pennsylvania Historical Society. He was appointed by State Superintendent, Wickersham, in 1876, a member of a special educational committee to prepare the State exhibit of public schools at the Centennial Exhibition of 1876. Among the special features of his work in this connection may be mentioned his “Centennial Map,” which shows the location and character of every school-house outside of the city of Reading. It was the only map of the kind on exhibition, and was a credit to Berks County as a work of art, as well as showing an excellent educational status throughout the different districts. In 1877 he prepared an interesting “Educational History” of the county, which was published in the State report of that year; it was also published in pamphlet form and extensively distributed throughout the county.

In May, 1881, he was elected city superintendent of the public schools of Reading, and held this position for three years. His work in this position is mainly characterized by his efforts to get the teachers out of old ruts. With this in view, he held weekly meetings of teachers, instructing them in mental philosophy, methods of teaching and school management. It can safely be said that the schools made satisfactory progress during his administration.

In February, 1884, through his influence a lecture was delivered in the Granth Opera-House, and the sum of two hundred dollars was cleared. With this amount the nucleus of a “Teachers’ Library” was formed. Over a hundred books were purchased, most of them on “pedagogies,” and placed along with the old High School library for the use of the teachers.

In the fall of 1884 he was appointed by Governor R. E. Pattison assistant State librarian, which position he resigned, on account of failing health, in October, 1885, and accepted the position of superintendent of schools of Florence, S. C. Of his work in that place, the Florence Times of January 21, 1886, speaks as follows:

“It gives us pleasure to announce to the public that the Florence graded schools are a success. Ever since the opening in November, they have been growing in number of pupils and in popularity. Dr. Samuel A. Baer, the superintendent, has proven himself the man for the position. We predict that ere long Florence will be noted for her good schools as she now is for her healthful climate and genial society."

He has been at all times loyal to the Pennsylvania German element, following in this respect the course of Professor John S. Ermentrout, whose friend and frequent companion he was. At the meeting of the Pennsylvania State Teachers' Association, held at Washington, Pa., he delivered the memorial address in honor of his friend. In January, 1882, he delivered an address at the request of the State superintendent before a meeting of city and county superintendents, held at Reading, on—"How can the academic teaching of our High Schools and State Normal Schools be made to harmonize more fully with the advanced academic work of our colleges and Universities." This was published and distributed by the State superintendent.

He served several terms as member of the executive committee, and once as chairman of the Pennsylvania State Teachers' Association. At the meeting held at Williamsport, 1883, he was elected its president. In July, 1884, Ursinus College conferred upon him the honorary degree of Ph.D.

DAVID S. KECK was born in Lehigh County October 6, 1852, and there acquired his early education in the public schools. When ten years old he left home to make his way by his own exertions, working for a time in the iron ore mines of Lehigh County. Ambitious to extend his education, he attended the Keystone State Normal School for a time, from which he was graduated in the teachers' course in 1874. He taught public schools, in Lehigh, Berks and Luzerne Counties, officiated as principal of the High School at Hamburg from 1874 to 1877, and as superintendent of the Model Department in the Keystone Normal School from 1877 to 1881. By that time he had obtained a high reputation as an educator, and in the year last mentioned the school directors of the county elected him superintendent of the common schools. He was re-elected to this position in 1884 for a second term of three years. He is now filling this important office with great credit to himself. In June, 1883, the Ursinus College conferred upon him his honorary degree of Master of Arts.

COMPARATIVE TABLE.—I have arranged, the following table to show the number of schools and scholars in the county by districts at four different periods; also when the common-school system was accepted by the several districts. The total attendance of scholars for 1884 was less than in 1876. The average attendance, however, was for 1876, 18,706 scholars, and in 1884, 19,522 scholars.
CHAPTER XVI.

LANGUAGE, MANNERS AND CUSTOMS.

The great majority of the early settlers of Berks County were Germans, and through them their language, manners and customs became predominant. Most of them remained here, and, to a great degree, where the several families first settled and prospered. Their number influenced the early erection of the county in 1752. Their industry, perseverance and economy built up and enriched its valleys and hills with substantial improvements. Over one hundred and thirty years have elapsed since, but the general features of the whole community bear their impression. Their manners and customs have been handed down from generation to generation, with little, if any, change; and their language is still in general use in every section. This permanence exhibits inherent strength. The introduction of a strange people, with a different language, almost entirely English, have not weakened their hold upon the people.

Language.—Their language is composed of words principally from German dialects, such as the Allemannisch, the Pälzisch and the Schwäbisch, and some from the German proper. Its preservation to such a marked degree is due mostly to their German Bible. Martin Luther performed a great service to one of the strongest and most prolific nations of the earth in translating the Latin Bible into the German, for through it he made the use of the German here persistent and continuous. Their German hymn-books and prayer-books, and Arndt's Wahren Christenthum (True Christianity) assisted greatly in this behalf. The use of the English language in courts of justice, and in legal documents of all kinds, did not, and apparently could not, interfere with its preservation. Even English teaching, through a general system of school education, has not disturbed it very much, though fifty years have elapsed since its introduction. This system has caused the introduction of numerous English, mixed and contracted words, and doubtless induced the language to be called "Pennsylvania German"—or "Pennsylvania Dutch." These remarks are particularly applicable to the country districts. The teachers are mostly young people, who, in many instances, are not qualified to use the English language accurately. Through them many peculiar and incorrect expressions have been engraven upon the language of our immediate locality; and the German people themselves have occasioned the introduction of a considerable number, through an earnest desire to succeed in their business relations with the citizens of Reading. The sounds, expressions and intonations cannot be communicated in a published narrative.

The Pennsylvania German language is presented admirably in a number of poems which Mr. Thomas C. Zimmerman, editor of the Reading Times, translated from the English, be having selected a variety of styles of composition, in order to show its capabilities for metrical expression. This variety comprehends subjects both grave and gay; also humorous and pathetic. His first translation was the Christmas poem by Clement C. Moore, entitled, "'Twas the Night before Christmas." It is presented herewith, following the English version, in order to afford an opportunity for comparison:

A VISIT FROM ST. NICHOLAS.

'Twas the night before Christmas when all through the house
Not a creature was stirring, not even a mouse;
The stockings were hung by the chimney with care,
In hopes that St. Nicholas soon would be there;
The children were nestled all snug in their beds,
While visions of sugar-plums danced in their heads;
And mamma in 'kerchief and I in my cap,
Had just settled our brains for a long winter's nap—
When out on the lawn there arose such a clatter,
I sprang from my bed to see what was the matter.
Away to the window I flew like a flash,
Tore open the shutters and threw up the sash.
The moon, on the breast of the new fallen snow,
Gave a lustre of midday to objects below;
When, what to my wondering eyes should appear,
But a miniature sleigh and eight tiny reindeer.
With a little old driver, so lively and quick;
I knew in a moment it must be St. Nick.
More rapid than eagles his coursers they came,
And he whistled and shouted and called them by name,—
"Now, Dasher! now, Dancer! now, Prancer and Vixen!"
On Comet! on Cupid! on Donder and Blitzen!
To the top of the porch, to the top of the wall,
Now, dash away, dash away, dash away all!"
As dry leaves that before the wild hurricane fly
When they meet with an obstacle, mount to the sky,
So up to the house-top the couriers they flew,
With the sleigh full of toys—and St. Nicholas, too.

And then in a twinkling, I heard on the roof
The prancing and pawing of each little hoof.
As I drew in my head, and was turning around,
Down the chimney St. Nicholas came with a bound.
He was dressed all in fur from his head to his foot,
And his clothes were all tarnished with ashes and soot;
A bundle of toys he had flung on his back,
And he looked like a peddler just opening his pack.
His eyes, how they twinkled! his dimples how merry!
His cheeks were like roses, his nose like a cherry;
His droll little mouth was drawn up like a bow,
And the beard on his chin was as white as the snow.
The stumps of a pipe he held tight in his teeth,
And the smoke, it encircled his head like a wreath.
He had a broad face and a little round belly
That shook when he laughed like a bowl full of jelly.

He was chubby and plump—a right jolly old elf;
And I laughed when I saw him in spite of myself.
A wink of his eye, and a twist of his head,
Soon gave me to know I had nothing to dread.
He spoke not a word, but went straight to his work
And filled all the stockings; then turned with a jerk,
And, laying his finger aside of his nose,
And giving a nod, up the chimney he rose.
He sprang to his sleigh, to his team gave a whistle,
And away they all flew like the down of a thistle.

But I heard him exclaim, ere he drove out of sight,
"Happy Christmas to all, and to all a good-night."

"DIE NACHT FOR DE CHRISCHDAAG."

[Translated for the Reading Times.]
'S waar die Nacht for de Chrischdaag, und dorche e gans Haus
Verreegt sich kee Thierl, net emol en Maus;
Die Schrumpf waare schnock im Schornschte gehanke,
In der Huoffung der "Nick" dheet graad runner deschumpe;
Die Kinner so schnock waare all noch im Bett,
Von Zuckerschlick driame un was mer, doch, wött;
Die Mamme im Schnupdurch un ich in der Kapp, Hen uns juescht hi geleegt for'n lang Winter's Nap—
Dan draus in 'm Hoof waar so 'n dunnerse Jacht, Dass ich ufg'schrunge bin zu sehn wär's macht.
An's Fenschter graad schpring ich so schnell wie'n Flasch, Die Lade ufg'risse, ufg'schmiisse die Sassch!
Der Moon und der Brunsch deu neg'fallne Schnee
Macht Holling wie Mitdaug, ünwer alles, so schö, Im e' Aageblick kumnt, jetz, un rund wie e' Kersch
E' Fuhrmann im Schilde un acht kleene Hersch—
E' Männll in Pelze, so frendlich un frei—
'Hab graadewiek g'wisst's muss der Pelknickel sei!
Wie Andler, so schnell, sin die Herschlin zusammen, Un er peift un'r ruus, un'r nennt sie mit Naam:
"Jetz Dascher! jetz Danzer! jetz Franzer! jetz Vixen!
Un Komet! un Kupid! un Dunder! un Blitzen!"
An der Porch isch er nut, um die Maer gefalle—
"Jetz schpringt eweck! schpringt eweck! schpringt eweck alle!"

Wie laah for'm e Windschtorm—der wildscht das mer seht,
Wann ebbes im Weg isch un's himmelwerts geht,
Zum Hausgiwel nuf sin die Herschlin wie g'flote, Mit'm Schlolid fall Sasch un der "Nick"—mit gezoge;
Im e' Aageblick hörst ufm Dach—owwedrowe—
En Gescheer un Gedanz wie mit hülz'line Glowwe.
Mol Kop zieg ich ne, guk um mich im Haus—
Un im Schornschte, do kumnt's wahrhafting schun raus!
Mit Peltze ferwickelt fon Kop biz um Fuus, Un alles ferschnuettet mit Aesche un Ruus!
Uf'm Buckel en Bundoll fell allerhand G'schpie—
'S hat guekket wie 'm Kremer sei Kramm—artig fšel.
Sei Maat, wie 'n Kersch, un sei Dimple die lache—Sei Age, die hlantle, und wie Rosa sei Backe.
Gans rund war sei Mable un roth wie der Klee,
Un 's Schnurbällidi weiss wie woll, oder Schnee:
En schumptiges Peifli, fescht zwische de Zeh,
Un der schmook schteigt in Ringlin so schö in die Hôh.
Sei G'sichtli so breed, un sei Bäuchli e' bissel Üvern Lache hot g'shittelt wie Dschelly in der Schütssel.
So dick un so rund war des luuchtige Elfge,
Muss lache, graad aus un kan's gear net helfe.
Sei Köpli waar eifrig un schwätzit mit Nücken—
Sei Age, gear freundlich mit Blinzle un Blicken;
Die Schrumpf hot r' g'fill't, un mit fröhlichem Braus, Da schpringt inschtandig, den Schornschte hinaus—
Er schpringt uf sei Schlidde, zu der Fuhr peift en Pifel, Dann fliege sie fort wie Duun fon der Dischtel:
Doch eb' er gans fort waar, sei Gruss hat er g'macht—
"En herrlicheChrischdaag! un zu alle, Gut Nacht!"

The following are extracts from additional translations by Mr. Zimmerman:

DIE YUNG WITFRAU.
Blöd is sie un' doch net bashful, Free und easy, doch net bold;
HÖRSCHT DU DEN REGE,
Wie er saftlich fällt?
HÖRSCHT DU DEN Vogel,
Der vom Busch 'raus ruft?
HÖRSCHT die Imme, du,
Über die Sunnblum' ringe?
Sagt uns, Mädle, now—
Set'scht du net 'mohl singe?
HÖRSCHT DU NET DES srctfles Wind
Seufze um die Rose dort?
Und die gleene süsse Rose,
Die wu Lieb' zu Lieb' antwort?
So set'scht du als Antwort mache
Dem G'bed', wu mir dir bringe;
Dass der Rose-Knopf, dei Maul, Ufschpringe thät mit Singe!

"THE BONNIE GEORGE CAMPBELL."

Hoch uf die Hochländler, Und dief in em Dag,
Der gute Georg' Campbell
Reit frei wie er mag.
All g'sattelt, all 'zaumt,
Schöne Gläder tragt er:
Heem is sei guder Gaul,
Doch er nimmermehr.

'Raus komt sei Mutter—
Sie weint so herzlich:
'Raus komt sei schöne Frau—
Sie weint avver schmerzlich.
All g'sattelt, all 'zaumt,
'N schtark Schild tragt er,
Heem komt der Sattel,
Doch er nimmermehr.

Mei Wiss, sie leit grü,
'S Welshkorn 's net g'ernt, Mei Kornhaus is leer, Ung'bore mei Kind.
All g'sattelt, all 'zaumt,
Scharfe Waffe tragt er,
Heem komt der Sattel,
Doch er nimmermehr.

The last poem appeared originally, as its title would indicate, in the Scotch dialect. It was partly compiled and partly written by William Motherwell, who published it in 1827. Subsequently it was translated into German by O. L. B. Wolff, from whose version Henry W. Longfellow translated it into English; and it is Longfellow's interpretation that Mr. Zimmerman selected for conversion into Pennsylvania German.

Harbaugh's "Harfe," also Fischer's "Pennsylvanisch Deutsche Gedichte" and "Kurzweil and Zeitvertreib," are publications in the Pennsylvania German which are worthy of especial mention. They contain numerous interesting poems in this dialect, and introduce, in a superior style, the notions, manners and customs of our German people.

The English language, both written and spoken, has been in use from the time of the earliest settlements by the English in the county, and it is natural to suppose that, in all these years, through judicial proceedings, business transactions and general education, it should have made considerable progress, especially during the last twenty years; but frequent visits to churches and schools, stores and families in this time enable me to say that the German language is still predominant. Another generation—indeed, several generations—will have to pass away before the English language can take its place. The circulation of English newspapers is increasing gradually; but their total circulation is still small compared with our population. They are a strong agency in effecting a change from the German to the English; in reality, they are a stronger agency in this respect than the common schools. This is particularly apparent in Reading. Before the daily English newspaper was established here, the German language was commonly used by the major part of its inhabitants in their daily affairs; but now the English has its place, and principally through the more and more general introduction of the newspaper. The convenience of distribution facilitates its growth. But the situation is not much improved in our boroughs and towns and townships, especially in the latter, notwithstanding the use and encouragement of common schools. In those, the newspapers are not generally read as they are in Reading. They are not so conveniently distributed. But in them, as in Reading, the English language will become more generally used according to the more general introduction of English newspapers. The national government is contributing much aid by extending and increasing the postal facilities and the delivery of mail matter throughout the county. If the distribution of newspapers from the several post-offices could be effected in those districts as in Reading, without compelling the people to walk after them, a great step would be accomplished towards increasing their circulation, and, with it, the use of the English language.

Manners and Customs.—The buildings and improvements throughout the county are mostly the result of German thrift and energy. Profits from labor have been almost entirely appropriated towards increasing the value of land rather than towards enlightenment. Fine barns, dwellings and fields are prominent in every locality. They are superior to those which existed in the previous century. Practical affairs show a decided advancement beyond their condition fifty years ago. This is apparent in live stock, in the cultivation of fruit, in the possession of improved implements and machinery, besides a better class of dwellings and barns. A higher order of taste in the adornment of persons and places has made its way through increasing liberality. These are signs to indicate the development of the people out of their previous condition.

Domestic habits, in respect to home-made articles, have changed. Spinning and weaving have been abandoned. The loom and the factory supply all the materials required. A change began to be made about 1840. Before that time, spinning was common everywhere in the county. It was one of the necessary accomplishments of mothers and daughters. Till then reels and spinning-wheels were sold at different stores in Reading. Sales then declined gradually, and within twenty years afterward there was no demand at all for these articles.

Gardening is still carried on successfully. Besides supplying vegetables for family use, it is a source of profit to mothers, who dispose of a considerable proportion of garden products at market.

The almanac is a common guide to indicate by the changes of the moon the proper time for planting. The practice of consulting the moon's phases is regarded by many persons as a superstitious notion; but it still prevails. So fences are erected when the points of the moon are up, shingle roofs are nailed in position when the points are down, and woods are cleared when the moon is full. But the custom is not so general as it was, especially in towns and cities, where building operations are conducted through all seasons; and walls, fences and roofs are placed in position regardless of the point of the moon.

A funeral in the country districts is always largely attended, especially the funeral of a citizen of some prominence. The services are generally conducted in the German language in the church of which the deceased was a member. Afterward the guests return to the house of mourning and participate in a large dinner. This custom has continued time out of mind. Great sociability is exhibited upon such an occasion. Friends travel miles to attend a funeral in order to show respect for the deceased. And the entire neighborhood is very often represented.

The burials are generally made in the burying-ground adjoining a church. The first settlers made burials in private grounds set apart on farms for this purpose. It was instituted as a matter of convenience; and then the funeral service was held at the house. The change of farm ownership caused this custom to be gradually abandoned. Thirty years ago private grounds were still numerous. Church cemeteries began to be more encouraged then and burials in them increased. Occasionally a burial in one of these private grounds is still made.

The country store was a great institution years ago. But its influence, trade and popularity are much reduced. This change was effected through the introduction of the railway and competing stage-lines. Variety of goods and cheapness are considerations which induce the people to visit the towns and the county-seat for their purchases. It is noticeable that the railway is drawing the patronage of Reading to Philadelphia more and more; so that as our townsships come to patronize Reading, Reading goes to patronize Philadelphia. This is apparent elsewhere—the cities attracting the trade of towns, and the towns that of the country districts. The country inn was also a popular place for many years. Frolics and dances were common everywhere years ago; and they were carried on successfully at the inn. The "fiddler" was an important person upon such occasions. And "Battalion Day" brought much profit to the inn that was near by the place where the military exercise was conducted.

Military affairs were active throughout the county from the close of the Revolution till the beginning of the Civil War, a period covering nearly eighty years. Companies of men were formed in every section, and battalions of them were drilled annually at the prominent towns, mostly at Reading, Kutztown, Hamburg, Rehersburg and Womelsdorf. These exercises occasioned the day to be called "Battalion Day." They afforded the men much pleasure and a great change in their daily employment in field, barn and work-shop. Many sons of early families became quite prominent as military men. The most popular military men, by reason of long-continued service, were Generals George De B. Keim, George M. Keim, Henry Schaeffer, and William High, and later for several decades till the Civil War, General William H. Keim.

The old "Conestoga wagon" is no longer seen passing over our highways. Fifty years ago it was in prominent use everywhere. Many of them were seen moving together in conveying great loads of wheat and other products, such as manufactured articles, whiskey, etc., to distant markets, especially to Philadelphia. Each one was drawn by four horses, sometimes by five and six; it attracted much attention, with jingling sweet-toned bells on the lead-horse of the team to indicate its movement on the way. Its capacity was from two thousand to three thousand pounds. It was covered with a strong canvas top. In returning, store goods of various kinds were brought along. Upon the opening of the railroad in 1838, this business of hauling in Conestoga wagons ceased. Since then, the only considerable hauling by farmers is in conveying their grain, hay, etc., to the market at Reading; and this is done almost entirely in one wagon at a time.

In a "moving" by a farmer about April 1st many teams are used to convey the whole stock, furniture, etc., in a day. The long train affords to a certain degree an idea how the Conestoga teams appeared.

The life of the farmer is comparatively little beyond hard, earnest labor and rigid economy throughout each succeeding year. His daily reflection is upon his stock and crops. All the improved implements and labor-saving machinery are devised and introduced by others for his benefit. He would continue in the same manner of conducting his farming operations which had been practiced last century and even this century till 1850, if inventive genius had not created them for him. The farmer of our own county has not produced anything to improve his situation in respect to labor. He adopts what is brought to him. This singular inactivity keeps him back of the advancing times. Through it, the products of his labor are permitted to be drained to populous places. One of the chief consequences is little remuneration. The men of thought and energy in cities absorb the greater proportion of the profits. If his daily habits were not simple and his expenses small, he could not keep what he has, much less accumulate more. His net income from actual labor is limited. Compared with the income of business men, agents, officers, and clerks in cities, it is insignificant. His manners are the same in this respect as in others. If we examine them closely and compare them with the condition of things one hundred years ago, we find little progress. His household furniture, bedding, clothing, table-ware, social habits and general customs are generally the same. His walls are not decorated with costly paintings, his floors are not covered with fine, soft carpets, his beds are not composed of easy springs and hair or wire mattresses, his table does not glisten with polished silver or sparkle with cut glass, his dwelling is not after the modern style, with arrangements for health and convenience, and he himself is not a patron of art, literature or amusements. But in towns and cities we find all these things, not only in the dwellings of bankers, lawyers and merchants, but also of industrious mechanics, agents and clerks; and art, literature and various amusements are largely patronized and encouraged. This great difference is caused by the spirit of progress, which obtains more in populous places, where the people are led in numerous ways to intermingle daily with one another. Association creates the laudable ambition to develop improvement in the various departments of domestic and social life; and it relieves the monotony of daily labor by amusements, literary, musical and dramatic. In carrying on its amusements successfully, it is converting night more and more into day and devising new methods for social pleasure and excitement. Improved light facilitates and encourages it in the night-time. And traveling is a great agency in stimulating it. Indeed, in certain respects, it is like steam on the one hand and electricity on the other,—active and energetic in moving about from place to place, and brilliant and powerful in providing the necessary light to accommodate its conceptions. Horse-power, and locomotion afforded by it means may suffice for the people in the country districts; but steam and railroads afford locomotion which is not too rapid for the people in the towns and cities. Indeed, the genius that thrives in the very midst of the most populous places and of the pleasures and excitements which they produce is struggling with the mysteries of the world for a motive-power stronger and quicker than steam and hopes of realizing victory are highly entertained. Restless energy is introducing wonderful changes in the manners and customs of the people. In the mountainous and farming districts, where distance separates the inhabitants and where means for rapid intermingling are impracticable, if not impossible, the changes are imperceptible. Their situation does not warrant changes, especially such as are constantly going on in the cities, for it could not support them. The profits of labor and the investments in them are too slow and too small. Hence their manners and customs, their dwellings and churches, their roads and movements, their speech and actions, their dress and associations, are the same or nearly the same as they were a hundred years ago. Their energy is inseparable from the plow and the hoe and muscular exertion. But the cities produce and support these changes, and in them energy partakes more of the mind than of the body. And these changes and this mental energy are more active amongst their inhabitants. In comparing the situation of the people of Albany and Caernarvon townships—districts located at the extreme northern and southern ends of our county, thirty miles apart also of Hereford and Bethel townships,—districts located at the extreme eastern and western ends, forty miles apart, with the situation of the people of Reading, the county-seat, the difference is apparent at a glance. One hundred years ago they were alike or nearly so. But just as Reading is in advance of the districts mentioned, so is New York, the great metropolis of our vast country, in advance of Reading. By contrasting the two extremes, our mountainous districts with the great metropolis, the difference in the manners and customs of the respective inhabitants is wonderful. And yet the forefathers of each, as immigrants, started alike. In the one, oil and tallow are still used and even the open fire-place for the production of light in a simple and inexpensive way; in the other, these have long passed away, especially for public purposes, and the people have light from electricity. In the one, thousands of inhabitants are scattered over miles of territory; in the other, thousands are concentrated upon a few acres. In the one, a few hundred dollars suffice to make the inhabitants contented and happy; in the other, millions of dollars are invested and expended to carry on successfully the manners and customs of the inhabitants, and such changes as ambition and competition produce. Contentment would seem to be the co-partner of slowness, if not of stillness; but discontentment of energy and activity. In the one, the expense of a few extra dollars in travel or in entertainment is looked upon as luxury, if not extravagance; in the other, thousands of dollars are expended as a matter of necessity for the same purpose.

These strong contrasts enable us to see our own manners and customs in the county of Berks as they are or were, or as they will be, especially in our more populous places, the nearer steam and electricity come to be connected with us in our material progress.

CHAPTER XVII.
NEWSPAPERS.

During the early history of Reading, there was no newspaper published in the town. News was communicated by persons to one another mostly at inns, of which the number was large in proportion to the population. It will not be supposed that the inhabitants encouraged these resorts only for the liquid spirits which they afforded. It is true, men there drank whiskey, cream-beer, mead, etc.; and they played at cards, dominoes, checkers, etc., for sport, if not for stakes. And the young people frequently indulged in dancing in the bar-room and dining-room of these places. But there was a prominent feature of the daily life at inns which surpassed all the things mentioned. This was talk and gossip and storytelling. Each man was an unappointed, implied committee of one—a reporter, as it were—to collect and report anything new. The "bulletin board" was not in existence. The latest accident, death, transaction or crookedness of any kind was communicated from one to the other, or to small groups of persons by the living voice. And so it was carried from building to building and from place to place. What interesting persons these reporters must have been—not reporters with pencil and paper gathering news for the press, but communicators reporting what they knew or heard for the general information of the public! What versatility—what attention—what memories—what imagination they must have possessed! And what story-tellers, indeed, enlivened frequently, if not generally, under the influence of "apple-jack" and "old rye!" Not in the English language, for English was rarely spoken then by those who assembled at inns; but in the German language, which was used almost entirely throughout the town in the daily affairs of life, both secular and religious. The inn of the past can be, in this sense, likened to the newspaper of the present. People assembled there for information; and the places could have been appropriately named—"Messenger," "Observer," "Courier," "Reporter," etc., instead of "King George," "Gazall.
Washington,” “Red Lion,” “Black Horse,” etc. Now reporters go there daily, not to communicate, but to collect news for newspapers, by which it is circulated throughout the community.

During that early period of Reading, the Pennsylvania Gazette, published at Philadelphia, had a limited circulation here. It was an interesting messenger to the people; and its weekly arrival must have been an event of more than ordinary importance. A copy was doubtless busy in passing amongst persons who could read English—not for the personal matters which it contained, but for foreign affairs, market reports, letters published at Philadelphia, etc. Christopher Sauer’s Journal, a newspaper printed in German, and published at Germantown, had a more extended circulation in this vicinity, and it exercised a large influence over the residents.

Over forty years in the history of Reading elapsed before the newspaper became a local institution. The entire period of its local life as a town, with all its interesting and many important events, passed away without having it introduced. This would seem to be a long while for such a factor to obtain a foothold in a community otherwise energetic and progressive. But this delay is capable of explanation. The people were interested in home rather than in foreign affairs, and strove to give them successful, if not profitable, development. Local matters required no printed publication, for, the town being small and the population limited, they were easily communicated. But as the town grew into a borough, and especially as the borough grew into a city, with its territory enlarged, the inhabitants more widely scattered and the population largely increased, the natural way became more and more incapable of satisfying the inquisitiveness of the people and an artificial way had to be introduced, and this was supplied by the newspaper. After the lapse of nearly a hundred years since its introduction, general progress has come to be so wonderful, the people so numerous and scattered and their relations so intermingled, that, just as the natural way had to yield to the artificial, so did the old and slow process of printing on a hand-press, with its limited capacity, have to make way for the new and spirited process by a steam-press, with its unlimited capacity. In the beginning the newspaper was weak in every respect—small in size, limited in circulation, uncertain in financial support and wanting in mental vigor and originality; but now it is strong, rich, bold and energetic.

The newspapers of the county comprise two classes—weekly and daily. The weekly began in 1796, and continued to be the sole public agency for the transmission of news and the advertisement of merchandise, notices, etc., for sixty years. Its publication in the English language and in the German began at nearly the same time—the former having anteceded the latter by six months. The following narrative comprises the newspapers which were instituted in the county:

WEEKLY NEWSPAPERS.

Kutztown.—Neutralist, Gelst der Zeit, Der Hirt, Kutztown Journal, National Educator, American Patriot.

Hamburg.—Hamburg Schnellpost, Hamburg Advertiser, Rural Press, Hamburg Weekly Item.

Boyertown.—Boyertown Bauer, Boyertown Democrat.

Womelsdorf.—Womelsdorf Gazette, Womelsdorf Herald, Womelsdorf News.

DAILY NEWSPAPERS.

WEEKLY NEWSPAPERS.

The Weekly Advertiser was the first newspaper publication at Reading. It was an English weekly, instituted by Gottlob Jungman (Youngman.) The first issue appeared on Saturday, May 7, 1796; and the subsequent issues appeared regularly every Saturday for twenty years, excepting probably an interim for some time previous to 1811. The subscription price at the beginning and for fifteen years thereafter was one dollar, and the publication was during that period in folio form upon a sheet ten by sixteen inches, with two columns on each page; then, on August 3, 1811, it was enlarged to sixteen by twenty inches, with three columns on each page, and the price increased to two dollars. By the issue No. 196, February 1, 1800, it appears that Youngman had taken in a partner, named Carl A. Bruckman; but it is not known how long they continued together in the publication. Upon the enlargement of the paper, on August 3, 1811, the new issue was begun with No. 1. It is probable that the publication had suspended for some time previously; otherwise the consecutive numbering would have been retained.

The new issue was published by Gottlob Jungman & Co. The name of the additional person in the company was not given. On December 31, 1814, the firm became G. & J. E. Jungman—the father having introduced his son John, who was a musician and then conducted a "Musical Academy" at Reading. The size of the sheet continued the same; but the columns were increased from three to four on each page. A book and stationery store was carried on by them in connection with the publication. They also issued a German newspaper called the Standhafte Patriot. The beginning of this publication could not be ascertained. In October, 1815, they advertised a notice that they had determined to close out their store and to continue the publication of the English and German newspapers till May 1, 1816, when they would leave Reading permanently for the West, and they invited in the mean time proposals of purchase. The store and publications were continued till the time named; but Gottlob Jungman, not finding a purchaser, was forced to make an assignment of his property for the payment of his debts. The assignee sold the estate, and it is believed that George Getz purchased the newspaper and printing material, for about that time he began the publication of the Berks and Schuykill Journal.

For the purpose of affording an idea how the first newspaper of Reading was conducted, the contents of No. 1, issued May 7, 1796, are presented—

Pages 2, 3 and part of 4, part of charge of Hon. Jacob Rush, president judge of Berks County, addressed to grand jury at Reading on April 4, 1796 (conclusion appeared in No. 2).

Remainder of page 4 was taken up with—

1. Vote of Congress on the question whether the Treaty with Great Britain should be executed.

2. Notice of the sheriff of Berks County that a Court of nisi prius would be held at Reading on May 24, 1796.

3. Advertisement of Jesse Pearson, a silver-smith and whip-maker.

4. Advertisement of notice by George Kemp that he had found a saddle-bag, with contents, on the road between Kutztown and Klein's Tavern.

Gottlob Jungman was the first postmaster of Reading. He held the office from the time of its establishment on March 20, 1793, till October 1, 1801.

The Impartial Reading Herald was an English weekly newspaper. It was begun on June 22, 1796. The first publishers were J. Schneider & Co. On the 14th of October following the firm comprised Jacob Schneider and George Gerrish. The size of the sheet was sixteen by twenty inches, with four columns to the page, and the price was two dollars per annum. It is not known how long the firm or the publication continued; but it is probable that the firm discontinued the Herald upon having begun Der Readinger Adler, a German weekly, in the month of November following.

It has been stated that the first publication at Reading was a German weekly newspaper bearing this name, the German title having been Die Neue Unparteiische Readinger Zeitung. The first number is supposed to have appeared in 1789; but this statement is founded upon supposition alone, there being no copy of the paper in existence from which to obtain any facts that relate to it. Another statement appeared in the Berks and Schuykill Journal, in 1855, representing that this German newspaper was instituted by John Gruber, of Germanstown.

and Gottlob Jungman, of Reading, in 1793, and that within a year afterward Gruber returned to Germantown, leaving Jungman as the sole publisher. Gruber died at Hagerstown, in Maryland, on January 5, 1855, aged ninety years. It is possible that this latter statement is correct, which would lead to the belief that the Herald was begun three years afterward as an English weekly and published by a different party. If this be so, the Readinger Zeitung was the first newspaper which was published at Reading.

Der Readinger Adler.—The Readinger Adler was instituted Nov. 29, 1796, by Jacob Schneider and George Gerrish. It was the first newspaper printed in the German language at Reading. The title at first was Der Unparthei- siche Reading Adler, with the cut of an eagle between the last two words carrying a scroll with the motto, "Freedom." It was a folio sheet, sixteen by twenty-four inches, with three columns to each page. The second number was issued on Tuesday, January 10, 1797; and each successive number of the paper has been issued regularly every week, on the same day, without a single omission, till now,—a period covering eighty-nine years. It is now the oldest German newspaper published in America. In the third number, issued on January 17, 1797, the word "Reading" was changed to "Readinger;" and, on January 6, 1801, the word "Unpartheiische" (impartial) was omitted.

The parties named continued to issue this paper till June 29, 1802. John Ritter, a nephew of the senior member and a practical printer, was substituted in the place of Gerrish, with the next number, issued July 6, 1802, and the firm-name became Schneider & Ritter. The business was conducted by them till 1804. Then Schneider withdrew, and Carl A. Kessler (a Saxon) was introduced, he having married Ritter's sister. The firm-name thence, till 1857 (excepting from 1824 to 1827), was John Ritter & Co.1 Kessler died in October, 1823. The surviving partner alone conducted the publication for several years, then admitted Mrs. Kessler, the widow, as a partner. During that period it was conducted with great success. In December, 1840, the Berks and Schuylkill Journal (a cotemporary newspaper at Reading) gave the Adler the following friendly editorial notice, and, coming from the independent and vigorous young editor, John S. Richards, Esq., it was certainly complimentary:

"The Adler, at its commencement and for some time after, advocated the principles of Democracy, but within the last twelve or fifteen years has sadly fallen off from Democracy, as we understand, having given a cordial support to Jackson and Van Buren. The paper merits commendation for the gentlemanly tone which usually characterizes its articles; and the editor, Mr. Ritter, is universally esteemed in his private relations. Although we differ considerably in politics, we are willing to award him the credit of being honest and sincere in his views, which is a good deal more than we can say of some of his political friends and rivals."

From 1843 to 1847 the senior member of the firm, John Ritter, was the representative of this county in Congress. He died on November 24, 1851, aged nearly seventy-three years. His straightforward, truthful and honorable course in the publication of the Adler had won for him the highest regard of his fellow-citizens, and for his paper the title of "Berks County Bible." The confidence of his patrons in its reliability had become so entire that they were willing to "swear by" all its reports and opinions. They knew that he was a most conscientious man in respect to truthfulness on the one hand and to carefulness on the other.

In December, 1852, steam-power was introduced for printing the issue every week. This was the first practical application of steam for this purpose in the county. Formerly the printing was done by means of a hand-press.1 The labor of running off an edition of five thousand four hundred copies by this slow and tedious process can be readily imagined. The introduction of steam for the Adler was therefore a great step forward in this branch of industry. It saved much labor and shortened the time of producing the issue for readers at home and abroad. This same power was used for some time in printing the Berks and Schuylkill Journal and the Reading Gazette and Democrat.

1 Ritter & Co. published an English weekly, entitled Berks and Schuylkill County Messenger, in February, 1816. When it was begun, or how long it was continued, I could not ascertain.

1 The power-press was introduced about that time.

Charles Kessler became the exclusive owner of the Adler on August 1, 1857, he having previously obtained his mother's interest, and on that day the Ritter interest. The Ritter family had a continuous interest in the publication from 1802 for fifty-five years. Kessler conducted it successfully till April 1, 1864, when he transferred it to William S. Ritter and Jesse G. Hawley. He had been connected with it for forty-four years, having begun as an apprentice in the office in 1820, and advanced through a journeyman printer to editor, part owner and eventually sole proprietor. His long connection with this great and well-established newspaper embraced a very important period in the history of the country. He was a stanch Democrat. At the outbreak of the Rebellion and during its progress he advocated the principles of the Democratic party with zeal and courage.

Shortly after retiring from the Adler he was nominated for the office of associate judge of the county and elected, filling the term from 1866 to 1871. He was recognized as a man of undoubted integrity and impartiality in the performance of his official duties.

Ritter and Hawley resumed the old firm-name of "Ritter & Co." which had been identified with the Adler for over half a century. On January 28, 1868, they instituted a daily English newspaper, called the Daily Eagle, and shortly afterward purchased the well-known and established Reading Gazette and Democrat, an English weekly. They carried on these three publications and also a large general book and stationery store with great success till November 13, 1874, when they dissolved partnership. In the dissolution, Ritter took the German Adler and Hawley the two English newspapers and the store. A prominent publication by the proprietors of the Adler since 1806 was an annual almanac in the German language, entitled "Der Reading Kalender." In the dissolution Mr. Hawley, strange to say, retained this German almanac, for the newspapers taken by him were English. He has published it since.

During the year 1876 Mr. Ritter erected the first imposing, substantial four-story brick printing establishment in Reading, at the southeast corner of Sixth and Court Streets, in which to accommodate the publication of the old and well-supported Adler, and he took possession on January 1, 1877. He conducted this German publication alone for nearly six years; then, on May 1, 1880, he instituted a daily English newspaper, called the Reading Daily News, and on August 27, 1881, also a weekly English newspaper, called the Reading Weekly News. These three newspapers have been published by him successfully since, with increasing patronage and area of circulation from year to year. In 1878 he began the publication of a German almanac, entitled "Der Neue Readinger Adler Kalendar." A large book and stationery store is conducted by him in the same building. His father was a brother of John Ritter. The present size of the Adler sheet is twenty-nine by forty-two inches, with eight columns to each page.

John Ritter was the son of Francis and Barbara Ritter. He was born in Exeter township, near Schwartwald Church, February 6, 1779. He had very restricted advantages of education, even in the German; and instruction in the English language for three months was the sum of his privileges in that line. He continued to labor on his father's farm till his eighteenth year. Then his father bought a half-interest in Der Readinger Adler (a German weekly newspaper, published at Reading), and placed him in the office to learn printing. In 1802 this interest was transferred to him. In 1804 Charles Kessler purchased the other half-interest, and the firm-name became John Ritter & Co. Under this firm-name the publication was continued till his death, and for some years afterward. He died November 24, 1851. Mr. Ritter's private life was exemplary in every respect. He enjoyed the uniform respect and confidence of his fellow-citizens through a long life. He was a conscientious editor, and conducted the Adler with success. His integrity and exactitude in the publication of local news and of election returns were recognized by the whole community. He represented Berks County as one of the five delegates to the State Constitutional Convention in 1837, and he was a member of Congress for this district for two terms, from 1843 to 1847.

William S. Ritter.—The Ritter family is of German origin. Its progenitor was one of the early settlers of Oley (now Exeter) township. His descendants have been in the same locality till now, a period covering over one hundred and fifty years. Francis Ritter, the grandfather of the subject of this sketch, pursued farming successfully till his decease, and

In connection with the newspaper he began and published the Neue Readinger Calender, a German almanac, from 1802 till his death. This almanac is still continued, though issued from the office of a different newspaper publication.

In 1803 he married Catharine Frailey, a daughter of Peter Frailey. Three sons survived him, viz.: Joel, Louis and Aaron.

He was an earnest and active member of the Universalist denomination. He assisted this society in the erection of their church in 1830, left to survive him seven children,—four sons (Daniel, John, Jacob and Samuel) and three daughters (Mrs. Charles Kessler, Mrs. Nicholas Seidel and Mrs. Samuel Christian).

Daniel, the oldest son, was born in Exeter township in the year 1776. He was married to Susanna Snyder, a daughter of Benjamin Snyder, who resided and was brought up in the vicinity, and lived to reach the ripe old age of eighty-four years, she having died in the year 1876. He also pursued the vocation of farming on the old homestead successfully. He died in 1853, aged seventy-seven years. He had nine children,—two died in infancy, and seven survived him, namely: Benjamin, Esther, Daniel, Louisa, Ferdinand, William S. and Franklin.

William Snyder Ritter was born in Exeter township on September 13, 1828. He remained at home with his father till the age of seventeen years, assisting in the farming operations and attending the schools of the township, when he was apprenticed to his uncle, John Ritter, in the Reading Adler office, to learn the art of printing. He finished his trade, and continued in the establishment till 1856, at first as a journeyman printer and then for several years as foreman of the office. Subsequently, for eight years, he was engaged in the mercantile business at Reading, the greater part of the time in partnership with David Keiser.

In 1864, Mr. Ritter and Jesse G. Hawley purchased from Charles Kessler the old and well-established Reading Adler, and under the former name of Ritter & Co., conducted it successfully for ten years. In 1868 this firm started the publication of a daily evening English paper at Reading, which they entitled Reading Daily Eagle, and in the same year they purchased from J. Lawrence Getz the Reading Gazette and Democrat. In 1874 he dissolved partnership with Mr. Hawley, and became the sole proprietor of the Adler. In 1876 he erected the first substantial and extensive printing establishment in Reading, into which he then moved. Shortly afterward he began the publication of a daily evening English newspaper, entitled Reading Daily News, and an English weekly, entitled Reading Weekly News, and a German almanac, entitled, Der Neue Reading Adler Calendar. He has conducted all of these publications since with success. In politics his newspaper publications are exponents of Democratic principles, he himself being a thorough Democrat. In 1875 he was a delegate to the Democratic State Convention, which assembled at Erie, and nominated Hon. Cyrus L. Pershing for Governor.

Mr. Ritter represented his ward in Common Council three terms—1861-62, 1864-65 and 1874-76. He was president of this branch during his second term, and took an active part in the proceedings of Councils which resulted in the purchase of the Reading Water-Works. And he served two terms as a prison inspector, from 1877 to 1882, filling the office of president during the entire time. In these positions he won the high esteem of his colleagues by a quiet, straightforward and impartial course in the discharge of his official duties. In matters of public interest and general improvement he ever displayed a spirit of progress; and these have his constant recognition in his several publications, as a means of developing and enriching our community.

The Agricultural Society of the county has received his earnest encouragement for many years. He is the treasurer of the society, having filled this office very acceptably for the last twelve years. He has now been in active public service, of one kind or another, for upward of twenty years, without compensation. His selection, in this time, for official positions attests for him strongly the unusual degree of confidence and popularity which he enjoys in this community.

He was married, in 1853, to Julianna Shearer, daughter of Jonathan Shearer. He has seven children,—two daughters and five sons, all of the latter being practically engaged in the printing business with him. They are named Milford Newton, Jonathan Shearer, William Clinton, Francis Daniel, Henry Snyder, Laura (intermarried with William F. Shaneman), and Annie.

BERKS AND SCHUYLKILL JOURNAL.—This newspaper was founded by George Getz.1 The first number was issued on June 8, 1816, in folio form, twenty by twenty-four inches, with four columns to each page. It was then the only English newspaper in the county. In 1818 a column was added to each page. Getz continued to publish it for over seventeen years. His last number was No. 29 of Vol. 17, issued on December 1, 1832. He then transferred it in a flourishing condition to David F. Gordon, a lawyer who had settled in Reading at 1824.

Gordon was a Whig. In announcing his principles, upon assuming control of the paper, he said, among other things,—

“This paper is steadfastly devoted to the interests of our Republican Institutions; and decidedly opposed to any measure having the remotest tendency to violate the constitution, to infringe upon the rights of conscience or to lessen the sovereign authority of the people.”

And he paid a high compliment to Mr. Getz by saying publicly that “his predecessor had conducted the paper with a sedulous attention to the admission of such matters only as might be circulated without injury to the public morals or offense to the interests of religion and virtue, for which he was given liberal and extensive encouragement.” It continued under his management for six years, with increasing patronage. During that time he advocated the political principles of the Whig party.

On January 6, 1838, Henry Rhoads and John S. Richards, young attorneys of the Berks County bar, obtained control and increased its size to twenty-four by thirty-four inches, with six columns to each page.

They were introduced to the public as “staunch Whigs, who will keep unchanged the political principles advocated by the paper.” They together published it for one year, when Rhoads withdrew to resume his law practice. Richards issued the publication till December 28, 1844. It was under his direction a strong advocate of the principles of the Whig party, and it espoused the cause of the common-school system of education in a manner as remarkable for its boldness, surrounded, as it was, by obstructionists and a large majority against the system, as for its sound perception and good sense. The policy of “protection to home industry” found a devoted friend in the Journal. In this respect it pursued a course directly opposite from that of the Adler.

Jacob Knabb then assumed the editorial management of the newspaper and issued the first number of a new year on January 4, 1845. He had entered the printing establishment of George Getz in 1829 as an apprentice, and, after having completed his term of service, followed his chosen occupation here and elsewhere during the succeeding sixteen years. In that time he founded and published, with J. Lawrence Getz, the Reading Gazette, and conducted the Clay Bugle, a campaign newspaper, in 1844 at Harrisburg. He entered this new arena with large experience as a practical printer and journalist, and this experience enabled him to take hold of the Journal and direct its publication in the same channel which had been so ably and thoroughly prepared for it by his predecessors. Forty-one years have since elapsed; but notwithstanding the numerous changes in the community in this long period of time, the Journal continues in the same successful channel. In 1866, Mr. Knabb admitted as partners with him in its ownership and editorship Jacob K. Sterrett and Thomas C. Zimmerman, the former having learned the art of printing under him, and been connected with his establishment for some years previously, and the latter having come from Lebanon a practical printer. In December, 1878, William Sterrett took the interest of his father. The present size of the sheet is thirty by forty-six inches, with nine columns to each page.

The Journal was founded just as the internal improvements of the town began in earnest.
The three turnpikes (with their termini concentrating at Reading) and the Harrisburg Bridge had been completed shortly before. Then the canals followed, and the railways. Common-school education was instituted. The borough was advanced into a city, with its streets laid out, extended and regulated, its buildings and industries increased and its population multiplied from four thousand to fifty thousand, and that of the county from forty-five thousand to one hundred and thirty thousand. The Mexican War was fought and the annexation of Texas successfully accomplished, and the terrible convulsions of civil strife were endured and overcome. The dominant political party in the county maintained its power with increasing strength, aided by almost continuous success in State and national affairs, till 1860. Newspapers began, flourished for a time and fell. Panics came and went, but the Journal survived them all—panics and wars, even weakness of its own local political parties, which were without prestige, patronage or power. And yet in the midst of all these things it advocated common schools and protection to home industry with remarkable courage and persistence, notwithstanding the great majority of the people round about were opposed to these two great policies. The former of these policies is now settled, and has been for thirty years; but the latter is still debated as the one great issue which divides the principal parties here and elsewhere in the country. The Adler and the Journal have now circulated together for seventy years. Both have been successfully conducted from the beginning till now, though in different political channels entirely adverse to each other.

George Getz was born at Lancaster, Pa., on July 18, 1789. He learned the printing business in the Lancaster Journal office. At an early age he entered the service of the United States, as a midshipman in the navy. He took part in the memorable naval engagement between the British ship "Peacock" and the United States ship-of-war "Hornet," under Captain James Lawrence, and he also performed active service in several minor naval exploits. Towards the close of 1813 he resigned his post in the navy, and accepted the appointment of lieutenant in the army from President Madison. He served with credit till the close of the war. In 1818 he moved to Reading, and instituted a weekly English newspaper, entitled Berks and Schuylkill Journal. He conducted this newspaper with boldness and success for a period of sixteen years, when he sold it to David E. Gordon, Esq. At the time of founding this newspaper, it was the only English publication in the county—the Weekly Advertiser having suspended shortly before. It has been continued with increasing success till now—for the last forty years by Jacob Knabb.

Mr. Getz took an active interest in elevating the standard of the volunteer militia at Reading. In 1821 he organized a company under the name of the "Reading Guards," and held the office of captain for a number of years. Subsequently, in 1827, he was elected major of the First Battalion of Reading Volunteers, which was composed of the "Reading Artillers" (commanded by Captain Daniel de B. Keim), Lafayette Guards (commanded by Captain Solomon Foster) and the Reading Guards (commanded by Mr. Getz).

In addition to his editorial duties, he edited and published several books of general utility. One of these was a volume of forms in conveyancing, which passed through several editions, and became popular and widely known in Pennsylvania as "Getz's Forms." The last enlarged edition was published in 1845, and reprinted by a Philadelphia firm in 1850. It is still in use by many of the older conveyancers of this State.

After retiring from the publication of the Journal, Mr. Getz traveled for a time in the Western States, and then opened and carried on at Reading a general book and stationery store, in which he continued for some years.

In 1849 he was elected to the office of mayor of Reading—the third official elected since the incorporation of the city in 1847, and he was re-elected three successive times. This re-election was a high compliment to him as a citizen, and as an official of a rapidly-growing city. He died on February 10, 1853, in his sixty-fourth year, whilst holding this office; and both branches of Councils assembled in joint convention on the following day, and passed resolutions highly complimentary to him. His body was buried in the Episcopal burying-ground, and subsequently removed to Charles Evans' Cemetery.

Jacob Knabb.—Michael Knabb was born at Pfeldersheim, in Pfalz, a Rhenish province of Bavaria (which formerly belonged to France, and was restored to Bavaria in 1813), on the 17th day of April, 1717. He emigrated to this country, as near as can be ascertained, about the year 1737, in company with his two brothers, John and Peter, and settled in Oley township, on the farm now occupied by Samnel B. Knabb, near the line of Exeter township. The old house was destroyed by fire in the winter of 1816–17, and the present house erected in the summer of the same year. A family grave-yard near the dwelling contains the remains of the three brothers and a number of their descendants. These are the only persons of this name who are known to have at any time emigrated from Europe to America. John died single, in the forty-eighth year of his age. Peter died in the seventy-fourth year of his age, and his descendants are now very numerous, most of them residing in Berks County.

Michael Knabb was married to Eve Magdalena Seltzer, only child of Jacob and Elizabeth Seltzer, of Heidelberg township, on the 11th day of March, 1755. He died June 17, 1778, in the sixty-second year of his age, and was buried in the family grave-yard in Oley township. Eight children survived him,—Nicholas, Peter, Jacob, Daniel, Susan, Sarah, Catharine and Mary.

Jacob Knabb, the third son of Michael Knabb, the father of the subject of this sketch, was born in Oley township in 1771. In 1800 he was married to Hannah Yoder, a daughter of Daniel Yoder, who was a son of John Yoder, of Oley township. The Yoder family in this county descended from John (Hansel) Yoder, a Huguenot, who emigrated with his brother, Yost Yoder, from Switzerland in the early part of the eighteenth century on account of religious persecution, proceeding first to England and thence to Pennsylvania, where they were amongst the early settlers of Oley township.

John settled on a tract adjoining Pleasantville about 1720, and their descendants in the direct line have continued till now, a period covering one hundred and sixty years. He had married in Switzerland and brought his wife with him. They had six children, amongst them John Yoder, who was the grandfather of Hannah Yoder. John Yoder was married to a daughter of Martin Schenkel, and had two sons, Daniel and Jacob. Jacob migrated from Oley to Ohio at an early period and was the first person who went down the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers in a flat-boat. Daniel remained in Oley and was married to Margaret Oyster and had eight children,—Hannah, Daniel, Martin, Catharine, Mary, John, Margaret and David. Catharine, married to William Willman, lived to reach the surprising age of ninety-nine years.

Jacob Knabb, soon after his marriage with Hannah Yoder, moved to Union township and there carried on farming successfully. He died in February, 1825, leaving to survive him six children,—Daniel, George, Jacob, Margaret, Catharine and Hannah. His wife died previously, in August, 1824.

Jacob Knabb, the youngest of the sons named and the subject of this biographical sketch, was born in Union township on August 21, 1817. His parents died when he was only seven years old, and until his eleventh year he was sent to the pay schools which the township afforded, having lived during this time with an elder sister. He then apprenticed himself to the business of printing under George Getz, in the office of the Berks and Schuylkill Journal, and continued there till Mr. Getz transferred the newspaper and printing establishment to David F. Gordon, Esq., which terminated his apprenticeship. Being desirous of extending his education, he then took a course of study for a year at the Lititz School, and subsequently another year at Lafayette College, and afterwards till 1840 he was engaged at printing, part of the time at Reading and the remainder at Harrisburg. Whilst at the latter place he was in the office of the Harrisburg Telegraph, at which the printing for the State was then done. The Colonial Records were being printed at this establishment and he held the position of foreman for a time.

In 1840 Mr. Knabb, with J. Lawrence Getz as co-partner, began the publication of an English weekly newspaper at Reading which they entitled Reading Gazette. He was interested in the publication of this paper till 1843, when he sold his share in the enterprise and removed to Harrisburg, where, in 1844, he began a campaign paper entitled the Clay Bugle, and published it during the Clay and Polk Presidential campaign, giving it a popularity and success equal to any other Whig paper issued in the State.

In January, 1845, Mr. Knabb became the editor of the Berks and Schuylkill Journal, a well-established Whig paper at Reading, and some years after its proprietor. He has continued its regular and successful publication from that time till now, a period covering forty-one years. In 1866 he associated two co-partners with himself and conducted the newspaper under the firm-name of J. Knabb & Co. In 1869 his firm purchased the Reading Daily Times and several years afterward the Evening Dispatch, consolidating the two under the title Reading Times and Dispatch. They have published these two papers—daily and weekly—till now, with increasing success. In 1881 he erected the fine, commodious and substantial four-story brick building which the firm is occupying in conducting their business of publication and printing. He has occupied this locality without change for over thirty years.

Mr. Knabb, upon attaining his majority, became a Whig in politics. From that time till now he has been prominently identified with the Whig and the Republican parties, acting for some years as chairman of the County Republican Committee. In 1860 he was a delegate to the Chicago Convention, from the Berks District, which nominated Abraham Lincoln for president. In the matters of protection to home industry, of general education through the common-school system and of local and internal improvements he has been a firm believer, giving them through the Journal and the Times unqualified recognition and encouragement. The “Reading Library” has received his active assistance for many years, being now, and having been for some time, one of its managers. Its collection of books was in his old printing establishment, No. 11 N. Sixth Street, from the time when they were removed from the “Reading Academy” building till they were placed in its present building—Library Hall. He was a fearless advocate for upholding the government in its great efforts to sustain the Union during the terrible convulsions of civil strife. In this period, under the administration of President Lincoln, he held the office of postmaster of Reading; and in 1876 he was the Presidential elector from this Congressional district to the college which cast its ballot for Hayes, President, and Wheeler, Vice-President. His prominence in local politics won for him the recognition of the national and State administrations in the distribution of political patronage during the twenty-five years that the Republican party was in power. The leaders of the party were his associates, including such prominent men as John S. Richards, Levi B. Smith, William M. Baird, Jacob Hoffman, Dr. Diller Luther, Dr. Edward Wallace, G. A. Nicolls, Isaac Eckert, Edward Brooke, A. F. Boas, Alexander P. Tutton and Henry S. Kupp. These were men distinguished for large intelligence, experience and influence. Such were, indeed, necessary in an agitated condition of the community during the Civil War; but they were equal to the occasion of preserving its equanimity and of directing its thoughts and feelings towards subserving the public welfare.

In 1878 Mr. Knabb, with Mr. William H. Levan, of Schuylkill Haven, as a traveling companion, made an extended tour through Great Britain, France, Switzerland, Italy and Germany, visiting all the places of importance in these several old and historic countries. In the course of his travels he forwarded numerous interesting letters, which were published in the Times and Journal. They were highly appreciated by the community for their clear and sententious style and their valuable information, and the general interest in them grew to such an extent that he was invited to issue them in book-form, but he modestly declined to gratify this desire of many friends.

In 1856 he published the first “Directory of Reading.” This volume is rare and valuable, after the lapse of thirty years. It affords abundant evidence of his enterprise in behalf of serving the public. It contains a large collection of valuable information relating to Reading of that period, including a complete list of the taxable inhabitants of the several wards of the borough for the year 1806.

Mr. Knabb was married in 1846 to Ellen C., daughter of Machiavel Andrews, a lady highly esteemed for her many excellent qualities, a devoted member of Christ Episcopal Church and to the poor people of Reading a great friend, who was ever solicitous for their relief and welfare. During the Civil War she was particularly active in kindly assistance to the sick soldiers in our local hospital, and in matters pertaining to the Sanitary Fair at Philadelphia, having had charge of one of the departments. She died in 1875, leaving a devoted husband and many sincere friends to mourn her departure. In 1879 he was married to Ellen M., a daughter of Mr. James Jameson, a very successful merchant and now the oldest surviving business man in Reading.

In religious belief, Mr. Knabb is an Episcopalian. He became a member of this church at Reading in 1848, being now one of the oldest surviving members. He is at present, and has been for some years, a vestryman of the church. In character, manner and deportment he is unassuming and straightforward; and in his business and social relations he enjoys the confidence and esteem of the entire community.

Jacob K. Sterrett was born in Union township, Berks County, May 1, 1827. His father, David Sterrett, was a native of Cumberland County, Pennsylvania, and died in Berks County, in 1833, having previously to his location here traveled extensively throughout the United States, and compiled a dictionary of the Chippewa language.

When thirteen years of age he entered the printing-office of Knabb & Getz, (who then published the Reading Gazette) as an apprentice, to learn the trade of a printer, and continued in this office till 1845, when he entered the office of the Berks and Schuylkill Journal. After being in this office twenty years he became one of the proprietors of the Journal. He continued his business connection with the firm of J. Knabb and Co., publishers of the Journal and Times, till December, 1881, when, on account of ill health, he transferred his interest to his son William. He died November 2, 1884. He was a superior printer and an enterprising journalist. During his connection with the Journal and Times he contributed occasionally articles of rare interest. He was particularly fond of local reminiscences, and by the aid of a strong memory and a facile pen, he published a series of historical sketches, which related to the early times of Reading. He was a great reader and became familiar with the standard literature of his time. He was partial to the works of Moore, Poe, Irving and Cooper. His nature was of a most genial kind, which won him many friends. Though positive in his actions, he created no enmities.

In the early history of the St. Matthew's Lutheran Church he was one of its vestrymen; and when the Reading Musical Society was in its active existence, previous to 1860, he was a prominent member.

He always resided here in Berks County. For several months about the beginning of the year 1853 he was in South Carolina, engaged as a journeyman printer on the legislative proceedings of that state.

Mr. Sterrett was an active Republican and took an earnest part in the management of the Republican party in Berks County. He frequently represented his district in local conventions, and his party here in State and national conventions—having been a delegate to the National Republican Convention which assembled at Cincinnati and nominated Hayes. He acted as a jury commissioner of the county for the years 1881 and 1882. During the Civil War he enlisted twice,—first in Captain Bickley’s company, which served in the emergency of 1862, and then, in 1863, in Captain Rhoads’ company, Forty-second Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Militia. Before the Civil War he took an active part in the military affairs of the county for some years, having been a member of the Ringgold Light Artillery, commanded by Captain James McKnight.

Mr. Sterrett was married to Anna M. Arnold, (a daughter of John Arnold, of Reading) in 1855, and had three surviving children,—William, Henry and Ellen.

THOMAS C. ZIMMERMAN, publisher, editor and translator, was born at Lebanon, Pa., on the 23d of January, 1838, and was educated in the common schools of that place. At thirteen years of age he was apprenticed to the printing business in the office of the Lebanon Courier. After the expiration of his apprenticeship he was employed for a short time in the office of the Philadelphia Inquirer, but soon thereafter, January 8, 1856, removed to Reading, where he entered the office of the Berks and Schuylkill Journal as a journeyman printer. He remained here until the fall of 1859, when he went to Columbia, S. C., where he worked on the State laws in the printing establishment of Dr. Robert Gibbs, who subsequently became surgeon-general of the Confederate army. On his way thither, while passing through Virginia, Mr. Zimmerman witnessed the great excitement incident to the John Brown insurrection. While on his way to Richmond he was grossly insulted by a number of Southern soldiers who were on the train, their indignation having been excited by seeing a copy of the New York Tribune in his hands, and which he had been quietly reading. During his stay in Columbia, for having expressed sympathy for a poor fellow who had been tarred and feathered for mere opinion sake he, too, was threatened with a like indignity. It was at this time, it should be remembered, that the preliminary legislation looking towards disunion was being formulated. Secession was discussed at all hours of the day and night. Rumors of slave insurrections were rife, proclamations summoning the citizens to arms were issued and the people were terrified as never before. Northern men were eyed with suspicion, and their movements were closely watched. Postal communication with the North was temporarily suspended. The Confederate gray cloth, which was afterwards worn so extensively during the war, was being manufactured for the first time in that city. Peace commissioners were appointed to represent the Southern States at Washington in the interest of general harmony, and for the uninterrupted preservation of slavery. Soldiers were drilling almost nightly throughout the city. John Brown was burnt in effigy on the streets of Columbia in the presence of the multitude. The excitement was intense, and foreshadowed the approaching storm. Even the condemnation of a great wrong like the tarring and feathering of a poor wretch, whose only offense consisted in a justification, among his fellow-workmen, of the John Brown raid, was construed into an evidence of avowed hostility to the interests of the South, and indignities of one kind or another were swiftly visited upon such offenders. A single example will illustrate this: One day, while Mr. Zimmerman and Mr. Thomas Scott (the latter long a resident of Columbia, and foreman of the State printing-office) were on their way to dinner together, Mr. Scott, addressing Mr. Zimmerman, was overheard, while passing the guard-house, in a mild denunciation of the tarring and feathering outrage which had just been committed. A half-hour had scarce elapsed ere a notice was served by the mayor on Mr. Scott to “leave the town within forty-eight hours, or take the consequences.” It is needless to add that he left, Mr. Zimmerman remaining, however, for a short time, but under the added suspicion which such association and presumed sympathy with so grave an offender carried with it towards him in the eyes of Southern people.

In March, 1860, Mr. Zimmerman returned to Reading, and re-entered the office of the Berks and Schuylkill Journal. In May of that year Mr. Jacob Knabb, proprietor of the Journal, was appointed postmaster of Reading. Upon taking possession of the office Mr. Zimmerman became his chief clerk, continuing in this position until the close of Postmaster Knabb’s term, July, 1865. He again returned to the Journal office, and in January following he was admitted as a partner and became associate editor. From that time till now he has been identified with the publishing firm of J. Knabb & Co. In 1869 the firm became the proprietors of the Reading Daily Times, and in 1871 of the Evening Dispatch, when these two papers were consolidated into the Times and Dispatch. He has been the editor of this daily newspaper ever since.

During the Civil War in 1863, he enlisted in Captain D. G. Rhoads’s company, Forty-second Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Militia.

In the course of his journalistic experience he has visited numerous points of public interest throughout the country. His published letters descriptive of these visits in the Times and Journal were widely copied. One of these—his description of the Luray Caverns in Virginia—was published in pamphlet form, illustrated, by the proprietors of the Hotel and Cave Company, who printed upwards of sixty thousand copies for general circulation. A representative of the Smithsonian Institution prepared about the same time a scientific report of his investigations of this great natural and geological curiosity—the two having been distributed simultaneously by the proprietors of the caverns. Mr. Zimmerman’s letter having been reproduced in some of the Richmond papers and other Southern journals, he shortly afterwards received an invitation to write up the undeveloped resources of Alabama.

Mr. Zimmerman’s Pennsylvania German extraction naturally interested him in the capabilities of the vernacular, and so, several years ago, he began the translation of poems from the English classics into that dialect. His first attempt, Moore’s “‘Twas the Night before Christmas,” was received with marked favor by the press of the State. Congratulatory letters from prominent men came in from all sides, among them from the late Professor Haldeman (the eminent philologist of the University of Pennsylvania), Hon. Simon Cameron, Governor Hartranft, P. F. Rothermel (painter of the “Battle of Gettysburg”), Professor Porter (Lafayette College), Professor Horne (of Muhlenberg College), and H. L. Fisher, Esq., of York. Other translations from "Barry Cornwall," Tom Hood, Oliver Goldsmith, Heine, the Greek Anthology, etc., followed. Some of these have been selected and are introduced in this history in the chapter on "Language, Manners and Customs."

During the past year Mr. Zimmerman has made translations from the German classics into the English. These have been received with even greater favor than the translations into the Pennsylvania German. Among the commendations received by him were letters from B. P. Shillaber ("Mrs. Partington"), S. L. Clemens ("Mark Twain") and Dr. Frank Cowan. In all these translations, whether from the English into the Pennsylvania German, from the Scottish into the same dialect, or from the German into the English, Mr. Zimmerman has shown remarkable aptitude and skill. He not only invariably preserves the exact measure of the original poems, but the rhythmical beat of each syllable with remarkable fidelity. Rarely, indeed, does he resort to the transposition of the author's lines as an easier method of translation, as may be seen in his published efforts in the files of the Times and Journal, where they appear every Saturday in parallel columns. The range of his selections is extended, and comprehends many of the best lyric productions of the most noted authors. His library of German poetical works, among them twenty-seven volumes from an admirer, resident in Berlin, Germany, is the gift of friends in attestation of the appreciation of the excellence of his efforts at translation.

Mr. Zimmerman has had many tempting offers to relinquish his journalistic work, but in all cases these were declined. A brother editor's opinion of him will serve to show the estimate in which his extraordinary journalistic abilities are held:

"Mr. Zimmerman is a writer of force and ability. His writings are pure, easy and graceful in diction. He is witty and humorous when occasion demands. In controversy he is gentlemanly at all times, and in argument he is fair and generous to his opponents. He has a genuine taste for literature, poetry and the fine arts, as many of his articles attest. He is one of the ablest writers in the old commonwealth. Many of his articles show alike the eye of the artist and the hand of the litterateur." One of Reading's foremost pulpit orators once said, in a published article concerning Mr. Zimmerman's management of the Times: "In his 'History of American Literature,' Professor Nichols says of Edgar A. Poe's poems, 'in their purity, simplicity and sweetness they stand forth from the confusion of their author's life like white nuns in a corrupt and contentious city.' So the editorial conduct of the Reading Times stands forth in this city," etc.

Mr. Zimmerman was married to Tamsie T. Kauffman, of Reading, on June 11, 1867.

Mr. Zimmerman is an ardent lover of nature, and evidently believes, with a distinguished writer and fellow-pedestrian, that "the shining angels second and accompany the man who goes afoot, while all the dark spirits are ever looking out for a chance to ride."

Chronicle of the Times.—This newspaper was instituted by Samuel Myers and Douglass W. Hyde with the title—Chronicle of the Times and Berks and Schuylkill Advertiser. It was an English weekly paper, on a sheet twenty-one by twenty-eight inches, with six columns on each page. The first number was issued on May 9, 1822. In 1823 the latter half of the title was dropped; with the beginning of its tenth year the title was changed to The Reading Chronicle. Robert Johnston had become the proprietor several years previously,—possibly as early as 1826,—there being no file for reference, and therefore I cannot state the time with exactness. On September 27, 1831, Jesse James became the proprietor and editor, issuing his first number of the paper on the 4th of October following. In politics it had been previously devoted to the principles of the Democratic party; but with the ownership and direction in Mr. James it became Democratic-Republican. It was conducted in a spirited and successful manner by Mr. James till March 5, 1833, when it was purchased by one of its founders, Douglass W. Hyde, who restored the original title. In November, 1835, Lloyd Wharton, Esq., an attorney at Reading, became the owner. Mr. Wharton not being able to conduct its publication in connection with his law practice, placed it under the editorial management of William F. Elseley, a practical printer of Reading. It was issued successfully till the close of the Presidential campaign of 1836, when Mr. Wharton suspended its publication and sold the printing establishment, with all its material, to Samuel Myers, who was then publishing the Berks County Press at Reading.

Der Readinger Post-Bote (The Reading Courier) was a German weekly. It was begun by Charles A. Bruckman on August 3, 1816, in opposition to the Readinger Adler. He continued its publication for ten years with ability and success.

Charles A. Bruckman was the son of Carl A. Bruckman, a Saxon, and was born in Amsterdam, in the year 1792, whilst his father was on the way emigrating to this country. He learned the trade of printer under his father at Reading. In 1816 he started a Federal German newspaper, and conducted its publication for ten years. He was an earnest advocate for the election of Hon. Joseph Hiester for Governor. Subsequently he was a supporter of General Jackson for President. He died in 1828.

Jackson Democrat.—About the time the Post-Bote was discontinued, Charles J. Jack instituted an English weekly, called the Jackson Democrat. This was during the fall of 1826. But it had a short existence—surviving only several months.

Readinger Democrat (The Reading Democrat) was a German weekly, instituted by Jeremiah Schneider (a son of Jacob Schneider, who assisted in founding the Adler) and Samuel Myers, on October 4, 1826. It was published by them for several years, when Daniel Rhoads became the owner. Rhoads conducted it till July, 1833, and then transferred it to Mr. Myers. It was continued by Mr. Myers, under a new name, Der Democrat, till February, 1835, and then discontinued. For some time before its discontinuance, Charles F. Egelman was associated with Mr. Myers in its publication. The size of these newspapers was eighteen by twenty-four inches, with four columns on each page.

Charles Frederick Egelman was born at Osnabrück, in Hanover, on May 12, 1782, and emigrated to this country in 1802, landing at Baltimore. He learned the trade of coach-making and remained there for a time, when he removed to Berks County. His last piece of work executed there was the body of a coach for Jerome Bona parte. He was then engaged at teaching for a number of years, officiating in this time also as organist for several German Churches in country districts. About 1830 he settled at Reading and assisted in the publication of a German newspaper, entitled Der

Reading Democrat. He was recognized as a man of great scientific attainments, having been particularly accomplished in astronomy. His ability in this branch of learning was utilized for the period of forty-three years in furnishing astronomical calculations for the principal almanacs published in the United States. The study of perpetual motion received his earnest attention for a number of years, he having devised and constructed various machines in his efforts towards accomplishing this object, regarded as impossible. In the matter of copper-plate engraving he was a skillful artist, and executed a number of superior designs. He died at Reading, November 30, 1860, aged nearly seventy-nine years. His residence was at the northwest corner of Ninth and Penn Streets. He left to survive him seven children, —Ferdinand; Edward; Charlotte, married to Daniel Hafer; Julia, married to Henry Hafer; Wilhelmina, married to Solomon Seidel; Catherine, married to John Brissel; and Amelia, married to Dr. H. W. Bergner,—and two children (Solomon and Lydia) of a deceased daughter, Henrietta, who had been married to Solomon Seidel.

Berks County Press. Upon the suspension of Der Democrat, Samuel Myers began an English weekly paper, in size, twenty by thirty-two inches, six columns on each page, with the title Berks County Press. The first number was issued March 10, 1835. About 1840 he introduced his son, John C. Myers, a practical printer, as a joint owner and editor. About 1854 he retired, transferring his interest to his son, Henry R. Myers, also a practical printer. Franklin L. Myers was the last publisher, who sold it to Rauch, Lacier & Co., proprietors of the Evening Record. It was published till November, 1865, when it was suspended. In 1854 the size was increased to twenty-four by thirty-six inches, with seven columns on each page. It was a radical advocate of Democratic principles, and conducted for nearly thirty years. Its able management by Mr. Myers and his sons won for it a strong patronage. During its publication John C. Myers was in the Assembly for three years, 1847 to 1849.

Samuel Myers was born near Morgantown, in Chester County, in 1800. When twelve years of age he removed to Reading. Some years afterward he entered the printing-office of George Getz and learned the art of printing. In 1821 he was married to Mary, daughter of John Christine, of Reading. He was connected with the publications of newspapers at Reading from 1822 for a period upward of thirty years, principally the Chronicle of the Times, Readinger Democrat and Berks County Press. His name is mostly associated with the latter. He died in 1870, leaving to survive him a widow and four sons, John C., Henry C., Franklin L. and Albert, all of whom had learned and followed printing under him.

Liberale Beobachter.—The German newspapers published at Reading during the course of its history as a borough for over forty years were altogether Democratic in political faith.¹ A German Catholic Whig then appeared upon the field of journalism and broke the monotony in this respect by instituting a German weekly newspaper whose mission was to advocate and disseminate Whig principles. This was Arnold Puwelle, a man recognized for his unpretentious, straightforward demeanor. He entitled his paper Liberale Beobachter (Liberal Observer). The first number was issued in September, 1839. In 1858 it was said by a contemporary to be, in the cause of Whig and afterward Republican principles, “consistent, never swerving from its allegiance to the good old cause.” It had a large circulation. Puwelle continued its publication successfully till May 10, 1864. Then a new character, humorous, if not erratic, appeared upon the stage. This was Edward H. Rauch. He purchased the Beobachter. Not regarding the title as definite in respect to locality, he substituted the name of the county, calling the paper the Berks County Zeitung. The first number was issued on May 5, 1864. It was devoted to the measures for the vigorous and successful prosecution of the “War for the Union;” but its earnest endeavors in this behalf were soon exhausted, not for the want of energy and ability and courage, but for the want of sufficient patronage from the German people of the community which it was named to represent, they, apparently, having still clung too devotedly to its aged and well-established contemporary—the Adler.

Arnold Puwelle was born in Westphalia, Prussia, in 1809. He emigrated to Pennsylvania when twenty-five years old and settled at Skippackville, Montgomery County. He there carried on the occupation of a stone-mason for a time and then the publication of a German weekly newspaper, entitled Freiheits Wächter. In 1839 he removed to Reading and shortly afterwards started a German weekly called Der Liberale Beobachter, which he continued to publish successfully till May, 1864, when he sold ¹It would seem from a local notice in the Journal that Charles F. Egelman had started a Whig weekly paper, in the German language, on May 6, 1884, bearing the title, The Berks County Adler, but I have not been able to ascertain any particulars respecting the continuance of its publication.

the printing-office and the newspaper to E. H. Rauch, who merged it with the Berks County Zeitung. A complete file of the Beobachter is amongst the valuable collection of the Pennsylvania Historical Society at Philadelphia. It was Republican in politics. He took an active part in the conventions and work of the Republican party in this county. Upon withdrawing from the business of newspaper publication, he continued to carry on a book and stationery-store till his decease, on September 14, 1879. In 1860 he acted as a deputy-marshal in enumerating the census of this district. During the Civil War, when small denominations of money were scarce, he was the first business man to issue personal scrip. It circulated freely upon his good credit and was entirely redeemed. He was a Roman Catholic, highly esteemed for his quiet, unpretentious manners.

Reading Gazette and Democrat.—On the 9th of May, 1840, Jacob Knabb and J. Lawrence Getz began the publication of a neutral family newspaper, called the Reading Gazette, with three hundred subscribers. Mr. Getz became the sole owner in November, 1846. Mr. Knabb sold his interest in 1844. William H. Boyer owned the interest of Mr. Getz for several years, the publication having been carried on by the firm of Knabb & Boyer. The size of the sheet was twenty-four by thirty-six inches.

The Jefferson Democrat was instituted about the beginning of the year 1838, by Robert W. Albright. In June, 1841, it was sold to A. S. Whitman, who conducted it for a short time; and afterward, till 1848, it was owned and issued by Joel Ritter, Henry Longenecker and Reinhart (John M.) & Snyder (Geo. B.) It was then purchased by Mr. Getz, who consolidated the two papers, under the name of Reading Gazette and Democrat. Under this title the paper was conducted very successfully by Mr. Getz till he was elected to Congress from the district comprising Berks County. During the Civil War he displayed a high order of ability in its publication, first as a Democrat in advocating the principles of the Democratic party, but then as a patriot in standing by the Constitution, in advocating the preservation of the Union and in encouraging voluntary enlistment for carrying on the war successfully for that purpose. His official duties obliged him to sever his connection with this strong and influential publication, and in 1868 he transferred it to William S. Ritter and Jesse G. Hawley. Its size had increased to twenty-eight by forty-two inches. It was then conducted by the firm of Ritter & Co., in connection with the Readinger Adler, a German weekly, and the Daily Eagle, an English weekly, till they dissolved partnership, in November, 1874, when Mr. Ritter retired with the German weekly, and Mr. Hawley continued the publication of the English newspapers.

On September 28, 1878, Mr. Hawley substituted Reading Weekly Eagle in place of the familiar title Gazette and Democrat; and thus ended the career of a superior newspaper which occupied a high position in the journalism of Reading for nearly forty years. Since 1848 it was an able, earnest and successful advocate of the principles of the Democratic party. The Adler was begun in 1796, twenty years afterward the Journal, and twenty-three years more the Gazette. These three publications traveled side by side as companions through the most progressive periods of the county and county-seat,—a progress which arose to a great degree from their own introduction and growth, as well as from the introduction and growth of internal improvements and manufacturing industries; and the names of Ritter, Knabb and Getz became prominent in the field of journalism, just as others in banking, manufactures and politics.

J. Lawrence Getz was born at Reading, September 14, 1821. His father was George Getz, an officer of the United States navy, and founder of the Berks and Schuylkill Journal and its publisher for a number of years. His grandfather, on the maternal side, was a soldier in the Revolution. He received an academic education, read law in the office of Hon. William Strong and was admitted to the bar August 6, 1846; but he never engaged in active practice.

In 1840 he founded and began the publication of the Reading Gazette, an English weekly newspaper at Reading, with Jacob Knabb as a co-partner. Some years afterward he purchased the Jefferson Democrat, and then, as sole propriestor, merged the two into one, and issued the paper under the name of the Reading Gazette and Democrat. He conducted its publication very successfully till 1868. In politics it was a strong advocate of Democratic principles. During the Civil War he was a firm Union man, advocating the preservation of the union of the States and the enforcement of the Constitution. With the national administration in the hands of the Republican party, whose principles were opposed to his own, the course which he pursued in publishing a Democratic newspaper was commendable. His patriotic sentiments contributed much towards creating a proper spirit of submission in the adherents of the Democratic party. As an editor he displayed a high degree of ability and energy.

In 1856 he was elected as one of the representatives of the county to the State Legislature, and re-elected in 1857. During the latter term he was made Speaker of the House by the unanimous nomination of his Democratic colleagues, an evidence of his popularity and ability. In 1866 he was elected to represent this district in the Fortieth Congress of the United States, and re-elected to the Forty-first and Forty-second Congresses, serving three successive terms from March 4, 1867, to March 4, 1873. After his retirement from public life he edited for a time the Spirit of Berks, and he has since been an occasional contributor to the press of Reading and other cities.

Alt Berks.—Alt Berks—Der Stern im Osten (Old Berks—The Star in the East) was a German weekly, instigated by William B. Schöner, on January 28, 1840. It was a Democratic organ, and started out with Martin Van Buren as a Presidential candidate for re-election. It was continued five years by the same publisher and editor, who advocated with earnestness and ability the principles of Democracy. The sheet was twenty-eight by forty-four inches, with five columns to each page. Mr. Schöner sold the paper and printing material to Charles W. Guenther.

Sonne von Alt Berks.—When Charles W. Guenther purchased Alt Berks, he continued its publication under a new title,—Sonne von Alt Berks (Son of Old Berks). Its politics remained the same under his management. It was conducted by him successfully at Reading for three years, when it was sold and transferred to Pottsville, where its title was changed to Pottsville Adler. At the time of its discontinuance here the list of subscribers numbered twelve hundred.

Evening Herald was an English semi-weekly newspaper instituted by Abraham S. Whitman in June, 1846. The size of the sheet was eighteen by twenty-four inches, with five columns to each page. The price was one cent a copy, or one dollar a year. It was continued by him for a year, with increasing patronage. Feeling encouraged in this departure from the weekly issue, he took another step forward, and in June, 1847, he began the publication of the—Morning Herald, as a tri-weekly. In August following he enlarged its size, improved its general appearance and conducted its editorial department, in respect to politics, in a neutral manner, in order to elicit a favorable spirit in the community towards the publication; and he fixed the subscription price at one dollar and twenty-five cents per annum. It was issued on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Saturdays. He stated that the circulation was larger than that of any English newspaper in Reading, and "rapidly increasing." But it was not large enough for the expense, and a short experience compelled him to change the tri-weekly to a weekly, and substitute for its title the—

Reading Herald.—This weekly English paper was issued by Mr. Whitman on Thursdays; size of sheet, twenty-two by twenty-eight inches, with six columns on each page. The price was three cents a copy, or one dollar a year. On July 7, 1849, he began a new volume, price two cents a copy, and dimensions reduced to sixteen by twenty-four inches, and changed the day of issue to Saturday. It was continued till June, 1850, when it was merged in the People's Advocate.

The People's Advocate and Chronicle of the Times was an English weekly neutral newspaper, instituted by A. S. Whitman and Joseph E. Berret on June 20, 1850; size of sheet, twenty by thirty-two inches, six columns on each page, and the price was one dollar a year. In December following, its appearance in a new dress called forth from a cotemporary paper the following complimentary notice: "It has a neat, tasty look, is conducted with much spirit, and deserves to be well patronized." But this patronage, however well deserved, was not realized. Its publication was suspended in July, 1852, the editor (Mr. Whitman) announcing, as a reason, that he gave "too much labor for too little compensation." The subscription list (comprising several hundred subscribers) was transferred to the Gazette and Democrat.

Berks County Democrat was an English weekly newspaper, instituted on September 16, 1858, by Samuel L. Young and Andrew M. Gallade, two young attorneys of the county bar, for the special purpose of advocating the election of John Swartz as the representative to Congress from this district, and of opposing, in connection with many prominent men, that branch of the Democratic party which was known as the "Jones Faction." It was successful in the cause which it espoused. They continued its publication till December, 1858, when they sold it to J. Robley Dunglison, by whom it was issued for some time and then suspended.

The School Album was a school journal instituted September 25, 1858, by two scholars of the "Reading High School," James Millhol-land and Albert R. Durham. It was issued semi-monthly. The price was one dollar per annum. Its publication was continued with energy and success till February 5, 1859, when it was suspended on account of the sickness of the junior editor. At first these enterprising young men had circulated amongst the scholars a written journal entitled The Album. The principal of the school, appreciating their earnest labors in this behalf, encouraged its publication in a printed form.

The Weekly Leader was an English weekly newspaper, begun on the 10th of May, 1860, by J. Robley Dunglison, Esq. He conducted it as a weekly till the 23d of August following, when he suspended its publication for several weeks, whilst preparing to change it into a daily morning paper. He issued the first number of the Daily Leader on the 12th of September, and continued it as a morning paper till March, 1861, when he changed it into an afternoon paper. But as an afternoon daily it had a short life, having suspended with issue No. 159, on the 18th of March.

Reformierten Hausfreund.—This is a German weekly religious newspaper, edited by Rev. Benjamin Bausman D.D., pastor of the St. Paul's Reformed congregation of Reading, and published by Daniel Miller, in the Republikaner building. It was begun in 1867. Its size is thirty-six by forty-eight inches. It is conducted with spirit and success, and devoted mainly to religious topics. Its circulation numbers nearly three thousand, and extends throughout Eastern Pennsylvania, principally, if not altogether, amongst the Pennsylvania Germans.

Banner von Berks.—The Adler continued to be the representative German weekly newspaper of our people for nearly seventy years. It passed through trying periods, but it had nothing to fear, supported as it was by the people in all parts of the county, with comparatively little opposition. In December, 1864, William Rosenthal, a practical printer and editor, and a German scholar, who had resided at Reading for four years, acting as editor-in-chief of the Adler, conceived that this territory would afford sufficient patronage to support another German newspaper, not so much in opposition to or competition with the Adler, as to occupy a new field, and represent the immigrant portion of the German population, just as the Adler represented the sentiments of the German families who had settled here many years before. He therefore began the publication of a German newspaper, and entitled it Banner von Berks. It was an eight-page paper in the beginning, thirty-two by forty-four inches, the printing having been done at Philadelphia, on account of not having a press large enough, and continued to be done there till September, 1867, when the size was reduced and a Sunday paper was established by him, entitled Die Biene, to supply literary matter excluded by the reduction. The size then became twenty-eight by forty-three, four page, with nine columns on each page. It has been issued regularly till now, with increasing patronage. In politics, it is devoted to Democratic principles; but it is not so much inclined to serve party politics as to elevate the notions of the German people, especially those who come as strangers into our community, to a proper conception of their duties, responsibilities and privileges under a free representative government. Its circulation is general throughout the city and extends also into surrounding districts.

Die Biene is the only German Sunday newspaper published in the county. It was established in September, 1867, by William Rosenthal, as a literary supplement to the Banner von Berks when that sheet was reduced in size and a new press was introduced to accommodate his increasing business. It is a folio printed on a sheet twenty by twenty-six inches. Its circulation is mostly in Reading.

Die Deutsche Eiche is a German weekly newspaper issued on Wednesdays. It was established by William Rosenthal on October 19, 1869. It is an eight-page paper, printed neatly on a sheet twenty-six by thirty-six inches. It is the recognized organ of publication for the Order of Harugari in the United States, and has a wide circulation, being addressed weekly to two hundred and seventy-six post-offices. This order was first instituted in the country on March 9, 1847, and afterward (August, 1848) a lodge was begun at Reading named "Hermann," No. 16. Three others were subsequently instituted here. The total membership of the order in the whole country is about twenty-five thousand.

Wilhelm Rosenthal was born November 20, 1823, at Nordhausen, at the foot of the Harz Mountains, in Prussia, and educated in the gymnasium of that place, in which he pursued a collegiate course and graduated in 1840. He then entered the large publication-house of Dr. Philip Phebus and continued there employed for nearly five years. After conducting a publication-house himself for a short time he, in December, 1846, emigrated to America, on a sailing-vessel named "Biene." He landed at New York in May, 1847, and was engaged for several months at practical printing in Ludwig's large establishment. In September following, he moved to Philadelphia and established and carried on a general book-store. Whilst in this business, the Revolution of 1848 in Germany developed considerable excitement among the German citizens of Philadelphia, and he, with other earnest Germans, organized a "German Workingmen's Association," the object of which was to awaken proper sympathy for the movement in behalf of representative government and for the interests of the working people. He was elected as the first president of the association, and re-elected annually for five years. The members numbered one thousand. During that time the association erected a large three-story structure, sand-stone front, on Third Street below Green, and he superintended the building operations. This building is still standing and known as "Mechanics' Hall."

Mr. Rosenthal began his career as an editor in this country in 1848. In May of that year he was employed by F. W. Thomas to assume the editorship of a new daily paper at Philadelphia, entitled Free Press, and its issue was successfully edited by him till 1855. In politics it was Democratic. Then he established and published a German weekly, entitled Wochenschät, continuing its publication for three years, when it was purchased by Hoffman & Morwitz and merged into their paper, known as the New World. This latter paper he then edited till July, 1860, and also acted in that time as assistant editor of the Philadelphia Democrat, which was published by the same firm. Whilst thus employed he received a call to edit the Readinger Adler, and accepting it he removed to Reading.

When Mr. Rosenthal assumed the editorship of the Adler for its proprietor, Mr. Charles Kessler, the country was in a state of political agitation owing to the Presidential campaign of 1860. He was an earnest Democrat, and the Adler was a pronounced advocate of principles similar to his own, so he was in his natural element in directing the publication of this influential paper. The election of Breckenridge was encouraged with all the power that he could command, and he and Major J. Lawrence Getz, of the Gazette and Democrat, held the party together admirably.

The Republican party took the government in hand and the Civil War followed. Mr. Rosenthal, in editing the Adler, advocated the preservation of the Union, but denounced many of the extreme measures brought into effect by the Republican administration in carrying on the war. He was prominent in the Union meetings held at Reading, and exerted himself with success in encouraging voluntary enlistment, especially after the rebels had invaded our State. He continued in this position till Mr. Kessler sold the Adler to Ritter & Hawley, in 1864, and for a short time afterward. In the month of August of that year he was a delegate from Berks County to the Democratic National Convention at Chicago, when General George B. McClellan was nominated for President. This selection was a high compliment to him as a comparative stranger in the county, and indicated that his course as a Democratic editor had been satisfactory to the party in the county.

In that time Mr. Rosenthal had formed a large and favorable acquaintance with the people of our county, and upon retiring from the Adler he established a German weekly, which he named Banner von Berks. It found immediate favor. He has published it since with an increasing success and enlarging circulation. In 1867 he began the publication of a Sunday edition of this paper, under the title of Die Biene (The Bee), naming it after the sailing- vessel which carried him from Hamburg across the Atlantic Ocean to New York, twenty years before. And this was the first Sunday newspaper published in this county, and even in this section of the State. In 1868 he instituted a German daily paper, called the Reading Daily Post, an enterprise in this community, (rapidly growing more and more into English speaking and reading,) which required more than ordinary energy and ability for its successful establishment. He has also published this daily now for seventeen years; and his prominent connection with the Order of Harugari led him to issue a fourth German paper in 1869, entitled Die Deutsche Eiche. This is the official organ of this secret society throughout the United States, and it has a large and wide circulation. These publications by him alone in one printing establishment indicate a man of unusual character, ability and business sagacity.

Mr. Rosenthal has been connected with the building and savings associations of Reading since 1866, either as a director or officer. And besides assisting through them in building up and developing the city of Reading, he, in 1884, erected a row of fine cottages on Mineral Spring Avenue; and he has taken an active part in the musical and literary societies of Reading. In the twenty-five years that he has lived here, Mr. Rosenthal has become thoroughly identified with the progress and welfare of our community.

Republikaner von Berks.—During the Presidential campaign of 1868 a “German Republican Club” was organized at Reading, and, as a means of assisting them in carrying on more successfully their political work in behalf of the Republican party, they instituted a German weekly newspaper, under the title of Republikaner von Berks, and conducted it successfully, with Arnold Puwelle and Charles W. Guenther as editors, for a period of fourteen weeks, till the close of the campaign. The great work of electing General Grant to the Presidency was accomplished, and the newspaper was then suspended. But its suspension was permitted for only a little while. Daniel Miller, a practical printer of Lebanon, and foreman for a time of the Pennsylvania (a German weekly published there), came to Reading on the 1st of January, 1869, and, taking advantage of the opportunity afforded for a German Republican weekly newspaper in the field, which had been developed, but not retained, instituted a publication—Republikaner von Berks. He issued the first number on Jan. 6, 1869. The size was twenty-four by thirty-six inches in folio, with seven columns to each page. Two years afterward he enlarged the size to twenty-six by forty-one inches, with eight columns to each page. This enlargement of a German newspaper with Republican principles in a county largely Democratic indicates admirable management, especially when we consider that the older German residents were passing away, and the gradual development of English education was inclining the people generally towards the English language. He has retained his hold upon the field since with increasing influence. The circulation extends throughout the county and into the borders of the adjoining counties.

Daniel Miller was born in Lebanon County, Pa., on September 19, 1843. He was raised on a farm, and attended the county common schools till his sixteenth year, when he entered the printing-office of the Pennsylvania at Lebanon, and learned the art of printing. Upon finishing his apprenticeship he was made foreman of the office, and continued in that position for ten years. On January 1, 1869, he removed to Reading and began the publication of the Republikaner von Berks, a German weekly newspaper. He has continued its publication regularly till now with increasing success. Besides conducting this newspaper, he has carried on a job printing business, having published a number of books which have had an extensive sale. Prominent among his publications are “Life of Conrad Weiser,” Travels of Rev. Dr. B. Bausman in Europe, “Sinai and Zion,” “Wayside Gleanings,” “Life of Ulric Zwingle.”

He was married in 1865 to Sarah Keller, of NEWSPAPERS.

Lebanon County, Pa., and they have issue four children—Henry K., Franklin C., George (now deceased) and Mary E.

Spirit of Berks was an English weekly newspaper begun on May 6, 1876, by Daniel S. Francis, Isaac Mengel and George M. Mengel. It was a firm advocate of Democratic principles. These publishers conducted its publication successfully till April 13, 1878, when the Mengel brothers withdrew and Mr. Francis became the sole proprietor. The editor of the paper for a time was Garrett B. Stevens, Esq., who was succeeded by J. Lawrence Getz, Esq. Mr. Francis continued to publish the newspaper, with the assistance of Mr. Getz as editor, till November 14, 1881, when he sold it (and the Daily Spirit of Berks, which had been established by him several months before), including the printing materials, to John B. Dampman, who had for a short time filled the position of editor of the two papers. The name was then changed to Weekly Herald.

The Reading Weekly News was instituted by William S. Ritter on August 27, 1881. At this time there were being published at Reading nine weekly newspapers—six German and three English, of both political parties, Democratic and Republican. But Mr. Ritter found a place for the Weekly News, just as he had found a place for the Daily News in 1880, and he has maintained its place since with increasing popularity. It is the representative organ of the Democratic party, and has a general circulation in the city and county. Jacob Weidel, Esq., is editor of the paper.

Reading Weekly Eagle is the title of a large and successful newspaper issued by Jesse G. Hawley, Esq., which was substituted by him on September 28, 1878, in the place of the Reading Gazette and Democrat, a weekly newspaper which had been previously published for nearly forty years. He became a joint owner of this well-established newspaper in 1868, and sole owner in 1874. It has a wide circulation, and contains in each issue a large collection of news from all sections and of interesting articles on various subjects. The editorial department is conducted by Mr. John D. Missimer.

Reading Weekly Herald is the name of a newspaper which was substituted in the place of the Spirit of Berks upon a change of proprietors, in November, 1881. John B. Dampman, Esq., an attorney of the Berks County bar, then purchased the Spirit of Berks, and, after conducting it several weeks, formed a co-partnership with A. C. Buckwalter, a practical and successful newspaper publisher and manager at Reading for a number of years. They changed the name, and under the firm-name of Buckwalter & Dampman they have conducted it since with marked ability and success—the former being manager and the latter editor.

A. C. Buckwalter was born at Phoenixville, Pa., December 4, 1843. He came to Reading in 1850. After attending the common schools for eight years he entered the printing establishment of B. F. Owen, and served an apprenticeship with him. He then worked at the case in the office of the Gazette and Democrat for some time, and afterwards in the office of the Miners' Journal, at Pottsville. During the Civil War, while on his way westward, he enlisted at Cincinnati, entering the navy service on the flag-ship "Louisville" in the Mississippi Squadron, and serving till near the close of the war. Upon his return to Reading he purchased a half-interest in the Evening Dispatch, and assisted in the publication of this daily newspaper for two years. His energy and ability made this enterprise a success. After an extended trip through the Southern States he bought a half-interest in the Daily Times, and conducted its issue successfully till 1869, when it was sold to J. Knabb & Co. He then started and published for a time the Evening Star, a penny paper. Afterward he became the manager of the Eagle printing establishment and continued actively engaged in its successful management for nearly ten years. In 1881 he became interested in the Spirit of Berks publication with John B. Dampman, Esq. They formed a co-partnership, under the name of Buckwalter & Dampman, and changed the name of the newspapers to Reading Daily Herald and Reading Weekly Herald. He has since that time continued his connection with these papers. His energy and courage are creating for these publications an increasing circulation and influence here and in the surrounding counties.

John P. Dampman was born July 29, 1851, in West Nantmeal township, Chester County, Pa., and obtaining an education, attended the Chester Valley Seminary, at Coatesville, Pa., Williston Seminary, East Hampton, Mass., and Pennington Seminary, Pennington, N. J. After graduating from the latter he spent a year at Princeton College. He then returned home and taught school for several years in Chester and Berks Counties. In 1873 he removed to Reading, read law for two years with George F. Baer, Esq., and was admitted to the bar Nov. 8, 1875. He practiced the legal profession for six years, and then directed his attention to the publication of a newspaper, having purchased the Spirit of Berks, an English weekly at Reading. Shortly afterward he became associated with A. C. Buckwalter, and they together began the publication of the Daily Herald and Weekly Herald, which they have published successfully since.

Other weekly newspapers were started and continued for a short time at Reading, prominent among them being, *erks County Legion, Father Abraham, Sunday Dispatch, Saturday Review and Sunday Review.

Newspapers at Kutztown.

Neutralist.—The first newspaper published at Kutztown was the Neutralist. It was a German weekly, instituted by William Harmony. The first number was issued on the 12th of June, 1833. Its editors were Henry Hawrecht (a native of Berlin, Prussia, and formerly, for a time, editor of the Readinger Adler) and Charles Wink (a practical printer, who served an apprenticeship in the Adler printing-office), and its motto was "Jeden das Seine" (Give to each one his due). These editors conducted the paper successfully till the spring of 1841, when they migrated to Ohio, and its publication was suspended.

Geist der Zeit.—This paper (Spirit of the Times) was begun by Hawrecht & Wink on the 1st of June, 1841, upon their return to Kutztown from their Western trip. Hawrecht dying in 1859, its publication was continued till 1863 by his widow, when Mr. William Ro-seuthal, of Reading, purchased it together with the printing-office and all its material. It was printed in German and issued weekly.

Der Hirt.—This newspaper (The Shepherd) was instituted and edited by Rev. J. S. Herman. The first number was issued on the 30th of June, 1854, and its publication was continued two years. Its list of subscribers numbered twenty-two hundred. It was published weekly in the German language.

Kutztown Journal was begun on the 3d of February, 1870, by Isaac F. Christ, and edited, successively, by Charles Kolbe (of Doylestown), — Gelz (of Allentown), F. Konietzks (of Reading), Conrad Gehring (of Reading) and Emil Meister. After publishing the newspaper successfully till March, 1875, he sold it to his (then) editor, Mr. Gehring, and A. B. Urick, of Lebanon, who continued its publication under the name of Urick & Gehring. In September, 1875, they introduced 'steam-power for running their printing-press. The size at first was twenty-four by thirty-six inches. In 1876 it was enlarged to twenty-eight by forty-two, and then it had sixteen hundred subscribers. It is printed in the German language and issued weekly. In 1877 Urick became the sole proprietor, and he has published it regularly since.

National Educator.—This newspaper was also begun by Mr. Christ, in the spring of 1872. It was edited for a time by Professor A. R. Horne, advocating principally the interest and advancement of the common-school system of education. It was issued, at first, monthly, and in size it was sixteen by twenty-four inches. Subsequently it was changed to a weekly. In 1876 the circulation was nine hundred.

American Patriot.—In May, 1874, Isaac F. Christ began the publication of another newspaper, which he entitled American Patriot. It was partly German and partly English. Its size was twenty-four by thirty-six inches. Its publication was placed under the management of Conrad Gehring. In March, 1875, Mr. Christ sold it to Urick & Gehring. In 1876 the circulation was five hundred.

Newspapers at Hamburg.

Hamburger Schnellpost is a German weekly newspaper, published at Hamburg. It was begun by a firm named John Scheifly and William Shubert, in May, 1841, and published by them till April 12, 1842. Then Shubert sold out his interest to M. A. Sellers, a practical printer of Montgomery County, and the paper was issued by Scheifly & Sellers till December 12, 1843, when Mr. Sellers obtained sole control of it.

It was published successfully by Mr. Sellers till March 25, 1845. He then transferred the newspaper and the printing establishment to Charles Bensaman, a young man who had learned the art of printing under him. Bensaman carried it on till 1853, when he died, when it was sold to Moritz P. Doering, who has issued it successfully till now. The old hand-press is still used in printing its weekly editions. In politics it has always been Democratic. Its circulation is mostly at and in the vicinity of Hamburg.

The Hamburg Advertiser was the first English paper of general circulation printed at Hamburg. The first number appeared on July 5, 1865. It was a six-column folio sheet, Republican in politics, started by M. H. Shollenberger, who was editor and publisher. In September, 1865, he sold the paper to O. A. Richards, who published it about a year and then disposed of it to David Q. Guiger, who changed the name to The Hamburg Herald, and as such issued it for two years, when he removed it to Pottstown. Its publication was there continued as the Pottstown Advertiser.

The Rural Press was the next venture in English journalism at Hamburg. It was first issued in the summer of 1872 by J. K. & J. G. Smith. Its publication ceased here in May, 1875, when the office was removed to Saline, Ohio, where the paper is now issued by them under the name of Advance. A portion of the paper was devoted to the cause of education and general literature, under the editorship of Professor H. G. Hunter, who was then the principal of the Hamburg High School. The price was two dollars. The weekly issue numbered five hundred, which circulated at Hamburg and in the surrounding country.

Der Hamburger Berichter was established in 1872 by William F. Tyson. It was a folio German paper with seven columns to a page. After two years of publication it was discontinued and the material removed to Reading.

Hamburg Weekly Item was instituted by Samuel A. Focht on April 17, 1875, in the form of a folio sheet, three columns to a page. The place of publication was in the country, three miles from Hamburg, where Mr. Focht engaged in this enterprise as a novice. He had never learned the art of printing, and had scarcely seen the inside of an office before he opened his own. Yet he succeeded in laying before the public a neat and readable sheet. The issue was weekly at fifty cents per annum. It was printed on a Cottage press. In March, 1876, the office was removed to Hamburg and the size changed to a five-column folio, the sheet being eighteen by twenty-six inches. On April 15, 1882, the size was again increased to twenty-four by thirty-six inches, with seven columns to a page. The subscription price was advanced to one dollar per annum. In this form the Item is now issued by the original proprietor, from a well-equipped office on Main Street, with a growing patronage.

Newspapers at Boyertown.

The Boyertown Bauer (Farmer) was a German newspaper, instituted at Boyertown by O. P. Zink in 1858. It was a folio, in size twenty by twenty-eight inches. He continued its publication for two years and then sold it to Samuel Leaver, and Mr. Leaver published it till 1868, when he sold it to George Sassaman. Its title was then changed to Boyertown Democrat.

The Boyertown Democrat was published as a German newspaper for a period of ten years from 1858 under the name of Boyertown Bauer. It then passed into the ownership of George Sassaman, who substituted the name of Boyertown Democrat and enlarged the size to twenty-four by thirty-six inches. Its start and continuance under the new name were not very successful, for in one year afterward it was sold by the sheriff and purchased by William B. Albright, ex-sheriff of Reading. Mr. Albright carried on its publication for only a year and then sold it to Charles Spatz. Mr. Spatz taking hold of it with energy in 1871, he soon awakened new life in its feeble publication and won favor and patronage from the public. In 1876, finding a demand for English reading matter, he introduced the English language, making the newspaper half English and half German. He conducted its publication successfully till his death, in 1884, and left it to his estate with a circulation numbering thirteen hundred subscribers. It has been carried on since by his estate, with his son, Charles Spatz, as editor and manager. From the beginning till now it has been a stanch advocate of Democratic principles and the Democratic party.

NEWSPAPERS AT WOMELSDORF.

WOMELSDORF GAZETTE.—In April, 1847, Samuel Mowry began the publication of an English-German weekly entitled Womelsdorf Gazette, and continued it for nine months, when he sold it to Fasnocht Brothers. It was published by them for a year and then removed to Myerstown. Its news department was entirely local.

WOMELSDORF HERALD was instituted by Michael K. Boyer, an enterprising young printer from Reading, in September, 1879. It was an English non-partisan weekly paper. He continued its publication till May, 1880, when Joel Weidman became the proprietor. Several months afterward Mr. Weidman was compelled to suspend its publication for want of patronage.

WOMELSDORF NEWS.—In March, 1882, Joel Weidman encouraged himself to start again in the newspaper enterprise at this place, and then issued the first number of a small weekly entitled Womelsdorf News, with its subscription price at fifty cents per annum. In 1884 he took a partner, enlarged the paper, increased the price to seventy-five cents per annum, and under the name of Weidman & Engle, continued its weekly publication till April, 1885, when it was suspended.

NEWSPAPERS AT BIRDSBORO'.

BIRDSBORO' PIONEER was an English weekly begun by B. F. Fries on April 24, 1873, at Birdsboro', and continued till January, 1876. It was a folio, size of sheet twenty-four by thirty-six inches. Its subscription list included five hundred subscribers. Upon its discontinuance at Birdsboro' it was transferred to Reading by Mr. Fries, where its title was changed to The Industrial Pioneer, and became the recognized advocate of the interests of the working people. Several months afterward a company was organized at Reading, called the "Industrial Publishing Company," by which this newspaper was then purchased and published as a daily under the management of John Tomlinson, but it was discontinued after a struggling existence for four months.

DAILY NEWSPAPERS.

Weekly newspaper publications were carried on in Reading for fifty years before a daily was thought of—at least before a public proposition to this end was made. Many weeklies had been instituted in that time; but they all suspended excepting two, and these two are worthy of especial mention for their energy, success and longevity,—the Adler and the Journal—the former a German publication founded in 1796, and the latter an English publication founded in 1816. The population was certainly here to support a daily newspaper. The rapid increase of the people would seem to have warranted—if it did not inspire—such an enterprise in that period of time. Education was quite general, though stimulated with marked public energy after 1834; and the English language was growing gradually into favor. The railroad was constructed, various shops and factories—especially for the manufacture of iron goods—were erected; even English churches were founded. The borough was promoted into a city. All these things came to pass, and yet the daily newspaper had not yet arrived. The second period of Reading was unusually prolific in producing great things for the common progress of its citizens. In 1840 the population was eight thousand four hundred and ten, and in 1847 it was about twelve thousand; and in the respective years named the entire county had about sixty-five thousand and seventy thousand. The railroad extended through the entire Schuylkill Valley to the north and to the south, but nowhere else from Reading. The stages, however, ran daily in every direction. These means facilitated the distribution of newspapers, and, indeed, encouraged the spirit of publication. And yet there was no daily newspaper. The third period—the city—came. Then there were seven weekly newspapers carried on successfully,—Adler, Journal, Berks County Press, Liberale Beobachter, Alt Berks, Jefferson Democrat and Reading Gazette. They were issued upon different days in the week, but mostly on Saturday. Naturally, this number was sufficient to discourage the thought of a daily publication. But the spirit of enterprise was working its way wonderfully through the people in different channels. Buildings were multiplying, trade was growing, population was increasing and many strangers were coming and locating here permanently. The daily events necessarily grew with the general growth, and the disposition to know them at once was preparing the way for a step beyond the weekly publication; just as the stage-coach and canal-boat, through the energy of trading, were found to be slow and had to make way for the steam-car, so the weekly newspaper was coming to be late in communicating news, the feeling against the delay was growing stronger and stronger, and public eagerness was clamoring for an improvement, for a step beyond the days of decades before. Of course, this had to be satisfied—this feeling, this eagerness, ay, this curiosity. And in time it was.

Reading Herald.—Reading was incorporated as a city in March, 1847. Three months afterward Abraham S. Whitman, a practical young printer of Reading, took the first step beyond a weekly publication by instituting and carrying on a tri-weekly newspaper, which he entitled The Reading Herald. His energy was strong and his spirit young. These gave him boldness to encourage the project. Within two months he enlarged its size and improved its appearance. What a conception this was to awaken enthusiasm in the master—public patronage! But he soon found that he had stepped—if not run—beyond his time, beyond the public; and, realizing that discretion would be to him the better part of valor, he stepped back to the plane of his cotemporaries and issued The Reading Herald as a weekly newspaper.

Reading Gazette.—About the same time J. Lawrence Getz, publisher of the Reading Gazette (weekly), made the editorial announcement that he was encouraged to undertake the publication of a daily newspaper, and on the 10th of July, 1847, he stated that he would issue the first number on the following Monday (the 12th of July), his proposals having met with favor during the previous month in a canvass of the city for subscribers. But he took the precaution to say (26th June) that if support could be obtained for the publication "well and good, we shall go ahead with it; if not, well and good again, we'll wait a little longer." He issued the daily; but "it lived exactly nine days, and then went quietly out of existence." The price was two cents a copy or ten cents a week.

These first efforts were in 1847. Ten years elapsed. In that time two new railroads were extended from this natural centre for enterprise and population in amongst the hills of South Mountain, one to the west through Lebanon Valley, the other to the northeast through East Penn Valley. From twelve thousand the population in the city increased to twenty thousand, and from seventy thousand the population of the county increased to ninety thousand. The post-offices round-about in the county multiplied from forty-one to seventy—truly a wonderful increase in this valuable department of the public service. The added wealth to the community from all sources was estimated not by the thousands of dollars, but by the millions, and the hand-press—that laborious time-server in running off the issues of newspaper publications—was supplanted by the steam-press. Surely, under these inviting circumstances, the time would appear to have come for a certain step in advance of the days of 1796, of 1816, of 1847.

Mr. Getz doubtless reasoned in this manner in 1857; and, satisfying himself that the prospects were favorable, he started in this enterprise a second time. In the first issue (15th of June, 1857) he expressed himself in an editorial thus,—

"Again we venture upon the experiment of a daily issue of the Reading Gazette. Ten years ago we tried it and it failed, or, more properly speaking, we abandoned it just in time to prevent its failure. It lived exactly nine days, and then quietly went out of existence. Some of our friends, disposed to joke about the affair, although it was a very serious thing to us, called it 'a nine days' wonder.' It was so only in this particular—that it was very soon entirely forgotten. But, in other respects, nobody made the paper a subject of wonder. The only wonder expressed was at our folly in undertaking so hazardous an enterprise. Few took any interest in our short-lived daily, and none thought it was needed. But ten years work many and great changes in men and things. Reading is larger and more busy than it was then, and we are older and wiser, if experience be counted wisdom. The want of a daily paper in our city is now felt, and the desire appears to be general that the want should be supplied. To show our willingness to meet it, here the paper is."

And he presented before the public a fine morning newspaper. It was a folio in size, twenty-two by thirty-two inches, with six columns on each page. Its contents comprised nine columns of reading matter and fifteen columns of advertisements. The price was two cents a copy and ten cents a week. He continued the publication of it successfully, though under discouraging patronage, till the 3d of February, 1858, when he changed the time of its issue to the evening, and reduced the price to six cents a week. This change was made as an experiment. The morning issue not having been a profitable enterprise, he desired to ascertain whether or not public sentiment would favor an evening issue at a reduced rate. But the experiment was carried on for three weeks only, and, finding patronage too weak for the expense, he suspended its publication on the 27th of the same month. The last issue was No. 177. A local weekly 1 complimented the spirit and enterprise with which it had been conducted, but, in addition, expressed the opinion that its suspension was by no means creditable either to the intelligence or to the public spirit of a city with twenty-five thousand inhabitants. Its list of patrons embraced four hundred and fifty regular subscribers, but only sixteen out of two hundred and forty business men of Reading took sufficient interest in its success to give it advertising patronage. And thus ended the second attempt. It would seem that the daily newspaper, like all great things in the progress of mankind, could not be created in the first effort, but that several efforts in its behalf also had to be made before it became an established institution in our community.

We may well ask why this daily was not supported. It was certainly conducted with ability, for Mr. Getz was a practical printer and editor of acknowledged experience and competency. The secret of its failure may have been hidden beneath its political bias. It was an exponent of Democratic principles. About this time the political sentiment of the city was against the Democratic party, and it would seem to have been growing in favor of the Republican party. Just before, in 1856, the city gave Buchanan (Democratic candidate for President) nearly one thousand majority, and, in 1857, it gave A. Jordan Schwartz (Democratic candidate for mayor) 368 majority; but, in 1858, it gave Bennevile Keim (candidate for mayor on the American ticket) 444 majority, and, in 1859, for same office, 944 majority over the Democratic candidate; and, in 1860, it gave Lincoln (Republican candidate for President), a plurality of 338, though the sentiment against the Democratic party was stronger, the majority having been 580 in a total vote of 3700. A file of the issues of the daily is not in existence. Hence we cannot express a positive opinion. The political sentiment was against the editor, and the price may have been too high, the people not having been taught as yet to appreciate such a factor in their midst by paying for it at the rate of one cent a day or six cents a week.

Reading Times.—Immediately after the suspension of the Herald a stronger feeling for a daily newspaper manifested itself in the city. So a third attempt was made. A sentiment in its behalf had apparently been created at Mr. Getz's expense. This was by a stranger to the city. In many things, it is said, a prophet is not without honor, save in his own land. And it would seem that this was applicable here, with respect to the daily newspaper. J. Robley Dunglison, an accomplished young man from Philadelphia, settled in Reading about that time, and, finding an opening in the field of journalism, decided to take up the daily newspaper for his vocation. On the 19th of July, 1858, he issued the first number of his paper, which he entitled the Reading Daily Times. It was a folio, printed in the English language, in size sixteen by twenty-four inches, with five columns on each page, and issued in the morning. In his salutatory, he said,—

"Upon the cessation of the issue of the Daily Gazette, we were solicited by numerous friends to commence a new daily newspaper, whose columns should not only be perfectly neutral in politics, but be correct and complete records of all matters of social interest in which the people of Reading and vicinity might be interested. Encouraged by their solicitation, a thorough canvass of the city was made, and finding support guaranteed sufficient to warrant the commencement of the enterprise, we determined to risk the experiment."

Its contents consisted of nine columns of reading matter, and eleven columns of advertisements. Its price was one cent a copy, and six cents a week. The printing-office in which it was published, was situated on the northwest corner of Fourth and Penn Streets.

Mr. Dunglison continued its publication till December 9, 1859. It was then sold to Henry Lantz and conducted by him successfully till he enlisted in the Civil War, in September, 1861, when he transferred it to A. S. Whitman and C. F. Haas. He is given the credit of establishing firmly the first successful daily paper at Reading. The firm of Whitman & Haas increased the price to eighteen cents a week, and issued it during the progress of the war with great ability and success, displaying firm patriotism in advocating its vigorous prosecution and in encouraging all measures for the preservation of the Union. Its columns contained full reports of the movements of the army, of the battles fought, etc., besides local and general news and interesting literary matter. The publishers displayed much enterprise in its publication. It was the only daily paper then issued at Reading. Daily papers from Philadelphia and New York—especially the Press from the former place, and the Tribune from the latter—were patronized by our community for extended correspondence pertaining to the war in the several sections of the Southern States, and for vigorous editorials in sustaining the national government. In that thrilling period of our history the Times occupied a position here similar to the position of the other papers named in their respective cities.

In March, 1865, F. B. Shalters, Jr., became one of the firm, and in September following Mr. Haas retired, on account of official duties as clerk of the city. Mr. Haas had learned the art of printing under Mr. Whitman, and continued with him for a number of years, advancing from a compositor to foreman, and thence to co-proprietor of a newspaper. He was a man of ability and energy. In October, 1865, the price was reduced to twelve cents a week.

In October, 1868, Mr. Whitman withdrew from the firm. Mr. Shalters then became sole proprietor and editor, and conducted it till April 3, 1869, when he sold it to A. C. Buckwalter and Charles B. Rhoads. A stronger feeling for newspapers was being created in the community. At that time there were two competitors contending for a share of influence and patronage. These were the Dispatch and the Eagle, published daily in the evening. The parties named published the Times successfully till June 19th following. Messrs. J. Knabb & Co., the proprietors of the Bucks and Schuylkill Journal, then purchased it, and conducted it in connection with their weekly newspaper. In the previous eleven years, it had passed under the management of five different parties. But a new era began in its history under the direction of an established firm, its prospects soon brightening and its circulation extending. Within a year afterward (April 4, 1870) the firm purchased the Evening Dispatch, and united it with the Times, entitling the newspaper Reading Times and Dispatch. From that time onward it has been successfully published by the same firm. The latter part of the title was dropped in December, 1881. In politics it has been a consistent advocate of Republican principles. In general and local news it has always exhibited energy on the one hand in collecting the daily occurrences both here and in distant places, and care on the other in reporting them correctly; and the department of general literature for the family has been conducted with discrimination. In general reading matter, all the newspapers of Reading display a praiseworthy energy towards creating increasing interest in daily publications. Compared with publications ten years ago, they show considerable progress. In the line of general advancement they are at the head of the column, advocating measures for the convenience and improvement of the community.

Evening Dispatch was a daily newspaper, begun on February 10, 1866, by J. D. Lacier, C. D. Eliot, H. Schultz and J. L. Mast, who traded under the name of Lacier & Co. It was published every week-day afternoon, at fifteen cents a week, and seven dollars a year. Its size was twenty-two by thirty-six inches, with seven columns on each page. It was a thoroughly Republican paper, and conducted with energy and ability till April 4, 1870, when Messrs. J. Knabb & Co. purchased and merged it with the Daily Times, in conjunction with which paper, as the Reading Times and Dispatch, it appeared on the following day.

Reading Daily Reporter was started by Alfred S. Jones as an independent newspaper on April 26, 1864, and carried on successfully by him for four months. It was a folio, price six cents a week. The subscription list, at the beginning, included twelve hundred patrons. John Ralston, Esq., then became a partner, and the newspaper was published, in an enlarged form, at ten cents a week, as a Democratic organ for several months longer, and suspended.

Reading Daily Eagle.—This daily English newspaper was begun by William S. Ritter and Jesse G. Hawley, proprietors of the Adler, on January 28, 1868. Its size was twenty-two by thirty inches, and its price three cents a copy, ten cents a week and $4.50 a year. The motto placed at the head of the paper was:

"For the good that lacks assistance,
For the wrong that needs resistance."

The firm of Ritter & Co. was dissolved on November 13, 1874, and the Daily Eagle became the property of Mr. Hawley. During that year the firm bought and introduced into their establishment a Hoe four-cylinder rotary press, costing nineteen thousand dollars.

The daily issue was published six days of the week, in the afternoon, till February 25, 1877. Shortly before, an increasing demand had arisen for a Sunday local paper, and Mr. Hawley satisfied this demand by issuing a Sunday edition of the Eagle in the morning. It was at once appreciated. The price was, and still is, three cents a copy. It is the only Sunday English paper in the county.

This newspaper has been issued regularly since on every day of the year with increasing patronage and success, and an extending circulation throughout this city and county, and into adjoining counties. It is independent in politics. Its columns show much energy and success in collecting news, both local and general. The editor of these papers, including the Weekly Eagle, is John D. Missimer.

Jesse G. Hawley, son of Jesse Hawley and Esther (née Meredith) his wife, was born at Pughtown, in Chester County, Pa., on August 8, 1839, and educated at the Marshallton Academy (a private institution in Chester County), Millersville Normal School, and at Poughkeepsie, N. Y. Whilst at the latter place he studied law at the National Law School. He then settled at Reading in September, 1859, finished his legal studies under Maj. Samuel L. Young, at Reading, and was admitted to the Berks County bar on September 20, 1860. He continued in active practice till 1870. During that time, in 1864, he purchased a half-interest in the Readinger Adler, and became interested with William S. Ritter in the business of printing and publication. He and his partner instituted the Daily Eagle in 1868, and purchased the Reading Gazette and Democrat in 1869. These three publications, together with a large book-store and printing establishment, were conducted very successfully by them till 1874, when Mr. Hawley became the sole proprietor of all, excepting the Adler, his interest in which he then transferred to Mr. Ritter, and the firm of Ritter & Co. was dissolved. In 1877 he began the publication of a Sunday edition of the Eagle; and in 1878 he substituted the name of Weekly Eagle in the place of the Gazette and Democrat. He has conducted his newspapers, printing establishment and book-store with great and increasing success. Since 1880 he has annually traveled very extensively throughout the United States and Europe, journeying across the continent in the former, and visiting all the important countries and metropolitan places in the latter. During a second visit to Europe, in 1885, he was accompanied by his wife and daughters.

Mr. Hawley was married to Kate E., daughter of Louis Ritter, of Reading. He has two daughters, Edith and Helen. He is highly esteemed throughout the community for his business enterprise and progressive spirit. General education and internal improvements have his constant and earnest encouragement.

Die Reading Post.—The first daily English newspaper was established at Reading in 1858. Ten years afterward a daily German newspaper was established here by William Rosenthal. This was on June 1, 1868. A departure, of this character from the ordinary course of German newspaper publications required more than ordinary enterprise and courage, and also a careful survey of the community, in order to know that such a publication would be acceptable and be sufficiently patronized. But Mr. Rosenthal was equal to the task; and, mastering the situation, he started out boldly and at once won success by deserving it. And he has continued it till now. It is the only daily German newspaper in the State, outside of Philadelphia and Pittsburgh. It is a folio, printed on a sheet twenty-four by thirty-five inches; price (including Sunday supplement) twelve cents a week, and six dollars a year. Its circulation is mostly in Reading. It has secured a strong hold upon the community through his intelligent and careful direction, avoiding offensive partisanship and the discussion of religious subjects. Mr. Rosenthal has accomplished a work worthy of special mention, when we consider the strong and persistent influences at work against the preservation of the German language and its daily use here by the increasing encouragement given to English education.

Daily Spirit of Berks.—Mr. Daniel S. Francis, after having issued successfully the Weekly Spirit of Berks for over five years, was encouraged to issue a daily edition. On August 6, 1881, he accordingly began the publication of the Daily Spirit of Berks, and it met with immediate success. In November following, he sold both papers to John B. Dampman, Esq., who shortly afterward formed a co-partnership with A. C. Buckwalter. This firm then re-organized the two editions and changed their names to the Morning Herald and Weekly Herald.

They have conducted both since with increasing success. The daily edition contains vigorous and independent editorials. It is conducted with ability. In politics it is neutral. Much attention is given to the discussion of questions on the subject of labor, and much enterprise is displayed in the news department, both local and general.

The Reading Daily News was begun by William S. Ritter, the proprietor of the Adler, on May 1, 1880. It is a folio sheet, twenty-four by thirty-six inches, with seven columns on each page, and issued daily, excepting Sundays, in the afternoon. In politics it is thoroughly Democratic. Its editorial department is conducted by Jacob Weidel, Esq. It is a progressive newspaper, showing energy in the collection of news and vigor in the discussion of general topics. It is now in its sixth year, in which time, notwithstanding the existence of three other daily papers at Reading,—two in the morning and one in the afternoon,—it has acquired a considerable popularity and an extended circulation throughout the city and county.

Other daily papers were conducted at Reading, but their publication was not continued for any considerable time. The earliest was the Daily Leader, and afterward there appeared the Evening Star, Evening Record, Daily People and Daily Graphic.

Louis A. Wollenweber was at no time connected with the newspapers of Reading or Berks County. But he has been a printer, newspaper publisher and correspondent through a period of fifty years in this country, and identified himself so thoroughly with our community that he is worthy of a place in this chapter.
He was born December 5, 1807, at Ixheim, a suburb of the town of Zwielüicken, Germany; and there learned the trade of printing. After the French Revolution he manifested an active public interest in politics, and made speeches against the crown. This conduct obliged him to flee from his country. He emigrated to the United States, landing at Philadelphia, July 18, 1832. He spent the following year at Reading and then returned to Philadelphia, where he found employment at printing. In August, 1836, he instituted there the first daily German newspaper in the United States. It was entitled Frei-einige; and in 1838 he began the publication of another daily German newspaper, entitled Philadelphia Democrat, and continued its issue regularly till 1852, when he sold it to Hoffman & Morwitz, and retired from the active duties and responsibilities of newspaper life. After residing again at Reading during the years 1854 and 1855 he acted as agent for a number of German steamship lines at Philadelphia. Whilst filling this position his only son Louis was killed in the Civil War, in the service of the national government. This was a hard blow to him, but he bore the sacrifice willingly, because it was for a great and free country which he, as a stranger, had learned to love. Shortly afterward he moved permanently to Berks County. He lived at Womelsdorf till 1876, and then settled at Reading. He is the local agent here for the German Consul, and is also correspondent for a number of prominent German newspapers in this country and in Germany. During his residence at Womelsdorf he became interested in our early local history, and after gathering considerable facts, particularly relating to the German immigrants, he published, in 1880, a small, but interesting book in the German language, entitled Die beiden ersten Deutschen Ansiedler in Pennsylvanien, and about the same time another, entitled Die Berg Maria (narrating the affecting story of a German woman who lived alone on the mountain in Pike township, this county). He is a stranger in a strange land, but he is thoroughly appreciated for his genial and sociable disposition and upright deportment. He has found a desirable home here in the midst of beautiful hills, and, as he expressed himself, he wants to be buried in his beloved old Berks County.

CHAPTER XVIII.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

The internal improvements of the county relate to the several prominent affairs which have been instituted and carried on for the general development, convenience and enrichment of the whole community. They comprise the following subjects: Schuylkill River, Bridges, Roads and Turnpikes, Stages, Canals, Railways, Public County Buildings, Post-Offices, Telegraph and Telephone. Each of these subjects are treated in the order mentioned.

SCHUYLLKILL RIVER.

In a natural aspect, the Schuylkill River has occupied an important position in the well-being of the county. We can only appreciate this position by realizing the great advantages which it has afforded us in leading away successfully the enormous quantities of water throughout the year, from the mountains and valleys to the sea. And its meandering channel is worthy of consideration, inasmuch as the flowing waters are thereby detained in their onward course to moisten the air and vegetation, and to proceed with only such speed as not to injure the adjoining country.

FISHING AND NAVIGATION.—In a practical aspect, it has been valuable in various ways—two especially, fishing and navigation. In respect to fishing, it was a source of profit and subsistence to the early settlers who occupied the adjoining properties. They discovered this fact immediately after settling here; and to facilitate the catching of large quantities of fish with little labor and expense, they erected weirs, racks and dams in the river, into which the fish were driven by the fishermen, who either waded afoot or rode on horseback through the water. And in respect to navigation, it was likewise a source of advantage to them in en-ableing them to carry conveniently, by boats, flats and canoes, and with little expense, great quantities of grain and goods of all kinds, to the market at Philadelphia.

Penn had hardly landed here before he found that navigation in the river was obstructed by fishing wears and dams; and believing them to be objectionable, he encouraged legislation against them. Various acts were passed, but the wears and dams were not abandoned. This process of fishing continued. But eventually the inconvenience and suffering occasioned by them became so burdensome that loud and earnest complaints arose, when they were discontinued; but not till the assistance of the law had been invoked. The farmers of our own county having been concerned in the difficulties which they occasioned, I submit such details as I could find relating to them.

Obstructions to Navigation.—Deposits in respect to these dams, and the obstructions to navigation, were taken before George Boone, Esq., on the 12th of March, 1728. The following witnesses, who resided in Amity township, were heard:

"Marcus Huling said that as he was going down the Schuylkill with a canoe loaded with wheat, it struck on a fish-dam and took a great deal of water into the wheat, by means whereof his wheat was much damaged and was in great danger of being all lost. At another time he struck fast on a fish-dam and would have lost his whole load of wheat if he had not leaped into the river and with hard labor prevented the canoe from swinging around, and thereby he suffered very much in his body by reason of the water and cold. And at still another time he struck fast on one of the rack-dams, and with great hazard and hard labor escaped with his life and load.

"Jonas Jones said that in the month of February, the weather being extremely cold, he struck fast on a fish-dam, and to save his load of wheat, was obliged to leap into the river to the middle of his body, and with all his labor and skill he could not get off in less than half an hour. Afterward he proceeded on his journey with the clothes frozen stiff on his back, by means whereof he underwent a great deal of misery."

"Jacob Waren said that he struck fast on a dam with a canoe loaded with wheat and he and his partner were forced into the river; and then one of them was obliged with all his might to hold the canoe whilst the other dug away the stones of the dam and thus with much difficulty got off.

"Isaac Smally said that whilst going down the river he struck fast on a rack-dam with one hundred and forty bushels of wheat in a canoe, and in order to save the load from being all lost, he (much against his mind) was obliged to leap into the river. The water, being up to his chin in depth, frequently dashed into his mouth, where between whiles he breathed. He and his partner were only able to hold the canoe with great labor, whilst a young man, there present, ran above a mile to call help to get them off.

"Walter Campbell said that he had struck fast many times on the fish-dams with his canoe loaded with wheat, and been forced to leap into the river before he could get off.

"Jonas Yocum and Richard Dunklin said that they got fast on a fish-dam with their canoe loaded with sixty bushels of wheat; and the said Dunklin's wife and a young child whilst in the canoe were for more than an hour in great danger of being overset into the river, and if this had happened they would undoubtedly have been lost.

"Barnabas Roads said that he struck fast on a fish-dam in the Schuylkill for several hours in the cold winter season, destitute of any help, in which time he underwent many hardships and at last got off—during all which time he was in great danger both of his life and load. And that he had been fast on the said dams at divers times and in great danger.

"And John Boone, Joseph Boone, James Boone, Samuel Boone and George Boone also said that they were fast sundry times on the said fish-dams and rack-dams; and to preserve their loads of wheat, they were forced several times to leap into the river, escaping very narrowly with their lives and loads."

Riot between Boatmen and Fishermen.

—These obstructions in the way of navigating the river had existed for some time before this investigation and continued for some years afterward. The fishermen claimed the right to carry on fishing, especially since they had expended considerable money and labor in constructing their wears and dams in the river at and near their properties. In locating them, they selected places most convenient and advantageous; but these were generally where they obstructed navigation most. The canoes, in passing down the river, naturally demolished

1 These canoes were evidently of considerable size to carry so large a quantity of wheat. They were hewn out of a single trunk of a tree. The growth of the trees in the wild, extended forest of that early day was very large. William Penn stated, in a letter written in 1683, that he had seen a canoe made from a poplar tree which carried four tons of bricks. The Smally canoe must have been one of this size, if not larger.
them and necessarily injured the business and success of the fishermen. Hence, they complained. But the farmers, who lived up the river, also claimed the right of navigating in and through its waters for the purpose of conveying merchandise to the market at Philadelphia, and they were determined to exercise this right. Notwithstanding these difficulties in the way of each class, the fisherman continued his fishing and the farmer continued his navigation, the one losing fish and the other risking cargo and life. Six years passed, however, before they culminated in proceedings at law—for the farmers had in this time suffered such marked inconveniences and losses that patience ceased to be a virtue, and they accordingly lodged complaints before George Boone, Esq. (a justice of Philadelphia County, in Oley township), and obtained a warrant for removing the obstructions in the river and the arrest of their assailants. This warrant was placed in the hands of the constable of Amity township (William Richards), on the 20th day of April, 1738; and, with deputies to accompany him, he proceeded down the river to execute the same. But the fishermen had no fears for the law and the constable who had visited them to execute its mandate. They defended their wears and dams, and their opposition resulted in a riotous demonstration. The facts relating to it are detailed in the following interesting deposition of the constable, taken on the 27th of April following: 1

"That, on the twentieth day of this instant, April, he received a warrant requiring him to take to his assistance such persons as this deponent should think proper, and go down the Schuylkill and remove all such obstructions as should be found in the said river. In obedience to which warrant he took several persons, inhabitants of the said county, as his assistants, and together with one Robert Smith, constable of Oley, who had received a warrant to the same purpose, went down the said river in three canoes to Mingo Creek, where they found a large number of racks and obstructions in the said river, and saw four men upon an island near the said racks; that this deponent and company removed the said racks without receiving any opposition. Thence they proceeded down the river to the mouth of Pickering’s Creek, near which they found several racks, which extended across the said river to an island, which racks this deponent and company also removed. Then immediately about the number of two hundred men came down on both sides of the river, and were very rude and abusive, and threatened this deponent and his company, and expecting from the ill language and threats given that some mischief or a quarrel would ensue, he took his staff in his hand and his warrant, and commanded the said men, in the king’s name, to keep the peace, and told them that he came there in a peaceable manner and according to law to move the racks and obstructions in the river, upon which some of the said men damned the laws and the law-makers, and cursed this deponent and his assistants; that one James Starr knocked this deponent down in the river with a large club or stake, after which several of the said men attacked this deponent and company with large clubs, and knocked down said Robert Smith, the constable, as also several of his assistants; that one John Wainwright, accompanying him, was struck down with a pole or staff, and lay as dead, with his body on the shore and his feet in the river; that this deponent and company, finding that they were not able to make resistance, were obliged to make the best of their way in order to save their lives; and they together after this proceeded down the river, in order to go to Philadelphia to make complaint of the ill usage they had received. As they came near Perkiomen Creek they found another set of racks, which were guarded by a great number of men. That this deponent and company requested the said men to let them go down the river, and, if they would suffer them to pass, they would not meddle with their racks. Upon which the said men abused and cursed this deponent in a very gross manner, and said that they should not pass by them. One of the said men called out aloud, and offered five pounds for Timothy Miller’s head, the said Timothy being one of deponent’s assistants, and another of the said men called out to the said Timothy to make haste away. And afterward the said men pursued this deponent and company, who, for fear of being murdered, made the best of their way with their canoes to the mouth of the Perkiomen Creek, and there went ashore, and left their canoes there, with some clothes, which are since reported split in pieces and the clothes turned adrift in the river."

Benjamin Milliard, one of Richards’ assistants, a resident of Chester County, deposed on the same day that the statements made by Richards, in his deposition, were true.

The Executive Council having been informed of this obstruction to legal process and this attack upon the constable and his assistants, they, on the 25th of April, 1738, recommended to the justices of the counties of Philadelphia and Chester to issue their warrants for apprehending all such persons who were concerned in the said riot and outrage.

The fishermen were doubtless arrested, for the sheriffs of the said counties were "enjoined and required, with sufficient assistance, if need be, to cause the warrants to be duly executed," and the farmers of Amity township were enabled to carry their wheat, etc., by canoes on the river to Philadelphia without any further trouble from their opponents.

There was no trouble along the Schuylkill above the mouth of the Manatawny, in reference to weirs and dams. And yet fishing was carried on to a great extent, especially by the citizens of Reading. There were two fish-pools which were particularly famous for their supplies of fish,—"Levan's" and "Lutz's," the former at the foot of Neversink, and the latter a short distance above. Fishing was continued successfully for seventy years in these pools till the construction of the "Little Dam" in the Schuylkill Canal, and this forced their abandonment. Fishing with nets was common. It was a regular pursuit with some people. After the canal began to be constructed fishermen turned to the river for sport with the rod and line rather than for profit with nets.

The Schuylkill River forms the western boundary of Reading. In its natural state, before it was contracted on both sides by the construction of the Schuylkill Canal along its eastern bank, and of the Union Canal along its western, it was over six hundred feet wide. Its bed was capable of carrying a large body of water. Before 1800 the quantity of water which flowed daily through its meandering channel was considerable. It occupied a very important relation with Reading in its early history, much more than since the introduction of the canals and railways. It was not only indispensable in receiving and carrying away the drainage of the town, but also useful for navigation, in the transportation of merchandise by boats to Philadelphia. Spring was generally selected as the time when shipment by water could be most conveniently and satisfactorily made. Then the water was higher than during the other seasons of the year. Heavy cargoes on flat-boats would float down the river with ease, requiring only proper and careful steering. The steersmen were expert in keeping the boats in the channel, and very seldom failed to reach their destination successfully. Besides the long paddle at the stern of the boat, for guiding purposes, there were pole-men, with long, stout poles, who were stationed at the bow, and there directed the boat to the right or left, as necessity required. Poling was not generally required to propel the boat with the current; this labor was practiced in returning against the current. And what a labor it must have been! we cannot imagine the strength, energy and persistence which it required. Horse-power could not be introduced. There were no tow-paths.

The improvement of the river, to facilitate navigation, was a subject of consideration by our early inhabitants, both of the county and county-seat, for many years. Its agitation began at an early period. An enterprising citizen of the county addressed an interesting letter to the Pennsylvania Gazette, at Philadelphia, on March 24, 1760, in reference to clearing the river from obstructions, expressing the opinion that their removal would encourage transportation of produce, etc., by water, and be of inconceivable benefit, as well to Philadelphia as to the county of Berks. The matter was of such importance as to gain the attention of the Provincial Assembly, and obtain appropriations for the improvement of the channel.

A year afterward (March 14, 1761), an act of Assembly was passed which provided as follows:

"Whereas, The river Schuylkill is navigable for rafts, boats, and other small craft in times of high freshes only, occasioned by the obstruction of rocks and bars of sand and gravel in divers parts of the same;

"And whereas, The improving the navigation of the said river, so as to make it passable at all times, will be very advantageous to the poor, greatly conducive to the promotion of industry, and beneficial to the inhabitants residing on or near said river, by enabling them to bring the produce of the country to the market of the city of Philadelphia, and thereby increase the trade and commerce of the province;

"And whereas, Divers of the inhabitants of this province, desirous to promote the welfare of the public, have subscribed large sums of money for the purposes aforesaid, and, by petition to the Assembly, have requested that commissioners may be appointed by law to take, receive, and collect the said subscriptions, and such others as shall hereafter be given or subscribed, and to apply and appropriate the same for and towards the clearing, scouring, and rendering the said river navigable as aforesaid;

Therefore be it enacted, That Joseph Fox, John Hughes Samuel Rhoads, John Potts, William Palmer, David Davis, Mordecai Moore, Henry Pawling, James Coults, Jonathan Coates, Joseph Millard, William Bird, Francis Parvin, Benjamin Lightfoot, and Isaac Levan shall be, and hereby are, constituted and appointed commissioners for clearing, scouring, and making the said Schuylkill river navigable: * * * with full power the moneys collected and received to lay out, appropriate and employ for and towards making the said river navigable and passable for boats, flats, rafts, canoes and other small vessels, from the ridge of mountains, commonly called the Blue Mountains, to the river Delaware."

The commissioners were authorized to enlarge, straighten and deepen the channel of the river, in any part or place which should appear most convenient. And persons were forbidden to erect, build, or set up, or maintain any wear, rack, basket, fishing-dam, pound or other device within said river, or to fix or fasten any net across the same, whereby the fish may be obstructed from going up the said river, or to take, destroy or spoil any spawn, fry or brood of fish, under the penalty of twenty pounds, or six months' imprisonment.

The last four commissioners named in the act were residents of Berks County, and men of large wealth and great influence. But they did not succeed in their projected enterprise, though they doubtless proceeded, to a certain extent, in removing obstructions, etc., in the river. In 1773 a supplement was passed to the act mentioned, whereby new commissioners were appointed to execute the provisions of said act, and the surviving previous commissioners were required to pay over to them the moneys collected and remaining unappropriated.

In the "Potts Memorial," the authoress (Mrs. James) states (p. 140): "In 1769 it (the navigation of the Schuylkill) seems to have been a perfect battle-cry; and the newspapers of that date are full of notices and descriptions of contending interests. Parties ran high upon this local project, and more prominence is given to it in the newspapers than to the oppressive acts of Parliament, which were soon to sever the colonies from the mother-country."

And the latter commissioners did not accomplish anything worthy of special mention.3

3 From Berks County—Mark Bird, James Star, Jacob Kern and John Pawling, Jr.

A new and third act was passed 24th March, 1781. Thirteen commissioners were appointed for same purpose. From Berks County—Mark Bird, Baltzer Gehr, George Douglass and John Hiester.

And a fourth act passed 16th March, 1784, owing to previous laws being inadequate. Twenty-two commissioners were appointed altogether.

Those from Berks County, and for districts in Berks, along Schuylkill River, were as follows: From Berks County line to Beidler’s Mill, Abraham Lincoln and Mordecai Miller; thence to mouth of Tulpeheekon, John Bishop and George Gardiner; thence to mouth of Maiden-creek, John Mears; thence to mouth of Tamagwuy Creek, Charles Schoemaker and George Miller; thence to coal mines on Schuylkill at Basler’s saw-mill, Henry Haller, Samuel Baird and Fr. David Cleckner.

On 13th April, 1791, an act was passed appropriating twenty-five hundred pounds to improve the Schuylkill, from the lower falls to Reading.
The river, notwithstanding these efforts, remained about the same in respect to navigation. The only practicable and expensive improvements in and along the river were effected fifty years afterwards, by the construction of the Schuylkill Canal, during which time the inhabitants of the county transported their grain and merchandise on boats and flats, in the same manner as they formerly had done, twice a year, generally in the freshets of spring and fall.

When the Revolution began in earnest, the subject of improving the river for navigation was apparently forgotten. The citizens felt that they were taxed sufficiently for the one great purpose of carrying on the war for independence. After its successful conclusion, they directed their attention again to business affairs and to the development of such local improvements as tended to facilitate intercourse between the people of the several sections roundabout them. Over ten years elapsed before the fruits of agitation were realized; then, however they began to manifest themselves in directing public attention to the necessity, utility and advantage of bridges, and turnpikes and canals.

First Board of Trade.—The navigation of the river induced the organization of the first Board of Trade at Reading. A number of prominent business men of the borough assembled on March 13, 1807, and considered the subject of the navigation of the Schuylkill; and then they formed a society under the name of "The Society for Promoting the Clearing of the River Schuylkill." The men who constituted this society were James May, William Moore, Gabriel Hiester, Jr., John Birkinbine, Lewis Reese, Samuel D. Franks, Joseph Hiester, Benjamin Davis, John Witman, Isaac Addams, Matthias Ludwig, Peter Nagle, George De B. Keim, John Spayd, William Stauble, Daniel Oyster.

It is not known, however, what practical improvements these men effected in carrying out the object of their existence as a society, for nothing has been preserved to show what steps they took in the matter beyond their organization. It is probable that the society died shortly afterward, especially after the agitation of the subject of a canal for the same purpose, and its subsequent construction. Fifty years of thought in this matter had not brought the river into such a state as to encourage transportation by sailing-vessels. The channel was evidently too difficult to master, and the water supply was too small to sustain a grand succession of dams. Hence it must have been regarded as impracticable. But within twenty years afterward, the difficulty was solved by the construction of an artificial narrow channel for slack-water, with numerous locks whereby to overcome grade and detain the water in certain levels to facilitate navigation.

Freshets.—Numerous freshets have swept down the Schuylkill and its tributaries, entailing great losses upon the adjoining property-holders. By evidence from various sources, I am able to refer to them for a period extending back nearly one hundred and thirty years. The inhabitants of Reading were the principal sufferers from the sweeping waters which found an angry escape to the sea.

Freshet of 1757.—The first reference to a freshet which I could find is in the journal of Jacob Morgan, which he kept whilst commander at Fort Lebanon, during the French and Indian War. On the 16th of July, 1757, he states that there was a heavy rain-fall all of that day, and that the creeks were so high that the Schuylkill rose perpendicularly fifteen feet in nine hours' time, being considerably higher than was ever known in these parts. This is all that was reported. No damages were mentioned. Then there was not a bridge across any of the streams in the county, and Reading was not laid out in that portion lying between Third Street and the river.

Freshet of 1786.—A freshet visited the county in 1786, which, it is believed, was the highest, if not the greatest, that ever occurred in this vicinity. There was no newspaper published then at Reading, in which a description of its extent and character might have been preserved, and no letter of that day mentioning it has as yet been discovered. But tradition has brought it down through the passing generations till now as having been extensive and also destructive of much property. The only particular fact known in reference to it is that its wild waters were twenty feet seven and a quarter inches above low-water mark. It was commonly known for many years afterward as the "Pumpkin Freshet," owing to the great number of pumpkins which were then swept from farms adjoining the river and carried down the stream. Reading was then a borough; but the improvements of the place had not as yet reached the river. "Water-lots" had been laid out along both banks of the river over a decade before for the purpose of encouraging the erection of storage buildings upon them; and doubtless some of these were there then, because shipping and navigation were active, and buildings convenient to the boats were necessary. This freshet occurred in the fall of the year.

Freschet of 1822.—Nearly thirty years elapsed between the freschets of 1757 and 1786. This was a long while to be without serious rain-storms or sudden thaws which occasion freshets. But the timber-land still remained in almost its original state, for vast tracts extended many miles to the right and to the left of the river, and these detained the waters as they fell in rain from the sky or melted from the fallen snow. And this condition of the country above Reading required a very severe rain-fall or thaw in order to occasion a freshet worthy of special mention.

Thirty-six years elapsed before the next freshet occurred. During the middle of February, 1822, there was a snow-fall which exceeded twelve inches. A mild atmosphere on the 20th of February caused it to melt rapidly, and the waters therefrom filled the creeks and river, which, in their onward course, washed down great quantities of ice. It was reported that an ice-gorge had been formed at the Schuylkill Dam, Philadelphia, which piled up the broken ice forty feet in height. The water in the Schuylkill at Reading, on the 21st of February, reached a point thirteen feet nine and one-quarter inches above low-water mark. The freshet did not occasion much loss along the Schuylkill; but it washed away numerous dams in the several tributary streams, Tulpehocken, Maiden-creek, Antietam and Manatawuy.

Freschet of 1839.—A violent rain-storm set in on Friday evening, 25th of January, 1839, and continued without intermission till Saturday evening, at six o'clock, when the rain ceased falling and the weather grew suddenly colder, the thermometer falling below the freezing point. The water in the river at Reading rose to a point seventeen feet one and three-quarters inches above low-water mark, which was within two feet of the floor of the Harrisburg bridge. The freshet was reported as the most extensive that visited the community in fifty years, and certainly the most costly of all the freshets, the damages possibly surpassing the losses of all the previous freshets taken together. Among the numerous losses occasioned, the following were reported:

Smith & Reese's mill, large quantity of flour and grain damaged, loss not estimated; Jones & Co., machine-works flooded, loss $100; William Silvis, lime-house and boat burned through wet lime, loss $2000; Samuel Bell, Sr., boats washed away, loss $3000; John Getz, three boats washed away, loss over $2000; Dotterer, Darling & Co., damage to castings, etc., $500; Thomas Jackson, damage to rope-walk, etc., $800; Keim, Whitaker & Co., coal and lumber washed away, $1500; fifty canal-boats washed down, loss at least $20,000; Lancaster bridge badly injured, estimated repairs $10,000; Poplar Neck bridge destroyed, loss $10,000.

Five bridges across Maiden-creek washed away, viz: Moser's, Greenawald's, Dreibleis's, Dunkle's, and at Friends' Meeting House. Total loss at Reading was over $40,000.

Freschet of 1841.—A serious freshet occurred on Wednesday night, January 6, 1841. It was reported as "the greatest flood since 1786, the water at Reading having reached a point two feet higher than during the freshet of 1839." Several squares of buildings along the river were inundated. Many boats and a large quantity of coal and lumber were washed away. The damage to numerous properties was great. The total loss was not estimated.

Great Freschet of 1850.—The most destructive flood that ever occurred in the Schuylkill Valley visited Reading on Monday, September 2, 1850. The loss of life was heartrending and the destruction of property immense. The extent of the calamity in damages to persons and property could not be estimated. It fell upon rich and poor, and also upon the public. It came near destroying the Schuylkill navigation. It swept away bridges, dams, mills, factories and workshops... The flood came suddenly and altogether unexpected. In this vicinity it commenced to rain on Sunday evening. At the source of the river rain fell for twelve hours before. During the night rain poured down in torrents. Early in the next morning the people residing along the river were aroused from their beds by the rapid rising of the waters, which was unprecedented. At four A.M., Monday the water was confined within the banks of the river; at six it had risen ten feet higher, overflowing the canal and rushing through all the lower streets of the city; at eight it was as high as the freshet of 1841; at ten, the Penn Street bridge was forced from its piers, when it floated down the stream. It carried along the Lancaster bridge, which had withstood the floods of half a century. It was soon after followed by the following bridges: Kissinger's, Leize's and Althouse's. Every bridge on the river from Pottsville to Royersford was swept away, excepting the Railroad (or High) bridge above Reading (at Tuckerton). The flood reached its highest point at three P.M. The whole lower part of the city was inundated. Many houses were submerged to the second and third stories. In some there were men, women and children, and these called for help. Substantial brick buildings, whose foundations had been weakened by the water, fell in every direction. Frame houses, barns, sheds, bridges, canal-boats, etc., floated down the river in one general wreck.

There were many narrow escapes. The loss of life in Reading and vicinity was confined to a single family. It was that of William Sands, a puddler at the rolling-mill of Bertolet & Co., who resided on Front, below Franklin Street. The flood had surrounded the houses before the inmates could make their escape. The family consisted of Mr. Sands, wife and three children—the youngest being an infant only eight weeks old; also a hired girl and an unknown man. They took refuge in the second story. Both ends of the house had been washed out. As two men (William Seitzinger and William Moyer) approached to render aid, Mrs. Sands held out the child at arm's length; and just before they reached the building it fell, engulfing all. Two of the children were drowned immediately. Seitzinger and Moyer narrowly escaped with their lives. The man and hired girl caught hold of a piece of floating wood and were thereby enabled to be saved. Mr. and Mrs. Sands and the babe were carried down the river on the second floor of the building. The babe lay on a chaff-bag. The child was soon drowned by the surf. Near the rolling-mill Sands clung to a tree, and was rescued. He begged his wife to do likewise, but her strength failed her. Several boats with men were started after her to save her, but they could not reach her; whilst she floated down the river, a number of persons followed on the shore to the "Big Dam." In this dam there was a large break and in this fearful current she was drowned. Through the whole distance her shrieks were most agonizing. Her body was found during the next day in a corn-field, about a mile below the dam, and brought to the city. A single daughter—who was absent from the house at the time—alone remained of the family to share her father's sorrows and most melancholy bereavement.

The two men named had been out all morning before this occurrence, and had rescued over thirty people from situations of extreme peril. The wife and three children of Eli Marks—a ferryman at Reesor's ferry, below Althouse's bridge—were also drowned. Whilst he and they were endeavoring to save their property, the house was surrounded by water, and they were forced to the garret for refuge. But the water continued to rise. He then broke a hole through the roof, and drew up his wife and children. Immediately afterward the house fell, and the roof broke in two parts—leaving him on one part and his wife and children on the other. The latter were drowned before floating any considerable distance. He floated down on a log to which he had clung and was rescued at Kissinger's bridge (a distance of nine miles).
Aaron Kemp, a blacksmith at Althouse's locks, in attempting to save his tools, was also drowned in spite of efforts to rescue him.

Houses, etc., at Reading entirely or nearly destroyed, were estimated at 100; particularly noted, 69. Above Penn, 3; Front and Water Streets, between Penn and Franklin, 14; Franklin, from Water to Second, 10; Front, between Franklin and Chestnut, 5; Chestnut, from Water to Third, 8; Canal and Water, from Third Street to rolling-mill, 29. At least 400 dwellings, with furniture, were more or less injured.

Nine bridges were swept away:—County—Penn Street, Lancaster, Poplar Neck; Company, —Hamburg, Mohrsville, Althouse's, Kissinger's, Birdboro', Douglassville.

Opposite Reading the Schuylkill rose from twenty-three to twenty-five feet above its ordinary level. It is said to have been five feet ten inches higher than the celebrated Pumpkin Freshet of 1786.

Water covered the river road at Reese's mill several feet. It forced its way up Penn to within a few feet of Second; up Franklin within a half-square of Third; up Chestnut to Third, surrounding Lauer's brewery; up Third to near Chestnut; up Spruce, within a half square of Fourth; up Fourth to Bingaman; up Fifth, half square beyond the gas works, and a hundred yards up Sixth Street.

The aggregate loss occasioned by the freshet, to our community was estimated at five hundred thousand dollars.

On September 4, 1850, the City Councils appropriated five thousand dollars to relieve the sufferers from the freshet.

Richard Boone, General William High and Benjamin Tyson were appointed a committee to make distribution.

A number of ladies of the city established a clothing depot at Fifth and Spruce Streets and there, on Fifth Street, they relieved the wants of one hundred and thirty persons by supplying them with clothing.

Freshet of 1862.—A freshet occurred in June, 1862, which occasioned great damage and loss of property, especially in the eastern section of the state, along the Lehigh and Delaware Rivers. At Reading a heavy rain began to fall on Tuesday night, June 3d, and continued the whole of Wednesday till Thursday morning, when the water reached a point within eight feet as high as the great freshet of 1850. All the railroad trains were detained. The loss here was not great, amounting to several thousand dollars.

Freshet of 1869.—A heavy rain commenced to fall on Saturday night, October 2, 1869, and continued through the whole of Sunday. On Monday the river rose rapidly. At eleven o'clock in the morning the water reached a point twenty-three feet above low-water mark. The lower section of the city was overflooded, and all the mills, factories and work-shops along the river were injured. The total damage was not estimated, but it exceeded fifty thousand dollars. The eastern span of the Lancaster bridge was washed away, also one span of the Poplar Neck. A number of bridges spanning creeks in different parts of the county were destroyed, and many grist-mills suffered considerable damage. The City Councils appropriated one thousand dollars for the relief of suffering families along the river.

Discoloration of Water.—The natural color of the flowing water in the river was changed at different times to so great an extent as to excite public attention. The change was to a light blue. It was caused by the intermingling of the water from the mining regions in the upper Schuylkill—charged with sulphuric acid—with the lime stone water from its tributary the Maiden-creek. Immediately above the point of confluence (which is distant about eight miles north of Reading, along the river) the water, and specially the bed of the river, had a red or rusty appearance; but below it, a white sediment was formed upon the bed of the river, and the water became light blue. This combination was injurious to the fishes in the river, numbers of them having at times been seen floating dead upon the surface of the water. During 1853 it was particularly discolored. This discoloration was not continuous. It appeared at irregular intervals. Several years ago the admixture was so strong as to follow the current and be noticeable along the entire course of the Schuylkill to Philadelphia, notwithstanding the great influx of waters from the numerous tributaries between Reading and Philadelphia. It caused the death of many fishes, and it awakened the attention of the water commissioners of Philadelphia to its cause and character.

BRIDGES.

Long before the first settlements in this vicinity there had been a ford across the river at Reading. And this was the only convenient ford for some distance above and below. It was used for seventy years after the town had been laid out. The only steps in advance of the first settlers was the introduction of a ferry-boat. This is, indeed, a surprising fact. A town otherwise so progressive in respect to trade, etc., and possessing numerous men of energy and wealth, not to induce the construction of a bridge, so as to facilitate and encourage ingress into and egress out of the town! Such tardiness, such indifference we can hardly appreciate. The crossing of the river in a ferry-boat, or by fording it, was always accompanied with risk.1

HARRISBURG BRIDGE.—In 1795 a petition was presented to the Quarter Sessions of the county, praying the court to order the grand jury to consider the advisability of the erection of a stone bridge over the river at the foot of Penn Street. The grand jury made a view and recommended an appropriation of thirty-two thousand dollars for this purpose, which recommendation was approved by the court. But this sum was deemed insufficient. The petitioners then devised the plan of raising sufficient money by a "lottery," and in this behalf obtained an Act of Assembly, passed the 29th of March, 1796, which was as follows:

"WHEREAS, a number of the inhabitants of the county of Berks, by petition, have stated to the Legislature that the Grand Jury of the same have lately voted thirty-two thousand dollars out of the public stock of said county for the purpose of erecting a stone bridge over the river Schuylkill at or near the place where the public road from Philadelphia through Reading to Harrisburg crosses the same, and that the said sum will be inadequate to the completion of this desirable object. Therefore,

"SEC. 1.—Be it enacted, &c., that the three county commissioners for the time being, together with Jos. Hiester, Jas. Diemer, Thos. Dundas, Jas. May, John Otto, John Keim, Daniel Graeff and Sebastian Miller be commissioners to raise $300,000 by way of lottery, to be applied in erecting a good stone bridge over the river Schuylkill, etc."

Lottery Scheme.—In pursuance of this act, a notice of the lottery was published in the newspapers at Reading. This notice was as follows:

"Scheme of a lottery for raising sixty thousand dollars, agreeably to an Act of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, passed during the last session, for building a stone bridge over the river Schuylkill, at the borough of Reading, in the county of Berks.

"Commissioners."
"Tickets may be had of either of the aforesaid commissioners, at their respective places of abode, in the county of Berks. In Harrisburg, at Alex. Graydon and Wm. Graydon, Esq';s., and at Messrs. Michael Kapp, Wm. Means and George Ziegler's."

The commissioners awakened a considerable interest in behalf of the bridge, but they were not able to sell five thousand of the thirty thousand tickets, and they did not have the smallest prospect of disposing of the remainder within a reasonable time, so as to enable them to draw the said lottery. They therefore prayed the Legislature to authorize them to take back the tickets sold, to have their accounts settled, etc., and to repeal the act, which was done on the 29th of March, 1798. This first effort accordingly proved unsuccessful.

In 1801 another application was made to the Quarter Sessions for a view and an appropriation. The petition of divers inhabitants of the county represented:

"That a bridge is much wanted to be erected over the River Schuylkill in the Borough of Reading, at the place where the public highway crosses the said river on the Great Road from Philadelphia to Harrisburg, where it is frequently rendered impassable by means of ice and high water—that a former grand jury, with the concurrence of the Court, appropriated £14,000 to erect a stone arch bridge at the place aforesaid, which sum on calculation was discovered to be totally insufficient for the purpose, in consequence whereof a Lottery was instituted to assist the county in constructing the said bridge; that after great efforts and industry by the Lottery Commissioners to dispose of the tickets, they were not able to sell so many as to render it safe or practicable to draw the lottery—that from these causes the attempt to erect a stone bridge at the place aforesaid has altogether failed."

They concluded their petition with a prayer for a "wooden bridge," and estimated the probable expense at six thousand pounds. The grand jury acted upon the petition at August sessions, 1801, and recommended an appropriation of sixteen thousand dollars, which was to be assessed at three yearly equal payments. The courts approved of their action on August 6, 1801. The county commissioners then proceeded to cause the erection of a "wooden bridge." The contract was awarded to Obediah Osburn, on August 19th following, and the contractor began operations in earnest. What pride the people must have taken in watching the progress of this much-needed improvement! What anxiety they must have felt for the accomplishment of this undertaking! They doubtless wanted to see it completed. But they could not hurry the work. "Great bodies move slowly." This was a "great body," a big thing for the times. But the people were too anxious, the contractor failed at the piers, with much timber lying along the banks of the river. This was natural, and yet it was more interesting than natural. Additional appropriations were wanted. Possibly some of the good people were afraid of a wooden bridge in respect to strength and performance, and therefore preferred a stone bridge. And in this supposition there is more truth than fiction. The subsequent proceedings would indicate that this idea was entertained by the people. The county commissioners had expended thirty thousand dollars for what was done, and it was estimated that seventy thousand dollars more would be required to complete the bridge if built of stone. The county was then in arrears for unpaid State taxes, amounting to $4789.12; and the Legislature offered this sum as an inducement to build the bridge of stone, an act for this purpose having been passed on April 2, 1804.

At January sessions, 1805, a third petition was presented to court. This represented:

"That the Commissioners agreed with a certain person to build a wooden bridge, and did also cause to be built two abutments of stone on each bank and two piers in the river; that the person has not been able to perform his contract and the building of said bridge has been frustrated.

"That if the notion of building either a wooden or stone bridge be entirely abandoned, it will evince great imbecility or at least a great want of public spirit in one of the richest and most populous counties in the State of Pennsylvania. The want of a bridge at the place aforesaid will continue to be felt and the inconvenience arising from it will become augmented in proportion to the population, agriculture and commerce; that public opinion is now against a wooden bridge and for a stone arch bridge; that a wooden bridge without additional piers would be impracticable and unsafe; that the three additional piers to be required for a wooden bridge would be much towards expense of this bridge, which would not be twice the expense of completing a wooden bridge."

It was accompanied by a proposed plan, which suggested eight arches: two of thirty-seven feet, two of fifty-six feet, two of seventy feet and two of eighty-four feet, and the probable expense was estimated at twenty-five thousand pounds. The prayer of the petitioners was granted, and the return of the grand jury was approved by the court.

Notwithstanding this encouragement from the grand jury and the court, the county commissioners would appear to have been indifferent to the matter, and in 1806 a complaint was made to court, representing that the stone-work was suffering from neglect; and then again the grand jury recommended a stone bridge. For six years afterward this enterprise lay in idleness. What was the difficulty in the way? Who can imagine? On February 22, 1812, an act was passed authorizing the county commissioners to build a stone bridge and charge toll, and providing that, when the principal invested in its construction was realized from the tolls, it should be declared free. But still the matter halted. Another act was passed on February 21, 1814, which modified the previous act, by giving the commissioners the power to build either a stone or wooden bridge. This was a fortunate modification, not so much for the bridge as for the people. The delegation of discretionary power to the commissioners apparently won them over to the improvement, and they at once ordered the bridge to be erected—not of stone, for thereby they would have favored the wishes of the people and carried out the recommendations of the grand jury, but of wood. The bridge was so far completed as to be passable in December, 1815; and it was finished in 1818. The first passage over it was made by Coleman's stage-coach on December 20, 1815. Many persons were present to witness the occurrence, and they demonstrated their joy by loud applause. Well may we ask, What stood in the way of this important, much demanded improvement for nearly twenty years? Was it the stone which is typical in so many respects and hangs about so many necks to prevent the accomplishment of noble purposes? or was it the ferry-boat under the control of a politician? And such was the exertion, and so long was the period to obtain the "Harrisburg Bridge," the first public improvement of the town beyond the court house and prison! The bridge was six hundred feet long, three spans of two hundred feet each, covered by a roof. The builders were Wernweg & Johnston. They began in March, 1814. The contract price was thirty-nine thousand five hundred dollars. Their workmanship was highly complimented. John Weldy was appointed as the first toll collector. The rates of toll were as follows:

The subject of a "Free Bridge" was agitated as early as 1821, just three years after the bridge was completed. This related more particularly to persons. To accomplish this object, a petition was presented to the Legislature in February, 1821.

In February, 1846, petitions were presented to the Legislature "to declare the Harrisburg bridge free," setting forth that the bridge cost $50,438.15, and that the act under which it was built required it to become free whenever the toll collected amounted to the cost of its construction.

At August sessions, 1848, a petition was presented to court, representing that the tolls received from the bridge, excluding the pay to toll gatherers, amounted to $52,439.89, and that the expenditure amounted to $50,438.15, wherefore the petitioners asked the court to declare the bridge free. The county commissioners objected to the proceedings, and replied to the petition that the income had not amounted to the expense by $28,065.50, submitting the following statement as to the cost:

- Expense of abutments and piers, $20,510.25;
payment to Osborne, first contractor, $8833.42; payment to Warnweck & Nathans, builders, $49,297.94; repairs from 1836 to 1848, $1863.97; total, $80,505.58.

And they also alleged that, by reason of the balance still due, the bridge would not be free for fifteen years to come.

The subject was agitated for over thirty years afterward. The county bridges—Harrisburg, Lancaster and Poplar Neck—were not declared free till 1883. This great step forward was obtained through the instrumentality of the City Councils of Reading—an earnest and successful application in this behalf having been made to court, upon the representation that the tolls received exceeded the cost of erecting and maintaining them, and the judge having decided that the bridges must be declared free under the legislation which authorized their erection. The adjudication was made on March 28, 1883.

In 1884 it was demolished by the Schuylkill Valley Railroad Company, and this company erected in its stead a superior iron bridge at an expense exceeding one hundred thousand dollars. The county commissioners appropriated thirty-three thousand dollars toward the cost. The new bridge became a necessity, owing to the railroad improvements along the river.

HAMBURG BRIDGE.—Across the Schuylkill River, at a point several miles south of the Blue Mountain, there was a prominent ford—having been the direct course from Harris' ferry, on the Susquehanna River, to Easton, on the Delaware River. After the vicinity became considerably settled the ferry-boat was introduced, which continued in use till the substitution of a bridge, in 1828.

During the progress of the “Penn Street Bridge,” at Reading, the subject of a bridge was discussed at Hamburg, and the spirit created thereby was sufficient to result in the passage of an act of Assembly on March 19, 1816, for its erection. The act authorized the formation of a corporation for this purpose, with power to issue four hundred shares of stock, of the par value of twenty-five dollars; but no practical results flowed from this first effort. Eleven years afterward (April 14, 1827) an act was passed appropriating six thousand dollars from the State for the erection of a bridge over the Schuylkill, near Hamburg, on the State road from Jonestown (Lebanon County) to Northampton County. The bridge was erected during the following year by the commissioners of the county, and confirmed by the court on January 12, 1829. It has been maintained by the county since. Toll was charged till December, 1883, when it was made a free bridge.

LANCASTER BRIDGE.—The county commissioners were authorized, by an act of Assembly passed April 23, 1829, to erect a bridge over the river at Gerber's ferry, on the road from Reading to Lancaster. They entered into a contract, on the 20th of February, 1830, with Schuyler & Fletcher for the construction of this bridge of wood, with roof and sides, on stone abutments, at ten thousand dollars. It was finished in 1831. Its length was three hundred and fifty-two feet—two spans, each one hundred and seventy-six feet. This was the second bridge erected across the Schuylkill. The ferry at this point was owned previously by John Strohecker, after whom it was called “Strohecker's Ferry.” He sold it to John Gerber, and thence it took the name of “Gerber's Ferry.” This bridge has been known since as the “Lancaster Bridge.”

In January, 1838, a part of the bridge was swept away by a high freshet, and in 1860 two spans were swept away by the great freshet. In the freshet of 1869 the eastern half was washed away.

In 1876 (July 9th) the bridge was destroyed by fire—the act of young incendiaries. Shortly before there were loud complaints about its insecurity and darkness and its unpleasant condition on account of dust. The county commissioners caused a fine iron bridge to be erected in its stead, having been opened to travel on January 2, 1877. It was the first large iron bridge structure erected in the county. It was declared free of toll in 1883.

POPLAR NECK BRIDGE.—Immediately after the completion of the “Lancaster Bridge,” the 1 Counsellors gave A. K. Stannifer, Esq., a vote of thanks for his efforts and public spirit in this proceeding.

Legislature authorized the erection of a county toll-bridge across the river at "Poplar Neck," about four miles below Reading. The act was passed on the 31st of January, 1832, and the following commissioners were named in it: Peter Kline, Jr., Greenwich; John Miller, Albany; John Rutter, Colebrookdale; Daniel Eyster, Pike; Jacob Banman, Earl; and Henry Keely, Douglassville.

These commissioners acted in pursuance of the powers conferred upon them, reported that the bridge was necessary and the county commissioners accordingly built the same during 1832 and 1833. It has been maintained till now by the county. Toll was exacted till the county bridges were declared free, in 1888.

At this place a ferry had been conducted for many years before 1832. It was known as "Lewis' Ferry." In 1816 a company was authorized to be organized, and certain commissioners were then appointed to construct a bridge across the Schuylkill at this point; but the spirit for this improvement was suffered to pass away, and the people of that vicinity did not secure a bridge for sixteen years afterward, when it was erected for them by the county.

PRIVATE BRIDGES.

The following private bridges were erected across the Schuylkill by private individuals or stock companies specially incorporated and anthorized for that purpose:

BELL'S BRIDGE.—In 1822, Samuel Bell was authorized to erect a substantial bridge across the Schuylkill near his fording-place, opposite the road known by the name of Lardner's Lane, provided that he finish the same within five years. He commenced its erection, but was prevented from completing it on account of the prevailing sickness in the neighborhood, which had been occasioned by the construction of the Schuylkill Canal near the bank of the river.

The act was revived, as if the bridge had been built and completed within the time limited.
Subsequently, in 1833, commissioners were appointed to form a stock company for the purpose of erecting this bridge "near to Bell's Mill." They were, Anthony Bickel, William Eckert, Samuel Bell and William Lash, of Reading, and Abraham Kissinger, Daniel Dappen, Michael K. Boyer, Hiram Kalbach and Jacob Conrad, of Bern township. This point was at the mouth of the Tulpehocken Creek.
The bridge, as contemplated, was not finished;
but Mr. Bell succeeded in extending a common bridge across the river with movable planks chained to the cross-beams. It was in use till the great freshet of 1850, when it was swept away, leaving only the abutments to indicate its existence.

"KISSINGER'S"—THE FIRST BRIDGE.—The
"Harrisburg Bridge" was first suggested and steps towards its erection first taken in 1795;
but it was not completed till the lapse of twenty-two years. Different enterprises were inistituted and finished in this time. Among them was a bridge across the river farther north, erected by Ulrich Kissinger in 1810. It would seem that he wasted no time in completing this improvement; and, by his promptness and energy, he became the builder and owner of the first bridge which spanned the river in the county.

Ulrich Kissinger was authorized by act passed February 12, 1810, "to erect a toll-bridge over the Schuylkill River at his mill where the road from Reading to Sunbury through Bern township crosses the river." This was at the place where the "Kissinger Bridge" is now situated, over a mile above the "Harrisburg Bridge." The bridge was then built of chains in two spans. Its length was about three hundred feet. It took its name after the projector and owner, and it has been since known by this name. About 1830 this "chain bridge" was removed and a wooden bridge, with roof and sides, substituted. This was swept away by the freshet of 1850. A new bridge, of same style, with one span, two hundred feet long, was built in 1851. This is still standing. It is a private toll-bridge.
Leiss’ Bridge.—In 1833 David Bright, David Gehr, John Stauch and Henry Hahn, of Reading; Adam Leiss, of Alsace township; and Jacob Ebling, Jacob Kline, William Hain and Philip Fox, of Bern township, were appointed to form a stock company for the purpose of erecting a bridge over the Schuylkill, near Leiss’ mill. The necessary stock was raised, and a covered wooden bridge was erected, within a year, at the place designated, and it has been successfully maintained as a private toll-bridge from that time till now. It is situated about five miles above Reading.

Stoudt’s Ferry Bridge.—The following commissioners—Jacob Stoudt, Samuel Moser, Jacob Leinbach, Abraham Koenig, Daniel Aulenbach, John Koenig, Abraham Rieser, Abraham B. Tobias, George Maurer, George Medler, Reuben Herbine, Abraham Herbine, John Zacharias, John Zacharias, Jr., Jonathan Koenig, Jonas Shalter, Samuel Mengle, George Shalter, George Fox, William Dunkle, Jacob Kalbach, Adam W. Kaufman, Dr. D. L. Beaver, Peres Hehn, Jacob S. Ebling, Jacob Ahrens, Dr. J. H. Spatz and Jonathan Bittner—were appointed, by an act passed in 1850, for the purpose of erecting a toll-bridge across the Schuylkill, at the place where there was, and had been for many years, a ferry, known as Stoudt’s Ferry. The bridge was to be begun in two years and finished in five years; but, it not having been erected in the time limited, a second act was passed in 1855. The necessary stock was subscribed, and the bridge company was formed in the latter part of 1856, when operations for the construction of a covered wooden bridge were begun. The bridge was finished in July, 1857. It has been maintained since as a toll-bridge. A ferry had been in use here for thirty years to convey boat-teams from the one side of the river to the other.

Althouse’s Bridge.—In 1834 John Althouse, Adam Reber, Benjamin Parvin, Jacob S. Ebling, John Ginger, of Maiden-creek township, and Abraham Reiser, Jacob Orange, Jacob Kaufman and John Potteiger, of Bern township, were appointed commissioners to form a bridge company and erect a bridge across the Schuylkill, at or near Althouse’s, about eleven miles above Reading (now Leesport). The bridge was erected in 1835. From that time till January, 1886, it was continued as a private toll-bridge, and then, upon proceedings of appraisement, it was taken by the county and declared a free county bridge.

Mohr’s Bridge (Mohrsville).—In 1836 the following commissioners, citizens of Berks County—John Gernand, George Loose, John H. Mohr, Peter Addams, Isaac Addams, Geo. Haag, Jacob Kline, Jacob D. Klein, John Kauffman, Christopher Klein, Jacob Yoder, John Yoder, Philip Schneider, John Snyder, Jacob Philips, Philip Kline, Daniel Guldin and Valentine Wagner—were appointed to form a stock company for the purpose of erecting a bridge over the Schuylkill, at or near Mohr’s tavern. It was constructed in 1837, and maintained as a private toll-bridge till 1886, when it was appropriated by the county and set apart as a free county bridge.

Windsor Haven Bridge (Shoemakersville).—In 1842 James Reber and Joshua Reber were authorized to construct a toll-bridge over the Schuylkill, at or near Windsor Haven. Subsequently, in 1849, commissioners were appointed to form a stock company for this purpose. They were Benjamin Seidel, John Kirchner, Solomon Seidel, William Madare, Samuel Hoffman, David Moll, Daniel Unger, Charles Egolf, John Shappell, John Heckman, Solomon H. Lesher, Jacob Boyer, Isaac Deturk, Elijah Weidman, George K. Haag, Samuel Stepp, William Merwine, Daniel Christ, Joseph Seidel, David Keim, John Schlappig, Samuel Keim, Benneville Unger.

The bridge was erected in 1862, and maintained by this company as a private toll-bridge till 1886, when it was taken by the county and declared a free bridge.

Birdsboro’ Bridge.—A covered wooden bridge was erected across the Schuylkill at Birdsboro’ during the years 1844–45. The nearest bridge to this point across the Schuylkill was at Douglassville, three miles down the river, and at Poplar Neck, six miles up the river. A company was incorporated for this purpose by act of Assembly passed March 16, 1844, and therein the following commissioners were named for its organization and management: Levi B. Smith, James Everhart, David Smith, Jeremiah B. Kerns, Isaac Christman, Jacob Pyle, Edward Brooke. This bridge has been since maintained as a private toll-bridge.

Monocacy Bridge.—In 1866 the Monocacy Bridge Company was incorporated to erect a bridge across the Schuylkill, near Monocacy Furnace, at the village of Mount Airy, and the following commissioners were appointed to raise the necessary subscriptions of stock and organize said company: Benjamin B. Thomas, Chas. M. Clingan, Charles F. Norton, Thomas T. Iaeager, Michael Lynch, J. F. Gulden, Hiram Ludwig, Jeremiah Weaver, Morris Hacker.

The company succeeded in erecting an iron bridge during the years 1870–71. It has been maintained as a private toll-bridge since.

Douglassville Bridge.—In 1832 a bridge was authorized to be erected over the Schuylkill River, between the “Black Horse” and “White Horse” taverns, in Amity township, and for this purpose a company was incorporated and six commissioners—prominent and influential citizens of the county—were appointed, George Douglass, Frederick Linderman, Clement Brook, John P. Rutter, Jacob S. Spang and John Ber- tolet. Sufficient stock was taken and a covered wooden bridge was erected shortly afterward at the point designated. And this bridge was successfully maintained as a private toll-bridge till 1885, when it was declared a free county bridge, upon the earnest application of citizens of Amity, Douglass and Union townships for that purpose.

Exeter Bridge.—In 1866 a company was incorporated for the purpose of erecting a bridge across the Schuylkill, near Exeter Station, and the following commissioners were appointed for the organization of the company: Henry Thompson, Daniel Reed, William E. Schlemm, Washington S. Kissinger, Reuben B. Seidle, Isaac Moore, Gottlieb Moyer, John Kufp, Simon Seyfert, J. P. Althouse, Amos W. Potteiger, Martin Dankle, George W. Bruckman.

A bridge was much needed at this point—the nearest bridge across the Schuylkill being at Birdsboro’, four miles below, and at Poplar Neck, several miles above, and the inhabitants suffered much inconvenience without it. Twenty years have elapsed, but this bridge remains to be constructed. It was the second bridge company incorporated in the county, and in the same section of territory, which failed to accomplish its purpose, notwithstanding the improvement was a necessary one for that section of the county. A county bridge was applied for at “Medlar’s Ford,” across the Schuylkill, seven miles above Reading, and an act was passed in 1832, but it was repealed in the following year. The “Exeter Ford” is still used.

Railroad Bridges.—A number of handsome and substantial bridges have been erected across the river by the several railroad companies operated in the county. They are—

Philadelphia and Reading Railroad, near Tuckerton—high arch, built of stone.

Lebanon Valley Railroad—within limits of Reading, built of iron.

Berks County Railroad (now Schuylkill and Lebanon)—three; one at and two below Reading, built of wood.

Pennsylvania Schuylkill Valley Railroad—five; one above, another at, and three below Reading, built of iron.

There are now altogether twenty-three bridges which span the river within the limits of the county.

Roads and Turnpikes.

Indian Paths.—There were paths through this section of country long before Reading was laid out. The “Schuylkill Ford” was a central point for the Indians. Nature would seem to have selected the site for the town rather than the Penns. Accessible water may have induced the Penns to select it; but Nature—the great index to many things, which so strangely remain hidden from our perception till revealed to us by time and experience—formed the ford that became the terminus of different roads. And naturally the confluence of these roads directed the tendency to formulate a town. Roads make a town. Its success is dependent upon them. They antecedent the railroad centre as a sure means towards the rapid development of a community.

Tulpehocken Road.—The earliest mention of a road through this region of country is the road which was marked out in 1687, from the Delaware at Philadelphia to the Susquehanna, by way of this ford. It was known for many years as the "Tulpehocken road." In 1768 a road was regularly laid out from Reading, to the Susquehanna, at "Fort Augusta," by way of Middletown (now Womelsdorf) and Rehrer's Tavern (now Rehersburg), over the Blue and Broad Mountains, in pursuance of a petition from a considerable number of inhabitants of Berks County, presented on 30th of January, 1768. The report was presented to the Executive Council on 19th January, 1769. The roads began "at the east end of Penn Street, in the town of Reading, and extended through the same to the banks of the river Schuylkill, west three hundred and forty six perches; thence south eighty-seven degrees west thirty-three perches across said river; thence four courses westwardly with a total distance of fourteen hundred and fifty-seven perches to Sinking Spring Town; thence by fifteen courses, generally westwardly, a total distance of twenty-eight hundred and fourteen perches to Second Street, in Middletown [now Womelsdorf]; thence across the Tulpehocken Creek and by way of John Rice's tavern and Nicholas Kinser's, northwardly to Gottfried Rehrer's tavern [now Rehersburg], and thence by way of Henry Derr's house to Fort Henry, and over the Kittanning Mountain, etc., in a northwardly course to Fort Augusta." The commissioners appointed to lay out the road were Jonas Seely, John Patton, Frederick Weiser, Benjamin Spycker, Christian Laur, Thomas Jones, Jr., James Scull, Mark Bird, Henry Christ.

Fifty years afterward this road from Reading to Middletown, and thence westwardly to and through Dauphin County, became a turnpike, a company for this purpose having been incorporated in 1805, under the name of "Berks and Dauphin Turnpike Company."

The commissioners from Berks County were Joseph Hiester, Peter Frailey, John Keim, Sr., of Reading, John Huy, George Ege, Conrad Stauch, Christian Lower.

The turnpike was, however, not then begun. The "Harrisburg Bridge" was under a cloud at the time, and possibly threw a "cold wave" over the commissioners. Their ardor was chilled by some means. Ten years afterward the two seemed to move together, and they were completed about the same time. The turnpike was commenced in 1816, just after the bridge was passable, and finished in 1817; and it has been maintained successfully till now, a period exceeding seventy years.

The Assembly of the State had anticipated this turnpike by certain proceedings thirty years before, for in the Assembly on September 15, 1783, a committee in their report recommended the following resolutions:

"To view the different roads leading from Susquehanna to Reading and Philadelphia, and point out the most practicable mode of improving and repairing the same, and to consider the most probable way of opening a communication between the rivers Susquehanna and Schuylkill, and to form estimates of the expenses to carry the above designs into execution and to report their proceedings with all possible expedition to the next House of Assembly."

And on September 20th the House appointed David Rittenhouse, Thomas Hutchins and Nathan Sellers to carry out the resolutions. I could not find any subsequent proceedings in the matter.

MAIDEN-CREEK ROAD.—A road was surveyed by Samuel Lightfoot in 1745, from Francis Parvin's mill, near the mouth of the Maiden-creek, southwardly to the ford (where Reading now is), in almost a straight line about six miles in length, and confirmed in June, 1745. In 1753 it was regularly laid out from Reading northwardly, and extended to Easton by commissioners from Berks and Northampton Counties, appointed by the Executive Council at Philadelphia. The commissioners from Berks County were Francis Parvin, James Boone, Jacob Levan, Joseph Penrose, Benjamin Lightfoot, Sebastian Zimmerman.

1 Penn refers to it in his proposal of 1690 for a second settlement, which was to be made at a point on the Susquehanna, now Harrisburg.

A turnpike was constructed on this road from Callowhill Street, in the borough, over the "longhill" to the mouth of the Maiden-creek, and thence northwardly, by way of Hamburg, "Schuylkill Gap" and "Sharp Mountain Gap," and northwardly over Broad Mountain, by way of a point now Ashland, to Sunbury. A company for this purpose was incorporated in 1805 to be called "Centre Turnpike Company." The turnpike was completed before 1812. The commissioners from Berks County were Joseph Hiester and James May, of Reading, and Jacob Toppell, of Hamburg. The turnpike was conducted and tolls were exacted till 1884, when it was abandoned, such a conclusion of a great franchise not resulting till the road was declared a nuisance for want of repairs.

OLEY ROAD.—In September, 1727, a petition was presented to the court at Philadelphia for a road to extend from the "Lutheran Meeting House" at the Tulpehocken to the High road at the "Quaker Meeting House," near George Boone’s mill in Oley. Eight years after days the court appointed Mordecai Lincoln, Marcus Hulings, James Thompson, Peter Robeson, Benjamin Boon, Thomas Potts to lay out this road from the high road eastwardly to the Schuylkill ford. They reported a road at June sessions, 1736, which began at the ford; thence south 80 degrees east 80 perches; south 75 degrees east 800 perches; south 70 degrees east 420 perches, etc.; onward in almost a direct line eastwardly to a road called the "King’s Highway." Its eastern terminus was at a point now Amityville. This was the road to Philadelphia for many years, till changed by a road from a point near the "Black Bear Inn," by way of Bishop’s Hill, to a point near Molarton church, now at Douglassville. In 1810 a turnpike was authorized to be constructed on this road from Reading, by way of "White Horse tavern" and Pottsgrove, to Perkiomen Mills, at Perkiomen Creek. In 1811, commissioners were named, those from Berks County having been George Douglass, Matthew Brooke, John Brower, Conrad Fegar, Lewis Reese.

They immediately commenced its construction and completed it in four years at an average cost of seven thousand dollars per mile.

The road from the "Old Philadelphia road," near Schwartzwald Church, to the King’s Highway (Pleasantville to Amityville) was laid out and confirmed in 1755. The "Oley Turnpike" is constructed on this road from Jacksonwald eastward. The company for this superior, well-kept turnpike was incorporated in 1862. The road extends from "Black Bear Inn" to Pleasantville, ten miles. The total cost was fifty thousand dollars. The commissioners appointed to receive subscriptions of stock were William Herbst, George S. Yoder, Enoch E. Griesemer, Peter D. Griesemer, Wellington B. Griesemer, John Snyder, Amos Ritter.

1 The petition for this road was presented in Council-on 21st of May, 1753. It was signed by the following prominent men of the county, who represented that "the roads now commonly used were not laid out by any authority, either from this Board or from the respective Courts of the said counties [Northampton and Berks], and they are often diverting and obstructed and rendered almost impassable:"

narvon township, in a northwesternly direction to Reading. It was surveyed by George Boone, and reported in 1751. This is supposed to be the road from Warwick Furnace, by way of "Plow tavern" and "Green Tree tavern," through Caernarvon, Robeson and Cumru townships and along the western bank of the Schuylkill, "to the Tulpehocken road opposite Reading." It was twelve and a half miles in length.

Other Roads.—"Neversink road," from Reading southwardly to "Flying Hill," in 1753.

"Alsace Church road," from Reading northwardly through Alsace township, in 1753.

"Lancaster road," from Reading southwardly through Cumru township, in 1762.

"Bern road," from Reading northwardly over the Schuylkill at point now occupied by Kissinger's bridge, through Bern township, in 1772.

"Alsace road," from Reading northeastwardly through Alsace township into Oley township, to a point in the "King's Highway" (supposed to be near Friedensburg, and now called the "Friedensburg road") in 1776.

Numerous other public roads have been laid out round-about Reading. The prominent highways distant from Reading are mentioned in the several sections into which I have divided the county.

From Reading during its earlier history. And these have continued to be the great roads for travel till now.

In 1822 the State held subscriptions of stock in the three turnpike companies, as follows:

Berks and Dauphin $29,000 (individual subscription $63,905); Centre; $80,000 (individual subscription $62,000); Perkiomen, $58,000 (individual subscription $135,000). Length reported: 1, 34 miles; 2, 75 miles; 3, 28$ miles.

Stages.

First Stages.—The first public conveyance at Reading was a two-horse coach. It was instituted by Martin Hausman in 1789 and traveled weekly between Reading and Philadelphia for the transportation of passengers and letters. The distance was about fifty-one miles, and the passage was made in two days. The fare was two dollars, and letter carriage three pence. During this year he transferred the established business to Alexander Eisenbeis. After operating it two years, Eisenbeis sold it to William Coleman, and from this time onward, for nearly seventy years, without intermission, the Coleman family were prominent throughout Eastern Pennsylvania for their connection with this great enterprise.

Coleman Lines.—Soon after Coleman had obtained the possession of this stage-line he extended it westwardly, by way of Womelsdort and Lebanon, to Harrisburg, and northwardly, by way of Hamburg, Orwigsburg, Sharp Mountain Gap and over the Broad Mountain, to Sunbury. In 1818 the stages ran twice a week from Philadelphia to Sunbury. They left Philadelphia on Tuesdays and Saturdays at three A.M.; arrived at Reading at five P.M., and lodged at Hamburg on the same days; and on the following mornings left at three A.M. and arrived at Sunbury on the succeeding days at ten A.M. And

The accompanying plan will indicate in a general way how the prominent roads extended

\[\text{PLAN OF ROADS TO READING.}\]

1 The first coach in New England began its trips in 1744. The first stage-line between New York and Philadelphia—then the two most populous cities in the colonies—was established in 1756. The trip was made in three days. When the Revolution came, most of these public conveyances ceased to run. And they did not take the road till the return of peace. Many years elapsed before the traffic over the highways became at all considerable.

2 Daniel Lebo ran a line from Reading to Sunbury and return, bi-weekly for a time.
they ran thrice a week from Philadelphia to Harrisburg—Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays,—leaving Philadelphia at four A.M., lodging at Reading and arriving at Harrisburg the next evening. The same order was observed in returning. The length of the respective lines over the turnpikes to the south, west and north was as follows: Reading to Philadelphia, fifty-one miles; Reading to Harrisburg, fifty-three miles; Reading to Sunbury, seventy-seven miles.

In 1820 William Coleman died. His widow carried on the stage-lines till May 21, 1821, when the sons, John and Nicholas, purchased and conducted them. They then advertised the following schedule:

“Leave Philadelphia on Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays at 4 A.M.; arrive at Reading at 3 P.M. (a gain of two hours), and lodge at Womelsdorf, proceeding next morning to Harrisburg; and in returning leave Harrisburg on same days at 11 A.M., lodge at Womelsdorf, start next day at 4 A.M., breakfast at Reading and arrive at Philadelphia in the evening. Through fare was $7; to Reading from either place, $8.50. From Philadelphia to Sunbury, leave Philadelphia on Tuesdays and Saturdays at 4 A.M.; and returning, leave Sunbury Wednesdays and Fridays at 9 A.M. Hamburg was the lodging-place on the way. Fare, $8; way passengers, seven cents a mile.

In 1823 they ran weekly stages to the southwest to Lancaster, over a natural road, in length thirty-two miles, and to the northeast to Easton, over a natural road, in length fifty miles.

In 1825 Colder & Wilson ran the “Mail-Stage” between Reading and Harrisburg three times a week, leaving Sundays, Wednesdays and Fridays at five A.M., and arriving at Harrisburg at five P.M.; and on return leaving Harrisburg on Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays at five A.M. and arriving at five P.M. The passenger fare was 50 cents to Womelsdorf; $1 to Lebanon and $2 to Harrisburg.

Stage Combination.—In 1826 a combination was made between the Coleman, Jacob Peters and Colder & Co. to run a daily line of stages between Philadelphia and Harrisburg via Reading. The arrangement began June 27, 1826. The stages left Philadelphia daily, except Monday, at four A.M., dined at Reading, lodged at Lebanon, and proceeded to Harrisburg next morning. Returning, they left Harrisburg daily, except Tuesday, in afternoon, lodged at Lebanon, took breakfast at Reading next morning and arrived in Philadelphia at eight P.M. Through fare, $6; to Reading, $3.

From the beginning till 1826 the stage-coach in use was called a “steamboat,” an uncovered wagon capable of holding twenty passengers. It was manufactured at Lancaster by Sleighmaker & Co. Then a sharp competition arose in this business between three lines; first, the “Old Line,” or Coleman’s, which conveyed the mails; second, Reeside & Platt’s; and third, Miltimore & Mintzer’s. This was in 1827. A new and improved stage-coach was introduced as a consequence, called the “Troy Coach.” It held eleven passengers with room for five and more on top.

In 1830 the competition was full of life. The rates were reduced one-half. But the “Old Line” forced the others to withdraw. Its mail contracts were a great support and enabled it to bear the pressure. It carried a hundred horses always on hand to supply the lines with motive power under any emergency.

Decline of Stages.—The stage business continued active and profitable in the several directions from Reading till the introduction of the railways, when it was discontinued. The stage-coach could not compete with the railroad train, or horse-power with steam-power. And in this respect, as in others, the fittest and strongest survived. The discontinuance on the several lines was as follows: From Philadelphia, 1838; from Potts ville, 1842; from Harrisburg, 1858; from Allentown, 1859.

A daily line of stages on the road to Lancaster was begun on June 15, 1848, and this continued in successful operation till the construction of the Columbia Railroad, in 1864.

Stages still run in different directions from

Reading and carry passengers, merchandise and mail. The lines extend to (1) Bernville and Millersburg, (2) Adamstown, (3) Friedensburg and Pikeville, (4) Oley Pike to Pleasantville and Shanesville.

A line of mail-stages was conducted for a time by Conrad Stauch from Womelsdorf via Rehrersburg and Millersburg to Pine Grove, leaving Womelsdorf three times a week, Mondays, Thursdays and Saturdays, and returning from Pine Grove Wednesdays, Fridays and Sundays. Through fare was $1.25.

CANALS.

The great internal improvements in this country were projected in Pennsylvania. The enterprise of her early citizens directed the first public attention to the establishment of canals and turnpikes for convenient transportation. In 1690 William Penn suggested the idea of connecting the Susquehanna and Schuylkill by means of a canal, but it was not acted upon. Seventy years afterward this idea was again considered, and then a survey was made by David Rittenhouse and others. A course was marked out for a canal between these two rivers; but nearly seventy years more elapsed before the great scheme was realized and put into practical and successful operation.

Union Canal.—In 1791 the Legislature of Pennsylvania passed an act incorporating the Schuylkill and Susquehanna Navigation Company for the purpose of connecting the two rivers by a canal, and facilitating traffic thereby from the one to the other; and in 1792 another company was chartered, under the name of the Delaware and Schuylkill Canal Company, for the purpose of extending a canal from the eastern terminus of the canal mentioned at Reading, along the Schuylkill to the Delaware at Philadelphia. These canals were to be part of a great scheme conceived by an association of enterprising individuals in order to promote internal improvements, whereby Philadelphia and Pittsburgh were to be connected by water communication. But these creatures of the law would appear to have received little life from the Legislature and their projectors, because they accomplished nothing in the nature of a practical improvement.

On April 2, 1811, the Legislature passed an act to incorporate “The Union Canal Company of Pennsylvania.” The name was chosen because the new corporation was really a union of the old Schuylkill and Susquehanna and the Delaware and Schuylkill Canal Companies. The preamble recited that those corporations had made strenuous efforts to carry out the objects of their charters, but had failed. They were, therefore, dissolved, and a new company was formed by the stockholders of the old corporations, whose relative rights were adjusted in a new distribution of the capital. The managers went to work with hope, but not with vigor. They had trouble because their capital was insufficient, and were waiting the slow profits which came through the grants of lottery privileges. Seventeen years had gone by before the canal was finished. It was announced on the 1st of January, 1828, that the work was completed, but it was nearly three months afterward before it was used. The first canal-boat that went west was the “Fair Trader,” Captain Smith, which left Philadelphia on the 20th of March of that year, by way of the Schuylkill Navigation to Reading, and thence by the Union Canal to Middletown, arriving at the latter place on the 29th. The event was duly celebrated at Middletown. There were seventeen Union Canal boats in service in July, 1828, and over two hundred were in operation before the end of that year.

The length of the canal is 793 ½ miles, with 91 locks, 8 basins, 93 bridges, 16 dams and 17 aqueducts. From the summit (four miles east of Lebanon) to the mouth of Tulpehocken Creek the distance is 37 miles. This section of the canal is 26 feet wide at bottom, and 36 feet at water surface; depth of water, 4 feet, and width of towing path, 10 feet. The number of locks required to overcome the fall of 310 feet is 52. The locks are faced with dressed sandstone; chambers 8½ feet wide and 75 feet long; and lifts vary from 5 to 8 feet. About 1855 the locks were enlarged to correspond with the locks of the Pennsylvania Canal—first from Pine Grove westwardly to Middletown, and afterward from the Swatara eastwardly to Reading.

The success of this canal was dependent upon the construction of a similar canal along the Schuylkill; in order to encourage traffic from Susquehanna to Philadelphia by way of Reading. A company had been chartered in 1815 for this purpose, which then began the improvement desired, and finished it in 1825.

In 1830 the canal was extended along the western bank of the Schuylkill; three miles below Reading, to the “Little Dam,” having its outlet in the “Big Dam,” about a thousand feet below. But this portion was washed so badly by the freshet of 1850 that it was rendered useless, and connection was altogether made with the Schuylkill Canal at a lock near the Harrisburg Bridge. 1

In order to form an idea of the extent and growth of the business over this canal, soon after it was completed, the following statistics are presented:

For the week ending May 27, 1831, eighty boats passed Reading going down, forty-five being loaded with lumber and coal, and the others with flour, whiskey, castings, etc.; and sixty passed going up, seventeen of which were loaded with merchandise.

For the week ending June 14, 1835, one hundred and twenty-five loaded boats passed down, and one hundred and twelve loaded boats passed up.

Some years afterward the tonnage and tolls were as follows,—

| Year | Tons | Tolls rec’d.
|------|------|-------------
| 1847 | 139,256 | $91,356
| 1848 | 158,222 | 95,933
| 1849 | 148,332 | 88,800

Lottery Privileges.—The amount of money raised in the course of the prosecution of the canal work between the Schuylkill and Susquehanna Rivers was enormous, not so much from the actual cost of the improvements as in the wasteful way in which the money was raised, and the amount taken from the community which did no good to the enterprise. The capital of the two companies, which were afterward united, was believed to be insufficient for the execution of the work, and the Legislature, in order, as it was supposed, to assist them, granted them power to raise money “by way of lottery.” The whole amount specified in the grant was $400,000, of which the Schuylkill and Susquehanna Company was to have two-thirds, and the Delaware and Schuylkill Canal Company one-third. This act was passed April 17, 1795, and under it the companies began, shortly afterward, to exercise the privilege of issuing lottery tickets. This power was exercised for fifteen years, with small profit. Till 1810 the companies had realized about $60,000 from the lottery, a sum wholly insufficient for their purposes. They complained that their affairs had “fallen into disorder and embarrassment; that they were covered with reproach and ridicule,” and that the public confidence was impaired in their efforts. This led to the union of the two corporations in 1811. In the act, the lottery grant privileges were renewed; and, as the company had not made much by their own management, they were empowered to sell or assign their lottery rights to any persons whom they might select. The company leased out the lottery privileges to various lessees or managers. Under this arrangement and in the course of years the lotteries became very successful. The managers took in large amounts of money, but the Canal Company did not have much added to their funds: A report made to the Legislature states that the lottery managers made many millions, while the Union Canal Company got but $269,210.40. There was high dispute about the business, great scandal and much bad blood.

The act of Assembly for the suppression of lotteries in Pennsylvania on and after the 1st of March, 1833, declared that the lottery rights of the company were exhausted, and prohibited the sale of lottery tickets of any kind after Dec. 31st of that year. But, as a compensation for the privileges which were taken away from the company, the Governor was authorized to subscribe for 1000 shares of the stock on behalf of the State of Pennsylvania. The lotteries of the Union Canal Company were drawn at stated periods from the gallery of the stairs in the tower of the State-House, which led to the upper chambers. After the Arcade was finished, in 1827, they were drawn from the gallery in front of the second-story offices, in the east avenue. Hundreds of persons attended these drawings.

1 At this point the company had constructed, about 1828, a dam called “Union Dam” (commonly known as the Lott’s Dam), for the purpose of forming a connection with the Schuylkill Canal; and this was the only connection till 1855, when the canal was extended to a point opposite “Jackson’s Lock,” at the foot of Sixth Street, where connection was afterward made.

The canal was supposed to be the only possible means of conveyance, except by the common road, long after all the companies connected with the navigation of the Schuylkill were chartered. The Columbia Railroad, under the management of the State, began to be a rival of the Union Canal in bringing produce and passengers from the Susquehanna as soon as it was finished. The movement for its establishment commenced in 1826, when a company was incorporated to build a railroad from Lancaster and Columbia to Philadelphia. The plan not proving successful, in 1828 the State of Pennsylvania authorized a survey, and followed it up in after-years by appropriations, under which the work was carried on. The road was finished to Lancaster in April, 1834, and opened through to Columbia in the summer of 1835. Just as soon as this means of transportation was finished the Union Canal Company lost a large share of its business and prospects. The railroad offered a shorter route and quicker method of communication between the Susquehanna, Schuylkill and Delaware Rivers. The opening of the Lebanon Valley Railroad, from Reading, to Harrisburg, in 1857, through the same section of territory, proved the final and crushing blow to the Union Canal Company. From that time onward it began to decline more and more. It has not been in full operation for some years; in fact, the traffic upon it declined soon after its enlargement, owing to the competition referred to and the disuse of the Pennsylvania canals.

Schuylkill Canal—Incorporation of Company.—The Schuylkill Canal Navigation was incorporated on March 8, 1815, for the purpose of transporting coal, lumber, merchandise, produce, etc., by a system of canals and slackwater navigation, which was to be afforded by appropriating the water of the Schuylkill River from Mill Creek, in Schuylkill County, to Philadelphia. The transportation of articles was then carried on over the Centre turnpike to Reading, and the Perkiomen and Germantown turnpikes to Philadelphia. Certain commissioners were named in the act, among them being the following prominent and enterprising men from Berks County: Lewis Reese, John S. Hiester, John Wiley; James May, Jacob K. Boyer, John Brower, Matthew Brooke, Robert Scott, Abraham Bailey, Abraham Wolf.

These commissioners were directed to open subscription books at various places in May, 1815. The par value of a share of stock was fixed at fifty dollars, and twenty-five hundred shares were to be subscribed at Reading—one-fourth of the total shares.

The first board of directors was elected at Norristown on October 5, 1815. It included two members from Berks County—Lewis Reese, of Reading, and John Wiley, of Maiden-creek. Samuel Baird, of Pottsgrove (now Pottstown), was also a member, having soon after removed to Reading and practiced law. The construction of the canal was begun in 1817.

Construction of Road.—In 1822 the president of the company, Cadwallader Evans, reported that “the canal was completed from John Potts’, at the mines, to within one-half a mile of Hamburg, below the Blue Mountain, and sixteen miles from Reading. This included the tunnel at the mountain. The remaining portion of the upper section, north of Reading, was not finished. The lower section, from the Lancaster Schuylkill bridge (at Philadelphia) to Reading, was finished.” He also reported that boats had carried during the year (1821) over the completed portion of the canal, from the coal-mines to the vicinity of Hamburg, large quantities of coal, which were deposited there and sold out by the ton to the country people from the neighborhood and for many miles distant. No tolls were required from the boats during the fall of 1821. The unfinished portion of the canal was reported to have been completed during the year 1822; and this was the first completed navigation enterprise in the country.

1 The boats were diminutive, being only eighteen tons' capacity at the opening of the canal; afterwards, in 1825, increased to twenty-three tons; and, further, the size and tonnage of boats was increased until 1815, when the capacity was sixty tons.

The total length from Mt. Carbon to Philadelphia was one hundred and five miles (sixty-two miles of canal and forty-three miles of pools in river), was a fall of five hundred and eighty-eight feet; including one hundred and twenty locks (eighty-one above Reading and thirty-nine below), twenty-eight dams, seventeen arched stone aqueducts and a tunnel four hundred and fifty feet long, cut through solid rock. The total cost was one million eight hundred thousand dollars.

In 1827–28 the canal was extended to Mill Creek, making the total length 108.23 miles; and, by an enlargement in 1846, the number of locks was reduced to seventy-one, with a total fall of about six hundred and twenty feet. The size of the locks was eighteen by one hundred and ten feet; width of canal, sixty feet; depth of water of six feet. The capacity of boats was one hundred and eighty tons.

Its Completion Celebrated.—From a "local" in the Berks and Schuylkill Journal, on July 10, 1824, it would appear that the water was not turned into the canal till the beginning of July, 1824. This event was anticipated; and the management accordingly selected an "anniversary day" for the purpose of celebrating it as such an event deserved to be celebrated. This was on July 5, 1824. For several days previously the water had run into this new highway to prepare the way for the celebration. On the day fixed, at seven o'clock in the morning, amid the booming of cannon and the applause of many spectators, three boats moved down the canal from Reading. And then there was witnessed the first triumph in a class of internal improvements which had been recommended by the good and noble and far-seeing Penn over one hundred and thirty years before.

The three boats which were used upon this occasion were the "Thomas Oaks," "Stephen Girard" and the "De Witt Clinton."

The first boat was named after the civil engineer under whose supervision the canal had been principally constructed. It was occupied by General Joseph Hiester (ex-Governor of Pennsylvania), managers and engineers of the canal company and specially invited guests of the management; the second was occupied by young gentlemen and ladies of Reading; and the third by business men. A fourth boat followed—being loaded with agricultural implements. Upon entering Lewis' Dam, beyond Poplar Neck, the boats were anchored and Charles Evans, Esq., delivered an appropriate address. Immediately afterward a public announcement was made that the section of canal for twenty-two miles below Lewis' Dam should be called the "Girard Canal," as a deserved tribute to the enterprise and liberality of Stephen Girard. The boats then proceeded down the canal to Laurel Hill. There they were welcomed by a great number of ladies and gentlemen from Pottstown and vicinity, estimated at five hundred. Their arrival was announced by a discharge of cannon and a military salute from the Union Guards of Pottstown. Patriotic toasts were offered at an impromptu meeting. The "Thomas Oaks" then returned to Reading—having been drawn by one horse at the rate of nearly six miles an hour without much effort. The "Girard" and "Clinton" proceeded ten miles farther down the canal and returned to Reading about dusk. Three weeks afterward (26th of July) the "Girard" made her first voyage to Philadelphia. This packet was occasionally used for pleasure trips.

Cost and Traffic.—The cost of transportation (by land) from Reading to Philadelphia was forty cents a hundred-weight; by canal it was reduced to twelve and a half cents. The toll on coal from Mt. Carbon to Philadelphia was, in 1825, six cents a bushel or one dollar and sixty-eight cents a ton.

Horses or mules were not used for towing boats previous to 1826. The boats were first towed through the canals by men at the end of long tow-lines. Two men drew a boat after them by pressing their shoulders or breasts against a stick fastened crosswise to the end of the tow-line. With such locomotion, a trip from Mount Carbon to Philadelphia generally required six weeks. At this time there were no tow-paths along the pools of the navigation; hence the necessity for man-power.

The following statistics are presented to show the great traffic over the canal during the first five years after its completion—articles selected from reports:

Considerable tolls had been received from 1818 to 1825.

The traffic continued to increase from year to year. In 1842 it was over five hundred thousand tons, and the tolls over four hundred thousand dollars. “Ample dividends were made; and shares, which cost originally fifty dollars, were sold as high as one hundred and seventy-five dollars and even one hundred and eighty dollars.” In 1851 the total tonnage was 842,097 tons, of which there were 579,156 tons of coal; and the total toll was $285,621. After 1861 the canal tonnage reached in some years nearly one million four hundred thousand tons of coal and three hundred thousand tons of merchandise and miscellaneous articles. The capacity of the canal is estimated at one million eight hundred thousand tons descending and at least five hundred thousand tons ascending.

The boats are from seventeen to seventeen and a half feet wide, and one hundred to one and two feet long, with a maximum capacity of one hundred and ninety tons.

After the year 1858 the company offered premiums for dispatch in transportation. Two boats competed energetically and proved that a trip from Port Carbon to New York and return could be made in seven days. This was regarded as an extraordinary performance. The interest taken in this contest was so great that a boat came to be loaded at the canal landings in eighteen minutes from the time the boat reached the wharf till the trip was resumed. Finally trouble was anticipated from this rivalry and the company discouraged it, and this put an end to it.

The company continued to operate this great enterprise till 1870, when they leased it to the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company for a term of nine hundred and ninety-nine years.

Packet.—In 1825, John and Nicholas Coleman introduced the system of running packet-boats through the canal from Reading to Philadelphia. Trips were made three times a week. The fare was two dollars and a half a trip. A trip was made in a day. Three packets were operated by them. They were named “Lady of the Lake,” “Planet” and “Independence.”

The packets contained no berths for sleeping purposes, but each a large dining-room. Cooking was done aboard, and meals were furnished.

These packets were well patronized. They continued in successful operation till about 1832, when the increasing traffic on the canal forced them to be withdrawn. Theretofore boats, loaded and empty, would turn out or lay over for an approaching packet, which was given the right of way.

The first steamboat on the canal came from Philadelphia to Reading on December 5, 1826. Twenty years afterward a line of “Steam-Packets” was begun between Reading and Philadelphia. The first packet arrived on September 28, 1846. It was built of iron, with two Ericson propellers, eighty-five feet long, and thirteen and a half feet wide. These packets began to run regularly on October 5, 1846. They departed from Reading every day, except Sunday, at two p.m., and arrived at Philadelphia on the next morning. And they departed from Philadelphia and arrived at Reading at the same time. The fare was one dollar a trip. This enterprise did not continue long in operation.

JAMES F. SMITH.—The most prominent person in the county, connected with the canal navigation system, by reason of his long-continued service with the Schuylkill Navigation Company and his residence in this community, is James F. Smith. He was born December 25, 1813, at Pittsburgh, Pa., and began his engineering practice in 1831, on the Allegheny Portage Railroad. Afterward he was employed on railroads in Pennsylvania and New York, and on the Morris Canal in New Jersey. He came into the service of the Schuylkill Navigation Company in 1843, and was connected with that work as resident engineer during its enlargement in 1846, having charge of the lower division. He remained in that position until 1850, the year of the disastrous freshets, by which the canal was greatly damaged. At that time the late Ellwood Morris was resident engineer of the line of works above Reading, but resigned near the close of 1850. Mr. Smith was then made chief engineer, he taking entire charge of the Navigation Company's works and completing their repairs.

In 1870 the canal was leased to the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company, and Mr. Smith was continued as chief engineer. In 1872 he took charge of the Susquehanna and Tide-Water Canal, from Columbia to Havre de Grace, Maryland. The Columbia dam, six thousand eight hundred feet in length, over the Susquehanna River at Columbia, was greatly damaged by ice-floods in 1874 and in 1875. The work of repair was one of great magnitude, but it was successfully executed under Mr. Smith's direction and according to his plans. The dam has stood the test of the river floods, both ice and water, without material injury since.

In 1876 Mr. Smith was relieved as chief engineer and appointed consulting engineer of canals, which place he retained until the summer of 1885. In January, 1886, he was elected president of the East Pennsylvania Railroad Company and of the Allentown Railroad Company.

RAILWAYS.

FIRST IN PENNSYLVANIA.—The first railroad in Pennsylvania was built in 1827 from Mauch Chunk to Summit Hill, in length nine miles. It was constructed to complete the transportation of coal from Mine Hill to Philadelphia. From Mauch Chunk to Philadelphia a canal had been constructed shortly before by the Lehigh Coal and Navigation Company. But the canal could not be extended to Mine Hill; so the company were compelled to devise and build a railroad to take the place of ordinary roads.

Soon afterward "The Little Schuylkill Railroad Company" was incorporated, and it constructed the railroad from Tamaqua to Port Clinton.

PHILADELPHIA AND READING RAILROAD COMPANY.—In 1833 a railroad was projected from Port Clinton via Reading to Philadelphia. The Little Schuylkill Railroad Company was authorized to extend their railroad to Reading, and to construct a railroad from Reading to Philadelphia. A company was chartered on April 4, 1833, under the name of the "Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company." Twenty-seven commissioners were appointed, including George de B. Keim, Matthias S. Richards, Isaac Hiester and James Everhart, from Reading. Immediate steps were taken to construct this road. A considerable portion was constructed during 1835, and by December, 1837, one track of the road was completed from Reading to Pottstown. An excursion party, comprising one hundred citizens of Reading, made a trip on the 6th of December in five freight-cars, temporarily fitted up with seats and drawn by five horses. It started from the depot at nine A.M., and arrived at Pottstown in two and three-quarter hours, including all stoppages. In returning, it left at two P.M., and arrived at Reading at five P.M. The first regular train from Reading to Pottstown ran on Tuesday, May 1, 1838. The schedule comprised two daily trains:

Left Reading at 8 A.M. and 12.30 P.M.
Left Pottstown at 10.30 A.M. and 3 P.M.

And the road was opened to Norristown on July 16, 1838, and to Philadelphia in December, 1839. In May, 1840, the time-table to and from Philadelphia was as follows:

Leave Reading at 7.15 A.M., and 2.45 P.M.
Leave Philadelphia at 5 A.M., and 2.15 P.M.

The fare was: First-class, $2.50; second-class, $2.

The Little Schuylkill Railroad Company being unable to construct the road from Port Clinton to Reading, the charter of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company was therefore extended to cover the construction and operation of a railroad from Reading to Pottsville; and notwithstanding the financial difficulties which prevailed in and after 1838, this great project was completed within four years afterward. The first train ran over the whole line from Philadelphia to Pottsville, ninety-three miles, on the 1st day of January, 1842, and the road was opened for general travel on the 10th of January following.

In the establishment of this great enterprise the construction of two long tunnels is worthy of mention—one near Phoenixville, in length nineteen hundred and thirty-one feet, at a cost of one hundred and fifty thousand three hundred and three dollars; and the other near Port Clinton, in length sixteen hundred and six feet, at a cost of one hundred and twenty-five thousand seven hundred and eighty-two dollars. The latter extends through the Blue Mountain. The depth from the surface at the top of the mountain is one hundred and nineteen feet. A superior, large stone bridge across the Schuylkill, above Tuckerton, is also noteworthy. A third tunnel was constructed at Manayunk, in length nine hundred and forty feet, and costing seventy-five thousand dollars. The Phoenixville and Manayunk tunnels were enlarged in 1859, the former at a cost of twenty-six thousand three hundred and ninety-three dollars, and the latter at a cost of twelve thousand eight hundred and forty-eight dollars.

The second track from Philadelphia to Pottsville was opened for travel in January, 1844. In June, 1848, the trains ran as follows:

To Philadelphia: 9.10 A.M. and 3.50 P.M.
To Pottsville: 10.45 A.M. and 5 P.M.

The distance from Reading to Philadelphia was traveled in two hours; and to Pottsville in one hour and twenty minutes.

In May, 1855, there were eight daily passenger-trains—four departing and four arriving. The following statistics are presented to show the increase of traffic over the road, its receipts and income, at different periods, till now:

Note.—The figures of the passenger traffic for the four years first named are based on number through passengers, i.e., Philadelphia to Pottsville, one way, and the figures for the last year named are total number of passengers carried during 1885.

The statement includes the total business of the road and all its branches.

The introduction of this railway immediately stimulated enterprise at Reading, and caused energy and capital to be directed towards manufacturing. The increasing tide of affairs induced people and capital to concentrate here more and more every succeeding year; and buildings multiplied rapidly to answer the demands of the rapidly increasing population. The company established its work-shops here when the railway was completed. And these have grown here in capacity with the ever-increasing traffic of the road. The first large shop occupied the half-block on the west side of Seventh Street, between Franklin and Chestnut Streets, where it has continued till now, a period exceeding forty years. Each succeeding decade found the company with more extended shops of all kinds for the manufacture of engines and cars, affording in the mean time constant employment for an ever-increasing number of workmen. The total annual income to the people of Reading from this single source during the past forty years counts into millions of dollars, all of which contributed directly towards the substantial growth of this community, in its buildings, stores, factories, churches and schools. The largely increased wealth of the city is, therefore, attributable to this valuable internal improvement.

The passenger station, or "depot," as it was always called, was located at the northwest corner of Seventh and Chestnut Streets, and continued there till 1874, when it was removed to the commodious, costly and creditable building erected by the company at the "junction" of the Lebanon Valley and East Pennsylvania Railroad, with this road, about three-fourths of a mile to the north. This was done to accommodate and facilitate the large passenger traffic conducted daily under the management of this company. The possessions and investments of this company at Reading amount to an enormous sum. From these it is apparent that the company appropriated a great proportion of its income here, besides affording constant employment to several thousand men in its numerous shops and on its several branches of railway. This fact stands out prominently in the management of the company and it is worthy of special recognition in this history; and though this generous feeling resulted directly in the enrichment of this inland city and county-seat, the entire county of Berks was indirectly benefited by it. The statistics for the last forty years, in respect to the growth, wealth and producing capacity of our county, show that the major part was at Reading. This enrichment and development of Reading were, however, very beneficial to the county in various ways, especially in respect to supplying funds for our general government and to providing stores, merchandise of all kinds and an enlarged home market for the people. Many property-holders were enriched thereby, the enhanced value of real estate having been produced by the irresistible process of development through the energy and management of this company.

And I can attribute to the same strong cause the increased population, wealth, influence and power of the entire Schuylkill Valley from Philadelphia to the mountains, the Lebanon Valley from the Schuylkill to the Susquehanna and the East Penn Valley from the Schuylkill to the Lehigh, an area of territory covering altogether several thousand square miles.

The valuable and extensive buildings of the company at Reading comprise the following: Machine-shops, at Seventh and Franklin and Seventh and Chestnut; \(^1\) foundry-shops at Seventh and Spruce; forge, etc., at Benjamin and railroad; passenger stations; car shops, etc., at Sixth and Oley; \(^2\) depots at Eighth and Buttonwood; East Penn Shops, at Marion and railroad; roundhouses on North Sixth; rolling-mill on North Ninth.

The stations in the county, along the line, are the following: Douglassville, Monocacy, Birdsboro', Exeter, Neversink, Franklin Street, Reading, Tuckerton, Leesport, Mohrsville, Shoemakerville, Bern, Hamburg. The entire length of the railway from the southern extremity of the county to the northern is about forty miles.

Passenger Station.— Next to the general office building of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company at Philadelphia, the passenger station of the company at Reading is the finest and most commodious building in its service. It is a superior, two-story brick structure, situated at the junction of the main road with the Lebanon Valley and East Pennsylvania roads, about a half-mile north of Penn Street, in the central portion of the city. The main building is surmounted with a large and elevated clock-tower, visible from all sections, which contains a superior clock and four dials, facing north, east, south and west. Altogether, the building comprises twenty-four rooms, besides spacious hallways,—fifteen on the first floor and nine on the second. Extensive covered platforms are constructed over the three roads, nearly a half-mile in length; eastern, ten hundred and thirty-eight feet; northwestern, seven hundred and nine feet, and southwestern, six hundred and ninety-two feet; the first being forty-seven feet wide, and the others forty-two feet wide. The passenger trains to Philadelphia and to Pottsville pass through the first, those to Harrisburg and to Allentown through the second, and those to Columbia, Slatington and Wilmington, through the third. The building is heated by steam, and the clocks are operated by electric attachments. The entire area of ground comprises about two acres. The total number of passenger trains departing from and arriving at the station daily (excepting Sunday) is seventy-four.

1 The machine-shop was destroyed by fire on January 8, 1864; loss estimated at $50,000. It was rebuilt immediately afterward.

2 These superb shops, including all the valuable machinery, many cars, and at least 100,000 feet of lumber, were destroyed by an extensive fire on June 28, 1870. They had been built during the years 1864 and 1865, at a cost amounting to about $120,000. Their dimensions were seven hundred and ten by one hundred and sixty-eight feet, spanned by three contiguous roofs.

The building of this station was begun in August, 1871, and it was completed in 1874, and opened for the accommodation of passengers on August 3, 1874, when the lower station was abandoned. In 1884 the company re-established a station near by the former place, at Franklin Street.

G. A. NICOLLS.—In the several departments of the business life of Reading, we have had and still have men who were or still are identified in the respective vocations in which they were or are now engaged on account of long continuous service. In banking, in merchandise, in manufactures and in newspaper publications their names stand out prominently like bold eminences in the surrounding country. And as we have men in the departments named, so have we in internal improvements. The most prominent in the railway system is G. A. Nicolls, he having come here when the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad was projected through the Schuylkill Valley, in 1836, and remained here ever since, a period covering fifty years. His entrance here was with the dawn of our substantial development through the combination of iron, coal and steam, and he has been continuously connected with it in all its greatness from decade to decade till now.

Gustavus Anthony Nicolls was born April 3, 1817, at Abbey View, Thomastown, county of Kilkenny, Ireland. His father was Colonel William Dann Nicolls, of the English Royal Artillery, and his mother was Maria Graves, daughter of Anthony Graves, a landed proprietor in the county of Kilkenny, and they had issue three children,—the subject of this sketch; a son, William Jasper, born at Exeter, England, in 1824; and a daughter, Maria Anne, born at Woolwich in 1825. The Nicolls family is descended from John Nicolls, of Arran, in Strathmore, near Inverness, Scotland.

Mr. Nicolls was named after his uncle, General Gustavus Nicolls, of the Royal Engineers, and also intended for the military profession. With this end in view, he, during the early years of his boyhood, was educated under the personal supervision of his father, and then sent for some years to the Waterford Classical and Mathematical Academy, an institution distinguished for the scholarship of its pupils; after which he finished his education at the Wanstead Military College, near London. His proficiency in mathematics in all its various branches has been well attested by his successful career in later life as a civil engineer. Having been educated for the English military service, his father, immediately after the completion of his course of study, desired him to be sent to the East Indies, and in this behalf his uncle, Sir Jasper Nicolls, then commander-in-chief in India, promised to appoint him an aid-de-camp on his own personal staff. But, believing that the United States offered a better field for his talents and energy, he chose to emigrate to this country, and, accordingly, sailed from England in September, 1834. Upon arriving in Philadelphia, he studied law for a while in the office of Henry M. Phillips, Esq.

In April, 1835, Mr. Nicolls, then in his eighteenth year, received the appointment of rodman in the engineer corps of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company, and, in 1836, he was promoted to the position of assistant engineer, and given charge of finishing a section of railroad which lay between Douglassville and Exeter. In 1837 he was made principal assistant and stationed at Reading, and, in the year following, superintendent of transportation, which he held for eight years, till 1846. He was then appointed chief engineer and general superintendent of the company, and continued to discharge the duties of these two positions for thirteen years. The business of the road had by this time increased to such an extent that the two offices had to be separated, and Mr. Nicolls selected the latter. He served as general superintendent till February, 1871, when he was appointed to act also as president’s assistant. This order obliged him to remove his residence from Reading to Philadelphia, where he continued to reside till May, 1877, when he returned to Reading. In 1873 he was elected second vice-president of the company, and, in 1875 and 1876, he was unanimously re-elected to that position. In 1877 the positions of first and second vice-presidents were abolished, and then Mr. Nicolls was elected president of the following branchroads of this company: Reading and Columbia, East Pennsylvania, East Mahanoy, Allentown, and Chester and Delaware River. In 1876 he was chosen president of the Susquehanna and Tide-Water Canal Company. These several positions he has since retained by annual re-election. His retention in them is undoubted evidence of his marked ability, energy and integrity in the discharge of his duties. During his long and unusual term of service, now covering a period of more than fifty years, he has seen the company advance from its very beginning into its present wonderful proportions. And he has ever been devoted to its interests and progress. His constancy is particularly prominent as a characteristic during his entire career as an official. And his system in the management of railroad affairs is equally recognizable, resulting in many great advantages to the company and in safety to the people. During the destructive riots of July, 1877, at Reading, when the whole community was alarmed for its safety, and railroad employees were excited, dissatisfied and rebellious, he was fearless in occupying his prominent position at the passenger station and in giving valuable suggestions for the preservation of the company’s property and for the movement of regular trains.

Besides the positions named, Mr. Nicolls was a director of the Reading Fire Insurance and Trust Company from the time of its organization in 1868 till 1875. In 1862 he was elected a trustee of the Charles Evans Cemetery Company, and he has continued to fill that office till the present time. He is also a director of the Schuylkill and Lehigh Railroad Company. During the year 1882 the “Reading, Marietta and Hanover Railroad”—a branch line of the Pennsylvania and Reading Railroad Company system—was completed mainly under his supervision. Mr. Nicolls was a charter member of the Philadelphia, Reading and Pottsville Telegraph Company. In the organization of the company in 1847 he was elected one of the board of managers and he has been re-elected annually till now. As a citizen of Reading he has always shown a strong interest in its material development and prosperity. Enterprises of various kinds have received his active encouragement. He assisted in erecting here the cotton-factory and the steam-forge shortly after 1850. These two large and costly manufacturing establishments have been largely instrumental in building up the respective sections of Reading in which they are situated and have afforded almost constant employment to many working-people for the past thirty years.

The charitable work in Reading carried on by the "Reading Benevolent Society," has always received the aid of Mr. Nicolls. He served as president of the society for eleven years, from 1860 till the close of 1871. The Young Men's Christian Association has found in him a generous and constant contributor in its noble purpose of laboring for the improvement of young men. He filled the office of president of the association for over two years, from 1880 to 1882. Mr. Nicolls also acted as a manager of the Reading Dispensary and of the Reading Hospital for a number of years. He is now serving the "Home for Widows and Single Women of Reading," as chairman of its building committee in the erection of its handsome and commodious stone structure; and the "Reading Society of Natural Sciences," from the time of its organization in 1869 till its dissolution in 1884, received his earnest attention. During this time, one of its most active members—Mr. Hiram Hollenbush—a few years before his death, made for Mr. Nicolls a cabinet containing a beautiful and complete collection of all the various kinds of wood found in Berks County.

During the Civil War, Mr. Nicolls was thoroughly patriotic. He attended a number of public meetings, which were composed of prominent citizens without regard to political affiliations, and held in this critical period for the purpose of expressing sentiments favorable to the preservation of the Union; and he was constantly liberal in the encouragement of voluntary enlistment. When the State was threatened with an invasion in 1862, he enlisted in Company E, Eleventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Militia, commanded by Captain Charles H. Hunter and served as a corporal. This company was named after him, and known as "Nicolls Guards." A movement to signalize the distinguished part which our county took in the late war has been a cherished object with him since its termination. In 1883 he prepared a suitable and superior design and suggested the centre of "Penn Square" as a proper place upon which to locate the monument, believing that patriotism should be grandly typified in the form of a "Soldiers' Monument" and be placed permanently in the most prominent place of our community so that the eyes of future generations could behold what this generation had done to commemorate the services and sacrifices of our people in behalf of preserving and perpetuating the Constitution and Union of our country. In political belief he has been identified with the Whig and the Republican parties. In 1864 the nomination for Congress was offered to him by the Republican party of the county, but he was obliged to decline it on account of his prominent business connections with the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company.

During the last forty years Mr. Nicolls has been a great traveler. In 1848 he made a journey of three months to and through the British Islands, having then visited all the places of importance. In 1856 he traveled with a party of friends through the southern portions of the United States, and also the Island of Cuba. Whilst sojourning in Cuba he addressed a series of interesting letters to the Reading Times, in which they were published, narrating the experiences of his party in that country, the sights observed, the impressions received, etc. In 1872 he visited all the countries in Continental Europe. In 1878 he again made an excursion to Europe, visiting, particularly, the Paris Exposition, England, Sweden and Russia. Some of his letters home were then published on account of their general interest and information. And in 1884 he crossed the ocean for a fourth time and spent several months in the British Islands.

Mr. Nicolls resided for a number of years at the southeast corner of Penn and Fourth Streets, Reading. In 1870 he began the erection of a handsome and commodious double two-story sand-stone residence, at the northwest corner of Walnut and Fourth Streets, being the first costly improvement of this kind in that section of the city. The plans were prepared by him and the building was erected under his personal supervision. It was finished in 1871, and is even now, though fifteen years have elapsed, one of the finest and most tasteful homes in Reading.

For many years Mr. Nicolls was a vestryman of Christ Episcopal Church of Reading. He served as a member of the building committee which conducted the alterations of the edifice of this denomination from a brick building to the present beautiful and costly structure, the appearance of which, with its towering and graceful spire, is the most imposing of any church in the city of Reading. He ceased to be a vestryman in 1871. Throughout the course of his life he has been a consistent and devoted member of that branch of the Christian Church known as the Protestant Episcopal Communion of America and England.

In May, 1846, Mr. Nicolls was married to Rosa Catharine Muhlenberg, daughter of Hon. Henry A. Muhlenberg, who was for a number of years member of Congress from this district, also the first minister to Austria, and, at the time of his decease, in 1844, the candidate of the Democratic party for Governor of Pennsylvania. She died May 15, 1867. During her life she was highly esteemed for her intellectual superiority. She was distinguished for charity to the poor people of Reading. The Civil War awakened her patriotism; and her zeal for the soldiers who went from her native city placed her foremost in the movement which resulted in the creation of the first Ladies’ Aid Society in the entire country. She was the president of this society from the beginning to the close of the war, and, as such, was particularly active in performing valuable services in behalf of our men who were away from their homes, by collecting useful materials and forwarding the same to them on the field of battle. Her kindness and devotion were highly appreciated by them, and many of the survivors of that great struggle, who returned and resided in this community, still speak of her in terms expressive of their highest regard.

In January, 1869, Mr. Nicolls was married to Annie Hall Muhlenberg, daughter of Dr. F. A. Muhlenberg, of Lancaster, Pa. They have issue one son, Frederick William Nicolls, who was born on February 7, 1870.

The motto of the Nicolls family is “Fide et Industria.” Mr. Nicolls has ever kept it as the guiding rule of his life; and to it he attributes the success which he has realized on the one hand, and the confidence and esteem which he has received on the other.

George de B. Keim, the eldest son of the Hon. George May Keim and of Julia C. Mayer, his wife, was born in the house of his father, in South Fifth Street, below Chestnut, in the borough of Reading, and being the eldest male grandchild, was named for his grandfather, General George de Benneville Keim. The latter had been named for his grandfather, George de Benneville, widely known as Dr. de Benneville, who was born in London, July 26, 1703, and after a varied life, came to this country in the thirty-eighth year of his age. His father, bearing the same name, was “a French refugee, who, being persecuted for his religion, retired with his family and connections into England upon the invitation of His Majesty King William, who took a tender care of them and employed them at his court.”

After a preliminary education in local schools (with the exception of a term at Georgetown College, in the District of Columbia, during a part of the period when his father served as a Representative in Congress for Berks County), Mr. Keim was, in the fall of the year 1846, admitted into the sophomore class of Dickinson College, at Carlisle, Pa., from which he was graduated in the year 1849. Immediately after graduating, he entered into the laboratory of his kinsman, Dr. Charles M. Wetherill, at Philadelphia, to pursue the study of chemistry, particularly the Liebig system of quantitative and qualitative analysis with reference to mineral products. Upon returning home, in 1850, he entered the office of Charles Davis, Esq., a prominent and learned member of the bar, (who, in the year 1842, removed from Easton and located at Reading,) and in April, 1852, he was admitted to the practice of the law. While residing in Reading, Mr. Keim was actively engaged in local matters. He was a member of the Reading Rifles, which, under the command of Captain Ancona, took a prominent place among the volunteer soldiery; and for some years he filled the position of president of the Junior Fire Company, a very efficient and useful institution.

In 1855, Mr. Keim established himself at Pottsville, the county town of Schuylkill County. Indications then pointed to a greatly increased demand in the not distant future for anthracite coal—the important industry of that vicinity, and as a result, the enhancement in value of coal property, and an increase in the number of collieries, as well as in the business and population of the county. Much of the most valuable mineral land was out of the market, owing to the uncertainty of title, and the arrival of the activity looked for would promote measures, either by amicable adjustment or by the tribunals of law, to clear up such difficulties and open for the miner a way to those sealed deposits.

At that time nearly the whole of the valuable coal-field of Mahanoy was without inhabitants and without railroad facilities, and where now are flourishing towns not even a settlement existed. In the western portion of the southern coal-field there was no operation, and where the extensive Brookside and Kalmia Collieries are now located was then a wilderness.

Shortly after Mr. Keim located in Schuylkill County a period of great activity commenced. He “caught on” to the great industry of the region, and acquainting himself with the land titles and requirements of the county, was engaged very early by companies and individuals in the settlement of their difficulties and the promotion of their enterprises.

He was employed by the Philadelphia and Reading Coal & Iron Company to attend to the examination of much of their immense estate of leaseholds and lands, and assisted at the birth of that company; and, in 1874, he was called to Philadelphia in its service and that of its allied institution, the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company, filling various positions thereafter in each of said companies until January, 1884, when he was placed in the presidency of the same. In June following his election the companies, for the second time in their existence, passed into the hands of receivers (the first time being in May, 1880), when Mr. Keim was appointed one of the receivers of the companies by the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, since which time he has been assiduously engaged in the duties of his appointment and in the endeavor to promote an adjustment of the serious and embarrassing matters connected therewith.

It may be mentioned that Mr. Keim’s grandfather, General George de B. Keim, was one of the corporators of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company, and that his uncle, Mr. Wirt Robinson, was, for a number of years, its chief engineer and general manager, succeeding in that position Mr. Monceur Robinson, the eminent engineer, who, after locating and constructing that road with the assistance of his relative, Mr. Wirt Robinson, resigned the position, owing to the pressure of other important enterprises in the promotion of which he was engaged.

Historical matters, especially such as relate to his native county and to the State, have received the attention of Mr. Keim. His interest in such pursuits led him, many years ago, to connect himself with the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, which honored him by selecting him as one of its vice-presidents. The author of this history acknowledges kindly encouragement from him at various times whilst prosecuting the laborious undertaking.

By appointment of the Governor of this commonwealth, Mr. Keim served on the commission which presented Generals Muhlenberg and Fulton as the contribution of statuary from Pennsylvania to the capitol at Washington—these two distinguished men having been selected from the commonwealth as Representatives, on the one hand, of the German or “Pennsylvania Dutch” element of the people, and on the other, of the Scotch-Irish element. The Hon. Simon Cameron and the Hon. Daniel Ermentrout also served as members of the commission, and the conclusions reached were only arrived at after the fullest discussion and the most careful action. It must not be forgotten that General Muhlenberg was a grandson of Conrad Weiser, one of the earliest settlers in the Womelsdorf region before the Indian titles were extinguished, a true and useful character, who has honorable mention in connection with the earliest history of the settlement of Berks County.

Mr. Keim was married to Elizabeth Cocke Trezevant, the only daughter of Lewis Cruger Trezevant, M.D., of South Carolina (the only child of the Hon. Lewis Trezevant, a judge of the Supreme Court of that State), and of Elizabeth Marion Cocke, the daughter of Buller Cocke, Esq., of Bacon's Castle, Surry County, Va. Dr. Trezevant, when his daughter was an infant, moved to his plantation near Memphis, Tenn., where both he and his wife not many years after, at an early age, fell victims to the climate.

Mr. Keim's family, besides his wife, consists of two daughters — Julia Mayer Keim and Susan Donglass Keim.

J. Lowrie Bell, a son of Hon. Samuel Bell, was born at Reading, Pa., in November, 1837. He was educated at Russell's Collegiate Institute, New Haven, Conn.

He commenced business life as a clerk with Messrs. Stichler & McKnight, hardware merchants at Reading, and remained with them three and one-half years, until 1857, when he entered the service of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company as a clerk, at the freight depot, Broad and Cherry Streets, Philadelphia. In 1860 he was appointed chief clerk and cashier to the general agent; and in 1865 he became general agent at Philadelphia in charge of the traffic of the company.

In 1868 he was appointed general freight agent of all the roads under the management of this company, and in 1880 became its general traffic manager, in which capacity he has charge of all rates for tolls and transportation, and of all commercial questions pertaining to the interchange of traffic with other companies and transporters.

LEBANON VALLEY.—An act of Assembly was passed on April 1, 1836, incorporating the "Lebanon Valley Railroad Company," for the purpose of building a railroad from Reading to Harrisburg. This act required an actual subscription of four thousand shares of stock before the charter should become operative. This number could not be obtained by private subscriptions, and the project for this railway through a rich and productive country was allowed to slumber for seventeen years. In 1853 the idea was conceived that Lebanon and Reading, as municipal organizations, should encourage the enterprise by a large subscription of stock, the former by a subscription of two thousand shares, and the latter of six thousand shares. A supplementary act was accordingly passed on 5th of April, 1853, with a provision that the subject of a subscription be submitted to an election of the taxables of the respective places. The City Councils of Reading discussed this subject on May 11, 1853, and then ordered an election to be held on the 15th of June following. This election was to decide for or against a subscription of four thousand shares, amounting to two hundred thousand dollars. In the public discussion of this matter the Adler opposed the subscription; but the Journal and the Press favored it, expressing the belief that the city would be benefited to the extent of ten times the amount of the subscription. The result of the election was as follows:

For subscription.......................... 1658
Against subscription........................ 682

Majority for subscription.................. 976

The result having terminated favorably, certain taxables applied to the Supreme Court for an injunction. The application was argued at Philadelphia before all the judges on July 27, 1853; but the injunction was refused. (The case is reported in Penna. State Reports, 9 Harris, p. 188.) At the same time three similar cases were argued to restrain subscriptions for stock of projected railways. The Supreme Court assembled at Pittsburgh on September 6, 1853, and delivered an opinion, deciding that the subscriptions could be made. The subscription by the City Councils was accordingly made, and in payment thereof issued city bonds, amounting to two hundred thousand dollars. The construction and completion of this road were facilitated by the assistance of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company. During its completion an act was passed, May 5, 1857, to authorize the consolidation of the Lebanon Valley Railroad Company with the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company, upon first obtaining consent of the stockholders. This movement awakened considerable opposition, but it prevailed. The City Councils approved of the consolidation, and encouraged it, especially upon having been assured by the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company that the city bonds would be returned and that their company would assume the subscription of four thousand shares. The road was completed and the consolidation effected, and the city bonds were returned; and in December, 1858, the City Councils passed unanimously a resolution tendering their respectful acknowledgments to the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company for their generosity in surrendering the bonds in exchange for the stock, and expressing an appreciation of the kind and liberal spirit which dictated the action of the company in the premises.

The trains began to run over the road to Harrisburg on Monday, 18th of January, 1858. The first train consisted of ten passenger cars, and was arranged to convey a number of prominent citizens, including General W. H. Keim and staff, the "Reading Rifles," and the "City Band," from Reading to Harrisburg.

During the construction of the section of the road near Womelsdorf an "Irish Riot" occurred, which caused considerable excitement at Reading. It was reported that one hundred and fifty Irishmen had struck for higher wages on May 3, 1855, and had refused to allow other laborers to work in their stead; that, among other unlawful acts, they had beaten the foreman and set fire to a large barn in the vicinity, and that warrants had been issued for the arrest of the ringleaders, but that the constable had failed to quell the disturbance. In this alarming situation the sheriff of the county was sent for on the following day. He responded by calling out the posse comitatus, and making a requisition for three military companies. At two p.m. on the 4th of May the Ringgold Artillery, with seventy-five men, the Reading Artillery, with thirty men, and the Reading Rifles, with thirty men, under the command of General W. H. Keim, accompanied by certain citizens, altogether numbering about two hundred men, started from Reading and marched to Womelsdorf. They apprehended the ringleaders and brought them to Reading and imprisoned them. In marching through town the ringleaders were inclosed in a hollow square of bristling bayonets. This episode became the subject of a humorous poem after the manner of Tennyson's "Charge of the Light Brigade."

The company, in the construction of the road, erected a superb, large and costly wooden bridge across the Schuylkill. This was destroyed by fire during the riot of July, 1877. A superior iron bridge was then built in its stead.

The length of this railroad in the county is sixteen miles. It has the following stations: Sinking Spring, Wernersville, Robesonia, Womelsdorf.

East Penn.—On the 9th of March, 1856, an act of Assembly was passed incorporating the "Reading and Lehigh Railroad Company," for the purpose of constructing a railroad from the junction of the Philadelphia and Reading and the Lebanon Valley Railroads at Reading, to the Lehigh Valley Railroad at Allentown. The following persons of Reading were named amongst the commissioners: Hiester H. Muhlenberg, William Strong, George M. Lauman, William M. Baird, Horatio Trexler, William M. Hiester, Edward M. Clymer, George F. Sitzel and Charles H. Hunter.

The title of the company was changed to "East Pennsylvania Railroad Company," by act passed 21st April, 1857. The construction of the road-way began in June following—the first ground having been broken at a spot, now the highest point of the cut, a short distance north of Temple Station, on June 11, 1857; and it was prosecuted with energy for two years, when it was completed. The last spike was driven on the 20th of April, 1859. The beginning was signalized by a demonstration at the Temple, speeches were made and cannons fired off, etc.; and the completion was likewise an occasion of great joy to the projectors. The day was celebrated on May 11, 1859. Trains began to run then between Reading and Allentown Junction, a distance of thirty-six miles. A distinguished party from New York City—including a prominent metropolitan brass band—visited Reading. Among the prominent features of the celebration was a song in "Berks County Dutch," entitled "Der Deutsch Kompanie," the rendition of which caused much merriment and is remembered with pleasure till now by many who witnessed the performance on a platform which had been erected on Penn Square, at the market house, below Fifth Street. This song was "the joint production of native talent." It was as follows—the chorus having been repeated at the end of each stanza:

DER DEUTSCH KOMPANIE.

O te Deutch Kompanie
Is te besht Kompanie
As ever jined te sea
Mit ter Berks County.

Herr Clymer ish te President, and ven te times vos blue,
He got Moore help from Gotham and put te railroad troo.

Te beoples vot took shhtock didn't have many funds,
So te Bulls gif te money, and te Deutsch gif te bonds.

Te Kutztowners grumble tat te road ish n't teare,
But tey didn' gif tare money and tey wouldn't take a share.

Ein gloss Lager und zwei gloss Beer—
If you haint got no shhtock you can't shtay here.

Ven you hear te Drums go boom, boom, boom,
Ten you may be sure dat te Got'sh'm-ites haf come.

Here's to te Light Guard—here to te Band:
Ve'll take em to te Market-House and put em on te shhtand.

Ve'll take em out 3d street, vere tey vere before,
To see vat te beople call Lauer's "great bore."

Ve'll put em in te Manshen House as soon as tey do came, Kept by te "Prince of Lantlorts"—Te BERPOH ish his name.

Ve'll march em troo te shstreets and ve'll take em to te "Shprings,"
And ve'll feashnt em and ve'll toasht em and all tem sorts of tings.

Schweitzer Kase und pretzels und lager beer too, Ve haf in Berks County, and dem not a few.

Te New York chaps mit te hair at te nose, Tey open teir mouths and town te lager goes.

Talk about your Champaigne, Sherry and such,
But lager ish te besht for te bellies of te Dutch.

Too much Champaigne is very bad stuff;
But too much lager beer ish youst about enough.

Te city in te hills and te city on te sea,
Are now jined together by te Deutsch Kompanie.

Ve'll keep trate a goin' boys—tay you may bet;
You'll send te Dry Goods, and we'll send te wet.

Ten success to te party tat jined land and sea;
Tree cheers and a tiger for te Deutsch Kompanie.

Te song ish gittin' out—if you vant any more,
Begin at te top and go on as before.

This road was leased to the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company in May, 1869, for nine hundred and ninety-nine years; by which company it has been operated since.

The length of the railroad in the county is twenty-three miles, upon which there are the following stations: Temple, Blandon, Fleetwood, Lyons, Bowers, Topton, Mertztown, Shamrock.

EDWARD MYERS CLYMER was the son of Edward Tlghman Clymer and Marie C. (nee Hiester), his wife, born in Caernarvon township on July 16, 1822. He went to the local schools in his early youth and afterwards to the Abbeville Academy, in Lancaster County, and to the academy of Joshua Hoopes, at West Chester. He then selected the law as his profession, and after pursuing his legal studies for a while under William Strong, Esq. (then a practicing attorney at Reading, and afterward associate justice on the Supreme Bench of Pennsylvania and of the United States), he entered the Harvard Law School, from which he was graduated in 1845. Upon his return to Reading he was admitted to the bar, on August 4, 1845. He then opened a law-office and soon acquired a lucrative practice, which he continued till 1857, at which time he became thoroughly interested in projecting the East Pennsylvania Railroad from Reading to Allentown. His efforts in this enterprise were entirely successful. He became the first president of the company and continued in this office till the road was leased to the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company. In 1874 he was chosen president of the coal companies belonging to the New York, Lake Erie and Western Railroad Company, which it owned and operated in Pennsylvania, and he held this position till his death, which occurred at New York, May 25, 1883. His management of the coal companies was very successful. Whilst in the active practice of his profession at Reading he took great interest in the political affairs of the county, and having been a Democrat, he was associated with the leaders of the Democratic party during that period. He was married, in 1864, to Ella M. Dietz, of New York City, with whom they had issue, one son, Edward M. Clymer, Jr.

Reading and Columbia.—Whilst the Lebanon Valley and the East Penn Railroads were being constructed, the subject of extending a railroad from Sinking Spring—a point on the former—to Columbia was discussed with earnestness. In this behalf an Act of Assembly was passed on May 19, 1857, incorporating the "Reading and Columbia Railroad Company," and naming fifteen commissioners, including three from Reading—John McManus, John S. Richards and Frederick Lanier. The first project was to extend the road from a point in Reading; but, in 1861, an act was passed, authorizing a connection to be made with the Lebanon Valley Railroad at any point between Reading and Sinking Spring. Numerous meetings were held at Ephrata, Lancaster, Columbia and Reading, and reports pertaining to the business which the territory would afford were made to encourage the construction of the road; and these eventually terminated in its successful completion in March, 1864, from Sinking Spring to Columbia, a distance of forty miles. This introduced another valuable connection in the great system of railways uniting the Schuylkill with the Susquehanna. It was an improvement that immediately inspired new life and enterprise in the region of territory through which it extended. The first passenger train ran through from Reading to Columbia in May, 1864. Three lateral branches have been opened from it, namely,—

From Lancaster Junction to Lancaster City, eight miles, in August, 1866, which was extended to Quarryville, fifteen miles, in May, 1875.

From Chiques to Marietta, six miles, in August, 1883.

From Manheim to Mount Hope, six miles, in August, 1884.

The length of the railroad in the county is about five miles, upon which there are two stations—Fritztown and Vinemont.

Wilmington and Northern.—The subject of a railroad was encouraged through the southern section of Berks County, by a number of enterprising inhabitants of Robeson, Union and Caernarvon townships, and to encourage and authorize its construction, as a necessary local improvement, they obtained an act of Assembly, passed April 20, 1864, in which the following citizens of that section of the county were named as commissioners: Edward Brooke, George Brooke, Edward Bailey, Bentley H. Smith, Henry S. Kupp, Levi E. Hook, David J. Lincoln, John C. Evans, Robert A. Gilmore, John McGowan, James E. Wells, David Plank, Josiah Lewis and William Everhart. The road was authorized to extend from a point on the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad, at or near Birdsboro', by the most available route, to any railroad built in Chester County, and the incorporated body was named Berks and Chester Railroad Company; and the company was authorized to construct branch railroads not exceeding nine miles in length. In 1866 authority was given to connect the road with the Delaware and Pennsylvania State Line Railroad, and effect a consolidation with this company under the name of the Wilmington and Reading Railroad Company. The name was subsequently changed to Wilmington and Northern Railroad Company. The road was constructed and opened for travel as follows:

From Wilmington to Coatesville, thirty-three miles, in December, 1869; to Birdsboro', sixty-three miles, in June, 1870; and to Reading, seventy-two miles, in February, 1874.

This company constructed the road to a point at the "Cut," in the High Farm, at Poplar Neck, in Cumru township, and the length of road from that point to and through Reading was constructed by the Berks County Railroad Company.

The passenger station of the company at Reading was for a time at the southwest corner of Second and Cherry Streets. In 1882 the company effected an arrangement to run its trains to and from the Reading Station of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company.

The following stations on this road are in the county: Naomi, Seyfert, Gibraltar, Robeson, Clingan, Birdsboro', White Bear, Georgetown, Cold Run, Joanna Heights, Joanna. The passenger station at Birdsboro' is a handsome structure.

WEST READING. — The manufacturers of Reading who owned and carried on establishments situated along the Schuylkill Canal, feeling the want of a railroad to facilitate the receipt of materials and the shipment of goods to and from their shops, foundries and factories, obtained authority to construct a railroad from the Lebanon Valley Railroad at any point between Fourth Street and the River Schuylkill; thence to a point on Canal Street near the Reading Gas-Works, with power to extend it to the Henry Clay Furnace and to organize a company under the name of West Reading Railroad Company. The following commissioners were named in the act of Assembly passed March 20, 1860: Jacob Bushong, John McManus, Isaac Bertollete, Jacob H. Deysher, John Kissinger, Henry Bushong, Lot Benson, John Mellert, Jacques Craig, Solomon Brubaker, Solomon Snyder, and Isaac McHose.

The road was constructed from the railroad mentioned, at Fourth Street, to the Reading Gas-Works, in length nearly two miles, and opened for traffic in 1863. This company operated it for ten years, and then transferred it to the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company, by which company it has been used since as a branch road in delivering and receiving freight.

COLEBROOKDALE.—In March, 1865, a railroad was authorized to be constructed from the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad at Pottstown to Boyertown with the right to extend it to the East Pennsylvania Railroad in Berks County, and thence to the Catasauqua and Fogelsville Railroad; and for this purpose a company was incorporated under the name of "Colebrookdale Railroad Company." The road was constructed to Barto, in Washington township, a distance of 12.8 miles from Pottstown, and opened to travel in November, 1869.

The stations on the road in the county are Manataway, Ironstone, Colebrookdale, Boyertown, New Berlin, Bechtelsville, Eschbach, Barto.

The road was leased to the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company on January 1, 1870, for twenty years.

ALLENTOWN.—In 1854 a company was incorporated under the name of the "Allentown Railroad Company," and authorized to construct a railroad from Allentown to the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad at any point on said road between Reading and Port Clinton; and if this railroad should not be extended by way of Kutztown, a branch should be constructed to that place. A large portion of this road was partly constructed, but never finished. Subsequently a section of the road was constructed from Topton, on the East Pennsylvania Railroad, to Kutztown, in length four and a half miles, and opened for travel in January, 1870. It has been operated since by the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company under a lease.

SCHUYLKILL AND LEHIGH.—In March, 1871, a railroad company was incorporated by the Pennsylvania State Legislature for the purpose of constructing “a railroad from a point on the W. and N. R. R., at or near Birdsboro’, in Berks County, by the most available route, to and through the city of Reading, and thence to connect with any railroad or railroads now built in the county of Lehigh;” and certain commissioners were appointed, including the following influential citizens of Berks County: John McManus, Isaac Mc Hose, Isaac Eckert, David McKnight, Samuel C. Mayer, George Brooke, Hiester Clymer, Frederick Lauer, and Edward M. Clymer.

And a company was created by the name of “Berks County Railroad Company.” The railroad was constructed by this company from the “Cut” in the High farm on “Poplar Neck,” in Cumru township, to and through Reading by way of the Maiden-creek, to Slatton ton, where connection was made with the Lehigh Valley Railroad, a total length of about forty-five miles (forty-three miles from Reading). The road was open for travel in July, 1874. Shortly afterward the road was sold by proceedings of foreclosure on a mortgage, and a reorganization effected under the name of “Berks and Lehigh Railroad Company;” and subsequently this name was changed to “Schuylkill and Lehigh Railroad Company.” The road is carried on by the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company under a lease. The length of the road in the county is twenty-eight miles, and the stations (not including flag-stations) are Berkeley, Maiden-creek, Evansville, Moselem, Virginsville, Lenhartsville, Kempton. The report of business over the road is included in the general report of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company.

Pennsylvania Schuylkill Valley.—The Phoenixville, Pottstown and Reading Railroad Company was incorporated on September 30, 1882, for the purpose of constructing and operating a railroad from Phoenixville to Reading, by way of Pottstown; and on the same day the Philadelphia, Norristown and Phoenixville Railroad Company was incorporated for the purpose of constructing and operating a railroad from Philadelphia to Phoenixville. Subsequently, on May 1, 1883, these two companies were consolidated, under the name of Pennsylvanian Schuylkill Valley Railroad Company, and a month afterward a lease was effected with the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. The latter company then constructed the railroad from Philadelphia to Reading by way of Norristown and Phoenixville, during the years 1883 and 1884, opening it to Reading on November 15, 1884. In the course of the construction of this railroad, the company erected four substantial and costly iron bridges across the Schuylkill within the county—Douglassville, Poplar Neck, Little Dam and Reading,—and three handsome passenger stations—Reading, Birdsboro’ and Douglassville.

The Penn Street Bridge stood in the way of the contemplated extensive improvements at the foot of Penn Street by this company; and, in pursuance of a proposition by this company, to substitute a superior iron bridge in its place, at a cost of one hundred thousand dollars, provided the county of Berks contributed thirty-three thousand dollars toward the cost, the old wooden bridge was removed and the present handsome iron bridge erected during the years 1884 and 1885.

The length of this railroad, in the county, from Reading to the Montgomery County line, is about fourteen miles.

The Reading and Pottsville Railroad Company was incorporated afterward for the purpose of constructing and operating a railroad from Reading to Pottsville, by way of Hamburg and Port Clinton. This road was constructed by this company during the years 1884 and 1885, as a continuation of the railroad from Philadelphia, by way of Reading, to Pottsville and the coal regions. It was opened to Hamburg on December 7, 1885. On December 1, 1885, the road was also leased to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company.

Public County Buildings.

The county buildings comprise the courthouse, prison, “State-house” and poor-house.

Court-Houses.—The first court-house of the county was erected in 1762, at the intersection of Penn Square and Callowhill Street. It was built of stone, plastered and marked off in imitation of cut stone, and it was surrounded by a brick pavement about thirteen feet wide. The first floor was arranged in one large room for the "courts," and the second floor in three rooms—the eastern half having been in one room, and the western in two rooms. An entry separated the former from the latter. The stairway was constructed in the southeast corner of the court-room. The "bench" was arranged along the northern side of the room, and the "bar" was inclosed by a semicircular railing, the ends of which extended to the wall on both sides of the "bench." The "jury box" was situated in the northwest corner of the room. The court-room was entered by two door-ways, one on the south side and the other on the west. The latter was little used. A large stove was located near by and wood was generally piled up against the door, on the inside, during cold weather. This wood-pile was at times occupied by a boy or two during the progress of an important trial in court; and it was known to collapse and cause considerable merriment, if not commotion, at the boy's expense. The sudden cry of "silence" by the "court-crier" would throw terror into the boy's heart, and especially if the crier's long hickory stick reached out after his head.

The crier's seat was situated a few feet west of the centre of the room, adjoining the "bar," and the "prisoner's dock" was next to it on the east. The crier was a prominent figure in the room by reason of the elevation of his seat.

The floor was laid with brick. Benches were arranged on inclined platforms along the southern and eastern walls. The seating capacity was rather limited for a public place. The dimensions of the building were about forty by fifty feet. A marble tablet was built in the eastern wall near the centre. It contained the following inscription:

J. L., C. W., S. H., 1762.

These initial letters represented the names of the officiating county commissioners, viz., Jacob Lightfoot, Christian Witman and Samuel High. The steeple on the building contained a bell and town-clock. The bell was cast in England in 1763 especially for the county. The town-clock was a thirty-hour clock, imported from London about 1755. It was remarkable for being out of order continually.

Frequent repairs were made to it, but it could not be made to keep time.

Previously for ten years, the justices of the county sat and held the sessions of court in a room at a town inn. There were no rooms in the building for the county officials. Five offices of the county were vested in one individual for upward of twenty years. These were prothonotary, recorder, register, clerk of the Orphans' Court and clerk of the Quarter Sessions, and the person was James Read, a lawyer. He doubtless had the records at his home. By a letter addressed to the Pennsylvania Gazette, dated the 20th of February, 1766, it would appear that "public offices were opened on Monday previous at Reading." It is not known in which building they were opened. The "State House," which contained the offices for many years, was not erected till thirty years afterward.

Election polls were held at the several windows on the first floor. The windows were properly marked for the voters. The poll for the electors of Reading was at the eastern window on the side facing south.

This building was used for the purposes of hearing and determining criminal and civil matters till 1840. But its smallness and inconvenient arrangement had been felt seriously for many years. It was not, however, till 1837 that the citizens became earnestly interested in an improvement. At the August sessions of the year mentioned, a petition, signed by many taxables, was presented to court.

Among other things, they represented—

"That, in consequence of the rapid increase of the population and public business of the county of Berks, the present court-house has become too small and inconvenient for the transaction of business, and also for the accommodation of those persons who are obliged to attend court," and then prayed the Court "to recommend to the County Commissioners the erection of the necessary buildings for the accommodation of the Court and the Public."

It was referred to the grand jury, and they recommended a new building, selecting the northeast corner of Fifth and Penn Streets as the place for its erection. This return was approved by the court on 11th August, 1837. The site was changed to the northeast corner of Sixth and Court Streets, in order to obtain a larger lot for the proposed building. The county commissioners then purchased two adjoining lots, one hundred and twenty by two hundred and thirty feet, and erected thereon, during the years 1838, 1839 and 1840, the present attractive and commodious court-house, the total expense amounting to $58,846.42. The following interesting description was published in the Berks and Schuylkill Journal on 20th June, 1840:

"The walls of the edifice are constructed of handsome pressed brick, for which this borough is justly celebrated, and rest on a cut sandstone base. The building is 62 by 118 feet, and in height, to apex of the roof, is 60 feet. In front, resting on the basement story, is a handsome portico ornamented with s x columns, 27 feet in height, of the Ionick' order, cut from sandstone quarried in this county. The whole of the front base, columns, corniers, &c., is of the same material, and the effect is excellent. An octagonal steeple, 142 feet high, rises in front, surmounted by a figure of Liberty, which is 84 feet high above the roof. The original intention was to give this elevated situation to a statue of Justice, but (as will sometimes happen) there was some difficulty about arranging her scales. Still, though the statue of Justice has been superseded by Liberty on the outside, we have no idea that Liberty will take precedence of the statutes of Justice in the inside of the building, and many will, doubtless, find to their cost that the figure of Liberty on the Court-House is the figure which rhetoricians call locus a non lueno. A hall extends through the building on the first floor, with the county offices arranged on each side. The second floor is set apart for the court-room. The third floor for jury rooms and an additional court-room. The main "court-room" has been used annually, with the permission of the county commissioners, for political meetings of all parties. It was also used, occasionally, twenty years ago, for lectures and public addresses by distinguished speakers. And religious services have been held in it by several denominations during their church improvements.

A substantial fire-proof two-story extension was built at the rear of the building in 1869. The second story of the northern portion is set apart for the "Law Library."

The last term of court held in the old building was April term, 1840. During the following three months the county records were removed from the "State-House," and the August term of court was held in the new building. Gas was introduced into the building in May, 1849.

1This corner had been occupied for many years previously by a blacksmith, the shop having been regarded as the oldest, if not the first, in town.
A new clock was placed in the steeple in March, 1851. The bell weighed near seventeen hundred pounds. From that time on, this was the "town-clock," and town-bell for indicating "town-time."

The "Old Court-House" was purchased by Joseph Kendall and removed in May, 1841. He appropriated some of the material towards the construction of the row of small houses on the west side of Fifth, between Pine and Bingham Streets. Another portion was used in the erection of Goodhart's Military Inn. The old bell was sold to a congregation at Pricetown, in Ruscomb-manor township. It is still in use for church purposes.

Prisons. — The first county prison was erected in 1770, on the northeast corner of Callowhill and Thomas Streets. It was constructed of stone and plastered, two stories in height, and in dimensions thirty by seventy feet. The lot was sixty by two hundred and thirty feet. A substantial stone wall, twenty feet high, was erected to inclose the lot to the depth of one hundred and thirty feet. The first floor was arranged in four compartments, the corner room, facing the streets, having been occupied as an office by the sheriff; and the second floor in four compartments for prisoners. The sheriff and family occupied the remaining rooms of the building; and this practice was continued till the prison system was changed by special legislation for Berks County, in 1848. The "Old Jail" property was sold on the 5th of February, 1849, to William Rhoads, for seven thousand four hundred and sixty dollars, and by him converted into a store. It has been occupied as a store ever since.

A new county prison was erected on the "Commons," at the head of Penn Street, by the county commissioners, in 1847–48, at a cost of seventeen thousand dollars. It is constructed of stone from Penn's Mount, and is situated on a lot of ground one hundred and seventy by three hundred feet, which is inclosed on the north, east and west by a high stone wall. The tower is elevated ninety-six feet. It is still standing, a fine specimen of superior workmanship.

An addition, or "annex," was erected at the rear in 1869. The total number of cells is ninety-four—forty-four being in the main building and fifty in the annex. The cells are arranged in two stories.

The following table shows the total number of persons who were committed to the county prison since its completion, in 1848:

State-House—The State-House was erected by the county commissioners in 1793 for the accommodation of the county officers and also the county records. It was situated on the northeast corner of Fifth and Penn Streets. The building was built of brick, two stories in height, and in dimensions thirty by ninety feet. A small, narrow alley extended along the eastern wall on the outside from the front to the rear of the building. An entry extended across the building near the centre, with its doorway on Fifth Street; and a stairway led from this entry to the second floor. The first floor was divided into three compartments; the first, adjoining Penn Street, having been used for the prothonotary's office and clerk of Quarter Sessions, the central for the recorder, register and clerk of the Orphans' Court, and the rear for county commissioners and county treasurer. The second floor was divided into two compartments, the front room having been occupied mostly for Sunday-school purposes from 1819 for about twenty years,1 and the rear room for lodge purposes.2 The building was sold by the county commissioners upon the removal of the county offices and records to the new county-house.

The rear room on the first floor was used for some years, 1861 to 1865, as the post-office.

In January, 1872, a large fire broke out in Stichter's hardware-store, near by, which spread over the adjoining buildings to the west, and consumed the entire corner, including the "Old State-House." The inscription stone was preserved and given a place in the rear wall of the building which was soon afterward erected in its stead. The inscription reads,—

POOR-HOUSE.—The poor people of the county were provided for by "overseers" till the passage of an act of Assembly, on March 29, 1824, especially for this county, whereby the county commissioners were authorized to levy a tax for the purpose of purchasing land and erecting thereon and furnishing necessary buildings for their employment and support, and seven directors were appointed to proceed in the establishment of this public institution. They served till the election of three directors, in October following, as provided in said act. In the mean time (May 30, 1824) they purchased the "Brown farm," formerly known as the "Angelica farm," in Cumnor township (owned and occupied during the Revolution by General Thomas Mifflin), three miles from Reading, situated on the Lancaster road, and containing 417¼ acres, for the consideration of $16,690, and proceeded to erect upon it a commodious building to accommodate the poor people of the county. This building was finished in 1825. It has since been known as the "Main Building." Other improvements were subsequently made upon the premises, prominent among them being the "Insane Building," erected in 1837 and 1843, and the "Hospital," in 1871 to 1874.

The first poor persons were admitted on October 21, 1825, from Reading. Their names were William Hydecam, aged eighty-three years, and Dorothea, his wife, aged eighty-one years. In November, 1825, Saul Gordon was admitted from Hereford township. He is in the institution still, having been there continuously for a period covering sixty years.

During the first year, 1825, one hundred and thirty inmates were admitted. The average number of inmates in the institution annually since 1868, was as follows:

POST-OFFICE.—The postal department of the public service is classed with the internal improvements of the county. We have as yet no "public building" to dignify the service and give it that substantial prominence which it deserves, by reason of its extensive business; still, it must be associated with transportation, and therefore given a place in this chapter.

The first attempt to systematize and regulate postal communication in the American colonies was made by the British government in 1660. And this subject received the attention of William Penn shortly after his arrival in Pennsylvania, he having, in July, 1683, issued an order for the establishment of a post-office at Philadelphia. The postal facilities, however, in this early period, were only such as were afforded by personal accommodation among the colonists.

Benjamin Franklin was appointed postmaster at Philadelphia, and in 1753 a deputy postmaster-general. The delivery of letters by the penny post began in the latter year, and also the

In 1692 the rate of postage to and from Philadelphia, within a radius of eighty miles, was four pence halfpenny.

The office of Postmaster-General for America was created by Parliament in 1704, and shortly afterward stage-coaches were introduced to run between Boston and Philadelphia. In 1737 practice of advertising letters which remained in the office at Philadelphia.

In 1774 Franklin became obnoxious to the British government, and he was therefore dismissed. This caused private arrangements to be made for carrying letters, and, as a consequence, the postal service did not contribute any revenue to the British treasury. In 1775 the colonies established their own postal department, and on July 26th, in that year, Benjamin Franklin was unanimously chosen Postmaster-General. This was an important action in connection with the movement for independence. In 1792 rates of postage were established, which remained unchanged for over fifty years. They were, for every single letter, as follows:

From 1 to 30 miles.......................... 6 cents.
   " 30 " 60 " .......................... 8 "
   " 60 " 100 " .......................... 10 "
   " 100 " 150 " .......................... 12½ "
   " 150 " 200 " .......................... 15 "
   " 200 " 250 " .......................... 17 "
   " 250 " 300 " .......................... 20 "
   " 300 " 400 " .......................... 22 "
   " 400 " 500 " .......................... 25 "
   " Over 450 miles .......................... 25 "

Reading Office Established.—Within a year afterward the first post-office in the county was established at Reading. This was on March 20, 1793. The department had been in practical existence for nearly twenty years. Our population was large and business transactions were numerous. But correspondence was limited. Letters had been carried for several years previously by a private stage-line to Philadelphia and Harrisburg, at the rate of three pence postage, and about the year 1800 they began to be carried to Sunbury once a week on horseback, and to Lancaster and Easton once a week in a private two-horse carriage. After the stage-coach had become a fixed mode of transportation for people and light articles of merchandise, at regular intervals, postal matter then began to be carried by them from place to place.

Departure and Arrival of Mails.—In October, 1803, the departure and arrival of the several mails were as follows, according to a published notice by the postmaster of Reading:

"1. To Philadelphia—departs every Monday and Thursday at 4 A.M., and arrives every Tuesday and Friday at 8 A.M.; and returning, departs from Philadelphia every Tuesday and Friday at 4 P.M., and arrives at Reading every Wednesday and Saturday at 8 P.M.

"2. To Northumberland—departs every Thursday at 6 A.M., and arrives every Friday at 4 P.M. (in summer, and at 6 in winter); and returning, departs every Saturday at 5 A.M., and arrives at Reading every Sunday at 6 P.M.

"3. To Carlisle—departs every Thursday at 6 A.M., and arrives every Friday at 3 P.M.; returning, departs every Saturday at 5 A.M., and arrives at Reading every Sunday at six P.M."

Mail-Stages.—In 1811 William Coleman advertised the following schedule for his "mail-stages" to Philadelphia, Northumberland and Harrisburg:

"The stage for Philadelphia leaves every Monday and Thursday morning; and returning, leaves Philadelphia every Tuesday and Friday afternoon.

"The stage for Northumberland leaves every Wednesday afternoon, and arrives at Sunbury¹ every Thursday evening; and returning, leaves Sunbury every Saturday morning, and arrives every Sunday evening, reaching Philadelphia the following evening.

"And the stage for Harrisburg leaves every Sunday and Thursday morning, and arrives at Harrisburg in the evening of same days; and returning, leaves Harrisburg every Wednesday and Saturday morning, and arrives at Reading in the evening of same days."

And in the same year, Weyandts & Levan advertised the following schedule for their "Lancaster and Easton mail-stage:"

"Our mail-stage leaves Mr. Sebring's tavern, at Easton, every Monday morning, takes fresh horses at Kutztown, and arrives the same evening at Mr. William Coleman's Reading Hotel, from which it starts every Tuesday morning, via Lititz, and arrives in the afternoon of same day at Mr. John Michel's tavern, at Lancaster. In returning, it leaves every Wednesday morning, and arrives at the Reading Hotel on same evening, starting from there next morning and arriving every Thursday evening at Easton. The fare for passengers is three dollars, or a five-penny bit per mile, allowing passengers to carry fourteen pounds weight of baggage."

In 1828, an independent line of tri-weekly stages having been put upon the route between Philadelphia and Harrisburg, via Reading, two mails were afforded every Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday at Reading, at noon and at five P.M. This line went into operation on November 11, 1828. The combination or "Old Line" began carrying daily mails in 1826.

A daily mail between Reading and Mount

¹ Sunbury was the terminus in Northumberland County, two miles south of the town of Northumberland. It was then, as it is now, the county-seat.
INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

Carbon, to and from the respective places, was established April 1, 1829.

The mails were carried by stages till the introduction of the railways from the several places south, north, west and east; then the passenger train was substituted. The changes were made as follows: From Philadelphia, 1838; from Pottsville, 1842; from Harrisburg, 1858; from Allentown, 1859; from Lancaster, 1864.

There are a number of stage-routes which extend from Reading into and through districts of the county not reached by railroads. They are as follows:

Daily, except Sunday.—To Millersburg, via Leinbach's and Bernville; to Gougler'sville, etc.; to Mohan's store, etc.; to Boyertown, via Stonersville and Yellow House; to Shanesville, via Oley Pike; to Pikeville, via Stony Creek Mills and Friedensburg.

Tri-Weekly.—To Krick's Mill, via Cacooing; to Hummel's store, via Angelica; to Garfield, via Lower Bern.

Stamps.—No postage stamps were issued by the National government till August, 1847, when two denominations were issued—five cent and ten cent. The idea of using postage stamps had been first suggested in 1841. Previously postage had been collected entirely in money; and in all cases pre-payment was optional. The two denominations mentioned continued in use four years; then new denominations for one cent and three cents appeared, and shortly afterward others for five, ten, twelve, twenty-four, thirty and ninety cents. In 1861 this series was called in by Montgomery Blair, Lincoln's Postmaster-General, and a new series issued. July 1, 1863, the first two-cent stamp appeared, which was to accommodate local postage. In March, 1869, J. A. J. Creswell, Grant's Postmaster-General, brought out a new series, but they did not come into favor, and after two months were superseded by a series of the denominations of one, two, three, five, six, ten, fifteen, thirty and ninety cents. And a year afterward the following designs were adopted for these stamps: One cent, Franklin; two cent, Jackson; three cent, Washington; five cent, Jackson; six cent, Lincoln; ten cent, Jefferson; fifteen cent, Webster; thirty cent, Hamilton; ninety cent, Perry. Designs of persons on stamps in honor of distinguished representative men of our country, had been in use from their first introduction, particularly of Franklin and Washington.

Post-Offices. — The following post-offices have been established in the county till 1886: They number one hundred and thirty, being an average of one post-office to every thousand inhabitants. They are arranged in the order of their priority.

1 Discontinued shortly afterward.
In 1844 the telegraph was successfully introduced for the transmission of messages by electricity. The first message was sent through a wire elevated on poles, between Washington and Baltimore, May 27, 1844. Congress had in March previously appropriated thirty thousand dollars to Prof. Morse for the purpose of enabling him to make experiments with his instrument to demonstrate the practicability of his invention.

PHILADELPHIA, READING AND POTTSVILLE TELEGRAPH COMPANY.—A company was incorporated under the name of Philadelphia, Reading and Pottsville Telegraph Company, by an act passed March 15, 1847, for the purpose of making, using and maintaining telegraph lines between Philadelphia, Reading and Pottsville, and the following commissioners were appointed to effect an organization of the company:

From Philadelphia.—John Tucker, Peter Bosquet and Morris S. Wickersham.

The company was duly organized in April, 1847, and the telegraph line was successfully established shortly afterward. Communication was completed between Philadelphia and Reading May 10, 1847, and the first message then forwarded to Reading related to the Mexican War. This line has been maintained since. The length of the main line from Philadelphia to Pottsville is one hundred and one miles; the length of the main lines in Pennsylvania is 873$\frac{3}{4}$ miles, and the total length of wire is 3086$\frac{1}{2}$ miles. In 1884 it had 392 stations, 800 instruments in use, and 689 persons employed in operating and maintaining the line; and it forwarded during that year 381,454 messages. The total cost of the line and its equipment is $254,059.48.

Upon the construction and operation of the several other railroads running from Reading, telegraph lines were extended to the several places—Harrisburg, Allentown, Columbia, Lancaster, etc.

WESTERN UNION.—The American Telegraph Company introduced a line of telegraph here in 1863, and, in 1865, the Western Union Telegraph Company. These two then formed a union; and the lines have been operated since under the latter name. In 1879 this company and the Philadelphia, Reading and Pottsville Telegraph Company effected an arrangement for co-operation; since which time they have operated their lines here together.

LEHIGH.—The Lehigh Telegraph Company was organized in Allentown, and opened an office at Reading in September, 1880. It formed a connection with the principal cities in the United States through the American Union Telegraph Company. This connection was continued for a year and a half, and then changed to the “Mutual Union” for an equal period. It was operated under this name till January, 1884, when its lines, etc., were transferred to the Bankers’ and Merchants’ Telegraph Company. This company is now operating the wires under the name of the United Lines Telegraph Company, by which it is known throughout the country.

TELEPHONE.

The telephone was introduced in Reading by Henry W. Spang, in October, 1879. He organized a system of communication in the city and carried it on successfully till November, 1880, when he formed a stock company for the purpose of erecting and maintaining telephone lines and exchanges in Berks, Montgomery, Schuylkill and Lebanon Counties, under the name of East...
Pennsylvania Telephone Company. The stock subscribers were Henry W. Spang, Mrs. Mary Spang, Isaac Y. Spang, Daniel Spang, C. Holton, F. S. Jacobs and H. D. Van Horn. This company extended the system—making connection with Pottstown, Pottsville and Lebanon—set up an increased number of instruments, and operated it successfully till January 1, 1883, when the entire business, including wires and instruments, was transferred to the Pennsylvania Telephone Company, a similar organization, which had extended its wire to Lebanon from Harrisburg. This latter company has conducted the business since 1883. It has now in use and successful operation seven hundred and nine miles of wire and six hundred instruments, of which five hundred are in Reading and one hundred in the county districts.

The first telephone company in the State was organized at Philadelphia, November 14, 1878. The introduction of this improvement has been of great convenience and advantage to the business men of this community. The telegraph was a wonderful step in advance of the postal and express deliveries, which had been the common means of communication carried on through the agency of steam; but the telephone was a marvelous step in advance of even the telegraph—for instead of writing, forwarding and reading messages and letters, which required both labor and time, communication was facilitated and business men were enabled to speak with each other directly, as it were, face to face, without any loss of time. It is like the great agent, electricity, upon which it is based—the embodiment of dispatch.

CHAPTER XIX.

POLITICS AND CIVIL LIST.

Election Districts—Political Sentiment of County—Prominent Representative Men—Offices by Special Legislation —Political Parties—Political Festivals—State Conventions and Mass-Meetings at Reading—List of Officials—Biographical Sketches.

ELECTION DISTRICTS.—Provision was made by William Penn, in the laws agreed upon in England on April 25, 1682, in reference to the government of the province of Pennsylvania, for free and voluntary elections. The right of election was given to every freeman of the province. A freeman was defined to be “every inhabitant that is or shall be a purchaser of one hundred acres of land or upward; and every person who shall have paid his passage and taken up one hundred acres of land at one penny an acre, and have cultivated ten acres thereof; and every person that hath been a servant or bondsman and is free by his service that shall have taken up fifty acres of land and cultivated twenty thereof; and every inhabitant, artificer, or other resident that pays scot or lot to the government.”

At that time the territory comprising Berks County was occupied by Indians alone. Not a single white man had settled upon it. This is strange. And only two hundred years ago! There was no need for election laws, nor for districts to facilitate elections and their returns. Within one hundred years afterward, many permanent settlers had entered the territory. The necessity of government in all its forms had become apparent. Townships had been organized and the county had become erected with all its offices. Independence had been declared; and government “of the people, for the people, and by the people” had been established. And elections of various local officers had been made. But no special records have been transmitted to enable us to understand how and with what results they were conducted. The elections for county officials were held at Reading from the beginning of the county in 1752 till 1789, when the county was divided into election districts.

In 1785 the county comprised one election district; and all elections were directed to be held at the court-house, in the county-town, Reading. No additional returns could be found, excepting those hereafter mentioned for 1788.

In 1789 the county was divided into five election districts, and the electors of the several townships in the respective districts were required to vote at the places named:
Reading (1st District, at the court-house).

Reading. Exeter.
Alase. Heidelberg.
Bern. Maiden-creek.
Brecknock. Oley.
Caernarvon. Robeson.
Cumru. Ruscomb-manor.

Kutztown (2d District, at public-house of Philip Gehr).

Greenwich. Maxatawny.
Hereford. Richmond.
Longswamp. Rockland.

Hamburg (3d District, at public-house of John Moyer).

Bern, Upper. Windsor.

Tulpehocken (4th District, at public-house of Godfrey Roehr).

Bethel. Tulpehocken.
Pinegrove.

Amity (5th District, at public-house of William Witman—called "White Horse").

Amity. Earl.
Colebrookdale. Union.
Douglass.

There were then twenty-nine townships and one borough—Reading. The electors of twelve divisions voted at Reading. In the performance of this political duty many of them came a distance of fifteen miles. But this was an improvement on what had been required four years before—those living in the townships farthest removed from Reading having been required to travel from twenty-five to thirty miles.

Subsequently, for a period of three-score years, till 1851, additional districts were erected to facilitate the elections. And afterward four boroughs were incorporated and the wards of Reading multiplied. As a matter of historical interest, they are here presented in the order of priority:

Forest, 1791, at public-house of Isaac Bonsall, in Robeson, comprising Caernarvon, Robeson and Union.
Muthart's, 1794, at public-house of Joseph Muthart, in Colebrookdale, comprising Colebrookdale District, Earl and Herford.
Womensdorf, 1797, at public-house of Conrad Stouch, Womensdorf, comprising Bethel, Tulpehocken and that part of Heidelberg northwest of Hain's Church.
Pinegrove, 1797, at public-house of Jacob Gunckel, in Pinegrove.
Marquart's, 1798, at the public-house of Philip Marquart, in Robeson, comprising Brecknock, Caernarvon, Robeson and part of Union. Not used in table; vote included in district Forest.
Owingsburg, 1798, at public-house of John Hammer, comprising Brunswick and Manheim.
Croll's, 1799, at public-house of Michael Croll, in Greenwich, comprising Albany and Greenwich.
Mahantango, 1802, at public-house of Michael Artz.
Bethel, 1803, at public-house of Michael Miller.
Tulpehocken, 1809, at public-house of Henry Horsh.
Hereford, 1811, at public-house of George Hooff, called at times "Hooff's."
Keely's, 1812, at public-house of Henry Keely, in Douglass, comprising parts of Amity, Colebrookdale, Douglass and Earl; discontinued after 1820.
Shortle's, 1812, at public-house of George Shortle, in Bern, Upper, comprising parts of Tulpehocken, Upper, and Bern, Upper (now Shortsville).
Oley, 1814, at public-house of Jacob Kemp (now about a mile south of Friedensburg, on the road to Yellow House).
Rockland, 1816, at public-house of Andrew Shiffert (now at New Jerusalem).
Pike, 1816, at public-house of Daniel Oyster.
Maiden-creek, 1817, at public-house of Catherine Gift.
Longswamp, 1817, at public-house of Peter Trexler.
Earl, 1817, at public-house of Jacob Pennepacker.
Reading, 1817, divided into two wards, North and South, Penn Street the dividing line.
Caernarvon, 1818, at public-house of Thomas L. Jones, Morgantown.
District, 1818, at public-house of John Weller.
Albany, 1819, at public-house of Jacob Fosselman.
Perry, 1821, at public-house of John Binkley.
Bern, Upper, 1822, at public-house of Benjamin Haas.
Amity, 1822, at public-house of John Potts, Jr.
Richmond, 1823, at public-house of Thomas Dunn.
Douglass, 1824, at public-house of Daniel Pile.
Colebrookdale, 1827, at public-house of Henry Ritter.
Greenwich, 1827, substituted for Croll's in 1829.
Union, 1829, at public-house of David Sterrett.
Berneville, 1829, at public-house of Philip Filbert.
Robeson, 1829, at public-house of Anna Beard.
Brecknock, 1829, at public-house of John Ziemer.
Hamburg, 1830, incorporated a borough and taken from Windsor.
Windsor, 1830, at public-house of John Bailey, Hamburg.
Heidelberg, Lower, 1834, at public-house of Henry Binkley.
Heidelberg, 1839, at public-house of Michael Seltzer, Womelsdorf.

Exeter, 1839, at public-house of Daniel Boyer (now at Stonersville).

Alsace, 1840, at public-house of Jacob Bernhart.

Bern, 1840, at public-house of Jacob Ehbling.

Camrun, 1840, at public-house of Michael Nunne- macher, in Reading.

Washington, 1840, at public-house of Joseph Baughman.

Reading, 1840, divided into four wards, Sixth and Penn Streets the dividing lines: Northeast Ward, at northeast corner Seventh and Penn Streets, at public-house of John Miller; Northwest Ward, on Fifth Street, between Washington and Walnut Streets, east side, midway, at public-house of John L. Reifsnyder; Southeast Ward, at southeast corner Eighth and Penn Streets, at public-house of William Rapp; Southwest Ward, at southwest corner Fourth and Penn Streets, at public-house of George Germant. (Previously the elections were held at the court-house, at the intersection of Fifth and Penn Streets.)

Marxatawy, 1841. Kutztown voted separately from this time on. It was incorporated a borough in 1815. The two districts voted together till the election of 1838.

Penn, 1842, at public-house of Daniel Potteiger.

Centre, 1843, at public-house of Elizabeth Kauffman.

Marion, 1843, at public-house of Edward H. Becker, Stouchsburg.

Reading, 1844. Spruce Ward, erected out of that part of Reading lying between Schuylkill River, Philadelphia and Reading Railroad and Spruce Street, at public-house of George Goodhart, between Fourth and Fifth Streets, below Laurel.

Heidelberg, North, 1845, at public-house of John Kalbach.

Perry, 1849, at public-house of Jacob Boyer.

Muhlenberg, 1850, at public-house of Gabriel Gehret.

Ontelaunee, 1850, at public-house of George W. Althouse (now in Leesport).

Spring, 1850, at public-house of Jacob Hoffman, Singing Spring.

Birdsboro, 1872, at public school-house.

Fleetwood, 1873, at public-house of Percival Brumbauch.

Topton, 1877, at public-house of Josiah Fisher.

Centsreport, [private house.]

Reading, 1864, was divided into nine wards. In 1876 the Tenth Ward was erected out of the Second, and the Eleventh Ward out of the Ninth; and in 1885, the Eleventh Ward was divided into three wards.

The election districts in the county now comprise thirteen wards, nine boroughs and forty-one townships,—altogether sixty-three in number.

POLITICAL SENTIMENT OF COUNTY.—The earliest published vote which I could find was for Representative to Congress in 1788, of the following seven counties:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Federal Representatives</th>
<th>Anti-Federal Representatives</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Berks</td>
<td>1877 692 901 121 771 307</td>

<tr>

This table would seem to be comparatively insignificant. Yet it is worthy of serious study. A comparison of this vote with the vote of the counties for a period covering nearly one hundred years will reveal a political sentiment almost unchanged throughout the whole period, especially that which relates to Berks on the one side, and Chester and Lancaster on the other. The Anti-Federal party, in 1788, comprised what is now the Democratic party—the party generally representing confederation and State rights as contradistinguished from national rights; and the Federal party comprised what is now the Republican party—the party representing national rights and indivisible unity.

VOTE FOR GOVERNOR.—Since 1788 the people of the county manifested a most remarkable adherence to the Democratic party and the principles which it advocated, chief among which was the principle of local self-government. In the return of 1802 the Democratic vote was eight times that of the Federal. Afterward this proportion was at no time surpassed, not even equaled. And the vote was regularly for the Democratic candidate, excepting upon two occasions, in 1817 and 1820, when the people of the county manifested their respect for a distinguished son of one of the first families of the county, though on the opposing ticket, as they theretofore had, and thereafter have, done for party. These occasions were when the Hon. Joseph Hiester was a candidate on the Federal ticket for Governor. He had distinguished himself in political affairs of and for the county through a period of forty years. And Berks...
County did not stand alone in honoring him. Of the eleven counties in the southeastern section of the State, he had eight in 1817. This important section of the State gave him a majority of seven thousand one hundred and ninety-one, though the State was against him by a majority of seven thousand and five. And in 1820 he had nine of the eleven counties, with a majority of eight thousand one hundred and ninety-four, and in the State a majority of one thousand six hundred and five. In this connection, the vote of Hister for Congress, as against Daniel Clymer, in 1798, can be referred to in order to show Hister's popularity. The vote was more than four to one in his favor. All the districts in the county except one gave him large majorities. The exception was the "Forest" District, this having been influenced by the Clymer family, resident in Caernarvon township, in this district, for Daniel Clymer, the opposing candidate.

Even through the excitement incident to the Civil War, 1861–65, the county continued Democratic by large majorities. But the city of Reading was otherwise. It had been theretofore generally Democratic. At the election previous to 1860, it had been almost three to one; but in 1860, 1863 and 1866 it was Republican. Then in 1869 it was, and since has been, Democratic. This is remarkable too. It has been generally said that a manufacturing community is Republican in sentiment, through manufactures and protective tariff. But this is not the case with Reading.

VOTE FOR PRESIDENT.—In 1828 the vote for Jackson in Berks was five to one against Adams. Then it was that the county distinguished itself in voting for Jackson. It would seem that the people here, as the people had elsewhere, felt keenly the outrage perpetrated upon them by the House of Representatives, in not having respected the will of the majority by the selection of the candidate for President whose electors had received the greatest number of votes. The idea of self-government was again uppermost in their minds, and this idea they felt it their duty to express by ballot in a most unequivocal manner. The vote of Reading was in about the same proportion. And at Jackson's re-election, in 1832, the result of the vote, both in the county and city, was for him in the proportion of about four to one.

The vote in the county for President from 1828 to 1880 was always Democratic by a large majority. And the city of Reading was also Democratic by a considerable majority till 1860. Then a decided change took place through the great upheaval in political affairs. Lincoln was given a majority of more than five hundred over Breckenridge, and of more than three hundred over all, Douglass and Bell included. And this Republican feeling in the city prevailed till the re-election of Grant, when, remarkable to say, a majority of 1207 was given for him. Afterward a change took place for the Democratic party, which has prevailed since.

In 1828 the vote of the county was about nine per cent. of the vote of the eleven counties, and only three and seven-tenths per cent. of the State; in 1860 it was nearly the same; and in 1880 it was seven and three-tenths per cent. of the eleven counties, and only three per cent. of the State.

In 1828 the vote of the eleven counties was forty-one and four-tenths per cent. of the vote of the State; in 1860 it was forty per cent. and in 1880 it was forty-two per cent.

The county, in the total vote, compared with the State, lost seven-tenths of one per cent. in fifty years, and the eleven counties gained six-tenths of one per cent. This is certainly maintaining to a remarkable degree public political interests, notwithstanding the increase of the vote from 152,500 to 852,132, or over five times the number. In 1880 the number of taxables in the whole State was 1,112,422. Hence nearly seventy-seven per cent., or over three-fourths of the electors in the State, exercised their right of political suffrage.

The taxables of the county, of the eleven counties and of the State, for two certain periods, 1836 and 1880, are compared with the number of votes polled, in order to show the relative proportion of the taxables who voted.

By this statement it would appear that a small number over half of the taxables in the county voted in 1836, and over four-fifths in 1880; showing that in forty-four years the proportion had increased thirty per cent., or nearly one-third. In the eleven counties the increase was twenty-three per cent., and in the State twenty per cent. The county is therefore in advance of the average interest in political affairs.

In reference to the party vote in the county, the Democratic vote compared with the opposition was as follows: In 1828 it was five times the number; in 1832, four times; in 1836, three times; from 1840 to 1884 the average was a little less than double. In 1856 Buchanan had a majority of 6903; but in 1860 Breckenridge had only 1581. In 1880 Hancock had a majority of 7731.

The majority of the Democratic party in the county at each Presidential election from 1828 to 1884 was as follows:

Vote for Constitutional Amendments.

On the question of amending the State Constitution the tables are interesting. In 1825 all of the eleven counties excepting one, Lehigh, were against a convention, with a total vote of three to one. In 1835 all were against it nearly two to one. But the State was carried for it. In 1838, on the question of ratifying the work of the convention, Berks and Bucks voted for the amendments, but the other nine counties against them, the total majority in this section of the State against them having been nearly seventeen thousand. But the State adopted them by a majority less than twelve hundred in a total vote of 226,730.

In 1850, on the question of making the judges of both Supreme and County Courts elective, Berks and six others of the eleven counties were for it by a large majority; and the State was for it by a vote of two to one.

In 1871 the question of a convention was again submitted to the people of the State. Of the eleven counties, Berks was the only county against it, with the remarkable vote of two to one. But the eleven counties were altogether for it, three to one; and the State almost five to one.

Vote for Prohibition and License.

The liquor question was submitted to the people twice—first in 1854, then in 1873. On both occasions Berks County was decidedly for it—first by a vote of four to one, and afterward by a vote of three to one. And Lehigh was at first more decidedly for it, by a vote of six to one, and afterward nearly three to one. Chester and Delaware were against it at both elections.
Philadelphia, in 1854, was against it about five to four; but in twenty years public opinion had changed so much as to be for license two to one.

Prominent Representative Men.— Before 1820 it would seem that the major part of the voters of the county did not show so strong a partisan spirit in reference to the election of their representatives to Congress as they did afterward. Joseph Hiester was apparently a very popular man with his constituents. He maintained their confidence and political support through a period embracing thirty years, notwithstanding his identification with the Federal party and also the publication of certain letters in local newspapers reflecting against him. And he was eminently worthy of this confidence and support. He succeeded in accomplishing what no other man in the history of the county has been able to do; for, besides securing his repeated election to Congress on the ticket of the minority party, he even influenced the suffrage of the Democrats in the county in his own behalf against their own regular nominee for Governor to such an extent as to be elevated to the highest executive office of the State. The people not only honored him, but he also honored the people. He was an exceptional man. In the three-score of years which have elapsed since his retirement from political life we have not had his equal. And yet the people have not been inspired to signalize his nativity, his successful business career and his political prominence by the erection of a monument, or even by the naming of a township after him, though many townships were erected within twenty years after his decease in 1832. When Bern township was sub-divided, one of the sub-divisions could have been named after him with undisputed propriety. The indifference of the people of the county in this matter is to a great degree expressive of their simple and unostentatious life; but it is inexcusable—not so much in respect to the person of Governor Heister as to his enterprising, representative and truly patriotic character.

During the period from 1829 to 1844 Rev. Henry A. Muhlenberg—the son-in-law of Governor Joseph Heister—was the most prominent political representative in the county. By a re-election to Congress for five consecutive terms he evinced much popularity. In 1835 he received the nomination of the Democratic party for Governor; but he was not elected, owing to the action of an independent element in the party, which was led by Governor Wolf, the incumbent then in the executive office and concluding his second term. At that time the Anti-Masonic party was strong in the State, and, through the division of the Democratic party, it was enabled to elect its candidate, Joseph Ritner. Muhlenberg polled the largest vote of the three candidates in the county; but by the vote polled for Wolf there would seem to have been a considerable opposition to him. In the entire State, Wolf had a larger vote than Muhlenberg. Several years afterward, President Van Buren appointed Muhlenberg to be the first minister to Austria, and, in accepting this distinguished appointment, he resigned his seat in Congress. This was the first honor conferred by a President of the United States upon the county of Berks, and the people appreciated it highly. In 1844 Muhlenberg again became the regular nominee for Governor on the Democratic ticket, but he died before the election. Francis R. Shunk was nominated in his stead and elected by a small majority. It is possible that Muhlenberg would have been elected if he had lived. The opposition to him in the county had, however, not yet subsided. There was a great difference between Heister and Muhlenberg; the former was a Federalist in a Democratic county, successful in winning and holding a strong political support for himself, and he was a stanch advocate of a protective tariff, of the free school system and of the United States Bank (of which it is probable that he was one of the original subscribers of stock); but the latter was a Democrat, and as such he was opposed to the measures mentioned.

Twenty years after Muhlenberg's time in Congress, the first considerable dissatisfaction arose in the Democratic party in the county, and this resulted in the defeat of Hon. J. Glancy Jones, who was the regular nominee.
Jones had been the representative to Congress from this district since 1851, and, whilst serving his fourth term, he, in 1858, announced himself as a candidate for re-election. At that time there was a great political change working its way amongst the people throughout the State—gradually, if not rapidly—and, to a certain extent, this change was manifesting itself in Berks County. It was induced, principally, by the action of the Buchanan administration on the Kansas question. Jones was intimately associated with the administration, having been chairman of the committee on ways and means,—the most prominent committee in the House of Representatives,—and, when the feeling was developing itself against President Buchanan, the leader of this opposition naturally endeavored to extend this feeling into Berks County, so as to operate against Jones, one of his ablest supporters. And in this movement they were successful. Jones had made the nomination before the county convention almost by acclamation, this having been effected, principally, by a thorough party organization. But immediately afterward, certain influential Democrats in the county developed sufficient feeling against him to be able to call a convention together and express a decided opposition to his re-election. The principal ground upon which they based their opposition was his unsatisfactory course on the subject of the tariff. In his movements with Buchanan's administration he had, more or less, committed himself against this important measure, which was thought to be intimately connected with the increasing prosperity of the county, through manufactures. The independent Democrats, therefore, nominated John Schwartz, a prominent iron-master,—a man of large ability and experience, and a highly-respected survivor of the War of 1812-15,—and the Republicans united in supporting him. This union caused the defeat of Mr. Jones by a very small majority; and it was the first real defeat which the Democrats had met with in the history of the party in the county, especially since the thorough organization of the party under President Jackson. The county was thoroughly Democratic, for, at the previous Presidential election, in 1856, the Democrats had a majority of nearly seven thousand, and at the previous gubernatorial election, in 1857, they had a majority of nearly six thousand. The independent candidate and his friends had won a great victory, which had caused general rejoicing amongst them and also amongst the Republicans, to whose united support his election was directly attributable. The defeat of Jones was to President Buchanan a great surprise, if not a great disappointment, for Berks County had been so largely Democratic that it was counted upon for a Democratic representative, and this defeat was a loss to the national administration. Jones was recognized as an able and experienced leader in the Democratic party. His ability and experience had won a considerable prominence in national politics, and also the confidence and friendship of the President. And his services were appreciated by the President, if not by his constituents. Immediately after hearing of his defeat, the President appointed him to the Austrian mission. This honorable appointment he accepted, and, therefore, he resigned his seat in Congress.

Mr. Jones represented the national government at Vienna for over two years with distinction, and then returned home. His return was equivalent to retirement from politics, for in the mean time a new combination had taken possession of the county political affairs, which elevated, and continued to elevate, new men to Congress from this district; and the Republican party had obtained control of the national administration, which it continued to hold for twenty-four years. In this long period our several representatives in Congress, on account of their opposition to the national administration, naturally did not, and could not, command any political influence, much less political prominence.

The political activity in the campaign of 1858 was not permitted to subside with the defeat of Jones, for, during the congratulations of his opponents, he resigned, and his resignation caused a vacancy which the voters were called upon to fill. The Democrats nominated Joel B. Wanner, Esq., who, two years before, had served as mayor of Reading for one term; and the Republicans nominated General William H. Keim, a man highly respected for his ability and business qualifications, and very popular throughout the county in military affairs. The election was advertised to be held on November 30, 1858. The Democrats were despondent and without assurance, not having recovered from the shock of their defeat, and General Keim was elected. The vote polled was small, especially for the Democratic candidate, and showed much indifference on the part of the people.

Previously, on two occasions, in respect to county offices, a similar result occurred. In 1846 David Yoder, a prominent and influential farmer in Oley, and a descendant of one of the first families in that township, was elected, as a Whig, to the office of county commissioner, because the nominee on the Democratic ticket was alleged to have been an Irishman, a class of individuals not particularly appreciated by the German element in the county. And in 1853 Charles Van Reed, who was also a prominent and influential farmer and a paper manufacturer in Lower Heidelberg township, and a descendant of one of the old and well-established families in the county, was elected, as a Whig, to the office of county treasurer. The nominee on the Democratic ticket was Adam Leize, who had held this office for one term,—1849 to 1851. The incumbent, during the election, was William Ermentrout, whose son was married to Leize's daughter. Many Democrats thought that one family was obtaining too much in respect to one office, and, therefore, they opposed the election of Leize, notwithstanding that he had succeeded in making the nomination. Between 1879 and 1820 Daniel Messersmith and John K. Messersmith continued to hold this office, alternately, for a period covering thirty years; David Bright held it for twelve years, from 1823 to 1835; and Peter Nagle for eight years, from 1835 to 1843. This office was then filled by appointment, but in 1841 an act was passed making it elective.

In 1841 Hon. John Banks (then president judge of Berks County) was the nominee of the Whig party for Governor, but he was far from an election. The Democratic party was at that time under thorough organization, and Governor Porter was elected by a largely-increased majority in the county as well as in the State. Subsequently, in 1847, whilst the Whigs were in the majority in the State Legislature, Judge Banks was elected, by the united support of all the Whigs, to the office of State treasurer for one year.

Between 1850 and 1860 there were two prominent representatives from Berks County in the State Legislature. William M. Hiesteer was in the Senate from 1853 to 1855, and served during the latter year as Speaker; and J. Lawrence Getz was in the House for two years (1856 and 1857), having served in that body during the latter year as Speaker. Mr. Getz subsequently (from 1867 to 1873) served three terms in Congress from this district.

Hon. Hiesteer Clymer occupied political prominence in the county for twenty years, from 1861 to 1881. He was in the State Senate from the senatorial district from 1861 to 1866. In 1866 he received the nomination for Governor on the Democratic ticket, but he was not elected. The city of Reading was then Republican in political sentiment by a small majority; and the nominee on the Republican ticket, General John W. Geary, received the full party vote, notwithstanding Reading was the home of Mr. Clymer. This would indicate the thorough organization of the Republican party. And Mr. Clymer was the Representative in Congress from 1873 to 1881. Hon. Daniel Ermentrout succeeded Mr. Clymer in political prominence—he having been State Senator from this district for three terms, from 1874 to 1880, and since 1881 in Congress.

In looking over the "Political Hand-Book of Berks County," it would appear that a number of representative men were on the way to prominence, but fell short of it. We cannot fail to observe in the last thirty years there were many men in the representative offices from this county, and that if the county in this time has not produced men of wide political influence, such as the people have a right to expect from so rich and populous a county, the secret of its failure in this respect lies in the frequent change of its representatives. The policy, or rather the custom, of allowing men to drop into office and be forced out of it, especially of a representative character by accidental combinations, should not be tolerated. The time has come when the community at large should select representative men recognized for fitness and then retain them as long as possible. This would not only destroy the common ambition in so many men who are continually seeking after offices for which they have limited qualifications, but it would increase the usefulness of those who are elevated to representative positions.

OFFICES BY SPECIAL LEGISLATION.—The general political history of our county is similar to that of the surrounding counties,—in fact, of the whole State, in respect to its general government. Legislation created territorial divisions, and provided offices of various kinds for them in order to facilitate the regulation of local affairs, and the representation of the people in the legislative bodies of the State and nation. And these offices have been filled either by election or by appointment from the beginning of our political existence as a county till now. A sameness extends throughout the whole period. Comparatively little special legislation has been done for our county in the way of creating particular political positions. Four acts of the General Assembly are worthy of mention: One passed in 1824, relative to the management of poor affairs; another in 1848, relative to the management of prison affairs; a third in 1869, relative to the election of an additional law judge; and a fourth in 1883, for the election of an Orphans' Court judge.

A marked change was introduced by the Constitution of 1873, enabling the minority party to elect officials. In Berks County this applied to county commissioners and county auditors. Theretofore these officials in the county were almost entirely Democrats since their election in 1841.

The first Republican commissioner and auditor under this provision were elected in 1875. And in 1873 the act of 1848 creating the board of prison inspectors was so amended as to enable the minority party to elect three out of nine inspectors or annually one out of three.

The act of 1824, relating to the poor directors, which provides for the annual election of a director for three years, has not yet been amended to meet the spirit of the times and of the State Constitution. In 1867, when jury commissioners were authorized to be elected, provision was made that each elector should vote for one person for this office, and the two persons having the highest vote should be the commissioners. This provision enabled the minority party in the county to elect one commissioner. Accordingly, the Republicans have elected a jury commissioner since 1867.

POLITICAL PARTIES.—From the beginning of the county there have been two parties in political affairs. This was both natural and necessary. Before the Revolution agitation of political questions was not general or continuous. The elective franchise was a recognized privilege, but it was not particularly encouraged by the creation of convenient or numerous polls to enable electors to express political preferences. Local offices for the townships and the town were filled by election, but county officials were appointed, and this feature continued in respect to the major part of them till 1841, when an act of Assembly was passed which provided for a general change to election. Berks County comprised only one general election district, with the court-house at Reading as the polls. In 1789 the districts began to increase, and they have increased gradually, to satisfy the demands and encourage the facilities for election, till they now number sixty-three.

During the Revolution the people formed themselves into two parties, especially those who manifested any concern in the government which was to prevail over them. The one class, favoring a continuance of the royal government, was called "Tories;" and the other, favoring a free, representative government, "Federals," or "Whigs." The distinction was marked, and fortunately for the people of the county, as of the State and the great confederation of States, the latter party won a decisive victory. Upon the establishment of freedom new parties arose. These proceeded from the Whigs, and were recognized either as the Government Whigs, or Federals who desired a Re-
Republican form of government, with checks upon the impulses or passions of the people, and with liberty duly regulated, but strengthened and confirmed by central authority, or as the Particularist Whigs, or Anti-Federals, who desired the same form of government, but Democratic in spirit, with the rights of local self-government, and of States ever uppermost.

In a certain sense the latter took the place of the “Tories,” and were called “Republicans.” They were the dominant party in Berks County then and they have continued to be till now. A singular change—if not a transformation—in respect to party names, arose afterward. As early as 1793 the Anti-Federal party was called the Democratic-Republican party; but the word “Republican” was dropped in 1805, and the name Democratic alone used. Thence the Federals or Whigs (or Republicans) have been on the one side and the Democrats on the other, the latter party keeping its identity for four-score years.

For a time—about twenty-five years, from 1830 to 1855—the Anti-Mason party for ten years, and the Whig for fifteen years, were substituted in the place of the Republican party.

The Declaration of Independence was published on the 4th day of July, 1776. Since the Revolution, that day has been regarded as the nation’s birthday, and it has been made a holiday by the several State governments. Annually for about eighty years, the several parties of each community celebrated this great holiday by assembling at certain popular places and drinking toasts, making addresses and enjoying themselves generally. At Reading the political parties celebrated the day regularly in this manner. The Federalists and the Whigs assembled on the island ¹ in the Schuylkill River, several hundred feet above the ferry, at the foot of Bingham Street, and the Democrats at the Mineral Spring in Rose Valley, then to the east of, now within, the limits of Reading. When the Civil War broke out this custom was discontinued, and it has not been revived since.

The people of Reading have from the beginning of its history taken an active interest in political matters. By political organizations they have invited and encouraged cooperation for the development of party strength. Since the Civil War more energy has been shown through numerous minor associations, commonly called “Ward Clubs.” Two associations of this class have come to be prominent in the political affairs of Reading: the “Americus Club” of the Democratic party, and the “Union League” of the Republican party. All of them were especially organized for the purpose of considering the ways and means by which to direct public attention to the one or the other party in the struggle for political supremacy. This is the great object which is ever standing out prominently before them. Political questions are rather overshadowed, if not overlooked—they being not of the first importance, but the last. Clubs are not so much for discussion as for organization to develop party strength. Discussion is carried on mostly by the leaders of the respective parties, and clubs gather in followers. The real, earnest political thinking in each party is done and published by comparatively few individuals. The great proportion of voters adopt opinions and sentiments more by the influence of associations and circumstances than by investigation and reflection; and many of them are induced to act for or against a party from selfish purposes. Independence in political thought and action is still comparatively limited. The political returns of the county indicate this condition. The majorities are generally the same, especially at prominent elections when the vote is more numerousy polled. The general education of the people has not yet reached that standard which conduces to political liberality and to the selection of the fittest men for representative positions without regard for party affiliations.

POLITICAL FESTIVALS.

HIESTER FESTIVAL, 1820.—In 1817 the Hon. Joseph Hiester, of Reading, was nominated as the Federal candidate for the office of Governor of Pennsylvania against Hon. William Findlay as the Democratic candidate; but he was defeated by a majority of 7005. In 1820 the same candidates were on the respective tickets and Hiester was elected by a small majority—1605. The success of this election contest, by which the most distinguished citizen of Berks County was chosen to be the chief executive officer of Pennsylvania, was an event which could not be permitted to pass away in the annals of our local affairs without signalizing it by an impressive public demonstration. Hiester, whilst a young man, had distinguished himself by his pure and earnest patriotism during the Revolution; and he had afterward filled with honor to himself and his constituency of Berks County, various political offices, especially the office of national Representative for nearly eighteen years. He was concluding his ninth term when he was elected to be Governor of the State,—resigning his seat in Congress soon after his election. His fellow-citizens had therefore come to regard him with more than ordinary feelings of respect and honor, and they could, indeed, rejoice over his elevation to be the chief ruler of the commonwealth. And what means could they have selected more adapted to display their satisfaction and joy than a feast at which they could eat, drink and be merry? Accordingly, in honor of this event, pursuant to public invitation, a grand festival took place on Wednesday, November 1, 1820, on the "Commons" near by the "arched spring," east of the borough. People assembled from every part of the county. Many distinguished politicians came from Philadelphia and counties adjoining Berks to participate in the feast. Over four thousand persons united in the demonstration. A procession was first formed by the committee of arrangements on Penn Square, about eleven o'clock in the morning, in the following order:

1st. The butchers of the borough, dressed in white frocks, with blue sashes, armed with the different emblems of their profession, fancifully decorated, and mounted upon white steeds.

2d. Captain High's squadron of Dragoons, well-mounted, in complete uniform.

3d. The citizens formed in double-file.

4th. Captain Getz's company of Guards in new and elegant uniform.

The centre of the procession was occupied by a full band of colored musicians engaged from Philadelphia expressly for the occasion, clothed in green military suits, richly ornamented with silver lace.

After an ovation to the "Governor-elect" and an address of thanks by him, the procession marched, in the order named, up Penn Street to the "Commons," arriving there about noon. An area—comprising several acres—was surrounded by a barrier, with a large platform arranged on the eastern side, upon which were placed the articles for the feast. Two fine, fat bullocks on spits, and a bear and a hog on grills, were roasted entire. The four skins were stuffed and mounted on cars. The area was occupied by the committee of arrangements, High's Dragoons, Getz's Guards and the band, and "thousands of spectators, whose orderly deportment cannot be too strongly commended."

The butchers commenced carving the roasted animals about two o'clock. The first slice of each animal was taken to the residence of General Hiester by two butchers, who were escorted by a detachment of the Guards. And the carving was continued till all were satisfied.

After the feasting was concluded, a meeting was formed with the following officers:

President, Peter Nagle; Vice- Presidents, George de B. Keim, Jacob K. Boyer, Samuel Baird, Daniel Graeff.

Twenty toasts, expressive of patriotic and complimentary sentiments, were read and received with great applause. A unanimous desire was expressed "to see the Revolutionary veteran;" and accordingly he was escorted to the meeting from his residence by a committee specially delegated for the purpose. His arrival caused "indescribable effusions of joy."

"Merit must be great when it calls forth the voluntary honors of a free and enlightened people. But the attention shown on this occasion was not merely honorary; it was the tribute of gratitude to a man who aided, at the risk of his life, his health and his fortunes, to render his country happy and free."

At four o'clock the procession was re-formed; with "the Governor-elect, supported by two citizens, it paraded through the principal streets of the borough and halted opposite his residence," where the whole company was dismissed in the most perfect harmony and good order.

In the evening, the celebration was continued by a “torch-light procession.” A transparent temple was carried by four men through the principal streets of the borough, preceded and succeeded by a train of citizens who held lighted candles in their hands. The sides of this temple were illustrated: the front presented a likeness of Washington, the rear the arms of the United States and the right and left sides well-executed likenesses of General Hiester.

A similar festival, to celebrate the same event, was held at Orwigsburg, in Schuylkill County, on November 10, 1820. The morning of that day was ushered in by the firing of cannon and the ringing of bells. A meeting was first organized in the court-house, and addressed by James B. Hubley, Esq., the chairman, with appropriate remarks. Then the people formed into line and proceeded, under the leadership of three marshals, assisted by a band of music, to “Mount Monroe.” As they marched, bells rang and cannon boomed. There a fine ox and deer were roasted, and a large number of persons, seated at tables specially arranged, participated in a great feast. At a meeting, afterward formed, at which Mr. Hubley presided, thirteen toasts were offered and drank. On the same day a festival was also held at Kutztown. Twenty-five toasts were offered and drank at a large organized meeting.

Harrison Festival.—1840.—The Presidential campaign of 1840 was conducted with great enthusiasm, and it developed much political excitement throughout the country. Grand processions were witnessed in every community. The voters of Reading and the surrounding districts in the county of Berks caught the feeling, especially on the side of the Whigs. One of the processions was distinguished for its log cabin and living raccoons. The election resulted in a victory for the Whigs, an event which elicited from them particular demonstrations of joy. It was their first victory, and they felt great pride in it. The vote contrasted was as follows:

Their majority was small, but enough for them. What could they do upon such an occasion but demonstrate their feelings as their party, under the name of “Federals,” had done twenty years before. The leaders therefore decided to signalize their triumph by a “Grand Ox-Roast,” on the “Commons,” on Wednesday, December 9, 1840, and issued a public notice that “an ox will be roasted whole and plenty of hard cider will be provided.” The day was accordingly celebrated under the direction of an organized meeting, with prominent men in respect to business, politics and military as its officers. General William Addams was president of the meeting. Thirteen toasts were announced, and appropriate responses were made. Many persons participated in the feast.

Tilden Festival of 1876.—The Presidential campaign of 1876 was full of enthusiasm from the beginning to the end. Samuel J. Tilden, of New York, was the Democratic candidate, and Rutherford B. Hayes, of Ohio, the Republican. The Democrats throughout the entire country were very hopeful of success with so distinguished a candidate as Mr. Tilden, and they therefore carried on the political contest with all the energy that they could command. The leaders of the party in Berks County were particularly active. Towards the close of the campaign they made arrangements for a “buffalo roast” in order to enable their party the more thoroughly to demonstrate their feelings in a public manner, and selected a day for that purpose. The previous festivals in 1820 and 1840 were held after the election, but this was to be held before the election. The announcement was made, giving the public to know that “the Democratic citizens of Berks and adjoining counties will have a

Old-Fashioned Democratic Procession, in which soldiers and sailors, farmers and mechanics and all good citizens, with their wives and daughters, were respectfully invited to participate.

The day arrived and the programme was carried out very successfully. In the morning many delegations came to Reading from all parts of the county, and by eleven o'clock the "Jubilee Parade" was formed, when it was marched over a long route. Besides the usual demonstrations in a procession of this character, there was an "elephant in boots," veritably walking in the parade, hired from Forepaugh, (the showman) for the occasion. The symbol of the Reading Times, in signalizing a political victory on the morning after an election, for many years, was the "elephant in boots" at the head of its columns; but the Democrats desired to show by a living cartoon that they had taken its elephant captive, and were going to carry it along in their triumphant march. This conception created much amusement throughout the entire route. It was the centre of attention.
On the way the elephant kicked off one of his Democratic boots just as if he were walking in doubtful company and on a doubtful platform, and were desirous of freeing himself. The procession was nearly an hour in passing a point, and ended in the "Fair-Ground," where the feast on roasted buffalo was enjoyed by many hundreds of persons. Speeches were made by prominent men from different parts of the country. The most distinguished guest upon this unusual occasion was Gen. George B.
McClellan, whose presence elicited great applause wherever he went.

Election of 1876.—The Democrats in Berks County were certain of victory. Calculations for it had been made. They were taught to expect it, and when the night of the election arrived they looked for it. But the news was doubtful. They had counted upon a "Solid South," and also certain Northern States.
Their leader had calculated with great shrewdness, but neither he nor any of his followers had thought the loss of three Southern States within the range of possibility. And this result actually occurred. Late on election day, Chandler, the chairman of the Republican National Committee, announced that Hayes had one hundred and eighty-five electoral votes, and would be the next President. This came to be exactly so. But during the four intervening months great excitement prevailed, and fears of a political revolution were entertained.
At Reading excited crowds of people assembled for many nights in succession, to hear the returns which were reflected upon screens—the Times screen having been set up against the Jameson building, on the Sixth Street side, above the portico, so as to show the figures down Penn Square, and the Eagle screen in front of the Eagle building. Some of the cartoons thrown on the Times screen were striking and afforded much merriment, in relieving the monotony of election returns. The elephant figured conspicuously in them; at one time he came out with a rooster in his trunk lashing it around wildly in the air, then with a rooster tied to his tail running away with it; now jumping for joy at a favorable report, then lying on his back as if dead from a Democratic victory, with a rooster crowing lustily over his fallen body; Jeff Davis was represented as sitting up in a sour apple tree, and different prominent Democrats were drawn in various laughable positions; and numerous short witticisms appeared frequently. Altogether the exhibition awakened a thrilling interest in the people.

Democratic State Conventions at Reading.—Three Democratic State Conventions were held at Reading at which candidates for Governor were nominated: the first on June 4, 1851, when William Bigler was nominated by acclamation; the second on February 29, 1860, when Henry D. Foster was nominated; and the third on May 30, 1872, when Charles R. Buckalew was nominated. At the second convention, Hon. George M. Keim, of Reading, was selected as an elector-at-large.

Mass-Meetings.—Numerous “Mass-Meetings” have been held at Reading by the respective political parties for many years past. The earliest meeting, of which any extended notice was given, was held by the Democratic party on September 4, 1852, for the purpose of ratifying with enthusiasm the nomination of Franklin Pierce as the Democratic candidate for President. Philadelphia sent a delegation of fifteen hundred men, accompanied by three fine bands of music, the German Männerchor and the Granite Glee Club, and large delegations were in attendance from Dauphin, Lebanon, Lancaster, Chester, Bucks, Montgomery, Lehigh, Schuylkill and other counties, whilst from the hills and valleys of Berks County came hundreds of her indomitable Democracy to swell the assembled multitude. Conspicuous among the latter were the North Heidelberg delegation in large hay-wagons and vehicles of every description, the Boyertown Pierce Club in carriages with flags, banners and wreaths of flowers, and the Kutztown Pierce Club in carriages, with flags and music. It was the largest meeting ever held at Reading till that time and it included the largest number of great political leaders which the citizens had ever seen together here. A platform was erected at the upper end of the Western Market-House and around it the crowd assembled and heard the speeches of such distinguished men as Hon. James Buchanan, Hon. Stephen Douglass, Gov. Enoch Lowe (Maryland), Gov. William Bigler (Pennsylvania), Hon. Barnabas Bates (New York), Hon. Chas. J. Faulkner (Virginia), Hon. B. F. Ballett (Massachusetts), Chief Justice Le Grand (Maryland), Hon. John A. Wilcox (Mississippi), Hon. John H. Savage (Tennessee) and others. Addresses were made from noon till midnight. Mr. Buchanan was chairman of the meeting during the afternoon, and he, in the course of his opening remarks, complimented Berks County for “her undeviating patriotism and entire devotion to Democratic principles.” . . . The meeting was harmonious and enthusiastic throughout, and in all the speeches “there was a concord of sentiment upon the great questions of the day, which exhibited in a proud light the power and nationality of Democratic principles, and the completeness of that union in the ranks of the American Democracy, which is the never-failing precursor of glorious victory.”

In the State election for Governor, in 1851, the county gave Bigler (Democrat) a majority of 4765 over Johnston (Whig), and the State only 8465. In the national election following this “mass-meeting” the county gave Pierce (Democrat) a majority of 4590 over Scott (Whig) and the State 19,386.

Ritner Young Men’s Convention.—The young men of Pennsylvania, who were favorable to the election of Joseph Ritner for Governor, held a convention at Reading on June 4–5, 1838. Seventeen hundred delegates assembled from all parts of the State. Their meeting was held in the Trinity Lutheran Church, and it was distinguished for earnest enthusiasm. Appropriate addresses were made and resolutions passed. George G. Barclay, Esq. (a young and able attorney of Reading), officiated as temporary chairman. The meeting was the largest of a representative character ever held at Reading till that time. It was conducted with ability and occasioned much excitement. But it did not increase the strength of the Anti-Masonic party in this section of the State. It was the first and only political convention ever assembled in a church building in Reading. Permission was granted by the church vestry because there was no large hall in the borough then, and the Trinity Church was the only place in which so large a body of men could assemble with convenience.

Whig Mass-Meeting of 1844.—The Presidential campaign of 1844 was particularly exciting. Henry Clay was the Whig candidate for President and James K. Polk the Democratic candidate. The former enjoyed a very high degree of popularity throughout the county, and his friends conducted a very active campaign in his behalf. The State of Pennsylvania exhibited much enthusiasm for him during the canvass, for he was a great favorite in every section of the State, especially where manufactures were carried on. Reading was then a growing centre for industries of various kinds, and the Whigs here idolized him for his earnest labors in the cause of protection to home industry. They held a mass-meeting at Reading on September 27, 1844. Over five thousand persons were in attendance, delegations having come from different sections of the surrounding country. The day was specially noted for a large procession, in which the various trades and employments were represented. Miniature shops and factories were hauled about the town and successfully operated. And the living raccoon again figured conspicuously in the procession, as it had in the previous campaign. The singing of campaign songs added interest to this occasion, just as it had been practiced four years before, when there was one universal shout for "Old Tippecanoe and Tyler too." The chief marshal of this notable procession was Hon. Samuel Bell. After the parade a large meeting was organized on the Bell farm, in Cumru township, not far from the bridge, with David F. Gordon, Esq. (then an attorney at Reading, afterward president judge of Berks County), as chairman. The principal speaker was Hon. John Mc. P. Berrien, United States Senator from Georgia, formerly Attorney-General of President Jackson. Notwithstanding this great effort by the Whigs, they could not weaken the devotion of the Democrats in the county or lessen their majority.

The polk-berry was brought into great prominence by the Democrats; and during this campaign the Democrats also held a large mass-meeting, said to have been one of the largest ever held at Reading till that time. The procession was long and full of enthusiasm. One of its prominent features was a large boat, rigged as a "Ship of State" manned by a number of boys dressed as sailors, and drawn on wheels in the procession by many young men.

The majority for Polk in the borough was three hundred and sixty-nine, and in the county forty-six hundred and seventy-four. This result indicated the thorough organization of the Democrats. Dallas, their candidate for Vice-President, visited Reading during the campaign and delivered an address at the "Mineral Spring," dwelling particularly upon and favoring the tariff. Gen. Samuel Houston from Texas was also present upon that occasion.

Clymer Mass Meetings in 1866.—Hon. Hiestier Clymer, a citizen of Reading, received the nomination for Governor on the Democratic ticket in 1866. He had been State Senator from this district for two terms, from 1861 to 1866, during which time he acquired a considerable popularity throughout the State. General John W. Geary was the Republican candidate. Both parties were under thorough organization, and, with popular candidates, they labored earnestly for success. The friends of Mr. Clymer united in his behalf and they exerted themselves to bring about his election, if possible. Many mass-meetings were held in different parts of the State, and at all of them much enthusiasm was manifested. In Berks County the leaders of the party were particularly active. Numerous public meetings were held and many speeches were delivered. General political excitement prevailed from the beginning till the close of the campaign, which increased as the day of election approached. Two Democratic mass-meetings were held at Reading, one on July 18th and the other on October 3d, and upon each occasion a multitude of people assembled. At the former there were delegations from four-fifths of the counties in the State. Hon. Richard Vanx acted as chairman of the meeting, and addresses were made by Mr. Clymer, Hon. Montgomery Blair, Hon. George H. Pendleton and other distinguished political leaders; high party feeling was produced under the great excitement which was awakened by demonstrations of all kinds, so high, indeed, that it almost resulted in riots with certain Republicans who were equally earnest and active and demonstrative for their leader, General Geary. And at the latter there was a grand procession, with General Tobias Barto as chief marshal, estimated to contain five thousand persons in a line two miles long. Many wagons, teams, bands and banners of all kinds accompanied the numerous delegations, and the enthusiasm upon that occasion was unbounded. Notwithstanding all this exertion, the city of Reading was not carried for Clymer.
It had been Republican through the war, and this political sentiment still prevailed by a small majority, which, it would appear, Clymer could not overcome, even with the aid of local prejudice and enthusiastic demonstrations. The vote in Reading for him was two thousand six hundred and eighty-nine, and for Geary two thousand seven hundred and four, a majority of fifteen against him; and in the county for him thirteen thousand two hundred and eighty-eight, and for Geary seven thousand one hundred and twenty-one, a majority of six thousand one hundred and sixty-seven for him.

OFFICIALS OF COUNTY.

Immediately after the erection of the county it became entitled to representation in the Provincial Assembly, and to various county officers; and, after the establishment of national independence and government, also to representation in Congress.

All the officers—national, State and county—from and of the county, from the beginning of its existence to the present time, are set forth in the following arrangement: 1. National Representatives. 2. State Representatives. 3. County Officers.

1. NATIONAL REPRESENTATIVES.—The office of Representative to Congress of the United States was created by the Constitution of the United States, which was adopted September 17, 1787, and ratified by the Convention of Pennsylvania December 12, 1787. The term of office was then made two years; and so it has continued to the present time. Representatives were apportioned among the several States according to population, which was enumerated within three years after the first meeting of Congress, and every ten years thereafter.

The first apportionment by Congress gave Pennsylvania eight representatives. These were apportioned by the State Legislature, March 16, 1791, to eight districts. Berks, Northampton and Luzerne Counties were erected into one district, with one member. In 1793 the State was given thirteen members. These were apportioned by the State Legislature on April 22, 1794, when Berks and Luzerne Counties were made the Fifth Congressional District for the next ten years, with one member.

In 1802 Berks, Chester and Lancaster formed the Third Congressional District, with an apportionment of three members.

In 1812 Berks and Schuylkill formed the Seventh District, with one member.

In 1822 Berks, Schuylkill and Lehigh formed the Seventh District, with two members. In 1832 Berks became a separate district, called the Ninth, with one member.

In 1843, and every ten years successively, Berks comprised the Eighth Congressional District, with one member.

1 Joseph Hiester was elected Governor of Pennsylvania in October, 1820, and resigned his seat in Congress. Daniel Udree was elected in December, 1820, to succeed him for the unexpired term ending March 3, 1821.
2 John M. Hyneman was re-elected; but he resigned his seat, and Daniel Udree was elected to fill the vacancy for the unexpired term ending March 2, 1815.
3 Ludwig Worman died October 17, 1822, whilst occupying this position, and Udree was elected in December following to fill unexpired term ending March, 1823.
4 Henry A. Muhlenberg resigned his seat in February, 1888, and accepted the mission to Austria as the first minister plenipotentiary. George M. Keim was elected in March, 1888, to fill the unexpired term ending March 8, 1889.
5 J. Glancy Jones resigned in October, 1858, and accepted the mission to Austria. William H. Keim was elected on November 20, 1858, to fill unexpired term ending March 8, 1859.
6 Henry A. Muhlenberg, Jr., died at Washington on January 9, 1854. He had appeared in Congress only a single day, when he was taken sick with typhoid fever, and thereafter was unable to resume his seat.

Under the Provincial Constitution as provided by William Penn and his successors, and afterward under the State Constitutions of 1776, 1790 and 1873, the officers named in the subsequent pages were elected and appointed.

The State representatives from Berks County are arranged in three classes: State Officials; Senators; Assemblymen.

STATE OFFICIALS.—The following persons from Berks County held State offices:

Charles Biddle, Supreme Executive Councillor, elected by Legislature, 1784-87.
Joseph Hiester, Governor, elected, 1830-33.
Frederick Smith, Attorney-General, appointed by Governor Andrew Schulze, 1823-28.
Gabriel Hiester, Surveyor-General, appointed by Governor J. Andrew Schulze, 1824-30.
Frederick Smith, Supreme Associate Justice, appointed, 1828-30.
Jacob Sallade, Surveyor-General, appointed by Governor David R. Porter, 1833-45.
John Banks, State Treasurer, elected by Legislature, 1847.
William Strong, Supreme Associate Justice, elected, 1857-68.
William M. Hiester, Secretary of State, appointed by Governor William F. Packer, 1858-60.
William H. Keim, Surveyor-General, elected, 1860-61.
Warren J. Woodward, Supreme Associate Justice, elected, 1874-79.

1 John Schwartz died in July, 1860, and Jacob K. McKenty was elected to fill unexpired term ending March 4, 1861.
2 He removed from Reading to Philadelphia on 20th October, 1784. He was Vice-President of the Council from 10th October, 1785, till 31st October, 1787. Before his election he was the chief burgess of Reading.

SENATORS.—The office of State Senator was created by the Constitution of 1790. The State was thereby apportioned into senatorial districts, and again in 1793, and subsequently every seven years till the adoption of the new Constitution of 1873, whereby the apportionment was thereafter to be made on the decennial census of the United States. In the beginning Berks and Dauphin Counties comprised a district with an allotment of two members; and they continued together till 1808, when Berks was erected into a separate district with two members. After the erection of Schuylkill County, in 1811, it was added to Berks, and they together comprised a district with two members till 1836, when Berks was again erected into a district by itself with one member, and continued so from that time till now. The term was four years from 1790 to 1838; and three years thence to 1874, when the new Constitution fixed it at four years again.

The members from Berks alone are mentioned:

ASSEMBLYMEN.—The office of Assemblyman was first created by William Penn in establishing a government for the province; the representatives thereto, from the several counties as 1 William M. Hiester was elected and served as Speaker of the Senate for the year 1855.

they were erected, were elected annually till the Declaration of Independence and the adoption of a Constitution by the State in 1776. It was continued by this Constitution, and afterward by that of 1790, whereby members to the Assembly were elected annually till the adoption of the new Constitution of 1873. Then the term was increased to two years. In all these years—from 1752 to the present time—Berks County was a separate district, excepting after the erection of Schuylkill County out of portions of Berks and Northampton, when it was added to Berks, and continued so for a period of eighteen years—from 1811 to 1829.

The number of representatives from Berks was as follows:

In 1874 six members were apportioned to Berks, to so continue until an apportionment be duly made on the next census of the United States (1880)—namely, to the city of Reading two members, and to the county of Berks four.

3. COUNTY OFFICERS.—By the charter of William Penn and the several grants thereunder, various laws and ordinances were enacted from time to time “for the good government of the province." The regulation of the affairs of the province, and, subsequently to 1776 of the commonwealth, was directed by officers, either appointed or elected, for the entire territory or for the several counties into which it was subdivided.

The officers of the county from 1752 till 1886 were as follows:

JUDGES.

(See chapter XX., Judiciary.)

DISTRICT ATTORNEYS.

The office of district attorney was created by act of May 3, 1850, and made elective, with a term of three years. Previously the attorney-general of the State appointed an attorney in the several counties to represent the commonwealth in the prosecution of criminal cases.

The act of 1850 required a residence of one year in the county and a practice of two years at the bar, but the latter was reduced to one year by the act of 1852.

SPECIAL DETECTIVES.

An act was passed May 19, 1874, which provided for the appointment of a special detective officer in the several counties of the State, by the district attorney, with the approval of the Court of Quarter Sessions. The first appointment was made in February, 1875. The officers were:

COMMISSIONERS AND AUDITORS.— The board of county commissioners comprises three members. Previous to 1875 one was elected annually for three years. The new Constitution of 1873 provided for the election of the three commissioners in 1875 and every third year thereafter.

The board of county auditors also comprises three members. Previous to 1809 they were appointed by the county judges. An act was passed March 16, 1809, providing for the annual election thereafter of three auditors. In 1814 this provision was modified so that a new auditor was introduced into the board annually thereafter. This practice prevailed till the new Constitution of 1873, which provided for the election of three auditors in 1875 and every third year thereafter.

In respect to both commissioners and auditors, "each qualified elector shall vote for no more than two persons, and the three persons having the highest number of votes shall be elected." \(^2\) This was a marked departure from the old system, by which all of one political party were elected. It enabled the opposite party to elect one member. Since 1875 three officers have been elected—two by the Democrats and one by the Republicans.

TREASURERS.

Previous to 1841 the county treasurer was appointed annually by the county commissioners. On May 27, 1841, an act was passed providing for the election of this officer in October following, and every two years thereafter. The Constitution of 1873 increased the term to three years after 1875.

SHERIFFS.

The Duke of York's Laws, introduced into Pennsylvania 22d of September, 1676, provided for the nomination by the justices of the county, of three persons within their jurisdiction, out of which the Governor should make choice of one to be sheriff for the year ensuing. By virtue of his office, the sheriff was then a justice of the peace.

In the frame of Government prepared by William Penn for the province in 1682 it was provided that the freemen of the counties should annually elect and present to the governor a double number of persons to serve for sheriff, justices and coroner for the year next ensuing, out of which the Governor should nominate and commission the proper number for each office. After the erection of the county the first appointments of sheriff and coroner were made October 4, 1752.

The Constitution of 1790 provided for a similar election and appointment of sheriff and coroner, but the term of service was increased to three years, and no person was to be twice appointed sheriff for any term of six years. The Constitution of 1838 provided that one person for said offices respectively should be elected by the people for the term of three years. And these offices have thence been so filled.
