CHAPTER XXVI.

NEW CASTLE COUNTY.

NEW CASTLE County is the most northern county of Delaware, and contains an area of about five hundred square miles. It is bounded on the north by Pennsylvania, on the east by Delaware River and Bay, on the south by Kent County, on the west by Maryland. It is drained by the Brandywine and Christiana Rivers, and by the Red Clay, Red Lion, Duck and Appoquinimink Creeks. It is the most populous county in Delaware, and in manufactures and many products exceeds the other counties. It is intersected by the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore, Wilmington and Northern, Baltimore and Ohio, and Delaware Railroads. It contains the city of Wilmington, and Brandywine, Christiana, Mill Creek, White Clay Creek, New Castle, Pencader, Red Lion, St. George’s, Appoquinimink and Blackbird Hundreds. Wilmington is the county-seat.

The early history of the territory embraced in what is now New Castle County has been given elsewhere in the general history of the State. The county first assumed its boundaries in 1673. In that year the New Castle Court defined the boundaries of the county as being north of the Steen Kill, or Stony Creek, now at Quarryville (it being the south line of a tract of land called “The Boght”), and extended southward to Bombay Hook and Duck Creek; and it also embraced land on the eastern shore of the Delaware, now in New Jersey.

In the early days of the county the settlements were infested with wolves. To remove the pests, in 1676, the court passed an order offering forty gilders for each wolf-head brought into court. This order did not have the desired effect, and on January 5, 1677-78, it was ordered that the inhabitants erect fifty “woolf-pitta” along the streams before May 1st, under a forfeiture of seventy-five gilders.

The collections of customs and quit-rents, being insufficient to defray the current expenses of the county, in 1676 Governor Andros ordered the court to raise a sufficient sum of money by a levy upon the inhabitants. On the 8th of June, 1677, the justices responded to this order as follows:

"Whereas, your Honor hath been pleased to admit of a Levy by the Pole, we find that the same can not be paid without a general meeting or High Court of all the Justices once a year."

The court, at this meeting, appointed John Moll as treasurer, and on the 18th of September, 1677, passed the following order, directed to Samuel Land, constable of New Castle:

"You are hereby, In his Majesty name, required to take a true and exact list of all the Taxable [Taxable] persons from 16 to 60 years of age, with all horses, oxen, mules, sheep, and all other domestic cattle, and as downwards to the south side of St. George’s Creek, including all the inhabitants between the two Creeks, and the same to bring att ye next Court to be held in New Castle, on ye first Tuesday of ye month of Oct. next, for the doing of wch this shall bee your warrant.

"Given under my hand In New Castle the 18th Sept., 1677. (Signed)

"JOHN MOLL."

A similar order was issued to Charles Ramsey, constable in Christians, "wth all ye north syde of Cris- teena Creeke up as far as ye Bogt Creeke, above Oole fransen’s house."

This is the first record in which the early limits of the county are defined. The rate was to each person twelve gilders and ten styvers, payable either in wheat at five gilders, rye four gilders, barley four gilders, schepple Indian corn three gilders, schepple tobacco eight styvers per hundredweight, pork at eight styvers and bacon at sixteen styvers.

The list of taxable, which is given on pages 158-154, of the first volume of New Castle County Court Records, contains three hundred and seven names, of which sixty-four are given as residents on the “Eastearn Shoare.”

The phrase “Eastearn Shoare” refers to the now New Jersey shoare, which was then supposed to be a part of Delaware. The division into assessment districts then made are the embryos of what later become hundreds.1

The returns of the constables were as follows:

"December 8, 1683, New Castle, 109 taxables; North Christina

1 William Penn, in a letter to the justices of the peace in Sussex County, dated Chester, the 28th of Tenth Month, 1692, in writing of land, says: "That you endeavor to set the land that shall hereafter be taken up in the way of townships. As three thousand acres amongst Ten family; if single persons one thousand acres. Amongst Ten of them laid out in the nature of a long square five or Ten of a side, and a way of two hundred foot broad left between them for an Highway in the Township, and I would have you careful for the future good and great benefit of your country.”

The first mention of the term “Hundred” we have found in the public records, either as the name of a Duck Creek Hundred, in 1687, is to be found in a deed dated January 15, 1706, from William Grant, of Appoquinimink Hundred, to John Domareer, of St. George’s Hundred.

North side Duck Creek, 41 taxable.

North side Appoquinimink, 51 taxable.

North Side Brandywine, 28 taxable.

Of St. George's, 4 taxable.

In 1683 the names of the districts were: "The Constabulary of New Castle," which embraced the present territory of New Castle Hundred; "The Constabulary north of Christiana Creek;" "The Constabulary on the north side of Duck Creek Creek.14 "A list of the inhabitants of ye Constabulary from St. George's Creek to the north side of Appoquinimin."

In 1687 the district now embraced in "Brandywine Hundred" appears distinct and separate, as follows:

A list of the Taxables on the north side of Brandywine Creek.15 The district embraced on the north side of Christians Creek contained what is now Christiana, Mill Creek, White Clay Creek and part of Pencader Hundred.

In the same year Red Lion was embraced in the district called "a list of the Taxables on the north side of St. George's Creek." St. George's Hundred was embraced in "a list of Taxables on the north side of Appoquininy.

The term "hundred" first appears in the following connection: "A list of the taxables of north side of Duck Creek Hundred." The territory is what is now (1889) Appoquinimink and Blackbird Hundreds. In 1687 the hundreds of Red Lion, Pencader, Mill Creek and White Clay Creek were not mentioned.

The first act regularly defining the territory of New Castle County was made in 1775, and declares that the hundreds shall remain as defined by the ancient boundaries.

The last grants of land made before the occupation of the territory by William Penn, in October, 1682, were made at the September court, and were as follows:

To John Hermesen, 500 acres; Andrew Tilly, 200 acres; John Matthewson, 200 acres; Richard Smith, 400 acres; Jonas Askin, 200 acres; John Williamson and Bennet Starr, 300 acres; John Nommerson, 100 acres; Joseph Barnes, 200 acres; John Savoy, 200 acres; John Grubb, 200 acres; David Hendrix, 200 acres; Thomas Bell, 200 acres; William Skart, 200 acres; John Darby, 400 acres; Robberd Parke, 400 acres; John Smith, 200 acres; Joseph Cookson, 200 acres; Joseph Moore, 100 acres; John Smyth, Whyte Claye Creek, 200 acres; Anthony Wallis, 150 acres; Conrad Constantine, 150 acres; Hendrick Garretson, 150 acres; Gyles Barrett, 100 acres; Edmund Linsay, 200 acres; James Taylor, 400 acres; Peter Claesen, 200 acres; Henry Watkinson, 200 acres; John Stalcop, 200 acres; Samuel Peters and Andrew Stalcop, 200 acres.

From this time warrants and patents were granted under authority of William Penn, who ordered that all occupants of land not having their lands surveyed or patented should report the same to the court, and complete their title.

The Swedes and Dutch, under the English, were allowed to remain upon their lands, and were quietly in possession when Penn assumed authority, in October, 1682. Courts were organized in November following, and Penn took measures to bring the foreign population under English citizenship.

At a court held at New Castle on the 21st and 22d of February, 1683, at which Penn was present, the following form of naturalization was adopted, and the names of those appended are the Swedes and Dutch who took the oath of allegiance to the new government:

"The Proprietor was pleased to state ye following forms for those who desired Naturalization, according to Act of Assembly, passed at Chester (ala Upland).

"A gentleman solemnly promises to keep faith and allegiance to the King of England & his heirs and successors, fidelity and due obedience to William Penn, Proprietary and Governor of the Province of Pennsylvania and its Territories, and to his heirs and successors, according to ye laws of Naturalization, passed in Assembly in ye month of December Laest at Chester (ala Upland), in ye province aforesaid.

"Followeth the names of those who desired to be naturalized in Court:

The county of New Castle is at present divided into forty-three election districts, twenty-seven of which are in Wilmington and sixteen embrace the hundreds of the county.

The population of New Castle by the census of 1880 is as follows:

- Appoquinimink: 2951
- Red Lion: 2490
- Blackbird: 1778
- (Including Delaware City and Brandywine.)
- Brandywine: 3549
- St. George’s: 5140

- Mill Creek: 3474
- Middletown: 1290
- New Castle: 1566

- New Castle City: 3790
- White Clay Creek: 1897
- Pennacook: 2550
- Wilmington: 44,478

FOURS, BLOCK AND COURT-HOUSES AND PRISONS IN NEW CASTLE COUNTY.—The early courts of New Castle County were held in the forts that were erected by the Swedes and Dutch. The first of these was Fort Casimir, which was erected on a point at New Castle, extending out into the Delaware River, which has slowly gained upon the shore and washed the site away.

Jean Paul Jacquet was appointed Vice-Director of the territory on the Delaware, and assumed command of the fort early in December, 1655. He appointed a Council for the colony and laid out the town of New Castle. On the 26th of December, at his request Elmerhuyzen Cleyn, Dirck Smith, Gysebert Bracy, Hans Hopman and Andraes Huddle, members of the Council, examined the fort and reported that they found it "to be decayed in its walls and batteries and that if the same fort, if a good work is to be made of it, must be run up from the ground, whereas the outward work has already for the greater part fallen under foot, and what is still standing must necessarily fall, because it is burst and distended (by water)."

It does not appear whether any repairs upon the fort were made under Vice-Director Jacquet, as he was removed in March, 1657, and was succeeded in May following, by Vice-Director Jacob Alrichs.

In reply to a letter of the Governor on June 14th and 20th, in the same year, he says: “There comes in such a newly begun work daily great burdens and expenses will occur quite unexpectedly, also that the fort and other [buildings] are much decayed, so that there is no warehouse or other place to store the provisions, etc., and protect them against rain and other damages; the quarters too, are too small, besides very leaky and very much out of repair; the ramparts and curtains in no way suitable, the platforms for the canons unfit for use, the parapets so decayed that one can pass over them as easily as through the inner gate itself, so that also an outer gate had to be made to be somewhat in position of defence mostly [against] the Swedes, who still [nourish] great hopes to be reinstated."

Alrichs writes to the Governor, March 18, 1658, that "the house in the Fort in which I live, has been raised one third for a chamber and a garret. . . . I have also been obliged to make a new guard-house, as the old one could not be used and was entirely decayed."
After Mr. Alrich's death in December, 1659, Alexander de Hinijossa was in command.

The court-room is mentioned as held in the fort the first time on June 30, 1660. Commissary Beckman, writing from Fort Altena in reference to the inventory of the late Mr. Alrich's property and of Mr. de Hinijossa's, said: "That the city would take it very ill that their court-room was so despoiled of chairs, books, pictures and other things." This room was in the upper story of a building within the walls of the fort as is shown by a letter from William Beckman, dated 9th of Seventh Month 1661, where he says, "I appeared yesterday before the court in the fort of New Amsterdam where I found not more than two persons... John Hendrick and Pieter Pietersen Herder, which two Commissaries made me come up stairs in the court room."

On the 5th of October, 1670, Capt. John Carr, commander, made proposals to the Council at New Castle setting forth "that a suitable place might be selected here at New Castle to erect some fortifications for times of need, and that another place might be chosen above Christiana Kill, which would serve as retreat in times of need, and should also be fortified."

The Council took the subject under consideration and it was resolved:

"1. That it was thought the market-place where the bell hanged was the most convenient place in New Castle to erect block-houses for defensive purposes, and it was resolved to give the order accordingly, provided his Honor, Captain Carr, shall send forever the ground necessary thereon without retaining any claim on it. As to the expenses and labor required for the aforesaid fortifications and block-houses, the citizens of New Castle are first to advance money, each according to his means and position, to pay the laborers, provided that inhabitants of this district, able to do such work, shall be held to assist in the work as occasion may require."

"2. Concerning the fortifications above, the matter is left to the discretion of the people there, to choose the most convenient place or places for the defense. All, however, with the understanding that, in case war breaks out with the natives, which God may prevent, the said house shall be used for the public service, as council house, prison and for other public purposes, while they may be used as such by the whole River for a general and public account and expenses."

"This resolution shall not be carried into effect without order of his Honor, (general), but preparations may be made in secret without arousing suspicion among the natives."

(Signed)

"John Carr, Will Tom,
H. Black,
Peter Rambo,
Peter Kock."

A few days after this action Captain Carr wrote to the Governor and Council of New York, relative "to some matters touching ye town of New Castle and Plantations on Delaware River." Concerning the block-house, he says:

"That ye Towne of New Castle being ye strength of ye River and only capable to defend itself against ye sudden violence & Incursion of ye Indians, it's humbly left to consider either whether ye inhabitants shall not have more than ordinary encouragement. As first, That a Block-House may be erected in some convenient Place of ye town, where a constant watch may be kept, now ye flotte is fallen into ruins & decay, for the common defense; the which will cost noe great matter & may be risen at ye charge & expense of ye Inhabitants of ye Towne & Plantations above ye River, who will not be backward (if any order shall be issued forth for it) in contributing towards ye same."

"That ye House in ye flotte being so greatly decayed as they cannot stand long, their Tiles, Brick, Iron, or other Materials may be taken down in time and preserved for ye building a new House in their Rooms when opportunity permits."

William Tom, the clerk of the court at New Castle, in a letter to Gov. Lovelace, dated March 9, 1671, says:

"Sixthly, or Intenoon here is to build a blockhouse, 40 foot square with 4 silt every end for flanks in the middle of the town, the fort not being flit to be repaired, and if repaired of noe defence, lying at the extreme end of the town, and no garrison; therefore we beg that we may have liberty to pull it down and make use of the tiles, bricks and other materials for the use of ye new intended fortification, we, if we have noe occasion for, as we are free men, shall be convenient for a court house, notwithstanding."

These matters were considered by the Council in New York June 14, 1671, which decided, first:

"As ye first Branch, ye Inhabitants of ye Towne of New Castle may assure themselves of all due encouragement. And what is provided is to ye Erecting of a Block House for their Common Defence it very well approved of. The Officen there being hereby Authorized to prosecute that Designe by employing ye Inhabitants and others concerned to go on and finish the same."

Section thirteen recites:

"It is left to ye care of ye Captain Carr and ye rest of ye Officers in New Castle to see that the Materials in ye Forte be preserved in ye best manner they shall think fit, who have likewise liberty to dispose of such of them toward ye Erecting of ye new flotte or Block House as shall be occasion there."

It was also provided in this answer from the Council that the license fees for distilling strong liquor "shall goe toward ye reparacon of ye New Block House or florte or some other publique work."

The work was begun, but proceeded slowly, and in the summer of the next year (1672) Captain Edmund Cantwell, who was then high sheriff of New Castle, wrote to Governor Lovelace, asking:

"That his Honor would please to give his instructions about the finishing ye Block House in Delaware with standieth still in that posture his Honor left it. It is high time that some speedy order be taken therein in regard, not only of the trouble now likely to ensue from the Wars in Europe, but that what is already expended thereupon will be as good as thrown away by reason as it is now it only stands and rots. It is humbly conceived that the most effectual means to be used for ye accomplishment will be by ye Governor to be imposed both upon ye Towne and River."

Before the fort or block-house was completed the Dutch again became the dominant power, and at a meeting held at Fort William Hendrick, 12th of September, 1673, by the commanders of the forts and territory, Jacob Benkes, Cornelis Evers, Jr., and Captain Anthony Colve, the deputies from South River, appeared and presented their credentials, and the following concerning the forts or block-houses was granted:

"2. Somebody shall be appointed Commander at the South River with authority to enlist 10 or 12 men at ye expense, and to summon the sixth man from the whole population of the river, and order them to make a fort on a suitable place, if the Commander deems it necessary, and as reward and in consideration of the great expense which the inhabitants of the South River will have to incur in erecting the fort, they are hereby granted freedom from all ground taxes, and from excise on beer, wine and distilled waters which may be consumed at the South River until the month of May, 1676."

It is not shown that a fort was built by the Dutch, or that they even completed the one at New Castle. They were driven out by the English in November of the following year.

On the 15th of August, 1675, a letter was written by the magistrates to Governor Andros, in which occurs the following:

"As for that part of your Honor's letter concerning Capt. Carr's Valley, it was never improved in the least; it is of humble desire the fort lying on the other side may be removed, making of a Court
NEW CASTLE COUNTY.

House and that some other conveniences may be made by it for a prison, but being very necessary for this Towne and river, and where it stands rather detrimental than otherwise to the place, that it may be done at the publick charge of the whole river and bay, itt being a general concern that there may be some tax laid for the expense of the High Court and Low Court, itt formerly being one sch of Wheat for the High Court and one sch of Rye for the Low Court.

The Councill at New York, September 15, 1675:

"Ordered that ye Block House at New Castle be removed & built at ye back side of ye Towne, about ye middle of it, at or near ye old Block House, wherein there may be a Court House and a prison."

There is a tradition that at one time a fort or block-house stood at the west end of the town, near a lane still known as "Fort Lane," and it is quite probable this block-house, that was ordered to be removed, stood at or near that locality. That it was built about 1670 or soon after on the market-place is shown by the following memorandum made by the Hon. George Read:

"As to the Market Square. In a survey made in 1688 by Ephraim Herman, for Capt. Markham, of 1678 [ acre] land marked Markham's Hope, adjoining to the little marsh below the town of New Castle, there is a Plan or representation of the said town and therein is laid down the square in the centre of the town called 'The Market Plains,' in which square the Fort is represented as standing in the place where Immanuel Church now is."

On the 8th of November, 1676, the magistrates wrote to Governor Andros on municipal affairs and said: "There being no prison for ye securing of debtors, fugitives and malefactors, who often make their escape for want of the same, Wee therefore desire his Honor's order for the erecting of a prison, where we imagine would be Convenient to stand in ye Fort."

This request was granted November 23, 1676, as follows:

"Allowed that a prison bee built in ye Fort and the Sheriff to bee responsible for the Prisoners."

The following is of record of court, February 7, 1677:

"According to his honor the Governor's order, itt was this day Resolved and concluded by the Commander and Court, that a prison with a dungeon under it bee built in the fort with all expedition, also a weignt house to bee built, with the Lyke Expedition, in some convenient place near the water's edge, manner of building the same left to the Contrives and ordering of Capt. John Colier & Mr. Moll."

In February, 1677, the repairs and improvements to be made were placed in charge of Captain Collier and John Moll, and the court, on October 8th of the same year, ordered a court-room to be fitted up, as appears in the following:

"It was this day resolved and Mr. John Moll desired by ye court wee would Reimburse so much as for ye mutch being upp of ye Court Room, in ye fort, fit for ye Court to sit in ye winter time, and yt ye same reimbursement bee paid him out of ye Lavy to bee paid."

"The Court doe allow to ye messauns to finish ye chimney in ye fort as it might bee 2000 gridders."

The court-room, prison, stocks and dungeon were inclosed in the walls of the fort or block-house.

Commander Billop was in the fort on the 26th of September, 1677, when a disturbance occurred between him and Francis Jackson, which caused a rupture between Billop and the court.

Many complaints were also made against Captain Billop during the winter of 1677-78, which were brought before the Court March 8, 1678, as follows:

"That for the whole winter and now he makes use of ye Towne fort where the watch on occasion is kept, for a stable to put his horses. That he keeps the Court Rooms above in the Fort filled with hay and fodder, that he keeps his logs within ye fort walls and by that means keeps ye gates continually lockt up. That he hath and doth still debar this Court from sitting in their usual place in the fort. That he makes use of ye soldiers (who is in pay and is kept for to look to ye fort and to keep it clean) about his own Pryvett affairs, &c. That he has denied and forbidden the Sheriffs to put any prisoners in ye unall Prison in the fort."

Other complaints were made against him in relation to other matters. In reply to these complaints Captain Billop said:

"That bee had only to doe with the fort and militia and that the Court should not sit in the fort and that itt not concerned the Court, and as to Customs, &c., &c."

After a long dispute Captain Billop promised to remove the horses out of the fort and to cause the same to be made clean, and he said "the Court might sitt there again, Lykewise that the Sheriffs might again make use of ye country prison as formerly." These charges were forwarded to New York and Billop ordered before the Council.

He was succeeded by Peter Alrichs, August 24, 1678, and the following is an inventory of stock belonging to the fort:

"Forts ammunition and guns received from Capt. Billop, belonging to ye Forte, viz: 8 yron Guns, 7 Leadens aprons, 18 Match Locks, 6 fyre Locks, in all 24 Musquetts, 12 Collers of bandoleers, 66 yron Shott, 465 Musquetts bullets, one and one third barrils of powder, 3 quires of Cartridge paper, 12 skynes of Match, 2 Leadells, 3 sponges, 3 Rammers, 1 loose Barrell, 1 Lant stike. In New Castle.—Signed John Moll, Peter Alrich, September 6, 1678."

From this time the civil magistrates assumed the entire control of affairs, and although Peter Alrich was appointed to take charge of the fort, he did not have the same authority as the former commanders. The fort was kept up a few years later, and the walls were still standing October 27-28, 1682, when William Penn arrived off New Castle, to receive the territory from the justices. But little mention is made of it from that time, and the walls were removed a few years later. How long the court-house that was in the upper room was used for the court is not known, as the court records from 1680 to 1765 are very meagre. It is the opinion of those best informed that the east wing, now in part used for the mayor's office, was the old court-house of that day. As has been stated the provincial courts, which were then presided over by William Penn, were often held in the court-house at New Castle. The meetings of the Council and General Assembly, before the dismemberment of the three lower counties from the mother colony, were often held at the same place. It is probable that the main part of the old court-house, sometimes called the State-House, was built about 1704, as the court and the General Assembly of the province held their session at New Castle, the latter, with few exceptions, from May 24, 1704, to 1779, when it was removed to Dover. The date of erection of the old building or either of the wings, are beyond the memory or tradition of the oldest inhabitants. That the court-house, with the wings, was completed and in use before the Revolution.
is evident from the following, which bears date November 26, 1771.

"The court taking into consideration the danger resulting to the court-house and the other public building thereto adjoining by fire, by reason of the two wings of the court-house being used for schoolhouses. Do order that the said two wings of the court-house shall not be occupied as school-houses or used for any other purpose whatsoever."

The jail in 1771 was in the rear of the court-house, and joined it on the northeast side. It was used for jail purposes until 1793, when a new jail was built. In 1786 it was repaired and new floors put in. A new jail was erected nearly on the same site of the present jailer's residence, extending from Market Square northwestward, which was not very strong, as the Levy Court, November 24, 1795, reported that prisoners had escaped from under the heartachs, and recommended iron barn to be put under them. The doors also were barred, as they had been sawed into, and near the hasp had been burned off, and a prisoner had escaped. At the same term of court the old jail was ordered prepared for a work-house, and was used as such with repairs until 1811–12, when $3000 was appropriated to rebuild the work-house. The Levy Court, September 28, 1824, appropriated $500 to build in the jail-yard adjoining the west end of the jailer's house, a building for the confinement of debtors, and the next year appropriated $300 for furnishing the debtors' apartments. These rooms were between the east wing of the court-house and what is now the present jailer's residence.

At the same term $400 was appropriated for erecting a wall around the back yard of the jail, and in March, 1825, $868.82 were appropriated for completing it. The work-house, debtors' apartments and "new jail," were used until the present (1888) jail was erected. A new whipping-post was erected in October, 1798, by John Aull, at a cost of $12. Henry Darby, an inn-keeper in New Castle, was appointed to make repairs on the court-house in 1790, and on December 23, 1794, a petition was made to the court by a judge of the Supreme Court, the judge of the Court of Common Pleas and several jurors, "alleging this December term, that the lower court-room of the court-house, in its present condition, is very inconvenient for transacting of public business and requiring repairs." Dr. George Monro, Alexander Reynolds and Arnold Naudain were appointed to make a report, which was done, and repairs were declared necessary. Particular mention was made of the stairs formerly erected in the northwest corner of the store-house, which were on the outside, in the northwest corner of the main building, and in the angle that is now used as a post-office, and led to the second story over the court-room. The judge's stand in the lower court-room, as it were in the olden time was on the northwest side of the room.

In May, 1798, the clerk of the peace petitioned the court for more commodious quarters to keep safely the records and papers of the offices. Measures were taken to fit up the west wing for that purpose, for the accommodation of the clerk of the peace and the clerk of the Superior Court, and the offices were kept there until their removal to Wilmington.

The jail built in 1793 was used until 1858. The Levy Court, in March, 1855, resolved to build a new jail, and William D. Clark, Eli Todd, Thomas Scott, John T. Smith and Thomas Hendrickson were appointed commissioners to visit other places and examine jails with a view of erecting one at New Castle. Plans were drawn and accepted, and the present jail was built.

The old whipping-post stood on the Market Square, in the rear of the old market shed. It was moved later on the green between the arsenal and the jail wall, where it stood until 1853, when it was moved to its present location.

For more than a hundred years earnest efforts had been made to remove the county-seat of New Castle County to some other place. In the year 1765 the justices at New Castle became alarmed at the frequent passing on the river of Spanish pirates, and wrote to Judge Richard Peters, of Philadelphia, on the subject, suggesting that the books and records be taken to Christina Bridge for safe keeping. This was carried into effect.

In 1803 a movement was set on foot to remove the county-seat from New Castle. The subject was brought before the General Assembly in that year, but received little attention. The originators of the plan, however, were in earnest, and on the 11th of January, 1810, John Way, Senator from New Castle, laid upon the members' desks petitions signed by five hundred citizens of New Castle County, setting forth reasons why the county-seat should be removed.
NEW CASTLE COUNTY.

The reasons they gave were as follows:

"To the honorable, the Legislature of the State of Delaware, in General Assembly met,

The Petition of the undersigned, Citizens of New Castle County, respectfully shewed,

That the people of this county, through the continued increase of population, have labored long for the greatest convenience, in consequence of the ineligible situation of the present seat of justice of this county, the reason of which we beg leave to submit to, and to request your honorable body to grant such redress, as you, in your wisdom, may think proper.

A handful of Swedes, in the year 1627, in making New Castle and its vicinity their place of settlement, likewise made that town their seat of justice, not through choice, but necessity. They were the first settlers on the Delaware—the forests at their backs were filled with lawless and savage inhabitants; it was therefore absolutely necessary, that their seat of justice, as well as their chief place of residence, should be so situated as to afford them, in case of an attack, a safe and speedy retreat to their vessels for protection. Perhaps it exceeded their most sanguine expectations to suppose that the rugged face of nature around them would one day undergo the polish of a refined system of agriculture—that prosperous towns and villages would arise to view, and the bust of their industrious inhabitants resound through the interior; and if the said settlers, by reason of their peculiar situation, did place the seat of justice where it now is, they left it to the representative wisdom of a Free People, to make such regulations relative to it, as might appear proper for their convenience and safety.

"The leading features of our government—the liberty of the important and a constitution of our judicial establishment, imperiously require the seat of justice, with the valuable records attached to it, to be placed in the most central and secure situation the nature of the country will admit of.

"The present seat of justice is situated at the extreme edge of the county, remote from the limits of population, and of difficult access to the greatest portion of our citizens—to the northern part of the county, by reason of its inhabitants having to travel the distance of thirty miles over an extensive stream of the river; and to the westward and northern part of the country, the remoteness of the situation is equally intense—sheer and highly objectionable; the present seat of justice being at the most extended promontory the first settlers could find.

"In the present piratical state of the world, and in particular during the peaceable condition of our general government, with respect to the sovereigns of the ocean, and our incapability of defence, there is reason seriously to apprehend, from its exposed position, that the town of New Castle may, at no distant period, with the court house and the records of the county (the property of the public), be involved in a common destruction.

"Your petitioners beg leave to observe to your honorable body, that the records of New Castle, by reason of their being deposited in so improper a place, have already been mutilated, to the great loss of the citizens—and that there is good reason at present to fear a similar depredation may be repeated.

"There are few counties in the neighbouring states that have not submitted to a renewal of their seat of justice, even where suffrage is exercised incent; and a recent example has occurred in one of our sister counties of Sussex, whose seat of justice has, within a few years, been removed to a more central position, from the margin of the Delaware.

"Your petitioners, therefore, request your honorable body, to enact such laws, as you may think advisable, for the removal of the seat of justice of New Castle county, from its present to a more central and secure situation for the citizens of the said county—and, in due course, will ever pray."

This petition was referred to a committee of three, and soon after Andrew Reynolds, of the committee, reported a bill, which was read. Adam Williamson, Nehemiah Tilton, Joseph Burns, John Crow, John Way, William Cooch, George Clarke, Francis Haughery and John Clarke were appointed to examine for a location, not exceeding five acres, within two miles of Christiana Bridge.

The Committee on unfinished Business for the session of 1811 reported a bill, but it was not acted upon during that session. At the session of 1838 numerous petitions were again sent in, presented by Mr. Bayard. These petitions requested that the county-seat be removed to Wilmington. A bill was presented on the 15th of January of that year, but was postponed until the 19th, when it was amended. It was read a third time on the 28th, but failed to become a law. At the session of 1835 it was again brought forward, and again in 1837, when remonstrances were presented from the citizens of St. George's Hundred, and also from citizens of New Castle. The latter was signed by P. B. Dulany, W. E. Janvier, Richard H. Barr, William Guthrie, Edward Williams, John Bradford, Jeremiah Bowman, Samuel M. Cowper, Evan H. Thomas, Andrew C. Gray, James Booth, William H. Rogers, James Cowper, Jr., William T. Read and George B. Rodney.

Remonstrances were received January 25th, signed by many citizens from White Clay Creek and Penncorder Hundreds. The bill was lost, and no further effort was made until 1847.

The result of the election in 1839 for the removal of the court-house put the matter at rest for a few years, but in the fall of 1846 the question again came up and was agitated with considerable zeal. Public meetings were held in the county, and on the 20th of January, 1847, a bill was introduced in the House, and passed eighteen to seven for submitting the question to the people. In the Senate it was delayed, and on the 4th of February, at a public meeting in Wilmington, a committee of five were appointed to go before the Senate in the interest of the measure. Speeches were made by James A. Bayard, William G. Whiteley and others. This agitation originated a new movement, looking to a division of the county. On February 6th a meeting of tax-payers of White Clay Creek, New Castle, Red Lion, Penncorder, St. George's and Applequinnimink Hundreds for this purpose was held at the house of John Sutton, in the village of St. George's, which was presided over by Philip Reibold. Resolutions were passed in favor of the measure, and a bill to remove the county seat was taken up on the following day in the Senate, and indefinitely postponed.

The subject was postponed until 1866, when the grand jury alluded to the matter as follows:

"Whereas, the members of the Petit Jury of the Superior Court and Court of General Sessions of the Peace for New Castle County at the November Term, A. D. 1865, having been required to attend upon the Court at New Castle, have found the present Court-House to be so badly constructed and ventilated as to subject them constantly to a foul, dism
...greeable and unwholesome atmosphere, without any accommodations for the Jury while they are not engaged in trial, and so small as to be frequently crowded and almost intolerable to the Judge. Members of the Bar, Jurors, parties and witnesses, and all others who are compelled to attend upon the court.

"And Whereas, the present Court-House and County Offices are situated at a place not the centre of business in the County, but inconvenient of access to a large portion of the County, thereby impeding the administration of Justice, and causing much trouble and expense to the Jurors, Suitors, witnesses and public generally, in attending upon the Courts and transacting business at the public offices.

"Therefore, by the Jurors aforesaid being assembled at the close of the November term, "Be it Resolved, That the present Court-House is a common and public nuisance and that the necessary action should be taken at once for the building of a new Court-House and County offices suitable for the wants of the community.

"Resolved. That we recommend the building of a new Court-House and County Offices at the City of Wilmington, the centre of business, population and travel of the County.

"Resolved, That the preamble and Resolutions, signed by the Jurors aforesaid, be presented to the General Assembly at its coming session, and that a copy of it be presented to Judges of the Superior Court now in session."

This document was signed by twenty-eight persons. No attention was paid to this report, and it was not until 1875 that a presentment was made. From that time until 1879 the grand jury, in one form or another, brought the matter to the attention of the court.

The levy bill was amended, reducing the amount appropriated to $70,000, and in this form was passed by the Senate March 11, 1879, without a dissent. It passed the House on March 20th, by a vote of eighteen to three. On the 20th of March a special meeting of the City Council of Wilmington was held for the purpose of considering the question of donating the ground for the new building to the Levy Court, which the Council was empowered to convey by the passage of the act removing the buildings from New Castle to Wilmington. The City Council appointed a committee of seven members to confer with the Levy Court in reference to the selection of the land required, and also to suggest the reservoir lot occupying the square between Market and King Streets, and Tenth and Eleventh Streets.

The conference was held between the committee of the City Council and the Levy Court on the 8th of April, 1879, and on April 15th the Levy Court, having reviewed the different proposed sites for the erection of a new court-house, deemed the square known as the Market Basin lot in Wilmington, to be the most convenient and the best location. The attorney of the Levy Court was instructed to examine the title, which was found perfect, and in due time the lot was conveyed to the trustees specially designated in the act, viz., Thomas F. Bayard, Daniel M. Bates, J. Wilkins Cooch, Nathaniel Williams, George Z. Tybout and their heirs and assigns.

The Levy Court, on June 19, 1879, decided to borrow $70,000 at four and one-half per cent, payable in twenty years from July 1, 1879. Plans and specifications were drawn by Theophilus P. Chandler, an architect of Philadelphia, for a building eighty-three feet by one hundred and thirty-seven feet, containing on second floor a court-room sixty-five feet square, twenty-five feet in clear, parlors, jury-rooms, library and consulting rooms. On the first floor offices were provided for sheriff, prothonotary, clerk of the peace, register of wills, register in Chancery, clerk of Orphans' Court, recorder of deeds, Levy Court, and county treasurer.

The building committee,—Albert H. Silver, Wm. B. Bright, Wm. Polk, Wm. L. Wier and Alexander Wilson,—on August 22, 1879, made a contract with Archibald Given, of Wilmington, for the erection of the court-house for the sum of $66,208. The foundation was begun and completed in the fall of 1879. The superstructure was erected in 1880, and the entire court-house was completed, according to contract, by December 25, 1880. It is built of Brandywine granite, Ohio buff and Chester...

1 The Levy Court, at the November meeting in 1875, appropriated forty thousand dollars for repairs of building, but, fearing the result on the fall election, refrained from expending it.

2 Before the deed was executed the Hon. Daniel M. Bates died, and upon application to the chancellor, the Hon. George Gray was appointed to fill the vacancy.
NEW CASTLE COUNTY.

County serpentine. The building was fitted and furnished, grounds graded and paved by the Levy Court, and on the 17th of January, 1881, the building committee notified the officers at New Castle to remove all books and papers belonging to their respective offices to the rooms allotted to them in the new court-house, on Thursday, January 20, 1881, which was done. The building committee, at the February term of the Levy Court, presented a statement of the cost of the building and grounds, which amounted to $112,605.33.

Almshouses.—The first mention of the poor in New Castle County is in 1740, when an act was passed "to prevent poor and impotent persons from being brought into the government." From that time until 1775 no provision was made for the care of paupers. In the latter year an act was passed providing for their support and for the appointment of overseers.

On the 28th of March, 1785, the first steps were taken to establish a poor or almshouse in the county. On that day Robert Hamilton, Edward Hewes, Robert Pierce and John Lynam, overseers of the poor of Christians Hundred, purchased the property of John Stapler, on Broome Street, between Front and Fourth Streets, Wilmington. Upon this site they erected a large three-story stone building, forty feet square, and made such other improvements at a cost of £1771 6s. 9d. to provide for the poor of Christians Hundred. The example set by Christians Hundred awakened the people of the State to the fact that provision should be made for the care of the poor of the entire State, and accordingly, on the 29th of January, 1791, an act passed the General Assembly, authorizing the erection of a poor-house in each county, unless proper houses already built could be purchased. Trustees were appointed for each county, who were authorized to purchase land not exceeding one hundred acres and to erect buildings thereon.

Section 9 provided that if the trustees of New Castle County could not agree with the overseer of the poor of Christians Hundred for the purchase of the poor-house already built, and should build in another part of the county, Christians Hundred should be exempt from the provisions of the act.

Section 28 provided that the poor of each county should wear a badge of red cloth on the left arm, which should have in Roman characters the letters, P. N., P. K. and P. S., for the different counties.1

The trustees appointed in the act for New Castle County were John Lea, John James, Isaac Grantham, Thomas Montgomery Peter Hyatt, William Alfere and Matthew Aiken.

They met at the house of Henry Darby in New Castle, February 27, 1791, and organized, with John James as chairman. The number of paupers in the county was reported as one hundred and sixteen, distributed among the various hundreds as follows:

1This section was repealed in 1804.

New Castle, 14; Christians, 30; Brandywine, 6; Mill Creek, 5; White Clay Creek, 5; Pencader, 5; Red Lion, 6; St. George's, 12; and Appoquinimink, 35. The trustees ordered a levy of £2809 6s. to be made for the erection or purchase of proper buildings and for the maintenance of the poor of the county. The question of the location of a site was discussed, and at the next meeting, March 3, 1791, several propositions were offered. A committee was appointed to arrange for a site by this meeting. John James was chosen treasurer and Robert Hamilton overseer. On the 19th of April, 1791, the trustees purchased the almshouse property of Christians Hundred, the consideration being £1800. The deed was not made until March 9, 1792.

This purchase was added to, August 31, 1829, by nine acres purchased from James Baker, Abisha Clark and Thomas Strode; November 16, 1835, three and one-quarter acres of William Sellers and a small triangular piece, March 18, 1882, of Mrs. Helen Price. To meet the needs of the county, the building was enlarged July 27, 1781, by raising the middle part of the main building one story, and a cupola and bell was placed on the addition.

This building stood until March, 1804, when, through the carelessness of a half idiotic boy, playing in the garret, it was destroyed by fire.

A meeting of the trustees was held on the 20th of the same month at New Castle, when it was decided to send the county poor to their respective hundreds and board them out until a new building was erected.

The burning of the building served as a pretext for an agitation for the removal of the building to another part of the county. Much bitter feeling was displayed, and two petitions were presented to the Legislature in relation to the matter—one from four hundred citizens of Christians and Brandywine Hundreds, asking that they be allowed to care for their poor as under the original act; the other, that the Legislature authorize the Levy Court to assess money to enable the trustees "to rebuild or to procure a tract in some other section and build." The Legislature declined to interfere, as sufficient power was reposed in the Levy Court to regulate the matter. The matter was finally settled, however, by awarding a contract for $15,180 to Joseph Newlin, to erect a building on the old site, and on the 12th of July, 1806, the building committee reported "that they had received the building from the contractor the preceding June." An insane department was added prior to 1843, and in 1845 a brick wall was built around the grounds. In 1848 a building southwest corner Fourth and Broome Streets was erected for the use of the sick emigrants, who were about that time landing in considerable numbers at New Castle. This building in later years was used as a small-pox hospital.

On July 21, 1850, fire again visited the almshouse and destroyed nearly all the buildings. The old walls were taken down and the buildings rebuilt upon a larger scale, on plans prepared by John McArthur, of...
Philadelphia. They were turned over in February, 1852, to the trustees.

The increase of the population of the county made the necessity of increased accommodations felt, and provisions were made toward the erection of larger quarters. On the 22d of February, 1882, the trustees of the poor purchased of Graham Blandy a farm of about one hundred acres for $20,000, situated near Hare's Corner Station in New Castle Hundred. A building committee was appointed, consisting of N. W. Williams, M. Lackey, J. W. Cooch, H. D. Hickman and James Bradford, which was directed to procure plans for the erection of a new almshouse.

S. T. Button, an architect of Philadelphia, prepared the plans, which were accepted, and in May, 1882, the contract was awarded to John B. Johnson and Joseph Hyde, of Wilmington, for the erection of the new buildings, for $163,500, the work to be completed by May, 1884.

On March 30, 1883, the Legislature passed an act authorizing the Levy Court to borrow such sums as might be necessary to erect new buildings for the insane and poor of New Castle County, not exceeding two hundred and ninety thousand dollars, for which they were authorized to issue certificates of indebtedness, payable not less than ten thousand dollars each year.

On the 1st of May, 1884, the buildings were completed, but it was not until May, 1885, that the building committee reported the building ready for occupancy, and on the 20th of May in that year the insane (seventy-five in number) were transferred to the new building, and the following day the inmates of the almshouse were removed.

The new buildings front on the road leading from Wilmington to Hare's Corner. The style is Italian. The main building has a frontage of two hundred and thirty-six feet, and a depth of one hundred and ninety-two feet, with a centre wing fifty feet wide. The windows and doors have stone sills with black bands above. Steep roofs of slate, with galvanized iron crowns and tin guttering, cover the building. From the towers a fine view of Wilmington, New Castle, Delaware City, Newport, Stanton and Green Hill is obtained. The basement is devoted to cooking, dining and store-rooms, laundry, dormitory for colored people etc. On the first floor, which has forty-five rooms, are the offices, reception rooms, dormitories, chapel, etc. Thirty rooms on the second floor divided into dormitories, separate the chambers and the hospital department. Elevators run through the building. The insane department is quite similar to the main building in arrangement. Both are well ventilated and have all the modern improvements.

After public notice a committee of the trustees sold at public sale in March, 1882, that part of the old grounds lying east of Harrison Street, between Front and Third, except two lots previously sold, and two not taken, for which they received $3807.28. Section 4 of an act passed March 30, 1883, directed the trustees of the poor to transfer, in fee simple, all the real estate in Wilmington, belonging to the corporation, to Henry G. Banning, Edward T. Bellak, Joseph L. Carpenter, Jr., Wm. C. Lodge and Victor Du Pont, who were authorized to lay out the land into lots and streets and sell it. The greater portion has been sold and rows of fine buildings have been erected on the ground. Every vestige of the old buildings is entirely obliterated.

The following items are taken from the superintendents' report, dated April 27, 1887.

Number of inmates in both buildings at commencement of year: 276
Number admitted during the year: 276
Total: 313

The admissions from the various hundreds were as follows:

Sheriffs.—Under the Dutch the sheriff was termed the schout, or scout, and on the 12th of June, 1657, Gregorius Van Dyck (who acted on the Delaware

1 He was also clerk of the peace and recorder in Kent County at the same time.
River as deputy schout, under the schout living at New Amsterdam) was appointed schout, or sheriff. He was succeeded by Gerret Von Swearingen, whose commission was dated May 18, 1660. He served until the surrender of the territory to the English, in 1664.

Captain Edmund Cantwell was appointed April 21, 1668, as high sheriff on the Delaware River, embracing the jurisdictions of the courts of Upland, New Castle and Whorekill, and served until May 1, 1683 (with the exception of 1673-74, when the Dutch were in possession, when Peter Alrik was chosen schout), when Abraham Mann, of Bread and Cheese Island, was appointed. Thomas Wollaston was appointed deputy sheriff under Cantwell, and served until 1679, when he was succeeded by Samuel Land, who continued to act in that capacity until June 17, 1684, when he succeeded Abraham Mann as sheriff.

Edward Gibbs appears in 1686 as certifying to the election returns of that year, and is continued in office until after 1690. The following dates are obtained from commissions and sheriff's deeds:

Clerks of the Peace.—William Tom was clerk of the courts on South River (Delaware), embracing Upland, New Castle and the Whorekill, prior to 1767. Upon the reorganization of the courts by Gov. Andros, in 1767, Ephraim Herman was chosen, his commission bearing date September 23, 1767. He continued until January 1, 1804, when he was succeeded by John White, who served until March 15, 1809. James Claypoole was then appointed, and continued until August 6, 1894. The prothonotary held several offices, and his deputies transacted the business in several of them.

Prior to 1730 the names of the following persons appear as deputies: Joseph Fox, John Denny and Robert Robertson.

The names of a few of the clerks are gleaned from the records, as follows:

Justices of the Peace.—The justices of the peace were magistrates of the court until after Delaware became a State.

But little has been ascertained of the Swedish and Dutch courts. Trials of small cases were conducted by the Vice-Director and his Council, and although the English came into possession in 1664, there is no mention of magistrates until April 21, 1668, when Governor Richard Nicolls appointed Hans Bloeg, Israel Helme, Peter Rambo, Peter Cock and Peter Alrich to be magistrates on the Delaware, then embracing Upland, New Castle and Whorekill. On April 9, 1672, Captain Walter Wharton was appointed a justice. Upon the recapture of the territory from the Dutch by the English in 1674, the following persons were appointed magistrates on the Delaware for New Castle: Hans Bloeg, John Moll, F. Outhout, Joseph Chew, Dirck Alberts. For the river (Upland): Peter Cock, Peter Rambo, Israel Helm, Lars Andriessen and Walla Sвайnсен.

Upon a reorganization of the court under Governor Andros at New Castle, October 10, 1676, there were chosen John Moll, Henry Ward, William Tom, Garrett Otto, E'ropp Outhout and Jean Paul Jaquett.

In 1757 a supplement to this act was passed authorizing the Levy Court to appoint county treasurers.

On the 14th of June, 1798, the act was amended, which provided that the Levy Court and Court of Appeals should be composed of commissioners to be elected by the people—eleven for New Castle County: two from each hundred of Christiana and Appoquinimink, and one each from the other hundreds. Nine from Kent County: two from Duck Creek and Mispillion Hundreds, three from Murderkill, and one each from the hundreds of Little Creek and St. Jones. Ten for Sussex County: one for each of the hundreds.

An amendment, February 9, 1796, provides that the Court of Appeals shall receive the returns of valuation of assessors and remedy complaints, and stipulates that every freeman over twenty-one years of age should be rated, in addition to his amount, a personal tax for capital, not exceeding two hundred pounds nor less than fifty pounds.

An amendment passed on January 19, 1797, provides, in addition to these powers, authority to raise money to maintain the poor of each county in their poor-houses, for laying out, repairing, amending, supporting and erecting bridges, causeways, State and other public roads and common highways.

The first meeting of the Levy Court composed of commissioners, as at present, was held November 26, 1798, at which the following persons were present:

CHAPTER XXVII.

THE CITY OF WILMINGTON. 1

WILMINGTON, the metropolitan city of Delaware, is situated in New Castle County, on the Delaware River and on the Brandywine and Christiana Creeks, which unite half a mile from the river. It is twenty-eight miles southwest of Philadelphia and seventy miles east-northeast of Baltimore. It is on the extension of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, the main line of the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Division of the Pennsylvania Railroad; it is the northern terminus of the peninsula system of which the Delaware Railroad forms the backbone, and is the connecting point of the Wilmington and Northern Railroad and the Delaware Western Railroad. By the river it has daily steam communication with Philadelphia. It is on latitude 39° 41' north and longitude 75° 28' west of Greenwich. It is built on three slopes of a hill, the summit of which is two hundred and forty feet above the tide-level and commands an extensive view of the Delaware and the city itself. The city is well built, mostly of brick, stone and iron, and its streets are wide and straight. Those parallel to the Christiana are Water, Front, Second, Third and thence in numerical order up to Twenty-eighth Street, beyond the Brandywine. These are intersected at right angles by Market Street, the principal business thoroughfare, which extends the whole length of the city and is over two miles long, including the bridges over Brandywine and Christiana Creeks. The streets parallel with Market are designated by proper names, such as King, Shipley, French, etc. The streets, stores and residences are lighted with gas and electricity.

1 The history of Wilmington is to so large an extent the history of the State that many of the prominent events in the foundation and growth of the town are narrated in the first volume of the "History of Delaware," to which the reader is referred. It includes incidents connected with the early settlement out of which Wilmington grew, the events which occurred during the Revolution, The War of 1812 and the Civil War and the general political annals up to the present time, that belong to the State as much as to Wilmington.
tricity and supplied with water from the Brandywine, and efficient Fire and Police Departments are maintained.

The origin of the city is to be found in the building of Fort Christina by the Swedish pioneers in 1638. Its site was within the present limits of Wilmington, on the south side of the creek, near "The Rocks" and in the vicinity of Old Swedes' Church. Around this fort, according to Governor Rising, fifteen or twenty houses were clustered when the Dutch captured the position in 1655. By them the name was changed to Fort Altena and a little town laid out west of the fort under the direction of Governor Beckman, which was called Christinaham, and in 1661 lots were granted to settlers, among whom were John (Anderson) Stallcop, Jacob Vanderveer, Paulus Jansen, Peter Meyer, Thomas Brun, Jan Jansen and Tymen Stidham. The lots were adjoining the fort and were thirty feet in breadth; double lots, sixty feet. The fort, which was nearly destroyed in the Dutch assault in 1655, was in 1658 repaired and eight thousand brick were brought from Fort Orange (Albany, N. Y.) for that purpose, and a few men placed in charge. Christinaham at that time was next in importance to New Castle, at which place Vice-Director Beckman resided most of the time from 1658 to 1669, although New Castle belonged to the city of Amsterdam and Christinaham to the Dutch West India Company. In 1664 Fort Altena was captured by the English and permitted to go to ruin. The town of Christinaham ceased to exist from that time and is not later mentioned.

In 1669 Robert Jones was granted the right to establish a ferry near the site of the old fort, to which a road led from the Falls of Brandywine, where was a fording-place (now at the foot of Adams Street). At Crane Hook, on the Delaware River, south of Christiana Creek, a church was built by the Swedes about 1665, the most of the Swedish settlers then residing at Swanwyck, north of New Castle, Crane Hook and Vertrecht Hook (the present Edgemoor), and on the "Boght," a tract of land north of the latter place. Here the Swedes worshipped until 1698, when the present Old Swedes' Church was built, and a burial-place established around it. No settlement, however, grew up, and Old Swedes remained a parish church, practically isolated until within the past forty years, when the locality became a part of the city.

From the abandonment of the town of Christinaham, about 1664, until 1731 no attempt was made to found a settlement or lay out a town on the river north of New Castle, within the limits of Delaware, and the territory now embraced in Wilmington was mostly in five large tracts that about 1671 came into possession of John (Anderson) Stallcop, Dr. Tymon Stidham, Jacob Vanderveer, Jean Paul Jacquet and Peter Alrich, who were all residents under the Dutch, either at New Amstel (New Castle) or at Fort Altena. Jacob Vanderveer, from whom the Vanders in that vicinity descended, came to this locality in 1688, and was a sergeant under the Dutch for about a year, when he left the army and for several years commanded a vessel which traded along the coast. He then settled on a large tract of land north of the Brandywine, and erected a house on the site of Pickle's foundry, near which the family resided until within the past fifty years.

Dr. Tymon Stidham, a Swede, was a physician and surgeon, who came to this country with Gov. Rising in 1654, resided at New Amstel in 1658, and later took up lands, for which he received a patent May 28, 1671. Rattlesnake Run was its eastern boundary. Peter Alrich, who was active in the government of the colony from 1656 to 1682, both under the Dutch and English, was in possession of the lands on the Delaware on the south side of the Christians.

Jean Paul Jacquet, who was Vice-Director in 1655-56, was the owner of "Long Hook," a property on the Christiansa, opposite the old town of Wilmington, which embraced a tract at the foot of Market Street, east and west. The territory on which the old town stood, and the present business part of Wilmington now stands, is the tract of eight hundred acres granted to John (Anderson) Stallcop in 1671. It was bounded on the north by Stidham's land; on the west by Rattlesnake Run and a line of marked trees; on the south by the Christiansa and the meadows, and extended eastward.

On April 16, 1675, Stallcop, by an article of agreement, conveyed the one undivided half of the greater part of his estate to Samuel Peterson and Lars Cornelison. The latter sold his interest to Justa Anderson, by whom later it was assigned respectively to Mathias Defoe and Charles Pickering. In April, 1686, Thomas Pierson, a surveyor under the government, was employed to survey the property and make a division of the estate. The tract assigned in the division to Samuel Peterson, who still held under the conveyance of April, 1675, was bounded, as described by a later survey, as follows: Beginning at a thorn-bush standing in the middle of French Street and on a line with the south side of Water Street; from thence the eastern boundary line passed up the middle of French Street to a point about two rods above the upper side of Third Street; thence by a line running in a northwest direction diagonally across the square at Fourth and Market to the east end of "Love Lane," and following the lane to a stake near Rattlesnake Run, a distance of four hundred and forty-four rods from place of beginning. From the run the boundary line extended in a southwest direction fifty rods to a stake, and from thence to the mouth of a small 1 Very little is known of the early history of John Anderson. There was a tradition among the early settlers that he came from Holland, as a cook on board a vessel. On the voyage he wore a woolen cap which he used in place of a towel. It then became very much soiled, greasy and gloomy. For this reason the sailors nick-named him Stelkapp, afterwards spelled Stalcoop. To the deeds which he executed he signed his name Johan Anderson. In deeds of conveyance from his descendants, he is called John Anderson Stalcoop. There is no evidence that the name Anderson was retained by any of his posterity, all taking the name Stalcoop. He left four sons,—Andrew, Charles, John and Peter.

rivulet which then flowed into the Christiana below the corner of Front and West Streets.

The tract of Charles Pickering, according to the survey of 1686, had the following boundary lines: Beginning at a Spanish-oak tree standing in what is now Poplar Street, five rods below Seventh, within six feet of a spring; from this point the line extended in a northwest direction four hundred and sixty rods, nearly one and a half miles to a white-oak tree near Rattlesnake Run; thence in a southwesterly direction seventy-four rods to a corner of Peterson's land; thence by the line of Peterson's land to French Street near Third, and down French to the thorn bush mentioned above; thence by shore of the Christiana to the mouth of Stallcop's Run and along the run to the oak where the survey began.

John Anderson died before 1686, and the remainder of his land was divided between his widow, Christiana, and his eldest son, Andrew. The widow received the land lying east of Stallcop's Run and north of Pickering's tract. It was bounded by Tyms Stiddham's land on the north, by a line near Rattlesnake Run on the west, and by the Christiana on the south. The eastern limit was near the old churchyard. Andrew Anderson's portion lay to the south-west of Peterson's tract.

The tract of land that Charles Pickering owned afterwards became the property of the Swedish congregation. In 1736, by an indenture under the signatures of John Enselberg, the pastor, Charles Springer, Jacob Stilly and Garret Garrison, church wardens, and Philip Vandevere and Moses Justice, vestrymen, Charles Springer became their trustee, who, with Jacob Stilly and Garret Garrison and their successors, were granted power to "lease and demise for a term of years or forever, in small lots, any part of said church lands." These lands are now occupied by the central part of Wilmington.

Samuel Peterson, by his will dated November 20, 1699, devised to his son who should live longest with the mother, all his real estate. By this novel bequest it came to his son Peter, who owned it during his life. By his will, January 29, 1714, he bequeathed it to his son, Peter Peterson, who, on the 8th of May, 1727, conveyed to Andrew Justison "all that part of the plantation lying on the Christiana, extending from the foot of French Street to the mouth of a rivulet at Front and West Streets, and north and west according to the lines above described." Thomas Willing, in 1728, married Catharine, daughter of Andrew Justison.

September 26, 1731, his father-in-law deeded him part of the land lying between what is now West and French Streets. The part lying between French and Market was then the most eligible; and, as nearly as can be ascertained, in October, 1731, Thomas Willing laid out this tract into lots and then began the village of Willington, from which Wilmington really grew. The first house known to have been erected on the plan for a town made by Willing, stood at the northwest corner of Market and Front Streets. It was built of brick and bore the date 1732 and the initials I. W. S. cut in a marble tablet placed in the gable wall. This building stood eight feet out from the present western line of Market Street. It was torn down in 1825 by Eli Sharpe, who kept tavern in it for many years, as did others before him.

In July, 1732, Joseph Way bought a lot in Willington for ten pounds. On the same day, Dr. James Milner bought two lots at the intersection of Front and Market Streets for ten pounds, and Charles Empson one lot for fifteen pounds. In 1734, Samuel Kirk, store-keeper, purchased a lot sixty by ninety feet at the west end of Market Square for fifteen pounds. A few other purchases were made about the same time. In 1735 there were about twenty houses in the village. In that year, William Shipley, of Ridley, Pennsylvania, at the suggestion of his wife, who had previously traveled through the town, came to it on a visit of inquiry. On May 20, 1735, he purchased a lot of Samuel Kirk and his wife Margaret, at the southeast corner of Market and Second Streets. The lot was described as being on Market Square. On August 9, 1735, William Shipley bought of Andrew Justison and Thomas Willing eight acres for one hundred and four pounds, all lying between Market and West Streets above Second, and below Fifth Street. At the same time he bought of Charles Empson one acre and four rods for forty pounds. He also bought some of the church land.

It may be said of William Shipley that he was the virtual founder of the town of Wilmington, by his purchases and investments. He was born in Leicestershire, England, in 1693, and married Mary Ann Tatnall, daughter of Robert and Mary Ann Tatnall, and had three children—Thomas, Ann and Elizabeth. Early in 1725 he came from England to Philadelphia and settled at Ridley, Pennsylvania. His wife died soon after his arrival in America, and he married Elizabeth Lewis, of Springfield, Pa. She was a preacher in the Society of Friends, an intelligent woman and very influential among her people. A very curious and well authenticated story is told of the coming of herself and her husband to Delaware. While they were living at Ridley, Pa., in 1730, she had a dream which the next day she related to her husband. In it she was traveling on horseback, along a high road, and after a time she came to a wild and turbulent stream, which she forded with difficulty; beyond this stream she mounted a long and steep hill-side; when she arrived at this summit a great view of surpassing beauty spread out before her. The hill whereon she stood melted away in the distance into a broad savannah, treeless and covered with luxuriant grass. On either side of the hill ran a stream—upon one the wild water-course which she had just crossed; upon the other, a snake-like river that wound sluggishly along in the sunlight. Then for the first time she saw that a guide accompanied her, and she spoke to him.

"Friend, what country is this that thou hast taken me to?"

"Elizabeth Shipley," answered he, "beneath thee lieth a new land and a fruitful, and it is the design of Divine Providence that thou shouldst enter in thereto, thou and thy people, and ye shall be enriched even unto the seventh generation. Therefore, leave the place where now thou dwellest, and enter into and take possession of this land, even as the children of Israel took possession of the land of Canaan." He finished speaking, and as she turned to look, he vanished, and she awoke.

William Shipley bade his wife think no more of her dreams, for if one pulls up blue beans after they have sprouted, one's pot is like to go empty. So, meeting with no encouragement, after some days the sharpness of her dream became dulled against the hard things of every-day life.

A year passed, and Elizabeth received a Divine call to go and preach at a meeting of the Society of Friends held in that peninsula that lies between the Delaware and Chesapeake Bays. It was in the spring-time, when the meadows were clad with bright green, when the woodlands were soft with tender leaves unfolding timidly in the generous warmth of the sun, when the birds sang, when the cocks crowed lustily, when the wren chattered under the eaves, and all the air was burdened with the sweetness of the apple blossoms, among which the bees swarmed with drowsy hum. So she set forth on her journey, Jogging southward along the old King's road. She passed many streams of sweet water untainted with lime, where the little fish darted here and there as her old gray farm horse went splashing across their pebbly reaches. After a journey of sixteen or eighten miles she came to a roaring stream that cut through tree-covered highlands, and came raging and rushing down over great rocks and boulders. The cawing of crows in the woods, and a solitary eagle that went sailing through the air, was all the life that broke the solitude of the place. As she hesitated on the bank before entering the rough-looking ford, marked at each end by a sapling pole to which a red rag was fastened, the whole scene seemed strangely familiar to her. After she had crossed the stream she began ascending a hill up which the highway led, that feeling strong upon her which one has at times of having lived through such a scene before. At the top of the hill she came to a clearing in the forest where an old Swede had built him a hut, and begun to till the land. Here the woods unfolded like a curtain, and beneath her she saw the hill melt away into level meadows that spread far to a great river sparkling in the sunlight away in the distance. Upon one hand ran a sluggish river curving through the meadows; on the other, the brawling stream she had just crossed. She sat in silence looking at the scene, while the little barefoot Swedish children gathered at the door of the hut, looking with blue-eyed wonder at the stranger; then clasping her hands she cried aloud, "Behold, it is the land of my vision, and here will I pitch my tent!"

Such is the story told by Howard Pyle, the author and artist, regarding the removal of William and Elizabeth Shipley to Wilmington. In 1736 Mr. Shipley built a large three-story brick house at the southwest corner of Fourth and Shipley Streets. It was then doubtless the largest building within the present limits of Delaware. In this house he lived until his death, in 1768, at the age of seventy-six years. It was owned for many years by Henry Latimer, president of the Bank of Delaware, and was subsequently sold to Gawthrop & Bro., who in 1883 removed the venerable and historic old mansion and upon the site erected the beautiful Gawthrop Building. The Shipley mansion thus stood one hundred and forty-eight years and when torn down was still in a good state of preservation.

Thomas Shipley, the oldest son of William and Mary Shipley, was born in England in 1718, came with his parents to America, settled with them in Wilmington, and afterwards purchased part of the water-power of the Brandywine, which became a source of wealth to the family. By his marriage with Mary Marriott he had nine children. Those who grew to adult age were William, Mary, Joseph, Sarah, Ann and Anna. William, born in 1746, died in 1816. Mary, born 1750, married Phineas Buckley and died in New York in 1795. Joseph was born in 1752, married Mary Levis, of Springfield, Delaware.

Co., Pa., and died in 1882. He inherited the large mill property on the Brandywine, was successful in business and left an honorable name. His wife Mary died in 1843. Sarah, fourth child of Thomas Shipley, born 1755, married Cyrus Newlin, of Wilmington, and died in 1834, leaving two children—Mary and Thomas. Ann, fifth child, was born in 1758, married John Jones, and died in 1808, leaving two children, Cyrus and Lydia. Anna, the youngest child of Thomas Shipley, born in 1760, married William Byrnes, and died in 1808, leaving one son, Thomas.

The children of Joseph and Mary Shipley were Samuel, Mary, Thomas, John, Rebecca, Anna, Elizabeth, Sarah, Margaret, Joseph and Hannah. Samuel, the oldest son, born in 1777, married Elizabeth, daughter of Captain James Jeffers. He engaged in the milling business with his father until his health failed and he died in 1844, leaving two children—Thomas and Sarah. Mary, oldest daughter of Joseph Shipley, married John Dixon, of Wilmington. She died in 1844.

Thomas, second son of Joseph Shipley, born in 1790, engaged in the shipping business at Philadelphia, and was remarkably successful. He was prostrated with a stroke while visiting in the south of France.
He died soon afterwards, in 1818, at the early age of thirty-two.

John, third son of Joseph and Mary Shipley, born 1792, for many years engaged in the milling business, and died in 1863.

Joseph, fourth son of Joseph and Mary Shipley, born 1796, at the age of eighteen entered the counting-house of Samuel Canby, in Philadelphia. In 1819, he went to England and, as will be seen, soon after became a member of the great banking house of Brown, Shipley & Co. The reputation of this house is sufficient evidence of Mr. Shipley's character and ability, for his importance to the firm was shown not only in prosperous times, but in adverse and trying circumstances, and his worth as a merchant and a citizen was recognized in the community in which he so long resided in England.

Joseph Shipley, the subject of the following notice, was born December 4, 1796. He was the great-grand son of William Shipley and Mary (Tatnall) Shipley, who came to America in 1735, and belonged to the Society of Friends, as also did his parents.

Though not strictly conforming to the plain speech of Quakers, nor fully recognizing their discipline personally, he nevertheless remembered his origin with peculiar satisfaction.

While yet a young man, he went to England, and assisted to build up an extensive business in the name of Brown, Shipley & Co., which yielded him a fortune.

Thirty years after he went abroad he returned to his native State and purchased a fine property in Brandywine Hundred, where he erected a beautiful residence, and called the place "Rockwood." Here he continued to reside until his decease.

Mr. Shipley was noted for being always judicious in action, and to his high character as a man the firm to which he belonged was largely indebted for its celebrity and success. His sound judgment and singular aptitude for business rendered him an admirable ally in prosperous times; but it was under adverse circumstances that his many resources deried from long experience and natural resolution were most strikingly developed.

In conversation he was solid rather than brilliant and showy, while his knowledge of the world made him a genial companion. His hospitality was large, and the friends he collected at his board were such as gave zest to the feast. He was well read in literature, especially the English poets, whom he loved to recite. He died at his residence on the 9th of May, 1867, in the seventy-second year of his age, and his body was interred in the Friends' Burying-Grounds in Wilmington, amid a large concourse of relatives and friends. The last sad rites were performed in the usual quiet and unostentatious manner, there being no ceremony or address observed. He passed from earth at a ripe age, his life being one of honor and usefulness, and we doubt whether the soil of Delaware covers the remains of a more trusty merchant, a more worthy citizen or a better man than Joseph Shipley.

The enterprise of the first William Shipley was equal to his wealth, and the town began to grow rapidly after his removal to it. In 1736 lots were bought by Joseph Steel, yeoman, of Maryland; John McArthur, weaver; Thomas Tatnall, of Ridley; William Lewis, Joseph Peters, Abraham Skinner, mariner; Lucas Stidham, Enoch Lewis, cordwainer; Hans Rudolph, Henry Heath, George Howell, storekeeper; David Bush, merchant; Alexander Hooge, carpenter; Thomas Downing, inn-keeper; Thomas Broom.

Benjamin Canby, ancestor of the Canby family in America, resided in Yorkshire, England. Thomas, the second of his two sons, emigrated to Bucks County, Pa., and about 1736 moved to Wilmington. He died in 1742.

Oliver, son of Thomas Canby, settled in Wilmington about 1740. He owned the old Timothy Stidham mill, which was the first built within its limits, and stood near the old ford road, now Adams Street. In 1744 he married Elizabeth, daughter of William and Mary Shipley, and died in 1754. William, the eldest of the five children of Oliver, in 1774 married Martha, daughter of Thomas and Sarah Marriott, of Bristol, Pa. They settled in Wilmington, on the south side of the Brandywine, the same year. She died in 1826, and he survived her until 1850, when he died at the age of eighty-two.

Niles' Register, in noticing his death, said: "William Canby, a much beloved member of the Society of Friends, died in Wilmington. If it is even possible to suppose that any one man was more separated from worldly affairs, more willing to perform deeds of charity and benevolence, less guilty of bad thoughts or capable of a bad action, than any of the rest of his kind, we should have fixed upon William Canby.” He was the author of a letter to Thomas Jefferson in 1813, which, with the reply, was very extensively published, and may be found in the supplement of the ninth volume of the Register, page 183. Though endowed with a vigorous intellect, and fitted by education for commercial success, he relinquished a lucrative business in the meridian of life. He had a considerable knowledge of practical mathematics, and was a diligent student of history, astronomy and some of the other sciences.

Samuel Canby, second son of Oliver Canby and Elizabeth Shipley, was born in Wilmington in 1751. His father died when he was three years old. He learned the business of a carpenter and cabinet-maker with Ziba Ferris. When his term of service as an apprentice ended, in 1771, he removed to Brandywine and engaged in the milling business. In 1775 he married Frances Lea, daughter of James and Margaret Lea, of Wilmington, and moved to the house formerly owned by his father on the banks of the Brandywine, between Orange and Tatnall Streets. Later in life he built a large residence at the corner of Fourteenth and Market Streets, in which his son James afterwards resided. In this mansion he lived forty-one years, until his death. In the words of Benjamin Ferris, “here he had room to gratify his hospitable disposition, and to have his friends around him, which he greatly enjoyed. His home for many years was the principal one in the place for the accommodation and entertainment of Friends traveling on religious service. He was prudent in the management of his affairs and prospered in business. His exemplary conduct, dignified deportment, undoubted integrity and uprightness raised him to a high standing in the estimation of his friends and fellow-citizens.” He died in 1832, aged eighty-one years.

James Canby, son of Samuel Canby, was born January 30, 1781, and for most of his adult life continued the flour-mills founded by his father. He was one of the originators of the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad and became the first president of the company. He was also president of the Union National Bank, and in all respects a business man of the highest class. He died May 24, 1858.

Merritt Canby, son of William Canby, was born in Wilmington, November 19, 1783. From 1815 to 1836 he was engaged in the sugar refining business in Philadelphia. In 1836 he removed to Wilmington and was connected with various financial institutions and other corporations until his death, December 10, 1866.

Benjamin Ferris, the author of the “History of the Early Settlements on the Delaware,” was descended from an English family who emigrated from Reading, England, and settled at Groton, near Boston, Massachusetts. From there Samuel Ferris, the ancestor of Benjamin, removed about 1682 to New Milford, Connecticut. From this place his grandson, John Ferris, with other members of the family, came to Wilmington and settled in the year 1748. He was the grandfather of Benjamin Ferris, who was born August 7, 1780, in the house still standing at the corner of Third and Shipley Streets. At the age of fourteen he went to Philadelphia, where he learned the business of watchmaking, which he followed in that city until the year 1813, when he returned to Wilmington, where he resided during the remainder of his life.

Not being actively engaged in business, and fond of knowledge, he read extensively upon religious and historical subjects, especially the history of our own country. In connection with this he became much interested in collecting and preserving such facts as he could obtain of the early settlement and history of Wilmington and its neighborhood. He conversed much with the oldest inhabitants, and gathered such information as they could give him, and searched diligently through old family records for such facts and dates as might be preserved in them. In this way and with a most excellent and retentive memory he laid up a store of facts which he turned to valuable uses.

He was warmly interested in the welfare of the American Indians, and deeply felt the wrongs they suffered through the neglect of the government in failing to protect them in their rights. In 1839 he was appointed one of a committee of the Yearly Meetings of Friends of New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore, to investigate the case of the Seneca Indians, who were about to be defrauded of their valuable reservations of land in the State of New York, and to present a statement of their wrongs to the President and Congress of the United States. These efforts were continued for years, and finally resulted in securing to the Indians their claim to fifty-three thousand acres of land, on which they still reside.

The frequent visits made by Benjamin Ferris to the State of New York, in connection with his duties on this committee, gave him an opportunity of examining the records of Albany, and those of the New York Historical Society. Finding that much of the information he desired to obtain was only preserved in the Swedish records, he engaged the services of a young Swede to give him instruction in his native language, son of the original owner, who built three brick houses on the site.

Thomas West (a distant relative of Lord De La Warr, whose name also was Thomas West, from whom Delaware takes its name) was an uncle to the celebrated painter, Benjamin West. He was married to Mary Dean, in the Devonshire Square Friends' Meeting, London, in 1709. Their children were—Sarah, Samuel, Jane, Thomas, William, Mary, Rachel, Elyner, Elizabeth and Joseph. Thomas West came to America in 1712, settled at Concord, Chester County, Pa., and removed to Wilmington in 1736. He died in 1748. Joseph, the youngest son, owned one of the first tanneries in the town. It was situated in the square bounded by Third and Fourth, Shipley and Tatnall Streets.

William, an older brother, married Mary Wilson. They had two children,—Mary and Sarah. Mary married John Craig. Sarah married George Stern, who inherited the homestead and farm of William West, his father-in-law, at the north end of Kennett turnpike, near the State line.

John Stern, his son, learned the saddler's trade. He was born in 1776, and was married to Phebe McFarlan, and resided near Gause's Corners, Chester County, Pa., until 1816, when he moved to within one mile of Centreville, Delaware, where his youngest son, Cyrus Stern, now a merchant of Wilmington, was born January 5, 1818. In 1885, Mr. Stern published a complete history and genealogy of the McFarlan, Stern, Heald and West families of Pennsylvania and Delaware. It is a work of one hundred and eighty quarto pages, and required several years of careful investigation to prepare it.

At the close of the year 1786, there were thirty-three dwelling-houses in Wilmington. The plan was extended west from Market to Tatnall, and east to Walnut Street, and Wm. Shipley at his own expense erected a market-house on Fourth Street, extending from Shipley Street half-way to Market Street, which became a fruitful source of contention. A notice was given July 16, 1785, by the people interested in the Fourth Street Market that they would hold market days on each Wednesday and Saturday. In the same year a rival faction had taken steps towards opening a market on Market Street near Second, and a war was begun between them and the Shipley people, which resulted in an appeal to Governor Thomas Penn. Charges were made by the opposition affecting the private character of Mr. Shipley, but he was subsequently vindicated, and a compromise was reached by which the lower market was erected on Second Street, and a number of citizens bought Shipley's market and dedicated it to the use of the public.

Willingtown was still without any municipal government, and on June 10, 1736, a hundred and three citizens petitioned Governor Penn for a borough charter, "that they may be empowered to choose burgesses and inferior offices as shall be found necessary for the encouraging virtue, preserving the King's peace and the detecting of vice, that they may be enabled to form and enact such ordinances for the regulation of the markets and streets, and cleansing and mending the streets and highways within the precincts of the said town or borough, as may prove commodious and advantageous both to the said town and country adjacent, etc." The signers of the petition were Joseph Pennock, William Shipley, Joseph Way, Charles Empson, Thomas Peters, Robert Read, Thomas West, Joshua Way, Theodore Broom, Edward Tatnall, James Milner, Samuel Pennock, Griffith Minshall, John Pierce, Caleb Way, Erasmus Stidham, William Atherton, Samuel Houton, John Smith, Christopher Marshall, Mordecai Lewis, Mathias Morton, Goldsmith Folwell, William Empson, Joseph Greist, Andrew Justice, Thomas Willing, Thomas Tatnall, David Bush, Philip Vandevere, John Greist, William Cheneay, Joseph Williams, Richard Evenson.

The granting of this charter was deferred until November 16, 1789, and when allowed it contained Delaware in the first half of the eighteenth century, and the river inlets around New Castle and Wilmington furnished the most convenient landing-places for illicit rum, tobacco, dress goods and various articles of personal adornment and finery, that found their way thence to Philadelphia without undergoing the inspection of the excise officers. The crews of smuggling vessels could make very lively their nights on shore after duty was done, and rum was cheap enough to allow even the negro slaves to touch occasionally an extreme limit of indulgence. Hence the new government of Wilmington had scarcely been installed before they discovered that one of their most pressing needs was a prison, in which offenders might be confined pending their transportation to the county town of New Castle for trial. On March 31, 1740, the burgesses bought from William Shipley a piece of ground, on which they erected a "cage" or prison, the stocks and the whipping-post. For fifty-eight years thereafter the cage is said to have been the most prominent public building in the town. It stood on the west side of Market Street, a few doors above Third. In the borough records the prison is designated as "the Cage," though it was generally known as "the smoke-house." Well-authenticated tradition says there was no fire-place in it. In very cold weather a dish full of burning coals was used to heat the rooms. Those may have emitted smoke, and from that cause the name probably originated. It was a quaint one-story brick house, twelve feet square and eight feet high, with two apartments, one for males and one for females, but it has no chimneys or windows. The only place for light or pure air to enter was between the iron grating in an opening about a foot square in each of the two doors.

Prisoners who were held for trial at the County Courts until sent to New Castle Jail, vagabonds and disorderly persons were incarcerated here. Vagrants, or what are now called "tramps," and some disturbers of the peace, were taken before the burgesses, who sentenced them to the stocks, to the whipping-post, or to be "drummed out of town." When it became known that a culprit was sentenced to the last-mentioned punishment, crowds assembled in front of the prison, awaiting for the unfortunate one to be brought out. Amidst the shouts of the rabble, the constable marched the prisoner to the centre of the street and shouted, "Forward!" The drum then began to beat and the procession moved. Says an early chronicler,—"The first step the prisoner took was the signal of attack; a shower of every kind of offensive matter was poured upon him. By the time he arrived down to Fourth Street he was dripping from head to foot with the contents of rotten eggs and all the filth of the streets and gutters. The wretched sufferer was all the time begging in vain for mercy. The rattle of the drum, the shout of the mob which followed, and the cries of the victim could only be realized by the spectator. The procession moved in the other direction as far as Brandywine Bridge.

Most of the scenes such as described took place soon after the Revolution, when the country heretofore contained many vagrants of the worst description. They had been followers of the army, and after the war became robbers, thieves and drunken beggars. A class of characters called "wheelbarrow-men" were troublesome in Wilmington a century ago. They were dischaged prisoners from Philadelphia, where many were then sentenced to work on the roads and streets at the wheelbarrow, with an iron collar around their necks, and a heavy ball chained to one leg. About 1792, when the "smoke-house" became old and dilapidated, a sailor prisoner was placed in it. His comrades marched from the Foil Anchor Inn, armed with handspikes, smashed open the prison-door and released their man, whom they carried on their shoulders in triumph down Market Street. The Delaware Gazette, a day or two later, in an amusing article, "ridiculed the old prison and the borough authorities for retaining it." In 1788, fifty-eight years after its erection, it was torn down, and the cells in the basement of the town hall, built that year, were used as a place of imprisonment until the erection of the old building, since which time prisoners have been kept in cells.

The first borough election was held September 8, 1740, the franchise extending to all freeholders and to all tenants who paid at least five pounds yearly rent, and who had resided in the town one year. The officials elected, and the number of votes for each, were as follows: Chief Burgess, William Shipley, 61; Second Burgess, Joseph Way, 50; High Constable, Charles Emison, 54; Assistant Burgess, Thomas West, 96; David Ferris, 87; George Howell, 78; Robert Hannum, 58; Joshua Way, 50; Joshua Litter, 45; Town Clerk, Gouldsmith Edward Folwell, 96.

The following is a complete list of the burgesses and clerks elected under the original charter, those given for 1739 being named in the charter for the offices designated:

In 1789 the population was only 610, but at the opening of the Revolution in 1775 it had increased to 1172 whites and 67 colored. There was no other computation until 1790, when the town comprised 2335 inhabitants. In 1791 the insurrection of the negroes in San Domingo drove hundreds of the French families from the island to the United States, quite a number of the emigrants settling in Wilmington. The population was further augmented in 1789 by refugees fleeing from the yellow fever plague in Philadelphia, who sought new homes in Wilmington. So large was their number that all the residences in the town were overcrowded and high rents were paid for the poorest kind of accommodations. The Christiana, from the old ferry to the upper wharf, was so crowded with ships of all kinds that there was scarcely room left for the passage of a boat. In 1795-96 the pestilence was again manifested in Philadelphia and when it attacked that city in the most malignant form in 1798 some of the refugees brought it to Wilmington, which had previously escaped the contagion. The consequences were terrible. First developed in the low land on the river-bank, the fever spread to the higher localities and out into the village of Brandywine. The mortality rate was enormous and during all that year there was a partial paralysis of trade and industry. Nevertheless the city hall was completed in 1798 and the growing commerce of the port was fairly maintained.

Wilmington existed under Governor Penn's charter until 1809, and in January 1st of that year the Legislature passed an amendment to it, by which the borough boundaries were defined as follows:

"Beginning at the mouth of the Brandywine Creek, on the east side of the same; thence along the eastern and northeastern side of the same about two and a half miles to the Old Ford above the head of tide-water; thence crossing the Brandywine westwardly and passing along the Old King's Road, according to the several courses there to the State Road, leading from Wilmington to Lancaster; thence in a direct line south-easterly, passing over the mouth of the riverlet called Stalcup's Gut, to the opposite side of the Christina River; thence down the side of the same until south-west of the lower point of the mouth of the Brandywine; thence northeast to the place of beginning."

In 1832 the Legislature granted the charter that converted Wilmington from a borough into a city. It provided for a mayor, one alderman, a City Council of fifteen members, a treasurer, an assessor, who also filled the office of collector, one inspector of election, and two assistants for each ward. On January 25, 1833, Wilmington Hundred was erected by act of Assembly, and called the City of Wilmington. From 1832 to 1848 the mayor was elected by City Council for a three years’ term; in 1848 the term was shortened to one year, and since 1850 he has been elected by the people. In 1869 the term was restored to three years and the mayor made ineligible to re-election. The original salary was two hundred dollars per annum, which has been increased by successive steps until it is now fifteen hundred dollars. The roster of the municipal officials from 1832 to the present time is as subjoined:

MAYORS—This office was abolished in 1869. Between 1832 and that date its occupants were:

PRESIDENTS OF COUNCIL—From 1832 to 1868 the president of Council was elected by the members, and since 1868 has been chosen by the people at the regular election. The salary in fifty-six years has been increased from fifty to three hundred dollars yearly. The incumbents of the office have been:

The City Assessor was originally elected by the people for a one year term. In 1845 it was provided that an assessor be chosen for each of the five wards, but from 1858 to 1870 there was a reversion to the old system of one assessor. Since 1871 the city has been divided into two assessment districts, and an assessor chosen from each for a term of three years. The names of the assessors, except for the period from 1845 to 1858, are:

Municipal Court.—From 1832 to 1883 the mayor was the sole police and committing magistrate, but on June 1, 1883, the Municipal Court was established by an act of the Legislature, to assume the functions of primary jurisdiction. Walter Cummins was appointed by Governor Stockley as judge of the court, and still holds the position. Henry R. Penington was clerk until his death, in September, 1886, and his successor, William B. Hyland, was appointed, and has since been the incumbent.

Chief Engineer.—The department of engineering and surveying was created by an ordinance passed by City Council, January 5, 1871. The head of the department is the chief engineer, who receives an annual salary of two thousand dollars, and is chosen by Council for a term of three years. He is allowed two or more assistants at an eight hundred dollar salary. Daniel Farr was elected chief engineer in 1871, and in 1874 was superseded by Myers C. Connell, who resigned in 1883 and went on professional service to the United States of Colombia, where he soon perished of yellow fever. Frederic H. Robinson was elected his successor, and was filling the office in 1887.

The City Council.—Under the charter of 1832 the election of Councilmen was so fixed, that while the

The first town hall was built over the west end of the Second St. market-house, with a frontage on Market Street. It was supported on arches extending from the columns, which divided the market walks, and when the borough officials were not occupying the one room which it contained, it was used for the accommodation of one of the early schools. It was erected in 1774, to provide accommodation for the Borough Council, which, since the establishment of Wilmington, in 1739, had been meeting at public taverns or at the residences of members. It had a small square cupola, surmounted by a spire and weather-vane. It was demolished about 1795, and a part of the lot where the City Hall now stands was purchased by the borough for $127. The owner of the remainder of the site wanted $816 for it, and the burgesses refused to give him more than $640. Several enterprising citizens, well aware of the future importance of the addition, made up the balance; the borough borrowed $1500 on bond, and in 1798 the City Hall was completed. Peter Baudry drew the plans, and in 1798 it was undoubtedly "a creditable movement to the liberality and public spirit of the citizens of Wilmington." The following letter of Joseph Tatnall, then president of the Bank of Delaware, tells from what source the clock and bell were obtained:

"Friends and fellow-citizens,—I have for several years past appre- hended that great convenience would arise to the inhabitants of this borough by having a commodious time-piece erected in a central part of the town. In the first place it would accelerate the punctual meeting of the religiously-disposed people at their places of worship; secondly, it will be of service to those who think themselves not of ability to pur- chase time-piece; and last, but not least consideration is it will become ornamental to the place of my nativity. Therefore, I have pre- pared from Europe a large and complete town-clock of excellent worksmanship, which I now present to you for the use of the town, with a sum of money not exceeding $250, to be laid out in a large, complete and good bell to serve the clock as well as the Town Hall now erecting, which I beg you to accept.

"I am your Friend,

Joseph Tatnall.

"Brandywine Bridge, 5th mo. 224, 1798."

At a meeting of the burgesses May 25, 1798, the gift was accepted, in resolutions of thanks to Mr. Tatnall, and a copy ordered to be sent to him. The bell hung in the cupola of the hall from 1798 to 1866, and in those sixty-eight years it struck the hour of day over half a million times. In 1878 it was placed in charge of the Delaware Historical Society, and subsequently passed into the possession of the Phoenix Fire Company, who still retain it. The clock in 1849 was overhauled by Jacob Alrich, who said it would last for fifty years more. The City Hall has always been a focus of interest for the people of Wilmington. Besides being the meeting-place of Council and the court-house of Municipal Courts for three-fourths of a century, nearly all public meetings were held within its walls. All the fire companies and many other corporations met there, and it was the scene of many notable public festivities, including the banquet to Lafayette, October 26, 1824. In the basement cells hundreds of prisoners have awaited trial or undergone penal sentences. The building is historic and honorable, and while Wilmington should preserve it as a souvenir of the past, it is in itself now unworthy of a wealthy and public-spirited community.

The first directory of Wilmington was issued in 1814, and marked an epoch in the progress of the city. It was published by Robert Porter, then one of the proprietors of the Delaware Journal, and also of the book-store, still maintained by his grandson, Harry Porter, who owns one of the few copies of the directory now in existence, and has granted the use of it for re-publication in these pages. The names of the streets north of Third, and parallel with it, were changed when the city charter was obtained, in 1832, the numerical titles taking the place of the original names. The streets that are now Fourth to Fifteenth, both included, were in 1814 known respectively as High, Queen, Hanover, Broad, Kent, Wood, Chestnut, Elizabeth, Dickinson, Franklin, Washington and Stidham. In the directory of 1814 the old street numbers were used, and the list of names and residences was as subjoined:

Ministers of the Gospel in Wilmington in 1814 were Revs. Read, D.D., Daniel Dodge, William Pryce, George Sheetz and William Meeks. The places of worship were the Friends' Meeting house, West Street; First Baptist meeting-house, on King Street; First Presbyterian Church, corner Market and Tenth; Second Presbyterian Church, corner Walnut and Fifth; Trinity Church (Old Swedes'), then "below the borough on the Christians;" Methodist meeting-house, Walnut, below Third; Zion Church (colored) and African Union, nearly opposite; New Baptist meeting-house, corner of French and Sixth.

The attorneys were James A. Bayard, Outerbridge Horsey, Caesar A. Rodney, Brown & Davis, Louis McLane, Archibald Hamilton, N. G. Williamson, William P. Brobson.

Edward Roche and Francis O'Daniel held the office of justice of the peace. Jonas P. Fairlamb, Isaac Stevenson and Joseph Reed were surveyors.

The Bank of Delaware was at the corner of Market and Fourth, but removed to its present site the next year. The capital was $10,000. Joseph Baily was president and Edward Worrell cashier. This bank was then nineteen years old. The Bank of Wilmington and Brandywine was at that time located at its present site. John Way was president and Daniel Byrnes cashier. Capital, $120,000. The Farmers' Bank was the third door above Third on Market, with John Rumsey, president and Peter Caverly, cashier.

Colonel Allen McLane was collector of customs, with office at 10 E. Water St. Joseph Brinagurst was botanist. The arsenal was at Washington Street, above Eighth. Reliance Fire-Engine House, West Third Street, between Market and Shipley. Friendship Engine-House, corner of Seventh and Shipley. Brandywine Engine-House, near Brandywine Bridge.

The Wilmington and Philadelphia stages left David Brinton's Indian King Hotel every morning at eight o'clock, and Anderson's coachman for same city, left Swan Tavern (now Gibson House) at same hour, taking four hours to go to Philadelphia, and that was pretty good time by stage. Cook's coachman, started at Christians Bridge Inn, daily at seven A.M., and arrived at Philadelphia at one P.M. The southern mail-coach stopped at Indian King for breakfast every morning at seven o'clock. The northern mail-coach from Baltimore stopped at same public inn for dinner. The "Exposition" and "Pilot" were stages of other lines running north and south, that also stopped daily for meals. Members of Congress were frequently on these stages going to and from Washington, and partook of meals, at this time prepared by David Brinton. His tavern was known as the stage-office. Stages for down the Peninsula also started from here daily.

There was one steamboat to Philadelphia in 1815, the "Delaware." The packet boats, "Ann," "Captain Bush; "Tryphena," Capt. Garretson; "Sarah Ann," Capt. Dougherty, plied between Wilmington and Philadelphia, one of which left or arrived at either place daily.

In 1814 the Abolitionist Society in Wilmington flourished. A society for the education of colored children, a female benevolent society, one Masonic lodge, and a musical organization of young gentlemen.

Mail was received daily. The great Northern and Southern mail route passed through Wilmington. It was surveyed between June, 1812, and January, 1813, and extended from Robinstown, Maine, to St. Mary's, in Georgia. The Northern route, from Washington City to Robinstown, the northeast coast of Maine, was eight hundred and sixty-eight miles. The Southern route, from Washington to St. Mary's, Georgia, eight hundred and twelve miles.

The country seats and mansion-houses in view of Wilmington (the sites of most of which are now in the city limits) in 1814 were those of Colonel Alexander Fairfield, David Alrichs, Peter S. Alrichs, south of Christiana River; Peter Bauhuy, Eden Park; Hon. James A. Bayard, Thomas Beseo, Philadelphia Road;

The records of Willington and Wilmington, as preserved by tradition and print, are replete with interesting incidents of the people who made the city. There was a good deal of wealth in the old community, and its owners were much given to investing it in fine houses and costly furniture. The early clergy were not, as a rule, overburdened with temporal fortune, but Rev. Peter Tranberg, rector of Old Swedes' from 1742 to 1748, built at the corner of French Street and Spring Alley a residence for himself, which was the most elegantly furnished in town. His widow lived there many years after his death, and his descendants occupied it to the sixth generation.

His only son was an officer in the Revolution, and Colonel Benzel, who married his eldest daughter, was stationed at Crown Point, New York, about 1750, and died in the service of King George. His youngest daughter married Orloff Parlin, pastor of Old Swedes' Church, Philadelphia, from 1750 to 1767.

Dr. John McKinley, the first President of Delaware, resided at the northwest corner of Third and French Streets, where he built a mansion; back of which, extending to King Street, was a beautiful garden of tulips and other rare flowers. One of his distinguished guests was Alexander H. Rowan, the Irish nobleman, then an exile in Wilmington. The doctor died here in 1796. The property was afterward occupied by Governor Caleb P. Bennett. Late in life he resided on the west side of Market Street, just below the Lore Building.

Dr. Didie, a French physician of note, and formerly a surgeon in Napoleon Bonaparte's army, lived on the west side of French Street, opposite the present site of Wesleyan College Building. J. B. Garesche the wealthy Frenchman, owner of the Eden Park Powder-Mills, lived on the east side, and Dr. Bayard at the corner above, until his death, in 1802.

Dr. Ebenezer Smith, Revolutionary surgeon, and whose father was one of the earliest Presbyterian ministers in Lancaster County, Pa., resided at Seventh and King Streets. He was health officer when the yellow fever prevailed here in 1802. His brother, Dr. Samuel Stanhope Smith, was president of the College of New Jersey, at Princeton, from 1795 to 1812. One of his sons, also a physician, died in Mississippi, where he had gone to recuperate his health; and his daughter, Eliza B. Smith, was killed by lightning in July, 1824, while sitting by an open window in the third story of their home. A second son was appointed assistant Professor of Mathematics at West Point Military Academy. He died of typhoid fever during a summer vacation. Captain Joseph Nicholson, of the United States Navy, was a neighbor to Dr. Smith.

Captain Prole owned the house at southeast corner of Second and Walnut Streets. It had an orchard in the rear, and in 1796 he sold the property to Robert Montgomery, who laid out a beautiful flower garden around the house. He made a tour of Europe when quite young and spent a year or more in France. He entertained the Governor (Thomas McKean) of Pennsylvania four months in 1797, when the yellow fever prevailed in Philadelphia.

Isaac Henderson, a merchant trader of the last century, resided at the northwest corner of Second and French Streets. Captain Elias Brown, soon after the Revolution, bought this property, and in 1791 sailed for the West Indies. He and his crew were lost at sea. Colonel Allen McLane afterwards lived in the mansion at the northeast corner of Second and French Streets, and John Stapler owned the house next above.

Phebe, widow of John Vining, United States Senator from 1793 to 1798, lived at the southeast corner of Third and French Streets, and from there to Water Street was the court end of town in those days.

James A. Bayard, Sr., who died soon after his return from signing the treaty of peace with England, in 1814, once occupied this house, and Governor Baslett, his father-in-law, once resided in it.

The Bush family, in colonial days, lived at the corner of King and Water Streets, and Captain Giles, a wealthy trader, resided at the northwest corner of King and Front Streets. His children were a son and a daughter. The latter married a young man named Malcolm, who was drowned in the Delaware a few days after the wedding, while boating with a party of his young friends. Captain Joseph Gilpin married the young widow and for a long time occupied the Giles homestead. He was a soldier in the Revolution, and moved to the West, where he lived to the age of eighty-nine years. His brother, Israel Gilpin, lived to be nearly one hundred years old. At the southwest corner of Second and King Streets Gilpin long resided. He moved to Philadelphia, where he died in 1844. Charles Gilpin, his son, was elected mayor of that city in 1850 by the Whig party.

Eli Mendenhall had a card factory and a dry goods and grocery store nearly opposite Second Street Market, on King Street. Near by were the watchmaker shops of Thomas Crow and Jonas Aldrich.

Timothy Hanson, a chair manufacturer, lived on Second Street, between Market and King Streets.

The residence of Captain Jeffries, a noted seaman, was on King Street, above Second Street. Captain Brinton, who was lost at sea, was his neighbor.

John and Samuel Adams were printers at the corner of Fourth and King Streets.

Matthew Crips, about 1760, bought the land east of King Street, between Seventh and Eighth Streets, and on it started the first pottery in Wilmington. He also made cups and saucers and sold the products of his manufacture in Delaware and New Jersey, until he grew wealthy. In 1797 he built a large mansion on this site, in which he lived for several years, and then it was rented by John Keating, a wealthy Englishman, who married the daughter of Madame Deschappelles.

Peter Proencher, an educated Frenchman, who had, prior to the French Revolution, been attached to the household of the Duc d'Orleans, brother of King Louis XVI., was a member of this family. He came to this country in 1794, and returned to France when the Bourbon were restored to the throne, after the downfall of Napoleon. One of Mr. Keating's sons was educated in Paris and became a skilled chemist and mineralogist, dying in London in 1840. Another son was a lawyer of some note in Philadelphia. When Mr. Keating moved from the Crips mansion, Mrs. Capron, of Philadelphia, took it as a boarding-house, and it was subsequently occupied by Joshua Mauel. Later on it became Eli Hibbs' boarding-school for girls.

Peter Vandever owned a bridge across the Brandywine, which he built as early as 1760, and charged toll for crossing it.

His ancestors settled on a large tract of land now included in the northeast section of the city, a portion of which was known as Vandever's Island, being then surrounded by the stream. The last bridge at the site was taken away by a flood in January, 1839.

Front Street from Walnut to Market was a beautiful green lawn in early days.

Dr. George Monro's residence until his death was on the east side of Market Street, a few doors below Second. He was a surgeon in the Revolution and married a daughter of Col. John Haslet. John Patterson, dry goods merchant, was adjoining. The house above was first the home of Major Adams, and afterwards of the celebrated architect Benjamin H. Latrobe, who designed part of the Capitol at Washington. On the northwest corner of Front and Market Streets stands the building for a century known as the Buck Tavern. On this site the first house in town was built. Col. Thomas Kean, a hero of the Revolution, and who died of yellow fever in 1802, had a mansion on the opposite corner, south of the Bank of Brandywine. Dr. Pascal's drug store was near the centre of the square, on the west side. Joseph Baily, for thirty-three years president of the Bank of Delaware, succeeded him in the drug business. Joseph Shallcross, the merchant trader and patriot, who sent a letter to General Washington before the battle of Brandywine, lived next above. Late in life he moved to Delaware Avenue, above Adams. John Sellars, the hatter, afterwards occupied the same house. William R. Sellars was his son. John Reynolds' hardware store was on the southwest corner of Third and Market. Within the same square James Brobson, a prominent merchant, had a store. He was many years burgess of the town. The Sign of the Ship, at the corner of Third and Market, was a well-known old-time tavern. It was the headquarters for several officers of Washington's army just before the battle of Brandywine. John Marshall was proprietor at that time, and afterwards Captain Patrick O'Flinn kept it until his death, in 1818. John Webster, a wit, and in 1790 a successful teacher in town, started a drug store, which, for many years afterwards, was owned by Joseph Brighurst and now by H.R. Brighurst. David Bush resided at the northeast corner of Third and Market Streets.

Thomas Stackman had a shoe store just above the Bush homestead. His daughter married Joseph Grubb, owner of one of the earliest hardware stores in town; another daughter married Joseph Richardson.

James Lea, Sr., resided at the northwest corner of Fourth and Market Streets, afterwards the site of the Bank of Delaware, from 1795 to 1815. Bonsall & Niles' printing-office was next-door above, and when Hezekiah Niles moved to Baltimore, his daughter, Mary B. Niles, remained in Wilmington and was known as one of the most successful teachers in the town. The residence of Robert Hamilton, an Englishman, was on Market Street, above Fifth Street.

Francis Robinson, a Friend, emigrated to Wilmington, from County Wicklow, Ireland, in 1732, and bought the land now bounded by Market, King, Fourth and Fifth Streets. In the centre of this square, in his newly-built house, he engaged in the preparation of buck-skins and chamois leather. Nicholas Robinson, his son, during his leisure hours, shot squirrels in the thickly-wooded land now embraced in the same square, and afterward succeeded his father. When he retired William, his son, took the business, and in 1823 was the first person in Wilmington to manufacture morocco. For seven years, with about a dozen employees, he carried on that business, and in 1830, with James Rice as partner, built a foundry at Tenth and Orange Streets. He removed to Philadelphia and later to Baltimore. Francis Robinson, his brother and now an aged citizen of Wilmington, together with his brother Harrison, in 1833 and for eleven years afterward, engaged in cleaning and preparing wool on the site where his ancestors had previously conducted the tannery. This square for a century and a quarter was owned by the Robinsons. Hanson Robinson went to Philadelphia in 1843, and began the wool business on Front Street, below Chestnut Street. In 1855 he built as his country residence Woolton Hall, Blandywine Hundred, where he died in March, 1871.

General John Stockton owned the Bauduy Mansion, opposite the City Hall. He was brigadier-general of the New Castle County militia during the War of 1812, and his youngest son was killed fighting the British, on the Niagara frontier. Captain Thomas Stockton, an older son, commanded a company and was distinguished at the battle of Lundy's Lane in that war. His company marched from Wilmington to Canada. He was elected Governor of Delaware, and died while in office. He lived in New Castle. Job Harvey, a leading shipping merchant, owned the corner now occupied by the Clayton House, before 1790. The Queen of the Otathelie tavern was opened there before 1800. On the south side of Sixth Street, near Market Street, prior to 1800 stood John Jordan's one-story brick school-house.

The headquarters of the French officers in Washington's army during its stay in Wilmington was in the large mansion of Abijah Dawes, a Friend, on the east side of Market Street, above Sixth Street, now owned by the McCauleys. They had considerable sums of French money placed in bags and deposited in the cellar. Gunning Bedford, whom Washington presented with a pocket pistol for his services in the war, afterwards lived until his death. He was the only one of the framers of the Constitution of the United States, one of the first Representatives in Congress, and a judge of the courts. Martha Washington gave him the crimson satin Masonic sash of the first President. Mrs. Bedford was the daughter of James Parker, one of the early journalists of New York City. Her mother was a French lady. The Bedford home was famed for its hospitality and brilliant entertainments. The mansion was sold in 1813 by the original owner to Louis McLane.

On the west side of Market Street, opposite the old Presbyterian Church, prior to 1800, there was a large vegetable garden, owned by Governor Dickinson. Adjoining it was the cabin of an old colored woman, Lydia Hall, who lived to the age of one hundred years. She had two sons in the Revolutionary army, one of whom was captured and executed by the British.

On the south side of Front Street, near Tatnall, lived Francis Way, a Friend. His ancestors were among the first settlers. The home of Belle McCluskey, a camp follower of the Revolution, was on the north side of Front Street, nearly opposite. Major Patten, an officer of the famous Delaware Regiment in the Revolution, lived on Front Street until his death of yellow fever, in 1798.

William Jones, prior to 1800, owned a residence at the northwest corner of Shipley and Front Streets, with a beautiful flower garden surrounding it. His son, William G. Jones, the leading undertaker and cabinet-maker of half a century ago, and father of Washington Jones, president of the Bank of Brandywine, succeeded in the ownership. Shipley Street up to Third, in 1800, was not built up. On the north side of Second, between Orange and Tatnall Streets, was Caleb Sheward's brewery, one of the first in Wilmington. He operated it as late as 1814. William Sheward, his son, was the next owner till 1848, when it was sold. Zachariah Ferris, a minister among the Friends, owned a tanyard and dwelling-house on the south side of Second, beyond West Street. His son, John Ferris, built a large house on Market Street.

Dr. Nicholas Way erected a large mansion at the southwest corner of Third and Shipley Streets. He began the practice of medicine in 1775, and was an eminent physician and preceptor. In 1788 he entertained nearly a hundred Philadelphians during the yellow fever epidemic. Monsieur Hammond, a wealthy Frenchman, bought the Way mansion and resided in it until 1802. Jacob Broom, one of the framers of the Constitution of the United States, was its next owner, and died there. His son, Jacob M. Broom, was a Representative in Congress. John Wales, United States Senator from 1849 to 1851, lived here for many years.

Nicholas G. Williamson, a lawyer, resided at the northwest corner of Third and Shipley Streets. He was postmaster of Wilmington and second mayor of the city. It was at his house that Myra Clark Gaines was entertained the night before she started with her future husband to New Orleans to claim her fortune. In Revolutionary days Joel Zane kept a hardware store at the southeast corner of Fourth and Shipley Streets, and his wife daily gave food to the French soldiers quartered in the neighborhood. Mr. Zane moved to Front Street after the war. Ziba Ferris and his son of the same name resided for many years at the corner of Third and Shipley Streets. John Ferris, who was unceasing in his care of the yellow fever patients in 1798 and 1802, was one of the last victims of the disease, dying October 30, 1802.

On the east side of Shipley Street, near Fifth, was the most famous school of colonial days, conducted by Henry Pepper. William Cobbett, the notorious political agitator, was for a brief period in the employ of Mr. Pepper as a teacher. Captain Kirkpatrick, of Revolutionary fame, lived opposite Pepper's school. He was the father of David, James and Robert Kirkpatrick, who founded a large importing house in Philadelphia.

About 1800 "Billy" McDougall, a town notoriety, kept a little tavern on the edge of the marsh at Tatnall Street and Delaware Avenue. He called it "The House that Jack Built," but it was better known as "Bull Frog Tavern." The marsh was full of plump and juicy frogs that found no better destination.
than to be stoned by the boys, until the French refugees from San Domingo and Paris settled in Wilmington. They knew what a table delicacy the big, green batrachians were, and soon had them served by their own cooks, but it required time and persuasion to induce the Delaware natives to eat them.

Dr. William Gibbons lived south of Delaware Avenue near Jefferson Street, and in the vicinage resided John Hedges, who occupied an old-time hipped-roof house, and died in it at the age of one hundred. Moses Bradford built the large stone mansion afterward owned by Job Jackson. William Shipley’s brewery was at the foot of Quaker Hill. A large stone house—one of the first on West Street—was built by Joseph Shallcross, and was sold to Mordecai Woodward, who owned a large rope-walk on what is now Washington Street. John Dauphin, a Frenchman, succeeded him in its ownership. Frederick Shrade, the gunsmith, lived at the northwest corner of Sixth and West Streets, since the site of a Catholic Seminary. Caleb Seal, who died at ninety-three years of age, owned a residence at northeast corner of Sixth and West Streets. His son, William Seal, lived here during his life.

The father of Governor Caleb P. Bennett, who was chief burgess in 1809, resided at the northwest corner of Fifth and West Streets. The headquarters of General Washington, before the battle of Brandywine, was in a building below the southwest corner of Fourth and West Streets, afterwards owned by Joseph C. Gilpin. Captain John Lea lived next door below, and the famous William Cobbett in 1794 was his nearest neighbor. Mrs. Mary Johnson, a woman “with a masculine mind,” who always wore a man’s hat and carried a cane, lived next door. She was said to be “the first woman lawyer in the United States.” Before 1800 she argued causes in court at New Castle and West Chester, in the presence of the ablest attorneys of that day.

The old barley mill was on the south side of the Brandywine above the residence of the late Bishop Lee. John Fleming used it for cleaning barley for a score of years. The Jordans next turned it into an establishment for printing and dying calico. In 1790 Archibald Hamilton Rowan, the Irish exile, and William Alfred continued in the same business. In 1798 Rowan took charge of it himself, and engaged Walter McIndoe, Robert Connell and John McWilliams, “experienced artists,” in his works. The old mill was enlarged, and the name “Rockburn” was given to it when run as a cotton-mill. Joseph Bringhurst afterward turned it into a carding-mill. Spindle-making was later carried on in it by John Schofield, of the Cross-Keys Tavern.

Federal Hill, or Bellevue, was originally the home of Bancroft Woodcock, an Englishman who was a silversmith in the town as early as 1765. Though a conservative and somewhat austere member of the Society of Friends, he was known as the best skater in all the country round-about. In mid-winter, even when he had attained the age of three-score years, his familiar tall, slim form was seen to glide over the glassy surface to the admiration of all spectators. He was also noted as a pedestrian, and when he moved to Redstone, then in the backwoods of Pennsylvania, about 1800, he would walk seventeen miles from his home to the meeting-house. Dr. James Tilton bought the Bellevue property and gave it the name of Federal Hill for the reason that it was one of the sites considered by the committee of Congress appointed to select the location of the national capital. They eventually fixed upon Washington, but the Tilton place was much admired by them. The view from the cupola of the old mansion extends over the city of Wilmington, reaches Philadelphia, and stretches away to New Jersey on the east and touches the Maryland boundary on the south. In 1802 Dr. Tilton built the big house, thirty-eight feet square, and in 1808 planted large chestnut trees around it, some of which are now standing. Charles W. Howland has been the owner of this property since 1852, and in 1856 remodeled it as it now stands.

Monckton Park, afterwards called Eden Park, was another of the old-time country seats adjacent to Wilmington. Before the Revolution it was owned by Mr. Haines, an Englishman of wealth, largely engaged in trading with foreign ports. His business centered in Philadelphia and he spent much time in the West Indies. Monckton Park was his summer home and he usually came here on horseback. He took an interest in public improvement and was the first person to propose the erection of mile-stones in New Castle County, and with others had them placed along the road between Wilmington and Red Lion. He was an intimate friend of Robert Morris, the celebrated financier of the Revolution, and with him and others founded the Bank of North America. Although of English birth, he was a friend of the American cause when it was not known which country would triumph. He was one of the most exact men of his day in his business as well as in his home. Late one evening, just he was completing an invoice for the cargo of a vessel to sail the next day, a drop of ink fell upon the paper and he spent the remainder of the night re-copying it. He wore large metal buttons on his coat, fashionable in that day. These he covered with tissue paper, every night before going to bed, that they might be protected from rust. On one occasion, during the prevalence of the small-pox, he was compelled to make a business trip to Boston on horseback. He related that at every place where he stopped over-night he was placed in a smoke-house and thoroughly smoked before he could enter the town.

After the declaration of peace in 1783 Mr. Haines returned to England. His youngest daughter married Henry Physick, who bought the Governor Dickinson mansion. Robert Morris purchased Monckton Park and lived there during the summer months. In 1800 it was bought by Peter Bauduy, who changed the name to Eden Park. Bauduy was Carlos de Viny, aged sixty-five years. She was buried in the Old Swedes' church-yard, and her grave is not designated.

Cool Spring is the name of the stone mansion at the brow of the hill near the reservoir. It was the country-seat of Cesar A. Rodney, nephew of Cesar Rodney, the "signer," a Congressman and the last of six attorneys-general in the Cabinet of President Jefferson. The vessel which took his library and household furniture to Washington was wrecked and the goods much damaged. This prevented his family from going to the national capital. He remained in the Cabinet to the end of Jefferson's term. Soon afterwards he went to South America with Dr. Baldwin, the botanist. He was sent as minister of the United States government to the Argentine Republic, and sailed in the frigate "Congress" under Commodore Biddle. He died while there and his family returned home in 1824. Cool Spring is still owned by the Rodneys.

Kentmere, near the Riddle Mills on the Brandywine, was the location of some of the first factories and flour-mills. Joshua and Thomas Gilpin had their paper-mills there in 1787, the first to manufacture paper by means of revolving cylinders. They had a foundry near by, at which they constructed their own machinery. The erection of these mills and the improvements to 1838 cost $850,000. In 1831 they provided Matthew Carey & Son, of Philadelphia, with paper for printing a large edition of Lavoisier's Celebrated Atlas. Their mills soon become widely known and the new process was destined to entirely revolutionize the business of making paper in this country. The difficulties which followed were very discouraging. Others were envious of the probable success of the new invention, and obtained information of the process from some of the employees of these mills. By these means sufficient knowledge was gained to secure a patent and make similar machinery by avoiding infringement of Gilpin's patent. By the year 1825 the improved machinery was introduced into the paper-mills at Springfield, Massachusetts, and soon thereafter into other paper-mills throughout the country, and the prestige of the invention was never properly credited to Thomas Gilpin.

The great flood of February 22, 1822, when the Brandywine rose twenty feet above its banks, took away the dam, destroyed the races and badly injured much of the machinery and some of the buildings of these mills, and in April, 1825, one of the buildings and its valuable machinery were destroyed by fire. By the freshet of 1838 still greater damage was done and the bridges immediately below were carried away. The Gilpins owned and conducted the paper-mills for half a century, when the business was discontinued and the property sold to a company that spent five hundred thousand dollars in improvements. Large quantities of bank-note paper were also made here. Thomas Gilpin resided most of the year in Philadelphia, but spent part of each summer at the mills in a pleasant cottage. On a more elevated portion, surrounded by a forest, was the house of John Gilpin. He called it Kentmere. In it he entertained his numerous friends who frequently visited him. He died here in 1841. The large stone house opposite the mill was occupied by Lawrence Greatrake, manager of the establishment. The buildings after their sale by the Gilpins were turned into cotton-mills.

Rokeby was a cotton factory on the Brandywine near the old wire bridge, established by Louis McLane about 1815. It was formerly one of the leading grist-mills of the vicinity and was owned for nearly half a century by Vincent Gilpin, a very worthy citizen of Wilmington. Rumford Dawes' spinning-mill was near here. It was afterwards bought by the Du Ponts for fifty thousand dollars, and they erected powder-mills on the sites. Jacob Broom, in 1735, built the first cotton-mill in the vicinity. It was considered a wonderful enterprise. He put up a large mansion in the vicinity, which was afterwards owned by Dr. Smith. In 1785 William Young, a Scotchman in the book business in Philadelphia, erected a paper-mill. He built a house for religious worship about the same time. The floor was of solid rock. He also erected for himself a mansion and then called the place Rockland. He was the chief director of the Wilmington Steamboat Company, which ran a line of boats to Philadelphia. Near the Lancaster road is a stone house of historic interest, which for some years was the residence of Louis de Tousard, a French officer who came to this country with the troops of his nation to assist the Americans. In 1793 he removed to a farm, where he covered the walls of his house with canvas, on which some of his guests painted landscape scenes. Madame Tousard died on this farm in 1794. Her remains were interred in Old Swedes Church-yard.

On Sixth Street near French was the little stone dwelling once inhabited by the Marquise de Sourci and her ingenious son. She was a refugee from the Reign of Terror in France in 1792, and arrived at Wilmington impoverished and infirm. Her countrymen relieved her necessities until her boy grew up and was able to support her. From the fruit of the dwarf-gourd, that grew in the yard of their home, he made boxes, that, when varnished and carved by his dexterous hand, found ready sale. He constructed toys for the children and found much profit in making an automatic grasshopper of wood and whalebone. Then he built a boat for himself and ferried sand and gravel from the New Jersey shores for the Wilmington builders. This proved a lucrative business, but during a storm his boat capsized, and young De Sourci was lost, and his body never recovered. His mother died soon afterward and was buried in the Old Swedes' Church-yard.

INCIDENTS IN WILMINGTON HISTORY.—The 22d of February, 1800, was a warm, pleasant day. It was the sixty-ninth anniversary of the birth of Washington, who died on the 14th of December, preceding. The members of the Society of the Cincinnati, in Delaware, had arranged for a funeral procession in his honor, through the streets of Wilmington, on that day. Gunning Bedford was master of ceremonies, assisted by Major Case, of the regular army, who commanded a detachment then quartered in the town. The procession was formed in front of the Town Hall, with a military band, followed by the soldiers of the regular army, the Society of the Cincinnati and the Masons; then came nine young ladies to represent the Muses, sixteen ladies to represent the sixteen States which then composed the Union. The ladies were dressed in white, with short sleeves, long kid gloves, little muslin hats turned up at the side, blue kid slippers and a red sash of broad ribbon over the right shoulder tied in a bow on the left side, and the name of the State represented in gilt letters in front. Virginia led the Southern and Delaware the Northern States. Each lady held in her hand a sprig of laurel. Next came the members of the State Legislature, members of the bar and ministers of the gospel, followed by a large number of citizens. When the ceremonies were closed the sixteen ladies deposited the sprigs of laurel on the bier, which stood in front of the old academy, with the following words: “Sacred to the memory of Washington, I deposit this laurel as an emblem of his never-dying fame.”

One of the early celebrations of the 4th of July was held in 1794, at Cool Spring, where a thousand or more persons sat down to a bounteous dinner prepared by the industrious house-wives of the town and its vicinity. Many patriotic toasts were drunk, followed by the singing of national airs by the vast multitude, and the delivery of an oration suited to the occasion.

Many of the 4th of July celebrations after the Revolution were held in the Academy woods, then situated on the side of Market Street, above Eighth.

There was a very numerous assemblage of the citizens of Wilmington and vicinity at Cool Spring, near Wilmington, belonging to C. A. Rodney, July 4, 1808. On that “auspicious occasion” Doctor James Tilton was chosen president, Captain Patrick O'Flann, Major Peter Jacquett, Dr. A. Alexander, Andrew Reynolds, George Clark, Capt. James Campbell, vice-presidents. One hundred and fifty persons sat down to a table prepared by David Brinton at his tavern. Turtle soup from a sea-turtle weighing one hundred pounds, cold rounds of beef and ham were served at one dollar for each man. Numerous toasts were responded to, and the day was spent in general rejoicing.

Michael Wolf was quite a character in Wilmington. He was born in 1736, and for more than a half-century sold cakes through the streets. He died in 1825.
French Kellum was in the colonial navy during the Revolution. In 1788 he sailed for the West Indies in a merchantman. He was gone two years and was supposed to be dead, but returned to Wilmington and fell into the well at his house while trying to make his toilet preparatory to discovering himself to his family.

Archibald Hamilton Rowan, one of the most noted Irish refugees who came to America, had a peculiarly romantic career. As a leader of the Society of United Irishmen in his native land, he sturdily fought the union of England and Ireland, and favored the establishment of the Irish Republic. He was arrested on charges of treason to the King and imprisoned in Dublin. His wife was allowed the privilege of visiting him, and she smuggled into his cell a woman's dress, clad in which he escaped from the jail. A reward of ten thousand pounds was offered by the government for his recapture; but he reached the French shore in a fisherman’s boat, and in a few months later crossed the ocean. In 1790 he came to Wilmington and was given a home by Thomas Armor.
His troubles, however, had turned his disposition toward the life of a recluse, and he took up his abode in a cabin on the Brandywine, where his only compatriots were his dogs “Sallie” and “Charles,” named for the wife and child he had left in Europe. He had a small business—printing and dyeing calico—that rendered him sufficient income for his modest wants. In 1802 amnesty was granted him by the King of England, and he returned to his Irish home and his valuable family estate, which yielded a large income. He was visited there in succeeding years by friends who had known him in his days of adversity in America, and to whom he delighted in extending the most generous of Irish hospitality. When he built a new mansion upon his property he named one of his reception-rooms “Wilmington.”

Rev. Lawrence Girelius, who left Wilmington in 1791, was the last of the Swedish pastors of the Old Swedes’ Church. There were no religious services in the Scandinavian tongue in or near Wilmington from that date until 1849, when Rev. Mr. Unonius became pastor of the Swedes in Trinity Chapel. In 1883 the Methodists founded a Swedish mission on Haskell Street, among some new immigrants to Wilkinson.

John Thelwell, the town bellman and clerk of the market, was widely known in 1780, and on one occasion, as he was making his rounds of the market, he found a woman selling butter in “pound cakes” of twelve ounces each. He told her that sixteen ounces made a pound in Delaware, and proceeded to confiscate all her produce for violation of the law.
In the altercation which followed, the woman struck him in the eye with a print of the butter, and disap-ppeared before he recovered his sight. He was town bellman over thirty years. Thelwell was one of the founders of the Asbury Methodist Episcopal Church, and one of its first exhorters. He was a teacher and taught at the foot of Quaker Hill in a small log house. Afterwards the burgesses allowed him to use as a school-room, their own building over the Second Street Market.

Anna Dorothea Vertz, known as “Dutch Dolly,” had a vegetable garden at Sixth and King Streets.
Her husband was a tailor called “Frederick the Great, fortune-teller.” He predicted events by the stars.

Louis Philippe, in 1798, as the banished Duke of Orleans, spent considerable time in Wilmington with the French émigrés. He succeeded to his title on the execution of his father in 1792, during the French Revolution. For participating with his father in the battles of Valmy and Jemmapes, he was exiled. In America he remained several months, sustaining himself part of the time teaching languages and mathematics. Subsequently he became the wealthiest man in France, was declared King in 1830, and continued until 1848, when the Second Republic was established.

Prospect Hill, north of Wilmington, was the home of Joshua North during the Revolution, but he was a Tory and fled the country for safety. The property soon afterwards was owned by Rev. Dr. Wharton, who succeeded Rev. Dr. Girelius as rector of Old Swedes’ Church. He removed to Burlington, New Jersey.

Fairfield, near the site of the Old Cranehook Church, was the residence of Dr. Alexander, a surgeon in the army during the Revolution.

William Hemphill was born in Belfast, Ireland, January 4, 1743. His father was engaged largely in the linen business. He came to America about the age of fifteen years, landed at New York, and there obtained a situation in a mercantile house. Thence he removed to Philadelphia, and afterwards to Wilkinson, where he became one of the prominent business men. He engaged in the shipping business several years, and then entered into partnership with Robert Ralston, of Philadelphia, who was one of the most enterprising business men of that city. The ships of this firm traded with the West Indies, France, Ireland and China. Mr. Hemphill took the oath of allegiance to the United States government, May 6, 1778. He became a large land-holder in Wilkinson, and was interested in, and contributed much to, its business prosperity. He married Elizabeth Allison, of Wilkinson, May 22, 1770. Their children were James, William, Sarah, Mary, Elizabeth and John.
He died February 10, 1829, and was buried in the cemetery of the First Presbyterian Church of Wilkinson.

John James Ullman, a native of Strasbourg, France, educated at the University of Paris, settled in Wilkinson in 1791. He had lived many years in India, and was celebrated as a traveler and a linguist.
While here he was reputed worth a million dollars.
He died of apoplexy in 1811, aged fifty-seven years, and his tomb is in the French corner of the Old Swedes’ Church-yard.
Joseph Shallcross, a Revolutionary patriot, purchased a large tract of land beyond Cool Spring, in 1750, for $500. He lived in a stone house near Cool Spring. He was a leading shipping merchant of Wilmington.

Joseph Springer lived and died in a log cabin near the Lancaster road. He was a son of Carl Christopher Springer, an educated Swede with a romantic history, who went to London with the Swedish ambassador, was "Shanghaied" and brought to Virginia, where he was sold into servitude for five years. After working out his time he came to Wilmington. His son Joseph became a farmer and gardener, and lived to the age of ninety-two years.

Commodore Perry, the hero of Lake Erie, stopped in Wilmington, February 4, 1814, on his way from Philadelphia to Baltimore. He traveled in a "private four-in-hand," and took dinner at the Indian King Inn, southeast corner of Fourth and Market, then kept by David Brinton. It was soon after he gained his brilliant victory on the lake, and there was an imposing demonstration in his honor the next day in Baltimore.

An elegant banquet was given to Hon. Louis McLane, in the Town Hall, July 28, 1829, by the citizens of Wilmington. It was the day before his departure for Europe as minister of England. Gen. John Caldwell presided, and Richard H. Bayard was vice-president. Among the distinguished guests present was Martin Van Buren, then Secretary of State in Andrew Jackson's Cabinet. Alexander Porter, of the Indian Queen Hotel, prepared the feast.

Dr. Daniel Bancroft, with his brother, discovered the process of making quercitron, or dye from black oak bark, in 1787, and several years afterward lived in the building on West Street now owned by the heirs of Benjamin Ferris. He was born in Boston and spent the most of his early life in England. While in Wilmington he was engaged in the export trade and was the first person to ship quercitron from America to England, or any foreign country. It was made near Wilmington.

Dr. John Vaughan, in June, 1802, introduced the practice of vaccination in Wilmington.

Peter Davis was the first to sell ice to the people of Wilmington, in 1802. Benjamin Webb moved to Wilmington from Chester County, Pa., at a later period, and sold ice on a more extended scale for many years. He owned several tracts of land in the vicinity. In 1836 he became very much interested in the cultivation of the milk mulberry trees, planting several acres with them on his farm near town.

Bache and Todd in 1803 announced that they "have a physiognomist whereby any person may have four correct likenesses in profile taken for 25 cents without any part of the machine passing over the face, at McLean's tavern Sign of the Buck, on Market Street." (now Sharp's Hotel).

In 1800 John LaTorr, one of the first dentists in town, with an office four doors below southeast corner of Fourth and Market Streets, announced that he "would cleanse teeth and set artificial teeth with enamel." He had Bruff's patented, perpendicular instruments for extracting teeth. Henry Tonveille, from Paris, was the next dentist in Wilmington.

John Chandler, on Market Street opposite the Academy, in 1797, advertised as a likeness-painter in miniature by a new method of his own invention.

S. Dewey, in 1814, at the corner of Market and Third Streets, made "profile likenesses, plain or in colors."

Frederick Shraeder, in 1808, at his residence corner of Sixth and West Streets, opened "a mead and flower garden with a number of small summer houses for the accommodation and amusement of genteel company."

Charles Tatem, born in Virginia, learned the trade of a blacksmith in Wilmington, and in 1818 moved to the forming of powder-mills at Dupont's, near Baltimore. The powder-mills were first located near the ponding-mill. Several workmen were employed there when one of them noticed a spark of fire on the sleeves of another. The man who made the discovery ran out to the bridge over the mill race and threw the ponding-mill into the water, dragging another workman with him. These were the only two saved at the immediate scene of the explosion. The ponding-mill blew up and covered the grinding-house and magazine with a shower of fire. The magazine, a stone structure, built on solid rock, was distant two hundred and fifty yards. It exploded a half hour later, and the report from the thirty-five tons of powder stored in it was heard as far as Lancaster, a distance of forty miles. Thirty-six workmen were killed and four received mortal injuries. All of the buildings in the vicinity of the mill, including Mr. Dupont's residence, were badly damaged, and the shock produced such a panic that many persons temporarily abandoned their homes. Mr. E. I. Dupont was not at home, but on his return he observed the widows of the victims at his own expense and clothed and educated their children. The loss by the explosion was thirty thousand dollars. Mr. Delmas, brother-in-law of Mr. Dupont, had his shoulder dislocated. Marshal and Colonel Grouchy were guests of Mr. Dupont's family, and by their presence of mind and bravery prevented greater loss of life and property. Referring to them a Philadelphia paper said:

"These distinguished strangers were on a visit to their friend, Mr. Victor Dupont, and were preparing to go out on a shooting party when the awful explosion of the powder works on the Brandywine took place. Upon the first alarm they rushed out with others to the scene to afford whatever assistance circumstances and has a broad bottom, the creek where the magazine blew up, spreading destruction in all quarters. A workman at the elbow of Colonel Grouchy was killed by a fragment of a brick house which fell through his body from the roof of the house at the Marshal's feet; they, however, both escaped unhurt. It was supposed that all the buildings in this quarter had been destroyed by the first explosion, as they appeared to be all in flames, but it was presently pointed out to them by one of the surviving workmen that the drying-house (in which they perceived through a window there was a considerable quantity of powder) had not yet caught fire."

"There was time enough for escape from all danger from this building, but they sought safety by flight; but with that decision and promptness in action which distinguishes truly brave men, they instantly seized axes and commenced cutting and tearing away a kind of a bridge or platform which communicated with all the buildings and was then in flames, and which in a few minutes more must have set fire to the drying house. Their example and encouragement drew others to the spot, and after great exertions, with the aid of water buckets, the fire here stopped. Had this building blown up, the refinery and other buildings on the right of the creek, which had escaped from the explosion of the magazine, together with the cloth manufactory on the left, with what remained of the dwellings of the Mr. Duponts, would, in all probability, have been entirely destroyed, and with these buildings the houses occupied by the wives and children of the workmen."

In February, 1823, an explosion occurred at the Eden Park Powder Mills, south of the Christians, resulting in the death of twelve persons. On April 14, 1847, nineteen men were killed by an explosion at Dupont's mills, and their remains so scattered that the number of victims could only be ascertained by calling the roll of employees.

During the fire in the afternoon of May 5, 1843, three five-horse wagons loaded with powder from Dupont's powder works exploded in the streets of Wilmington, while in transit to the wharf for shipment. The wagons, horses and contents were blown to pieces, and five tons of powder contributed to the work of destruction. The disaster occurred on Fourteenth Street near Tatnall and Market Streets. The residence of Bishop Lee was to Cincinnati, where he became a leading citizen. He owned a large foundry and machine-shop. He died May 29, 1845.

Isaac Kendall was well known to the boys who went swimming in the Brandywine about 1820. He was called at this time “Old Isaac,” and lived many years later to teach the boys how to swim, and that, too, without charge. He lived in a little cabin near the old barley-mill, along the Brandywine, and was most happy when a dozen or more youths of the town were his visitors and companions. They pasted the walls of his home with pictures, which delighted him.

Jonas Pusey moved from London Grove, Chester County, Pa., in 1826, and resided on the north side of Tenth Street, second door west of Market. He was not then a man of means, but soon became an enterprising and public-spirited citizen. He was the first treasurer of the Savings Fund Society, and filled many other positions of trust and responsibility. Lea Pusey, his brother, came to Wilmington about the same time. He was a man of fine literary taste, and knew most of the poems of Burns by heart. Both the brothers were conveyancers. After 1837, Jonas Pusey moved to Seventh Street, and later lived in the bank building. He died October 4, 1851. Pennock Pusey, a prominent citizen of Minnesota, is his son.

Don C. Hall was the first barber in Wilmington who advertised his business. It was in 1829 that he announced that he would “shave the gentry of the town once each day, for $2.50 a quarter, and $1.50 per quarter, 3 times a week.”

Blythe’s circus exhibited at Cross Keys Tavern in 1839, and in 1837 for two weeks in the yard of General Wolf’s Tavern, at Third and Market Streets. A circus exhibited at the corner of Seventh and Market Streets, on October 3, 1830. Malcolm & Howe’s menagerie and circus spent one week at Fourth and French Streets in 1846.

The woolly horse captured by General Fremont in New Mexico in 1847, was exhibited in Wilmington in 1860, and considered a great curiosity. It was with Van Amburgh’s circus.

A locomotive built in Wilmington in 1834, under the direction of E. A. Young, chief engineer of the New Castle and Frenchtown Railroad, on June 13th of that year, was put into successful operation on that road. It passed over twenty-five feet ascent per mile, near Frenchtown, at twelve miles per hour. Young was a native of Norfolk, Virginia. This was the first railroad engine in successful operation in Delaware.

In 1835 a man in South Carolina owed Thomas Garrett, of Wilmington, a considerable sum of money for manufactured products shipped to him. Being unable to pay the debt in cash, he proposed to give in exchange for it a supply of morus multicaulis, or silk mulberry trees, which were then being profitably cultivated in his State. The proposition was accepted, and Thomas Garrett planted them on seven acres of his land south of the Christiana.

At this time silk-growing became a mania throughout all the Middle and Northern States. In the autumn of 1845 Thomas Garrett sold the cuttings on the ground for $7500. The purchaser sold them to another for $10,000, he to a third for $12,000, he to a fourth for $15,000, and the last buyer paid $18,000 for them. By this time the morus multicaulis fever had abated, and the trees were still on the ground untouched.

A silk farm was established three miles from Wilmington, along the Concord turnpike, where mulberry trees were cultivated and a large cocoonery started. As late as 1845 the crop reports show that five thousand five hundred pounds of cocoons were raised in Delaware during the year 1845.

Joseph Wiggleworth, in 1837, owned the “Wilmington Museum,” at No. 15 East Second Street. It was a rare collection of curiosities. In 1838 he received one thousand birds from London on the ship “St. James,” of New York. In 1840 he had a very fine collection of birds, insects, animals and wax figures.

Betty’s Hollow was well-known to the school-boys of 1840. “Old Betty” lived alone in a half tumbled down frame house in this hollow, across which was a path leading to the skating place on the Brandywine by the site of the barley mill. She kept chickens and ducks in great numbers, and they were her companions. She had no use for boys. They believed her to be a witch. The depression surrounding her cabin became known as “Betty’s Hollow,” and the boys changed the path to the skating park so as to run south of her abode. She lived to old age and made a little money by telling fortunes.

William Seal, for many years an influential citizen of Wilmington, died September 20, 1942, aged sixty-six years. He filled many offices of public trust with faithfulness and ability. He was president of the Bank of Wilmington and Brandywine, and president of the Delaware Fire Insurance Company until the time of his death.

Arunah S. Abell, now (1888) the aged and honored proprietor of The Sun, published at Baltimore, Md., was the pioneer in the use of the “pony express,” by which he anticipated all his contemporaries in announcing the exciting news of the day. He established relays of fleet ponies from Halifax and Portland, Me., to Baltimore, Maryland, to convey the news brought by steamers from Europe. Fifty hours was the time in which the thousand miles were passed. The little Sun penny sheet then, as now, proved itself to be the peer in enterprise of the New York press, and far beyond its "blanket sheet" contemporaries in all that push and pluck which the modern newspaper requires.

Mr. Abell was the master mind also in organizing an overland express for the transmission of news from the battle-fields of Mexico, in 1846, across the continent to the news-rooms of The Sun, in Baltimore, and The Ledger in Philadelphia, of which latter paper he was one of the founders and part owner. This overland express consisted of "sixty bloomed horses," and cost over one thousand dollars a month. It almost invariably anticipated the great Southern mail from New Orleans by thirty hours, and kept the government at Washington advised of every important event transpiring at the seat of war, and thereby served the entire press of the country. Mr. Abell was also the pioneer in utilizing the "carrier pigeon express" to Baltimore, and the newly-invented magnetic telegraph found in him a liberal patron. As a matter of scientific history, it may be added that the first Presidential message ever transmitted by telegraph appeared in the columns of The Sun on May 11, 1846. Mr. Abell in the sole surviving member of the firm which established and created two of the greatest and most prosperous newspapers in this country—The Sun in Baltimore, Md., and The Ledger in Philadelphia,—both of which have a large circulation in Delaware, and command the respect and confidence of the public. In a ripe old age, Mr. A. S. Abell enjoys the confidence, respect and affection which a long and useful life merits. His hand has never been missing from The Sun, and he has kept it abreast of every change which the publication of a great newspaper demands. In 1857, Mr. Abell associated with him in the management of The Sun, his three sons,—George W., Edward F. and Walter Abell,—who are striving to do their responsible work for the public with conscience and common sense, honest purpose and clean hands.

The pony express established by A. S. Abell, about 1846, were largely looked to by the newspapers of Delaware for the exciting news of the day. The messages of the President were obtained in this way for early publication. It is astonishing how rapidly news was carried by these expert riders, who had frequent relays of horses. One of the most remarkable instances occurred on April 2, 1846. The rider for The Sun and also for the Delaware Republican left Philadelphia fifteen minutes past two o'clock in the afternoon, and arrived in Wilmington twenty minutes before four o'clock, traveling the distance, twenty-eight miles, in one hour and twenty-five minutes. The rider of The Sun and the Delaware Journal on the same day left Philadelphia at half-past two o'clock, and arrived in Wilmington ten minutes before four o'clock, making the distance in one hour and twenty minutes. The news they brought on this occasion was from Europe, and related to the Oregon Question on the controversy between the United States and England, regarding the northwest boundary line.

The Delaware Journal, on April 10, 1846, issued an extra with news from Europe sent by telegraph from New York to Philadelphia, and brought from the last-named city to Wilmington and Baltimore, for the papers above named, by pony express. This was soon after the declaration of war between the United States and Mexico, and the news brought explained the attitude of foreign governments toward the bellicose countries.

The Telegraph.—Cyrus Abbott, of Wilmington, on January 23, 1846, contracted to construct the first telegraph line between Philadelphia and Wilmington. On March 23d, following, the posts were all erected, and the wires placed in position as far as Chester, Pa. The wires were stretched to Wilmington, and the telegraph put in operation on April 13, 1846. The line was tested the day following. The Delaware Journal, in its issue of April 17th, says:

"The telegraph has been in successful operation for the past few days and a number of persons have examined its operation on Tuesday afternoon. Through the kindness of its gentlemanly agent at the station, Joseph Beatty, we witnessed the performance of this highway of thought. The miles of the afternoon Board of Brokers, at Philadelphia, were ordered and in a short time the whole proceedings were here. We sent to Philadelphia the late news from Washington received by mail, on Tuesday afternoon, and it was published in the same day's edition of the Evening News of that city. The charges are 12c. for ten words."

On May the 26th the same paper contained the following:

"The line between Philadelphia and Baltimore was completed and tested this week. The whole line of posts, one hundred miles, was completed in 35 days. Between Wilmington and Philadelphia a newly adopted iron cord, instead of the single wire, commonly used, has been put into successful operation. This iron cord was made at a wire factory in New Jersey."

"The only link now wanting in the great chain of the electric telegraph between Washington and Boston through Wilmington, is the distance from Bridgeport to New Haven, Connecticut. When this great scheme is completed it will make the Union a whispering gallery and re-echo through the country with instantaneous speed from one extreme to the other."

The line from Washington to Boston was completed June 23, 1846. The first telegraph office in Wilmington was in the second story of the Wilson Building, corner of Fifth and Market Streets. The telegraph line down the Peninsula to Dover and Milford was completed in 1848. The telegraph office at the corner of Fifth and Market Streets was moved to the central building, corner Front and King Streets, on June 12, 1848.

Banes' Telegraph Line was completed between Baltimore and Wilmington May 27, 1849. It was afterwards the North American Telegraph Line.

The third of a class of new passenger coaches for the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad Company, made by Betts, Harlan & Hollingsworth, was first placed on the road June 19, 1848, for the accommodation of the Asbury Sunday School, on an excursion to the Susquehanna River. The cars were fifty feet long, eight feet eight inches wide. They were one-third longer than any cars previously used on the same road. They had two apartments, one for ladies and one for gentlemen, and were provided with a sofa and mirrors. The seats were of crimson velvet.

The railroad company, on June 20, 1848, bought of J. & J. W. Duncan, for fifteen thousand dollars, seven acres of the old ferry property, as a site for a new station. J. W. Duncan, the next year, moved to Chicago to engage in the lumber business. J. & J. A. Harris completed their marine railway in 1850.

On the day the cars first came to Wilmington, an old gentleman passed up Market Street after having seen the train, informing every one that he had heard Oliver Evans, the inventor, tell his father, many years before, that it would only be a few hours' journey from Philadelphia to Baltimore, and that carriages would be invented to go without horses. When the prediction was made, it is said a Quaker stepped up and said, "Oliver, I always thought thy brain was a little cracked, and now I know it!"

A church stood at the corner of Third and Tatnall Streets, on a site procured on ground rent from Mr. Hallowell, and the lease expired Thursday night November 25, 1849. The trustees wanted to buy the land, but the owner asked an extravagant price, and at the last minute announced that he would claim the building after the lease expired. The bellman was sent through the town to proclaim the removal, and just before midnight a large crowd collected and removed it, amidst great excitement.

David C. Wilson in 1846 bought twenty acres of land, for three thousand eight hundred dollars, opposite the old Cross Keys Tavern, which was situated on what is now the southwest corner of Brandywine Cemetery, laid it out into streets and lots, and called it Washington. It is now part of the city of Wilmington.

Charles J. Du Pont & Co. in 1846 exhibited at the National Fair at Washington, cloths, cassimeres and kerseys of their own manufacture. The government then ordered sixty thousand yards of kerseys and twenty thousand yards of blue cloth for the army during the Mexican War.

Large brickyards were operated in Wilmington in 1846 by D. C. Wilson, Evan Coxe, Samuel McCaulley, Jacob Rice, William Lovell and Washington Moore. During that year nine million bricks were made, and thirteen million in 1848. McCaulley & Rice in 1848 built a brick-making machine, propelled by steam. It cost ten thousand dollars and made twenty-five thousand bricks a day.

Superior cloths were made at the Wilmington mills early in the present century. When the War of 1812 opened, exportation of goods was cut off. The chief market then was Philadelphia, but some of the merchants of that city claimed that American cloths were inferior to the foreign. An English agent took the entire supply of goods then on hand in Wilmington, shipped them to Philadelphia and disposed of them there as English goods. It was a clever trick and made the cloths of the Wilmington mills popular before it was discovered. Large quantities of them were sold soon after this event.

In 1846 there were two lines of steamboats running between Wilmington and Philadelphia. Competition was lively, and the fare was put down to twenty-five cents. The railroad reduced the fare to twelve and a half cents. The boats, to meet this, for a time charged but ten cents.

In 1866 there were 160 persons in Wilmington between 75 and 102 years old; 14 were over 90 years. David Hammond was 102.

Henry Herz, composer and pianist to the King of France and professor in the Royal Conservatory of Paris, with Signora Pico, of the Italian Opera of Milan, and Savoni the violinist, gave a concert in the City Hall, December 7, 1846. Says a local journal: "There never was so swell an audience in Wilmington before. The ladies were dressed in opera style, and there was a brilliant array of beauty and fashion."

Charles Grobe, of Wilmington, in 1847, wrote a piece of music entitled "Buena Vista," named in honor of General Taylor's famous victory over the Mexicans. "Old Rough and Ready" sent a glowing compliment to the composer after he heard it played.

Adams Express Company opened its first office in Wilmington, December 12, 1847. J. Shaw was the first agent. William F. O'Daniel in 1850 sold the first sewing-machines in Wilmington.

Lieutenant Joseph Roberts, of Wilmington, was in all the leading engagements of the Florida War. Soon after its close he was made Assistant Professor of Natural Philosophy in West Point Military Academy, until 1848, when he was appointed a captain in the Fourth Regiment of the United States Artillery.

Dr. A. H. Grimshaw was appointed surgeon of the Fourth Regiment of Delaware Militia in 1848.

William Holland in 1848 was appointed an engineer in the United States navy, and Lieutenant Colonel Graham, in 1850, was detailed by the War Department to assist in running the northwest boundary line of the United States. Both were from Wilmington.

He was one of the "forty-niners" in California.

Midshipman Charles Bayard, son of Richard H. Bayard, died at Naples, March 20, 1850. A few days before his death, while visiting Mount Vesuvius, he passed down into its crater where an unexpected eruption of the volcano occurred. Huge stones were thrown up in the air; one falling struck him in the right side of his body. His right arm was amputated after which there were hopes of his recovery, but the injury proved fatal.

In 1852, William S. Anderson, son of Daniel B. Anderson, of Wilmington, colored, when quite a young man went to the Republic of Liberia, in Africa. He possessed remarkable intelligence and soon gained a good reputation and exercised a commanding influence among the people of his race in that country. After a few years of residence there he was elected speaker of the lower branch of the National Legislature. He served one term in that position and then was elected by the government of Liberia to negotiate a five hundred thousand dollar loan in England. Soon after accomplishing this he visited his parents in Wilmington. He then left the public service and engaged in mercantile business and accumulated considerable property. On the 14th of September, 1872, he was assassinated in Monrovia, the capital of the country, by a political opponent. He died on the 27th of the same month in his forty-third year. It is said he was the ablest colored man Delaware has produced.

William R. Sellers, a gentleman well-known in Delaware, died May 1, 1855. He was a soldier in the war of 1812, represented the First Ward in City Council for many years and was president of that body from 1843 to 1849. He re-modelled and put in shape the vessels of the Wilmington Whaling Company. He planned all the vessels for Thomas Young & Co., and E. & C. Moore, for fifteen years, and is one of the best informed persons on ship-building, in the country.

Dell Noblit, who on account of having lived the age of 100 years, was somewhat a historic personage in Wilmington. He was born in Middletown, Delaware county, Pennsylvania, October 16, 1777, of French Huguenot parents. He moved to Wilmington, in 1810. He was twice married, and was father of sixteen children.

Hon. Henry Wilson, in October, 1856, in the City Hall of Wilmington, addressed the first Republican meeting, held in the State of Delaware. He was then United States Senator from Massachusetts, and afterwards vice-president during Grant's second administration. This speech was delivered during the candidacy of General Fremont as the first nominee of the Republican party, for President of the United States, against James Buchanan, Democrat who was elected Delaware that year cast but three hundred votes for Fremont, known in campaign history as "the immortal three hundred." Wilson afterwards reminded a distinguished Delaware statesman, that he received exactly three hundred electoral votes when he was chosen Vice-President.

The only time that Andrew Johnson paid his respects to Wilmington people was on the occasion of his tour of the States, in the Spring of 1866. He was accompanied by William H. Seward, Secretary of State, and General Grant, then Secretary of War. The President made a brief speech, from the platform of the car, while the train was standing at the depot.

General Grant made a visit to Wilmington on Thursday, February 3, 1873, a month previous to his second inauguration as President of the United States. The city put on her holiday attire, and interest and enthusiasm knew no bounds. Mayor Simms, a committee of City Council and a committee of citizens went to Perryville to meet him. As the train was crossing the State line, the mayor, in behalf of the committees, received the President in a glowing speech. He came here to take a view at the industrial establishments of the city, and in response spoke as follows:

"It gives me the greatest pleasure that I have this opportunity of visiting Wilmington, the chief city of the State of Delaware, and noted throughout the Union for her manufacturing and commercial interests. Especially was the invitation to come interesting to me, since it was not a partisan one. I shall be delighted to visit your manufacturing establishments and accept the hospitalities of your people."

When the train, at 12:20 P.M., arrived at the station, the President and party, including George M. Robeson, Secretary of Navy, and George W. Childs, were escorted to the residence of Joshua T. Heald, at Delaware Avenue and Broome Street, where the distinguished party was waited upon by the Governor of Delaware and the members of the State Legislature. Miss Emma Worrell, in behalf of the ladies, presented General Grant with a beautiful bouquet "for his great act in excluding wine from his New Year's reception." At two o'clock the entire party started on a visit to the leading manufacturing establishments, and at 5:30 proceeded to Institute Hall, where four hundred persons partook of a banquet. At eight o'clock the President was escorted to the military fair in Masonic Temple. As he entered, the band struck up "Hail to the Chief." Thirty-seven young ladies, representing the States of the Union, formed in a semi-circle on the stage, and sang a patriotic air entitled "Welcome to the Chief." He proceeded to the stage and shook hands with each of the ladies, and then was introduced to hundreds of citizens by Ex-Mayor Valentine. At ten p.m. he became the guest of Joseph C. Grubb on King Street, and at 1 A.M. left in the train for Washington.

Auchenloss in Wilmington, who had previously spent some time in Brazil, in the interests of the Jackson & Sharp Company, and wrote a book describing the resources of that country. The emperor was met at the railroad by a delegation of manufacturers. He visited a number of the leading industrial establishments and some of the public schools, with the design of examining into their management for the purpose of introducing needed improvements in his own country. He returned to Philadelphia in the evening of the same day.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

WILMINGTON—(Continued).

PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS, ETC.

The Post-Office.—The present postal system was established in the year 1790, during the first term of President Washington's administration. In that year Joseph Brimhurst became the first post-master at Wilmington. He kept the office in a small room adjoining his drug store, on Market Street, below Third. Few letters and papers were received and few were sent, as the entire population of the town at that time did not exceed 2,500. Mails arrived daily from Philadelphia and Baltimore, and was brought by means of post-coaches. The amount required to send a letter depended upon the distance, and hence the postage was paid by the one who received the letter, ranging from five to twenty-five cents. Joseph Brimhurst held the office continuously from 1790 to 1823, a third of a century. His successor was Nicholas G. Williamson, a lawyer, who was appointed by President Monroe, and continued in office under John Quincy Adams, Andrew Jackson and Martin Van Buren, serving from 1823 to 1841, or eighteen years. While Williamson was post-master the office was kept at the Northwest corner of Third and Shipley Streets. When Harrison became President, in 1841, he appointed Jacob Alrich post-master. Alrich was an ardent Whig, had been a jeweller and machinist, and at the time of his appointment lived in a house opposite the site of the present courthouse. He moved the post-office to Cyrus Newlin's store, near the Delaware House. Upon the death of the President and the succession of Vice-President Tyler to the office, Alrich was removed and John McClung, a dry-goods merchant who had a store on Market Street, was appointed in his place. The office was removed April 1, 1842, to the Southwest corner of Third and Market Streets, where it continued until the Government building was erected, in 1855, at Sixth and King Streets. The chief clerk during McClung's term and for several years succeeding, was James A. Roche, a small man with a club foot, who was so familiar with the duties of the office and also very popular, that the public learned to think his services almost indispensable to the Wilmington Post-office.

When James K. Polk became President, in 1844, McClung retired and William R. Sellars was given the place. He was a prominent hatter, lived on Market Street, near Third, and held the office four years. The Whigs again came into power in national affairs under President Taylor, and appointed Henry H. J. Naef, editor of the Journal, postmaster at Wilmington. He was continued under Fillmore, serving until 1852. Franklin Pierce in that year gave the office to Dr. Henry F. Askew, a leading physician of the city, who was prominent as a local politician in the Democratic party. His chief clerk was John Otto. President Buchanan continued Askew until the opening of the Civil War, in 1861.

It was during Dr. Askew's term, in 1855, that the office was removed to the Government building on King Street. The appropriation for the building was obtained largely through the exertions of Hon. George Read Riddle, then a Representative in Congress from the city of Wilmington. His efforts were ably seconded by United States Senators James A. Bayard and Martin W. Bates. The site for the building was selected by Mr. Riddle. It was previously occupied by Moore's carriage works. The land was purchased May 27, 1858, for $3,500, the contract price for constructing the building being $29,234. The cost, however, before it was completed was $40,146.34; in 1869 certain improvements were added, making the entire cost of the building $45,400.29.

After an earnest and prolonged contest for the office of postmaster in 1861, President Lincoln appointed Dr. A. H. Grimeshaw, who immediately upon assuming the duties of office, selected an entire new force of employees. George D. Armstrong, at present (1888) cashier of the First National Bank, was given the position of assistant-postmaster, and Isaiah Thomas, previously a mail agent on the railroad, assistant clerk. There were then two carriers. On the death of President Lincoln and the succession of Andrew Johnson, another clean sweep was made of the Federal officers in Delaware. Captain Joseph M. Barr was made postmaster. He served until the beginning of the administration of General Grant, in 1869, when James Lewis received the appointment. He was removed in 1872, and William M. Pyle, who had been chief clerk in the office for several years, was given the position. He was reappointed by President Hayes, serving until May 11, 1882, when President Arthur appointed William Y. Swigget, previously a mail agent, who served four years. Robert H. Taylor, the present efficient postmaster, was appointed June 18, 1886, by President Cleveland.

There is a full force of assistants to manage the details of the office, and seventeen letter-carriers who deliver mail in all parts in the city four times each day. Their salary the first year is $900 and afterward $850 a year.

A site has been purchased at the Southwest corner of Ninth and Shipley Streets, upon which the United States Government is about to erect an elegant and costly Federal building, Congress having appropriated $150,000 for that purpose.

BOARD OF HEALTH.—A Board of Health for the borough of Wilmington was organized in 1798. Some of its original members were Drs. James Tilton, John Vaughan and Geo. Monroe, all of whom were eminent practitioners of medicine in their day. Some of the other early members were Joseph Shallcross, John Ferris, Gen. John Stockton, Jacob Broom, John Warner and Joseph Tatnall. As a body it did effective work during the prevalence of yellow fever here in 1798 when Dr. James Tilton was president. In 1802 during the prevalence of the yellow fever its members were James Brobson, president; Samuel Spackman, secretary; Allen McLane, Edward Worrell, Joshua Seal, John Warner, James Hemphill, Joseph Bailey and Dr. E. A. Smith, port physician.

In 1832 when the cholera prevailed, Willard Hall was president, William Magens secretary and the other members were Dr. W. W. Baker, William G. Jones, Joseph Bailey, Samuel McClary, Samuel Hilles, Washington Rice, John Wright, John Wales, Samuel Wollaston and Stephen Bonsall.

In 1858 the members were Dr. J. G. Barstow, president; Hanson Harman, secretary; Ziba Ferris, treasurer; Samuel Hilles, William Rice, Thomas Mahaffey, Dr. J. F. Heyward, John H. Barr, Henry Eckel, James Murdock, Abern Cloud, John Rudolph, Dr. Henry F. Askew and John W. Smith.

Under an ordinance of City Council passed April 15, 1865, the Board of Health was composed of two members from each ward in the city and the port physician. This rule was in force until 1881 when an act of Assembly was passed under which the Board is now composed of the port physician, two other physicians, one practical plumber and one general business man. All except the port physician are appointed annually by the mayor. The chief engineer of the Surveying Department is ex officio a member, without salary as such. The other members of the Board receive $100 each. The Board annually appoint two executive officers, one for the eastern and one for the western district, vested with police powers and receive $500. It is their duty to attend all meetings of the Board and to examine into the sanitary condition of all houses in that city.

The impurity of the water supplied to the city from the Brandywine was a subject of frequent discussion. In 1863 Dr. L. P. Bush, Obed Bailey, Edward Darlington, Henry Eckel, Joseph Richardson and William Canby, members of the Board, were appointed a committee to examine into it and reported the water to contain an undue amount of mineral and organic matter.

In 1881 Dr. L. Bush was president; Dr. James A. Draper, Edward F. Kane, plumber; John Otto, Jr., general business; Dr. Willard Springer, port physician; M. C. Conwell, chief engineer; E. B. Frazer, Secretary; G. B. Underwood, executive officer eastern district; A. V. Gaynor, executive officer western district. The work of this Board for the year 1881, according to the present report was arduous on account of the prevalence of small-pox. Prof. Leeds, of Brooklyn, analyzed the water of the Brandywine in 1882, when it showed a greater degree of impurity than ever before. This report was confirmed by an analysis made by Dr. J. H. J. Bush, the same year. The Board inspected the banks of the stream to the State line and had certain nuisances removed.

Drs. Draper and L. P. Bush and Mr. Otto were appointed to revise and condense the health laws.

Dr. E. G. Shortridge and Dr. I. W. Hazlett were elected assistant vaccine physicians. In relation to small-pox the Board this year required the isolation of all cases, private funerals, all houses where deaths occurred disinfected, and would not allow convalescent persons to leave their homes without permission from a physician.

In 1884, Dr. A. H. Grimshaw, Seth H. Feaster and Alfred Gawthrop, were the new members appointed. In 1886, James C. Van Trump as plumber was the new member. In 1886 Dr. James A. Draper was president, James H. Griffin treasurer, Edward F. Kane, Dr. Howard Ogle, Dr. Willard Springer and Fred H. Robinson the other members. William H. Lee was chosen secretary.

The act of Assembly, providing for the registration of births, deaths and marriages was passed March 15, 1881. Under it the City Council on July 18, of that year appointed E. B. Frazer, the first registrar for a term of five years, with a salary of eight hundred dollars per annum. This officer is also secretary of the board of health with an additional salary of three hundred per annum. William H. Lee succeeded as registrar in 1886.

THE WILMINGTON WATER DEPARTMENT.—On 31st day of December, 1796, Isaac Hendrickson and William Poole were appointed a committee by the Borough Council “to inquire of the inhabitants of Wilmington who own pumps, whether they would be willing to give them up to the Corporation, who will take care of them and keep them in order.” A few property-holders consented and this is the first reference in the borough records relating to water.

In 1800, an attempt was made by the Borough Council, to introduce water and John Way, John Jones and S. Nichols were appointed a committee “to examine into the propriety and expense of bringing water from the spring on the hill in Third Street near Tatnall, and conveying the water from Third down Market Street, to supply the town.” This committee estimated the cost for eight hundred and thirty-five feet of pump logs, and for digging and laying them in the ground, and a cistern containing thirty hogheads, would be $112 9s. and 11d. This effort to supply the town with water was, however, unsuccessful.

THE SPRING WATER COMPANY, was organized in 1803. The first directors were James Lea, William Robison, Peter Bauduy, Thomas Crow, John Sellars,
NEW CASTLE COUNTY.

Joseph Bailey, James Brobson, Jacob Alrichs, Samuel Nichols, Eli Mendenhall, Edward Roche and Jeremiah Wollaston.

They were incorporated in 1804, as the "Wilmington Spring Water Company," with power to levy a sum of money on such persons as should use the water from its works. A fountain was opened on High (4th) Street, between West and Tatnall, which supplied all that part of the Borough lying south of High Street. In 1805, the works were extended to accommodate the inhabitants living north of Fourth Street, and arrangements were also made for fountains, persons owning property near Kennett Heights then outside the Borough limits.

In 1810, the Borough Council purchased the Spring Water Company for ten thousand dollars all their right and interest in the water-works, and established the Wilmington water department. The water from the different fountains was conveyed in wooden pipes from the reservoirs at the Springs along the principal streets, where a number of cisterns were placed. In 1816, at the "upper works," a reservoir sixty feet long, ten feet wide and ten feet deep, was built of brick and arches. Into this reservoir the water was led from thence conveyed underground wooden pipes down the Kennett Road to Market Street to supply the inhabitants north of Fourth Street. On September 6, 1819, Joseph Bringham petitioned Council for the right to introduce "the spring water into his kitchen," which was the first request of the kind made and was granted. This was the first hydrant used in the town.

The supply of water did not prove equal to the demand, because several citizens sunk pumps near the springs which diminished the supply of water. The large Lombardy poplars and willow trees in the vicinity of the Water Works were believed to absorb much of the moisture in the soil, and also aided in diminishing the supply of water at the Springs. To remedy this, the Borough Council unwisely ordered "all Lombardy poplar and willow trees growing in any of the streets, lanes or alleys of this Borough within fifty feet of any fountain, reservoir, cistern, conduit or well shall be removed." The action of the Borough authorities caused a great deal of dissatisfaction. The owners of those beautiful trees were unwilling to have them cut down, as they were an adornment to the town, and also furnished delightful shade. Many of them were relics of a former day under whose balmy shade the "forefathers of the village rested" their weary limbs protected from the scorching rays of the summer's sun. Some were planted by the ancestors of those who then owned them, and who were justified in saying "spare that tree, in youth it sheltered me and I'll protect it now." An old gentleman, on Market Street above Fourth, as the ruthless woodman was passing around fulfilling the edict of the irreverent Council, clasped affectionately the "dear old tree" in the front of his home saying, that if the axe touched "a single bough" it must first strike him. The certiorari of a justice of the Supreme Court supported the ordinance of the Council, that "trees on the streets of Wilmington are public nuisances." The opinion of two attorneys declared that the certiorari was not a "supersedeas" of the warrant; but the edict of the be-nighted town authorities took its course, the sturdy monarchs of the highways were felled and soon their sacred ashes were offered in honor of Siva.

The trees were all removed and a few months later when the water supply from the springs was still inadequate to the demands the council awoke from its accustomed lethargy and stupidity, and in 1820 appointed Chief Burgess, Eli Hilles, and John Rumsey a committee to "view the field and report the probable expense of having the water brought from the Brandywine." They said at the next meeting that the revenue from the Water Works by taxation was fifteen hundred dollars annually, and the expenses the same amount. They said the scarcity of water in the upper district was so great and the works in such a ruinous condition, that the tax in justice could not be levied on the citizens of that portion of the town, which would decrease the revenue five hundred dollars. This committee also reported that for the sum of fourteen thousand six hundred dollars the town could be supplied with water from the Brandywine through iron pipes, by means of forcing pumps, to a tank or reservoir near the junction of Shipley and Chestnut (Tenth) Streets from whence it could be furnished in iron pipes to all parts of the borough. The report of this committee was not immediately acted upon. Three hundred dollars was, however, spent in 1823 in repairing the "upper water works." The combined works then furnished but fourteen gallons of water per minute against thirty-five gallons per minute in 1810. Then the noble old trees in the town were standing, and in 1823 they were gone and the difficulty remained. On August 2, 1824, a committee composed of Eli Mendenhall, Henry Hoopes and John F. Gilpin claimed that the deficiency "has arisen from defective log pipes and cisterns," and requested the use of iron pipes, and on May 2d of the same year Jacob Alrichs, John F. Gilpin and Eli Mendenhall reported the work so "far progressed as to be conducted in a three-inch iron pipe from the borough line to the lot intended for a reservoir" between Tenth and Eleventh Streets and Market and King. The reservoir at this place was built under the superintendence of William H. Naff. The site was purchased of Isaac Kendall.

In 1825, permission was granted to all citizens to introduce spring water in yards and houses, in metallic pipes.

Joseph Grubb, Aaron Hewes, Frederick Leonard, Israel D. Jones and James Gardner were appointed a committee to consult with Eli Mendenhall, Henry Heald, Isaac H. Starr and Jacob Alrichs and propose the adoption of some measures "to insure an ample supply of water for domestic and other purposes."
Their report presented August 26, 1826, was brief. They unanimously decided the only hope was for the people of Wilmington in the future to quench their thirst with "Brandy Wine." On the 17th of June, 1827, the borough authorities purchased of John Cummins for the sum of twenty-eight thousand dollars his large mill on the south side of the Brandywine as the site for the location of the Double Acting Pump to be used as a motive power to force the water to the basin. On July 9th, following, a lot fronting on Market, Tenth and King Streets (now the site of the court-house) was purchased of Sallie N. Dickinson for twenty-seven hundred dollars where the reservoirs were erected. Fire plugs were also erected at the same time.

In 1832, the remainder of what is now Court House Square, was bought for twelve hundred dollars.

The forcing pump, which cost eight hundred dollars, was made by Prosper Martin, of Philadelphia. A stone building covered the over-shot water-wheel at the mill enclosing also the pump which was worked by the water-wheel of the mill. The pump was put into operation November 15, 1827, with a six feet stroke and in eighteen minutes the water reached the west basin. Israel D. Jones ran up from the pump and took the first draught of water at the basin.

The length of the pipe from pump to basin was two thousand one hundred and twenty feet, and the ascent ninety-nine feet. The iron pipe was eight inches in diameter and from mill to basin contained five thousand five hundred and thirty-five gallons of water. The two basins adjoined each other and when filled had a combined capacity of one million gallons, or ten thousand hogsheds. There could be thrown four hundred and eighty-seven thousand six hundred gallons per day into the basins.

The civil engineer who superintended the erection of the works was Jonas P. Fairlamb, a well-known citizen of Wilmington. Chief Burgess at the time was James Brobson; second burgess, Frederick Leonard; council, Joseph Grubb, Henry Rice, Israel D. Jones, James Gardner, Thomas Moore, John M. Smith, Mahlon Betts, Eli Sharp, William Larkin, William Townsend, Aaron Hewes, Jacob File, Elisha Huxley. The mason work was done by John Webster, excavation made by Joseph Pierson and pipes laid by James Logan.

A two-story building was erected at the northeast corner Market and Tenth Streets, and long used as the office of the water Department. In 1837 a new forcing pump, made by Betts, Pusey and Harlan, was purchased for one thousand two hundred dollars. In 1839 a new basin one hundred and fifty-eight feet by eighty feet and fourteen feet deep was built at a cost of four thousand nine hundred and seven dollars, but there were no improvements made until 1847.

The cost of what was known as the Spring Water Works from 1820 to 1827, was twenty-two thousand three hundred and eighty-eight dollars; cost of Brandywine Water Works, erected in 1827, was forty-two thousand and twenty-six dollars; cost of management and improvements from 1827 to 1847 inclusive sixty-eight thousand four hundred and fifty-one dollars.

Owing to the insufficient supply of water on September 7, 1848, on motion of James Canby, the mayor appointed David C. Wilson, Isaac R. Trimble, Elisha Huxley, Dr. Henry F. Askew, Mahlon Betts and Nelson Cleland from the citizens of Wilmington, and William R. Sellers and Dr. Robert R. Porter from the Council and the Water Committee to examine into the condition of the Water Works. The size of the reservoir was then increased one half. In 1855 a direct acting Cornish pump was added to the power of the works, and used until 1872.

The first annual report of the superintendent of the works was made by Aquilla Pritchard, in 1867, in which it was stated that an average of fourteen million gallons of water monthly supplied the city, and distributed to two thousand six hundred and five places. The total number feet of pipes laid was sixty-three thousand eight hundred and eighty-eight; entire cost of Brandywine Water Works, one hundred and thirty-four thousand seven hundred and twenty-eight dollars; amount of water rents received annually, sixteen thousand dollars. An act of the Legislature was passed empowering the Council to borrow ten thousand dollars for extension of the water works. At this time the machinery of the works consisted of a water-wheel, two double acting forcing pumps, of eight inch diameter, and a Cornish pumping engine with one eighteen-inch, all forcing water through one sixteen inch main into the basins.

In March, 1861, the mill property and water power of James E. Price, west of the city mill, was bought for twenty-five thousand dollars. Mr. Bayard, in January, 1862, sold the City Council, a part of his land known as the "Gilpin tract," near Ninth and Broome Streets for fifteen thousand dollars. Part of this land was exchanged for lands of Dr. George P. Norris and Charles W. Howland, the present site of the Rodney Street reservoir.

The superintendent in his report for 1864, stated that the new reservoir in the square bounded by Rodney and Clayton Streets, and Eighth and Ninth Streets, was partially erected. An eight-inch pipe was laid from a new pipe and a boiler-house was erected on the old basin square at Tenth and Market. The pump was also connected with the old basins. The whole cost of the improvements made was $19,205; the amount appropriated by Council under new legislative enactment $25,000; the amount of water rent for 1863 was $19,772; cost of laying pipe from pump-house to new basin and connecting with old basin, $14,920. The Council sold bonds of the city to the amount of $15,000 to complete the works. In 1866 the water committee reported the works to consist of two double-acting pumps, capable of forcing into the reservoir at Tenth and Market Street, nine hundred thousand gallons of water in twenty-four hours, and a Cornish steam pump forcing through a twenty-four inch-pipe one million gallons daily. This aggregate was not considered sufficient to supply the future demands of the town. A citizen committee composed of Edward Betts, Wm. T. Porter, William Canby, Jesse Sharpe and John Jones after conferring with Gregg Chandler, Jos. C. Rowland, John A. Duncan, Philip Plunkett and C. H. Gallagher the water committee, reported at a public meeting of the citizens, held February 13, 1867, "the absolute necessity of increasing the supply of water." On motion of Dr. L. P. Bush, the City Council was recommended to make application to the Legislature to borrow money for completing the Cool Spring reservoir. A bill authorizing a loan of two hundred thousand dollars "for the sole purpose of increasing the supply of water in Williamson," was passed. Isaac S. Cassin received seven thousand dollars in 1869, for repairs made on the Rodney Street basin. The daily consumption of water in 1869, was 1,118,537 gallons. A committee of the City Council composed of C. H. Gallagher, George H. Walter, H. F. Pickels, H. F. Finegan, Jr., and E. J. McManus April 7, 1870, urged the erection of new water works. William E. Morris, civil engineer of Philadelphia, was employed to "go over the whole ground" and make a report to the Council, which he did August 31, 1870. The large increase in the consumption of water on the river front, together with the increase of population in the lower part of the city, made such a draft upon the pipes as to almost deprive citizens who resided on the elevated parts from obtaining any water except at night and on Sunday. Improvements were needed, but at this time none were made, save a new pump-cylinder and a new boiler were placed at the pump-house on the Brandywine. In October, 1871, the office of the water department was removed from north-west corner of Tenth and King Streets, to the north-west corner of Tenth and Market Streets, and the old office was used by the surveyor and engineer. On February 1, 1872, Col. Fegiger, in behalf of the water committee, reported that a contract had been entered into with Henry R. Worthington of New York, for the construction of a compound Duplex pump to cost $37,000, with a capacity of forcing 5,000,000 gallons per day. The total amount of water supplied to the city in 1871 was 551,292,000 gallons, forty-seven gallons to each citizen; number of places supplied, 5,258; entire revenue $44,000.

J. D. Winslow constructed a new pump-house sixty feet square, for $9,486, on the site of the old mill in 1872. The total cost of the Water Works to the city, including expense of running from the time of their establishment in 1872, was $554,589.

There was general discontent among the tax-payers of the city, and March 30, 1877, an act of assembly was passed by which the completion of the Cool Spring reservoir was taken out of the hands of the City Council, and John P. Allmond, Cesar A. Rodney and James Bradford created a commission to carry the work into execution. They secured the services of Col. Julius W. Adams, engineer of the Brooklyn Water Department, Charles P. Manning, consulting engineer of the Baltimore Water Department, and William J. McAlpine, hydraulic engineer of New York who examined the incomplete reservoirs, and made a report giving their views as to the best method of procedure to finish it. The commission acting upon this report and upon their own judgment, entered into a contract with Peter F. Collins and James Kennedy, of Philadelphia, to complete the North Basin for $33,000, with a capacity, filled to the coping, of 17,964,000 gallons, and $36,- 600 for the South Basin, with a capacity of 20,809,- 000 gallons. Samuel Canby was the resident engineer, and gave the lines for the work. Cool Spring Reservoir was entirely finished and opened Tuesday, December 18, 1877, and the water was turned into the supply pipes on January 1, 1878.

The board of Water Commissioners was created by act of Legislature passed April 18, 1883, which named William T. Porter, Cesar A. Rodney, and Lewis Paynter as the first members, who by drawing lots were made members for six, four and two years respectively. Upon the death of his two associates, William T. Porter, by virtue of his office appointed William G. Gibbons and Christian Fegiger to fill out their unexpired terms, at the expiration of which the mayor under the act appointed James Carmichael to succeed William G. Gibbons, and reappointed Christian Fegiger.

During the early history of the Water Department some of the superintendents were James Logan, appointed in 1826 at three hundred dollars per annum, Joseph Seeds, in 1830; Joseph R. Townsend, in 1839; Thomas Mahaffey, in 1845; James G. File, in 1851, and Aquilla Pritchard, in 1856. The last named served several years. Upon the reorganization of the Water Department, the office of chief engineer was created and Charles H. Gallagher was first appointed by Council to that office. Joseph Hyde succeeded in 1874; Allen Ruth, in 1875; Charles H. Gallagher, in 1876; Henry B. McIntire, in 1878; David H. Coyle, from January, 1883, to July, 1884, when the Board of Water Commissioners organized. The appointing power being now vested in the hands of that body choose Henry B. McIntire, who retired in May 1886, and the present chief engineer, Joseph A. Bond, was appointed.

The office of registrar was created in 1871, when Frank A. Taylor was the first appointee. His successors have been, William S. Hayes, William J. Morrow, Thomas M. Ogle, Joseph A. Bond and John S. Grohe. George H. Simmons is inspector and collector.

Chief Engineer Bond in his report for the year ending January 1, 1887, gives the receipts for the preceding twelve months, $173,849; disbursements $130,430, with a balance on hand of $43,418. The revenue of the Water Department increased from $19,696 in 1862 to $30,046 in 1886. During the year 1886, there were supplied to the city 1,738,412,408 gallons of water. Estimating the population then at 52,000, the daily average per capita was ninety-one and three fifth gallons.

The Wilmington Gas Company was organized in 1833, with a capital of six thousand dollars, in two hundred and forty shares of twenty-five dollars each. Five dollars on each share was paid at the time of subscription. The commissioners named in the charter of incorporation granted by the Legislature were, James Canby, William Seal, Thomas Garrett, Elisha Huxley and Lewis Rumford. James Canby was the first president of the company and the first secretary, William H. Naff. The office was at No. 1 West Fourth Street.

The works were erected on Orange below Water Street, and rosin was used in the production of gas. The price at first charged was eighty cents per hundred cubic feet of gas, which in 1856 was reduced to seventy cents." In April, 1856, Dr. James W. Thompson, Edward Grubb, John McClung and Peter B. Porter, "a committee of consumers," reported through the newspapers that the gas supplies by rosin works afforded "cheaper light than sperm oil and for beauty, brilliancy and freedom from smoke far exceeds it." The works were enlarged in 1847, "for the purpose of supplying the increased demand for gas." The first superintendent was Peter Bourk; he was succeeded by Samuel McClary who managed the works for several years. The meters used by this company were made in London.

On Thursday evening January 29, 1848, as a small boy was amusing himself by lighting a small jet of gas issuing from the gasometer, the flames were communicated to a large body of gas, and a terrific explosion took place. The works were blown up and the loss was two thousand dollars. The boy was injured; there was an insurance of three hundred dollars in the Delaware Fire Insurance Company. The company before this accident was just out of debt, new works were built and the company continued to operate until 1851, when the Coal Gas Company purchased its effects.

Wilmington Coal Gas Company.—By an act of the Legislature, passed March 4, 1851, Jesse Sharpe, J. T. Seal, Joseph Seal, John A. Duncan, Stephen Bonsall, Samuel McCaulley, William Chandler, Washington Jones, Jacob Rice and their associates, or persons who shall become stockholders, were constituted a body politic and corporate by the name and style of the "Wilmington Coal Gas Company." Under this act the capital stock of the company was fixed at $60,000, in twelve hundred shares of $50 each, with the privilege of increasing it to $100,000. At a meeting held March 11, 1851, Stephen Bonsall was chosen president of the company, John A. Duncan, Secretary and Washington Jones, treasurer. The next meeting held on March 18th, nearly the entire amount of the capital stock was subscribed. A portion of the site now occupied at the corner of Madison and Read Streets, was purchased, on which works with a limited capacity were erected and the gas was first turned on for use, November 22, 1851, and during the first night seven thousand two hundred and ten cubic feet of manufactured gas were consumed. Originally there were but fifty consumers. The average daily consumption for the month of December in the years named was about as follows: in 1851, 8000 cubic feet; in 1832, 15,000 cubic feet; in 1860, 60,000 cubic feet; in 1870, 120,000 cubic feet; in 1880, 250,000 cubic feet; in 1887, with four thousand four hundred consumers about 500,000 cubic feet, daily. The works as first built, had a holding capacity of 30,000 cubic feet of gas, and a manufacturing capacity of 50,000 cubic feet, and had a retort house, a purifying house and a condenser.

Soon after the first works were constructed, additions and improvements were made. The most important improvement made in 1887, was the water gas plant, originated by Joseph Flannery, of New York, as an auxiliary to the coal gas works, thus increasing the producing capacity of the entire works to one million cubic feet in twenty-four hours. The consumption of coal in producing gas is ten thousand tons annually; the entire consumption of gas for the year 1886 was 108,000,000 cubic feet. Two engines of fifteen-horse power each are used, and the exhausters, scrubbers and condensers are all in duplicate. The plant covers an area of about three hundred feet square. The company owns three acres of land near by and south of F. W. & B. R. A holder with 88,000 cubic feet is situated at Fourteenth and Wilson Streets; one holder at the works has a capacity of 450,000 cubic feet, and the other 100,000, both telescopic.

While the English and American law requires the gas companies to furnish gas of sixteen candle power, this company furnish gas equal to twenty candle, which is twenty-five per cent. more light than is required by law.

Stephen Bonsal, the first president of the company, served from 1851 to 1864, when he resigned, and George Richardson was elected president, and has since occupied the position for a term of twenty-three years.

John A. Duncan was secretary from 1851 until his death in 1868, when Thomas Lawson succeeded him from 1868 to 1877, at which time William P. Taylor, the present secretary, was elected. In 1856, John A. Duncan was chosen treasurer, in connection with the office of secretary, and since that time the secretary has also been treasurer of the company. Washington Jones was treasurer until 1856, when John A. Duncan, the secretary, was also chosen treasurer, and since that time the two positions have been filled by the secretary. The business office is at 300 Shipley Street.

Thomas J. Mahaffey was superintendent of the works from the time of their erection until 1867.

when Thomas Curley succeeded him in the position, and has served continuously ever since. He has been an employee of the company from the date of its establishment, having previously served as foreman. Michael Newell is the present foreman. The capital stock of the company now is $408,000.

THE WILMINGTON CITY ELECTRIC-LIGHT COMPANY.—A charter was granted October 31, 1882, to the Arnoux Electric-Light Company to manufacture and sell the electric arc-light, of the Arnoux and Hoekhausen system, in the City of Wilmington. A company was organized in November, 1882, with John R. Flinn, president; W. W. Pusey, vice-president; Howard L. Chandler, secretary, and George F. Archer, treasurer. The paid-in capital of the company was $60,000. An electric-light station was erected on south Third, near Spruce Street, which was ready for operation January 1, 1883, and began with a patronage of thirty-five arc-lights. The Board on May 22, 1883, had the following officers and directors: S. H. Grey, of Camden, N. J., president; W. W. Pusey, of Wilmington, vice-president; H. C. Robinson, secretary and treasurer; Francis B. Colton, J. H. Hoffecker, Joseph Pyle, John R. Flynn, Samuel N. Trump, of Wilmington, and W. C. Dreyer, of New York. The company ran the arc-light from the Third Street station until December 2, 1885, when the first incandescent lamps of the Edison system were installed. On September 6, 1886, a charter was granted by the Courts of Delaware, incorporating the "Wilmington City Electric-Light Company," application having been made to the State of New Jersey for the dissolution of the original company, the stockholders of which agreed to exchange its stock for that of the new company. At this time S. M. Trump was president; J. Davis Sieler, vice-president; Ferdinand L. Gilpin, secretary; H. C. Robinson, vice-president; W. W. Pusey, J. H. Hoffecker, Francis B. Colton, and Thomas H. Savery, directors. Owing to the increasing demand for electricity as a motor and to produce light in Wilmington, the company purchased a lot on the north side of Fifth Street, between Orange and Tatnall, and erected a large station, with an electrical plant with a manufacturing capacity of four thousand lamps of ten candle-power. This plant, including the lot, building and electrical apparatus, cost sixty thousand dollars. Since the spring of 1887 the company has greatly extended its business by way of supplying electricity as a motive-power for manufacturing, and has entered into a contract with the Wilmington City Railway Company, to run its cars over the Brandywine extension of the Market Street line. This, with existing contracts for motive power and light, will exhaust the entire producing power of the station, with its present capacity, and a still greater extension of facilities to meet further demands is contemplated.

THE WILMINGTON CITY RAILWAY COMPANY.—On the 14th of March, 1884 the first meeting of the stockholders of this company was held in the office of the New Castle County Mutual Insurance Company, on which occasion they elected seven directors as follows: William Tatnall, Joshua T. Heald, William Wharton, Jr., Clement B. Smyth, Daniel M. Bates, Eli Garrett and Philip McDowell. The first officers elected were J. T. Heald, President; Philip McDowell, Vice-President; and Clement B. Smyth, Secretary and Treasurer. The charter incorporating the company was granted by the Legislature on February 4, 1864. The capital of the company under this charter is two hundred thousand dollars in shares of ten dollars each, of which but five dollars on each share has been called, making the present paid in capital one hundred thousand dollars. William Wharton, Jr., contracted to build a line from the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad station, up Front Street to Market, up Market to Delaware Avenue and from thence to Middle Depot a distance of two miles for twenty-nine thousand two hundred and fifty dollars by June 1, 1864.

The company bought of William Tatnall, for one thousand dollars payable in bonds, a lot upon which the present office, stables and car-house are built. The amount of fifty thousand dollars was borrowed on coupon bonds at five per cent, payable January 18, 1874, to assist in constructing the road. On May 17, 1864, it was decided to extend the line to Rising Sun Village. At this date one mile of the track was laid. The first cars were run over the road June 29, 1864, when the mayor, city-council and other city-officers joined the directors in an excursion over the line, and were delightfully entertained in a grove on the Brandywine, belonging to Clement B. Smyth.

Seven cars were purchased from John Stephenson, of New York, for seven thousand and ninety-two dollars, and thirty-five horses were secured.

George W. Kelsey was appointed the superintendent of the road June 27, 1864. Phineas Stearn, James W. Wood, James Fletcher and George Turner were appointed the first conductors. Bennett Flagg's stage-line, running between Wilmington and Brandywine Banks, was purchased for two hundred dollars. Clement B. Smyth resigned his position as secretary and treasurer May 2, 1864, and John F. Miller was elected.

At the second annual election in July, 1865, the directors chosen were James Bradford, J. Taylor Gause, Eli Garrett, J. T. Heald, Philip McDowell, William Canby and William Tatnall. From 1866 to 1879 there was no material increase in the annual receipts of the company; from 1879 to 1884 the increase was rapid, the receipts of the latter year being double those of the former year. From the opening of the road to 1887 about twelve million passengers were carried. The average dividend paid is about one per cent, annually.

The rails first put down lasted twenty-two years. In 1887 the company spent twenty thousand dollars in improving its lines, in renewing the substructure of the road and in replacing worn-out rails.
HISTORY OF DELAWARE.

On March 28, 1881, the company decided to construct a line from Fourth and Market Streets, eastward on Fourth Street to the Christiana River. This road was built by William Wharton, Jr., at a cost of nine thousand one hundred dollars. On October 3, 1881, a resolution was passed to construct a line on Spruce Street. The contract for this was given to Jeremiah Mahoney June 3, 1882.

In 1887 the same contractor built the extension from Market and Tenth Streets to Riverview Cemetery, a distance of one and a half miles. This line is run by the Sprague Electric Railway System, the motive-power being furnished by the Wilmington Electric Light Company. The following is a list of the presidents of the company:

Joshua T. Heald........................March 14, 1864, to August 3, 1864
John F. Miller..........................March 14, 1864, to January 1, 1880
C. W. Talley.............................January 1, 1866, to June 16, 1870
William H. Colby........................June 30, 1870, to November 3, 1873
Frank J. Holben.........................October 5, 1875, to January 22, 1877
Samuel Chambers........................January 22, 1877, to June 1, 1881
John K. Bradford.......................June 1, 1881, to July 1, 1882
John T. Miller..........................July 1, 1882, to date

William H. Burnett was appointed superintendent October 3, 1881. The directors for the year 1886 are William Canby, James Bradford, Joshua T. Heald, John Jones, Washington Jones, George H. Bates, George W. Bush. Since the lines of this company have been built, great improvements have been made in the northern and northwestern part of Wilmington. This was greatly owing to the accommodation afforded by the street railway passing through these localities.

THE FRONT AND UNION STREET-RAILWAY COMPANY.—The first meeting of stockholders who contemplated the organization of this company was held at the Artisans' Savings Bank, February 18, 1881, when they elected the following-named directors: H. S. McComb, William G. Gibbons, Francis N. Buck, Philip Plunkett, John R. Tatsum, E. T. Walton and George W. Bush. On the same day the directors elected George W. Bush, president; Edward T. Taylor, secretary; Philip Plunkett, treasurer. A charter of incorporation was obtained February 20, 1877. The paid-in capital was $25,000, which has since been increased to $30,000 in shares of $10 each.

William Wharton, Jr., of Philadelphia, April 20, 1881, contracted to build the road at the rate of $7400 per mile, for a single track, $2.90 per foot for the curved part of the track, and $6 per foot for gutter plate. Samuel A. Price was appointed superintendent May 2, 1881. The road was completed to its present length, a little more than one and one-third miles, and cars first run on Saturday morning, September 11, 1881. The first outfit included four cars, built by Bowers, Dure & Company, of Wilmington, and twelve mules. The company now owns six passenger cars and one large excursion car. Its patronage is steadily increasing. The office and stables are at the west end of the line. This section of Wilmington is rapidly improving; many new residences have lately been erected near the western terminus of the road. The officers of the company are George W. Bush, president; S. A. Price, secretary and superintendent; E. T. Taylor, treasurer. The other directors are Philip Plunkett, John R. Tatsum, R. J. Mackay, M.D., William Ferris, Joseph Pyle and James C. McComb.

THE BRANDYWINE BRIDGE.—The only way of crossing the Brandywine in coming to or going from Wilmington in early days was by means of a ferry or by fording the stream. The ferry terminating at the point where French Street reaches the creek was in use to 1764. Peter Vandeaver had a bridge constructed near where the Eleventh St. Bridge spans the stream, but there is no authentic information to establish the date. It was standing in 1767, though ordered to be removed three years before, when the bridge above was built. Under an act of Assembly, passed in 1762, a bridge to cross the stream where the present beautiful one does, was ordered to be built. It was completed in 1764, and the roads made to connect with it. For fifty-six years it served its purpose, having borne many hundred heavily-freighted wagons within that period of time. Repairs were needed, of course, at various times. As early as 1775, Ziba Ferris, by order of James Latimer and John Stapler, bridge commissioners, expended eighty-four pounds, five shillings and four pence for that purpose. One of the items of expense was one pound and one shilling, for "six gallons of rum for the workmen." The first bridge became old and somewhat dilapidated with more than half a century's use. In 1806 a move was on foot and a company incorporated with a capital of $20,000 to build a stone bridge, but it never was done. A petition was presented to the Levy Court, March 4, 1806, praying for the erection of a new bridge. John Warner, George Clark and Dr. Arnold Naudain were appointed to view the bridge and report its condition. They made no report until 1807. Another petition, signed by one hundred persons of Brandywine and Christians, asked that the bridge be repaired or a new one built. John Brynberg, David Stewart and Anthony Higgins, on May 2, 1809, a new committee, reported favorably to the erection of the desired bridge, and the same day Capt. James Jeffers, William Poole, John Way and Edward Tatnall were appointed as commissioners to build one, "on the plan of the bridge at the Falls of the Schuylkill River," with three chains, its width to be decided upon by the commissioners. The first commissioners refused to act, and the court appointed Jacob Derrickson, Robert Forwood, John McClintock, Isaac Dickson, and James Jefferis to erect a chain bridge. On June 13, 1809, the Levy Court appropriated $4000 for that purpose. It was completed in 1810, and was used until 1822, when it was taken away by a flood, and a covered wooden bridge built at a cost of $7558.28. The old bridge was sold for $884.07. This was carried away by a flood in 1839, and another placed there, which stood forty-eight years. In 1887, a committee of the Levy Court erected the beautiful one which now spans the stream, at a cost of $27,000. The committee were Henry D. Hickman, of Wilmington Hundred; Isaac N. Grubb, of Brandywine Hundred; Thomas Toy, of Christiana Hundred; Robert R. Morrison, of New Castle Hundred; and Thomas Mc Cracken, of Pencader.

THE CHRISTIANA BRIDGE AT MARKET STREET.—In answer to a petition signed by a large number of citizens of Wilmington and vicinity, an act was passed January 20, 1807, by the General Assembly, incorporating a company to erect a draw-bridge over the Christiana “at the foot of Market Street, and to open a road from thence through Holland Creek Marsh to the fast land near the residence of Major Peter Jacques, to intersect with the road from Clarke’s Corners and New Castle to Christiana Ferry below Wilmington.”

It was chartered as the “Wilmington Bridge Company,” with a capital of $15,000, in shares of fifty dollars each. The draw, as prescribed by the act, was to be twenty-five or more feet in width; the bridge to be lighted with six lamps, two at each end, and two in the middle of the draw.” James Stroud, Nehemiah Tilton, James Brinkley, Samuel Canby and Joseph Shipley were appointed commissioners to locate the site of the bridge and lay out the road. The directors chosen were William Collins, William Hemphill, John Warner, James Lea and Jacob Broom. They reported to the stockholders that the bridge was complete, April 5, 1808.

A bill passed the Legislature, January, 1851, authorizing the Levy Court to purchase this bridge, since which time no toll has been charged. The present bridge was built in 1883.

THE BRANDYWINE PARK.—The first move toward securing a part of the lands bordering on the Brandywine within the city limits, for a public park, was in 1868. On the 11th of July of that year a meeting of citizens was held in City Hall, when Thomas F. Bayard, Samuel M. Harrington, Charles B. Lore, Daniel W. Taylor and George W. Stone were appointed a committee to take the necessary steps towards procuring the desired site. On July 15, 1869, after having carefully examined the lands on both sides of the stream, this committee, in the name of the public meeting of citizens, reported to the City Council, recommending the purchase of the land “lying between Adams Street, adjoining Brandywine Cemetery grounds and Rattlesnake Run, northward to Loversing Avenue, including the Brandywine Creek and Race, to such natural boundaries on the opposite side of the Brandywine as may be deemed most desirable.” This committee, in a published report, glowingly described the eligibility of this site, its beautiful scenery and interesting surroundings, and declared that no city in the land had such a stream as the Brandywine within its limits. The report further gives a concise description of the leading public parks in other cities of the Union, and the great advantages derived from them.

The City Council made arrangements to purchase the lands recommended by borrowing money to pay for the same; but before this could be accomplished, several citizens procured counsel and had further proceedings stopped by an injunction issued by the chancellor of the State, on the plea that the city charter forbade the borrowing of money for such purpose.

No further action was taken until 1882, when a number of prominent citizens met together, and, prompted by a promise of a large tract of land outside the city limits, by William P. Bancroft, made the draft of an act which was submitted to the Legislature, and substantially as drawn, became a law in 1883. Under this act the following-named persons and their successors were created a Board of Park Commissioners for the city: William P. Bancroft, George H. Bates, Thomas F. Bayard, Edward Betts, Francis N. Buck, George W. Bush, William M. Canby, Joseph L. Carpenter, Jr., Henry A. Du Pont, J. Taylor Gause, the mayor of Wilmington, the president and the chairman of the Finance Committee of the City Council, and the chief engineer of the Surveying Department. William Canby and Dennis J. Menton have since been appointed to take the places of others who have retired from the board.

The original act was inoperative from lack of authority to borrow sufficient money, and an amendment was passed in 1885, authorizing the city to borrow $150,000 for the purchase of land for the contemplated park. The lands at present embraced in the City Park on the Brandywine, and in a tract in the western part of Wilmington, were purchased by the city authorities at a cost of $146,000. The grounds on the Brandywine extend on the south side from Van Buren Street to the city limits back to Loversing Avenue.

1 In 1814 the main post road from the Eastern to the Southern States crossed the Brandywine on a hanging bridge, passed through the borough of Wilmington, veered off to the west and southwest ranges of the northern banks of the Christiana and continued toward the South. A branch of this road crossed the Christiana and continued down through the Peninsulas to the Chesapeake and Delaware Bays. The Christiana bridge had a draw of thirty feet. Three stone turnpikes extended into Pennsylvania. Wilmington, or a large portion of it, was built on the southwest of a hill, nine hundred feet above tide-water, and near the Christiana. The village of Brandywine was on the northeast slope of the same hill and on both sides of the river. There were seven hundred and fifty houses in both towns. Many handsome country residences were located one hundred and fifty to two hundred and fifty feet above tide-water in the highlands, which extended from the Delaware west of the south and east of the town.
CHAPTER XXIX.

WILMINGTON—(Continued).

MARKET-HOUSES.

The greatest of all controversies in the history of Wilmington arose on the establishment of the markets.

The first market-house in Wilmington was built by William Shipley, at his own expense and on his own land, in the spring of 1736, the year after he moved to Wilmington from Ridley Township, Chester County, Pa. It stood on Front Street and extended from Shipley Street half-way to Market. The town then had but thirty-three houses, nearly all of which were south of Third Street, and between Walnut and Market Streets. The Fourth Street market-house was erected three years before the town was incorporated as a borough under the name of Wilmington, and when it yet was known as Willington.

On July 13, 1736, thirty persons put their signatures to a public notice declaring that there "should be particular days on which the country-people may bring to town their victualing which they are minded to sell, and which the inhabitants of the town may furnish themselves with, as they may think convenient." It was therefore agreed and advertised that "after the 17th of July, 1736, there may be a public sale of all sorts of victualing kept in the market-house built in Willington, on Wednesday and Saturday of each week, to begin at 8 o'clock in the morning."

The market-house being erected by William Shipley on his own land and at his own expense, even though allowed to be used by the public, was not considered lost, and eighty-one persons, in Willington and the Hundred of Christians, in which the village was then located, nominated Thomas West and Joseph Hewes, of Willington, Timothy Stidham and Henry Colebury, of New Castle County, and Joseph Mendenhall and Jacob Chandler, of Chester County, as trustees to receive and collect subscriptions to purchase the market-house, that it might become public property, and "to finish it and to build an addition thereto." They performed their duty by collecting sixty-seven pounds, of which William Shipley himself contributed ten; Joshua Way, four; David Ferris, three; Thomas West, two; William Lewis, two; Edward Tatnall, two; Robert Lewis, two; Griffith Minshall, two; G. E. Folwell, two; Joseph Mendenhall and Joseph Hewes, each one pound and ten shillings; Christopher Wilson, Samuel Hooten, Samuel Littler, Enoch Lewis, William Warner, John Swett, Richard Carson, James Speary, John Van ne man, William Cleny, William Seal, Stephen Fouk, Timothy Stidham, Honce Smith, Anthony Benezet, Joshua Littler, Job Jacob, George Howell, each one pound; Thomas Hollingsworth, William Hewes, each fifteen shillings; John Trimble, John Gleave, Christopher Springer, William Tussey, James Chandler, George Jenkin, Daniel Barker, Joseph Williamson, Andrew Jolly, Richard Eveson, Daniel Calfat, Na- thaniel Pennock, Isaac Lobdell, each ten shillings; Owen Evans, Nathan Wood, Wm. Welton, Daniel Few, Moses Minshall, Jonathan Sell, Jacob Stilley, Jacob Springer, Mouna Justin, Joseph Springer, Jonas Walraven, John Way, Samuel Pennock and Joseph Davis, each five shillings. A number of other persons a distance from town contributed the remainder.

With the money thus raised they bought the right of the owner to it and obtained a deed, and the market-house became public property. This pleased the advocates of what then became known as the "Upper Market," but some time previous to its erection, and before Wm. Shipley moved to the young town, the people in the lower part of the town had discussed the advisability of building a market-house down "nigher to the water's side," on Second Street, between Market and King, on land given by Thomas Willing and Andrew Justison, when the town was first laid out.

To oppose the completion of the lower market, the supporters of the Fourth Street Market prepared the subjoined address, which is here inserted to illustrate the nature of the controversy, and show who the first settlers of the town were:

"To all Christian people to whom these presents shall come:

We, whose names are hereunto subscribed, inhabitants of and adventurers in Willington, in the Hundred of Christians, in the County of New Castle upon Delaware, and other inhabitants of the County and parts adjacent, send greeting:

Whereas, There has already been built in Willing Town aforesaid, for the use and benefit of said Town and the country adjoining, one house or building commonly called a Market-House or Shambles, and situated on High (Fourth) Street and between Market and Shipy, and

Whereas, There is since proposed by some persons, inhabitants in the said Town, and now by them, a putting forward to be built, another Market-House, proposed to be erected in Market Street or Second Street aforesaid, but down nearer to the water side: Now those are, therefore, to declare to all persons, that

We, whose names are hereunto subscribed, being very well satisfied that the Market-House already built in High Street as aforesaid is, and doth stand very commodious for the benefit of said Town, both as to situation, largeness and form of building, and that we, and every of us, do approve the same, and that we, nor any of us, do any ways approve of, or do utterly disallow and disapprove the building or erecting any other Market-House or Shambles in the said Town at the present, and until we shall see more reasonable occasion for the same.

The signers to the above document were nearly all English Quakers, who lived in or near the town. It seems the Swedes to a man were also opposed to the erection of an additional market. They also prepared a written protest opposing it, stating that for their own interests and that of their lessees:

"Now these are to declare to all persons that we, whose names are hereunder subscribed, members of said (Swedish) congregation, holding diverse lands in the said town for the use of said (Swedes) church and minister therein, and having by our trustees leased many lots of land there to divers persons, and considering the interests of our said church and minister, and as well the interest and advantage of those persons that have already, or which shall hereafter, lease any of our said church lands, and the future advantage, rise and growth of the said town in general, and being well satisfied of the situation of the present Market-House on High Street, etc.

By the frame of government of the province of Pennsylvania, of which the counties of New Castle, Sussex and Kent were then a part, one of the powers delegated to the Governor and Provincial Council was "to settle and order the situation of all cities and market towns in every county, modelling therein all public buildings, streets and market-places." As Willingtown was not a chartered corporation and there being no municipal body in it, the "down-towners," or those opposed to the erection of the upper market, addressed a letter to "the Hon. Thomas Penn, one of the proprietors of Pennsylvania," describing their wants. Governor Penn ordered James Steel to write a letter to the "down-towners" asking them to suspend further proceedings in relation to the erection of the lower market-house until it would be convenient to the Governor to pay them a visit.

A letter signed by the following persons was then sent to the Governor: Samuel Scott, Charles Empson, James Milner, Sr., John McArthur, David Bush, Thomas Peters, David Enoch, Thomas Milner, Samuel Milner, James Milner, Thomas Downing, Timothy Scott, Joseph Tomlinson, James Hutchinsom, Joseph Steel, John Buchanan, Daniel Beeby, Richard Dockrill and Alexander Hooge.

They stated that they desired to erect a market-house on the spot originally selected, and claimed that William Shipley "had fallen away from the public interest and his former good intentions" by building a market-house on Fourth Street, and they "offered to pay the full expense he had gone to, but his resolution is so strong that he is not moved to accept any acknowledgement." Therefore, it would be a great detriment to defer the building of their market on Second Street until the Governor would visit them, "the workmen being all ready employed, the bricks and other materials provided," and this market-house was built in 1737.

Their address to the Governor contained some reflection on the conduct of William Shipley, and on November 15, 1737, he explained his position in a letter to Governor Penn. In very strong terms he assured the authorities that he had acted for the public interest and not for his own welfare. He further claimed that the site upon which the down-town party were about to erect a market-house "was a low, dirty place." Two months later David Ferris addressed a letter to the Governor in defense of his friend Shipley, and Joseph Hewes, another early settler, did the same a few days afterwards.

For a short time there was peace and quiet in the "quaint old Quaker-town," until the "down-towners" became indignant at the apparent success of the "up-towners." In command of a somewhat audacious leader, they marched up to Fourth Street, and with axes determined to cut down the white-oak pillars that supported the market-house. They demanded that the men who were at work, enlarging and completing it, should discontinue their operations. A large crowd soon assembled. There was a stirring war of words, in which a strong mixture of bad English, Swedish and Scotch-Irish blood was shown, and things waxed so warm that some of them came to blows. This resulted in two men being badly injured. Quiet was again restored, and the belligerent party marched down-town to their homes. The question was never finally decided until a borough charter was obtained in 1739. The matter was put to a vote of the "freeholders and inhabitants of the borough," December 10, 1739, who decided that "The Saturday market and Spring Fair," be held at the market-house on Fourth Street, and the "Wednesday market and Fall Fair" at the market-house on Second Street.

The controversy, which greatly disturbed the peace and harmony of the town, was now settled. The Fourth Street market-house was slightly enlarged, but few changes were made, and it did good service for one hundred and ten years, being removed in 1846, and another erected on the same site, which was completed November 17th of the same year, and stood until about 1867, when, by order of the City Council, it was taken away. In 1830 the Athenaeum was built over the eastern end of the old market-house, and was used as a meeting-place of literary societies. The Wilmington Library was kept in it for a time.

The Second Street Market, built in 1737, stood until 1793, when it was rebuilt. The Second Street Market-House, now (1888) standing, was erected by the City Market Company in 1878 on the site of the old one, the ground being leased from the city. The officers of the company then were: President, William Miller; Vice-president, Peter B. Huested; Secretary, James F. Sutton;
The following are the officers and directors of the company: President, William Miller; Vice-president, John J. Joslin; Secretary, David H. Magill; Treasurer, Abraham P. Geary; Lewis Lee, John Gibbons, Thomas Curtis, H. H. Moore and William F. Lovell.

The Twelfth Street Market was established by the city authorities in 1848. Market-sheds were built on that street between Market and King, at a cost of three thousand dollars, and farmers were allowed to have wagons on either side of the street, along the pavements, to Walnut. This market never prospered; very few farmers and fewer butchers secured stalls, and at the end of six months from its start was discontinued, and the building for years was used to store carriages, and eventually was removed.

Front Street Market-House was owned by David H. Craig, and was situated between Jefferson and Madison on Front. It was conducted for a year or two and then discontinued for lack of patronage. The building is now used as a carriage manufactory.

The Farmers' Market on Eighth Street was established by Gregg & Bowe in 1868, when they erected their large carriage works at the corner of Eighth and Shipley. It has since been incorporated. The market is on the first floor of their large building, one hundred and sixty-seven by fifty-two feet. It is well patronized by butchers, truckers and farmers, and is open every day. Wednesdays and Saturdays and the afternoons preceding them are days when farmers attend. There are about two hundred and fifty stalls.

Wilmington Market Company was chartered in 1885. It is familiarly known as the "Third Street Market," at the corner of Third and King. It was established at the same place by James Bradford in 1875, who then erected the present building, sixty by one hundred and eleven feet, and three stories high, containing one hundred stalls, all of which are disposed of to butchers, hucksters and farmers. The board of directors are Patrick Monaghan, president; Joel Walton, treasurer; John K. Bradford, secretary; J. W. Butler and Charles C. Mamele.

A market has recently been opened on Washington Street.

As the town grew in size and importance, the population increased, the farmers sold most of their produce from their wagons on Market and Fourth Streets, until the street railway was built in 1863, and since then they stand on King Street. Thus for a century and a half the country people from this neighborhood and from across the Delaware brought their produce to town in carts, dearness and market-wagons, which stand with their tail-boards to the pavement, while a row of benches placed along the curb displays their wares; butter as yellow as gold and as sweet as a nut, milk, eggs, sausage, scrap-vegetables, and poultry, all fresh from the farm. Up and down in front of this array of benches the town-folk crowd and jostle, inspecting the marketing, and driving shrewd bargains with the vendors. Rain or shine, on every Saturday and Wednesday, the line of farm wagons stands along the pavement. In the hottest day of summer, when the sun beats down on straw-hats and shirt-sleeves, in the coldest day of winter, when the snow drifts in blinding sheets up the street, these good folk come to town to turn an honest penny. In summer-time the wagons stand upon the east side of the street to avoid as much as possible the morning sun; in winter they shift to the west side, so as to gain the warmth as soon as possible.

During the spring and early summer the markets are gay with flowers, sometimes ranged tier on tier in a gaudy tableau of color and fragrance newly transported from the greenhouse, sometimes tied in homey nosegays of homely flowers—daffodils, lilies and pinks, pie&c and plain. Around these stands gather a group of feminine folk, and in many a market-basket butter and eggs contest the place with a bouquet, or jostle against a flower-pot, in which blooms some sweet blossom, or are decked with a bunch of the water-lilies which barefooted boys offer at every corner. Then in the season come the fruits in their natural order, free from forcing-houses, from the early strawberry of the spring to the apples of late autumn, each with a freshness and ripeness only too rarely found in our larger cities.

of their own property and that of their neighbors from fire, formed themselves into an association, to be known as the Friendship Fire Company. Each member pledged himself to furnish during a fire two leather buckets and one large wicker basket, and, when a fire occurred, to place a lighted candle in their windows and proceed to the conflagration. Should one member in passing another member's house fail to see a light in the window, he was in duty bound to stop and awaken the other. The whole fire apparatus at this time consisted of some seventy-four buckets and baskets. When a fire occurred two parallel rows of firemen and citizens were formed leading from the fire to a spring, well, pump or stream of water. The buckets full of water were passed down one row and returned empty up the other to the source of supply. This work was continued until the fire was put out. The old time hand-engines were supplied with water in the same way. A small hand-engine was purchased by the Friendship before 1790. It was gotten from a French man-of-war. A fire broke out in a row of old houses on East Fourth Street, in 1801, when nearly all the members of the Friendship Company were at New Castle attending the general election, which was then the voting-place for the entire county. In the absence of the men, women acted their part well as firemen. Following the example of the men, some of them arranged themselves into rows with buckets, while others pumped the hand-engine. They did their work so faithfully that a general conflagration was averted.

In 1793 a borough ordinance was passed directing how chimneys should be "burned out" and in 1803 another ordinance fined every person five dollars who allowed the flames to extend a "yard above the top of the chimney." The members of the fire company then were offered a reward if they reported persons who disobeyed this ordinance.

In 1798 the Friendship declared it would disband unless the Council gave it all the buckets belonging to the borough and grant thirty dollars to assist in building a house for the engine. In 1803 the engine was reported as being "very much deranged." It was fixed up and used until 1825. The first engine-house was on Fifth Street, between Shipley and Orange.

The Friendship Company was incorporated January 15, 1805. In 1812 its engine-house was at the northeast corner of Seventh and Shipley Streets. The bell was hung on a pole in front of it. The membership then was forty-three. Carson Wilson was president; David C. Wilson, his son, secretary; Joseph Grubb, treasurer. The engineers were Samuel Wallston, Joseph Newlin, James Crosby and General James Wolfe. Charles Yeates and Adam Witsell were appointed to collect buckets after a fire.

The engine-house about 1825 was moved to the east side of Market Street, between Sixth and Seventh Streets. It was a one-story building. The officers elected February 28, 1827, were: President, Caison Wilson; Secretary, Joseph K. Robinett; Treasurer, George Jones; Commander, Captain John McClung. The engineers were Samuel Wallston, Aaron Hewes, John Cleland and Albert Robinson.

The officers elected February 26, 1835, were: President, John McClung; Treasurer, George Jones; Secretary, John T. Robinson; Commander, Charles Bush; Engineers, Jeremiah W. Duncan, James Kernes, Joseph C. Seeds, Eliza Huxley; Hose Directors, Thomas Moore, Charles T. Grubb, James C. Aiken and Easu Coxe; Committee to see that chimneys in houses are properly burned, Aaron Hewes, William Hemphill Jones, James Carson and John McClung; Committee of Accounts, Stephen Bonsall, James C. Aiken and Samuel Wallston. These men were then some of the leading citizens in the city.

In 1840, John McClung was president; George Jones, treasurer; J. B. Lewis, secretary; J. W. Duncan, commander; James Kearns, Joseph C. Seeds, Alexander Kelley and Thomas Baynes, engineers. In 1846 the engine-house on Market Street was sold and the site used as a marble-yard by James Robinson. In 1847 the company built an engine-house on Orange Street above Tenth. The present engine house is on Tenth Street facing Shipley.

On December 22, 1875, the company celebrated its one hundredth anniversary by firing one hundred guns, a ball in the Masonic Temple and a supper at the Clayton House. The officers in 1877 were: President, Jacob Stevenson; Vice-President, John A. Shroeder; Secretary, Samuel T. Bayliss; Treasurer, Thomas Lynch. The steamer now owned cost five thousand dollars and was made by the Gould Manufacturing Company, of Newark, New Jersey. This company now (1888) has a new La France engine valued at four thousand one hundred dollars, three horses, a Silaby hose-carriage, one thousand feet of hose, sixteen hundred feet of fire hose, a four-story engine-house with iron front, valued at sixteen thousand dollars, eighty-seven active and honorary members. It can be justly proud of its historic record.

The Reliance Fire Company was organized March 4, 1796, and obtained a charter of incorporation January 2, 1802. It was originally a bucket company only, but as early as 1810 had also a hand-engine. The engine-house in 1812 was on Third Street, between Market and Shipley. This company, like the Friendship, was instituted and controlled by some of the leading citizens of the town. In 1814 the membership was fifty. John Reynolds was president; Joseph Read, secretary; Isaac H. Starr, treasurer; John Jones, Samuel Askew, James Wilson, William Seal, Robert Porter and Hance Naft, engineers.

On February 7, 1824, Evan Thomas was elected president; Ziba Ferris, treasurer; and Dr. Henry F. Askew, secretary. Buckets were still in use. The company had an open lattice-work wagon to carry the men. The Reliance Fire Company, together with the Friendship and Delaware, did good service at the great fire in New Castle in 1824. They arrived at that tow within half an hour from the time of starting, by the steamer "Superior," in command of Captain Henry Read. In 1829 John Hedges was president; William H. Naff, secretary; Ziba Ferris, treasurer; Allan Thomson, Henry F. Askew, Samuel Buzby, William J. Hallowell and Joseph Hayes, engineers.
The company then owned a hook-and-ladder, which was carried to a fire by the members.

About 1830 a building owned by William Naff, on Fifth Street near Orange, was used as the engine-house. Many years later the company erected an engine-house on Fifth Street, between Walnut and Poplar, which continued to be the headquarters of the company until the building now occupied by it was erected.

In 1886 the following were elected: President, Samuel Buzby; Secretary, William H. Naff; Captain, Ziba Ferris; Engineers, John L. Hadden, Edward Briniehurst, George Reynolds, F. Countess, B. A.
Crozier and George W. Mortimer. Ten hosemen and fifteen ladder-men were elected at the same time.

The Reliance in 1840 purchased a large supply of hose and a fine hose-carriage. The affairs of this company had heretofore been conducted without asking aid.
A few voluntary contributions were made by the banks and by individuals. On March 12, 1841, the company sold its old engine, which would yet throw water one hundred and seventy feet, and their "bucket-carriage," and on April 3d of the same year obtained from Betts, Pusey & Harlan a handsome new engine. It had a "seven and a half inch cylinder and a nine-inch stroke, and threw a gallery stream and had one discharging-screw on each side."

The motto of the company "Non nobis solum"— not laboring for ourselves alone—was neatly engraved on the engine.

Henry H. J. Naff, editor of the Delaware Journal, and postmaster of the city, was president of the Rel-liance for twenty years, and Ziba Ferris served as treasurer equally as long. The engines in 1843 were John C. Price, John B. Porter, Benjamin Johnson, Jacob Stevenson, Edward Briniehurst and William R. Pennington. In 1871 the Reliance had forty active members, eleven hundred feet of steam-forcing hose, a two-story brick house, on Fifth Street below Walnut, built in 1820. In 1887 there were sixty-three active and honorary members. G. A. Messick president, and H. A. Duffy, treasurer. The new en-gee-house, at the southeast corner of Fourth and Lombard Streets, erected in 1886, is 20 by 80 feet and cost $17,000. The company owns a Silby engine valued at $5,500, with a capacity of discharging 650 gallons per minute, 1 Silby hose-carriage, 1000 feet, of hose and 3 horses.

The Brandywine Fire Company was organized in Brandywine Village early in the present century, and had a very honorable existence for nearly half a

In 1841 it had thirty-eight members, most of whom were connected with the large flouringmills or cooper-shops in that section of town. This company contributed liberally toward providing fire apparatus and an engine-house for the Phoenix when it organized.

The Delaware Fire Company.—A number of young men met on April 28, 1819, to organize a fire company in Wilmington. Vincent Gilpin was chairman, and Samuel Harker, then editor of the Delaware Gazette, secretary. The name "Delaware Fire Company" was decided upon. Jesse Mendenhall, George Bush, Vincent Gilpin and Samuel Harker were appointed a committee to wait on the Borough Council and request to be recognized in the Fire Department and to secure an appropriation. George Worrell, Jesse Mendenhall, Thomas S. Newlin, Lewis Rum-ford, James Webb, Josiah H. Gilpin and Israel D.
Jones were appointed to call on the citizens for subscriptions toward erecting an engine-house and to secure apparatus. The next meeting was held in the Town Hall, February 29, 1819, when the citizens' committees reported a collection of seven hundred and fifty dollars, and from the Council one hundred and fifty dollars. William Alrich, George Bush and John F. Gilpin were appointed to procure an engine.
They reported soon after that "the hand-engine they bought was constructed upon the old English principle, with the addition of Coleman Sellers' patent improvement of the follower in the air chamber, and would play from two pipes at the same time."

The first officers of the company were Henry J. Pepper, president; Isaac Jackson, vice-president; George W. Worrell, secretary; and Vincent Gilpin, treasurer.

The following members signed the constitution and by-laws, November 9, 1819:

In 1828, Mahlon Betts was president; Lewis Rumford, vice-president; Charles B. Peterson, secretary; John McClear, treasurer. The engineers were Jesse Mendenhall, John F. Gilpin, Samuel McClary, Sr., Wilson Pier-son, Mahlon Betts, James Simpson and Dell Noblit.

In 1842, Evan C. Stotesbury was president; Spencer D. Eves, vice-president; Benjamin S. Clark, secretary; John McClear was treasurer for more than twenty years, and Benjamin S. Clark secretary for the same length of time. A one-story frame engine-house, eighteen feet front, was the first one owned by this company. It stood on Sixth Street, to the rear of the present Water Department building. A three-story brick engine-house was built on the same site, but was burned down when nearly finished. It was rebuilt and used until the one now owned by this company was erected.

Their first hand-engine was made by Alrich & McKay, members of the company. It played two streams, and took thirty-two members to man it, and did good service for many years.

A steamer was bought January 1, 1869, in Portland, Maine, for four thousand and five hundred dollars, which was kept in service until 1883, when the company sold it to the town authorities of Crisfield, Maryland.

The Hayes hook-and-ladder truck, built by the La France Engine Company, of Elmira, New York, was bought August 21, 1882, at a cost of three thousand and five hundred dollars.

The officers of the company in 1887 were Henry W. Perkins, president; Edward Lummis, secretary; James F. Wilson, treasurer. Some of the oldest members are William J. King, John C. Williams, H. W. Perkins, Peter Wood, John Hendrickson, Joseph C. Dutton, Thomas Wilson and Charles Higgins. William J. King is fire recorder.

The Phenix Fire Company.—As the open territory on the hill between Wilmington and the village of Brandywine began to be occupied by dwellings, so that the two towns came nearly together, it was determined to organize a fire company in that section. On December 3, 1826, a meeting of a number of the inhabitants of Wilmington residing in the vicinity of the mills, and on the south side of the Brandywine, was held, and after a brief discussion the Phenix Fire Company was instituted with about thirty members.

James Canby was elected the first president; John H. Price, secretary; and Samuel S. Poole, treasurer. The engineers chosen at this meeting were James Price, Samuel S. Poole, Edward Canby, John H. Price, William S. Poole, Wm. H. Marshall, John Springer and Wm. Rice, all of whom were prominent citizens. Treasurer Poole reported the cash assets of the Brandywine Fire Company to be $383.87, which was transferred to the Phenix. The borough of Wilmington gave $100. The organization having been effected, a hand-engine was purchased from Sollars & Pennock, of Philadelphia, at a cost of $545. This was used for many years. The first officers of the company were several times re-elected. January, 1827, Edward Canby was chosen secretary. In 1828 Wm. Morrow was appointed to collect fines. March 13, 1880, the president appointed Samuel S. Poole and Henry Rice to wait upon the Water Department of the borough, and obtain permission to use the water from the fire-plugs "in filling and playing their new engine." The original headquarters of the company seems to have been temporary. In 1882 the company rented "a room of Mary Wilkinson, for six dollars per annum, as an engine-house." It was a small building, which then stood on the west side of French Street, north of Twelfth. The bell was hung in the forks of a willow tree which stood near by. It was known as the "Factory bell." A committee appointed to secure a site and build a new house reported at a meeting, January 3, 1835, that the engine-house was removed to the situation proposed on "The Green." A new engine-house and a ladder-house were built, and the bell hung, and "everything in good condition." The site of this engine-house was on the east side of the market-house, between Fourteenth and Fifteenth Streets. At this time James Canby was treasurer of the company. In 1887 Joseph Rice was president and James McAllister, treasurer. The engine-house now owned and occupied by the Phoenix, situated on the northeast corner of Twelfth and King Streets, was built in 1886. It was remodeled to present dimensions—twenty and one-half feet front, sixty feet deep and two stories high—in 1888. Its value is $7000.

In 1875 the company celebrated the fiftieth year of its existence by an interesting demonstration, with street parade and banquet. The first charter was obtained from the State Legislature on January 26, 1835; renewed in February, 1855, March 6, 1869 and again March 2, 1875.

A Haupt engine was bought in 1867, and used until 1875, when the company, on July 3d, purchased a steam engine from the Allerton Iron Company for $4400. The other apparatus are one hose-carriage, value $500; one thousand two hundred feet of hose, value $1000. The company owns three horses. The entire valuation of real and personal property is $18,750.

In the second story of the engine-house is a parlor. It is carpeted with Brussels, has a fine suite of furniture and piano and the walls are decorated with pictures.

The number of active members of the company is twenty-seven, and honorary members, ninety-one.

The officers in 1887 were: President, William Price; Vice-President, Scott Porter; Secretary, William McCracken; Treasurer, H. R. Price; Trustees, Wm. Brown, E. G. Patterson, Sr., and Wm. Walker.

The Water Witch Fire Company was instituted with thirty members May 1, 1883. It was incorporated

1 In 1860 William Morrow was president; Thomas Porter, vice-president; Henry Shone, secretary; and J. Wesley Hawkins, treasurer.
January 22, 1835, and filled a very influential position in the Fire Department of the city to the time it disbanded, in 1882. The first engine-house of this company was on Fifth Street, nearly opposite Every Evening office. It was a small frame building erected by the members of the company at a cost of two hundred dollars. The bell was hung on a pole in front of the engine-house. The Delaware Fire Company presented the Water Witch with a hand-engine, September 10, 1840. The company bought a new hand-engine of Betts, Pusey & Harlan, for two thousand dollars. It was tried in front of City Hall, and threw water one hundred and eighty-three feet on the street, and fifteen feet above the spire of the City Hall. It had two side streams, three receiving streams and one suction. This engine was used for twenty years, and in 1860 was sold for old iron. The same year a new steam fire-engine was bought of a Philadelphia firm, and in 1873 another engine of Clapp & Jones, Hudson, New York, at a cost of five thousand dollars.

In 1837, F. Robinson was president; B. Staggers, vice-president; T. C. Plumly, treasurer; E. A. Wilson, secretary; F. Hollingsworth, E. A. Wilson, Cyrus Pyle, C. P. Mattock, H. Robinson, engineers. On June 1839, this company extinguished the fire and saved from destruction the brig “Rupert,” from Bangor, Maine, on her way down the Delaware from Philadelphia to Matanzas. The firemen went to the rescue of the vessel on the steamboat “New Jersey.” In 1840 the company built a two-story engine-house on Shipley Street, between Fifth and Sixth Streets. It was rebuilt three stories high in 1857, at a cost of four thousand dollars; a one thousand six hundred pound bell, costing five hundred dollars, was bought at the same time.

May 12, 1841, W. Buchman, J. L. Pusey and T. F. Lowe presented each member of the Water Witch with a fire hat, cape, coat and belt.

The Fame Hose Company.—A meeting for the organization of this company was held at the “Bird in Hand” tavern on Front Street, kept by Joseph K. Robinett, on New Year’s day, 1839, when Joseph S. Hedges was elected president, Joseph K. Robinett secretary and James C. Aiken treasurer. Some of the other original members were Henry G. Banning (now president of the National Bank of Delaware), (George Richardson, president of the Farmers’ Bank of Delaware), Buduy Simmons, Samuel N. Pusey, John Stewart, Charles Warner, David Woolman and Lewis Paynter. The permanent name of the company was not decided upon, until a committee returned from Philadelphia, where a hose-carriage was procured for $350 from the Fame Hose Company of that city, when this organization assumed the same name. A charter of incorporation was obtained February 9, 1841. The officers of the company in 1846 were: president, John A. Griffin; vice-president, James C. Aiken; treasurer, John C. Patterson; secretary, John T. Robinson; directors, Bernard Calahan, Lewis Paynter, John Read, Joseph S. Hedges, John Bowers and David Pogue.

In 1850, Lewis Paynter was president; Joseph Hyde, vice-president; Joseph K. Robinett, secretary; James C. Aiken, treasurer; William Stevenson, Robert A. Young, John Decatur, William Banner, Albert Cox and William McLaughlin, directors.

The first headquarters of the company was nearly opposite the present engine-house, on the north side of Second Street, where a two-story brick building was erected, at a cost of $1500. It was afterwards made into a three-story building and continued to be used until 1873, when the handsome three-story brick engine-house now owned by this company was completed at a cost of $13,000. The iron front, costing $3000, was made in Baltimore. The building committee were: David Woolman, John Y. Christy, John Wentz, Manuel Richenberger, John Stewart, Leighton Grimes and Harry Feldmeyer. Elliot & Houston made a hose-carriage for the company in 1846, which was in use until 1883. In 1867 the company purchased a Haupt steam fire-engine, at a cost of $4600, though the name Fame Hose Company was still retained. This engine was disposed of in 1874, and in May of that year a committee appointed by the company purchased a new engine from R. J. Gould, of Newark, New Jersey, at a cost of $3500. This engine was brought to Wilmington from Chicago, having been sent there by the manufacturer to take part in a competitive trial of engines of American manufacture. A new hose-carriage was made for the company by William S. Bullock in 1887, at a cost of $405.

The Fame in 1846 was composed mostly of owners of real estate. J. A. Griffin was president and J. T. Robinson secretary. The same year this company bought a new hose-carriage, made by Elliot & Houston, of Wilmington. On one side of it was painted the Goddess of Fame holding a trumpet in one hand and a portrait of Washington in the other. This was done as a mark of “Friendship toward the Washington” company. On the other side of the carriage the goddess was represented as sculling over the open sea, while the “Water Witch” was plowing her way over the waves underneath her.

The first time this company was brought into active service was in 1839, at a fire in New Castle, where the members arrived there on foot, fifty-eight minutes after starting from Wilmington. Within the past few years this company has paid fraternal visits to fire companies in Hagerstown and Frederick, Mary-
NEW CASTLE COUNTY.

In the second story of the engine-house is a parlor elegantly furnished, with hanging pictures, full parlor suite of furniture and Brussels carpet. The meeting room is on the third floor. The total value of the effects of the company, including apparatus, three horses and real estate, is about $23,000; number of active and honorary members, two hundred and fifty-six. The officers in 1887 were Hugo F. Bourdon, president; Lewis Peekey, vice-president; Alexander Whitcraft, secretary; Thomas Johnson, treasurer; Alexander Whincraft, Hugh F. Sweeney and James Crawford, trustees.

The Washington Fire Company.—The first meeting of the citizens of Wilmington, who laid the plans for the organization of the Washington Fire Company, was held in a school-house, on the east side of Shipley Street, above Third. On the 4th of January, 1840, the second meeting was held at the Delaware House, where the organization was affected with John Quinby as president, Samuel McLaughlin secretary, and John Luff treasurer. Of the original members Thomas Mitchell, of Wilmington, and William Blackshire, now of Philadelphia, are still living.

The first apparatus was a hand-engine presented by the Friendship Fire Company, known among its members as the “Black Maria.” A hose-carriage was bought from a Philadelphia hose company for one hundred and fifty dollars. The hand-engine was in use until October 18, 1842, when Bets, Pusey & Harlan built for the company, at a cost of one thousand two hundred and ninety-five dollars, a new hand-engine which did good service until 1866. It was then sold to the Fenwick Fire Company, of Salem, New Jersey, for four hundred dollars, and the same year a new Amoskeag steam fire-engine was purchased at a cost of four thousand six hundred and fifty dollars. This engine is still in active use. In 1899 it was rebuilt at Manchester, New Hampshire. The third hose-carriage was built by John Tweed, of Wilmington. The fine hook-and-ladder truck now owned by the Washington was bought in New York, July 3, 1866, for one thousand three hundred and fifty dollars. By this additional apparatus it became also a truck company.

The name first given to the company was the Fame Fire Company of Wilmington. This was changed to the present title about six months after organization. During the first few months the apparatus was kept in the Friendship engine-house, then on the east side of Market Street, where the Smith Building stands. The first engine-house of the Washington was a one-story frame, on East Sixth Street, between Market and King. This was torn down in 1852, and on the same site a three-story brick engine-house was erected and used as the headquarters of the company until 1873. It was then sold to the city for four thousand two hundred and fifty dollars, and is now occupied by the offices of the city treasurer, auditor and street commissioner.

In 1873 the company bought the lot on the west side of French Street, between Third and Fourth, from Mrs. McNamee, for four thousand seven hundred dollars, and the same year erected the present engine-house, three stories high, at a cost of thirteen thousand dollars. The building committee were William Hanna, Isaac G. Saxton, Maxwell B. Dixon, Samuel R. Jones, Thomas Massey and Isaac Stevenson. This company has on several occasions paid fraternal visits to the Fire Departments of Norfolk, Petersburg and Richmond, Va., Charleston, S. C., and Philadelphia, Reading and Harrisburg, Pa.

Among the interesting relics of the Washington carefully preserved are a large gilt frame, six by nine feet, containing pictures of prominent members of the company at different times; a silver horn presented, in 1866, by the Hanover Presbyterian Church of Wilmington; a gold horn and silk flag by the First Presbyterian Church in 1866; a white metal horn presented by the citizens of New Castle for services rendered at a fire March 19, 1869; a solid silver horn in a case presented by the Washington Fire Company, of Conshohocken, Pa.; a silk banner presented by the United Fire Company, of Norfolk, in 1872; and a silver pitcher and goblet by the Fire Department of Charleston, S. C., in 1872.

Wecessie Fire Company, whose engine-house is at the corner of Jackson and Second Streets, was organized July 19, 1869. The first meeting to take steps toward the formation of a company in the western part of the city, was held at the house of John Thompson, on Linden Street. The first members of the company were William J. Donaughy, Robert Cottingham, Dennis J. Menton, Michael Holland, John Dunn, Charles W. Solloway, Samuel Cannon, John Thompson, Benjamin Green, John J. Donahue, James Harigian, Bernard: Nugent, Philip Lynch, James Zehley, Michael Vaughan, James P. Devlin, James A. Bourke and Edward McGuire. Of these, ten were members in 1887.
The first officers of the company were Dennis J. Menton, president; William J. Donoughy, secretary; John Dunn, treasurer; Samuel Cannon, William Green, Michael Holland, Robert Cottingham and James Zebley, directors.

The name first chosen was "The Western Fire Company," by which it was designated but a short time. A committee composed of William J. Donoughy, Robert Cottingham and Dennis J. Menton petitioned the City Council to be admitted into the Fire Department of Wilmington as a hose company. Another committee appointed to procure apparatus visited the Weccaco Hose Company, of Camden, New Jersey, and obtained from that company a fine hose-carriage for $250 and five hundred feet of hose for $300. It was decided then to call the new organization the Weccaco Hose Company of Wilmington, in honor of the Camden company. Philip Lynch was chosen the first honorary member, and being a man of wealth was of valuable service to the Weccaco in its early days. Robert Cottingham served several years as treasurer and is yet a member of the company.

When the first hose-carriage became unfitted for use it was sold to a Philadelphia dealer and another one purchased of a fire company in Reading, Pennsylvania, for $350. William S. Bullock, of Wilmington, about the same time, made for the Weccaco the hose-cart now in use.

It continued as a hose company until December 3, 1875, when it was chartered as "Weccaco Steam Fire-Engine Company, No. 8," which name it now bears. The fire engine was obtained from Samuel Tazewell, of Wilmington, for $1500, which was used until 1878 when it was sold to the Rolling-Mills Company at Marshallton, Delaware. The same year the company bought a second-class Clapp & Jones engine, which is now in use, for $5500. The first engine-house of the Weccaco was a frame building on Liberty Street, erected by members of the company. It continued to be the headquarters for three years, when a site was secured nearly opposite the present engine-house, on which a two-story engine-house was built at a cost of $3500. In 1886 this was sold and the present convenient and suitable location secured, upon which was erected, in 1886, at a cost of $9000, the handsome three-story brick engine-house, thirty by eighty feet, now owned and occupied by the Weccaco, and of which its members can justly feel proud. The building committee were John McCloskey, Charles W. Solloway, Peter Matthews and Michael Walsh. The first floor is used for the apparatus; on the second story front is an elegantly furnished parlor, to the rear of which is the business meeting room of the company; the third story is a large hall used as a ball room and contains a piano.

The equipments are an engine, hose-cart, 2000 feet of hose and three bay horses. The total value of real and personal property of the company is nearly $20,000. Some of the presidents of the company have been D. J. Menton, Robert Cottingham, Edward Nugent, Ezra Lukens and William F. Green; secretaries, J. P. Devlin (now an active member), Charles W. Solloway, Charles Lukens, Edward McGuire and Michael S. Kelley. Peter H. Miller is the present treasurer.

Chief Fire Engineers.—An ordinance was passed April 6, 1868, reorganizing the Fire Department. One of its provisions created the office of chief engineer of the department, to be elected by the members of the different companies for a term of two years. The following is a list of the engineers, with the names of the company to which they belonged:

1868. Wilson E. Perkins. Delaware
1870. Samuel Springer. Friendship
1872-74. George McCall. Washington
1876. William Hanna. Delaware

For many years members of the fire companies paid their poll tax with firemen's certificates, under an ordinance granting that privilege. In 1843 this law was repealed. In 1842 the city collector passed into the hands of the treasurer $2390 in firemen's certificates. This money accrued to the companies and aided them in the improvement of apparatus. An appropriation of $1000 to the city fire companies was authorized by the State Legislature in 1843. This was amended in 1847, increasing the amount to $1500. The sum of $2500 is now annually appropriated to each company by City Council.

The Fire Watch, or fire alarm station for many years was on the top of City Hall. The Fire Alarm Telegraph was first used in Wilmington, July 4, 1882.

Parade in 1841.—On May 1, 1841, all the fire companies of the city engaged in a street parade in order to show the strength of the Fire Department and make a display of the apparatus, much of which was new. Jeremiah W. Duncan was chief marshal and Dr. H. F. Askew and George Powell assistants. The Water Witch, with seventy-three members, marshaled by Richard P. Gilpin, headed the parade. They wore black hats and caps, with the name of the company in gold letters. The Washington came next with sixty-eight members, wearing black hats and caps, with George Gregg as marshal. The Phenix was in citizens' dress with name of company in gold letters on hats. There were seventy-two members in line, under command of William F. Rice. James L. Devou led off the Friendship, following with their "newly improved, enlarged and beautified" engine. Thirty members marched in line with blue hats and caps with name of company in gold letters. The Reliance, forty-seven members, with their "new, highly ornamental engine, with carved work," followed. George McCorkle marshaled them. They wore green caps and hats. The Brandywine Company, with thirty-eight members, wearing black tarpaulin hats and a black badge gilded with the name of the company. Milton Russell marched in the van. Then came the Delaware, just two years old, with ninety members in line, wearing "handsome hats and highly ornamental caps," with Wilson Pierson marshal. This parade was the subject of conversation for several days thereafter, so delighted were the people with the display.

The Firemen's Centennial Association was formed January 16, 1876, by representative delegates of the different fire companies of Wilmington. Its object was to raise funds and erect a building on the exhibition grounds at Philadelphia, to represent the State during the Centennial. At the first meeting in the Washington engine-house George McCall, of the Washington, was elected president; William Blake, of Fame Hose, vice-president; S. H. Baylis, of the Friendship, secretary; George A. Messick, of the Reliance, assistant secretary; and Joseph K. Adams, of the Water Witch, treasurer. The finance committee was composed of George McCall, Thomas Lynch, Joseph H. Smith, Alfred H. Kirby, L. Stidham and L. Grimes; the soliciting committee, John Stratman, Joseph K. Adams, William Hanna, P. H. Peterson, Robert Cottingham, D. Richardson and J. Porter. Efforts were at once made and by the middle of April sufficient money was raised. J. K. Adams, J. W. Carey, George A. Messick, B. Richardson, T. Riley, George McCall and C. Lukens were appointed the building committee. E. L. Rice, Jr., was the architect.

A neat and attractive cottage was erected during the months of April and May at a cost of two thousand three hundred and sixty-four dollars. It became the pride of every Delawarean who visited the Centennial Exhibition and was familiarly known as the "Delaware Building." The whole Firemen's Association, together with thousands of other people of the State, visited the Centennial on "Delaware Day," October 19, 1876. This association, after having accomplished its patriotic work, feeling very jubilant over it, did not disband until February 18, 1878.

Insurance Companies.—The Delaware Fire Insurance Company was organized August 19, 1825, with a capital of one hundred thousand dollars, of which thirty thousand dollars was immediately paid in. William Seal was elected president; Daniel Byrne, secretary; and William Chandler, John Patterson, Joseph Bailey, David C. Wilson, Joseph C. Gilpin, Robert Porter, Joseph Grubb and David Bush, directors. The first office was at 21 Shipley Street, but removed to 29 Shipley in 1829. It was a stock company in shares of fifty dollars each, and paid a dividend of three per cent. at the end of the first six months, and dividends varying from four to six per cent. semi-annually thereafter. A charter was obtained January 25, 1826, giving the company the privilege of taking both inland and marine insurance. William Wales and T. C. Alrich were elected directors in 1830, and William Mendenhall secretary, with offices on Shipley Street, two doors below post-office. He died in 1839, and Matthew Kean succeeded him as secretary. November 2, 1883, the seventeenth dividend of five per cent. was paid. In 1844 George Jones was president and Matthew Kean secretary, and the directors were George Jones, William Chandler, John Wales, David Bush, Thomas C. Alrich, Joseph Mendenhall, Joseph Scott and John Ferras. Perpetual insurance on real estate was then taken. The same persons were officers and directors in 1850.

This company gradually extended its business with profitable results, and in 1876 declared two stock dividends amounting to forty-five thousand dollars. The full capital stock was then paid in. The assets in 1879 amounted to one hundred and five thousand one hundred and sixty-one dollars, and the liabilities to fourteen thousand six hundred and eight dollars. The officers were William Canby, president; F. L. Gilpin, secretary and treasurer; and William Canby, George W. Sparks, Wm. G. Gibbons, George W. Stone, John R. Tatum, George W. Bush, William M. Canby, George S. Capelle, the board of managers. The office was then at 608 Market Street.

The company continued in business until March 10, 1884, when it was decided, owing to the small margin of profit realized after the increase of the capital stock in 1879, paid up largely out of the earnings of previous years, that it was to the best interest of stockholders to reinsurance the company's liabilities under the policies of insurance, retire from business and make a dividend of assets among the stockholders. The reinsurance was effected in the American Fire Insurance Company of Philadelphia, and during the year ending December 31, 1886, there was paid back to the stockholders $104,600, including $4600 surplus over the capital of $100,000.

The Wilmington Insurance Company was incorporated February 20, 1883, with a capital of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. Its office was on the east side of Market Street, first door below City Hall. James Canby was the first president and Lea Pusey secretary. The other original directors were James Price, Stephen Bonsall, Lewis Rumford, Vincent Gilpin, Jesse Mendenhall, Jacob Pusey, Edward Tannall, Thomas H. Larkin, Joseph C. Gilpin, Washington Rice and George Bush. This company did not take marine insurance. In 1835 Stephen Bonsall was elected president, William McCaulley secretary, and Samuel Hilles and E. I. Du Pont were directors. In 1842 other new directors were John Bullock, James Delaplaine, Dr. R. R. Porter, Samuel Bubby, Thomas Janvier, John A. Duncan, John Rice and Joseph Bringhurst. The office was then opposite City Hall, in property bought that year of Philip Jones. In 1847 the company had an eight per cent. dividend. In 1849 William McCaulley was succeeded by Joseph Bringhurst as secretary. Soon after this date it closed out business.

The Farmers' Mutual Fire Insurance Company of the State of Delaware was organized June 12, 1889, at the Mermaid Tavern in Mill Creek Hundred. The first officers elected were James Thompson, president; Robert McCabe, secretary; Jonathan Wilson, treasurer; William Bracken, Thomas Walter, David Wilson, Maxwell B. Ocheltree, managers; Dr. F. W. Clement, Philip Chandler, Stephen M. Stapler, Matthew Lockhard, Stephen B. Johnson and M. B. Ocheltree, appraisers. A charter was procured March 24, 1848, the original name being the Farmers' Mutual Fire Insurance Company of Mill Creek Hundred, by which it was known until a revised charter extending the privileges of the company was received in 1853, and the present name given to it. Originally the taking of risks by this company was limited to Mill Creek Hundred. By resolution passed August 25, 1841, the territory was increased so as to include White Clay Creek and Christiana Hundreds, and in 1847, the whole of New Castle County. Insurance is now taken throughout the State of Delaware and the bordering counties of Maryland. The company was organized with a board of three managers, which in 1843 was increased to nine, and in March, 1853, increased to seventeen, and January, 1878, reduced to fifteen—five elected annually for three years. The managers elected in 1843 were Aquila Lamborn, James Griffin, M. B. Ocheltree, James J. Brindley, John S. Caldwell, John Allen, Thomas Bennerson, Thomas B. Armstrong and James Lindsey.

The regular business meetings of the company were held at the Mermaid Tavern in Mill Creek Hundred, from 1839 to 1850, when, after a few meetings held at the Indian Queen Hotel in Wilmington, a room was secured in the Odd Fellows' Hall in Wilmington. This continued to be the office of the company until 1865, the year in which the premises now owned and occupied by the company at 833 Market Street, were purchased of Miss Black for $6000, and a brown stone office and dwelling erected at an additional cost of $16,500.

Only a limited amount of insurance was taken the first year of the company's history, but since 1870 it has steadily increased. The following statistics will illustrate the growth and prosperity of the company:

The cash surplus fund in 1850 was $10,700; 1869, $61,000; 1875, $129,000; 1880, $234,000; 1886, $230,000. In addition to the above cash surplus, the company holds $900,000 of notes of members subject to assessment in the event of extraordinary losses. As a security to members, this fund is invested in city, county and railroad bonds and first mortgage liens. The value of life policies issued by the company is $11,442,666; the amount received from members for annual payments, and the interest on loans and investments for the year 1886, was $56,904. The amount of losses by fire, paid from 1851 to 1886, was $534,935. The affairs of this company are carefully and judiciously managed to the best interest of all members.

Jonathan Wilson held the position of treasurer from the time of the organization of the company until his death, in March, 1850, when Pusey Wilson was elected, who served one year, when the office of sec-

The office of vice-president was created by act of the Legislature, March 23, 1888, and William Canby elected January 21, 1884. He filled the office until elected president of the company, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of William Tatnall. George Richardson was chosen vice-president November 2, 1885. William Tatnall, who was a director for thirty years, and president fifteen years, died suddenly in the office, while attending to business, October 28, 1885.

a school in a frame building in the centre of an orchard, back of which is now southeast corner of Third Street and Spring Alley. He taught both sexes; but he said he did not think it was necessary for girls to "go in arithmetic further than through simple Division, 'cause it was no use; only tom-boys, with big slates, would care to cipher in the Double Rule of Three."

Dr. Nicholas Way and Samuel Canby were among his pupils.

Robert Coram was an old-time schoolmaster of note. In 1790 he taught in a building on Fourth Street between Market and King Streets.

James Filson taught in Wilmington before the Revolution. He returned from the army with no injury, save a slight wound in the right arm. He again opened his school in 1785, and continued it for two years. His wounded arm prevented him from "threshing the boys" as he thought they deserved; so he abandoned his profession, went to Kentucky, and was one of the early adventurers there with Daniel Boone. He made the first complete map of the State of Kentucky. Less favored than the famous hunter, he fell a victim to the tomahawk, and was killed in a desperate contest with an Indian about 1810.

The name of the teacher who succeeded Filson has not been ascertained. The latter studied law with Gunning Bedford, and removed to Tennessee, and was one of the first Representatives in Congress from that State.

John Theilwell was a well-known teacher in Wilmington and the surrounding country. He began his career in his chosen profession about 1765, and continued it for nearly half a century, besides following the occupations of bellman, market master and clerk. He was one of the founders of the Asbury Methodist Church, and its first records were kept on the fly-leaves of his "ciphering-book." His daughter, Deborah, was also a teacher.

Mrs. Elizabeth Way was a popular teacher of needle-work in 1790, and later taught in a room of her own house on French Street, where a dozen or more girls of that day were continually under instruction. She used a cat's-o'-nine-tails to make her pupils obedient, and put leather spectacles on those who did imperfect work. In her early days she was a schoolmate of Benjamin West, the famous painter.

M. Michel Martel, a French refugee, was a teacher in Wilmington a century or more ago. He was a linguist, and, tradition says, knew fifteen languages. Success attended him in New York and Boston, where he had taught for years. Hearing that some of his friends lived in Wilmington, he determined to spend the remainder of his days with them. Two more years in his profession were spent with pleasure and profit in Wilmington, and he then fell a victim to paralysis. He lost his knowledge of all languages save his native tongue. Sad as it was, charity waned, and M. Martel, now poor, became an inmate in the County Almshouse, a large white building on the hill west of the town, where he died. He had once been a teacher of Theodosia Burr and on intimate terms with her father, Aaron Burr. To her he dedicated several poems, chiefly translations, which he wrote in this country. Aaron Burr visited Wilmington when Vice-President of the United States, in 1803. People thought he would be generous to his daughter's former preceptor, but with his characteristic ingratitude, said he knew Martel when he was rich—he did not know him in his poverty.

William Cobbett taught school for awhile in an old house standing on Quaker Hill (so named on account of the numerous Quaker families residing there). Cobbett's straight, soldierly figure and military tread, were well known in the town and long remembered by his scholars.

Monsieur Turel, in 1797, had a fencing school on Market Street, and Francis Gattels a drawing and dancing academy on French Street. Azariah Forbes, on January 5, 1803, began to teach "psalmody" in the academy. At the expiration of one quarter, he congratulated himself and the public on his success, and resolved to continue his instructions. M. de Coutrad opened a dancing school at Mr. McCoy's house, on Market Street, in September, 1803. Catharine Hall, in 1804, advertised a school in which she taught pupils to play on the piano. The next year, John Scanlan started a school on Shipley Street, and Mrs. Chandler her seminary on Market Street. John Webster advertised, in 1805, that he could "teach the Latin and Greek classics with grammatical accuracy and give strict attention to the vernacular tongue." He was a teacher in Wilmington as early as 1785. For a number of years he presided over his "kingdom" on Quaker Hill.

General Lewis Cass, a distinguished American statesman, who represented Michigan in the United States Senate, was Secretary of War in the Cabinet of Andrew Jackson; minister to France, and Secretary of State in President Buchanan's Cabinet, and a candidate for President against Taylor, taught school in Wilmington during 1797. He was born in New Hampshire, came to Wilmington on foot on his way West and remained here nearly a year. In 1848, when he made a great speech in City Hall, he referred to his experience as a teacher in Wilmington, a few of his former pupils being present.

In 1814, Evan Lewis taught a Ladies' Seminary on corner of Sixth and King; Miss Elizabeth Montgomery a sewing and drawing school at Market corner of Eighth Street; Miss Eleanor Bonsall a similar school on Market Street. Miss Green's school was at 109 Shipley; Miss Deborah Theilwell at 39 King; Mrs. Woodside, on Shipley Street; Mrs. Martha Mason's at 223 Market; Mrs. Hannah Hollingsworth 147 King Street; Azariah Forbes had an English and musical school at the corner of King and Fourth Streets; James Davis' school was at 136 King; Joel Zane's at 65 East Front; Jesse Gause's
NEW CASTLE COUNTY.

West Street near Friends' Meeting-house; William Rankin's, West Street, corner of Seventh. William Wickes opened a select school for young ladies, August 3, 1814, and Richard Elkton a seminary for young ladies and gentlemen on French Street.

In 1814 there was one school for colored children, with thirty-four pupils. On January, 1816, Evan Lewis sold to William Seal, Jacob Arlinchs and Benjamin Webb, trustees of the African School Society, a lot on Sixth Street between West and Tatnall, on which a school-house for colored children was built, at the cost of eight hundred dollars. Nicholas Donelly, on January 25, 1822, removed his school from Oxford to Wilmington, and opened it at the house of Mr. Pogue, on Market Street. He advertised to teach a "class of English grammarians on the celebrated plan of Mr. Greenleaf." D. Hewett in 1822, advertised "a geography and penmanship school near the Indian Queen tavern. Running hand a specialty." The Female Free School was kept in the Presbyterian Church in 1823. The Misses Grovenor in 1823 opened a seminary for females under the direction of Rev. R. Williston, of St. Andrew's Church. In 1826 they moved to King Street; their school was well patronized. Mr. and Mrs. Shiffer had a school on Orange Street in 1824. Mrs. Brady began teaching in Wilmington in the same year.

H. Hardy, in 1833, opened a school in the Second Presbyterian Church session-room. Miss M. C. Smith opened a boarding-school in 1825, which was quite popular.

The system of grammar taught by James Brown, in his school, was criticised through the newspapers. This annoyed him so much that he called a public meeting in the Town Hall in 1825, where he defended his mode of teaching. Edward Maher the same year kept a school above the "barber-shop" on Front Street.

Enoch Roberts, who was a noted teacher in Wilmington, in 1828 gave a course of lectures in the Town Hall on the Natural Sciences. Edward Worrell kept the "Union school room," Fourth and French Streets, in 1828. James C. Allen, from 1826 to 1830, taught a school on Orange Street above Fourth.

William Sherer removed from Newark in 1826, where he taught several years and started a young ladies' boarding-school in Wilmington, which he conducted until 1838, when Bishop Davenport succeeded him with several female assistants.

Enoch Lewis, afterward noted as a mathematician and educator, taught a school for advanced pupils at Third and West Streets about 1830.

Caleb Kimber began the Wilmington Seminary for boys on Market Street near Eighth in 1835. His school was large and popular. In 1842, he and J. Sharpless revised and published an edition of Comly's Spelling-book.

Madame Declémy started a French school in 1835.

J. M. Goodman opened "his celebrated Chirographic Institution" on Market Street in 1835.

James Gardner, July 6, 1835, opened an English and classical school in a room on the third floor of Webb's leather-store, at Orange and Fourth Streets. J. McNevin, in 1836, and before, taught a seminary for boys and girls on Eighth Street, between Market and King Streets.

Drawing, painting and French school by F. G. Gwinzewski in 1839.

Mrs. Janvier's seminary for young ladies was prosperous in 1840. It was situated three-quarters of a mile west of the city.

Mr. Parker had a school at Sixth and French Sts. in 1839, with Miss Wilkinson as assistant. Miss Charlotte Grimshaw succeeded Mrs. M. C. Smith with a school for young ladies, in 1842, on King Street.

John Thomas, in 1840, was principal of an academy in the old Presbyterian Church on Market Street.

Mrs. Maxwell's academy for young ladies was opened in 1841.

In 1840 the Wilmington Classical Institute, with Rev. S. M. Galey as principal, was removed from Market Street to Mantonia, one mile from the city. This was quite a school in its day.

In 1842 Rev. Corry Chambers started the Literary Institute.

The Franklin Academy was established in 1842, on Sixth Street, between Market and King Streets, by Benjamin F. Niles and Mary B. Niles.

John T. Page, a graduate of Bowdoin College in 1845, began a classical school in "Mayor Wilson's new building, on Market Street."

Captain Aldin Partridge, in 1846, opened a military and scientific academy at Ninth and Market Streets, and Colonel Hyatt's celebrated Chester Military Academy was started in Wilmington, at the corner of Ninth and Tatnall Streets. It prospered here for a few years, and was then removed to West Chester, occupying the old Bolmar Academy, and from thence to its present location, at Chester, Pa.

The Hannah More Academy, for young ladies, was for many years a well-conducted educational institution, at the northwest corner of Eighth and West Streets. The building, which is now used as a boarding-house, was erected in 1853, with large recreation-rooms, dormitories and dining-room. The principals were Misses Charlotte and Isabella Grimshaw. Dr. Arthur H. Grimshaw delivered lectures to the students on various subjects. This school flourished for many years.

Carson Adams, who afterward became a prominent clergyman in New England, taught a classical school in the basement of Hanover Street Church in 1847. Rev. E. Wilsoa, in the same year, moved from Newark, and started a school in Wilmington, at the corner of Eighth and West Streets. In 1849 he opened a boarding-school for girls.
Rev. Azariah Prior was principal of Trinity Episcopal Church school in 1849.

William Robert Stratton, in 1850, opened a select school for boys at the corner of Fourth and West Streets. Sarah Tyson was at the same time teacher of the Friends' school, on West Street.

Rev. T. M. Cann's Young Ladies' Institute was well patronized in 1859.

James H. Crabb taught in the Wilmington Academy for several years, beginning in 1876.

Joshua Maule was one of the most successful teachers of Delaware. He was born in Radnor, Pa., in 1776, of Quaker parentage. At the age of eighteen he enlisted in the army, and joined the march to quell the Whiskey Insurrection in Western Pennsylvania, but his father met him at Downingtown, and induced him to return. He taught school near home, and, in 1803, came to Wilmington and founded the boarding-school for girls on King Street. He became a minister among the Friends, and in 1809 made a religious visit to Canada. In 1809 Eli Hilles joined him in the school. Joshua Maule died in 1812, in Bucks County, where he had gone on a visit.

The Old Academy was situated on the east side of Market Street between Eighth and Ninth. The building was built of stone, two and a half stories high and stood a distance in from the street. It was the leading educational institution in the State of Delaware during the latter part of the last century. Many hallowed associations to the early residents of Wilmington, were associated with it, as within its walls most of them obtained their education. It was built as early as 1765, on land obtained from John Stalup, within a beautiful grove of native trees.

The celebrated preacher of Methodism, George Whitefield, on his visit to this country in 1774, noted in his journal: "In the academy woods at Wilmington I preached to 3000 persons." On April 10, 1773, it was chartered as a Public Grammar School for the County of New Castle. Rev. Lawrence Girelius, pastor of the Old Swedes' Church, was the first president of the board of trustees. Some of the first members of the board were Bishop White, Hon. Thomas McKean, Gunning Bedford, Dr. Robert Smith, Thomas Gilpin, Dr. Nicholas Way and Joseph Shallcross. The first principal of this institution of learning, of whom there is any record, was Professor Robert Patterson. He was the father of Dr. Robert M. Patterson, of Philadelphia, once president of the United States Mint. When the War of the Revolution opened, he proved himself to be a devoted patriot—versed in military tactics. He began to drill his older pupils, and the young men of the town and vicinity. Israel Gilpin, whom he trained, took charge of this company. Prof. Patterson afterward joined the New Jersey Line, and was a major in the paymaster's department during the war.

The instructors in charge of the academy soon after the war were M. Murdock and M. Maffett.

In 1786 a meeting of scientific men was held in it, among whom were Benjamin Franklin, Dr. Rittenhouse, Benjamin Rush and James Madison. They brought with them instruments for astronomical investigation, and from the cupola of the building made some observations. The next day Dr. Franklin experimented with electricity.

Interest in the academy must have declined about 1795, when the building was turned into a cotton factory, and filled with looms and spinning-jennies, and so continued for a few years.

In 1803 it was remodeled and refitted, and on January 26th of that year an act was passed revoking the charter granted in 1773, and granting power to found an institution of learning in the academy building, to be known as the "College of Wilmington." The province of the institution was "to educate the young in the American, learned and foreign languages." Gunning Bedford was chosen president of the board of trustees. The other members were William White, Thomas Read, D.D., John Dickinson, Caesar A Rodney, James A. Bayard, Dr. James Tilton, Dr. George Monro, Outerbridge Horsey, Dr. Latimer, Jacob Broom, Louis McLane, Joseph Tatnall, Henry Latimer, Thomas McComb, Robert Hamilton, Ebenezer Smith, Joshua Gilpin, David Hall, Nicholas Ridgely, James Sykes, John Warner, James Lea, Thomas Lea, James Wilson, Daniel Rodney, George Kennard and William McKee. This board of trustees was remarkable for the number of distinguished men in it. The charter of 1803 gave full powers to grant degrees upon graduation, but there is no record of any classes that completed a collegiate course. The higher branches were taught, however, by experienced teachers. William Maffett and his brother John, who was a graduate of Yale College, were teachers. E. K. Dare was principal of the male department, and Abraham Kinsey of the female department.

In 1805 an act was passed allowing the trustees to raise money by lottery to support the institution, which power was renewed in 1809. In 1811 an act to raise ten thousand dollars by lottery was passed.

In 1814 the Latin department was in charge of Job Staples. He was succeeded in 1818 by Joseph Downing, a teacher who was very successful. He was superintendent of Trinity Church Sunday-school of three hundred pupils, which in 1819 met in the academy. Lyman Matthews, a graduate of Middlebury College, Vermont, was elected principal of the academy in 1823, by the trustees, composed of E.W. Gilpin, Archibald Hamilton, Robert Porter, Rev. E. W. Gilbert, John Brinckle, M.D., John Rumsey, and Allan Thomson. Edward L. Forest, a linguist, was chosen an assistant. William Rankin was a principal in 1825, and returned thanks to the people for their liberal patronage. Mrs. Aurelia W. Corlant at this time had charge of the female department.

The building was offered for sale by the sheriff of New Castle County in 1825, but was bought by the corner of Seventh and King Streets, where he continued to reside during the remainder of his life. Being a practical character and of sterling integrity, he lived for the benefit of mankind.
NEW CASTLE COUNTY.

Masons, to whom the debt was due, to prevent the sheriff's sale. Dr. H. L. Davis, was principal in 1826, and still advertised it as "Wilmington College."

Byron Lawrence, a graduate of Oxford University, succeeded in 1828 as the principal.

The building was sold to David C. Wilson, who tore it down about 1832 and erected private residences on the site.

The Boarding-School for Young Ladies, conducted by Eli and Samuel Hilles, was an educational institution of high standing and excellent reputation. Joshua Maule, a very worthy member of the Society of Friends, had been conducting a school on King Street for a few years. In 1809 Eli Hilles came to Wilmington from Chester County, Pa., and in association with him founded a boarding-school for young ladies on the east side of King Street, between Seventh and Eighth. The building occupied for this school at first was a large mansion erected by Matthew Crips in 1797. Under the intelligent and well-directed management of these two gentlemen the school was at once filled with pupils coming from the homes of the better class of people. It was not a sectarian school, and young ladies whose parents belonged to different religious denominations were admitted. Joshua Maule died a few years after the institution was established, and Samuel Hilles, who had opened a school for boys in an octagonal building, near the present site of Central Presbyterian Church, discontinued that, and associated with his brother, Eli Hilles, in conducting the boarding-school for girls in the building where it was first started. The intimate friendship of these two brothers, and their superior qualification for the careful education and training of the young ladies who composed their school, gained for it increased popularity. It was at a time when there were very few schools in this country for young ladies, and when girls were not generally afforded the same educational advantages as the opposite sex. In 1818 Eli and Samuel Hilles erected a large building, surrounded by beautiful grounds, with a delightful view of the Delaware River, at the northeast corner of Tenth and King Streets. Here, with extended school accommodation and increased facilities, they enlarged the scope of their institution.

Young ladies from nearly all the States of the Union and from the West Indies were pupils. The school became so favorably known for its excellent management, the ennobling influence it exerted on the manners and character of its pupils, and the practical and useful instruction given, that applications were constantly being made for admission to it. The two brothers conducted the school very prosperously together until 1828, when Eli Hilles, intending to retire from the educational work, withdrew from the partnership, and moved into the mansion previously built and occupied by his brother, and now owned by his daughter, Miss Elizabeth B. Hilles, at the southeast corner of Tenth and King Streets, where he continued to reside during the remainder of his life. Being deeply interested in the cause of education, and naturally adapted for the correct training of the young, the next year (1829) Eli Hilles was persuaded to open a day-school for young ladies, to which a few boarding pupils were admitted. For this purpose he erected a building a few doors below his residence on the same side of the street, and successfully conducted a school there from 1829 to 1838. He then retired with a competence as the result of his school work.

Samuel Hilles in 1828 exchanged homes with his brother, moved into the building at the northeast corner of Tenth and King Streets, took charge of the Boarding-School for Young Ladies, and continued its popularity and success until 1832, when he was invited to take a position at Haverford College, then being founded. The Boarding-School was subsequently taught by John M. Smith and Dubre Knight.

Eli Hilles was a son of William and Rebecca Hilles, and was born in Chester County, Pa., in 1783. His ancestors were of Welsh descent. When he was quite young his parents moved to the western part of Pennsylvania when that region contained but few inhabitants. As a young man, he was a diligent student of the books that came within his reach, and for a short time taught school. Soon after he became twenty-one years old he came to the well-known Westtown Boarding-School in Chester County, and was the librarian of that institution several years previous to his removal to Wilmington in 1809—a young man of twenty-six years. In connection with his school interest he took an active part in the growth and prosperity of Wilmington, and during his long life was identified with a number of institutions. As early as 1826 he was elected a director in the Bank of Delaware, and for more than a third of a century continued a member of the board of directors. He was one of the founders of the Savings Fund Society, and for thirty years a director in it. He was also one of the commissioners who secured the establishment of the Union Bank of Delaware. When the city of Wilmington, in 1851, accepted the provisions of the act establishing the public schools he was chosen one of the first members of the Board of School Directors in the city, and was elected its first president, serving but a few weeks when he retired from the position in favor of Judge Willard Hall, and in association with him and others was instrumental in putting into successful operation the excellent school system of which Wilmington now is justly proud. He continued in the School Board about ten years. He was a member of the Society of Friends, and for many years an elder in the meeting at Wilmington. In the days of slavery he was a staunch abolitionist, at a time when it required a brave man, residing in a slave State, to favor the freedom of the colored race. As an enterprising and public-spirited citizen of Wilmington he was highly esteemed by every one who knew him. A man of upright, irreproachable character and sterling integrity, he lived for the benefit of mankind.
Eli Hilles was married in 1809 to Martha Barker, of Burlington, N. J., and the same year came to Wilmington. His wife died in 1849. During the last year of his life he was an invalid, and died in 1863, at the advanced age of eighty years, leaving but one child, Miss Elizabeth B. Hilles, now residing in Wilmington.

Samuel Hilles, son of William and Rebecca Hilles, was born in Chester County, Pennsylvania, November 20, 1788, and died in Wilmington August 4, 1873, aged eighty-five years. When a small boy he moved with his parents to the western part of the State and there obtained the rudiments of his education. When he grew to be a young man he went to the Westtown Boarding-School. Owing to rapid advancement in his studies he was soon invited to become a teacher. He remained in that famous institution as an instructor for a few years and then came to Wilmington and entered upon the prosperous career as an educator, an account of which is given above. After his retirement from the school work in Wilmington in 1832, he spent nearly two years in Haverford College, being invited there to become its general superintendent, and gave his valuable services to that young institution without charge. He then returned to Wilmington, built a house—the first building south of the Old Baptist Church—where he resided until the Boarding-School closed, when he moved into that building. By industry and perseverance he had accumulated a handsome fortune, which was increased by his careful business transactions, and he spent the remainder of his years in looking after his private affairs and in attendance upon the interests of the institutions of Wilmington with which he was connected. In 1841 he was elected a director in the Bank of Delaware, continued a member for thirty-five years, and was one of the board of directors that converted that institution into a National Bank. For a long time he was a director in the Wilmington Savings Fund Society. He was a prominent member of the Society of Friends. Early in life he became interested in the question of the freedom of slaves, was an avowed abolitionist, and at the end of the war was one of the first persons in the State of Delaware to propose means and methods for the education of the children of the colored race. The Howard School in Wilmington was organized largely through his instrumentality. When he was engaged in teaching and during his whole life Samuel Hilles was a diligent student of the science of botany. He was one of the founders of the Wilmington Botanical Society, which existed for several years. Together with his brother and others, he was one of the first members of the Board of Education in Wilmington. He served as secretary of the board for a time and was devotedly interested in the cause of public education. He was a man of excellent judgment, fine intelligence and most exemplary character, constantly using his best effort for the good of the community in which he lived.

Samuel Hilles was married October 31, 1821, to Margaret Hill Smith, on her paternal side a great-granddaughter of James Logan, Deputy Governor of Pennsylvania under William Penn. On her maternal side she was a great-granddaughter of Governor Lloyd, of Pennsylvania. The children of this marriage were Gulielma Maria, William S. and John S. Hilles.

William S. Hilles, the oldest son, was a prominent and influential citizen of Wilmington. In 1861 he was chosen a director in the Bank of Delaware. Subsequently he was one of the founders of the Artisans’ Savings Bank and served as its first president.

Gulielma Maria Hilles was married September 7, 1843, to Charles W. Howland, of Cayuga County, New York, who has resided in Wilmington since 1853. Their children are Samuel Hilles Howland, William H. Howland, Margaret Smith Howland, Charles Samuel Howland, Susan Howland, Rachel Smith Howland.

ST. MARY’S COLLEGE was an institution of learning, founded by Rev. Patrick Reilly, afterwards pastor of St. Mary’s Roman Catholic Church of Wilmington, and vicar-general of the diocese. The entire grounds comprised fifteen acres on Delaware Avenue, and extended from Jefferson to Madison Streets, and ran in an irregular outline on one side to Ninth Street and on another to Monroe.

In 1840 there was a female academy in Wilmington, conducted by the Sisters of Charity. A gentleman whose daughters were being educated here prevailed upon Father Reilly to open a school for boys, which he did August 15, 1841, at his residence at the northeast corner of Fifth and West Streets. The school prospered and he bought a house and grounds of Mr. Bradford, father of the late Judge Bradford, on Delaware Avenue, and removed the school there.

Father Reilly had a natural fondness and great aptness to teach, and his school soon grew in public favor. In 1842 the building was enlarged with dormitories to accommodate thirty-six students, and other day scholars. A charter was obtained from the Legislature of Delaware January 29, 1847, granting full power to confer scholastic degrees. The same year the college building, four stories high and one hundred by sixty feet, was built with a large bell in the belfry.

The first graduates of the institution in 1850 were Wm. McCaulley, of Wilmington; Edward McCabe, of New Orleans; Edward Ridgely, of Dover; and John Fulmer. Archbishop Corrigan, of New York, received his preparatory training here, and eighteen of the students afterwards became priests. The col-

College had students from nearly all the States of the Union, and a few from South America. The first board of trustees were Rev. Patrick Reilly, Rev. J. Walsh, Alfred Du Pont, J. B. Garesche, Dr. S. Miller, Peter N. Brennan and Henry Miller.

In 1857 there were one hundred and twenty students in attendance. The institution prospered until the opening of the war. Students from the South then withdrew and the attendance was greatly diminished. The city extended its limits, and the section surrounding the buildings was occupied by dwelling-houses.

In 1866 the college closed its doors, and in 1868 the building was sold to a syndicate. The older portion was torn down. The main building was afterwards occupied for a short time by the Nuns of the Visitation, a religious community of ladies. It was also torn down a year or two later.

Academy of the Visitation.—Among the educational institutions of high rank in Wilmington is the Academy of the Visitation, conducted by the Sisters of that order, which was founded in France by St. Francis de Sales in 1610, for the education of young ladies of the higher class, and whose academies are well known throughout Europe and the United States. This branch was established in Wilmington in 1868, from the house in Monthbier, near Lyons, France. The academy was first opened in the building on Delaware Avenue, known as St. Mary's College, but at the close of the second scholastic year was removed to the handsome Hollingsworth property on Delaware Avenue, between Harrison and Van Buren Streets, which was purchased by the Rt. Rev. T. A. Becker, bishop of Wilmington, and fitted up for that purpose. Young ladies of all denominations are received as pupils, without regard to creed, and all religious discussions are strictly prohibited. Within these walls the Sisters work silently but faithfully, fulfilling the mission they have chosen, and to which they have dedicated their lives—educating the hearts as well as the minds of those entrusted to their care.

Brandywine Academy was founded in 1799. On February 29th, of that year, seventy-nine persons met and by subscription raised $448.13, and with this amount soon thereafter erected the building on land donated by John Dickinson and John Welsh. The institution was incorporated January 81, 1815, when the trustees were Isaac Jones, James Price, James Smith, Alexander Draper, William Smith, Charles Tatem and Thomas Lea. In 1830 Mr. McNevin conducted it as an "English and Classical Academy." Another charter was obtained for this school January 26, 1832. The incorporators named in it were John M. Clayton, Gregory Bedell, Stephen H. Tyng, Cyrus H. Jacobs, Thomas Robinson, James W. Thompson, Thomas Mitchell, John W. Downing, John B. Brackle, James Booth, John B. Clemson, J. H. Coit and others.

John Bullock's Boarding-School.—About the year 1821, John Bullock, a Friend, opened a boarding-school for boys at the northwest corner of Ninth and Tatnall Streets, which continued in operation until 1846, a period of twenty-five years. The school soon acquired a reputation which drew to it pupils from remote parts of the country and from the West India Islands, at a time when the facilities for communication were far from being what they are at present. This reputation, apart from the solid character of the instruction, was in no small degree based upon the parental care and oversight bestowed upon those committed to his charge.

"Of those committed to his charge, John Bullock was a faithful and conscientious teacher, and a public-spirited citizen interested in the public education of the day, and ready to advance with influence and effort all measures that concerned the general welfare. He died in 1847, aged sixty-three years. Samuel Alsop then took the school. He was well-known as an accomplished mathematician and capable instructor."

Wilmington Boarding-School for boys was founded by Samuel Smith in a large, three-story building on West Street below Fourth, in 1829. The school building was on high grounds overlooking the town of Wilmington, whose limits had not then ex-
Samuel Smith, who founded the Wilmington Boarding School for Boys, was born Eleventh month (Nov.) 24, 1794, in Bucks County, Pennsylvania. William Smith, his ancestor, a member of the Society of Friends, came from Yorkshire, England, in 1684, and settled at what is now Wrightstown, Bucks County, Pennsylvania, where he purchased three hundred acres of land, bordering on Neshaminy. At that time he was one of the only two white men living in that locality. In 1690 he married Mary Crossdale, also a Friend, according to the good order of that religious society. The certificate of their marriage is still in existence.

William Smith died in 1748, on his Wrightstown farm, where he had lived from the time he first came to the place. He left a son, Thomas Smith, who married Elizabeth Sanders in 1727. He died leaving a son also named Thomas Smith. This Thomas Smith married Mary Ross in 1750, and died leaving a son also named Thomas Smith, who married, in 1793, Elizabeth Linton, and died leaving a son, Samuel Smith, the subject of this sketch, who married Sarah Watson in 1817. She was a direct descendant of Thomas Watson, also a member of the Society of Friends, who married Rebecca Mark in 1692, and subsequently settled in the province of Pennsylvania.

Samuel Smith, whose ancestry we have thus traced, evinced in early life a fondness for study, and acquired great proficiency in grammar, mathematics and astronomy. He was a student in John Gummere’s famous academy at Burlington, New Jersey. His habit of thought, strength of mind and earnestness of purpose peculiarly fitted him for the profession of teaching, in which he delighted, and which he pursued through his whole life. As an instructor, he possessed the happy faculty of arousing the enthusiasm of his students. They loved to gather around him after the study hour to hear him illustrate and explain difficult parts of the branches studied in his classes. In social life he was cheerful and entertaining; a fine conversationalist, a man of strong convictions and attracted many warm friends.

He conducted a successful mathematical school in Philadelphia until the year 1829, when, at the solicitation of his friends, he instituted in Wilmington, Delaware, an academy, where a full course of studies was thoroughly taught. In connection with this institution, Mr. Smith had an unusually large and excellent collection of mechanical, philosophical and scientific apparatus.

His school was justly celebrated, and a number of his students became prominent and influential men.

In 1859 he removed to Poughkeepsie, New York, a large number of his pupils accompanying him, where he pursued his admirable mode of instruction for several years.

Afterwards retiring to Philadelphia, he died in 1861, closing his long life-work, respected and honored by many friends.

Wesleyan Female College was for many years a prosperous and influential institution of learning. Rev. Solomon Prettyman, who previously had conducted a school for girls at Seaford, Delaware, opened Wesleyan Female Seminary with thirty pupils, in a rented building on Market Street, in October, 1837. In 1838 it was removed to a larger building at Ninth and Market Streets. David C. Wilson, of Wilmington, made a liberal proposition for the erection of a building specially adapted for school purposes. A site was secured on French Street above Sixth. The cornerstone was laid June 3, 1839, in the presence of students and faculty. In ten months from that date the building, forty-five by eighty-six feet, was finished and occupied. In 1841 the school was chartered under the name of Wesleyan Female Collegiate Institute. The number of pupils had increased to one hundred and twenty-five. In 1844 the Female Student and Young Ladies’ Advocate was published by the students and continued three years. From 1847 to 1850 the institution did not prosper. In 1851 it passed from the control of Mr. Prettyman into the hands of a board of trustees representing the Methodist Episcopal Church. Under the directions of the Philadelphia Conference a new charter was obtained and the name changed to Wesleyan Female College, with power to confer degrees upon graduation. Under that name, for thirty years it did good work. It was conducted for one year by Prof. T. E. Sudler, a graduate of West Point. Rev. George Loomis, a man of fine scholastic attainments, followed and was very successful. The building on Sixth Street was erected under the superintendence of William Bright, one of the trustees, at a cost of $13,000. Rev. J. Thompson joined in the educational work and a brother of Prof. Loomis was president for a time. In 1859 Rev. John Wilson was chosen president with a complete faculty. He remained for three years and then went away for a short time and returned again and continued the institution for several years. In 1882 the property was purchased by William Bright, the present owner. A new charter was obtained under the name of the Wesleyan College. A complete board of trustees was selected, with Hon. Charles B. Lore as president. The institution for the past few years has been closed.

The Taylor Academy.—T. Clarkson Taylor, who was a very popular and successful teacher, came to Wilmington from Virginia about 1850. He was a graduate of the celebrated school of Benjamin Howell at Alexandria. His first experience here was in charge of the Friends’ School, corner of Fourth and West Streets. He next erected a four-story building at the corner of Eighth and Wollaston streets—long known as the Taylor Academy, first for the education of boys only, and afterwards for both sexes. His school numbered from seventy-five to one hundred pupils regularly, and many persons who have since prospered in business were educated by him. He had a natural aptness to teach, was an excellent disciplinarian and held in the highest esteem by his pupils. Some of his assistants were J. K. Taylor, Pusey Heald, Daniel W. Taylor, Charles Swayne and Milton Jackson. After the death of the founder it was conducted as the Taylor and Jackson Academy. The building is now used as a public school. Few schools anywhere were more favorably known than this academy.

The Friends’ School, on West Street near Fourth, was established in 1748, by some of the first members of the Society of Friends who settled in Wilmington. Within the one hundred and forty years of its history thousands of children of both sexes have been educated in it. It is the oldest school having a continuous existence in the State of Delaware. The first building used was the meeting-house, twenty-four feet square, with a projecting roof at the south end. A sun-dial to tell the time of day was placed over the small window under the peak of the roof. For nearly a century this school was without the city limits, in what was known as “Quaker Hill.” Of the early teachers very little information can be given either from records or tradition. For half a century or more the most important branches taught were ‘Reading,’ ‘Riten’ and ‘Rithmetic,’—the last named was generally called “ciphering.” In 1786 the committee of the Friends Meeting having control of the school employed a teacher from Philadelphia, who introduced the study of English grammar, Latin and Greek, and the standard of the school was raised in competition with the old academy on Market Street. John Webster, who taught here before 1780 and many years later, was a man of note. He became an influential citizen of the town. It was on him that the old-time trick of “baring out the teacher” was last played. “‘Twas the night before Christmas” that the boys climbed into the school-house by the chimney way, piled wood against the door inside and nailed the windows down. Master Webster appeared at the door at eight o’clock the next morning, turned the latch with the well-worn key he always carried in his pocket, but could not open the barricaded door. “We will only let you in,” shouted the biggest boy, peeping through the window, “if you promise to give us a holiday.” “It is not my will that boys shall rule or dictate terms of peace,” responded the irate teacher, and more vehemently than ever did he attempt to capture the “fort,” as the boys then called it. It was nearly ten o’clock and Master John was still assailing the fort. Three male Friends, on their way to meeting in the house on the opposite side of the street, came to his rescue. With a crowbar they banged open one of the windows, just as some of the boys escaped out of another, but most of them were caught in the house, and finally, the whole party of them were inflicted with all the punishment that the law and the rod could apply. Nothing was saved but the boys and the reputation of the teacher.

James A. Bayard, Louis McLane, Judge Gilpin and Caesar A. Rodney were pupils of John Webster, but it is not known that they helped to bar him out.

Jesse Gause was teacher in 1810, and many years later. He was followed by Alexander McKiever. The Bayards, Gilpins and the Mendenhalls were pupils under him. He punished the boys by shutting them in a wood closet. Robert Hurnard, an Englishman, was an early teacher. He believed in “moral suasion with a grape vine,” he used to say. Aquilla Thomas was engaged as teacher in 1828, and was succeeded several years later by Thomas Hayhurst. Nathaniel Bassett and Jacob Heald were also among the early teachers. Among the teachers of the girls’ school were Margaret McCannon and Margaret Dixon.

Sarah Ann Tyson, in 1847, had a very popular school for girls. She was very successful in teaching geography, a study introduced but a few years before. In 1846 a new building for females was erected. Miss Emma Worrall was a teacher here for many years.

This school has had many teachers within the past quarter of a century, and is now under the control of Isaac T. Johnson, a graduate of Haverford College, who, with Mary E. Butler, Anna Bach, Enos L. Doan, Ella M. Turner, Mary J. Hoopes and Augusta Lacombe as assistants, is doing an excellent work for the educational interest of Wilmington. Males and females are taught together, and the total enrollment for 1887 was two hundred and eight pupils. The school within the past few years has prepared a large number of pupils for college.

The school property is situated opposite the Friends’ Meeting-house, at the corner of Fourth and West Streets. The building, in 1883, was remodeled and arranged with convenient class-rooms and laboratories, and a new study hall was erected. The school is under the charge of a committee of the Monthly Meeting, composed of Edward T. Bellak, Thomas Worrall, Elizabeth W. Smith, Deborah Ferris, Anna Ferris, Lindley C. Kent, Ellwood Garrett, Catharine W. Garrett, Sarah S. Richardson, Mary B. Pyle, Priscilla T. Speakman and Lucy Smyth.

The Friends’ School at Ninth and Tatnall Streets, to the rear of the meeting-house, was originally on Market Street above Eleventh. In 1832 Samuel Canby donated a lot and $1000 for the purpose of establishing the school at its present place. A school-house was built that year, part of the money being raised by subscription. The school was placed under the charge of a committee of the Monthly Meeting, and has been regularly continued since. In 1874 the original frame building was replaced by the one now in use.

W. A. Reynolds, for twenty-nine years a teacher in Delaware, was born in Cincinnati. He graduated at Wesleyan College, Middletown, Conn., came to Delaware and opened a school at Dover, Nov. 3, 1888. This school grew rapidly from two scholars to a hundred, they coming in from every part of the Peninsula. For the last ten years he has taught privately, except for one year, when he held a submastership in the Boston Latin School. During 1887 he had under his instruction eight pupils who entered the best colleges of the North.

At the close of the Civil War he came to Wilmington, where he had greater success than at Dover, building up, in the face of strong competition, a school of from two to one hundred and thirty scholars. This success continued for about ten years. Professor Reynolds has from time to time had many of the sons and daughters of Delaware under his care.

H. S. Goldey, in the spring of 1887, in Institute Building, opened the "Wilmington Commercial College," for the preparation of young men and women for business. The school is flourishing. He has a number of assistants, and some of the leading citizens of Wilmington deliver lectures to students.

RUGBY ACADEMY, for boys, was opened by Samuel W. Murphy, A.M., M.D., January 2, 1872, and has always had an enviable reputation for thorough scholarship and good discipline. It has prepared quite a number of students for various colleges, and many more for business. There are three departments—Primary, Junior and Senior—having together about one hundred pupils. The convenient and attractive rooms occupied are on the second floor of Masonic Temple. They are decorated with the portraits of distinguished literary personages and some landscape paintings. There is also apparatus for instruction in chemistry and physics and a fine cabinet of minerals and fossils. Two literary societies are conducted by the pupils under the direction of the principal. A military drill has been a feature of the course of instruction, and the "Rugby Cadets" are drilled regularly with light arms. Dr. Murphy, after conducting this school with success for fifteen years, sold out October 18, 1887, to W. M. Foult, late principal of Elkton Academy, who is the present principal.

The Misses Hebb, in 1890, opened an English and French boarding and day-school for young ladies and girls at Ninth and West Streets, with fifty-four pupils. The demand for admission increased, and in 1891 they erected a large and commodious house expressly for school purposes at Franklin Street and Pennsylvania Avenue. Into it they moved their school in 1897, when the number of pupils in attendance was ninety-six.

BRANDYWINE SEMINARY.—The Brandywine Seminary was established by W. S. McNair, A.M., in the Institute Building, September, 1878. From a small beginning, it grew to be one of the leading schools in the city. The course of study commenced with young children unable to read, and extended to preparing a pupil for business life or entrance in any class in college. A kindergarten was annexed, where children were trained by natural methods, applying the principles developed by Pestalozzi, Froebel and Grube. Both sexes were taught, and the school received boarding pupils from New Jersey and Pennsylvania. In the management Mr. McNair was assisted by Mrs. McNair, and the instruction given was of such an excellent nature that the school enjoyed an enviable reputation for its thoroughness and discipline. It was removed to the Harkers Building, Tenth and Market Streets, where after several years it was discontinued.

THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.—The State Constitution of 1792 enjoined upon the Legislature the duty to provide for the establishment of schools. In 1796 an act was passed to form a school fund. Nothing effectual was done in Wilmington until 1829, when the act for the establishment of free schools formed the system which, with additions and amendments, is still in force in the city and State. Under this act Wilmington was divided into ten school districts. There was considerable opposition to organizing schools in these districts.1

In two other districts schools existed for irregular periods. In 1833 a considerable sum of dividends from the income of the school fund standing to the credit of eight of these districts was obtained. A plan was conceived to unite them and form one large public school. A supplement to the act was passed February 6, 1833. Under it the districts from nine to eighteen, inclusive, were organized as the United School Districts of New Castle County. This was accomplished October 20, 1834. An election of two school commissioners from each of the sub-districts was held November 15th. A school-house was built at the southwest corner of French and Sixth Streets, with two rooms, one for male and the other for female pupils, each containing one hundred and twenty seats. Good teachers were selected, male for the boys' rooms and female for the girls' rooms, and these schools continued till 1853.2 They accomplished much good, but there was no general interest taken in them from the fact that the rooms would only accommodate a small portion of the school children of the city. At times there was stern opposition to them, but the public mind settled to the conviction that the benefit of public school instruction ought to be extended to all desiring it. A meeting of citizens was held in 1851, and it was unanimously agreed that "the city needed a better system of Schools," and an act was passed February 9, 1852.

1 In 1880 Benjamin Webb, Eli Hollingsworth and Jonas Popey were chosen a committee to secure a teacher and open a "free school" in the Tenth District. In November of the same year the Eleventh District was united with it in the support of a school, and Kristus Edgerton was appointed teacher of the boys at one hundred dollars per quarter, and Hannah Monaghan, teacher of the girls' department at seventy-five dollars per quarter. James Wallace, of Kent County, taught the boys' department the second quarter, and reported thirty-three pupils in attendance. The girls' school had forty-four pupils. The school was kept in the old academy building on Market Street. Jonas Popey took charge in 1881. Henry S. Allisha, Jacob Pierson and Eli Hollingsworth were the school committee for 1852.

2 The whole number of pupils in the schools of the United School District in 1858 was 715, of which 272 were boys and 444 girls; 117 pupils were admitted in 1858. All the "common branches" were taught, and some "take lessons in definitions, Grammar and English classics. In the girls' schools two days of each week were devoted to needle-work, which was attended with good satisfaction." The Visiting Committee were Willard Hall, Thomas Young and Jonas Popey.
establishing the school system which is now in force in Wilmington. The members of the first Board of Education were Samuel Hilles, Jesse Sharpe, Azariah H. Quinby, Robert Carawell, David C. Wilson, Dr. J. F. Wilson, John H. Stidham, J. Morton Poole, Dr. A. H. Grimshaw, John Rudolph, Edward Moore and James Webb. They met for organization in the City Hall, March 17, 1852. Samuel Hilles was elected president, J. Morton Poole secretary and Jesse Sharpe treasurer. John Rudolph, representing the First Ward; Jesse Sharpe, the Second; Dr. J. F. Wilson, the Third; and Robert Crane, the Fourth, were appointed a committee "to propose and submit to a future meeting of the Board some plan for the establishment, organization and government of the Public Schools of the city."

At the next meeting Samuel Hilles resigned his position as a member of the board, and Judge William Hall was elected. School District No. 9 "was united with the rest of the city of Wilmington" April 6, 1852. An election was held in the Fifth Ward April 13th following, and Right Rev. Alfred Lee and Samuel Walker were chosen members of the board to represent that ward.

The second story of the building corner of Tenth and King Streets, the office of the Water Department, was granted by City Council as a school-room. The school-building at French and Sixth Streets was ordered to be repaired. Bishop Lee reported that School District No. 9, when it was united with the City School District, was in debt. Misses. Lee, Poole and Dr. Wilson were appointed to "take charge of the new school in the Fifth Ward."

On May 10, 1852, the building committee bought as a site for a new school-house the lots on Washington Street between Second and Third, one each from John Menoungh, and John and James Jackson. The price paid was seventeen dollars per foot, the entire front being eighty-six feet. On the 26th of May "James S. Williams making the lowest and best proposal for the erection of the school-house on Washington Street, for five thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars, a contract was made with him."

Under the act establishing the schools, City Council was allowed to appropriate ten thousand dollars annually for school purposes.

William Hilles was chosen member of the board. Oliver H. Bryant was paid $108.15, for one quarter's salary as teacher of boys' school at Sixth and French Street; Mrs. C. G. Hutchins, $75; Miss E. C. Holliday, $62.50; Margaret H. Meahy and Miss Lydia P. Bunting, $50.

John H. Stidham resigned on June 24th, and George G. Lobdell was elected director in his place. Samuel Walker also resigned at the next meeting, and William F. Torbert was elected. The board decided to call the school corner Sixth and French Streets No. 1; the one on Twelfth Street, in the Fifth Ward, No. 2; primary school at Tenth and King, No. 3; and Washington School, No. 4.

At the meeting held September 13, 1852, on motion of Dr. Grimshaw, an order was drawn on the city treasurer for five thousand dollars, "being money borrowed by authority of the Legislature by City Council for the exclusive benefit of the Board of Public Education." Wesley Talley was elected teacher of Boys School No. 2, on Twelfth Street between Orange and Market. October 4, 1852, Bishop Lee, J. M. Poole and Dr. Wilson, who were appointed to purchase school-books, made a contract with J. T. Heald to furnish them for the year 1852-3. The estimated cost for conducting all of the schools for the year 1853 was $8296.50.

Owing to the increasing number of applications for admissions to the public schools, the City Council granted the building on Sixth Street, between the Delaware and the Washington engine-houses, for school purposes. This is now used by the receiver of taxes and Board of Education. It was then called School No. 5. Miss Mary Rumford was elected principal teacher of this school, at two hundred and fifty dollars a year, and Miss Mary B. Simpson assistant, at one hundred and fifty dollars a year. The latter requested the privilege of having vocal music taught in her school, which was allowed, providing the board "would not be asked to pay for such instructions."

School No. 4, on Washington Street, was completed in October, 1852, and Albert G. Webster, then at North Danvers, Massachusetts, was elected principal teacher of the boys' department, at seven hundred dollars a year. He was authorized to "bring his assistant teacher with him." Miss Laura Osgood was elected principal teacher of the girls' department, at three hundred dollars a year.

Among the items of the committee on accounts for 1853 was $1.40 "for mouse traps for use in school-rooms," of $12.50 for druggists and $19.75 to John Stein as "house-keeper" of School-house No. 4.

Robert Carawell resigned his place in the board January 25, 1853, and Daniel M. Bates was elected. Dr. Grimshaw offered a resolution, which was passed, stating that "severe punishment is injurious to the manners and morals of the children of the public schools." John T. Robinson was elected secretary, at a salary of one hundred dollars a year. He was chosen under a new rule and was not a member of the board. The second annual election for members of the board was held in March, 1853. The members chosen were Eli Hilles and James C. Alken. J. Morton Poole was elected treasurer April 11, 1853.

Messrs. Poole, Webb, Moore, Wilson and E. Hilles were appointed a committee to superintend the erection of a school-house in the 2d Ward, on a lot on the westside of Walnut Street between Third and Fourth. The property on Tenth Street, west of Orange Street, known as the Bowling Alley, was bought for eight hundred dollars and fitted up for a primary school. A contract was entered into July 24th, with Joseph C. Seeds, for the erection of School-house No. 6, on Walnut Street lot, to seat two hundred and forty October 15th, Miss Harriet Pike, of Newbury, Vermont, was elected principal of No. 2 Primary School, formed in the new school-house corner of Eleventh and Washington Streets. On account of a report that some teachers did not read the Scriptures at the daily opening of the schools, the board passed a resolution requiring that they should be read "and the scholars required to repeat the Lord's Prayer in concert in a serious manner." An association of teachers for mutual improvement was formed in September, 1855, and met weekly. A general examination of the scholars in all the schools was begun by a committee of the board. The new school building at Fifth and Pine Streets was completed, and School No. 7 opened in it November 5th. The entire number of pupils in the public schools at this date was one thousand five hundred and sixty-nine. Members of the board elected in 1856 were Joseph Richardson, Albert Thatcher, Joshua S. Valentine, James P. Hayes, John B. Porter and Vincent C. Gilpin. Treasurer Poole reported that but eight thousand six hundred and eighty-one dollars of the appropriation for 1854 was received, six thousand six hundred and five dollars in 1855, and the amount due the board from the city in 1856 for back appropriations was three thousand seven hundred and twelve dollars. The Visiting Committee stated that it was important to sustain the character of the boys' grammar school, at Sixth and French Streets, at a high standard. The teachers in that school were Adolphus Brown and Miss Mary Brown, who displayed superior capacity for teaching. Miss Brown's salary was three hundred dollars per annum. Adolphus Brown resigned July 1, 1856, stating that it "is a matter of interest to him to enter another business." He recommended as his successor William D. Dowse, of New Hampshire, a graduate of Dartmouth College, who was elected. John A. Lamprey, of New Castle, Maine, in the following November, was elected principal of this school and superintendent of the "Association for the Mutual Improvement of Teachers." On motion of Dr. Thompson, public examinations of pupils were ordered to be held semi-annually, conducted by teachers under the direction of the Visiting Committee.

Eli Hilles, Azariah H. Quinby, Wm. S. Hilles and J. P. Hayes were elected members of the board in 1857. Miss Pike resigned as principal of School No. 2; went to her home in New Hampshire, and Miss Sarah Brown was elected. Miss Lillias Watson was principal of the girls' grammar school at Sixth and French Streets for several years. A school-house was built at a cost of four thousand three hundred and ten dollars on Jefferson Street, back of School No. 4, located on Washington Street, and called No. 3.

The Committee on Examination in 1857 reported to the board that "a revolution in the system of education in the city had taken place within the five years past." The number of children in the schools had increased during that period from three hundred to one thousand eight hundred, and comfortable school buildings had been erected. The plan of regular examinations had proven to be very beneficial. The pupils were well prepared in the elementary branches. The exercises in spelling and mental arithmetic were remarkable for accuracy and promptness and reading was well taught.

Willard Hall, president of the Board of Public Education, in his report of 1859, said: "In Schoolhouse No. 1, at Sixth and French Streets, are two schools, one for boys and one for girls; in the former all of the elementary branches and history, astronomy, algebra, geometry and philosophy are taught, and in the latter nearly the same course of study, together with drawing. All the lower schools are carefully graded. The number of teachers is thirty-nine; pupils, one thousand nine hundred and forty."

The board in 1859 applied to City Council for funds to erect school building No. 6 one story and to purchase a lot on which to erect a grammar school building. The amount required was fifteen thousand dollars. The Council assented. Permission was asked of General Assembly, and granted, the expediency of the loan be approved by a majority of the votes of citizens. Upon taking this vote in 1860, the persons in the city for the benefit of whose children this measure was proposed, voted it down.

In 1861 there were eight school-houses in use in the city—six of which were the property of the board. The aggregate number of seats in the school-room were two thousand and seventy-two; number of pupils in attendance, two thousand and fifty-two; number of teachers, thirty-two, of whom seven were principals; cost for supporting the schools, twenty-four thousand nine hundred and thirty dollars. D. M. Johns was principal of male department of the highest grade school at Sixth and French Streets and Miss Lillias Watson principal of the female department.

The schools were continued regularly ten months of each year, and grew in public favor. The examination of pupils was conducted by the teachers and a committee of the Board of Education until the office of city superintendent of schools was created. David W. Harlan was elected the first superintendent, entering upon the duties of the office January 1, 1871. He was re-elected annually for a time and triennially for the last four terms, having filled the office continually since his first election with great acceptability. He is a graduate of Oberlin College.

Since 1871 the following features of the system have been added: A course of study definite in its outlines and divisions, designed to lay the foundations of knowledge well in the primary schools and to secure in every grade clear conceptions and good training. A method of semi-annual promoting of pupils that is stimulating both to pupils and teachers, and, under which, with few, if any, exceptions, the pupils who ought to be promoted are promoted.

A rule allowing the superintendent to call teachers together in such meetings as often as he thinks best for consultation and advice in regard to methods of school work.

A rule granting teachers time to visit other schools for the purpose of observing results and methods.

The establishment of a training-school in which all the candidates for positions as teachers who have not had one year's successful experience are required to spend eighty days in training and on trial, under the instruction and marking of a skillful teacher.

A plan for selecting teachers that requires every candidate for a position, before her name is put on the list from which appointments are made, to show by an examination that she is a good scholar according to the grade of position she wants, and by certificates that she has taught successfully one year, or by a term in the training-school that she has skill in imparting knowledge and the power to interest and control.

A civil service, an appointing and promoting teachers, that has been adhered to closely for ten years, and that secures to each teacher on the list of accepted applicants appointment in turn, and after appointment, promotion in turn, unless her unfitness for promotion is already established.

The free text-book system, by which all pupils are supplied with the needed books and slates without charge.

Superintendent Harlan, in a recent annual report of the school, said:

"1. Are the pupils who ought to be studying trying quietly to learn their lessons?"

"2. Do the pupils who are at recitation give proper attention to the question, answers and explanations, and do they recite promptly and in a way that shows that they are getting clear ideas?"

"3. Does the teacher show ability in explaining the difficult parts of the lesson, and in getting the pupils to try to learn these parts?"

"4. Is the teacher dividing his attention between those who are at recitation and those who are studying, so as to keep all his pupils at their proper work?"

"5. When the teacher commands a thing to be done, does he follow up his command and see that it is done?"

"6. Do the manner and words of the teacher indicate a kindly interest in the success of his pupils?"

"7. Is the teacher willing to do a fair day's teaching every school day?"

The following table shows the increase of school attendance during the last fifteen years:

The High School building, at Eighth and Adams Streets, was erected in 1884–85. On the 11th of November, 1883, the following committee to select a site for the building was appointed: Dr. T. A. Keables, Dr. Read J. McKay, J. H. Hoffecker, B. R. Heisler and Jacob Pusey. February 25th the committee purchased the lot for eight thousand dollars of J. C. Patterson. On May 12th the committee was re-appointed, with the substitution of William Stilley in place of Dr. Read J. McKay, whose term had expired as a member of the board. S. J. Willey was added to the committee in place of Jacob Pusey, who resigned.

The plans of E. L. Rice, Jr., were adopted October 16, 1884. J. R. D. Seeds & Sons contracted to erect the buildings for fifty-two thousand nine hundred dollars.

On December 11th the corner-stone was laid by Charles Baird, the president of the board. The other members present were Messrs. Allen, Dunn, Fueckel, Hanson, Heisler, Hoffecker, Keables, S. R. Smith, Beaton Smith, Stilley, Trump, Willey and West. The furnishing of the building was completed the 4th of January, 1886, and occupied by the school January 11, 1886.

The cost of the ground, building and furnishings was $70,514.88. This is one of the finest school buildings in this country and one which the citizens of Wilmington may feel proud to own.

The Boys' High School grew out of the grammar school in 1871. The following is a list of its principals, all of whom took the position in September of the years named, except Charles D. Raine, who was elected in January to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Stansbury J. Willey,—

Mr. Graham, the present principal, is a graduate of the College of New Jersey, at Princeton. Prof. S. J. Willey, Ph.B., who was for many years principal of the Wilmington High School, was born on the farm of his father, in Sussex County, Delaware, March 19, 1845. His parents, Robert A. and Mary M. Willey, gave their attention and energies to the usual duties of farm life.

His early education was obtained in the public schools in the vicinity of his home. Afterwards he attended Newark Academy, Newark, Delaware; Crittenden's Commercial College, Philadelphia; and Boylston Hall of Harvard College. His honorary degree of Ph.B. was conferred upon him by Delaware College.

Mr. Willey taught for a time at Public School No. 20, in Christiansa Hundred, and after acceptable service there he became an assistant teacher in the High School of Prof. William A. Reynolds, in Wilmington, and filled this position with credit to himself and to the satisfaction of the principal. While in this latter position he was elected principal of the Wilmington High School. After seven years of service in this capacity, he resigned the place to take the position he now holds in the Dental Manufacturing Company, of Wilmington. Professor Willey was for four years a valuable and esteemed member of the Board of Public Instruction of Wilmington, to which he was twice chosen by the unanimous vote of his ward. He is held in high esteem by his fellow-citizens, irrespective of creed or party. Professor Willey is now the secretary-treasurer of the Wilmington Dental Manufacturing Company, and is treasurer of the Welsh Dental Company, of Philadelphia. Mr. Willey holds a high position in the Order of the Knights of Pythias. He served for ten years as Grand Keeper of Records and Seals, and has been twice chosen Supreme Master of Exchequer. At the second election, in 1884, the choice was unanimous. For the eleven years previous to 1884 he served as Supreme Representative of the order. On December 27, 1885, he was married to Mrs. Lydia A. Moore, daughter of Robert R. Robinson, late of Wilmington. He is an adherent of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

The first class of girls who took the full high school course graduated in 1875. The Girls' High School grew out of the grammar school in School-house No. 1, and its beginning properly dates from the formation of this class in 1872. The Girls' High School has from its formation been under the charge of Miss
NEW CASTLE COUNTY.

Mary Miller, one of the most efficient of principals, assisted by a corps of capable and zealous teachers. Nearly all the teachers now in the public schools of the city were educated in this school, or in the grammar school, out of which it grew; and sixty-one of them are graduates of the full High School course.

The Training School was started in school No. 9 in 1876, under the principaship of Miss Elizabeth D. Fraser. In 1881 Miss Fraser resigned and Miss Mary C. I. Williams succeeded her. Eighty-one of the teachers now in the public schools of the city, after leaving the High School, took the course in methods in this school. While a larger course of study, and one including psychology and the science of teaching, would be better for the preparation of teachers than the present course, the thorough teaching done in the High School, and the insight into methods given in the Training School have been unobtrusive but potent factors in the production of the excellent corps of teachers now in the public schools of the city.

SCHOOL BUILDINGS.—School-house No. 1 was the High School building from 1871 to 1886. It is three stories high, as indicated in the accompanying illustration, and will accommodate five hundred and forty-six pupils. The superintendent’s office is in the building.

School-house No 8, corner Seventh and Spruce, was built in 1865; No. 9, corner Eighth and Wollaston, formerly the Taylor Academy building, was purchased soon afterward; No. 10, corner of Adams and Elm Streets; No. 11, corner Ninth and Scott, in 1869; No. 12, on Twenty-second Street near Market, in 1869; No. 14, Claymont, near Lobdell Street, in 1872; No. 15, at Third and Harrison, in 1874; No. 16, on Orange between Twelfth and Thirteenth, formerly Howard School, built by “Delaware Association for the Moral Improvement of Colored People,” is now owned by the Board of Education.

School-house now called No. 5 was erected in 1876. The building committee was Henry Eckel, Allen Ruth, Jacob F. Sharp, Lewis Zebley and James C. Morrow. The lot, one hundred and fifty by one hundred feet, was bought of John R. Tatam for $1500. It was built by contract by James Mitchell, at a cost of $11,659. The entire cost of building, furniture, land, etc., was $16,885.

No. 18 was built in 1881-82. The committee was Peter U. Furry, Samuel F. Betts, Edward McIntire, Dr. N. B. Morrison and Luther W. Palmer. Contractor, William R. Beatty, for $4543. The entire cost was $5517.

No. 19 was built the same year at an entire cost of $13,948. P. Chandler, the contractor, erected it for $11,743. The building committee was William J. Morrow, William W. Lobdell, Jonathan Hilton, William F. Forsythe and Charles Baird.

No. 20 was built in 1881-82. Building committee—Allen Ruth, Dr. A. H. Grimshaw, Dr. E. G. Shortridge, William Kyne, Daniel O’C. Kenny. Cost of lot, $3043; F. R. Carswell, architect, $250; J. R. D. Seeds & Son, contractors, $15,921.61. Entire cost, $22,056.

Nos. 21 and 22 are small buildings.

In September, 1885, M. M. Child, James Bradford and J. T. Head, by request, visited all of the school-houses of the city, and estimated their combined valuation from No. 1 to 22 and the new High School to be $398,660.

The offices of secretary and treasurer have been filled most of the time, since the establishment of the school in 1852, by one person who is not a member of the board. The following have served in that position in the order named: J. Morton Poole, John T. Robinson, William S. Hilles, Wesley Talley, Joseph L. Killgore, William H. Cloward, Henry Morrow, John S. Grohe and Benjamin E. Bartram.

Miss Elizabeth Montgomery, daughter of Captain Hugh Montgomery of Revolutionary fame, spent several years in the profession of teaching, and was very successful. She is best known to the people of her native town by her “Reminiscences of Wilmington,” an entertaining volume of 310 pages, first published at the request of her friends in 1851. This edition had a large sale, and the work was re-published in 1872 by Johnston & Bogia.

Francis Vincent, whose biographical sketch appears elsewhere in the History of the Press, was also a diligent student of the history of Delaware. Un-regretted that Mr. Vincent's work did not receive sufficient encouragement to enable him to complete his laudable enterprise.

Howard Pyle, the author and artist, who has been for many years closely identified with the educational history of Delaware, was born in Wilmington, Delaware, March 5, 1853. He was educated at T. Clarkson Taylor's well-known academy, in Wilmington, and studied art under Van du Milen, in Philadelphia, a graduate of the Art School of Antwerp, where he took the first prize at the age of twenty-two. The first literary production of Mr. Pyle, which indicated the remarkable talent with which he is gifted, was "The Magic Pill," a short poem or rather a story in verse, published in the bric-a-brac department of Scriber's Monthly. He has since been a frequent contributor to magazine literature. Some of his most meritorious articles of this kind are the following: "The Island of Ponies" and "The Thousand Isles," which appeared in Scriber's; "The Peninsular Canaan," "The Last Bevel in Printz Hall," "The May Idyl," "Life in an Old-Time Quaker Town," "Stephen Wycherly," "The Buccaneers and the Mariners," in Harper's Magazine. His fairy tales, running for three years through Harper's Young People, have proven to be exceedingly interesting to children. They have gained him the reputation of being one of the most popular writers for the young in this country. "Robin Hood," the first book from his fertile brain, brim-full of characteristic illustrations of his own designing, has passed through several editions and has had a very large sale. "Within the Capes," a story whose scenes and incidents are laid in his native State, is charmingly written. "Pepper and Salt," his next work, appeared in 1884. It was the quaintest and most entertaining fairy book of the season and profusely illustrated by himself. "The Wonder Clock," also a book for children, was published in 1887. It is a fascinating fairy story, and at once won great popularity. The book is fairly brimming over with bright and lively things; it contains twenty-four marvelous tales, one for every hour of the day, embellished with charming verses written by his sister, Miss Catherine Pyle. The illustrations, one hundred and sixty in all, are quaint and characteristic. "The Rose of Paradise," his last work, with its appropriate drawings, appeared in December, 1887. It is a detailed account of certain adventures which happened to Captain John Mackre in connection with the noted pirate Edward England, in 1720, off the Island of Juanna, in the Mozambique Channel.

The history of literature in Delaware does not present a stronger representative than Howard Pyle. His productions are noted for purity of style, elegance of diction and fine rhetorical finish. As a story-writer he has endeared himself to thousands of children, and as an artist and designer his work indicates remarkable proficiency.

Dr. Caleb Harlan, of Wilmington, a sketch of whom appears in the medical chapter of this work, is the author of "The Fate of Marcel," a work of fiction; "The Efflores of the Susquehanna," a poem; "Ira Randolph," a poem; and "Mental Power and Sound Health."

Right Rev. Alfred Lee, late bishop of the diocese of Delaware, is the author of "Eventful Nights in Bible History."

Gen. James H. Wilson, after his return from a trip through Asia, wrote a popular book of travels, entitled "China." It was issued from the press of D. Appleton & Co., of New York.

Miss Margaret Canby, who has been a frequent contributor to magazine literature, wrote "Birdie," "His Fairy Friends," and other works, published by Claxton, Remsen & Hasselfinger, of Philadelphia.

Benjamin S. Clark, who conducted the jewelry business for fifty years at 407 Market Street, Wilmington, was born in 1817, and died in January, 1888. He was educated at the Friends' School, corner of Fourth and West Streets, and learned his trade with George Jones, whom he succeeded in business, in the same building, January, 1837. Mr. Clark was well-known and very popular man of sterling integrity, and honorable in all his business transactions. He was elected city treasurer by the Whig party in 1852, re-elected in 1854, serving four years in that office. He was several years a member of the Board of Education of the city, was a director in the Wilmington Gas Company and in the Savings Fund Society. He was well informed in local history.

CHAPTER XXXII.

RELIGIOUS DENOMINATIONS.

EARLY CHURCHES AND MINISTERS.—Among the original colony of Swedes who settled in Delaware and built Fort Christina in 1638 was Rev. Roerus Torkildius, who established religious worship in the fort, the first meeting-place for Christians on the Delaware, and there it was continued until the church at Ticincum was erected in 1646.

Rev. John Campanius came to Christena February 15, 1648, with Governor Printz, and ministered to the Swedes there and at Ticincum until 1648. In the latter year he returned to Sweden, and was succeeded by Rev. Lawrence Locke in 1647. The latter was identified with the congregations of Christians, Ticincum and Crane Hook, and died in 1688.

In the minutes of the Council at New Amstel, August 9, 1656, Vice-Director Jacquet in charge, "Mr. Laers" is mentioned as "a preacher and an ecclesiastical deputee in matrimonial affairs."

In 1660 the Vice-Director reports to the Governor that he had fined the priest, Mr. Laerston, fifty guilders for marrying a couple irregularly. "Mr. Laers, the Swedish priest," in April, 1661, notified the Vice-Director that his wife had eloped with one Jacob Jongh during the night. Laers was fined heavily for visiting Jongh's house and breaking open his chest, etc. He pleaded that he was looking for his wife.

In June, 1668, Rev. Abelius Zetsscorren arrived at New Castle, and received a call from the Swedish congregation; but Vice-Director Beekman wrote that "Dominie Laers objected" to his presence to such an extent that he had to threaten the dominie with a protest before he could be persuaded to permit Dominie Zetsscorren to preach. The latter was subsequently "offered as high a salary as Dominie Laers receives; but they of New Amstel would not let him go."

A few years after the occupancy of the territory by the English, an insurrection was much feared, and one Coningsmark, known as "The Long Finn," was arrested, and later tried. Governor Lovelace, in a letter to Captain John Carr, then commandant at New Castle, dated Fort James, in New York, September 15, 1669, says: "I perceive ye Little Dominie hath played ye Trumpeter to this disord. I refer ye quality of his punishment to ye discretion."

Dominie Laers continued in charge of the Swedish congregation until after 1675, and his name appears May 19, 1679. The Swedish congregation at Crane Hook endeavored to keep their services in the Swedish language.

Crane Hook Church is said to have been built in 1667, and probably by the united efforts of the Dutch congregation and the Swedes. It was used for public worship until the "Old Swedes' Church" was built, in 1698, on the present site. Rev. Eric Biork, in a letter to the reverend superintendent, Dr. Israell Kolmodi, dated Christiansa Creek, October 29, 1697, after speaking of a visit to Wicaco, June 30th, writes: "We did the same thing on the 2d of July, to the lower congregation at Tran Hook where they also have a church. On the 11th of July I, their unworthy minister, clad in my surprise, delivered my first discourse to them in Jesus' name on the subject of the righteousness of the Pharisees."

The Rev. Mr. Biork at that time was preparing for the erection of the church at Christeen, now known as "Old Swedes", and which was erected in 1698, and dedicated Trinity Sunday, 1699. Mr. Biork, in the same letter, writes respecting Tran Hook or Crane Hook congregation: "They were uncomfortably situated, the land which led to their church, being then overflowed with water, and yet they would not abandon the place until they should have ministers to whom they could commit the work in which, through God's grace, I have succeeded, and agreed with them to fix on a more convenient place to build a stone church to be called Christena Church. . . . In comparing the religious situation of these people, their divine service, attention to the ordinances and instruction of their youth in the catechism and other things with the congregations in Sweden, I must say that they are quite irregular. . . . This state of things is not to be wondered at; for their ministers,"

4 Mr. Farnow, in a note, says: " Probably Magister Fabricius." This was not the case, however; for by a letter shown later, dated New York, April 3, 1670, Fabricius was, at that time, pastor of a Lutheran congregation at that place. That it was Dominie Laers is proven by the fact that his name occurs among those fined as Confederates of the Long Finn. It is there signed as "Laersten Carolus, Minister," and he was fined 300 guilders. There were 36 confederates who received fines from 1500 guilders to 50 guilders. His name appears as fifth in amount.

5 Crane Hook is the point of land that lies below the mouth of Christiansa Creek, and upon this place the church was built, close to the Delaware River. Ferris, writing in 1846, says: "A few years since, on a visit to this spot, which was pointed out by Peter Artizh, no tombstone or other trace of the grave-yard could be discovered. The church, which was a wooden one, was entirely gone. The only vestige of the building were four large hornblende rocks, which served for corner-stones to raise the house above the earth. . . . The building and grave-yard occupied a piece of ground on which is at present an orchard."

7 It is stated by the early writers, Rodman, Acclius, and Clay, that the Rev. Mr. Loch was at Ticincum from 1647 to 1688, and it is shown from the records here quoted that the Rev. Lauransius Carolus Laers was in the vicinity from 1654 to 1679 and perhaps later. This minister, and the same, preached in the Swedish language. The Rev. Jacobs Fabritius or Fabricius preached to the Swedes in the Dutch language, particularly the last, was old and infirm and could not pay proper attention to the education of youth."

In the year 1699 the Christian congregation was thoroughly organized, and Charles Springer was their authorized agent. He had been the reader in Crane Hook Church for some time.

The property of the old church was sold November 1, 1699. The deed as quoted by Mr. Ferris is here given:

"Articles of Agreement done, made and concluded by & between Pletter Mounson, of ye one party, and Charles Springer, of ye other party, witnesse as followeth:

"Be it known that I, Pletter Mounson, doe acknowledge that I have bought a certain tract of Land, namely, 100 acres, with all the conveniences thereto belonging, Lying & being upon Delaware River Joyning next unto my Land, which Tract of Land did formerly belong unto Henck Pletternon and Charles Springer and the rest of ye 3d Church Wardens, which then, at that time, were Church Wardens, did buy this aforesaid Tract of Land for a Minister to live upon, wth they did in the behalf of ye Congregation then ye Cranebooks Congregation called. Butt when it pleased God in his mercy, that when our Reverend Min-ter arrived, and the Congregation did conclude to build ye Church upon Christen, so was this Land altogether found not convenient for a Minister to live upon, and so with a common consent for to be sold. Which aforesaid Tract of land, with 130 acres of Marsh and all ye conveniences wth thereto doth belong to, Charles Springer, as Church Warden, & in behalf of ye Congregation, doe sell this unto Pletter Mounson for him and his heirs, for ye have and to hold for ever.

And for which aforesaid Tract of Land I, Pletter Mounson, doe oblige me & my heirs to pay unto Charles Springer or his Asst the full & just sum of Thirty-five pounds in Silver Money. Twenty pounds of Silver Money to be paid at the 21 of November, at which day Charles Springer doth oblige himself to make this aforesaid Land over to Pletter Mounson, If it please the Lord to permit him Life and health; and the other 15 pounds of the Pletter Mounson is to pay at or upon ye 15th of Sept, 1700. Peter Mounson, who bought the church property, was one of the early Swedes, who settled on Vertrecht Hook. He, with others, received a patent for seven hundred acres in 1675.

After the purchase the church gradually went to decay; the grave-yard was used a few years later, and finally given up, and at present no trace of it remains.

When the Dutch recaptured Fort Casimir from the Swedes, in 1655, Jean Paul Jacquet was sent to the colony as Vice-Director, and, in taking the oath of office, pledged himself to "maintain and advance as much as I can the Reformed religion as the same is taught and preached here and in the Fatherland, conform to God's word and the Synod of Dortrecht;" but it does not appear that in laying out the town of New Castle, after his arrival, he made any provision for a church or place of worship; nor was there any minister among the Dutch at this time. Subsequently, in April, 1657, the West India Company promised to send a minister to the colony. They referred to Rev. Mr. Welins, who came, and was at New Amstel and Altena until his death, December 9, 1659.

After Mr. Welins' death, Vice-Director Beckman, of Altena, referred to one Jan Jurien Becker, "who does not perform any other service here than to read aloud on Sundays, which I can have done by the sergeant or any other." From the time of Rev. Welins' death until June 6, 1668, there was no regular minister among the Dutch colonists 2 and this was the cause of a number of appeals from Vice-Director Beckman to his superior. On one occasion he wrote that there were several children in the colony to baptize, and, at another time, that the Lord's Supper had not been administered for two and a half years. During the interval Rev. Egidius Luyck did visit the colony and preach, but did not perform any other ministerial functions.

On June 6, 1663, Mr. Beckman writes: "Until to-day no chance has offered itself to speak with the Swedish or Lutheran Dominie." He referred to the Rev. Zetsｃoren, mentioned among the early Swedish preachers.

No further information concerning church affairs is obtained until 1670, except that among the privileges granted by the English to the Dutch upon their occupation in 1664, it was provided "That all people shall enjoy the liberty of their consciences in church discipline as formerly."

On the 18th April, 1670, Governor Lovelace, writing from Fort James, in New York, to Captain John Carr, commandant at New Castle, says: "Upon ye request of Magister Jacobs Fabricius, pastor of ye Lutheran confession, commonly called ye Augustin, who, by the Duke's Lycean hath a Congregation here, I have granted my Passe to him and his wife to goe to New Castle or any place in Delaware River."

In 1674 Rev. Fabricius was tried for having violated the law by marrying Ralph Dophe and Mary Von Harris, "without having any lawful authority thereto, and without publication of banns." There were present at the meeting of the court, the Governor-General, Anthony Colye, the honorable councillor Cornelis Steenwyck, Mr. Cornelis von Ruyven and Secretary Bayard, as associated councillors.

"The Honorable Fiscal Plaintiff against

Jacob Fabricius, Late Lutheran Preacher, Defendant."

After the recitation of the facts heretofore stated the plaintiff

"therefore demands as office that Deft. shall be brought to the place where Justice is usually executed, he whipped there severely and then be forever banished from this government. Deft. confesses to have served through ignorance, sake forgiveness and promise to behave properly in future."

New Castle, says: "In the year of 1667 or 1668 a Dutch Church was organized in this town by the Rev. John Polhemus, while on his way from Brazil (where the Dutch at that time had a colony) to New Amstmerd, near which he settled and died. The same year a schoolmaster was sent from Holland by the name of Everett Peterson, and the following year the Rev. Everardus Welins was commissioned by the States of Amsterdam as minister of the church in New Amstel, where he arrived soon after. He was the first ordained minister of any denomination in this town."

1 Becker had been brought before the Council several times for selling liquor to the Indians unlawfully. He was clerk and reader, and was degraded from this position by the Fiscal at Amsterdam April 12, 1660, fined five hundred guilders and ordered to remove from the colony. Andreas Hulde succeeded him as clerk and reader.

2 Rev. Mr. Spottwood says in 1669 the Rev. Warnce Hudson was sent from Holland to minister to this church, and died on the passage.
NEW CASTLE COUNTY.

The Governor-General and Council of New Nether-lands heard the complaint, and "would not proceed against him in the most vigorous manner, considering his age and late position, but they condemn him and declare him incapable to perform the functions of a minister, and what is connected with them within this province, for the time of one year. After the time has elapsed, Deft. shall be held to ask for special consent before he shall be readmitted to the performance of said functions."

On the 18th of April following Fabricius requested, in a petition, "That the sentence against him should be mitigated so far that he might be allowed to baptize, if he may not preach and act as minister." The request was denied.

About this time efforts were being made to divide this religious field between Rev. Laers, the Swedish preacher, and Rev. Fabricius, the Dutch minister, and in a petition to Governor Andros, June 1, 1675, one element presented its claims as follows:

"Show with all reverence the subscribed petitioners the community of the Unchangeable Augsburg Confession, called the Lundwen, which has its residence on the South river that after the petitioners had addressed as humble petition to the Right Honorable Governor on the 13th of May, 1675, together with a document drawn up in Council at New Castle on the 10th of December, 1674, and presented by petitioners' minister, whereby they divided the river into two parishes, so that all above Verdriggte Hook is and shall remain under the pastorate of Mr. Laers, and all below Verdriggte Hook under the pastorate of Mag. Jakobus Fabricius, and requested and asked with due humility that your Noble Honor would please to confirm the act and the division for the sake of God's glory and good order, the petitioners expected hereupon a favorable answer and decision and had hoped to receive the same through Capt. Ed. Kantwall, but as the speedy journey and many troubles have prevented your Noble Honor, the petitioners do not know how to act and they come therefore again to your Noble Right Honorable Worship with the humble request, to confirm the act and the division, also their minister Mag. Jakobus Fabricius and to grant a favorable reply to the petitioners doing which they remain your Noble Right Honorable Worship's subjects and ministers with God.

To this action some of the Swedes and Finns of Crane Hook Church objected, and sent to the Governor the following remonstrance:

"LAD DEO SERMEN, The 14th of August, 1675.

"The Swedes and Finn belonging to the Church at Crane Hooks understand that the Dutch Minister Fabricius very unfairly and without our knowledge, . . . to the Honorable General our church, and this . . . which was never granted by General Lovelace, except the common consent to it and what reasons could induce us to do it, for neither we nor our wives and children are able to understand him. We request, therefore, his Honor Capt. Cantwell with due respect, humbly to ask the Honorable General that we hold divine service with our priest for our edification as we have done so far. If the Dutch priest desires to teach us remain among his own people at Swanswayck and preach before the Dutch.

1 The Verdriggte Hook was the land lying on the east bank of Chris-
Rev. Mr. Spotswood says that in 1684 a French clergyman resided at New Castle, of whom nothing was known, and that in that year the Congregation of Amsterdam sent a pastoral letter to the church at New Amstel, in which they deplored the condition of the church. Wm. Penn, in a letter dated 1688, said: "The Dutch have a meeting-place for worship at New Castle." The territory down to the Horekill was purchased by the West India Company in 1658. No mention is made of a minister for that region, and as late as 1675 there were but forty-seven persons at "Sekonnesseick on Horekill;" and it was not until the beginning of the eighteenth century that any organized movement for religious purposes began in the lower counties of the State.

Episcopal Churches.—Holy Trinity Church (Old Swedes').—The history of Trinity Parish begins in 1688, when Peter Minuit built a fort on the north side of Minquas Creek, at a place called by the Indians, Hopoahackie, naming it Christians, after the reigning Queen of Sweden.

With him came the Rev. Reorus Torkillus as pastor of the colony. For several years religious services were held in the fort, and their churchyard or cemetery was on a hillside in the rear of the present Church of the Holy Trinity (Old Swedes'), the ground coming just half-way up the side of the church.

In 1667, a timber church having been built on the south side of the creek on land now owned by Richard Jackson, near the old Alrich house, called Crane Hook, the services were transferred to it, and a cemetery laid out for the use of the people on that side of the creek.

The Rev. Reorus Torkillus died in Fort Christina September 7, 1648. The Rev. John Campanius came over with Governor Pintz, and remained about six years. The Rev. Israel Holgh and the Rev. Lawrence Charles (Lars Carl) Lokenius were sent out about that time and the Rev. Mr. Peter came with one of the bands of colonists soon after. It is uncertain when Pastors Holgh and Peter returned to Sweden, but the former about 1655. Pastors Lokenius served the churches at Tenakong and Christina, but chiefly the latter, for twenty-two years, notwithstanding he became very infirm in his latter years, and died in 1688.

The Rev. Jacob Fabricius was called from New York in 1677, and notwithstanding he became blind five years after, did the best he could for both churches until about 1693. After his complete disability Charles Christopher Springer, a young Swede of good education, kept up the services by prayers, hymns and reading from the Postilla (Sermons on the Gospels). Thus they seem to have been destitute of an ordained minister for about four or five years.

In 1693 Springer and others of both congregations sent an urgent request to Sweden for two priests to be sent over to them, and some Bibles, hymn-books and other religious works. The King, Charles XI., after some delay occasioned by the death of his wife, Queen Ulrica Eleonora, called to the castle Dr. Jesper Swedberg, who was at that time provost of the cathedral in Upsala, gave him the letter to read and asked him what should be done. He replied: "In America, most gracious sovereign, where there are many Swedes who now need and desire ministers, bibles, hymn-books and various other works of devotion, there is a good opportunity to convert the heathen—yes, and to see to it that the children of Sweden do not become heathen, as they dwell among them." The King answered: "We shall find the means thereto, and provide them ministers, God's word and the necessary books; therefore provide suitable ministers for me."

Thereupon the doctor suggested that His Majesty put the matter into the hands of the archbishop, Dr. Claes Swedbibilius, which was done with the proper instructions. The archbishop laid his instructions before the Consistory, and after due deliberation, they called Andrew Rudman, of Gestrichen, candidate for the degree of Master in Philosophy, and it was left to him to select a fellow-laborer. Dr. Swedberg proposed Mr. Eric Björk, of Westmania, who was then in his house, being tutor to the sons of his brother, Judge Skönsström.

To these two were added, by the King's command, Mr. Jonas Aareen, of Wermeland, whose duty should be to gather information of the country and its inhabitants, and transmit it to His Majesty. And that he might do the more good, he was ordained with Mr. Björk at Upsala, Mr. Rudman having been ordained previously. By the recommendation of the archbishop, the King appropriated for their outfit 1800 dollars copper money, of which was given Mr. Rudman 500 dollars, as he had still something to pay for his academic degree of Magister, which was then conferred, and to each of the others 400 dollars.

The King called the three clergymen into his cabinet, and told them to apply directly to him for whatever they should need, and gave a large number of books as a free donation from himself, to be delivered to the officials of the churches, among which were five hundred copies of Luther's Catechism, translated into the American Virginian language; and on all the books the King's initials were stamped in gold letters. When they departed the King said to them,—"Go, now, in the name of the Lord, to the place to which I send you, and may He make your undertaking successful."

Messrs. Rudman and Björk went on board ship at Dalarö, December 4, 1696, and Mr. Aareen went by land to Götheborg to join them in London. On the 10th of October they arrived in London, and were given a special pass by King William (of Orange).

On the 14th of February, 1697, they went to sea. They were ten weeks at sea, "landing first in Vir..."
gisia, and then went up to Maryland, where the ship was bound."

Then, after the Governor of Maryland, Sir Francis Nicholson, had hospitably entertained them for two weeks, and presented them with twenty-six dollars for their traveling expenses, they continued their journey on a yacht to Elk River, where they arrived June 24th. There were some Swedes dwelling in that place, who welcomed their countrymen most heartily, and sent word to their brethren in Pennsylvania, who came without delay, and with tears of joy greeted their much-longed-for pastors, and conducted them overland to their homes.

We now come to the diary of Mr. Björk, which is so full and rich in incidents that it is difficult to select and condense from it.

He says, July 2, 1697, "After I, together with my colleagues, Magister Andrew Rudman and Mr. Jonas Aureen, had notified the Vice-Governor, Wm. Markham, of our arrival at Philadelphia, and shown him our passport, with King Wm.'s Royal seal thereon, giving us liberty of passage from England over to this place, dated at Kensington, Nov. 22, 1686, and the Vice-Gov. had given us assurance of all possible favor and assistance, we assembled for the first time in the Cranehook Church, when I read to them the letters and commission of King Charles XI., of Sweden, sending us over here with the promise of recall, after a time, and proper preferment at home, in Sweden, others being sent in our place, and also the King's own letter to the congregations, dated at Stockholm, July 15th, 1696, stating what books His Majesty had sent to them, being a great many more than they had asked for.

"Then we read our commission from the Archbishop, Dr. Claus Swedilus, with his representation of our duties to the churches and theirs to us as their pastors.

"As Magister Rudman preferred to remain with the church at Wicacoa, I took up my residence at Christina, and, on July 11th, the 16th Sunday after Trinity, began in Jesus' name my first Divine Service in Cranehook Church."

The charge, or parish, of Mr. Björk embraced at that time the settlement on both sides of the River Delaware, extending, on the west side, from Upland (now Chester) on the north to St. George's on the south; and on the east side from Racoon Creek (Swedesbury) on the north to Pumpkin Hook (Penn's Neck) on the south; and he, with his assistant, Jonas Aureen—who did not prove very reliable—the only clergyman and his log church the only church for all that region.

He not only was the pastor of the Swedes scattered over this wide extent of territory, but also began, almost at the very commencement of his ministry, to preach to the English in their own language, and perform all needed pastoral offices for them, while the comparatively few Dutch settlers were incorporated into the Swedish fold.

To return to the diary,—he says: "On the 30th of July, agreeing to notice given on the 25th, we met to choose certain discreet persons from both sides of the River to act for the whole church in selecting and agreeing upon a place where we, in Jesus' name, should set the new church; and from this side were chosen Charles Springer, John Numerson, Hans Peterson, Hendrick Juessen and Brewer Senek; from the other side, Mr. Whole Stobey, Staffan Juranson, Jacob Van Dever and Olle Fransen. And the fixing of the site was earnestly discussed, as some wished it to be Cranehook, some Thirdhook and some Christina; while those on the east side of the River feared that if they were to contribute to the building of a new church on this side they would not be helped by their brethren when they should be numerous enough to form a separate church on the other side. But they on this side immediately satisfied them by promising that whenever they should become sufficiently numerous to form a separate church, and able to support a separate minister of the evangelical doctrine, they would do as much for them as they now would do towards building a church on this side of the river. Then those who usually cross over from the other side to Sandhook (New Castle), and come up on this side, thought it would be hard for them to pay ferryage across the Christina River if the church were set on the north side of it, and, to content them, it was promised that they should be provided with a new canoe for their own special use in coming to church. And so it was finally unanimously decided that the church should be at Christina, and as there was not ground enough in the cemetery on which to set the building, without encroaching upon graves, and also that it was too much of a side hill, John Stallop, of his own free will, gave land enough to set the upper half of the church on, and also 20 ft. on each side of the building, and a church-walk to the highway. It was first decided that the church should be 30 ft. long and 12 ft. in height, and the walls of stone 3 ft. thick," but when they came to the final consideration of the matter Mr. Björk says: "Now although some of the church wardens wished to have the church no longer than was first talked of, and most of the congregation thought it would be large enough, I opposed it earnestly, in the confidence that God would help me, for I saw plainly that it would not be what it ought, and that we should so build that it would not be necessary to enlarge, and I urged that our contract should be for a building 60 ft. long and 30 ft. broad within the walls, and that the wall should be 20 feet high and three ft. thick, up to the lower end of the windows, and then two ft. upwards, and the contract was so made."

The limited space allotted to this sketch precludes the recital of the interesting details of construction, and it must suffice to add that the stones were broken by the congregation, and hauled, mostly, on sleds in winter; that the boards were all sawed by hand on a saw-pit and the nails all forged by a blacksmith, and it was happily completed and ready for consecration on Holy Trinity Sunday, July 4, 1699.

September 19, 1698, there was a meeting of the congregation at Christina to choose new church wardens; but two of the old were retained for another year viz.: Charles Christopher Springer and Mr.
Wholley Stobey, to whom four were added, viz.: Hans Pietersen, Brewer Seneke, John Stalcoop, and from the other side of the river, Jacob Van de Ver.

From that time to the present there is an unbroken record of the wards, or, as they were afterwards constituted, wardens and vestrymen.

On the 4th Sunday after Easter, 1699, the last service was held in Cranehook Church, when the pastor says: "I exhorted the congregation to renew their hearts before God, and joyfully thank Him that He had blessed them with a new church."

Holy Trinity Sunday, July 4, 1699, Mr. Björk says: "God graciously gave me and the congregation a delightful day for our first entrance into our new church at Christina, after so much labour and cost, and the consecration took place in the presence of many hundred persons of various religious belief, besides our own people, and proceeded as follows: After the assembly had been called together by the ringing of the bell, my colleague from the upper church, Magister Andrew Rudman, and myself, clad each in a surplice (but not in a chasuble, as they could not be obtained here), went in before the altar, as also our colleague, Mr. Jonas Aureen, though he had only a long cloak, with a cape.
'Then Magister Rudman and myself stood in front next to the altar, and Mr. Aureen before us, and we began thus:
"Mag. Rud., 1st.—'Come, let us praise the Lord God.'
"Mag. Rud., 2d.—A prayer of his own composing that God will be graciously pleased with this house.
"Mr. Aureen, 3d.—Read Kings 1st, the whole chapter.
"Pastor Locii, 4th.—Read the 24th King David's psalm, the whole.
"Mr. Aureen, 5th.—Read from the New Testament
John 10th, the whole chapter.
"Mr. Aureen, 6th.—Sing Our Father which art in Heaven, etc.
"Mag. Rud., 7th.—With a loud and slow voice read the Holy (Heilig), as it is set forth in the church directory for such an occasion.
"Mag. Rud., 8th.—'Come, Holy Spirit, Lord God, etc.'
"Then Magister Rudman preached the consecration sermon from the pulpit, beginning with Tobit, 12th chapter, 7th verse. The counsels and secrets of Kings and rulers shall be concealed, etc., but the proper text was Psalm cxvii., verse 3d: 'The Lord hath done great things for us, whereof we are glad."

"And the Church was named Holy Trinity Church.
"11th.—Then from the pulpit he began: 'We praise thee, O God, etc.' 11th.—Then Magister Rudman and I only went before the altar again and he sang the prayer and then the blessing.
"12th.—And then gave an exhortation to keep and reverence this house as the house of God, and thereupon said 'Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost.'
"Pastor Locii.—Answering. 'As it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be, world without end. Amen.'
"And this was the conclusion of the proper consecration service.

"The Holy Communion was then celebrated and administered and children baptized, closing with a sermon by Mr. Aureen and the customary Psalms and hymns.

"After the conclusion of the services we gathered all the notable strangers in John Stalcoop's house and entertained them with food, wine and beer, and afterwards all the rest. Governor Markham was invited to be present, but was prevented by illness."

The congregation contributed for this entertainment of their guests five sheep, two quarters of meal, one quarter of venison, six hundred pounds of wheat, ten pounds of butter, four dozen of eggs, six pounds of sugar, one turkey, several loaves of bread, eight bushels of malt, three gallons red wine and a quantity of coffee, raisins and hops, and John Stal-coop's wife, with the help of Anne Ritman, an English woman from the other side of the river, who was familiar with such occasions, made all necessary preparations.

The cost of the church, reckoning all labor and gifts at the ordinary price, was estimated to be £800, Pennsylvania currency. A considerable part of the money necessary for the payment of the masons, carpenters, etc., who were obtained from Philadelphia, was given by members of the congregation, and what was needed besides was borrowed from John Hanson Stelman, a wealthy Swede at Elk River, Maryland, on Mr. Björk's own recognition, £130 of which was paid by him and given into the church when he returned to Sweden.

Thus was completed in the year of our blessed Lord, 1699, this substantial church building which shall stand for ages a testimony to future generations of the piety, zeal and perseverance of that humble servant of Christ, but really great man, the Rev.
Eric Björk, and it may be truly said that of all the names of those who have helped to make our beloved Commonwealth what it is, none should be remembered with greater reverence and gratitude than his.

Before the completion of the church the indefatigable pastor conceived the project of securing a glebe for the use of the ministers of the parish, and after long and tedious negotiations purchased of John Stalcoop a farm of five hundred acres, on which now stands the greater part of the city of Wilmington, and which, notwithstanding much of it was lost in after-years by maladministration and dishonesty, has been the means of sustaining and carrying the church through many seasons of depression and weakness.

He also secured from John Stalcop ground for the enlargement of the church-yard, and no sooner was the church finished than he stirred up the congregation to go forward in their good work and provide for their ministry a substantial and comfortable parsonage house.

A part of the money for the farm and other improvements was also borrowed of the above-mentioned John Hanson Stelman, and gradually repaid by contributions of the congregation, except £100 given in by Stelman to the church, he finding himself liable to prosecution by the Maryland authorities for charging ten per cent. interest, which was illegal in that colony.

Thus in the short time of three or four years he had laid foundations for the lasting prosperity of this depressed and disheartened community, and by his exhortations and example infused life and energy into his people, calling them together often to lay language of their fathers and the direct union with their mother church was dissolved. The Swedish and English clergy attended each other's councils, held mutual councils of both communions, and preached in each other's churches.

Most of the Swedish ministers were allowed certain stipends for preaching in vacant English Churches by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, and Bishop Swedberg was a member of that society. The bishops of London, who had the oversight of the Episcopal Churches and missions in America, repeatedly recommended the Swedish ministers to the kindness and hospitality of the English, and the various archbishops of Sweden and Bishop Swedberg exorted the Swedish ministers and churches to live in unity and friendship with the English Churches.

Thus, naturally, when the time came that English-speaking preachers and pastors were necessary, and the Swedish authorities deemed it best to withdraw their fostering care and allow the churches to choose religious teachers from this, now their native country, a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church was chosen in the place of those who returned to Sweden. Indeed, not all did return. Mr. Collins remained rector of Gloria Dei Church until the time of his death, in 1830, having several Episcopal ministers in succession as assistants.

There was no difference in doctrine, and very little in the manner of conducting religious services, and many in the outlying districts had already connected themselves with Episcopal Churches in their neighborhood, and, as will be shown farther on, the last Swedish minister of Holy Trinity requested and received from the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel religious books for his English-speaking young people.

On the 29th of June, 1714, Mr. Björk, with his family, started for Sweden, having been recalled by King Charles XII., by a letter written at Tamariack, near Adrianople, in Turkey, June 23, 1713, and appointed provest and to be pastor of the great Copperburg Church in the city of Fahlun, in Dalecarlia, where he preached till an old man, dying in 1740, and from whence was sent, in 1718, a beautiful chalice and paten of silver given to the Holy Trinity Church by the mining company of that city, a result of his loving remembrance of his first charge here in the wilderness, which communion service is still used in the churches of the parish on all anniversary and special occasions.

Immediately on the intended recall of Mr. Björk two other ministers were selected by the ecclesiastic authorities and commissioned by the Royal Council (the King being a fugitive in Turkey, to which country he escaped after the disastrous battle of Pultowa in Russia.) They were Magister A. Hesselliou and Mr.
Abraham Lidienius, and they arrived May 1, 1711.
They labored in conjunction with Mr. Björk until the 3d of May, 1712, when they took formal charge of Holy Trinity Church, Mr. Björk having been appointed provost of all the churches by Bishop Swedberg (who now had the oversight of the churches in America), he serving in that capacity until the King could be heard from and his regular transfer to the church above mentioned be made.

The Rev. Jonas Aureen had been in charge of that part of the congregation on the east side of the Delaware, under the direction of Mr. Björk, for some time past, but had died in the previous February, so it was thought best that Mr. Lidenius should be assigned to that side of the Delaware and Magister Thessellius remain at Christiana as pastor, with the general oversight of the parish.

The people on the other side soon after began the erection of a church on the spot where the present Penn’s Neck Church stands, and were organized a separate church, with Mr. Lidenius for their pastor, and as circumstances would permit, the congregation fulfilled their promise to those on the east side of the river to repay them as much as they had contributed towards the building of Holy Trinity, which, on account of the great scarcity of money, was paid mostly in wheat.

The folks at Raccoon Creek having already built a small church, they were united under the same pastorate with Penn’s Neck, and Holy Trinity Parish was henceforth confined to the west side of the Delaware River.

During the pastorate of Magister Thessellius the church prospered, and, notwithstanding the times were hard, paid off their debts and provided schools for their children. He preached his last sermon September 15, 1728, and soon after returned to Sweden, the English clergy giving him a most hearty testimonial for his zeal in serving in vacant English neighborhoods, and his brother Samuel, who had been for several years in the country serving in congregations in Pennsylvania, was transferred to Holy Trinity.

The Rev. Samuel Thessellius preached his last sermon October 10, 1731, and returned to Sweden.

The English clergy gave him a testimonial and recommendation to the bishop of London and the Swedish authorities, on account of his exemplary life and his great service to the English people, the signers of which were Archibald Cummins, commissary; George Ross, minister at New Castle; Richard Backhouse, minister at Chester; Walter Hacket, minister at Appoquinimink; William Becket, minister at Lewes.

The Rev. John Enneberg, who was already in the country, served the congregation as he had opportunity, and finally took the pastorate, his commission being dated at Stockholm, July 4, 1732, and remained till 1742, when he returned to Sweden and the Rev. Peter Tranberg was transferred from Raccoon and Penn’s Neck to Christina, August 1, 1742. Pastor Tranberg died suddenly at Penn’s Neck, where he had gone to attend the funeral of an old friend and parisioner, November 8, 1748, and lies buried in front of the altar in Holy Trinity Church.

The death of Mr. Tranberg became known to Archbishop Benzellius and the Consistory in May 1749, and they immediately transferred the Rev. Israel Acrelius (the historian) from Raccoon and Penn’s Neck to Holy Trinity, and he took charge of the parish in November following. Acrelius was recalled to Sweden, and took his departure November 9, 1750.

The Rev. Eric Unander was transferred from Raccoon and Penn’s Neck to Christina in 1755, and took the pastorate by his own authority, he being provost, being confirmed therein by a commission from Sweden as soon as it could be obtained. He exerted himself very earnestly to bring the financial condition of the church to a more safe and satisfactory state, and in order to legalize titles and save what remained of the glebe and other real estate from being squandered and lost, applied to Governor William Denny and the General Assembly at New Castle for a charter, which was granted October 27, 1759, the corporate title being the Minister, Church Wardens and Vestrymen of the Swedes’ Lutheran Church, called Trinity Church, in the Borough of Wilmington, which is the present legal title, except that by a subsequent amendment the word minister was left off. This had long been a necessity, as the property, by bad management and dishonesty of agents, had more than one-half of it been lost, and not being a body corporate, the church as such could give no legal title.

Mr. Unander had leave to return, brought by Dr. Weanzell and Magister Andrew Borell in 1758, but he remained till July, 1760, staying to finish his undertakings and leave all things in good order.

Mr. Borell was provost of the churches and had charge of Holy Trinity until the arrival of Rev. Lawrence Girelius, October 21, 1767, who says on the 25th of October Mr. Borell preached in English, but with great difficulty, he was so weak; and this was his last sermon, and the last time he was in the church until he was carried there and buried, after a long and painful illness, on the 5th of April, 1768.

In the early days of the church, burial within its walls was considered the highest honor and tribute of respect that could be shown to the departed. Mr. Björk relates that he buried Church-Warden Brewer Seneke under his own seat, he being the first buried in the church, and also tells us that he buried a son, who died here, on the south side of the altar, and when John Hanson Stelman, of Elk River, gave up to the church the note for one hundred pounds, as a special mark of gratitude they voted him a place of burial on the main aisle of the church. The floor being of brick and stone, a place was easily made for the graves.

During the illness of Provost Borell, Mr. Girelius had charge of the congregation, and he says, “I preached alternate Sundays in Swedish and English, with very good effect, so that on the 2d of Easter, I, assisted by pastor Goranson, administered the Lord’s Supper to fifteen persons, it being the first time the Holy Communion was ever celebrated in English in this church.”
NEW CASTLE COUNTY.

After the death of Mr. Borell, Mr. Girelius was appointed pastor, and in 1770 he says, "I began to instruct the youth in the English catechism, beginning 23rd of November, teaching them every day, except Friday, from eleven to two o'clock, and followed it up till the 2d of June, and at the same time distributed among them small religious books in English, published by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, which they, by the request of Dr. and Provost Wrangel, furnished me, to give out wherever I thought good might be done. I also sent a number of the books to the Swedes at Egg Harbor, when Pastors Goranson and Wicksell visited them. I especially gave them the small book called 'The Baptismal Vow or Covenant Explained,' with directions to learn it by heart, and told them that hereafter I would examine them yearly, so long as God allows me to work in His vineyard.'

The Rev. Mr. Girelius was made provost of all the churches in 1770, and continued in charge of Trinity Parish until 1791, at which time the Swedish superintendence was officially discontinued.

Soon after the departure of Mr. Girelius the vestry called the Rev. Joseph Clarkson, a clergyman of the Episcopal Church, who remained until 1799.

December 15, 1799, the Rev. William Price was engaged at a salary of one hundred and seventy-five pounds and the parsonage, and he remained pastor up to March 25, 1812.

April 16, 1814, the vestry agreed to give the Rev. William Weeks seven hundred dollars and the use of the lot by the church, provided the congregation should approve of him, and their approval was voted at a meeting on the 19th. Mr. Weeks resigned June 25, 1817.

January 31, 1818, a committee appointed to take the sentiment of the congregation in writing, by their signatures, with regard to the call of the Rev. Levi Bull to Trinity Church for the ensuing year, reported that they had obtained eighty-nine names in favor and but one against, and it was resolved that Mr. J. M. Broom communicate the intelligence to the Rev. Mr. Bull.

Mr. Bull resigned January 2, 1819, but served till March following. March 2, 1819, the vestry offered the Rev. Richard D. Hall eight hundred dollars, if the congregation approved, and, a meeting being called, there was a unanimous approval. Mr. Hall resigned December 25, 1821.

The Rev. Ralph Williston was called March 30, 1822, the sense of the congregation having been taken by a canvass of the parish. Mr. Williston left in 1827, and the Rev. Pierce Connelly was engaged, and remained two years, his salary being five hundred dollars and the rent of the parsonage-house. The Rev. Isaac Pardee was engaged September 25, 1828, and remained till 1836.

Having erected a new house of worship at the corner of Fifth and King Streets, the congregation of Trinity Church removed there at Christmas, 1830, and the old church being in a dilapidated condition the removal was permanent. In 1836 an effort was made to rescue the venerable building from ruins, and a part of the roof was newly shingled and new windows put in and new shutters provided for their protection. The vestry meeting held April 4, 1842, was adjourned to meet at the old church on the 11th, to determine what repairs were necessary, and a committee was then appointed to make the repairs, Miss Henrietta Almond having left by will seven hundred dollars for the renovation of the interior. August 25, 1842, is the following minute in the vestry-book: "On Sunday last the old church was re-opened for occasional services, when Bishop Lee said prayers and read the lessons and the Rev. J. W. McCullough, Rector of the parish, preached." In 1847, at a meeting of the vestry, it was decided to hold services at the old Trinity Church every Sunday afternoon, and that the evening service at Fifth and King be dispensed with. February, 1848, it was resolved that the offerings at the old church be kept separate and subject to the order of the assistant minister. I have not been able to find the name of the assistant. The bell was re-cast and it was ordered that it be rung not only for service at the old church, but also the new. April 5, 1852, the Rev. Walter Franklin was chosen assistant minister to officiate at old Sweden's. January 14, 1853, the rector was authorized to procure an assistant to officiate at the old church. December 4, 1854, Alexis I. Du Pont and George D. Armstrong, who had been appointed a committee to engage the Rev. J. A. Spooner as missionary for the parish, report that they have engaged him and made the arrangement that Mr. Spooner should preach every Sunday morning at the old church and in the evening at the new house for the rector, Mr. Buck, and in the afternoon Mr. Buck preach at the old church and Mr. Spooner read the service. Mr. Spooner remained till 1856.

July 21, 1856, it was resolved that the Rev. Stevens Parker be invited to become assistant minister at a salary of seven hundred dollars, and that the wardens make all necessary repairs to the church.

In September, 1857, Alexis I. Du Pont, senior warden and a munificent benefactor of Trinity Parish, died, and the church losing his aid in support of Mr. Parker, thought it necessary to accept his resignation; but, November 2, 1857, he was re-elected and served at St. John's and Old Sweden's, in conjunction with the rector, Mr. Buck. Mr. Parker resigned as assistant January 4, 1859, and after his resignation no continuous services were kept up till November, 1868, when the rector was requested to engage the Rev. William Murphy, who served until May 14, 1877.

In February, 1882, Rev. Louis R. Lewis was engaged as assistant in care of the old church, and continued till Easter, 1883.

To return to the rectory of the parish. The Rev. Mr. Pardee resigned December 25, 1834, and the Rev. Hiram Adams accepted a call March 3, 1836, and resigned February 22, 1838.
The Rev. John W. McCullough accepted September 12, 1838, and resigned March 25, 1847. The Rev. Edwin M. Vandeusen accepted May 21, 1847, and resigned October 20, 1852.

The Rev. Charles Breck was elected rector December 6, 1852, and resigned September, 1869. The Rev. Wm. J. Frost became rector June 1st, 1870 and continued till April 17, 1881.

The Rev. Henry B. Martin was elected rector, November 9, 1881. During this year the building at the corner of Fifth and King Streets was sold by consent of the bishop and standing committee of the diocese, and a lot of ground purchased at the corner of Delaware Avenue and Adams Street, and on the south part of it, a commodious house of worship was erected, to be used as a church until circumstances should be favorable for the erection of a larger and more appropriate church building fronting on Delaware Avenue, which house is now used by the Trinity congregation as their regular place of worship. The Rev. Henry B. Martin resigned July 4, 1886.

The Rev. H. Ashton Henry was elected rector February 16, 1887.

The present officers of the parish are: Rector, Rev. H. Ashton Henry, pastor of Trinity congregation and ex-officio president of the vestry; Assistant Minister, Rev. Jesse Higgins, pastor of Holy Trinity congregation; Senior Warden, Horace Burr; Junior Warden, Samuel M. Murphy; Vestrymen, Victor Du Pont, Thomas F. Bayard, Walter Cummins, William Davidson, Isaac C. Pyle, Edwin T. Canby, John P. R. Polk, John M. Harvey and James Carrow; Secretary, Walter Cummins; Treasurer, Edwin T. Canby; Receiver, John S. Grohe.

Among the many honored laymen who have been connected with this old parish during its two-and-a-half centuries' existence two names stand out as especially worthy of grateful remembrance—Charles Christopher Springer and Alexia I. Du Pont. The former, in the early days of its history, was the trusty agent, wise counselor and unwarried worker for its prosperity from early youth to a ripe old age of four-score years. The latter, though suddenly cut off in the prime of life, had already, by his untiring devotion to the cause of religion and his princely contributions towards the various needs of the parish, endeared himself to the church; and the beautiful and substantial St. John's stands a lasting memorial to his great-hearted munificence, which, though only in embryo at his untimely death, was built by his family in accordance with his wish and intentions.

The offspring of this old parish are St. Andrew's, St. John's, Christ Church and, through St. Andrew's, Calvary, and the descendants of her old membership are not only found in the various Episcopal Churches of the vicinity, but make up an inconsiderable portion of the best membership of the other religious communions around us and many of the honored and respected citizens of distant sections of our country bear the name and proudly trace their descent from those whose dust lies in the shadow of this revered old sanctuary, Old Swedes' Church.

St. Andrew's Protestant Episcopal Church. The subject of a new Episcopal Church in Wilmington was agitated as early as 1815 in response to a sentiment declaring the Old Swedes' Church inconveniently situated and inaccessible. As a result, the Episcopal Association of the borough of Wilmington was formed, and on April 26, 1815, John Lyman was made chairman; James M. Broom, secretary; and John Rumsey, Henry Rice, Dr. John Brinkle, John Hodges and Francis O'Daniel were appointed a committee and purchased the Second Baptist Church, corner King and Sixth Streets, together with an adjoining lot. Work was begun immediately, but owing to the business depression of 1817 the projected edifice was abandoned and the lots sold. Rev. Ralph Williston, rector of Trinity Church, reported to the Diocesan Convention, June 7, 1822, a possibility of a new church being commenced during the ensuing summer, but this was not consummated.

Subsequently a movement was inaugurated, resulting in the formation of a congregation, which, through the courtesy of the ancient Presbyterian congregation, utilized the church belonging to the latter, at the corner of Market and Tenth Streets, with Rev. John Howland Coit, called in June, 1823, as rector. In a few months the new congregation considered the expediency of erecting a church building, and on Tuesday, December 23, 1828, the "Board of Trustees of the Episcopal Congregation in the Borough of Wilmington and its Vicinity" met at Dr. John Brinkle's residence and took formal action. There were present Dr. John Brinkle, Henry Rice, Dell Noblit, John B. Lewis and Albert Wilson. Dr. Brinkle was chairman and Albert Wilson secretary. It was decided to purchase the lot offered by S. McClary and C. Bush, southwest corner Shipley and Eighth Streets, and to erect a stone building forty-five by fifty-five feet. The stone was furnished at a price considerably under market rates by Edward Tatnall. The church was consecrated October 1, 1829, by Bishop White, of Pennsylvania, assisted by a number of clergymen from that State and Delaware; Rev. Mr. Bedell, of Philadelphia, reading the service for the day and Rev. Dr. Bull, formerly rector of Trinity Church, preaching the sermon. On Easter Monday, 1830, the first vestry of St. Andrew's Church was elected. The earliest register contains twenty-seven names of those who had previously been members of the church and who united in forming the new congregation. The first report of St. Andrew's Church, 1830, signed by Rev. Mr. Coit, rector, showed that the membership was gradually increasing and nearly all the pews had been taken. Within two years between twenty and thirty had been added to the communicants, who numbered fifty; scholars in the Sunday-school, two hundred and fifty.

Fourteen persons were received on the first confirmation, May 30, 1830, by Bishop H. U. Onderdonk. The first deacons to the Diocesan Convention were John B. Lewis and James L. Devou, 1831. In April, 1832, Rev. Mr. Coit resigned the rectoryship to accept a call to Plattsburg, New York.

Rev. Wm. C. Russell, who became rector in November, 1834, established the missionary organization, an important auxiliary, which has continued in existence since. At Easter, 1837, Mr. Russell resigned in consequence of failing health and died six months later. In 1839 a spire was put on the church and other improvements were made, but on January 25, 1840, the church was totally destroyed by fire. The congregation then used the Hanover Street Presbyterian Church until October, the same year, when a new edifice, forty-eight by eighty feet, was completed at a cost of eleven thousand dollars. On October 15, 1840, it was dedicated by Bishop Onderdonk, assisted by Bishop Whittingham, of Maryland. Rev. Alfred Lee assumed temporary charge of the parish in June, 1842, and accepted the rectoryship July 30, 1843. In 1854 the church was enlarged. In 1857 a mission was started in a carriage-shop at Front and Justison Streets, under the auspices of St. Andrew's Church, and resulted in the erection of Calvary Church, which was opened for service October 20, 1859, and organized as an independent parish April 15, 1863. A colored Sunday-school was organized in connection with St. Andrew's Church in 1852, and was continued until 1888.

Du Pont reading the list of articles deposited in the stone. On August 28, 1847, Mr. Du Pont died from the effects of an explosion at the powder mills. The walls of the church were only a few feet above the ground; but Mrs. Du Pont labored earnestly and successfully for the completion of her husband's design. Rev. Stevens Parker was most assiduous, and did a very noble work, for several years. A parish school was opened in February, 1857. The church was consecrated November 3, 1858, on which day Mr. Breck resigned, and the Rev. Stevens Parker became rector. A guild did much work among the poor. The neighborhood was so rude, that the services were often disturbed by noisy men and boys. Rev. James Chrysal and Rev. Thomas G. Clemson were, at different times, assistants. In 1863 Mr. Parker resigned, and Rev. Leighton Coleman succeeded him as rector. A sewing school, night school and colored Sunday-school were opened. In 1866 Mr. Coleman resigned, and Rev. Thomas Gardiner Littell became rector. In May a mission Sunday-school was opened at the Augustine paper-mill. The corner-stone of a parish building was laid August 15, 1866, and the structure was first used November 3d. The old brick building was taken down, and the new Sunday-school erected the same year, and occupied December 28th. In 1868 an organ chamber was built on the north side of the chancel, and a new organ presented. The congregation has always been remarkable for its zeal and devotion.

Calvary Protestant Episcopal Church, corner of Third and Washington Streets, was started as a mission of St. Andrew's Church, and was fostered by the clergy of that parish. The initial services were held in 1857 in a carriage shop, corner of Front and Justison Streets, "a portion of the city then ill-supplied with religious advantages." From a small beginning the mission grew rapidly, and a large and flourishing Sunday-School was also soon in operation. As a result Calvary Chapel was erected, at a cost in excess of five thousand dollars, and opened October 20, 1859. On April 15, 1868, it was organized as an independent parish, and the same year Rev. George A. Latimer was chosen rector. In 1872 a recess chancel was added to the church. In March, 1877, Rev. Mr. Latimer resigned, and the following year Rev. B. H. Latrobe succeeded him. The latter resigned in 1879, and Rev. Wm. G. Ware became rector in November, and was in turn succeeded by Rev. George W. Du Bois, D.D., who continued in charge until January 1, 1885. On May 1, 1885, Rev. Mr. Latrobe began his second pastorate and remained until April 24, 1887. On May 29, 1887, Rev. David Howard, of St. John's Memorial Church, Ashland, Pa., became rector. In 1887 Calvary Church had one hundred communicants and a Sunday-School membership of two hundred and fifty.

The Reformed Episcopal Church of the Covenant, on Second Street, near Washington Street, Wilmington, was organized in 1878, by thirty former members of Calvary Protestant Episcopal Church. The first services were held in Institute Hall, July 21, 1878, by Bishop Fallows. On September 21, a vestry was chosen; the following week Rev. J. L. Estlin was elected rector. Services were held respectively in the Unitarian Church, the Masonic Temple and the Western Market House. Subsequently the present church building was leased then purchased. In 1881 forty members withdrew to organize the Church of the Redeemer, of which Mr. Estlin became rector. After his departure Rev. W. L. White of the Methodist Episcopal Church supplied the pulpit until the election of Rev. W. H. Barnes as rector. Rev. Charles H. Tucker, the present rector, began his term of service in 1888. The church has a membership of two hundred and fifty, and the Sunday-school numbers three hundred and twenty-five; D. B. Chapin is Superintendent. In 1882, the Church of the Covenant purchased a school-house at Fifth Avenue and Brown Street, and organized a Mission Sunday-school. It has now two hundred scholars, with William Y. Warner, Superintendent.

The Reformed Episcopal Church of the Redeemer, at Eighth and Monroe Streets, Wilmington, was organized May 23, 1881, by about forty members who withdrew from the Church of the Covenant, succeeding the resignation of its rector, Rev. J. L. Estlin, for the purpose of founding a parish in the northwestern section of the city. A lot belonging to Henry Evans, improved by a church building formerly occupied by the West Presbyterian Congregation, but for many years used as a carpenter-shop by Mr. Evans, was purchased for four thousand dollars, and improved at a further cost of one thousand dollars. Pending repairs the congregation, Rev. Mr. Estlin, rector, worshipped at the residence of Benjamin Elliott on Shipley Street. When the church was finished a congregational meeting was held for permanent organization. Rev. Mr. Estlin presided, and Isaac W. Hallam was secretary. About forty persons present organized as the Reformed Episcopal Church of the Redeemer, and elected a vestry consisting of Isaac W. Hallam, Franklin P. Mason, Robert Roberts, Benjamin Elliott, Jno. W. Todd and Edwin N. Morley, Rev. Mr. Estlin was formally continued as rector. The church has now a membership of seventy-six, and a Sabbath-school of three hundred scholars. The present vestry is composed of Isaac W. Hallam, Jonathan Magargle, John F. Keys, Dr. S. C. Brinckle, Benjamin Elliott, Edwin N. Morley, John W. Betelle.

The Society of Friends.—About the year 1682 several families of Friends arrived in America, and settled on the east side of the Brandywine, in New Castle County. Among them were Valentine Hollingsworth, William Stockdale, Thomas Conoway, Adam Sharpkey, Morgan

In 1873, while Bishop of Kentucky, he withdrew from the Protestant Episcopal Church, and established the Reformed Episcopal Church, of which he was the first Bishop. He died in 1876.

Druitt, Valentine Morgan, Cornelius Empson. In the year 1684 a survey of nine hundred and eighty-six acres, was made for Valentine Hollingsworth, on Shellpot Creek, north of Wilmington, near the country seat of the late Edward Brinahurst. The surveyor, in making his return, named the tract "New Worke." The owner of this land Eleventh Month, 7, 1687, gave one-half an acre for a meeting-house and a graveyard.

This was named the Newark Meeting which was continued until 1754.

In 1684 John Hussey, John Richardson, Edward Blake, George Hogg, Benjamin Sweet and other Friends settled in and near the town of New Castle. They first held meetings in each other’s houses by permission of the Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting. In 1703 a lot was bought and a meeting-house built.

When the settlement of Friends above the Brandywine increased the Newark Meeting established the New Castle Meeting, declined and was finally discontinued in 1758. Its members afterwards attended the meeting established at Wilmington and the meeting-house in New Castle was sold.

A Monthly Meeting was held in New Castle in 1686. In 1687 this meeting decided that it was “more convenient for the present that the meeting be held twice on the other side of the Brandywine and the third which will be the Quarterly Meeting at New Castle.” From 1689 to 1704 the Monthly meeting seems to have been “held at Valentine Hollingsworth’s and other Friends’ houses,” and was called Newark Monthly Meeting. It was then changed to George Harlan’s house at Centre.

The last monthly meeting held at Newark was in 1707. It was generally held at Centre though sometimes at Kennett, from that date 1760, when it was changed to the Kennett Monthly Meeting.

A number of Friends settled in the village of Wilmington in 1736, among whom were William Shipley, Joshua Way, Thomas West and Joseph Hewes, and the 13th day of the Twelfth Month, 1737, Chester Quarterly Meeting established the Wilmington Meeting for worship. The record of that date says: “Newark Monthly Meeting, on behalf of Friends living in and near Wilmington, do request that this Meeting would give the said Friends liberty of keeping meeting for worship on every first and fifth days of the week, which this meeting allows until further orders.”

The first meeting was held in the one-story brick house of William Shipley. Later meetings were held in William Shipley’s new house at the southwest corner of Fourth and Shipley Street, until the first meeting-house was completed in the fall of 1738. It was built of brick on the site of the Friends’ school-house on West Street, and the date of the erection, 1738, was placed in the gable-wall with black glazed bricks.

Benjamin Ferris, the historian, says this building was twenty-four feet square and one-story high. Originally a broad projecting roof extended across the entire southwest front. A sun-dial was placed over the small window under the peak of the roof in the south gable wall and remained there for sixty years or more. Within ten years after the establishment of this meeting, the society had become quite large. A great many Friends from New Castle and Newark Meetings came here regularly to worship, and those meetings declined. The first meeting-house was afterwards used exclusively for school purposes, and in a changed form is still standing. In 1748 another meeting-house was built on West Street on the site of the present one. It was forty-eight feet square, two-stories high, with galleries extending over one-half the ground floor. Over each of the doors was a double pitch roof, and elliptical arch over each of the windows in the first story. The form of the building was very singular. The four sides were of equal size, the root was a truncated pyramid. On the top of the pyramid, on the truncated part, was a small building about six feet square. Its roof was also of the form of a pyramid with a chimney rising out of the apex, and a window on each of the sides to light the garret. This meeting-house was a great centre of interest, and the society which met in it increased in numbers and prospered, having for many years a very numerous membership.

Concord Quarterly Meeting, on the 14th of the Third Month, 1756, constituted Wilmington and New Castle Preparative Meetings, a Monthly Meeting for discipline, under the name of Wilmington Monthly Meeting. It was that year that the records of the Wilmington Meeting now in the hands of the society begin. In 1758 the same Quarterly Meeting advised the New Castle Preparative Meeting to resign its right of holding a meeting, and join that of Wilmington, which was done, and the New Castle meeting-house was sold.

The meeting-house erected on West Street in 1748 was used until 1817, when the present one was built.

1 The facts were obtained from "A Retrospect of Early Quakers," a work prepared by Ezra Miller, of Chester County, Pa., in 1880.
Among the prominent ministers of the Wilmington Meeting since the beginning of the present century, on the men's side were Joshua Maule, Edward Brooks, John Brooks and Ezra Fell; and on the women's side were Deborah Spackman, Ann Ferris, Elizabeth Robinson and Sarah Ferris.

The Friends of Wilmington continued as one organization until the general division of the Society in 1827, when the followers of Elias Hicks became possessors, and have since worshipped in the Fourth and West Street Meeting-House. The orthodox Friends built a meeting-house at the northeast corner of Ninth and Tatnall Streets, which has since been their place of worship.

PRESBYTERIAN CHURCHES. — First Presbyterian Church. Among the early settlers of Wilmington were a number, principally Scotch and Irish descent, who had been educated in the Presbyterian faith, and there being no place of worship nearer than in New Castle, measures were taken to procure a site for place of worship and a burying-ground and a sanctuary. On December 1, 1737, an acre was purchased by the trustees chosen for that purpose. Three years after, the old First Presbyterian Church was erected, and still stands near the corner of Tenth and Market Streets.

For several years the congregation were limited in numbers and feeble in sources, enjoying no regular ministrations. The pulpit was occasionally supplied by the Presbytery of New Castle, with which the church has always with the exception of a brief interval been connected. Finally Rev. Robert Cathcart occupied the pulpit every fourth Sunday until his death, when the church had only such supplies as they could occasionally procure, being still too feeble to sustain a pastor. In June, 1759, Rev. Wm. McKennan began his ministries, and in 1761, divided his time between the churches of Wilmington and Red Clay Creek. In 1766 the first elder, Thomas Watt, is mentioned. Under the pastorate of Mr. McKennan the church flourished, and so a demand was made for regular services. In April, 1778, a call was placed in the hands of Rev. Joseph Smith to preach, except on the days when Mr. McKennan officiated, and regular services were secured through the united efforts of Messrs. Smith and McKennan.

The real pastorate soon led to dual differences. The friends of Mr. Smith were the most aggressive and demanded his undivided time to the exclusion of Mr. McKennan, whose friends opposed this demand and a contention ensued, resulting in the secession of the friends of Mr. Smith, and the abrupt discontinuance of his labors. The adherents of Mr. Smith formed a new congregation under the title of the Second Presbyterian Church of Wilmington, and he became their pastor October 25, 1774.

The loss of so many members proved disastrous to the First Church, and for the next sixty-five years it had a continuous struggle for existence. The pastoral relation of Mr. McKennan was dissolved by Presbytery in 1790 at his own request, and on November 28, 1796, Rev. Francis Allison Latta was installed, and remained until 1803. After the departure of Mr. Latta the church was supplied for a few months by Rev. Mr. Henderson. For the nine years ensuing, the congregation was without stated supply, and although during this period represented by trustees, was apparently without the means of supporting occasional ministrations. In February, 1813, the Rev. Mr. Snowden was engaged for one year. At the end of this time a period of four years of inactivity ensued.

In 1817, Rev. Thomas Read, D. D., having resigned a successful pastorate of twenty years over the Second Presbyterian Church, commenced to labor as his health permitted in the First Church, continuing for four years when he was disabled by a fall. During Dr. Read’s labors in this church a Sabbath-School was for the first time established in 1819.

In 1824, Rev. James Taylor supplied the pulpit for one year. Another interval of five years then ensued without stated ministrations. Rev. Thomas Love, conducted regular services from 1829 to 1832. Then for a time it seemed doubtful whether or not the First Church was in existence. The champion upholding the corporate capacity of the church, was the Rev. Samuel M. Gayley. In October, 1833, he united with the Presbytery of New Castle. For the ensuing three years the First Church was closed, Mr. Gayley devoting his time to the church at Rockland. In 1836, he again commenced to preach in the First Church every Sabbath afternoon. Mr. Gayley, was often the sole occupant of the room. He received no stipulated salary and at times supplied the necessary fuel and lights. At this time an application was made to the Trustees by Hanover Church, a branch from the Second Presbyterian Church, to open the First Church to Mr. Gilbert, their pastor, to the exclusion of Mr. Gayley, which was refused. Toward the close of 1837, at the suggestion of certain persons, a curb was laid by the city authorities in front of the grounds occupied by the First Church, in order that a debt might thereby be created which would necessitate a sale. The funds, however, were raised by the few remaining friends. The congregation subsequently received valuable accessions from the Second Presbyterian Church, up to that time worshipping on the corner of Walnut and Fifth Streets. The congregation thus largely increased extended an invitation July 7, 1838, to Rev. Stephen R. Wykooop, to preach temporarily and afterwards a call was extended to him which he accepted and was installed January 22, 1839. Under the care of Mr. Wykooop the congregation increased rapidly and at a meeting held February 4, 1839, it was determined to build a more commodious church. The congregation of the Second Church, having become identified with them, the funds of that organization were appropriated to the new building. The corner-stone of the new church was laid May 7, 1839. The building was completed and the congregation commenced to worship therein early in the following year. A few years later the old church was remodelled and employed for a school. During Mr. Wykooop’s ministry three hundred and ninety were added to the membership of the church. Owing to failing health he resigned in April, 1853. Rev. Wm. C. Roberts, succeeded him and was installed October 13, 1858. In 1859, the church was enlarged. During Mr. Roberts’ pastorate an average of eighteen were added yearly to the membership of the church. He resigned in October 1862. On May 11, 1863, a call was presented to the Rev. Charles D. Kellogg, who was pastor until the Spring of 1864. This pastorate represents one of the most vigorous periods in the church’s history—the membership was largely increased and the treasury was in better condition than in any former period. The present officers of the church are as follows: Pastor, Rev. Henry D. Lindsay. Elders, N. B. Culbert, Read J. McKay, M. D., James F. Price. Trustees, Wm. Lawton, President, T. F. Crawford, Joseph L. Carpenter, Jr., N. B. Culbert, J. S. Hamilton, R. J. McKay, M. D., Howard J. Wallace. Superintendent of Sunday School, Howard J. Wallace.

The Hanover Street Presbyterian Church is the successor of the Second and the Christian Presbyterian Churches. The Second Church was organized by members who withdrew from the First Church in 1774, with Rev. Joseph Smith1 as pastor.

In 1787 the Second Church was, by act of assembly, changed to Christiansa Church. In January, 1780, Rev. William R. Smith succeeded Rev. Joseph Smith as pastor of the Second Church, and continued in charge until 1795. He was succeeded in 1797, by Rev. Thomas Read, whose pastoral relations terminated in 1817. On May 20, 1818, Rev. E. W. Gilbert was installed as Mr. Read's successor. In 1832, Mr. Gilbert resigned, but accepted a second call in 1836, and remained until May 3, 1841, when he was elected president of Newark College. The old church proving too small, the present building was erected corner of King and Sixth, then Hanover, Streets, and dedicated March 12, 1829. In 1833, the congregation was incorporated under the title of the Hanover Street Church. Rev. Arthur Granger succeeded Dr. Gilbert and resigned in 1835. Rev. William Hogarth, a licentiate of Geneva, N. Y., Presbytery, became pastor December 6, 1841, and resigned November 21, 1846. Rev. Joel Edson Rockwell was installed as pastor, May 4, 1847, remaining five years. Rev. A. D. Pollock, of Virginia, was in charge from 1852 to 1855. On November 31, 1855, Rev. William C. Dickinson was elected pastor, but was never formally installed. Rev. William Aikman, D. D., was installed in October, 1857, and during his ministries Olivet Chapel was built. The present pastor, Rev. Lafayette Marks, D. D., was called in 1869. His pastorate has continued longer than any in the history of the church, and has been the longest, with one exception, of any Protestant minister in Wilmington. The Sabbath-School of Hanover Church is the oldest in the State, having been organized in 1814.

Olivet Presbyterian Church, corner of Adams and Chestnut Streets, grew out of a Sunday School started in 1849, in a frame building, corner of Dock Street and Newport Road, afterwards known as the "Little Arch," or the "Hedgeville School House." It was erected at a cost of $435, collected mainly by Samuel Floyd and John L. Haddin. The lot was donated by George Jones. The Sabbath School commenced August 5, 1849, with twenty scholars. Edward G. Taylor was superintendent and the teachers were Samuel Floyd, John L. Haddon, James Anderson, A. T. Taylor, Robert Porter, John McLean, George Clark, Sarah Simpson, Elizabeth Simpson, Martha F. Bush, Mrs. Lamb, Miss C. Smith and Miss Quimby. The building was deeded to the trustees of the Hanover Street Church. Weekly prayer-meetings and occasional preaching were maintained for several years. The first sermon was preached August 12, 1849, by the Rev. W. W. Taylor of Philadelphia, but now a resident of Wilmington. The Sabbath School prospered and on February 27, 1859, Mr. Taylor was succeeded as superintendent by J. P. McLean. Among the most active workers in the school were Joseph W. Day, Charles Baird, W. J. Morrow, Thomas L. Lawson, John Crozier, J. M. Ocheltree, James Morrow, Sarah J. Brown, Mary Ogle, William D. Dowes, Esq., Brynburg Porter, Jane C. Capelle, William M. Fyle, George Morrison, Thomas K. Porter, Lizzie A. Morrow, and Misses Anna and Ella Porter. Mr. McLean resigned the superintendent in 1869, and was succeeded by William D. Dow. The subsequent superintendents were William M. Fyle, Thomas K. Porter and George Morrison. In 1863, steps were taken to erect the present building, known as Olivet Chapel, at the corner of Adams and Chestnut Streets, the cost being nearly $4,000; the ladies of Hanover Church raised $987, and partially furnished the building. The cornerstone was laid October 8, 1863, Rev. William Aikman, pastor of Hanover Church, officiating. Addresses were delivered by Judge Willard Hall and the Rev. Charles D. Kellogg. The dedication services were held February 7, 1864. Rev. William Aikman preached the sermon, and Rev. Thomas McCann made an address. The Sabbath School was reorganized February 14, 1864. In December, 1864, Rev. William Edwards was elected pastor, and resigned in June, 1865. Rev. A. J. Snyder was pastor from September, 1867, to March 17, 1878. He was succeeded June 30, 1878, by Rev. Charles P. Mallery, who resigned in October, 1885, and was succeeded by Rev. Edwin D. Newberry, the present pastor, April 1, 1886. The congregation was formerly organized as Olivet Presbyterian Church, January 31, 1868, with Andrew Muir as elder. George Morrison and Newton C. Sample were ordained elders on April 28, 1872.

The Central Presbyterian Church of Wilmington was organized by the Presbytery of Wilmington, December 6, 1855. The application for the new congregation was made by a number of members of the Hanover Street Church, by which the movement was encouraged in the following terms:

"We approve the separation proposed and bid those who are engaged in it God-speed; that although it will take away from us much of our wealth and a greater portion of the youth and vigor of this Church, instead of deploring we rejoice over it, because it will form an energetic nucleus, not only to make the enterprise strong in its own line, but to impart character to the ascensions that will be made to it."

The West Presbyterian Church of Wilmington is an outgrowth of the Central Presbyterian Church of that city. The movement leading to its organization began as early as March, 1867, but was not consummated until 1

1 From a sketch by Mr. Charles Baird.
October 19, 1868, when the new church was constituted by the New Castle Presbytery, with the full consent and sympathy of the Central congregation. The West Church was formed by sixty-seven members from the Central and thirty-three from the Hanover Street church. The first public service was held October 25, 1868, in the Hall of the Wilmington Institute, Rev. Geo. F. Wiswell, of Philadelphia, officiating. A Sunday-school was organized a week later, and on February 10, 1869, the session was constituted. On June 1, 1869, Rev. George H. Smyth, of Washington City, became pastor and was installed September 30, 1869. In a few months the congregation removed to Monroe Street Chapel, corner of Monroe and Eighth Streets, belonging to the Central Church. On April 21, 1871, the corner-stone of the present church was laid, and it was completed and dedicated December 28th, the same year. It cost between $60,000 and $70,000. Rev. Mr. Smyth continued as pastor until September, 1873, and was succeeded by Rev. J. M. Otta, of Columbia, Tenn., who resigned January 27, 1878. The present pastor, Rev. Albert N. Keigwin, of Philadelphia, was installed November 19, 1878.

The Sabbath School commenced its sessions November 1, 1868, with forty persons enrolled as teachers and scholars. At a meeting held November 7, 1868, the officers elected were superintendent, John P. McLear; secretary, James A. Robinson; treasurer, Charles Baird; librarians, J. Eldridge Pierce and Edward F. Lummis.

April 18, 1869, when the church removed to the Monroe Street chapel, the School continued its sessions in the same building. Mr. McLear continued superintendent until the close of 1871.

When the church removed to their new building corner of Eighth and Washington Streets, the school was reorganized. There had been until this time a Sabbath-school in progress in the before named chapel under the control of the Central church since 1861. This school was united with the other school at the time of this removal to Eighth and Washington Streets, under one organization. Charles Baird, who had filled the office of superintendent of this afternoon school since 1868, was elected superintendent of the united schools, and continues in the position to the present time, December, 1887.

The officers are superintendent, Charles Baird; recording secretary, H. C. Taylor; financial secretary, R. O. Janvier; treasurer, W. J. Morrow; librarian, F. E. Janvier.

There are enrolled forty-three teachers and five hundred and fifty-two scholars.

Rodney Street Presbyterian Church.—For more than twenty-five years the Rodney Street Sabbath-school was a mission school, under the control of the Central Presbyterian Church. Lack of teachers and inadequate accommodations sometimes reduced its numbers until its officers almost despaired of its ever succeeding. As the portion of the city in which it is situated became more thickly populated the school increased, and became so over-crowded that better accommodations were necessary.

In 1883 the building which is now known as the Rodney Street Church was erected. On Jan. 28, 1886, a church organization was effected, under the name of the Rodney Street Presbyterian Church, with fifty-six members, twenty-six of whom were from the Central Presbyterian Church. Eight joined on profession of their faith, and the others were from different church organizations. W. M. Canby and Henry B. Seidel were installed elders. Rev. William L. McEwan was installed pastor in May, 1886.

The church has been self-sustaining from its organization, and rapidly increased in membership. At the first communion thirty-five members were added, and before the end of the second year the membership was one hundred and sixty.

METHODIST CHURCHES.—The Asbury Methodist Episcopal Church, of Wilmington, traces its origin back to 1766. In that year Captain Webb, a British army officer, preached in Wilmington under some shady trees, near the corner of King and Kent (now Eighth) Streets. John Thelwell, who kept a public house near the lower market, officiated as clerk and led the singing. Subsequently Mr. Thelwell offered his school-house, southeast corner King and Third Streets, as a place of worship, and there Asbury Society was organized.

The original members of the society were John Thelwell and Deborah, his daughter, Henry Colesburg, Betsy Colesburg, Sarah Colesburg, John Miller, Thomas Webster, William Wood, J. Jaquet, George Whistle, David Ford, James Belt, Patience Erwin and Sarah Wood, a little band, which gave expression to the sentiment, "Thus far have we come after twenty years."

The society soon numbered forty-three white and nineteen colored members.

On May 12, 1789, a lot of ground, southeast corner of Third and Walnut Streets, the site of the present Asbury Church, was purchased of Caleb and Sarah Way for one hundred and five pounds, and subsequently, by purchase and gift from Edward Worell, additional area was secured.

On this location, in 1789, the society proceeded to erect a church. Its dimensions were thirty-five feet square with a gallery. This was opened and dedicated October 10, 1789, by Bishop Asbury. In 1811 the building was enlarged, and again in 1828, giving a structure of seventy by fifty feet. Wilmington was a part of Chester Circuit until 1789, when it was made a station and continued as such, excepting from 1800 to 1806, when it was again in Chester Circuit.

Rev. Wm. Jessup was pastor in 1789. A school-house was built adjacent to the church in 1791. In 1829 the society put up a two-story brick academy on Shipley, near High Street. The institution was continued for several years, and the building was then used as a parsonage until 1843. In 1830 Asbury Church had ninety-one contributing members, and John Thelwell's "ciphering book" was used as the congregational registry for many years.

The ninety-one members were divided into three classes as follows:

In 1883 the number of scholars was 552, and in 1887 it was 795. Edward Spencer was superintendent for many years. St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal Church of Wilmington was organized January 26, 1844, at the residence of Hyland B. Pennington, southeast corner of Fourth and Market Streets, by a number of members of Asbury M. E. Church. Rev. John Kenneday, pastor of Asbury Church, was chairman of the meeting and Mr. Pennington, secretary. The present site of St. Paul's Church was immediately purchased by Jno. McKnight and Samuel D. Newlin for $3000, including improvements, and the erection of the church began without delay. The material and work were furnished at reduced prices. Samuel McCaulley supplied the brick at $6 per m., and John Flink laid them at $2.25; John M. Turner did the carpenter work and contributed $700; M. Edwards was the painter and afterward prominent as a singer in the congregation. The purchasing committee were Miller Dunott, Samuel McCaulley, Henry Hicks, Thos. Young, Edward Moore, John Flink, John M. Turner, William H. Calvert and H. B. Pennington. The building committee were William H. Calvert, Samuel McCaulley, Edward Moore, Henry Hicks and Miller Dunott. The trustees of the society were H. B. Pennington, Henry Hicks, William H. Calvert, Miller Dunott, Samuel McCaulley, Jacob M. Garrettson and Edward Moore.

The new church was dedicated on Thursday afternoon, March 3, 1846, by Rev. Dr. Kenneday and Rev. Levi Scott. Dr. Kenneday, celebrated as a preacher, lecturer and poet, was the first pastor, and in two years the congregation numbered three hundred. On October 29, 1847, the church was somewhat damaged by an accidental fire. In 1872 the church was improved at a cost of $7000 and a $1500 pipe organ was purchased. Miss Fannie McGonigle was the first organist. The present membership of the church is four hundred. The board of trustees are Joseph Pyle, president; Author R. Lewis, James C. Pickles, Jabez Hodgson, Edgar Finlay, Benjamin Margatroyd, William Swigget, Samuel H. Baynard and Edward Morrow. The pastors of St. Paul's have been, 1845-46, John Kennedy; 1847-48, Jos. Castle; 1849-50, Pennool Coombe; 1851-52, F. Hodgson; 1853, C. D. Carver; 1854, Joseph Mason; 1855-56, G. R. Crooks; 1857-58, Charles Cooke; 1859-60, W. H. Barten; 1861-62, T. C. Murphy; 1863-65, W. J. Stevenson; 1866-68, Aaron Rittenhouse; 1869-70, J. F. Clymer; 1871-72, R. W. Todd; 1873-75, J. B. Merritt; 1876-77, W. P. Davis; 1878-80, J. H. Caldwell; 1881-82, M. A. Richards; 1883-94, R. H. Adams. Rev. Mr. Hill is the present pastor. The Sunday-School, organized contemporaneously with the church, has over six hundred scholars and seventy-two officers and teachers. Joseph Pyle has been superintendent for nearly a quarter of a century. In 1886 the two-story building used for the infant department of the Sunday-School was torn down and a large and commodious Sunday-School erected, at a cost of $6000.

The Union Methodist Episcopal Church,1 of Wilmington, north-west corner of Fifth and Washington Streets, was established originally in 1847, by Rev. Edward Kennard, as the Orange Street Society. Mr. Kennard was a supernumerary of the Philadelphia Conference. In 1847 he removed to Wilmington from Elkton, Maryland, and purchased the building corner Third and Orange Streets, previously used by a society of Methodist Protestants. Here he organized the Orange Street Methodist Episcopal Society with fifty-three members, and it was placed under the care of Rev. J. Castle, pastor of St. Paul's Church, with Rev. Mr. Kennard as supernumerary. In 1849 Rev. H. S. Atmore was assigned to the charge in conjunction with Mr. Kennard. In this year there were seventy-three members and a Sunday-school of one hundred. During the early part of Mr. Atmore's term a lot was secured on Second near Washington Street, on which to build a new church, and church building operations proceeded until the edifice was ready for the roof. The corner-stone was laid with Masonic ceremonies, and this caused a disaffection which resulted in the disbanding of the church and suspension of the work. In the fall of 1849 Miss Margaret Rumford, a member of Asbury Church, contributed sufficiently to roof the building, and the following year Rev. Andrew Manship was appointed to Union Mission, as the abandoned church was called. He found the former congregation scattered and a debt of twenty-six hundred dollars on the unfinished structure. He began services in Odd Fellows Hall, Third and King Streets, with Miss Margaret Rumford and one other lady as sole members of his congregation.

Soon, however, the mission grew and a new board of trustees, consisting of Asa Pointsett, George McGee, John Rudolph, Albert Thatcher, Grubb Talley, Thomas H. Baynard and Edward Moore, completed the building of the church, at a cost of seven thousand dollars, and it was dedicated by Bishop E. R. Ames, November 28, 1850. At the close of Mr. Manship's first year the church had one hundred and fifty-four members, one hundred and forty probationers, and a Sunday-school of two hundred scholars. In addition to the trustees named, the following were the original church officers: Class Leaders, Barney C. Harris, John Boyce, Isaac McConnell, William Edmundson and Albert Thatcher; Stewards, Asa Pointsett, John Rudolph, George McGee and John M. Guire; Exhorters, William Edmundson, Franklin Supplee and Cyrus Stern; Cyrus Stern was also the first Sunday-school superintendent and was assisted by Miss Margaret Rumford, who was the first female superintendent. In 1865 it was determined to build a larger church in a better location and the present Union Church is the result. The committee appointed to take the matter in charge consisted of Rev. J. D. Curtis, pastor; Cyrus Stern, Stephen Postles, Henry F. Pickels, Wm. Edmundson, Asa Pointsett and Wesley Talley. This committee purchased the lot and appointed three of their number, Stephen Postles, Cyrus Stern and Jethro McColough, as building committee. Of the latter Mrs. Postles contributed more than one-tenth of the entire cost. The lecture room was dedicated December 23, 1866, and the auditorium November 17, 1868, by Bishops E. R. Ames and Levi Scott. The cost of the edifice was thirty-six thousand dollars. Of the members who joined during Mr. Manship's first year, the following remain: Margaret Rumford, Barney C. Harris, Eliza Harris, Letitia Hammitt, Susan Sinex, Cyrus Stern, Caroline Sterra, Eliza Lewis, Lizzie Hallowell, Maria Edmundson, Hannah McDonald, Mary Robinson, Susan Ford, Catherine D. Kelley, Mary A. Flegler, Joanna Gordon, James Dawson, Mary Dawson. The church has now five hundred and fifty members, with seven hundred and fifty in the Sunday-school. The pastors have been—Orange Street, from 1847 to 1850: 1847, Edward Kennard, supernumerary; 1848, J. Castle (in connection with St. Paul); 1849, H. S. Atmore (Union), 1850-51, Andrew Manship; 1852-53, Joshua Humphries; 1854-55, John B. Maddux; 1856, J. T. Cooper; 1857-58, John Ruth; 1859-60, William Barnes; 1861-62, John Arthur; 1863-64, James A. Bridle; 1865-66, J. D. Curtis; 1867-68, W. E. England; 1869-70, S. L. Gracy; 1871, J. H. Lightbourne; 1872-73, Charles Hill; 1874-76, T. E. Martindale; 1877-79, J. B. Mann; 1880-82, Adam Stenge; 1883-86, C. W. Prettyman; 1886-87, Adam Stenge.

The Scott Methodist Episcopal Church was the outgrowth of a union Sunday-school established corner of Seventh and Walnut Streets, September 28, 1851, by members of the Asbury Methodist Episcopal and Hanover Street Presbyterian Churches, with J. T. Welden superintendent. The following year the school was removed to the public school building at Sixth and French Streets, pending the erection of a chapel corner Seventh and Spruce Streets, which was dedicated in December, 1852.

The Methodist denomination then came into possession of the school, and in 1854 a Methodist society, under the title of Seventh Street Church, was organized by Rev. Mr. Geary, and among the members were J. S. Welden, George Mortimer, William H. Riley, Thomas Orpwood, Gilbert Holmes, Stewart Carlisle, William Bicking, William H. Foulk, John Dick, William Heisler, William Griffenberg, John Lansdale, George Carpenter and Joseph Spurway. In 1855 the seating capacity of the church was doubled and its name was changed to Scott Methodist Episcopal Church. In 1866 the congregation was supplied jointly with Grace Church and was called Grace Chapel, but in 1867 resumed its old name and independent character. The church was again improved in 1868, and in 1872 a new audience room was built. The Sunday-school is conducted by Thomas O'Daniel. The pastors of the Church have been Rev. Charles Lewis, 1850; Henry King, supernumerary, one year; Rev. E. I. D. Pepper, two years; Rev. William Ridgway, 1859; Rev. H. A. Bodine, 1861; Rev. A. Cather, 1862-63; Rev. H. A. Cleveland; Rev. J. McComb at one time manifested an active interest in the Sunday-school work, and among the earlier members of the church were L. T. Grubb, Isaac McGaig and Isaac Ferman. In 1868, Revs. J. D. Curtis and R. G. Moody held a revival in the church, continuing over seven months.

The first house of worship was erected at a cost of six thousand dollars, northeast corner of Twenty-second and Market Streets. In 1884, through the energy of the pastor and the co-operation of Elin Mendenhall, one of the trustees and his friends, the church was enlarged at a cost of about four thousand dollars. The present brick structure is valued at seventeen thousand dollars, and will seat seven hundred. The membership is two hundred and fifty; two Sunday-schools have five hundred officers and scholars. Rev. E. L. Hubbard conducted revival services in a tent in 1884, during the remodeling of the church and one hundred and sixty persons were converted. The pastors of this charge have been Rev. Wm. Grace Methodist Episcopal Church, 1 of Wilmington, springs from St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal Church. On November 17, 1864, a meeting was held of twelve persons, who adopted a mutual pledge that "our most zealous efforts and constant labors in the work of constructing a new and handsome Methodist Church in this city; and that with the blessing of God, our labors shall not be relaxed until this great and good work shall have been accomplished." On March 28, 1865, the plans of the present Grace Church were adopted. Messrs. George W. Sparks, J. Taylor Gause and Job H. Jackson were appointed the building committee. The trustees were Hon. Daniel M. Bates, chancellor of the State of Delaware; Deleplaine McDaniel, C. F. Rudolph, Job H. Jackson, Jno. Merrick, George P. Norris, Jared Megaw, George W. Sparks, Edward Moore, J. Taylor Gause, Samuel M. Harrington, Esq., was secretary, and William H. Billany, treasurer of the Board.

On October 7, 1865, the corner-stone was laid. Bishop Simpson made the address on that occasion, and prominent clergymen of the Presbyterian and Methodist Churches of Wilmington participated. On March 25, 1866, services were held for the first time in the nearly finished chapel. Rev. William J. Stevenson, who had fostered the enterprise from the first, was made pastor. On June 10, 1866, the chapel was dedicated by Bishop Ames, and on June 17, 1887, the Sunday-school room was dedicated.

The church was completed and dedicated on Thursday, January 23, 1868, Bishop Simpson preaching, and Bishops Scott and Ames being also present. The building is of decorated gothic design, and was built of Connecticut River valley stone, serpentine from the battle-field of Chadd's Ford and drab stone from Nova Scotia. The interior is very handsomely finished.

The church building cost over two hundred thousand dollars, and the membership aggregates four hundred and fifty. Epworth and Madeley chapels have been erected under the auspices of Grace Church. Epworth, corner of Tenth and Church Streets, was first organized as a Sunday-school under the auspices of St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal Church.

The history of Madeley chapel begins with the Rev. Jacob Todd, who preached on an open lot in May, 1871. He subsequently preached in a tent, and then services were held in a temporary structure. The present chapel was finished and dedicated by Rev. Jacob Todd, assisted by Rev. William J. Stevenson, in the winter of 1872-73. The building and furniture, exclusive of lot, cost eight thousand dollars. The pastors have been: Rev. I. N. Forman, Rev. J. E. Mowbray, Rev. D. Dodd, Rev. T. H. O'Brien, Rev. B. F. Price, Rev. H. W. Ewing. The present membership is eighty.

Edward Davis, 1880-1; Presiding Elder, 1882; Rev. C. A. Hill, 1888; Rev. B. Gregg, 1884-5; Rev. D. H. Corcoran, 1886-7. In 1878 the church property was transferred to the trustees of Epworth Society.

Kingswood Methodist Episcopal Church, Thirteenth and Claymont Street, Wilmington, grew out of a Sunday-school, started in 1878, by Mrs. Rinker, in the kitchen of her residence. As the school increased George R. Greenman became superintendent, and St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal Church assisted in the work. A mission was established and a chapel costing one thousand eight hundred dollars was built in 1873. It continued as a mission until 1884, when Rev. William A. Wise was appointed pastor. Recently, Rev. W. L. White, a local preacher, has been officiating. The church has a membership of seventy-five, and the Sunday School has two hundred members. Jabez Hodson was superintendent for two years and George W. Todd for the past six years.

The open-air meetings continued until October, 1881, and the services were then suspended until May 27, 1888, when Mr. Foster re-organized it. The Sunday-school and services were resumed by various ministers. Subsequently, the dwelling of Robert West and a remodeled stable were used respectively. Asbury Church took charge of it as a mission and Charles Moore, a local preacher, was, in January, 1884, assigned to it. In 1885, a place of worship was built and dedicated May 3d by Rev. Messrs. Murray, Hubbard and Jones. Rev. W. L. Tompkinson is now pastor and Mr. Foster is superintendent of the Sunday-school.

The Swedish Mission at Eleventh and Headl Street, Wilmington, was started as a Sunday school, in Kingswood Chapel in 1882. Miss Huldah Nelson was the first teacher of the school, composed of ten children, of Swedes who had lately arrived in this country. A number of the members of Grace Church took an active interest in the mission, prominent among whom was Capt. Alexander Kelley. Rev. Carl O. Carlson, a native Swede, was sent from Philadelphia to take charge of the mission. He was ordained by Bishop Simpson and entered upon his duties in 1883. The present church was built in 1883. In 1885, Rev. A. Z. Fryxwell, of Gottenberg, Sweden, succeeded Mr. Carlson, and remained two and a half years. The present pastor, Rev. Konrad R. Hartwig, also came from Sweden. He took charge November 2, 1886. Mrs. Jenny Hartwig, wife of the pastor, is superintendent of the Sunday-school. Services are conducted in the Swedish language. In 1885 the old building was enlarged and remodeled at an expense of three thousand four hundred dollars, under the direction of a building committee consisting of Henry Conner, Jesse Rhinehart, James McKelvey, J. H. Moes, J. D. Cael and Franklin Wyre. On November 29, 1885, the Sunday-school room was reopened by Rev. B. F. Benson, A.M., of Westminster, Maryland, Rev. Dr. J. E. T. Ewell, of Baltimore, and Rev. J. W. Charlton, of Seafood, Delaware. The building was completed in 1886 at an additional expense of one thousand dollars, and reopened January 31, 1887, by Rev. W. S. Hammond, President of the Maryland Annual Conference and President of the General Conference. The first pastor was Rev. J. G. Sullivan, appointed in March, 1880, and served one year. Rev. F. C. Klein was appointed in March, 1881, and resigned in September, 1882, to take charge of a missionary station in Yokohama, Japan, as the first male foreign missionary of the Methodist Protestant Church. In September, 1882, Rev. W. T. Valiant was appointed pastor. Rev. G. F. Farris, the present pastor, was appointed in March, 1888. The church numbers seventy-five members. The Sunday-school, under the superintendency of G. H. Gilbert and James McKelvey, numbers over three hundred scholars.

BAPTIST CHURCHES.—First Baptist Church.—

The First Baptist Church of Wilmington, founded October 8, 1785, was the pioneer of that denomination in that city. Prior to this date occasional services were held, and among the Baptists in Wilmington were Mrs. Ann Bush, who came in 1748; Mrs. Elizabeth Way, in 1764; and John Stow and family, in 1769. Rev. Philip Hughes preached in 1782. In April, 1783, Thomas Ainger, a Philadelphia Presbyterian, settled in Wilmington, and, his wife being a Baptist, he took a great interest in that denomination, of which he subsequently became a member, and it was mainly through his efforts that the First Church was established. Referring to him Edwards, the historian, says: "What Baptists could not do a Presbyterian did for them." Soon after his arrival Rev. Messrs. Fleeson and Boggs, by invitation, held meetings at Mr. Ainger's house, and on May 25, 1784, Mr. Boggs administered the rite of baptism to Thomas Ainger, Rachel Ainger, Noah Cross and Mrs. Ferris. During the same year Rev. Mr. Hughes visited Wilmington to publish an original work on Baptism, and preached alternately in the First Presbyterian Church and the town's school-house. He baptized Robert Smith, John Redman, James McLaughlin and Henry Walker in Brandywine Creek. Nine of the original Baptists of Wilmington joined the Welsh Tract Church, in New Castle County and they, in conjunction with six others, organized the First Baptist Church. These were Thomas Ainger, James McLaughlin, Thomas Williams, Henry Walker, Joseph Tomlinson, John Redman, Robert Smith, John McKim, Curtis Gilbert, Sarah Stow, Elizabeth Hopkins, Mary Mattson, John Stow, Thos. Stow and Abigail Ainger, of whom Thomas Ainger, James McLaughlin, Henry Walker and Curtis Gilbert were subsequently ordained to the ministry. The organization of the First Baptist Church met with opposition from the other denominations, excepting the Presbyterians whose pastor encouraged the new congregation, placed his pulpit at the disposal of Rev. Mr. Hughes, the Baptist minister, and promulgated the doctrine of "love thy neighbor as thyself." The Baptists soon erected a brick church, thirty-five by forty feet, and joined the Philadelphia Association. The first regular pastor of the First Church was Rev. Thomas Fleeson, who laid the corner-stone of the edifice, accomplished its erection and remained in charge of it until 1788. He was succeeded by Thomas Ainger, who was elevated to the ministry April 25, 1786. He was ordained as pastor October 28, 1788, and continued his ministration until his death, in 1797. His successors were Revs. Joseph Boggs, Gideon Farrell, John Ellis and Joseph Flood. Rev. Flood was soon dismissed from the pulpit for preaching polygamy. He subsequently went to Norfolk, Va., and created considerable trouble. From 1802 to 1819 Rev. Daniel Dodge was pastor of the church, and during this interval baptized two hundred and fifty converts. He was succeeded by Rev. Samuel R. Green, 1819 to 1824; Rev. David Lewis, 1824 to 1826; Rev. John D. Strumper, 1826 to 1827; Rev. Jno. P. Peckworth, 1827 to 1828. During Mr. Peckworth's ministry the Sabbath-school was organized. His successors were Revs. John Miller, Alfred Earle, Joseph Smart, Wilson House, Wm. Matthews, Samuel Earle and Elder E. Rittenhouse. From 1846 to 1858 the First Church was irregular in its connection with the Philadelphia Association, which it again joined in 1862, and remained until 1867, when it discontinued the connection, and in 1870 reunited with it. It was now in the Delaware Baptist Association. A portion of its members assisted in organizing the Bethany Church.

The Second Baptist Church of Wilmington1 was organized September 7, 1835, by thirteen members from the First Baptist Church.—Gideon F. Tindall, Susanna Boulden, John Hazlet, Susan Darby, Moses Bannister, Ann Bannister, Robinson Beckley, Margaret Springer, Sally Ann Todd, Sarah A. Graham, Margaret Sterret, Mary E. Stroud and Jane E. Cochran. In 1836 it united with the Philadelphia Association. The congregation worshipped first in a rented room on Sixth Street, and in the old Presbyterian meeting-house, and was originally supplied for three months by Rev. Jonathan Collom.

SECOND BAPTIST CHURCH.

NEW CASTLE COUNTY.

Subsequently a church was built by them, corner of Walnut and Fifth Streets, now occupied by the German Baptist congregation. In 1840 the membership numbered eighty-one. On January 21, 1842, Rev. E. Andrews began a twelve weeks' meeting, during which one hundred and twenty-five converts were baptized, among them Mr. and Mrs. Reuben Wheaton, Thomas Milner, Eliza J. Cloward, Wm. Stevenson, Mary and Rebecca Slack, Mary Billings, Mrs. William Emmons, Charles P. Matlack, Mrs. Samuel Tindall, Mrs. J. Wollaston and Martha A. Jones. At this time Washington Jones, G. G. Lobdell and W. G. Jones were trustees, and Lydia P. Drew and Betsey P. Bonney were leading members. In 1843 thirty-four of the scholars in the Sunday-school were baptized. Elder Jacob Knapp assisted the pastor from December 1, 1843, to January 28, 1844, and one hundred and fifty-seven were baptized during the year, among them Joseph and Mrs. Gould, Edward and Mrs. Bodle, L. R. Findley and Mary Lowe. Anne Semple, Mrs. Sarah Coxe, J. M. Chalfant and Mrs. Chalfant united with the church by certificate. In March, 1844, John and Rebecca Bradford, Alexander Brattan and wife, James and Mary A. Richardson and Joseph and Mary Bonney were baptized; in 1847, Mrs. Washington Hayes and Mrs. Ann J. Eldridge; and in 1850, W. H. Gregg and Hannah E. Cloward. In 1844 the membership aggregated three hundred and sixty-nine, and three Sunday-schools connected with the church had three hundred and twelve scholars and thirty-seven officers and teachers. In 1852 a lot for a new church at the northeast corner Fourth and French Streets was purchased for two thousand six hundred dollars and a building committee was appointed, consisting of Rev. Frederick Charleton, pastor, Thomas Allen, J. M. Chalfant, Washington Jones, Jacob Rice and G. G. Lobdell. On May 3, 1855, the new church was dedicated at a total cost of $28,091.37. On May 29, 1865, fifteen members were, by request, disannounced to organize the Delaware Avenue Church and others subsequently followed them. An organ was added to the church, in 1867, at a cost of two thousand five hundred dollars, and the same year three thousand eight hundred and twenty-two dollars were expended in repairs. In 1870 the Baptist City Mission, the forerunner of the Bethany Church, was formed. The semi-centennial of the church was celebrated September 6 to 13, 1885, in the meeting-house corner of Fourth and French Streets. Revs. Wm. Cathcart, D.D., J. W. T. Boothe, D.D., H. L. Wayland, D.D., H. G. Weston, D.D., C. C. Bunting, D.D., L. Marks, D.D., C. W. Prettyman, W. L. S. Murray, C. L. Williams, R. W. Perkins, a former member of the church; R. M. Luther, Washington Jones, W. H. Gregg, Alfred Gawthrop and others took part. The historical sermon was preached by the pastor, Rev. B. B. Cook, D.D., and a semi-centennial hymn composed by Rev. Prof. M. Heath, a member of the church, was sung by the congregation. The Trinity choir, under Prof. Rhoads, assisted, and Mr. Kurtz was musical director and organist.

The several pastors of the church were: Rev. C. W. Dennison, September 9, 1836, to April 1, 1839; Rev. G. J. Carleton, September 16, 1839, to April 14, 1841; Rev. Sanford Leach, July 1, 1841, to June 17, 1842; Rev. Morgan Rhees, February 14, 1843, to July, 1850; Rev. J. G. Collom, August 1, 1850, to 1853; Rev. Frederick Charleton, July 28, 1853, to August, 1857; Rev. G. M. Condron, February 1, 1858, to October 1, 1859; Rev. J. S. Dickerson, December 10, 1860, to May 1, 1865; Rev. W. H. H. Marsh, September, 1865, to March, 1871; Rev. James Waters, March 24, 1872, to 1878; Rev. A. McArthur, 1873 to 1875; Rev. Richard B. Cook, D.D., December 1, 1875, and is the present incumbent. Dr. Cook has been prominent in his church at State and national meetings, as trustee and moderator of the Philadelphia Association, manager of the American Baptist Historical Society, secretary of the National Baptist Bible Convention, and in various other positions. He has also written and published "The Early and Later Delaware Baptists," and "The Story of the Baptists," a general Baptist history, which in three years has reached a circulation of twenty thousand copies.

The German Baptist Church of Wilmington was founded by Rev. Jeremiah Grimmel, who in 1855

1 Rev. Grimmel was born in Marburg, and left his native place because of religious persecutions. He came to America in 1831 and labored as a colporteur, founding a church in Williamsburg, N. Y. In devoted his leisure to fostering the religious interests of the German Baptists, whom he invited to meet at his house, where he conducted worship. At the first service there were thirteen persons present, and these comprised the original members of the German Baptist Church, which was organized in 1856. His house being too small to accommodate those attracted by his preaching, Rev. Grimnell was offered a room in the residence of John Swager, corner Fourth and Pine Streets, where services were continued for quite a period. Rev. Leonard Fleishman preached to the converts of Mr. Grimnell on several occasions and encouraged him in his religious labors. In March, 1856, nine of them were baptized in the Second Baptist Church. Through the efforts of Miss Annie Semple, who manifested a zeal for the work, the church corner of Fifth and Walnut Streets was purchased for three hundred dollars. Here the congregation was organized April 17, 1856, by Rev. Mr. Grimnell and his wife, Edward Austermühl, John Mühlenhauzen and Sophia, his wife, John Swager and Elizabeth, his wife, Peter Braunstein and Susan, his wife, Frederick Neutze, Mrs. Elizabeth Kaiser, Mrs. Theresa Herzel and Catherine Braunstein. A Sunday-school was also organized the same year. The church has had the following pastors: December, 1856, Rev. F. A. Bauer, one and a half years; Rev. J. C. Haselhuhn, three years; Rev. H. Trump, four years; Rev. P. Piepgrass, one year; Rev. J. Fellman, five years; Rev. J. M. Heedlin, 1875 to 1881; Rev. Henry W. Geil, 1882, is the present pastor. The church has a membership of over one hundred, and is in a prosperous condition.

The Delaware Avenue Baptist Church of Wilmington was organized June 22, 1865, by Miss Annie Semple, Alex. Brattan, Miss Mary Slack, Mrs. Mary A. Brattan, Mrs. Amanda Brattan, Mrs. Marian Moore, Mrs. Mary Smith, Thomas Hess, William H. Gregg, Mrs. Lucy V. Gregg, John Bradford, Mrs. Eliza J. Clowan and Charles Townsend, of the Second Baptist Church, at the residence of Miss Semple. The deacons elected were Wm. H. Gregg and John Bradford; clerk, Thomas C. Hess; trustees, Wm. H. Gregg, Thomas C. Hess and Alexander Brattan. The first services were held July 6, 1865. Rev. E. W. Dickinson, D.D., preached and Rev. Levi G. Beck delivered the charge. For awhile the Wilmington Institute and the Phenix engine-house were used as places of worship. On April 1, 1866, Rev. G. W. Folwell entered upon the first pastorate of the church, and on June 27, 1866, ground was broken for a church building, which was completed and dedicated October 13, 1870, the lecture-room being finished and dedicated January 2, 1868. Mr. Folwell remained as pastor until December 31, 1874, when the membership was two hundred and forty-six. On April 1, 1875, Rev. Isaac M. Haldeman began a pastorate which continued until August, 1884. During his term the New Hampshire Confession was abandoned and pre-millenarian doctrine was adopted; two mission-schools were established, and about one thousand one hundred persons were baptized. In October, 1882, the membership of the church was one thousand one hundred and forty-five, but in 1883 declined to seven hundred and eighty-three, and subsequently to its normal number of three hundred and twenty-five. Rev. George C. Needham, the revivalist, succeeded Mr. Haldeman, but only remained about three months, and was succeeded by J. W. T. Boothe, in July, 1885. After the latter took charge about sixty members withdrew to form Grace Church.

Under Dr. Boothe's charge the large debt of the church has been largely reduced.

The Shiloh Baptist Church, of Wilmington, corner Twelfth and Orange Streets, was the first congregation for colored people of that denomination established in the State. It was an outgrowth of the colored Sunday-school of the First Baptist Church, Hiram Yeger, superintendent, which met in a hall on Twelfth Street, between Market and Orange Streets. In this hall Shiloh Church was organized May 31, 1876, by Annie M. Anderson, Thomas Anderson, John W. Jackson, George E. Hall, William M. Winston, Jacob Galloway, Maggie Mitchell, Maggie V. Miner, Rachel Brodus, Lucinda Brodus, Jefferson Crayton, Peter Saunders, Julia Parsall, John W. Gordon, Jennie Henderson and Sarah Elia. Thomas W. Jackson was clerk. Subsequently, the basement of the church corner Twelfth and Orange Streets was used. Rev. Benjamin T. Moore was made pastor November 15, 1876, and has officiated ever since. The church building was begun in 1881, and the basement was dedicated in September, 1885. The church has a membership of one hundred and thirty; Sunday-school, one hundred. The trustees are John W. Jackson, Arthur Thomas, Archie P. Hendley, Benjamin Landon, Tobias Whiten, Hiram Tate and Jeremiah Miller.

The Bethany Baptist Church, of Wilmington, corner of Elm and Jackson Streets, was organized November 14, 1878, with eighty-eight members. It succeeded the Elm Street Baptist Church, which had grown out of a Sunday-school organized by William H. Gregg and others. The present membership of Bethany Church is about 225 and the Sunday-school number 300. John Runer and William H. Gregg are superintendents. A handsome brick church was erected in 1887. The pastors of Bethany Church have been Rev. Thomas M. Eastwood, Rev. E. J. McKeever, Rev. F. B. Greul, Rev. Harry Tratt and O. G. Budaington, present incumbent.

Grace Baptist Church, of Wilmington, was organized October 1, 1885, with the following officers: Deacons, James J. Walker, George W. Sutton, George W. Hardin, John Gately, Julius Reed, Wm. Cloud and John A. Bennett; Trustees, Maria V. Pyle, Parke Mason, James Morrow, Jacob Melvin, J. Travers Jones, Philip Jones, Benjamin R. Connor, and William Crawford; Church Clerk, J. Travers Jones. Treasurer, James J. Walker.

This congregation is an off-shoot of Delaware Avenue Baptist Church. The cause of separation from the mother-church is best described by an extract from Grace Church letter to the Baptist Council held in Wilmington, September 14, 1886: "A party of sixty members of the mother-church in this city met October 1st, last, and completed organization as a community of worshipers. Before undertaking the above, the brethren and sisters referred to made careful consideration of the matter, and at length came to the conclusion that a parting from the mother-church was unavoidable, and, as recorded of Abraham and Lot, separated themselves." The Philadelphia Confession of Faith was adopted by special enactment. The church was incororated March, 1886, and elected Rev. S. B. Hayward, of Milford, Del., as pastor. Mr. Hayward accepted the call October 1st.

The Sunday-school of Grace Baptist Church was instituted November 16, 1885, with John W. Gately, superintendent, and J. Travers Jones, secretary. The church was recognized as a regular Baptist Church September 14, 1886, by a council of Baptist churches which convened in the old Baptist Church, South and King Streets. Seven churches from Philadelphia and vicinity were represented, in addition to the local Baptists.

The present pastor is Rev. F. W. Overhiser, who commenced his term December 4, 1887. He is a graduate of Bucknell University, and also of Crozer Theological Seminary, Upland.

Roman Catholic Churches.—St. Peter's Pro-Cathedral, of Wilmington.—Prior to the latter half of the last century the number of Catholics in and around Wilmington, and, indeed, in the State of Delaware, was very limited. The Jesuits from Maryland and, perhaps, from Pennsylvania extended their visits into Delaware, until the secular priests entered the field, and either assisted them or relieved them altogether. Father Whalen was one of the first secular priests and lived at Coffee Run. He was succeeded in 1805 by Rev. Patrick Kenny, who found a little log chapel there, from which he ministered to the wants of the Catholics in Wilmington. He had as his assistant, for a time, Rev. George Aloysius Carrell, who afterwards became a Jesuit and finally died bishop of Covington, Ky. After the French Revolution, and the negro insurrection in St. Domingo, some distinguished French Catholic families settled in and around Wilmington. These French Catholics had priests of their own nationality with them, but whether for want of a sufficient knowledge of the language or for other reasons, they do not seem to have attended, to any great extent at least, to any but their own people. In 1816, Father Kenny built St. Peter's church, at the corner of Sixth and West Streets, Wilmington, and divided his labors between Coffee Run and that city. In 1830 the Sisters of Charity from Emmitsburg, Maryland, established an academy and orphan asylum, nearly opposite St. Peter's, which is still under their charge. In 1834, Father Kenny had assigned to him as his assistant Rev. Patrick Reilly, then a young priest just ordained. He was a man of zeal, energy and self-sacrifice, and on the death of Father Kenny, in 1842, he succeeded him as pastor of St. Peter's. During his pastorate of nearly twenty years he from time to time made such improvements as circumstances permitted. In 1839, at great personal sacrifice, Father Reilly built and opened a school which afterwards developed into St. Mary's College. He was not unmindful of the wants of the poorer children of his parish, and a parochial school was built adjoining St. Peter's Church. In 1858, finding the labors of the parish and the college too great a tax upon his strength, he withdrew from St. Peter's and devoted himself exclusively to the college. In 1856, when the growing wants of the Catholics of Wilmington seemed to demand another church, Bishop Neumann, recognizing the invaluable services of Father Reilly as a parish priest, directed him to build the new St. Mary's Church. St. Peter's passed under the charge of the Rev. Patrick A. Prendergast, who labored here for four or five years, and was succeeded by Rev. P. B. O'Brien. In 1866 the Rt. Rev. Bishop Wood appointed the Rev. M. A. McGrane (late vicar general of the diocese of Wilmington) pastor of St. Peter's, and the Rev. P. P. McGrane, his brother, as his assistant. Under their care old St. Peter's was enlarged, and improved inside and out; so that in August, 1888, when the Rt. Rev.
Thomas A. Becker, D.D., the first bishop of Wilmington, entered its portals, he found his Cathedral already erected and a beautiful Pre-Cathedral ready to receive its first bishop. The second ordination in St. Peter's was held on July 31, 1870, when the Rev. John N. Lyons, the first priest ordained in Wilmington for the diocese of Wilmington, received the Holy Order of Priesthood. Rev. M. X. Fallon, ordained for the diocese of Wilmington, had been raised to the priesthood some time before at Mount St. Mary's, Emmittsburg. Father Lyons was assigned to duty in St. Peter's as assistant to Bishop Becker, a position he held for nine years, when he was succeeded by the Rev. Benjamin Keiley, who acted in the same capacity for seven years. Bishop Becker gave a new impetus to religion around old St. Peter's. He transferred the boys' Parochial School from the charge of lay teachers to that of the Sisters of St. Francis. He established temperance societies for the men and beneficial societies for the women. He enlarged and beautified the sanctuary and exchanged the old wooden altars for three marble ones. For the orphans, he had erected an imposing structure to replace the old rockery that had so long been an eyesore, and had served in times galore as a tavern and beer garden. The number of Catholics increased so much in the eighteen years of Bishop Becker's administration that it was found necessary to build the churches of S. James, S. Paul's, Sacred Heart for the Germans, and S. Patrick's. On the occasion of the elevation of Bishop Gross to the Archiepiscopal See of Oregon, Bishop Becker was transferred to the vacant See of Savannah, where he was soon followed by Father Keiley, who became his vicar general. Right Rev. Alfred Ambrose Curtis, for twelve years secretary in the Cathedral of Baltimore, to Archbishop Bayley and Cardinal Gibbons, was chosen as the successor of Bishop Becker in the diocese of Wilmington. He was consecrated on November 14, 1886, in the Cathedral of Baltimore, by Cardinal Gibbons, and was installed in St. Peter's Pro-Cathedral on the following Sunday, by Cardinal Gibbons, assisted by Archbishop Ryan, of Philadelphia, and Bishop Becker and Bishop Moore, of Florida. Cardinal Gibbons preached the sermon, at the conclusion of which he delivered a most glowing eulogium on the great learning, piety and zeal, combined with extraordinary humility and meekness, of his former secretary, whom none knew but to love and to love all the more the better he was known.

Alfred A. Curtis was born in Somerset County, Maryland, and is about fifty-three years of age. He began his studies for the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal Church in 1854, supporting himself during his course by teaching. He was ordained in 1859 by Bishop Whittingham. After doing duty in different stations of the Eastern Shore of Maryland, he was placed in charge of Mt. Calvary Church, Baltimore, where he remained as rector until the end of 1870, when he resigned. He went to England in 1871 and in April of that year was received into the Catholic Church by Cardinal Newman. He returned to Baltimore and entered the Seminary of St. Salpice in September, 1871, and there remained until ordained by Archbishop Bayley in 1874, and by him taken to the Cathedral as his assistant and secretary, which position he held as stated up to the time of his election to the episcopal dignity. Bishop Curtis was always very popular as an Episcopalian minister and a Catholic priest, and all his people parted from him with the deepest regrets. Cardinal Gibbons declared that he himself and his Cathedral congregation could only become reconciled to his loss by the knowledge that Bishop Curtis would have a larger field in which to display his extraordinary learning and virtue. Bishop Curtis has already endeared himself to the people of his diocese, both Protestants and Catholics, and by his untiring zeal and suavity of manners has compensated in great measure for the loss of the indefatigable and learned Dr. Becker. Bishop Curtis appointed the Rev. John N. Lyons to the rectoryship of St. Peter's Pro-Cathedral, made vacant by the transfer of Very Rev. B. J. Keiley to the diocese of Savannah, and later on, after the death of the venerable Father Magrane, selected him to be his vicar-general. The Rev. Francis J. Connelly, lately ordained, was made secretary to the bishop and assistant to the very reverend rector of the Cathedral.

St. Mary's of the Immaculate Conception Catholic Church, of Wilmington, was established as the result of a meeting of Catholics in the study hall of St. Mary's College January 17, 1858. The site, corner Sixth and Pine Streets, had then been purchased ten years. Rev. Patrick Reilly presided and nominated three persons from each ward to receive subscriptions for the proposed church building. They were George Winterhalter, Philip Plunkett, Joseph Eising, William J. J. Purcell, Michael Harrity, Henry Bleyer, William McNemamin, Christian Messick, John F. Miller, Charles Smith, Charles O'Donnell, Patrick McGowan, Hugh Sweeney, Thomas Curley and John Fox. This committee realized eleven thousand dollars and a building committee was appointed, consisting of Rev. P. Reilly, pastor, Rev. Emilius Stenzel, assistant pastor, George Winterhalter and Philip Plunkett. The corner-stone was laid May 2, 1858, by Rev. P. Reilly, assisted by all the clergy of the State, and the church was consecrated October 31st of that year. The trustees were Joseph Eising, Michael Harrity, Christian Messick and William McNemamin. All the German-speaking Catholics of the city were assigned to St. Mary's Church, under the direction of Father Stenzel. In May, 1864, the pastor purchased of Michael Harrity for one thousand seven hundred and sixty dollars a lot, eighty-six by eighty feet, adjoining the church, on which, two years later, he built a school-house and placed it in charge of the Sisters of St. Joseph, of Philadelphia. He also built a residence for the Sisters, making a total outlay of fifteen thousand five hundred dollars. The school was opened in 1867. A year later, on the division of the diocese, the Sisters being withdrawn, their places were supplied with lay-teachers. The school was soon discontinued and the building rented to the Board of Public Education. In 1886 the first mission was given in St. Mary’s Church by the Redemptorist fathers, and there have been three since. In 1871 the central tower was built and other improvements made at a cost of eighteen thousand dollars. The pastoral residence was built in 1881. The pastor’s health failing, Rev. Dennis J. Flynn was appointed his assistant. On August 24, 1884, Father Reilly celebrated his golden jubilee, over forty-nine of his fifty years of priesthood having been spent in Wilmington, and was presented with an address of congratulation. The event was also the occasion of a parade of all the Catholic societies and other imposing ceremonies. Father Reilly died July 30, 1885, in the seventy-eighth year of his age. Rev. Father Flynn had charge of the work of the church during the pastor’s illness and made many needed improvements to the church, including a new marble altar. At the Month’s Mind Father Flynn was sent to Galena, Md., and Father Fallon, of St. Patrick’s, to St. Mary’s. The latter made many additional improvements to the church and also organized the Reilly Lyceum for young men. When Bishop Becker was transferred to Georgia, Bishop Curtis, his successor, transferred Rev. George J. Kelly from St. Joseph’s, Brandywine, to St. Mary’s, and Father Flynn returned as assistant. Four Sisters belonging to the Third Order of St. Francis, a religious community of women, whose mother house is in Philadelphia, re-opened the parochial school on the first Monday of September, 1887.

The Sacred Heart Catholic Church was established by Rev. Wendeline M. Mayer, O.S.B. As early as 1857 Father Stenzel, recently from Germany, was sent to Wilmington by the bishop of Philadelphia to take charge of the German Catholics. Rev. Father Reilly volunteered the use of St. Mary’s College Chapel until a church could be built. After a year’s service Father Stenzel left Wilmington, and the German Catholics had no services in their language for a considerable period. In 1874 Rev. Wendeline M. Mayer was invited by Bishop Becker to collect the scattered German Catholics and give them a mission at St. Mary’s Church, which was successfully accomplished. In August, 1874, a lot two hundred and thirty-six by three hundred feet on Tenth Street, between Madison and Monroe Streets, was bought of Rev. Patrick Reilly for sixteen thousand five hundred dollars, less two thousand five hundred dollars which he donated. After collecting about twelve thousand dollars Father Mayer made arrangements to build a church and parochial residence. The cornerstone was laid by Bishop Becker, on Sunday, August 16, 1874. On August 27, 1881, Father Mayer died at Cape May, where he had gone for his health.1 He was succeeded by Rev. P. Corbinian Gustbihi, the present pastor, September 10, 1881. At that time the parish comprised forty families. The basement was used from August 16, 1875, to September 2, 1888, when the building was dedicated by Bishop Becker. It is of Roman architecture, sixty-five by one hundred and forty feet, and has twenty-eight stained windows, costing two thousand two hundred dollars. The high marble altar, costing fifteen hundred dollars, was presented by Joseph Eising and Herman and Herbert Lange, his nephews. The late F. A. Drezel, of Philadelphia, gave one side-altar and John and Eva Fuchs, of Wilmington, the other. The Brandywine granite stone steps leading to the church door cost two thousand three hundred dollars; chandelier, five hundred dollars; three bells, one thousand three hundred dollars. The latter weigh 2700, 1200 and 750 pounds respectively. There are now about one hundred families in the congregation. A parochial school, now in charge of the Benedictine Sisters, was opened in the basement of the parish-house soon after its completion, and is now located in the basement of the church. In October, 1888, the pastor opened a high school for boys, and Rev. Dominic Block was instructor. It has been discontinued.

St. Paul’s Catholic Church, corner of Fourth and Jackson Streets, Wilmington, is one of the most prominent churches in the diocese of Wilmington. The corner-stone was laid by Right Rev. Dr. Becker, June 6, 1869. The church was dedicated and opened for service on Sunday, December 20, 1869, by Bishop Becker, assisted by Rev. Joseph Plunkett, of Portsmouth, Va., and all the clergy of the diocese. The bishop delivered the dedicatory sermon.

At the Solemn Pontifical Vespers in the evening the bishop appointed Rev. M. X. Fallon first pastor of the new parish, which was bounded by Jefferson Street and Delaware Avenue, making an angle including Stanton and Newport, six miles south. There were then between fifty and sixty families in this area. In five years there were four hundred families, but all in very moderate circumstances. The ground was purchased for twelve thousand dollars from the late Aaron Conrad, father of Henry C. Conrad, Esq. Third Street was then opened only to Madison Street, and Van Buren from Front to Second Streets. The church was built by McCloskey Bros., and cost twenty-three thousand dollars before dedication. In 1873 the spire was erected at a cost of three thousand five hundred dollars. The bell was then put in. It weighs between three thousand and four thousand pounds, and cost one thousand four hundred and sixty dollars.

In 1875 Costaggini, the famous Roman artist, and now Brunmedi’s successor, did the frescoing, at a cost of three thousand one hundred dollars. The pillars and columns were done in Kilkenny Irish marble. The organ cost three thousand dollars. Miss Magar

1 Father Mayer was born in Neuhausen, Württemberg, November 3, 1829; was ordained priest of the Order St. Benedict, May 28, 1857. He wrote a prayer-book in English and German, which was approved by the bishops of the church.
ritry, of Broom and Cedar Streets, was the first organist.

The Germans have now a church at Tenth and Madison Streets, so that St. Paul's Parish is practically bounded on the north by Fourth Street, while St. Peter's Parish includes the east side of Madison St.

St. James' Catholic Church, on the corner of Lovering Avenue and Du Pont Street, is a neat frame structure, 30 by 65 feet. It was built in 1869. The first resident pastor was Rev. John P. Hogan, who was installed in December, 1870. The present pastor is Rev. William Doolard. Attached to this church is a protecyory for orphan boys, conducted by the Francis-can Sisters, who are doing a most excellent work. A new church is now in course of erection. It is to be large and of Brandywine granite. The basement was dedicated in December, 1887, by Bishops Becker and Curtis.

St. Patrick's Catholic Church, a neat brick struc-ture, forty-five by one hundred feet, is situated at the southeast corner of Fifteenth and King Streets. The corner-stone was laid by the Right Rev. Dr. Becker, bishop of Wilmington, on Sunday, July 3, 1881. The congregation, at first numbering only about forty souls, under the charge of Rev. M. X. Fallon, worshiped in a rough shed for some time. On Christmas morning following, divine service was, for the first time, held in the basement. After a few months the church proper was completed, and service was held in the main room above. The basement was thereafter used as a school and Sunday-school room. The church contains the handsomest marble altar in the diocese. Its organ is also one of remarkable sweetness and ranks with the best in the city. It has a large bell, of nearly two tons in weight.

The congregation soon increased under Father Fallon, who was the founder of the church and parish. The church is now too small to accommodate its members. The first pastor remained in charge for four years, and on September 20, 1886, was succeeded by the Rev. George S. Bradford, who is the resident pastor. The present boundaries of the parish are: On the north by Pennsylvania, east by the Delaware River, south by Tenth Street and Delaware Avenue to Van Buren Street, and west by Van Buren Street to Pennsylvania.

Lutheran Churches. — The Lutheran Church, of Wilmington, was organized in 1848 by Rev. F. Walz, and the congregation originally used the old Central Hall, N. W. corner of Fourth and King Sts. Among the first members were Gust. Weil, Jac. Karch, Joh. Schwager, Jac. Butz, G. Hille, John F. Busch, G. Gouert, H. D. Fr. Klund, Joh. Fullmer, J. Greiner, H. Grebe and John Otto. Only two of these—John F. Busch and John Fullmer—are still in connection with the church.

In 1867, under the pastorate of Rev. Thomas Steck, the congregation erected a church building on Walnut Street, above Sixth. There they worshipped for nearly ten years, meanwhile growing larger by immigration from Germany, while a good many of the original members had joined other denominations. The congregation intending to open a school for its children, and the building not having the necessary room for that purpose, it was decided to sell the church and buy the public school-house, corner of Sixth and French Streets.

In the basement of this building the school was established; the first story being converted into a place of worship, while the upper story was rented by the city for school purposes. In the new quarters the congregation prospered, and after a few years remodeled the interior for church and Sabbath-school purposes exclusively.

The congregation, during the forty years of its existence, has had eight pastors, viz.: Revs. F. Walz, C. Jaeger, Thomas Steck, W. Hasskarl, J. Kucher, H. Weickel, H. B. Kuhn and the present pastor, P. Isenschmid, who has served the congregation since 1871.

There are about two hundred communicant members. The Sunday-school, under the care of its superintendent, Mr. Fr. Weil, has over two hundred members. J. P. Theodore Fueckel is choir director and organist.

Swedenborgian Church. — The First Society of the New Jerusalem or Swedenborgian Church in Wil-mington was organized in the beginning of 1857. Daniel La Motte was president; Hon. E. W. Gilpin, treasurer; Daniel La Motte, Jr., secretary; and there were about twenty members. A room was rented, and services were held by Rev. D. K. Whittaker and Rev. E. A. Beaman. On August 6, 1857, the corner-stone of the present church at Delaware Avenue and Washington Street was laid, and on April 29, 1858, the building was dedicated. Rev. Abiel Silver was called as pastor, and remained until March 16, 1860. The pulpit was temporarily supplied until September 1, 1860, when Rev. J. T. Eaton came for one year. In September, 1861, Rev. R. N. Foster became pastor, and remained until July, 1863, when he left the ministry. The church was closed until the following spring, although the Sunday-school was continued, and in May, 1864, the Rev. Abiel Silver returned and remained until May, 1866, when he was succeeded by Rev. Willard H. Hinkley, of Baltimore, grandson of Rev. John Hargrove, the first ordained clergyman of the New Church in the United States. Mr. Hinkley remained until May, 1873. The church was without a settled pastor again for some months, although the services were regularly held by Rev. B. F. Barrett and Rev. E. P. Walton till January, 1874, when Rev. S. S. Seward became pastor, remaining until November, 1875. The pulpit was again temporarily supplied till February, 1879, when Rev. J. B. Parmelec, the present pastor, accepted the call. The present officers are W. H. Swift, president; W. A. La Motte, secretary; F. L. Gilpin, treasurer. The Sunday-school numbers about fifty members. James H. Cameron is superintendent. The church is free of debt.
NEW CASTLE COUNTY.

The Unitarian Church of Wilmington, the only one of that denomination in the State, was organized February 6, 1866. A number of persons assembled at a private house, and after discussing the subject of organizing a society, made declaration that,—"The undersigned propose to associate themselves for the purpose of forming and sustaining a church and society of the Unitarian faith." The signers were Rev. F. A. Farley, D.D., Edmund Q. Sewall, Charles P. Bent, N. M. Goookin, Cyrus Pyle, Thomas Y. de Normandie and his wives, and Mrs. J. P. Wales. The next meeting was attended by thirty persons who also adopted a declaration and determined "to form a society in the Spirit and love of Christ, that shall be known under the name of the First Unitarian Society of Wilmington." Signing this, constituted membership. Rev. James Y. de Normandie preached the first sermon to the society in April, 1866, and was followed by Rev. Dr. F. A. Farley, of Brooklyn, N.Y. Rev. Fielder Israel was the pastor from September 9, 1866, to 1876, when he resigned. Under his ministry, this congregation erected the house of worship now owned by them, on West Street above Eighth. The corner-stone was laid October 18, 1867, and the building was dedicated March 9, 1868. For a year the church was without a regular pastor, until Rev. J. M. W. Pratt was ordained to the ministry in the church January 28, 1878. The ordination sermon was preached by Rev. H. W. Bellows, D.D., of New York. Mr. Pratt remained until 1880. Rev. H. R. Wilson, M.D., was called to fill the vacancy in June, 1881, and is the present pastor. This church has no creed. Individual members are left entirely to the exercise of their private judgment on all theological questions. Its standard of membership is what a person is, rather than what he believes. The board of trustees are Lea Pusey, Thomas McClary, George G. Barker, George W. Stone, Heywood Conant, John Wainwright, Dr. W. W. Thomas.

The Household of Faith, a religious denomination rejecting the theories of eternal punishment and infant baptism, was founded in Wilmington June 24, 1877, by Rev. George R. Kramer, formerly pastor of Asbury M. E. Church, and the majority of the seventy original members had also been identified with that charge.

The Household first worshipped in a tent at Fourth and Lombard Streets, and afterwards in the McClary building on Market Street, where the membership increased to about three hundred. In 1880 a church was built on Tatnall Street, at a cost of thirteen thousand dollars, and dedicated December 3, 1881. In 1882 Rev. Mr. Kramer resigned and was succeeded by Rev. O. W. Wright. Subsequently the pulpit became vacant, and, with a large debt on the church, the congregation declined.

In 1887 the property was surrendered for sale, and services were discontinued.

Colored Churches.—Exion Methodist Episcopal Church—The colored people of Wilmington, in early days, worshipped with the whites, most of them at Asbury Church. Richard Allen, afterwards raised to the office of bishop, on September 13, 1788, was the first colored man known to have preached in Wilmington.

In 1789, of the forty-nine members of Asbury, nineteen were of this race. When the colored membership had increased to fifty they began to hold religious services in their own houses and in the shady groves on the suburbs of the town. This they began as early as 1800. In the year 1805 they withdrew from Asbury, and, by the assistance of some members of that society and others, built a stone meeting-house at the corner of Ninth and French Streets, the site of Exion Church.

A society was formed entirely of colored members—the first in the State—and was placed in charge of a white minister, sent by the Philadelphia Methodist Episcopal Conference. For a time it prospered. In 1812 most of the members desired an independent organization. Litigation for church property ensued, pending which a large portion of the membership withdrew, under the leadership of Peter Spencer, a colored local preacher, and formed the "Union Church of Africans." They built a house of worship nearly opposite the "stone church," as it was called. It remained under the control of the Methodist Conference until the Delaware Colored Conference was established.

In 1838 another division occurred, but the old members continued their work, and in 1844 enlarged the church. Rev. Whittington, who had long been the pastor, had grown old. Rev. John G. Manluff, one of the most intelligent colored men of his day, succeeded him. He was one of the founders of the Delaware Conference of Colored Methodists. Rev. W. S. Elsey was the next pastor, and was also a presiding elder. He traveled through the Eastern Shore of Maryland and part of Virginia. Rev. Harrison Smith was next appointed. During his pastorate the word "colored" was stricken from the Book of Discipline.

Exion Church was rebuilt in 1870. The pastors since then, sent by authority of the bishop, have been Revs. Jehu H. Price, Peter Burrow, J. D. Elbert, Solomon Cooper, L. Y. Cox, W. F. Butler, D.D., W. J. Parker, Henry Augustus Monroe, who in 1887 was appointed to St. Mark's Church, New York. The present pastor is Rev. — Walters. Mr. A. Murray has filled the position of superintendent of the Sunday-school for several years. It has thirty-five teachers and officers, and six hundred pupils. Church membership, six hundred and fifty; valuation of church property and parsonage, thirty-eight thousand four hundred dollars. The church was nearly destroyed by fire January 6, 1886, and rebuilt the same year.

African Union Church.—Peter Spencer was one of the colored Methodists who left Asbury Church in 1805, and assisted in forming Ezion Church. In 1818, he and William Anderson founded the "Union Church of African Members," being the first church in the United States organized and entirely controlled by colored people. Peter Spencer and his associates gave the following reasons for their secession:

"In the year 1806 the colored members of the Methodist Church in Wilmington thought that we might have more satisfaction of mind than we then had, if we were to unite together and build a house for ourselves; which we did the same year. The Lord gave us the favor and good-will of all religious denominations, and they all freely did lend us help, and by their good graces we got a house to worship the Lord in. Then we thought we could have the rule of our Church, so as to make our own rules and laws for ourselves; only we knew that we must help to support the preachers that were stationed in Wilmington to preach at both Churches, which we were willing to do. We then thought we had the power to refuse any that were not thought proper persons to preach for us; but the preacher that was stationed in Wilmington to preach, told us plainly that we had no say, and that he must be entire judge of all. Then that body of us who built the meeting-house could not see our way clear to give up all say, and for that reason our minister said we had broke the Discipline and turned out all the Trustees and class-leaders, and never allowed us a hearing. This was done December, 1812. For the sake of peace and love, and nothing but that, we soberly came away."

The trustees named in the articles of association, signed by the heads of thirty-one families and legally recorded, September 18, 1813, were Peter Spencer, Scotland Hill, David Smith, Jacob March, Benjamin Webb, John Simmons and John Kelly. Some of the original members were William Anderson, Deborah Anderson, Simon Weak, Ellen Weeks, David Bias, John Benton, Edmund Hays, Henry Butcher, Amelia Butcher, Susan Hicks, Moses Chippey, Richard Jackson, Peter Clayton, Samuel Bayard, Charles Read, John Kelley, Perry Cooper, Sarah Hall and Grace Powell. The African Union Church building was erected on a site nearly opposite Ezion in 1813, rebuilt in 1827, and enlarged in 1842. William Anderson, who was one of the leaders and also a local preacher, died in March, 1843. Peter Spencer, who ministered to the colored people of this church from 1813, died July 24, 1843. He was a very worthy man and was also a mechanic. He was born in Kent County. The Delaware Gazette, in noticing his death, said: "His character for veracity and honesty was without reproach. He possessed unusual good sense, was quite intelligent, dignified in his manner, and exercised wonderful influence with his people."

Daniel Bailey, who served under Peter Spencer as a deacon, was chosen to succeed him and continued in charge several years. The African Union Church, as it was generally called, or the "Union Church of African Members," in 1851, had thirty-one societies and houses of worship in the United States. A conference already organized elected Peter Spencer an elder or bishop of the States of New Jersey, Delaware and Pennsylvania, and Isaac Barney to the same position for New York and New England. Upon the death of Peter Spencer, the surviving elder, Isaac Barney, ordained Ellia Saunders, of Christians, Delaware, as an associate with him in the control of all the churches of the denomination. The majority of the members in Wilmington refused to allow Ellia Saunders to preach or administer the ordinances. A few favored him, among whom were some of the trustees. At the next annual election none of the former board of trustees were chosen, and those who advocated the cause of the newly-ordained elder were expelled from membership.

Ellia Saunders obtained a mandamus to compel his restoration. The case was argued in the Superior Court, and on the opinions of Judges Wootten and Houston the writ was refused, Chief Justice Harrington dissenting. The case was carried to the Court of Errors and Appeals, Chief Justice Johns rendering a decision that where there is no legal right there was no legal remedy, and that the question in dispute was for an ecclesiastical body to settle.

This difficulty culminated ultimately in the withdrawal of all excepting the Wilmington churches from the parent organization of that denomination. The thirty churches which withdrew under the leadership of Elder Isaac Barney organized the Union American Methodist Episcopal Church. Two subsequently returned,—the churches at Cedar Grove and at Marlboro', N. J.

The African Union Methodist Protestant Church, after the separation in 1851, was an independent church body until 1860, when it united with a church in Baltimore, and formed the "African Union First Colored Methodist Protestant Church of U. S. A." In the mean time Daniel Bailey and Isaac Parker were pastors. The pastors since 1860, under the itinerancy system, have been Rev. Benjamin Scott, J. W. Leecons, E. H. Chippey, Isaac Johnson, E. H. Chippey, Henry Davis, Gaylord Peterson, John W. Hall and E. H. Chippey, who, in 1886, was called as pastor the third time.

The church building was remodeled in 1877, and stands on the site of the original African Union Church, built in 1813. The church membership is two hundred and fifty. The Sunday-school, with Spencer Antrim as superintendent, has one hundred and fifty members. Four missions have lately been established by this church in different parts of Wilmington. The trustees are William Page, Peter S. Chippey, Nero Backus, Perry Trusty, Jonathan Chippey and William Lewis. The "Big Quarterly" is held at this church once a year. As early as 1846 one thousand colored persons from Philadelphia came to attend it. Formerly there were four Quarterly Meetings held at different towns. This one attracted the largest attendance; hence its name. The others were discontinued years ago.

The African Wesleyan Church was on Second Street, between Tatnall and West. The society was organized in 1843, with Matthew Leary as pastor. He was succeeded by Rev. Jones. In 1847 the old building in which the society worshipped was removed and another built. The congregation has since disbanded.

Bethel African Methodist Episcopal Church on Walnut Street near Sixth Street, was founded in 1846. Among its first members were Bennett Hill and Charles Caldwell, who still belong to it. The first house of worship owned by the society was a frame building at Twelfth and Elizabeth Streets, which was built in 1846, and dedicated the following year by Rev. Stephen Smith, of Philadelphia, who contributed liberally toward its cost. For five years the society worshipped in it, and then erected a brick church, seventeen by thirty-four feet, on Penn Street near Seventh Street, using it until 1865. Meantime, the membership was increased to nearly two hundred. In 1865 the German Lutheran Church building, on the site of the present Bethel Church, was bought for four thousand dollars. In 1878 the present edifice was built at a cost of seventeen thousand dollars. The leading members of the building committee were D. P. Hamilton, John Green and James H. Jones. It was dedicated in 1881. The pastor at that time was Rev. C. C. Felts. The pastors who succeeded him were Revs. D. P. Sexton, Robert Wayman, Joseph H. Smith, T. G. Stewart, Leonard Paterson, John F. Thomas, T. G. Stewart, John W. Becket and George W. Brodie. The pipe-organ cost eleven hundred dollars. The membership in 1887 is three hundred and thirty. The Sunday-school has three hundred and sixty names on its roll. M. F. Sterling is superintendent.

Union American Methodist Episcopal Church.—Soon after the controversy of 1851 a portion of the members of the African Union Church, in Wilmington, formed themselves into a new society and held worship for three years at the house of John M. Benton. Rev. Edward Williams, now holding the office of bishop, was chosen pastor. They bought a lot of ground at 1206 French Street and on it erected a board tent, which was used for a time and in 1896 a meeting-house was built on the same site. This building was removed and in 1892 the present one was erected at a cost of eight thousand dollars. The pastors who have served this society are Revs. Edward Williams, Asbury Smith, B. T. Ruley, William Billingsly. Rev. B. T. Ruley was called to the pastorate a second time in 1896. The church membership is one hundred and eighty-two. The Sunday-school, organized in 1896, has one hundred and fifty scholars. The superintendents at different times have been Peter D. Hubert, J. C. Gibbs and J. F. Bostick.

St. Peter's Church, corner of Second and Union Streets, is now a station of the African Union Methodist Protestant Church. A number of the members of the church of this denomination on French Street lived in the western part of the city. Rev. E. H. Chippey, pastor, had a platform erected in the colored cemetery on Union Street and there held the first services, which resulted in founding a mission. In 1870 a lot was purchased from Mr. — Reynolds for one thousand three hundred dollars and a church building of brick was erected costing one thousand dollars. Rev. Nicholas Collins was the first pastor appointed by Conference and was succeeded by Revs. Isaac E. Cooper, George W. Biggs, John H. Nichols, Daniel Russell and George W. C. Laws. The membership is forty; Sunday-school, fifty; Joseph Price, superintendent.

Whittington Chapel, in South Wilmington, now an independent colored congregation of the M. E. Church, was for thirteen years a mission of Ezion Church. On the 10th of June, 1870, Rev. Solomon T. Bantoum began mission work in that section of the city, holding services in the dwelling-house of Francis Bird, on Buttonwood Street. A Sunday-school was organized and William B. Blake chosen superintendent.

In 1873 a chapel was built and named after the late Rev. Whittington, pastor of Ezion. The lot and building cost $594 and Revs. Hooper and Jarley officiated at the dedication in October, 1873. This chapel burned down in 1874, and for two years services of the society were held in dwelling-houses. In 1876 the first chapel was built at a cost of $700. The church membership is 80 and 150 scholars attend the Sunday-school.

The ministers of this congregation were Revs. Solomon T. Bantoum, Solomon Cooper, William H. Harlan, Isaac H. White, Thomas Hubbard, Harrison Webb, John J. Campbell, William F. Butler, J. J. Wallace and Charles H. Hudson.

St. James' Colored Church, in East Wilmington, is the second congregation originated and fostered by the A. U. M. P. Church, on French Street. It was organized as a mission in 1873 by Rev. E. H. Chippey at the house of Stephen Welsh. For several years it was conducted as a mission. The pastors were Revs. E. H. Chippey, Benjamin Scott, Robert Smith, Moses Chippey and Daniel Russell, until 1884, when it was made a station with Rev. Charles Walker as pastor. He was succeeded by Rev. Thomas T. Scott. When the mission was founded a day-school and Sunday-school was started, which has since merged into a public school for colored children. The church membership in 1887 was eighty and the Sunday-school, superintended by Henry Farrow, had one hundred scholars. The first frame school was built in 1874, costing $600. It has since been rebuilt at a cost of $1600. The lot cost $250.

St Paul's Church, in South Wilmington, is the third congregation established by the A. U. M. P.
Church on French Street. Mission work was begun in 1874 by Rev. E. H. Chippey. Religious worship was held in a private house for about six months, when a lot was bought of Mr. Townsend for two hundred and fifty dollars, and in 1875 the trustees of the French Street Church built a house of worship on it, for the mission, at a cost of one thousand dollars. As a mission it was served by Revs. Henry W. Davis, Gaylord Peterson and John Hall. It became a station in 1880, and has had as pastors, Revs. Hadrian Davis, Daniel Russell and Isaac B. Cooper. The membership of this church is seventy-five; Sunday-school, seventy.

Moore’s Chapel, on Ford Street, between Scott and Lincoln, is the house of worship of a mission connected with Bethel A. M. E. Church. A number of members of Bethel Church lived in McDowellville, now the northwestern part of Wilmington, and to accommodate them, religious services were first held in a private house in that section, commencing in 1875, during which year the trustees of Bethel Church purchased a lot of L. W. Stidham & Son for one hundred and twenty-five dollars and erected the present Moore’s Chapel at a cost of six hundred dollars. A Sunday-school was started with Francis S. Norton as superintendent. A camp-meeting was held in the vicinity, and soon after a mission of thirteen members formed by Rev. John F. Thomas. Religious services were conducted by the pastors of Bethel Church and local preachers for several years. The first pastor sent to the mission was Rev. Charles Parce, who was succeeded by Revs. J. B. Till and Charles H. Johnson.

The Haven Methodist Episcopal Church was originally known as Browntown Mission, and was established in 1876 by Rev. William H. Butler, D.D., then pastor of Ezion Church. The first place of worship was a small chapel in Browntown, along the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad. After a continuance of two years as a mission under the direction of Ezion Church, it was, in 1879, organized into a station as Mount Zion Chapel. The railroad company bought the small chapel in Browntown, December 15, 1879, for seven hundred and fifty dollars and the society procured a lot on Third Street, between Dupont and Scott Streets, and in 1880 erected a house of worship, at a cost of thirteen hundred dollars. This work was accomplished through the efforts of the trustees of Ezion Church. The membership of the church in 1887 was sixty-eight. The Sunday-school has one hundred and two scholars. Ellis Jefferson is superintendent. The pastors who served the church have been Isaac H. White, T. M. Hubbard, Harrison D. Webb, J. J. Campbell, J. R. Brinkley and D. A. Ridout.

Plymouth Church, of African Methodist Episcopal Zion denomination, was organized in the “old Union Church,” corner of Second and Washington Streets, in 1876, by Rev. M. M. Bell, under the direction of Bishop Clinton, of the Philadelphia and Baltimore Conference. Rev. Isaac R. Johnson, formerly pastor of African Union Church, was assigned to the charge and remained two years. He was succeeded by Revs. Jacob B. Trusty, E. S. Lane and John C. Brown. Mr. Johnson was recalled to the pastorate in 1887. The congregation worshipped two years in the building where it was organized, in Rice’s Foundry, at Tenth and Orange Streets, nearly two years, and in 1880 rented rooms in the “Arcade Row,” on Tatnall Street, below Second, which is now the place of worship. The membership is thirty-five. Thomas Bird was the first class-leader.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

WILMINGTON—(Continued).

BANKING INSTITUTIONS.

The National Bank of Delaware.—The records of public banking in this State go back to February 9, 1795, when the Legislature chartered “The President, Directors and Company” of the Bank of Delaware, the institution to be located in Wilmington, with a capital stock of $100,000, in 500 shares of $200 each. At the first meeting of the stockholders, June 5, 1795, Joseph Tatnall, Wm. Hemphill, Eleazer McCom, Samuel Canby, Isaac Hendrickson, John Ferris, Samuel Hollingsworth, Joseph Warner and Thomas Mendenhall were elected directors, who organized the same day by electing Joseph Tatnall president. A committee, consisting of Joseph Warner, Wm. Hemphill and Samuel Canby, purchased from James Lee, for one thousand pounds, the property on the northwest corner of Market and Fourth Streets for the location of the bank, and on August 17th it was opened for deposits and discounts. Notes were then issued to the amount of twenty thousand dollars, in denominations of fives, tens, twenties, thirty and fifties, payable in specie on demand, as required by the State law. A new system was introduced in 1800, but a five dollar-note of the first issue and the only one now in existence, was deposited in a Baltimore bank as late as July 17, 1888, and sent to this bank for redemption. It is now neatly framed and kept as a relic among the archives of the institution.

John Hayes was elected cashier, at a salary of $600 per annum if the yearly dividends should amount to six per cent., and $500 if less. In 1798 his salary was increased to $800, and from the beginning he was furnished a residence in the bank building free of rent. John Hellings was chosen assistant, at a salary of $400, and Daniel Byrnes teller, at $200. It was decided to receive no money on deposit except specie, notes of the Bank of the United States, Bank of North America and Bank of Pennsylvania, all of Philadelphia. Silver supposed to be spurious and plugged gold coin were rejected. By the rules it was provided that the bank should be open daily except Sunday, from 9 A.M. to 12 noon, and from 3 to 5 P.M.; discount days on Tuesdays and Fridays; no man living more than a mile from the bank would be accepted as an indorser unless the principal or payer lived within that distance; accounts to be kept in dollars and cents. At the first business meeting, on August 17, 1795, notes to the amount of $5000 were discounted; November 29th, $9396; December 29th, $13,045; March 11, 1796, $22,902, which illustrates the gradual increase in the business.

On October 16, 1796, John James, of Philadelphia, was appointed by the Bank of Delaware to receive moneys in that city and make deposits of it in the Bank of North America to the credit of the Wilmington Bank, the Philadelphia institution to send a weekly report of the moneys received. A committee of directors, appointed in 1796, to examine into the condition of the bank, reported on April 29th of that year that there was $38,548 in the "inner vault" and $41,408 "in the stairway.

The first semi-annual dividend declared was five dollars on a share. Some interesting correspondence passed between the banks of Philadelphia and the Bank of Delaware in reference to the banks of the former city recognizing the notes of the latter and receiving them on deposit. On March 3, 1796, John Nixon, president of the Bank of North America, wrote to Joseph Tatnall, the Wilmington president, saying, "this bank is disposed to evidence the most friendly disposition toward your institution." The business relations between these two concerns have regularly continued ever since. On June 2, 1802, there was on deposit $113,635. Joseph Tatnall, the first president, served until June 2, 1802, when his son-in-law, Thomas Lee, was elected, who continued to fill the position until 1810, and was then succeeded by Joseph Baily. John Hayes, elected cashier at the organization, resigned on account of ill health, March 27, 1810. The directors gave him "a beautiful silver tea-set as a token of their appreciation of his faithful services." Edward Worrall, one of the directors, was chosen to fill the vacancy, at $1200 a year. Evan Thomas was made assistant cashier at $800, and Edward Hewes teller at $600.

After the second war with Great Britain had been concluded, business increased so rapidly that the old bank building could not accommodate it, and, on May 23, 1815, the directors appointed James Pride, Joseph Baily and James Canby a committee to select a new location. They reported, on June 2d, that for $5000 they had purchased from William Warner the premises at the corner of Market and Sixth Streets, running through to King Street, then occupied as a store by Moore & Robinson. By paying this firm $500, their immediate removal was effected, the old buildings were demolished, and before the year 1816 the present banking-house was completed and occupied.

Joseph Baily, Jacob M. Broom, James Canby, John Ferris and Joshua Wollaston were the building committee. The old bank building and site were sold, July 14, 1815, to William Larkins for $10,000. On January 2, 1816, a meeting of representatives of all the banks of the State was held at Dover, and it was agreed that each should receive the note issues of the other in order to establish a general circulation of currency throughout Delaware.

The Bank of Delaware was successfully guided by its directors through the depressing period between 1811 and 1820, when one hundred and ninety-five banks in the Union became insolvent. A new charter was obtained January 11, 1820. During the financial crisis of 1837, after the failure of the Bank of the United States and one hundred and eighty other monetary institutions in this country, this bank stopped specie payments for a brief period, in common with all other stable institutions, but, like them, in 1838 renewed payments in specie. In the same year the number of directors was reduced to seven. As early as 1880 the stock was held at double its par value, and the institution had earned large fortunes that were mainly directed to the promotion of industrial and commercial enterprises of the town. The prudence of its management brought it through the financial panic of 1857 with undiminished credit and resources. It continued business as a State corporation for more than two years after the establishment of the national banking system, but on June 16, 1865, it was decided to enter the new system, and, on July 29th, it was made the "National Bank of Delaware," with a capital of one hundred and ten thousand dollars, and these directors: Henry Latimer, Samuel Bills, Joseph Shiple, Henry G. Banning, Edward Brinmuntz, Charles Warner, Lewis P. Bush, M.D., William P. Richardson and Joseph P. Richardson; Cashier, Samuel Floyd; Assistant, R. E. Ewbank; Teller, Henry Baird. The number of directors was soon afterward again reduced to seven.

The subsequent prosperity of the institution is attested by the fact that the stock, the par value of which is $200 a share, has sold as high as $700. The surplus is $115,000, and the deposits, at the latest official statement, amounted to $588,755.81.

Joseph Tatnall, the first president, was one of the leading citizens of Wilmington of his time. Thomas Lee, his successor, was his son-in-law. Joseph Baily, the third president, was a leading merchant of Wilmington, and son-in-law of Joseph Tatnall, and Henry Latimer, the fourth president, was a man of fine capabilities. Joseph Tatlall, the first president of the Bank of Delaware, for forty years one of the principal millers on the Brandywine, and a noble, patriotic and public-spirited citizen, was born at Wilmington, Ninth Month 6, 1740, and died Eighth Month 3, 1813, aged seventy-three years. He was in the line of direct descent in the third generation from Robert Tatlall, a native of Leicestershire, England, who died in his native country in 1715, and whose widow and five of their seven children, about 1725, sailed from Bristol, England, and settled in Darby, Pa. Those children were Jonathan, Thomas, Mary, Sarah, Elizabeth, Ann and Edward.

Edward Tatlall, the youngest child, and father of Joseph Tatlall, was married at London Grove Friends' Meeting, Chester County, Pa., Fourth Month 11, 1785, to Elizabeth Pennock, by whom he had five children—Mary, married to William Marshall; Ann, died unmarried; Joseph, the subject of this sketch; Elizabeth, married to John Tripp; and Sarah, married to Richard Richardson.

Soon after their marriage Edward and Elizabeth Tatlall moved to Wilmington, and he was one of the first carpenters in the town. In 1765 he placed a weather-vane, still swinging over a building in the ninth ward, on the same site of the stone house over which he placed it one hundred and twenty-three years ago. He died in Wilmington, Fourth Month 11, 1790.

Joseph Tatlall, son of Edward and Elizabeth Tatlall, was first married to Elizabeth Lea, First Month 31, 1765, in the Friends' Meeting at Wilmington. His second marriage was with Sarah Paxson. His children were Sarah, born 1765, married to Thomas Lea; Margaret, born 1767, married to James Price; Elizabeth, born 1770, married to Joseph Bally, for thirty-one years president of the Bank of Delaware; Edward, died an infant; Ann, born 1775, married to John Beller; Joseph, born 1777, died of yellow fever in 1798; Esther, born 1779, married to William Warner, father of Charles Warner, of Wilmington; Edward, born 1782, married to Margery Paxson; Thomas, born 1785, died of yellow fever in 1798.

Joseph Tatlall was the first of the name to engage in the milling business on the Brandywine. During the War of the Revolution, when yet a young man, he purchased grain and manufactured flour in large quantities. His name was known far and near, for his energy in conducting his extensive business, his great hospitality and his sterling patriotism during the eventful period of the struggle for independence. When Washington was in Wilmington, before the battle of Brandywine, he was for a time the guest of Joseph Tatlall, who ground flour for the famous army when few others would, owing to the danger of his mill being destroyed by the enemy if they approached. A few years later, as the first President of the United States, Washington, while passing through Wilmington on his way from Philadelphia, then the national capital, to his Mount Vernon home, stopped his chaise in front of the home of Friend Tatlall, and not finding him there, walked down to the mill to greet this worthy patriot.

About 1770 Joseph Tatlall built the large stone mansion, now No. 1803 Market Street, and then one of the few dwellings in the village of Brandywine, and it was here that Washington and Lafayette dined, with him. Lafayette stopped in front of it and inquired concerning the family of his former friend when he visited America in 1824. General Wayne had his headquarters in this house, the rear parlor being used as the council chamber. The front door jambs for many years had the mark of a missile thrown at Gen. Wayne while here. It is, therefore, one of the most historic buildings now standing in Wilmington.
Joseph Tatnall was engaged extensively in the shipping trade for nearly half a century. As an evidence of his ability to perform large business transactions, it is related that on one occasion he purchased thirty-five thousand bushels of grain of Col. Lloyd, of Talbot County, Maryland, valued at forty thousand dollars, and paid for it in cash. This occurred just before the beginning of the present century, and was then considered a very large amount of money. In 1798, when the present City Hall was built, he purchased a fine town clock and bell in Europe, and presented them to the citizens of Wilmington. The bell remained in position on the City Hall until 1866, and in 1878 was given to the Phoenix Fire Company, in the belfry of whose engine building it now hangs.

On account of his rare executive and administrative abilities, Joseph Tatnall was chosen the first president of the Bank of Delaware, when it was organized in 1795, and continued in that position until 1802. Two of his sons-in-law, Thomas Lea and Joseph Baily, succeeded him in the same position. Late in life he built the large house at the corner of Nineteenth and Market Streets, now the residence of Christian Febiger. He intended this building for himself, but his son, Edward Tatnall, having married about this time, the father gave him possession of it. He died August 13, 1813.

Edward, son of Joseph and Elizabeth Lea Tatnall, married Margery Paxson in 1809, by whom he had the following sons and daughters: Joseph, Edward and the late William and Henry L. Tatnall; Elizabeth T., widow of the late Commodore Gillis; Sarah T. (deceased), married Christian Febiger; Anne T., married William Canby; Mary, married to Edward Bette; Margery (deceased), married E. Tatnall Warner.

Edward Tatnall, the father, was connected with the Brandywine Mills the most of his life. He was in business there with his father first, and later with James Price. The firm of Tatnall & Lea was originally Joseph Tatnall and Thomas Lea, and afterward, from 1838 to 1864, the present Joseph Tatnall and William Lea.

Joseph Tatnall, the eldest son of Edward and Margery Paxson Tatnall, owns and resides in the late household of his grandfather, Joseph, at 1903 Market Street, built about one hundred and eighteen years ago, the floors in the front of which have never been changed. The high ceilings show the advanced ideas of the builder. Joseph Tatnall was married, in 1841, to Sarah, daughter of Ashton Richardson. The surviving children of this marriage are Ashton R., Thomas, Richard R., Lucy R. and William.

Henry Latimer, who for the long period of thirty-one years filled the position of president of the Bank of Delaware with honor to himself and great credit to that institution, was born in Wilmington May 21, 1799, and died at his house near the same city February 28, 1885. James Latimer, his grandfather, came to America in 1736, settled at Newport, in New Castle County, and engaged extensively in the mercantile and shipping business. Largely through his industry and enterprise that village in early days was made an important mercantile centre. He became one of the most prominent and influential men of his day in Delaware, and was president of the convention that framed the first State Constitution. Dr. Henry Latimer, his son, and father of Henry Latimer, was a skillful physician; practiced for many years in Wilmington, and was a surgeon in the War of the Revolution. He was elected a Representative in Congress in 1793 from Delaware, and served until 1795, when he was chosen United States Senator, which high position he filled until he resigned in 1801. Henry Latimer inherited a large landed estate, including "Woodstock," the homestead near Newport, owning it during his entire life. He obtained his education in the best schools the town of Wilmington then afforded. Under the excellent guidance of intelligent and worthy parents, he was early taught that nobility of character, honesty and integrity were essential to a successful and useful career. It was these valued traits that Henry Latimer always cultivated and possessed during his long and prosperous life of fourscore and six years.

When he reached the age of seventeen he went to Philadelphia, and was engaged in the mercantile business in that city for several years. He then returned to Delaware to superintend the cultivation of his farms, residing at the homestead, "Woodstock," until by the death of his brother, John R. Latimer, he came in possession of the beautiful country-seat near Wilmington, on the Newport turnpike. It was here that he resided during the later years of his life.

In his successful career as a banker, Henry Latimer was best known in Wilmington, in Philadelphia and over a very large area of the surrounding country. In 1823, when but twenty-four years old, he was chosen a director in the Bank of Delaware, and continued by annual election to be a member of the board of directors of that institution until his death, a period of sixty-two years. This incident is a remarkable one, and doubtless does not have a parallel in the whole history of the State. After serving seventeen years as a director of the bank, a vacancy occurred in the office of president, and Henry Latimer was unanimously chosen to fill that position June 4, 1841. He entered upon the duties of the office and performed them with his characteristic good judgment and wise foresight, continually keeping uppermost in his mind during his whole career the best interests of the institution over which he was called upon to preside. He was regular and punctual in his attendance at the bank, watched with zealous care all its affairs, continued its reputation for excellent management and increased its prosperity. On the 7th of June, 1872, after a long, successful and prosperous administration, he resigned the presidency of the bank and retired to private life, though continuing a member of its board of directors. He was a highly esteemed and very useful citizen of the community in which he lived.

National Bank of Wilmington and Brandywine.—The institution now known by this name was chartered in 1810 as the President, Directors and Company of the Bank of Wilmington and Brandywine, the articles of association having been signed by one hundred and forty subscribers to the stock. The capital was fixed at two hundred thousand dollars, in shares of fifty dollars, of which five dollars must be paid at the time of subscribing; five dollars at the expiration of every thirty days until twenty-five dollars had been paid, and the remainder at the pleasure of the directors. No director of another bank could hold a similar office in this one, and all must be citizens of the State. On April 16, 1810, the stockholders met at the public inn of Edward Thomas, two doors above the present location of the bank, and elected these nine directors,—John Way, William Poole, Daniel Lowber, Robert Hamilton, Joseph Robinson, Jeremiah Woolston, James Jeffers and John Torbert. They organized by electing William Poole president, which position he held but eleven days and then resigned. The amount of eighteen thousand three hundred and sixty dollars was subscribed to the capital, and Robert Hamilton, Jeremiah Woolston and Joseph Robinson, the committee appointed to procure a banking-house, reported that Samuel Hogg's property, immediately above the present site of the bank, could be rented for three hundred dollars a year. The lease was executed May 11th, and the president was instructed to draw five hundred dollars from the “trunks” of this bank, deposited in the Bank of Delaware, to fit the building up and buy paper and plates for engraving the notes. A loan of its plate press was offered by the Bank of Delaware. Daniel Byrnes, of Baltimore, was elected cashier at one thousand dollars a year, but refused to come for less than one thousand one hundred dollars and “house found him.” The first banking business was done May 19, 1810, when John James’ note for two thousand dollars, and Thomas Coffin’s note for two thousand five hundred dollars were discounted at sixty days. May 26th a committee reported that the amount of paid-in capital was thirty-four thousand five hundred and sixty-four dollars. The third installment of seventeen thousand five hundred and thirty-five dollars was paid on June 9th, and Samuel Smith’s note for two thousand dollars was discounted the same day. The president and Daniel Lowber, on June 29th, took twenty-two thousand and ninety-six dollars of the paid-in capital in notes to Philadelphia and obtained in exchange the same amount in specie. Three hundred impressions were made on half-sheets of five, ten and fifteen-dollar notes to the amount of twenty-one thousand dollars, from plates bought “by this bank in Philadelphia.” Six hundred sheets of the same denomination, and fifteen hundred sheets of one, two and three-dollar notes were ordered. The bank was opened regularly for deposits and discounts June 21, 1810, on which day notes to amount of $4,816 were discounted, and on June 28th, $7,198; July 2d, $3,864; August 30th, $12,115. One of the heaviest amounts discounted during the bank’s early history was on April 9, 1812, being $21,816.

The fourth installment of five dollars a share was paid July 5, 1810, amounting to $17,580. The fifth installment was called for August 16th. One-half of the capital stock, or $100,000, was now paid in. The first dividend of eight per cent. per annum was declared January 7, 1811. Edward Thomas was paid on the same day $41.49 for the use of his house by the bank and for a place of meeting of stockholders during the preceding year. John Way, John Torbert and Robert Hamilton were paid $58.77 on January 11, 1811, “for going to Dover on charter business.” Two thousand impressions in small notes were made February 27, 1811. The president’s salary for the first year was $400. A 4% per cent. dividend for the preceding six months was declared July 1st. On August 11th there was $46,997 in specie on deposit, and on January 1, 1812, $33,085. The cashier informed the public, in 1812, that there were counterfeit notes on this bank in circulation. A dividend of 5 per cent. for the preceding six months was declared January 2, 1812, when there was a surplus of $3,000; ten thousand sheets of bank paper were printed for the year. A committee made up of John Way, Jacob Jeffers and John Torbert reported, on February 12, 1812, that they had bought from William Townsend, for $3,300, the present site of the bank; whereupon, the directors decided that “the bank ought not to be a tenant-house, and the erection of a banking building would add confidence, security and repectability to the institution.” The new edifice was finished March 25, 1813. On May 10th, Directors Joseph Robison and Samuel Shipley were instructed to have $20,000 in specie put in boxes ready for ha-ty removal should it be necessary in consequence of reports of the arrival of the British fleet in Delaware Bay; but this order was revoked on reception of the news of the defeat of the enemy at Baltimore on September 12th-15th. The cashier, on August 23, 1815, was ordered to purchase for the bank, with the Baltimore paper on deposit, $62,000 worth of United States stock at 99%. These were transferred to the Bank of Pennsylvania and finally sold to the Bank of Philadelphia, February 22, 1816. The Bank of Wilmington and Brandywine sent representatives to a meeting of bankers held in Dover January 3, 1816, for reinstating the credit of the paper of the banks of the State. The surplus fund was increased $4000 this year. This bank, the Farmers’ Bank and the Bank of Delaware each subscribed $10,000 in stock to assist in constructing the Gap and Newport Turnpike.

The financial crisis which caused considerable trouble from 1815 to 1819 had now shown itself, and an agreement by this bank with the banks of Pennsylvania was made January, 1816, not to receive on depos it any paper issued by banks in the South and West. During a part of the year 1816 the local banks of Delaware would not receive or deposit each other's notes on account of "the great embarrass ment of the circulating medium." January 20, 1817, the Farmers' Bank of Delaware agreed to accept notes of this bank, which reciprocated the favor.

The same relations were soon afterwards established with the Bank of West Chester.

The notes of the Bank of Wilmington and Brandywine were placed at par in Philadelphia in July, 1817, when eighty thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven dollars in United States bank stock were sold. The following statement was made in August of this year: Specie on hand, $16,338; bank-notes, $31,714; checks, drafts, etc., $54,875; surplus fund, $50,000; paid-in capital, $120,000.

At the meeting of stockholders held at the public inn of Mary Thomas, widow of Edward, six of the nine directors were not re-elected. A difficulty had arisen on account of certain defaced notes not being properly destroyed and the institute became nearly bankrupt. The stockholders appointed Jacob Airicks, James Brian, John Walker, Evan Morris and Samuel Spackman to confer with the directors on the advisability of closing the bank. It was decided, however, to restore the stock to par value. The amount of the bank's notes in circulation then was fifty-eight thousand dollars, to provide for a redemption of which there was but thirty-five thousand dollars in assets. For a time the institution ceased to issue money or receive deposits.

John Torbert, Joseph Grubb and John Wardell visited Philadelphia "to assist in restoring credit of bank there." A committee appointed to examine into the condition of the bank on May 10, 1819, reported the liabilities to be $265,165, and resource in bills receivable, bonds, stocks, etc., $298,445, leaving a "nominal balance in favor of the bank of $33,280, most of which is collectible." It was therefore determined to immediately restore the credit of the bank, and for this purpose $12,000 was borrowed from the State Bank at Camden, N. J., $10,000 from the Bank of Delaware and $22,000 from the Bank of Pennsylvania, the president and directors signing notes payable in four months, thus making themselves personally responsible to the lenders. The bank resumed business May 13th by discounting paper to the amount of $13,510. The first notes were issued from new plates on July 15, 1820, to the amount of $12,000. Cashier Byrnes agreed to serve a year for $900; Evan Thomas was elected clerk; John Torbert, the president, received $300 a year. The first dividend after the crisis was a semi-annual one of fifty cents on each share, declared July 2, 1821. A new charter was obtained February 7, 1822. Daniel Byrnes resigned the position of cashier May 12, 1823, and Evan Thomas was elected at $700 a year. Joseph Wollaston was chosen teller at $400.

John Torbert resigned as president in 1824, and John Wales succeeded him. Evan Thomas, the cashier, died November 25, 1825. Joseph P. Wollaston was elected to the position. Daniel Byrnes returned to the bank as teller at the same time. At a meeting of the stockholders in December, 1828, they resolved to make good the capital stock and on the 21st of the following January obtained from the Legislature the necessary enabling act. An installment of $5 per share was called on March 28, 1829, $5 on July 11th and $5 on August 30th. On September 17th fourteen hundred and twenty-five new shares were issued at $30 each, and by January 4, 1830, the bank had so far recovered as to be able to pay a six per cent. dividend. It escaped disaster in the financial convulsion which shook the country in 1837, when the following were among the principal stockholders: John Janvier, 244 shares; James Gardner, 220; Jesse Mendenhall, 164; Joseph Mendenhall, 158; Jeremiah Wollaston's executors, 187; John Wales, 110; William Seal, 100; Martha Bennock, 100; John Walker, 95; Jesse Chandler, 95; Vincent Gilpia, 75; Samuel McClary, 65; William R. Sellers, 60; George Bush, 56; Mahlon Betts, 53; Jacob Fausey, 50.

An act of Assembly, passed February 18, 1887, extended the provision of the charter by creating twenty-six hundred and sixty-seven new shares, to be disposed of at not less than $35 each. The amount on deposit October 19, 1887, was $39,602.

Washington Jones, now president of the bank, was the first discount clerk, elected in 1839, and served until the fall of that year, when he resigned and was succeeded by William S. Haganly. In 1854 a dividend of five per cent. and an extra dividend of two per cent. were declared, and by April, 1856, the deposits had increased to $129,349.70. Seventeen months later came the great panic of 1857, and Mr. George Bush, president of the bank, represented it at the general meeting of Wilmington bankers on September 28, 1857, when it was resolved to suspend specie payments. It resumed with the general resumption of the next year, but of course suspended again during the Civil War and until 1879. In January, 1862, it loaned the State $10,000 to pay the direct tax assessed by the general government. On May 22, 1865, it became a member of the national banking system as the "National Bank of Wilmington and Brandywine," with a capital stock of $200,010, the directors being John A. Duncan, Jacob Fausey, Leonard E. Wales, Washington Jones, George W. Sparks, William Richards, Thomas W. Bowers, Joseph Mendenhall and Joseph T. Bailey.

President John A. Duncan died Wednesday, August 5, 1868, and Washington Jones was elected to succeed him and has held the position continuously for nineteen years. Jacob Fausey, after serving as director for nearly twenty-five years, died March 6, 1869. A dividend of seven per cent. was declared yearly from 1870 to 1878, and six per cent. in 1879. Otho Nowland, the present cashier, entered the bank... as a clerk, April 25, 1872. Caleb Sheward is paying teller and Aubrey Thatcher is receiving teller. On December 26, 1884, Washington Jones, George S.

Capelle and W. T. Porter were appointed a committee to enlarge and improve the banking-house. By November of the following year it was extended to Shipley Street and the office of the bank is now a large, roomy, well-lighted structure, and furnished with the best of conveniences for banking purposes.

One of Hall's improved burglar and fire-proof vaults was recently procured. The capital of the bank is $200,001; surplus, $100,000; undivided profits, about

$25,000; loans and discount during the past year,

$600,000; and deposits, about $560,000.

The directors for 1888 are Washington Jones, Geo.

S. Capelle, William G. Pumphrey, C. Wesley Weldon,

William T. Porter, J. Newlin Gawthrop, Alfred D.

Warner, Thomas P. Smith and James Morrow.

Washington Jones, now and for many years president of the National Bank of Wilmington and Brandywine, and who is about equally well known as manufacturer and banker, rather singularly, was not brought up or educated to either calling, but spent twenty years of his early manhood in the mercantile business. He is of Welsh and Irish descent. His great-grandfather came from Wales, and was one of the earliest settlers of that nationality in Delaware.

His father, William G. Jones, who was a cabinet-maker, lived all of his life in the house where he was born, and died there in his eighty-ninth year. His wife, Rachel Walker, was of a Pennsylvania family, of Irish origin. Their son Washington, the subject of this short memoir, was born in Wilmington January 5, 1818, and his youth was spent in the manner usual in the then small town, except that he could not fully enjoy even the limited educational advantages of the time because of poor health. When sixteen years of age he went to Philadelphia and entered a retail dry-goods store, and two years later he became a clerk in a wholesale house in the same city. After the expiration of a year he returned to Wilmington, clerked a year in a dry-goods store, served another year as discount clerk in the same bank of which he has since been president, and then, in 1839, when twenty-one years of age, with very little capital besides the knowledge which he had picked up in his varied experience as a clerk, he engaged in the dry-goods business upon his own account. He prospered, slowly at first, and then more rapidly, and for nearly twenty years he followed this line of merchan-dizing with such generally good results as to lay the foundation of a fortune. In 1858 he sold this store and became associated with Thomas H. Baynard, under the firm-name of Baynard & Jones, in the manufacture of morocco. He has ever since been identified with that trade, as a sketch in the manuufacturing chapter shows.

Mr. Jones became a director of the Wilmington and Brandywine Bank a few years after he served there as discount clerk, and, with the exception of a few brief intervals, has held the position ever since.

He was elected president in 1888. Large and exactive as have been his duties in this office, and at the head of a great morocco house, his energies have had exercise in numerous other channels. He has been a prime mover and active force in many of the enterprises which have been instrumental in advancing the material welfare of the city. He was prominently identified with the Franklin Cotton Factory, and was one of the foremost pushers in the movement which secured the establishment of gas works in the city. He is the only survivor of the directors who, in 1852, obtained the charter for the gas company. He has also been a chief promoter of several railroad enterprises, and has held positions of responsibility in connection with them. He is regarded as one of the most careful and prudent business men of the city, and while his abilities have brought a reward to him, they have not been of less value to the city—the people generally—both in a material and moral way. His religious affiliation has been with the Baptist denomination, and he has long been an active member of the Second Church, has held nearly every official position in it, including the presidency of the board of trustees and the treasurership; took a prominent part in securing the funds for erecting the handsome church edifice at Fourth and French Streets, and was himself one of the largest contributors. He has ever been one of its principal supporters, and was for fifteen years the superintendent of the Sunday-school. Mr. Jones has been twice married. His first wife, with whom he was united in 1841, was Margaret Wilson, daughter of Washington Rice, a prominent citizen and business man of Wilmington. There were four children by this union,—Emma D. (Mrs. Wm. W. Lobdell), Charles R., Margaret R. (Mrs. D. S. Creaswel, of Philadelphia) and William G. Mrs. Jones died October 4, 1854. In 1856 Mr. Jones married Emma W. Stager, of Philadelphia, and they have one child, Lizzie S. (Mrs. N. B. Danforth).

The Wilmington Clearing-House Association was organized in September, 1887, by electing Washington Jones president, and the National Bank of Wilmington and Brandywine, managers, for six months. The business of this association was begun October 1, 1887.

The Farmers' Bank.—The act incorporating the Farmers' Bank of the State of Delaware was passed February 4, 1807, empowering it to organize with a capital not to exceed $500,000, in ten thousand shares of fifty dollars each. The principal bank under this act was established at Dover, with branches at New Castle and Georgetown.

By a supplementary charter of January 22, 1818, a branch of the bank was established at Wilmington and opened a few months later on the west side of Market Street, a short distance above its present location. While the institution thus consists of branches, it is invariably treated as a unit in legislation. Each branch has a separate business, but the allotment of capital is permanent, and the entire resources of the corporation guarantee the liabilities of any one branch. The holdings of the State, which amount to $369,950, constitute a majority of the stock, and the investment of this block is mainly devoted to the fund for establishing free schools. Annually the bank pays to the State in dividends for the public use, $21,659, thus making the welfare of the institution a matter of personal interest to every citizen. In return, the bank enjoys by law the custody of certain State and county funds which form a large proportion of the public moneys.

The total capital now is $680,000 distributed as follows:

The Wilmington Savings Fund.—On August 20, 1881, a committee reported to an adjourned meeting of some of the most prominent citizens of the town that in accordance with their instructions they had prepared articles of association for a savings fund, which were adopted and signed by fifty-seven persons. At another meeting a few days later Lea Pusey, Richard H. Bayard and Samuel Hilles were commissioned to procure an act of incorporation, which was passed January 11, 1882. The charter members were Joseph G. Rowland, Richard H. Bayard, William Gibbons, Thomas Garrett, E. W. Gilbert, E. W. Gilpin, D. C. Wilson, Allen Thompson, John Bullock, Samuel Hilles, Henry F. Askew, George Jones, W. A. Mendenhall, Henry Gibbons, James W. Thompson, John Gordon, John Elliot, Samuel Buzby, H. W. Whiteley, Robert Porter, James Webb, Samuel Wollaston, Henry Latimer, Willard Hall, Lea Pusey, James Canby, John Wales, William P. Robson, Joseph Dauphin, Edward Tatnall, John H. Price, Joseph T. Price, Edmund Canby, Samuel Shipley, Eli Hilles, Jacob Alrichs, Mahlon Betts, Samuel Poole, James Price, James J. Brindley, Philip Jones, Thomas C. Alrichs, David Bush, Washington Rice, Benjamin B. Boulden, Harry Connelly, James Sidall, J. P. Garoshe, Charles I. DuPont, David Smyth, Edward Grubb, A. S. Reed, Ziba Ferra, Joseph Bringham, Edward Bringham, W. W. Baker, Thomas Gilpin. From these a board of twenty-five managers was elected, which organized by the election of the late Hon. Willard Hall as president and Lea Pusey as secretary. A code of by-laws was adopted February 2, 1882. The first investment committee was composed of the president and Edward Tatnall, David C. Wilson, Eli Hilles and James Canby. At the same time it was "Resolved, that for the purpose of receiving deposits and making payments the office of the society shall be open and the proper officers attend from ten o'clock A.M. till noon, and from two o'clock P.M. till four, in every seventh day (Saturday) commencing on seventh day the 18th instant." The first office of the society was that of its secretary, Lea Pusey, which was on the east side of Market Street, between Fifth and Sixth Streets, below the City Hall; and here business was commenced February 18, 1882. The president served without salary, and this continued to be the rule for nearly fifty years. The compensation to the secretary for his services and the use of his office was fixed at $100 yearly. Interest on deposits was paid at four per cent, per annum, calculated on whole calendar months; but no sum less than five dollars could draw interest. It is a curious commentary on the business habits of the day, that the Bank of Delaware was asked to allow the society to overdraw its account to an amount not exceeding $500. This was granted. Some years later the Bank of Wilmington and Brandywine agreed to extend this privilege to a sum not exceeding $1000, and the account was moved to it. The business of the society gradually increased. The first audit, made by C. I. Dupont, Arnold Naudain and Isaac Johnson, eighteen months after commencement of business, showed that there had been received $19,588.76, in four hundred and twenty deposits, of which sum $3800.22 had been repaid, while the investments and cash amounted to $15,966.77.

In 1837 the assets amounted to $37,463.11, the surplus being $1,825.60. In 1847 the assets amounted to $71,280.46, and the surplus to $9010.35.

The business made rapid progress in the next decade and in 1857 the assets amounted to $251,659.93, and the surplus to $27,987.46. In 1867 the amount of assets was $481,896.34, and of surplus, $53,876.63. These again nearly doubled in the next ten years, being respectively, in 1877, assets $876,637.78, and surplus $99,406.43. In the ten years following the increase was very rapid so that in 1887 the assets reached the sum of $2,546,903.48, and the surplus amounted to $214,249.21.

In an institution such as the Wilmington Savings Fund, it is necessary that the greatest caution should be taken in investing the money of its depositors. This has always been most carefully done. The bulk of the investments have been in mortgages of a first-class character, mainly in that city. Of late years these investments have resulted in aiding many of the depositors in obtaining, on easy terms, houses of their own, thus doing them a double service by first giving May, 1876. He was succeeded by his son, J. Ernest which he displayed in the discharge of duties pertain-them a safe place to invest small accumulations and savings, and then aiding them further by loaning them money to purchase properties, which loans, by continued savings, are gradually discharged. This institution has therefore combined the best features of a savings fund and loan association.

In 1840 the office of the Fund was removed to a property on the west side of Market Street, between Sixth and Seventh Streets, which was bought for four thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars, where it remained until 1856, when the corporation erected the fine, iron-front, four-story building at the corner of Eighth and Market Streets, for the use of the society, and as a dwelling for the treasurer. Within the last few years the growth of the business has been so very rapid that it was quite evident that some further accommodation would be required. Rather than attempt to improve the building which had well served for more contracted times, the managers wisely determined to make another move. Two large houses at the corner of Ninth and Market Streets were purchased and torn down, and the very solid and splendid structure which now adorns the site was erected; and to this on the 21st of November, 1887, the business was transferred. It is by far the finest building of its character in the State. The architect was Addison Hutton, of Philadelphia, and the builder James Mitchell. The material is Fox Island granite, and it is very substantially built. The bankingroom is spacious and lofty, being about ninety feet in length by thirty-six in width and thirty-five feet in height, from floor to ceiling. A steel vault fifteen feet by ten feet, in floor dimensions, and eight feet high, with doors, time-locks, etc., of the latest and most effective invention, protects its contents. This was built by the Marvin Safe Company. The rooms for managers' meetings, and for the use of committees, and the president and secretary, are perfect in convenience and exquisite in tasteful furnishing, while the arrangements for heating and ventilating the whole leave nothing to be desired.

The managers of the Savings Fund have always been ably seconded by its officers. The venerable Judge Hall was president from its foundation till his resignation, in December, 1872, a period of forty-one years, during which time he saw the society grow from a feeble beginning to a place of great usefulness and influence in the community; and his wise and prudent management and counsel were mainly instrumental in producing this result. He was succeeded by Joseph Bringhurst, who continued in office until his death, in March, 1889, and he by the present President, William M. Canby.

The first treasurer was Lea Pusey, who resigned in December, 1883, and was succeeded by Jonas Pusey, who continued to hold the office until his death, in September, 1861. Albert W. Smith was then elected, and continued the trusted and faithful treasurer of the society until ill health compelled him to resign in May, 1876. He was succeeded by his son, J. Ernest Smith, who also resigned in April, 1885, in order to take the office of solicitor, then newly created. William J. Ellison, the present treasurer, was elected his successor.

The office of auditor was established in September, 1848, and Albert W. Smith was elected to it. He resigned in 1851 to take the office of treasurer. The other occupants of this responsible office have been William B. Wiggins, Joseph Richardson, Edward Tatnall and Joseph A. Richardson, the last of whom ably performs the duties.

Albert W. Smith, the eldest son of Samuel and Sarah Watson Smith, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., on February 18, 1818. He was educated at his father's academy in Wilmington, Del., and finished there a full course of studies, including the French and Latin languages, qualifying himself for the profession of teaching, which he pursued during his early life, in co-operation with his father both at Wilmington, Delaware, and Poughkeepsie, New York. From the latter place he removed to Wilmington, which he made his permanent home.

He held commissions as notary and commissioner of deeds for many years, and was also by appointment city engineer and surveyor of Wilmington, all of which offices he filled with great acceptability. He was secretary and treasurer of the Wilmington and Brandywine Cemetery Company for thirty-three years, and after his resignation from that position was elected a member of the board of directors of that company. He was elected secretary and treasurer of the Wilmington Savings Fund, and served in that capacity from 1851 to 1876, having previously filled the office of auditor for that corporation. During his long term of office the deposits, which were less than $75,000 when he came into office, had increased to $608,000 and the surplus from $14,400 to $59,600.

Under careful management, and the conservative policy adopted by this institution, which in a great degree devolved upon Mr. Smith to execute, its losses were exceedingly small, and a correspondingly sure and profitable business always enabled it to maintain its credit unimpaired.

Ill health, resulting from overwork, compelled Mr. Smith's resignation as secretary and treasurer of the Wilmington Savings Fund, and his retirement from active business duties. At a meeting of the board of managers, held May 9, 1876, complimentary resolutions were unanimously adopted, and the hope expressed that many years of happiness and prosperity might follow his improving health. He was subsequently elected a member of the board of directors of this institution. His health was so much impaired as to necessitate his absence abroad for upwards of a year.

Mr. Smith, as a business man, was conscientious, thorough, prompt and of sound judgment. These characteristics won him strong friends and the confidence of the community. The ability and integrity which he displayed in the discharge of duties pertaining to positions of trust and responsibility are best attested by the official indorsement of the board of directors of the above institution to that effect, passed on the occasion of his retirement from office.

Mr. Smith, although often solicited, declined to enter politics. He was an original Republican, opposed to the extension of slavery in the Territories, and was one of the very few Delawareans who supported Fremont and Dayton in the campaign of 1856.

He is an active and prominent member of the religious Society of Friends.

Mr. Smith enjoys a green old age; he is cheerful, fond of companionship and never so happy as when surrounded by his children. He is a great reader, absorbing the current topics of the day as well as the more serious productions of the best thinkers.

Mr. Smith married Elizabeth Wollaston, daughter of Samuel Wollaston, a prominent citizen of Wilmington, June 6, 1839.

Their descendants are S. Rodmond Smith, who married Sarah E., only daughter of Charles A. and Anna M. Ware, of Alexandria, Va.

Linton Smith, who married Margaret, only daughter of Charles and Mary R. Warner, of Wilmington, Delaware.

Alexis Smith, who married Mary H., eldest daughter of Allen C. and Margaret Harmon, of Alexandria, Va.

Joshua Ernest Smith, who married Josephine T., second daughter of Henry L. and Caroline G. Tatnall, of Wilmington, Del.

And Arthur H. Smith, unmarried.

Mr. Smith's ancestry on the paternal side is given in the foregoing sketch of his father, Samuel Smith. On the maternal side it is as follows:

His mother, Sarah, was the daughter of Levi and Rebecca (Yerkes) Watson his wife; Levi was the son of Joseph and Rachel (Crosdale) Watson; Joseph was the son of Mark and Anna (Sotcher) Watson; and Mark was the son of Thomas and Rebecca (Mark) Watson, his wife, who were married the 4th day of the Ninth Month, 1822, at Scoby, near Carlisle, county of Cumberland, England, both being members of the religious Society of Friends. They subsequently came to this country and settled in the Pennsylvania province.

The Union National Bank.—This bank was chartered as a State institution February 15, 1839, as the Union Bank of Delaware. The following commissioners were appointed to receive subscriptions to the capital stock: James Price, James Canby, Edward Tatnall, John Gordon, Alfred Du Pont, Thomas Stockton, Archibald Hamilton, Nicholas G. Williamson, William Chandler, Merritt Canby, William Hemphill Jones, William P. Brobson, David C. Wilson, John H. Price, Samuel Canby, John Elliott, John Connell, Eli Hilles, James A. Bayard, William Lea, Allan Thomson, John Hemphill, Dr. James W. Thomson and Mahlon Betts.

The first meeting of the commissioners was held at John Hall's Inn, the Indian Queen, on February 28, 1839. James Price was appointed chairman, and William P. Brobson secretary. Subscription books were opened at City Hall on the 21st of March, following. Edward Tatnall was appointed treasurer of the board of commissioners, Mahlon Betts assistant treasurer and William Hemphill Jones assistant secretary. "Peter Counts high constable and Park Mason constable were appointed to preserve order in City Hall during the sittings of the Commissioners." At this meeting the entire capital stock, six thousand shares of fifty dollars each, or three hundred thousand dollars, was subscribed and five hundred dollars on each share immediately paid in. The next meeting of the commissioners was held at Indian Queen Hotel on April 3d, to conduct the first election for directors to serve until the first Monday in January, 1840. The following were elected: James Price, James Canby, Edward Tatnall, Alfred Du Pont, John H. Price, Merritt Canby, William Lea, Isaac Starr, William Chandler, John Hemphill, James W. Thompson, William Hemphill Jones and Miller Dunott.

William P. Brobson was the first cashier. The doors were opened for business in a building on the site of the present large and commodious banking house in May, 1839.

An act of the Legislature was passed in 1843 changing the time of holding election of directors from first Monday in January to first Monday in February each year and also reduced the number of directors from thirteen to nine, which is the present number. Application was made to the Legislature and the charter of the bank amended so as to divide the capital stock into twelve thousand shares of twenty-five dollars each instead of six thousand shares of fifty dollars each, and authorizing the directors to dispose of the residue of the shares for the benefit of the bank.

The Union Bank of Delaware was then fully established and soon recognized as one of the leading financial institutions in the State. Since it began business in 1839 it has met with the greatest success, as facts and statistics herein given will indicate. As a State institution it flourished, but the national banking system furnished superior advantages. The Board of Directors, therefore, made application and on the 29th of June, 1865, received a certificate from the comptroller of the currency at Washington converting the Union Bank of Delaware, into a National Bank. The directors then were Hon. Edward W. Gilpin, president; Henry Du Pont, James C. Alkin, Edgar Houssafeld, Joseph T. Warner, Edward T. Bellah, John H. Price, John B. Porter and Victor Du Pont. On June 27, 1865, they published the following statement of the liabilities and resources of the institution:
NEW CASTLE COUNTY.

The following were presidents at the time mentioned:

James Price, first president, April 8, 1819 to 1841; James Canby, second president, January 4, 1841 to 1845; Edward W. Gilpin, third president, 1845 to 1866; Victor Du Pont, fourth president, 1866 to date.

In January, 1873, Victor Du Pont, Edward T. Bellah, James C. Aiken and William M. Canby were appointed a committee to improve the bank room and place a brown stone front to the building. In 1885 Preston Lea, William H. Swift and William M. Canby, a committee of the Board of Directors, remodelled the banking-house. The same year a substantial vault was built in the banking-room and one in the basement, faced with Brandywine granite and lined with steel and iron.
HISTORY OF DELAWARE.

Since his election as president of this bank, in July, 1866, Victor Du Pont has administered its affairs with rare business foresight. William P. Brobson, the first cashier, retired on account of feeble health February 1, 1848, when Joseph Warner was elected to succeed him. William S. Craig was at the same time chosen teller. John H. Danby entered the bank, as assistant clerk, in November, 1870. He has occupied every position in it to his present one, having been chosen cashier April 1, 1885. Frank C. Carpenter, paying teller and notary public, entered this bank, as assistant clerk, in 1871. E. Frank Sharpley, receiving teller, in 1878; E. A. Ryan, discount clerk, in 1884; George H. Robinette, book-keeper, in 1885; William C. Buck, book-keeper, in 1885; William Butz, exchange clerk, in 1886.

The late distinguished chief justice, Hon. Edward Woodward Gilpin, was for many years president of the Union National Bank, besides being associated in many other ways with enterprises having for their object the advancement of the business interests of Wilmington. He died, greatly lamented, on April 29, 1876. A sketch of his legal career will be found in the chapter on the "Bench and Bar," elsewhere in this work.

The Mechanics' Bank, for a few years, did business at the south-east corner of Fourth and Market Streets. The capital of this institution was two hundred thousand dollars. The directors in 1859 were Mahlon Betts, Evan C. Stotesenburg, Jesse Lane, G. W. Churchman, J. W. Maury, William Tatnall, Joshua T. Heald, John Marshall, Thomas Walter, E. Moore and George Richardson.

Mahlon Betts was president; Samuel Biddle, cashier; and Joseph C. Spear, teller. When this institution closed out its business, Mahlon Betts, its president, was chosen president of the First National Bank. This was in July, 1864.

First National Bank of Wilmington.—This was the first bank in Wilmington organized under the National Banking Law of 1864. It was organized March 31st of that year, with these directors: Joshua T. Heald, Clement B. Smyth, Israel Pusey, George W. Bush, Stephen S. Southard, DelaPlaine McDaniel, Mahlon Betts, William Tatnall and Daniel James. On July 2d Mahlon Betts was elected president. Samuel Biddle was elected cashier June 30th. The bank was opened for business the 4th of July, 1864, in a building at the southeast corner of Fourth and Market Streets.

Joseph C. Spear, on the same day, was elected teller and clerk and William H. Connell discount clerk. The original capital stock was three hundred thousand dollars, which, on April 3, 1865, was increased to four hundred thousand dollars, and on January 4th, 1871, to five hundred thousand dollars, being the largest capital of any bank in the State of Delaware.

Edward Betts, owing to the retirement of Mahlon Betts, was elected president on the 11th of July, 1864, one week after its organization, and has filled that responsible position continuously from that date to the present time. George D. Armstrong has been the efficient cashier since August 1, 1864.

Dividends have been paid stockholders semi-annually since the time of organization. The first twenty-eight dividends yielded an annual income of ten per cent.; the succeeding nine dividends eight per cent., and all dividends since nine per cent. annually. The present surplus is one hundred thousand dollars. The average amount of deposits for the year 1864 was $171,567; for 1875 $364,272; and for 1886 $731,950. Loans and discounts for 1886 were $735,888.

These facts illustrate the substantial growth and prosperity of the institution, and its intelligent and well-directed management.

The principal correspondents of this bank, through which it makes collections, are the First National Bank of Philadelphia; the National Park Bank, of New York; and the National Bank of the Commonwealth, of Boston. On the 1st of April, 1873, the bank was removed from its original location to the one now occupied, at the corner of Fifth and Market Streets.

Chants, manufacturers and capitalists of Wilmington, during the year 1884 determined to organize another banking institution. The first meetings were held at the office of S. & T. McClary, 606 Shipley Street, where the stock was subscribed and the organization effected. The directors elected were John H. Adams, Samuel McClary, Henry C. Robinson, Phillip Plunkett, Archibald A. Capelle, Samuel G. Simmons, Winfield S. Quigley, Benjamin Nields, John Peoples, Charles E. Fritz, Henry F. Dure, James A. Hart, J. Davis Sisler and William M. Field. The board organized by electing John H. Adams, president, Samuel McClary, vice-president, and John Peoples, cashier.

The capital stock is two hundred and ten thousand dollars, in shares of one hundred dollars each. The requisite amount having been subscribed the president forwarded the names and number of shares taken by each of the one hundred and sixty-five stockholders, to the comptroller of the currency at Washington and a certificate was returned empowering the institution to begin business as the “Central National Bank of Wilmington.” The bank was opened in its elegant new rooms, in the Security, Trust and Safe Deposit Company building, November 30, 1885. Henry Rumford, was elected teller and Philip Q. Churchman, discount clerk. John H. Adams, on account of ill health, retired from the position of president, February 20, 1886, and Samuel McClary was elected president; Phillip Plunkett was elected vice-president.

The surplus fund at the end of the first six months was eight thousand dollars, and the second six months sixteen thousand dollars. In January 1886, it was twenty-five thousand dollars. Since the organization of the bank, Allen Speakman and Charles Baird have been elected directors, taking the places of John H. Adams and W. S. Quigley. The principal correspondents and reserve banks of the Central National, are the Central National Bank of Philadelphia and the Park National Bank of New York. The directors for 1888, are Samuel McClary, Jr., Phillip Plunkett, John Peoples, Charles E. Fritz, J. D. Sisler, Henry C. Robinson, H. F. Dure, Samuel G. Simmons, William M. Field, Benjamin Nields, James A. Hart, Charles Baird, Allen Speakman and A. A. Capelle.

The late John Hyndman Adams, first president of the Central National Bank and of the Security Trust and Safe Deposit Company, and for many years a heavy iron manufacturer, was born in Wilmington October 13, 1820. He was the son of John and Margaret (Hyndman) Adams, both descended from families long settled in Delaware, and belonging to the best elements of the pioneer population. His career was a simple but successful one, marked with little of incident and yet interesting because of the influence that emanated from the man, and had its effect in various ways upon the community. To sum up results of that influence or to portray fully the character of our subject, would be a difficult task, and beyond the province of this work, but the outline story of his life may be briefly told. His boyhood and youth were not notable for incident or peculiar experience. He received a liberal English education in the best private schools of his early boyhood days, and later in life attended the Belknap Academy, one of the best known of the higher institutions of learning that existed in Wilmington during the early part of the century. After leaving school he availed himself of every opportunity for pursuing his studies and improving himself mentally. As one evidence of this, we find him as one of the seven, founding, in 1834, the “Young Men’s Literary and Debating Society of Wilmington,” of which he became president in 1841 and which he was finally instrumental in merging with the Wilmington Institute. Thus at that early day he was evincing something of the taste for intellectual diversions and desire for knowledge, which became marked characteristics of the mature man. The greater part of his time, however, was of necessity, devoted to business, and he was permitted, in later years, to hold a place at the front rank of self-made men.

His first humble duties in the line of making a living were in the hardware store of Duncan Brothers, and they must have been faithfully and satisfactorily discharged, for after serving for a period as an apprentice with Messrs. Betts, Pusey & Harlan, and buying his remaining time from them, he became, in 1839, a salesman for Mr. John A. Duncan, who had, in the mean time, dissolved partnership with his brother. This position he held for eight years. In 1847 he began business for himself in the heater and range and hardware business, and in this he succeeded so well that at the expiration of ten years he had accumulated a modest capital, with which he decided to embark in the manufacture of iron. He accordingly connected himself with the firm of McDaniell, Craigie & Co., proprietors of the Old Ferry Rolling Mill, which three years later, upon the withdrawal of Mr. Craigie, became McDaniell, Adams & Co. In 1863 this firm was succeeded by the Diamond State Iron Company, of which Mr. Adams was elected president. Two years later he resigned this office, retired from the company, and early in 1866, connected himself with the McCullough Iron Company, with which he remained for sixteen years, twelve years as vice-president and four years as president, devoting himself unremittingly to the interests of the house and largely enhancing its capabilities as a great manufacturing establishment. In 1882 he retired and after a sojourn in Europe returned, only to be again pressed into active business life by reason of his universally recognized qualifications for responsible position. He was actively influential in organizing the Central National Bank and the Security Trust and Safe Deposit Company, and upon December 12, 1884, was elected president of both institutions, which positions he held until his death. Such, in brief, was the career and the success of one of Wilmington’s repre-
NEW CASTLE COUNTY.

Following were elected managers: Edward Betts, Leonard E. Wales, Clement B. Smyth, William Canby, Joseph W. Day, Eli Todd, Edward Moore, George Bush, Dr. J. F. Vaughan, James Scott, William S. Hilles, Charles W. Howland and Thomas W. Bowers. They organized by electing William S. Hilles, President; George W. Bush, Vice-President; and John P. McLean, Secretary and Treasurer. Edward Betts, L. E. Wales, Eli Todd and Clement B. Smyth were chosen the first investigating committee. The bank opened its doors for business April 1, 1864, in a building since removed, at No. 117 Market Street, where the first meeting of stockholders and of the board of managers had been held.

The changes in the election of managers have been as follows: February 10, 1863, N. R. Benson, Henry C. Jones and William Billany were elected, and Thomas W. Bowers, Eli Todd and James Scott retired; February 14, 1865, George S. Capelle, Job H. Jackson and Henry F. Dure were elected, when William Canby, Edward Moore and Henry C. Jones retired; February 13, 1866, Edward Darlington in place of Leonard E. Wales; February 12, 1867, M. L. Lichtenstein, in place of Dr. J. F. Vaughan; February 9, 1869, William H. Swift in place of Joseph W. Day; February 8, 1870, Anthony Higgins, in place of William H. Billany; February 14, 1871, John P. McLean, in place of Edward Betts; February 10, 1874, Ewan Stotesenburg, in place of John P. McLean; February 13, 1877, William M. Field, in place of William S. Hilles; February 12, 1878, Edward Pusey and Washington Hastings, in place of William M. Field and E. C. Stotesenburg; February 12, 1884, Joseph L. Carpenter, Jr., in place of Edward Darlington; February 10, 1885, T. Allen Hilles, in place of Clement B. Smyth; February 8, 1887, C. Wesley Weldin, in place of Edward Pusey.

William S. Hilles, the first president, filled that position from the time of organization until his decease, and at the seventeenth annual meeting, held February 12, 1878, George W. Bush was elected and has since continued in that position. On the same day George S. Capelle was elected vice-president in place of George W. Bush, who was promoted. John F. McLean, the first secretary and treasurer, resigned November 9, 1872, when E. T. Taylor, the present secretary and treasurer, was elected. Joseph M. Mather is the present auditor.

Two of the present board, George W. Bush and Charles W. Howland, were members of the first board in 1861. Of the first board of managers five are deceased, viz.: Joseph W. Day, Dr. J. F. Vaughan, William S. Hilles, Eli Todd and Edward Moore.

In the year 1865 the bank was removed from No. 117 to No. 602 Market Street, and since 1873 the excellently arranged apartments in the north side of the Clayton House, on Market Street, have been occupied.

The bank has continued to prosper in its business, and fill a very important position among the financial institutions of Wilmington. The amount of deposits for 1887 was $730,000, and the general fund, or surplus, $70,000. The individual depositors number 2290, and the average for each depositor is $250. Most of the depositors are of the laboring classes.

The Security Trust and Safe Deposit Company, of Wilmington, was chartered by act of the

THE SECURITY TRUST AND SAFE DEPOSIT COMPANY BUILDING.

An eligible site at 519 Market Street was purchased of Robert Logan and sisters, and on the 25th of March, 1885, the work of removing the buildings on it was begun, preparatory to the erection of the commodious and elegant building with all the necessary conveniences of a trust and safe deposit company. It was completed in 1885, at a cost of $71,000, and is an ornament to the city, as well as a credit to the enter-

The firm of R. R. Robinson & Company, at Fourth and Market Streets, conducts a private banking business which is the oldest in the city, having been established in 1849, though the present title is but little more than twenty-five years old. The house does a general banking business, and among its principal correspondents are Drexel & Company, of Philadelphia; Drexel, Morgan & Company, of New York; De Haven & Towsend, of Philadelphia; and McKim & Company, of Baltimore. The bank, originally founded by R. R. Robinson, has always been under the active management of himself or members of his family; now by his son, H. C. Robinson.

Robert Randolph Robinson, banker and broker of Wilmington, was born in Wilmington, December 15, 1805. For many years he followed the business of a tobacconist, and continued in it until 1849, when, with his son, John N., he began the business of a banker. Together they founded the well-known Banking-House of R. R. Robinson & Co. This firm has embraced two other sons, Robert Emmett and Henry C. Robinson. The latter is now the only surviving member. Mr. Robinson was married, March 31, 1831, to Sarah Norris, of Wilmington, and had six children, viz.—John Norris, Robert Emmett, Henry C, Lydia A., who is the wife of Prof. Stansbury J. Willey, Clara and Wm. Neff, the two latter deceased. Mr. Robinson died February 17, 1885, at the advanced age of eighty. He was an exemplary citizen, and always highly respected. The firm, under the original title, is continued at Fourth and Market Streets, Wilmington. Mr. Robinson died at his residence, No. 810 Market Street.

John Norris Robinson, banker and broker, was the son of Robert Randolph Robinson. He was born in Wilmington, January 8, 1832. His early life was passed in his native city and he enjoyed its valuable advantages. His first entry into regular business was as a clerk in the employ of J. B. Glazier, whose office was located at Third and Market Streets. Subsequently he went to Philadelphia, and after a short time spent in the office of Hopkins & Co., he returned to Wilmington and established the firm of R. R. Robinson & Co., of which he continued the active head until the close of 1864. During this period, among other matters in which he took a great interest, was telegraphy, then in its infancy. He constructed the line between Wilmington and New Castle, one of the earliest in operation in this State. January 1, 1865, he left Wilmington to become a member of the firm of Drexel & Co., in Philadelphia, where he remained until 1889, during which year he was transferred to the New York house, Drexel, Winthrop & Co., and upon the formation of Drexel, Morgan & Co., in 1871, he joined that firm, continuing a partner in the New York, Philadelphia and Paris houses until he was compelled by ill health to retire from business at the close of 1874. After a year spent in Europe in the vain search for health, Mr. Robinson returned to Philadelphia, taking up his residence in that city, and spending his summers at "Glengarry," Torrendale, near Philadelphia, where he died suddenly September 13, 1878, at the age of forty-seven.

Mr. Robinson was a self-made man; one to whose untiring industry, clear business perception and integrity was due his successful business career. He was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

In November, 1856, Mr. Robinson was married to Mary, only daughter of Edward Moore, an old merchant of Wilmington. Mrs. Robinson survived her husband, and is now the wife of Mr. J. Hood Wright, of the firm of Drexel, Morgan & Co., New York.

Robert Emmett Robinson, a banker and broker of Wilmington, was a son of Robert Randolph Robinson. He was born in Wilmington, August 6, 1833, and always resided in his native city. In 1849 he entered the Banking-House of Messrs. R. R. Robinson & Co. as a clerk, and served continuously in that capacity until 1864, when he became a partner in the firm upon the withdrawal of his brother, John N. Robinson. Mr. Robinson was an active, public-spirited citizen, as well as a skillful banker. He was one of those who organized Grace Methodist Episcopal Church, and enthusiastically...

pushed forward the erection of this elegant place of worship. Later he joined heartily in its mission efforts, and took a deep interest in Epworth and Mably Chapels, both of which he did much to establish. For a long time he was a teacher in the Sunday-School of Grace Church, and for six years he was one of the trustees. He was a gentleman of many excellent, agreeable traits, and had many friends, who esteemed him for his social as well as business merits. He was married, November 11, 1856, to Maria J. Kates, daughter of Joseph L. Kates, of Wilmington, and sister of John Kates, superintendent of telegraphy at Wilmington, on the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad. He died November 23, 1875, regretted by a large circle of acquaintances. His wife and four children survive him. Three of the four are now married, and are living in Philadelphia.

The late Joshua T. Heald was one of the most prominent financiers of the city, and it is probably not an exaggeration to say that he did more to enhance the interests of Wilmington than any other one man. He projected and built the Delaware and Western Railroad, was the inaugurator of the city passenger railway service, laid out large additions to the city, called the attention of capitalists to the advantages offered here for manufacturing enterprises, and in a score of ways contributed to the development of the city. When Wilmington extends itself to the Delaware, as it inevitably must in the next few years, the student of history will find in Mr. Heald the initial impulse of that movement, though others may be accredited by superficial observers with the accomplishment of that result. Mr. Heald took a leading part in organizing the First National Bank of Wilmington and he was a director of the institution (in more than that term usually implies) until 1876. He was also instrumental in organizing the Board of Trade. In politics he was a Republican and a very active worker. He was born May 26, 1826, in Mill Creek Hundred, New Castle County, near the curving boundary line, and was the descendant of a family which settled in Chester County, Pa., shortly after the arrival of William Penn. He died in Wilmington July 22, 1887, after a short illness.

His successor and the present head of the house is Daniel W. Taylor, with whom is associated Mr. Edwin H. Gayley, both members of the original firm of Heald & Company established under that name in 1874. The house conducts a general banking and brokerage business, transacting all affairs which are known under those general titles, buying and selling all kinds of stocks and bonds, making collections, buying and selling foreign exchanges, acting as foreign steamship agents, and doing a large business in real estate and rentals. In this department the house is undoubtedly the most important in the city, their transactions probably amounting to seventy-five per cent. of the total real estate operations. The manner in which the firm is most beneficial to the city is in cutting up large estates and putting them into the market in small lots, and upon easy terms, thus enabling the humbler classes to secure houses almost as low as rent prices and developing the growth of the property owning class in a degree scarcely known in any city of the union, except Philadelphia. Although the death of Mr. Heald caused an irreparable loss to the firm (as it was also to the city) the business is carried on upon the basis which he established, and the members of the house as at present constituted having been long known to the people, possess their entire confidence.

The firm of Elliott, Johnson & Company has carried on a banking business in connection with brokerage for about fourteen years, and with few changes in its formation (the principal one being that which recently occurred, and caused very serious loss, in the death of Henry H. Johnson). The firm was established under the name of Merrick, Johnson & Company in 1874, subsequently became Craigie, Johnson & Company, and in 1876 was constituted as it at present exists and under the same firm-name, the partners being Alfred S. Elliott, Henry H. Johnson and Henry P. Scott. While conducting a general brokerage business the firm makes a specialty of State, county, city and railroad investments, and they stand high in the estimation of business men.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

WILMINGTON—(Continued).

THE COMMERCE OF WILMINGTON.

WILMINGTON enjoyed very extensive commercial interests, particularly during the last century, and at one time imports and exports comprised her largest and most important item of industry. The first vessel, of which there is any record, leaving the port of Wilmington to engage in trade with foreign countries, was the brig "Wilmington" in 1740. She was owned by Griffith Minshall, William Shipley, David Ferris, Joshua Way and others, and originally sailed out of the Christians, and down the Delaware, during the summer of 1741, laden with flour, ship-bread, white and black oak staves, butter and beef in barrels. Her destination was the Island of Jamaica. Within a year the "Wilmington" returned to port with a valuable cargo of tropical products sufficient to meet the demands of the people of Wilmington and surrounding country. The "Wilmington" made several successful voyages and encouraged a traffic with foreign countries, which grew to large proportions. With the Revolutionary War it languished and did not revive to any considerable extent until 1789.

Nearly all of the leading citizens, from 1741 to 1775, owned or were interested in one or more sailing-vessels, the majority of which were built at home. In 1750, Thomas Willing built the first sloop packet that ran between this port and Philadelphia. Joseph Tatnall, Joseph Shalcross, Jacob Broom, Job Harvey and others were prominent shipping merchants here before the Revolution, and were engaged in trade with other countries. William Woodcock and Barney Harris were ship-builders, and merchant traders of considerable note. John Harris succeeded them. Simon Cranson as early as 1720 made small brigs at Stanton, and sailed them from there. James Latimer, who settled early last century at Newport, carried on an extensive business in flour. It was brought from Lancaster County in the old-time Conestoga wagons, and was shipped from his wharf to Philadelphia. About the same time the Lancaster teams began to come to Wilmington, and continued for nearly a century to bring the products of that fertile agricultural region for shipment. Isaac Harvey owned several brigs and schooners, and did a large business. From his wharf, now owned by George W. Bush & Co., many vessels sailed subsequent to 1750. Captain Mendenhall succeeded to the ownership of this wharf, engaging in the flour traffic, and running his packets to Philadelphia, where he found a market. The principal part of the flour shipped by him came from Lancaster County. As many as thirty wagons remained overnight in his yard, which was above Front Street and extended from Walnut to French Street, near the old Foul Anchor Inn. John Froudary at that time owned a wharf below Harvey's and ran a packet to Philadelphia. He lived on the corner of French and Walnut Streets, and at high-tide the water surrounded his house. Capt. Samuel Bush bought this wharf. Joseph Shalcross, a large shipper, owned the adjacent wharf up the stream. Wm. Hemphill succeeded him and engaged in foreign commerce. About 1812 he retired and lived in a handsome residence on Market Street. He died February 10, 1823, aged eighty years.

Robinson's wharf, now owned by Charles Warner, was the fourth in order up stream prior to the Revolution. Robinson was a sea captain early in life, and later a shipping merchant. He built a large residence on Front Street, where he died before reaching middle age. Jonathan Rumphord, an extensive shipper in 1780, and for many years prior, owned the wharf immediately above the draw-bridge.

George Taylor, a Hollander, who died wealthy, in 1787, lived here and ran a packet to New York. In 1792, Eleazer McComb, of Dover, bought the Rumphord property, fitted up the mansion in elegant style, and, with Colonel Tilton, conducted a trade in flour, in conjunction with a line of packets up and down the Delaware. In 1793, during the yellow fever scourge in Philadelphia, Mr. Wilcox, one of the leading shipping merchants of that city, brought the majority of his vessels to Philadelphia and made his home with Mr. McComb. The latter, together with his wife, died of the yellow fever in 1798.

In 1789 the following vessels belonging to merchants in Wilmington were actively engaged in the West India trade: The schooner "Isabella," Capt. Parks; the schooner "Pratt," Capt. Thomas Mendenhall; sloop "Hannah," Capt. Samuel Lovering; brig "Polly and Betsey," Capt. Andrew Norris; sloop "Industry," Capt. Hill; sloop "Sukey and Polly," Capt. Ingham; sloop "Hope," Capt. T. Newbold; sloop "Polly," Capt. Condgon; brig "Manuton," Capt. Staunton; brig "Maria," Capt. Fort; brig "Keziah," Captain Collins. A number of vessels at the same time were engaged in trade with Ireland, among them the brig "Brothers," Capt. James Jeffers; brig "Keziah," Capt. Brown; brig "Maria," Capt. Fort; brig "Sophia," Capt. T. Thomason; ship "Happy Return," Capt. Erwin; and ship "Nancy," Capt. Crawford. They were laden with flour and other American products, and brought back Irish linen, window-glass and glassware. Emigrants were also frequently brought over. For several years after this period, says Benjamin Ferris, "the foreign trade from this port continued to increase, particularly with Ireland. Several ships, from three hundred to four hundred tons burden, were owned in Wilmington. One object of this trade was the transportation of emigrants, of whom great numbers in early days were brought into this port." 4

In 1799, James Brian purchased the McComb estate. Brian was a native of Ireland, and came to this country about fifteen years before. Soon after his arrival he joined the Society of Friends. He was afterwards one of the leading shipping merchants, engaging largely in the West India and Nova Scotia trade. He also owned the packet "Sarah Ann," which plied for many years between Wilmington and Philadelphia. His wife died in 1802, of yellow fever. He died in 1817. John Stapler, his son-in-law, succeeded him in business.

The coasting trade with the Eastern States and with Nova Scotia was very extensive about 1800 and before. Numerous vessels came into Wilmington from coasting ports, with plaster of Paris, smoked salmon and other varieties of fish, and potatoes.

3 Among these emigrants were what were known as "Redemptioners," people who pledged their labors for two or three years in the new country to the captain in return for their passage. On their arrival in America the captain bound them out for the specified period to reimburse himself. Many of these redemptioners became useful citizens and some were afterwards among the most useful and respected residents of the State.

4 In this connection it may be stated that the West Indian traffic developed a passenger feature which was not so pleasant an addition to the colony. In 1760 a two-masted vessel, laden with colored slaves, and by their British owners from the West Indies dropped, anchor at the mouth of the Christians, and the following year another cargo of them arrived. An early writer describes the appearance of a gang of thirty or more of these human beings fresh from Africa, driven through the streets of Wilmington like so many animals and offered for sale. There the conservative planter at that time experienced no complications in buying slaves, as some of them were slave-owners a century ago.

5 James McCartney, a nephew of Brian, conducted the old "Sign of the Conestoga Wagon" Tavern, on Front Street, opposite Thorn Street, which was a popular hostelry with the Lancaster tamilers.

They returned with cargoes of flour, corn, meal and grain.1

Prior to the War of 1812, beef, pork, flour, grain and cheese were exported in large quantities from Wilmington. After the war, the home demand was so great that the foreign trade declined, and agricultural interest grew correspondingly. The Brandywine Mills, in 1814, owned nine sloop's of from forty to sixty tons, and used them in shipping flour to Philadelphia and elsewhere.2

The Western Transportation Line was established in 1827, between Philadelphia and Baltimore, via Wilmington and Elkton.

An interesting ceremony incident to the early commerce of Wilmington was that of "Chaining the Captain." It was a compliment extended to a popular skipper at the end of a successful voyage. An arm-chair was procured from "The Foul Anchor Inn," or at Captain O'Flynn's tavern, at Third and Market Streets, two poles attached to it, and the skipper was carried triumphantly up Market and down King Street, followed by his cheering crew.

An important factor in the commercial interests of Wilmington during the present century was the Wilmington Whaling Company, organized November 23, 1833.3 Up to this time the whaling industry had been confined almost exclusively to New England, but the demand for sperm and whale oil became great and the profits large; this induced capitalists to go into the business. The Wilmington Company organized with a capital stock of one hundred thousand dollars and the following directors: Edward Tatnall, James Canby, James Price, James G. Howland, C. I. Du Pont, S. B. Davis, John Gordon, David C. Wilson, Robert Porter, George Bush, Mahlon Betts, Jonathan Bonney, William Chandler, William Seal, John Wales, Stephen Bonsall, James W. Thompson, Henry Whitely, George Jones, Thomas Newlin, Thomas H. Larkin, Miller Dunott, John Rice, John Wright and William P. Brobdon. Beyond disposing of their stock, this board did not accomplish anything definite. On January 23, 1836, the company was chartered with an authorized capital of three hundred thousand dollars, and reorganized with twenty-five directors, some of whom were Philadelphia.

The prominent figure in connection with the commerce of Wilmington was Paul Coffee, whose father was an African slave and his mother an Indian. Paul adopted a sea faring life at a very early age and developed unusual intelligence and business capacity. He soon owned a sloop and engaged in the coasting trade. Next he became the owner of a schooner, then a brig and eventually a large ship, with a crew of colored men, which was a novelty in that age. Later in life he became well-known at American and foreign ports. He was frequently in Wilmington, where he stood high and spent much of his time. He joined the Society of Friends there and sometimes "spoke in meeting." James Brian was his intimate friend and had extensive business relations with him, as did also General John Stockton and Isaac Craig. Coffee was an advocate of civilization among the negroes. He owned a house in Sierra Leone. He is known in history as the most intelligent of his race and day.

The brig "Mermaid," four hundred and fifty tons, was the best Wilmington vessel in the foreign trade. She made her final voyage about 1800.

Whaling vessels sailed from Wilmington to the South Pacific and returned with oil as early as 1800, but their cargoes were small and the industry never amounted to much until the Wilmington Whaling Company went into operation.

1 Captain Edward Ayres was the only master in the employ of the company that settled in Wilmington. He subsequently sailed from New York and made two voyages around the globe. During the late Civil War, while on a voyage to China, his vessel, the "Tycoon," was captured by the Confederate cruiser "Alabama," and all of his effects were confiscated. Captain Ayres died of yellow fever in Galveston, Texas, in 1881, and his heirs were awarded thirty-two hundred dollars by the Alabama Claims Commission.

oil were unable to get up to their wharf, which was located where Pusey, Jones & Co.’s ship-yards now are. The ships were anchored at the mouth of the Christiana, where a portion of the cargo was discharged, and they afterward went up lightered. In order to deepen the channel, Congress was appealed to in 1836, and appropriated fifteen thousand dollars “for improvement of the Harbor at the port of Wilmington.” Of this amount the City Council of Wilmington, through a committee consisting of William R. Sellars, William Chandler and Thomas Young, expended fourteen thousand dollars in a dredging-machine made at the ship-yard of John Harris, under the supervision of Captain Alexander Kelley, now connected with the Harlan & Hollingsworth Company, who was sent by the committee to Baltimore to inspect the dredges then at work there. A force of men, under the charge of Captain Kelley, were then engaged during the summer months for three years in dredging the Christiana. Meantime, other appropriations were made by Congress. Up to 1880 the work of improving the harbor was confined to dredging, at a total cost of $106,156, and a twelve-foot low-water channel was maintained. In 1890 Congress directed a survey of the Christiansa, from the Delaware Railroad bridge to its mouth, and the estimated cost of establishing a mean depth of fifteen feet. This contemplated the building of a jetty at the entrance to the harbor and dredging the channel above to fifteen feet and from fifty to one hundred and fifty feet wide. This work has been in progress since 1881, and up to 1887 the government appropriated $150,750 toward it. The jetty was finished in 1881, and since, a limited amount of dredging has been required to maintain a fifteen-foot channel, which, in 1887, was made seventy-five feet wide from Market Street Bridge to a point within two hundred feet of the outer end of the jetty entrance. In addition to the funds contributed by the government ($259,906), since 1887, considerable sums have been expended by individual enterprise. There has been in Wilmington, since 1884, an office which controls the improvements of harbors and rivers in the district of Delaware, with General William F. Smith in charge.

Following is a list of the several collectors of customs at the port of Wilmington up to the present time:

- George Bush 3
- Allen McLean
- Henry Whiteley
- Arnold Naudain, M.D.
- James Young

1 The harbor of Little Lake, in the rear of the site of Fort Christiansa (near the foot of Seventh Street of the present), was filled up in 1820. It was here the first Swedish settlers landed in 1686. Old Ferry Point, foot of Third Street, and the point opposite extended into the stream in early times, and were called the Capes of Christiansa. In 1790 there was quite a stream emptied in the river at the corner of what is now Second and Orange Streets, and there was a mill on it operated by water-power.

2 The date of the appointment of Major Bush is not known. His first account was filed October 1, 1790, and his last February 28, 1797, the year of his death. The accounts of Col. Allen McLean began March 1, 1797, and closed June 7, 1825. President Andrew Jackson, after his inauguration sent Col. McLean word that “to the victors belong the spoils” and appointed his political friend, Col. Henry Whiteley, of Newark, to succeed him. Nathaniel Young resigned April 19, 1849, and Wm. P. Brobson died during his incumbency.

Dr. E. A. Smith was port physician in 1795; Dr. James Tilton, Jr., was appointed in 1803; Dr. William Brinckle in 1824; Dr. L. P. Bush in 1840; Dr. H. F. Askew in 1853, and Dr. Willard Sprunger is present incumbent. The appointment is a life office in the gift of the Governor.

The exports from the District of Delaware in 1811, the largest proportion being from Wilmington, aggregated $88,623, of which $75,945 were domestic articles; tonnage for the same year, $192. The exports of domestic articles from Wilmington in 1846, were $113,683; in 1847, $250,686.

Collector Brobson’s report of expenses of his department for the year ending January, 1849, was:

| Amount expended in collector's department, $1447; maintaining thirteen light-houses from Cape Henlopen to Fort Mifflin, $6208; floating lights, $4821; beacons and buoys, $5852; inspections and measures, $4394; total, $20,316. Revenue marine service: Schooner “Forward,” Capt. Henry B. Nones, four lieutenant, three second lieutenants, fifty seamen and twenty-five attendants, $6876; Schooner “Gallant,” captain, two lieutenants, thirty seamen and eighteen attendants, $4749. The revenue service was removed during Collector Nolen’s term to Philadelphia.

The number of vessels and total tonnage owned and recorded in Wilmington for the years 1882 to 1887 was 1882, vessels 165, tonnage 16,668; 1883, vessels 177, tonnage 17,877; 1884, vessels 181, tonnage 19,964; 1885, vessels 186, tonnage 19,945; 1886, vessels 176, tonnage 16,750; 1887, vessels 120, tonnage 16,412.

The total operations of the port for 1885 aggregated $18,181,000 for the year, and in June 30, 1887, $15,826,000.

The custom house was originally at New Castle, but was removed to Wilmington about 1800. For nearly a half century thereafter, it was located in a small-rented building on Water Street, between Market and King streets, where G. W. Stone’s store is now. It remained there until the building corner Sixth and King Streets was erected.

The first steamboat to ply between Wilmington and Philadelphia was the “Vestal,” which was launched at Grice’s ship-yard in Philadelphia, April 23, 1812, and made a trial trip the succeeding day. George Coxen was captain and part owner. The arrival of the “Vestal” was the occasion of much enthusiasm and hundreds of citizens visited her at the wharf. She was called the “Vesta” after 1815. Captain Milner commanded her in 1818.

The steamboat “Delaware” was put on the river
August 20, 1814, to run between Wilmington and Philadelphia "during the stoppage of the intercourse by water to Baltimore by the British."

The "Superior" was built in 1820 and put in charge of Captain Milner. It took her eight hours to go to Philadelphia, and two days were required for the trip. The fare to Philadelphia was one dollar. Captain Henry Read ran her for several years. She was owned by the Wilmington Steamboat Company of which William Young was president. Captain Read afterwards commanded the "Wilmington," built in 1829, at Philadelphia, and owned by the same company. In 1836 he retired and took the Indian King Hotel at Fourth and Market Streets. Captain Black took charge of the "Wilmington."

Wilmer Whildin was one of the most successful steamboat captains on the river half a century ago. In 1829 he opened Cape May Point as a seaside resort and built a hotel there. The same year he commenced to run the steamer "Emerald" from Philadelphia to Cape May Point, charging only seventy-five cents for the trip. The "Emerald" afterwards ran from Philadelphia to Wilmington. In 1835 he bought the "New Castle," and his son, W. Whildin, Jr., who was educated for a physician became her captain. The same year the "Linesa," Captain Bilderbach, was put on the river. The "New Castle" in 1836, was the first boat to make the round trip to Philadelphia the same day, resulting in active competition between the various boats and the newly constructed railroad. The latter put the fare down to twelve and one-half cents and the steamboats for several months carried passengers at ten cents.

George Thom was engineer of the steamer "Baltimore" and afterwards of the "Emerald" and "Delaware." He was born in Aberdeen, Scotland, in 1795, came to this country in 1822, and is still living on Justison Street, Wilmington, at the age of ninety-three. He superintended the construction of a number of engines at the works of Thomas Holloway in Philadelphia.

Captain Douglass ran the "Robert Morris" up and down the river in 1838; Captain J. L. Robinson on the "Balloo" in 1842; Captain Whildin, the "Sun" in 1843.

The "W. Whildin," named after its original owner, was the first iron steamboat with side wheels to run in the Delaware. It was built about 1841, and ran between Philadelphia and Wilmington. The "Whildin" was enlarged in 1846 and is now running between Baltimore and Philadelphia as one of the Ericsson Line.

The steamboat Balloon and the Rainbow, in 1843, charged twelve and one-half cents between Wilmington and Philadelphia.

The steamer E. I. Dupont, launched from Harris' ship yard in February, 1845, had a double propeller and a sixteen-inch cylinder, equal to a ninety horsepower engine.

Captain Whildin, in 1846 bought the Napoleon and put her on between Philadelphia and Smyrna Landing. In 1848 he owned a controlling interest in the Balloon, Robert Morris, Ohio and Sun, but sold the Sun to Capt. Douglass the same year for $27,500. He bought the Pioneer in 1849 and gave Captain Robinson charge of her.

The Zephyr ran between New Castle and Dover Landing in 1848. In 1829 the New Jersey Steamboat Company commenced to run small boats from Wilmington to the Jersey shore, to accommodate market people, and sold them in 1838. The Bolivar, a large boat, was next put on and run until 1847, when she was transferred to the Gulf of Mexico. Captain Wilson Fierson was given charge of the Enterprise on this line April 27th of the same year. The Gospert, Captain Baker, was enlarged in 1850. The Telegraph, a fine steamboat, was owned by Captain Whildin.

The "Alice E. Preston" ran for a while between Pensacroge, New Jersey, and Fourth Street Wharf, Wilmington, when she was succeeded by the "Sussie McCall," under Captain Denney. The "McCall" ran until December, 1887, when she was sold, and is now (1888) plying in Southern waters.

The Oregon was a handsome new steamboat, put on the line between Philadelphia and Baltimore in 1849, and the Mountaineer began to ply between Philadelphia, Wilmington and Cape May, the same year. The Montana and the Napoleon were fine river boats then. The Nebraska, built by Thomas Young in 1849, was a steam propeller for the New York and Baltimore line. The engine was made by Harlan and Hollingsworth. The Napoleon, Captain Ball, took the place of the Baltimore, between Smyrna and Philadelphia. The Santa Clara and Eldorado, each one hundred and forty feet long, twenty feet beam, three hundred tons, were made by Thomas Young for Aspinwall & Co., for the line from Philadelphia to California during the "gold fever."

Captain J. L. Robinson, of the Pioneer and Balloon, in 1850 bought the steamer "Cohansey" and turned it into a "down river boat." The iron steamer California, one hundred and fifty feet long, twenty-seven feet beam and eleven feet hold, was built by Harlan and Hollingsworth in 1850.

"The Ariel" ran between Wilmington and Philadelphia, and was succeeded, in 1866, by the "Samuel M. Felton," which continued to run until 1886. This year an explosion took place and, upon the repairing of the boat, she was taken off the line. The boat was the property of the Philadelphia and Wilmington Steamboat Company, and was, for a time, the only opposition to the railroad company. After a few years the railroad company purchased a controlling interest in the former, and the boat was run in the company's interest. When the railroad bridge on the Brandywine was washed away in the freshet of 1889, the boat ran night and day transferring passengers across the river. The "Felton" was built by Reaney, Son & Archbold, of Chester, in 1866, and for a time was the fastest boat on the Delaware River. She was the fleetest steamer.
on the river in 1869-70, and when the "John Sylvester" and "Eliza A. Hancock" were put on as opposition boats, made the fastest time between Philadelphia and Wilmington. At this time the fare was reduced to ten cents one way, and fifteen cents the round trip. The "Felton" withstood all opposition, and, in 1870, it was withdrawn. The "Felton" was without opposition until the propeller "Wilmington," owned by J. Shields Wilson and others of Philadelphia, was placed on the route, and has been running ever since. In 1885, the "Brandywine," a companion boat, and one of the fastest propellers in the country, was built by the Harlan & Hollingsworth Company for the same parties. A third boat, the "City of Chester," is now in course of construction for the same company, and will be placed on the line in 1888. For several months, in 1888, M. Green Wright & Co., of New York, placed the "Morrisania" on the river to run between Wilmington and Philadelphia. She was succeeded by the "Shady Side," and, for a time, Wilmington had three steamboat lines to Philadelphia. The "Shady Side" was discontinued, and the only boats that ran in 1887 were the "Wilmington," Captain Peter Bloomsburg, and the "Brandywine," Captain Horace Wilson.

The first board of trade of Wilmington was organized January 3, 1837. David C. Wilson was chosen president, Jacob Alrichs, vice-president, William Chandler, treasurer, and Jonas Pusey, secretary. The first directors were C. I. Du Pont, Jonathan Bonney, Samuel B. Wheeler, Samuel Buby, Washington Rice, Vincent Gilpin, Edward Grubb, John Bancroft, Thomas Young, Stephen Bonsall, George Bush, Allan Thomson, James Canby, Mahlon Betts, F. H. Larkins, Thomas Garrett, Eliasha Huxley and John Wright.

At the first business meeting of the board James Canby offered a resolution, which was passed, favoring the removal of obstructions from the bed of the Christiana Creek, so as to make it navigable for large vessels. A resolution was at the same time adopted advocating the extension of the city limits so as to include the mouth of the Christiana, and a memorial with three hundred and sixty signatures was sent to Congress asking for the improvement of the wharves, and the appropriation of funds for the erection of a custom-house in Wilmington. This Board had an active existence for several years. In 1850 David C. Wilson was president, Jonas Pusey and John A. Duncan, vice-presidents, Joshua T. Head, secretary, and George Richardson, treasurer.

The Wilmington Board of Trade was organized October 27, 1868, Edward Betts, was elected president, Francis Barry, vice-president, George W. Stone, secretary and James Bradford, treasurer. The board of managers, were Edward Betts, Josiah T. Head, Casper Kendall, George Richardson, George W. Bush, C. Feibiger, Victor Du Pont, Howard M. Jenkins, E. Tatnall Warner, Mr., Washington Jones, Henry B. Seidel, William M. Kennard, George G. Lobdell, Lea Pusey, James Morrow, James Lewis, Eli Garrett, Charles Moore, William G. Gibbons, Henry F. Finmegan, Caleb P. Johnson, William H. Swift, James Morrow, Job H. Jackson. The object of this board was "for mutual counsel and deliberation on the business interests, manufacture, commerce and trade of the city." The first effort of the board was to arouse an interest in the erection of a large hotel building. E. T. Warner, Jr., J. T. Head and William G. Gibbons, were appointed a committee to present plans for it, who recommended that the subject be referred to the Wilmington Hotel Company, chartered in 1867.

James Bradford and H. M. Jenkins, were elected representatives and attended the meeting of the National Board of Trade in Cincinnati, December 2, 1868. The same year George Richardson, William H. Swift and George W. Stone, were sent as representatives to the opening ceremonies of the Hall of the Commercial Exchange, in Philadelphia. A resolution was almost unanimously adopted by this Board, recommending the repeal of usurp laws of the State.

George G. Lobdell, Francis Barry and George W. Stone, were appointed to visit the State Senate, then in session, and ask that the tax bill passed by the House of Representatives be altered so as to decrease the heavy demands its final passage would have on the manufacturing interests of Wilmington. Through the efforts of this board the bill was modified.

In 1870 Geo. Bush was president. The new managers elected to take the place of others who retired were D. H. Kent, H. C. McLean, T. Y. de Normandie, H. F. Pickels, Geo. R. Townsend and D. W. Taylor. The delegates to the National Board of Trade at Richmond, Virginia, were Francis Barry and W. H. Swift. The port-wardens elected were Francis Barry, Charles Moore and E. T. Warner. In January of this year, J. T. Head, G. W. Bush and George G. Lobdell, members of this board, with a Committee of City Council, visited Washington, and through Representative Biggs, obtained an interview with the Congressional Committee on Appropriations, which resulted in the government granting fifteen thousand dollars for an examination and survey of the harbor of the Christiana. Alfred Lears, civil engineer, in April, 1870, read an interesting paper before the board on "The Improvement of the Harbor of Wilmington." The extension of the streets of the city to the Delaware river was the next topic discussed. "American Commerce and Shipbuilding" was a subject of frequent discussion. On May 10, 1870, the board petitioned Congress to enact such measures as shall encourage the building of vessels in the ship-yards of this country, at prices which will enable American ship owners to successfully compete with those in foreign countries for the commerce of the world.

The opening of the Wilmington and Northern Railroad, June 15 and 16, 1870, was conducted under the auspices of the Wilmington Board of Trade, by invitation of Hugh E. Steele, president of the road. The exercises of the 15th were held in the rooms of the board, northeast corner of Third and Market Streets. The City Council of Reading was present, and prominent citizens from other towns and cities,—all of whom were hospitably entertained. In the evening a complimentary supper was given in Institute Hall. After the banquet speeches were made by Hugh E. Steele, Frederick Lauer and Heister Clymer, of Reading; Dr. Charles Huston, of Coatesville; Henry S. Evans, of West Chester; C. W. Wright, Secretary of State; Dr. Franklin Taylor, of West Chester; Joshua Valentine, mayor of Wilmington, and George W. Bush. The following day a trip was made over the new railroad, stopping at Coatesville for dinner, and arriving in Reading at two P.M., when the party was received by Mayor Gernand, of that city, and a banquet was given in the Mansion House. The opening of the railroad created a bond of union between Reading and Wilmington, which has since been maintained.

E. T. Tatnall Warner was president and William H. Swift vice-president in 1871. Among the new members of the board of managers were W. S. Auchincloss, T. S. Bellah, J. N. Cooling, J. Taylor Gause, Washington Hastings, W. Y. Warner and Henry S. McComb. A resolution was passed advocating the widening of Water Street sufficient to accommodate the wants of railroads. This was accomplished.

J. T. Heald and W. H. Swift were delegates to the meeting of the National Board of Trade at Buffalo. They were instructed to bring up the subject of Civil Service Reform before that body. They did, and secured the passage of a series of resolutions favoring it. The Wilmington Board next passed resolutions advocating the removal of the county buildings to Wilmington. The question of State taxation and representation in the Legislature was next discussed. The new hotel, the project of the erection of which was freely discussed by the board two years before, was now in course of erection.

In 1872 Henry S. McComb was president, and Preston Lea vice-president. George W. Stone was secretary and James Bradford treasurer since time of organization. George S. Capelle, W. T. Crossdale, F. N. Buck and George A. Le Maistre were new directors. This was a year of business prosperity. Nearly every enterprise advocated by the Board of Trade the year before was pushed to completion. The meeting-place of the board was moved to newly-furnished apartments in Masonic Temple. The proposition to hold an industrial exposition met with great public favor, but was not held until the fall of 1874 in Third Street Market-House. The board in 1872 had seventy-five members; a new constitution was adopted, and the rooms in Masonic Temple for a time were open daily.

After 1873 the board did not hold regular meetings, nor put forth as vigorous an effort to the accomplishment of its aims as during the years immediately preceding. The depression in the business affairs of the country was deeply felt in Wilmington at this time. Meetings were held, however, and better sewerage for the city, a more satisfactory water supply, extension of the city limits and other subjects relating to the public needs were discussed with effect.

One important good accomplished in recent years by the board was its advocacy and finally securing the passage by the Legislature of the Port Warden Bill. Appropriations of recent years by Congress for the improvement of the harbor of Wilmington were obtained largely through the energetic measures of this body.

Preston Lea was elected president in 1873, Henry Mendenhall in 1875, George S. Capelle in 1877, F. N. Buck in 1881. E. A. Van Trump succeeded George W. Stone as secretary in 1875. The port wardens are Alexander Kelly, Job H. Jackson, Joshua L. Pusey, James Bradford, Enoch Moore, Jr. The rooms of the board since 1882 have been in the Exchange Building at Seventh and Market Streets.

At the last annual election Daniel W. Taylor was chosen president, George W. Bush, Jr., vice-president, E. A. Van Trump, secretary, and James Bradford, treasurer. The membership has been increased, and the board has again become an active and energetic organization.

Col. Henry S. McComb, the successful manufacturer and great railroad operator, was born in Wilmington, July 28, 1825, and died December 30, 1881. He was of Scotch-Irish descent, and inherited the excellent traits and strong characteristics of worthy and highly respected ancestors. He was the second of a family of five children, whose father died when he was quite young, and the care and protection of the children, devolved upon the mother, a woman possessed of many noble qualities of mind and heart, and who was earnestly devoted to the welfare of those under her charge.

But few of the early years of Col. McComb were spent in school, as he was required to assist in the common support of the family. When but a boy he became an employee in the office of the Delaware Journal, and a year or two later was apprenticed to learn the trade of currier. He acquired a knowledge of his new occupation so rapidly that he was enabled to buy two years from the face of his indenture papers, and was free at the age of eighteen years. In the meantime he had been a diligent student, and spent all his leisure time at home with his books and improved every opportunity for mental culture. He next became journeyman with a prominent leather-dealer, in Wilmington, and by judicious management, and by saving his earnings soon bought out the establishment of his employer, and just as he entered upon his manhood, began his brilliant and successful business career. By means of his intelligent mental grasp of every situation in which he was placed, by dint of his surpassing energy and untiring devotion to his business, he succeeded in everything he undertook. At twenty-five he was recognized as one of the foremost business men of Wilmington, and at thirty had surpassed nearly all his competitors in trade. He continued in this leather trade with the greatest success, continually enlarging and expanding his business, until he became known as one of the most extensive manufacturers, in his line, in this country.

He was a staunch defender of the Union at the outbreak of the Civil War. He held a number of very important contracts from the Government for the manufacture of tents, knapsacks, etc., and filled them with such promptness and satisfaction, that he secured the strong friendship of President Lincoln, Secretary of War Stanton, and the other members of the Cabinet. When a Military Governor was ordered for Delaware, the commission was made out to Col. McComb, but he advised against it, and no such governor was appointed. He then raised, and equipped at his own expense, the Fifth Delaware Regiment, of which he was Colonel.

After the close of the Civil War he became interested in a number of railroads. He was one of the originators of the Union Pacific Railroad, and took an active part in the construction of this great highway. In 1868 the Mississippi Central Railroad came under his control and put into operation a trunk line between New Orleans and Cairo, Illinois, by securing control of the New Orleans, Jackson and Great Northern Railroad. The complete consolidation of these roads was effected July 4, 1873, the trunk line extending a distance of six hundred miles. In 1870 he bought six thousand acres of land along this route, about one hundred and five miles from New Orleans. It was covered with valuable pine timber. On part of this land now stands McComb City, with a population of thirty-five hundred.

The successful railroad operations of Colonel McComb in the South brought him into intimate intercourse with the leading men of the South, as well as the entire country. Besides being president of the railroads mentioned above, he was president of the Southern Railroad Association, and he was interested in various lines of railroads in the North and West. He was also president of the Narragansett Steamship Co. running the Bristol line of steamships between New York and Boston.

When he became president of the Great Northern and Mississippi Railroads they were burdened with debt and out of repair. Within three years he put over five hundred and fifty miles in complete order, extended the business of the roads, which greatly developed the resources of the country through which they passed, and added much to the material wealth of the South. The bonds of the company in the meantime passed from seventy to one hundred, their par value.

In 1880 he purchased a controlling interest in the Delaware and Western Railroad, procured an amended charter for it, and made this road necessary to the projected through line to New York. It was greatly through the instrumentality of Colonel McComb that the exposures of the Credit Mobilier scheme were made.

Colonel McComb was a man of commanding presence, magnificent physique, being six feet two inches tall. He was possessed of great magnetism, had a pleasing address and great suavity of manners. He was genial, affable and courteous. These qualities made him very popular and greatly contributed to his success in life.

In politics he was a Republican and earnestly advocated the policy and principles of the Republican party.

In his youth he attended the Hanover Presbyterian Church of Wilmington, and later was a member of the Central Presbyterian Church of the same city in which he always resided.

Colonel McComb was married to Elizabeth McKean Bush, daughter of Charles Bush, of Wilmington, on the 16th of June, 1853. The children born of this marriage were Charles Bush (deceased), Ellen Bush (deceased), James Craig, Jane Elizabeth and Martha McComb.

Transportation Lines.—The transportation house of Messrs. George W. Bush & Sons is one of the oldest in any line of business in the city of Wilmington, its inception antedating the Revolution, and the continuity of its existence being unbroken from the outstart to the present. There was just a trifle of romance in the establishment of this business house over a century ago. Samuel Bush, the founder, son of Charles Bush, a West India importer, having been born in 1747—December 27th—was in 1778 twenty-six years of age, and it so happened in that year he fell in love with and became engaged to Ann McKee, the daughter of Andrew McKee, one of the old settlers, a resident of Brandywine Hundred and the owner of broad, well-tilled acres there,—a man of substance and character and influence. His daughter, too, had influence, at least with young Bush, and she exerted it in the matter of inducing her lover to abandon a sea-faring life. Now, Samuel Bush knew more about the sea and ships than of any other matters in the world, for at the age of sixteen he had sailed on board of one of the West India vessels, and he had followed the sea for several years, going out several times as captain, and yet he readily enough abandoned his chosen and well-liked calling, at the simple request of Ann McKee. Casting about for other means of making a living, he conceived the idea that he could create and build up a business by trading and freighting between Wilmington and Philadelphia, and, with this object in view, early in 1774 he bought a little sloop of thirty tons burthen, which naturally enough he named the “Ann.” With this little craft, the energetic and hopeful young man started a weekly line between the two towns, and laid the foundation for the great commercial operations of successive generations of his descendants. His plan was to take to Philadelphia the produce collected by storekeepers and others in Wilmington and dispose of it, and also to fill orders for Wilmington merchants, thus making a freight both ways and a small commission besides. This was something altogether new to the business men of the town. Previously to 1774, when Samuel Bush began sailing the “Ann,” there had been no regular communication between Wilmington and Philadelphia. It was a day’s journey from one town to the other, either by land or water, and hence the journey was not often made. Merchants were accustomed to go up to the Quaker City in the spring and fall to buy their stocks of goods, and chartering sloops to bring them down, occasionally making the trip by land, when they needed things between the regular buying seasons; but Bush’s enterprise changed all of this. The people of Wilmington were not slow to find out the conveniences of the new plan and to enter heartily into it,—so that it was a success from the outset, but only in a small way. The breaking out of the War of the Revolution unsettled all business; but Captain Bush found full employment for his sloop carrying stores and produce for the army. When, in September, 1777, after the battle of the Brandywine, the British fleet came up the Delaware River and occupied Philadelphia, they chased his sloop so closely that he was compelled to run into a creek on the Jersey side and scuttle her, to prevent her capture and destruction. After the British evacuated Philadelphia he raised and refitted the sloop, and again commenced freighting on the river as before. By this time the millers and distillers of Lancaster and Chester Counties, Pa., had found out that it was much cheaper for them to send their produce to Wilmington, and ship it thence to Philadelphia, than to send it, as they had always before done, direct to the city in wagons. To give them easy access to Wilmington, turnpikes were built out in all directions as far as the State line. The success of the shipping enterprise being recognized, and also the fact that the “Ann” was getting all the freight she could carry, another sloop was started from French Street wharf by John Foudrey, who continued the business until about 1790, when he sold out his whole property, from the river to Front Street, to Captain Bush.

Finding the “Ann” too small for the trade now offering, Captain Bush built a new sloop, of about double her tonnage, which he called the “Nancy” after the brig whose tragical fate created so much excitement in this part of the country. She was fitted up to carry passengers as well as freight, the passage money being a charge that would now be equal to fifty cents. The merchants of Wilmington being offered this convenience, soon began to go to Philadelphia to buy their goods in person, instead of sending orders as they had done heretofore. For some time they took with them their provisions for the trip, but after a year or so the convenience of having their meals prepared upon the sloop became generally appreciated and thus one of the now common features of travel by water was duly inaugurated. The charge was twenty-five cents for breakfast or supper and fifty cents for dinner, and as it usually took from six to nine hours to make the trip, the cost was from a dollar to a dollar and a quarter. A large bell hung upon the store-house signaled the hour of departure, which was so arranged as to take advantage of the tides, and the friends of those going up to the city accompanied them to the wharf to see them off and say good-bye, much as in these days is done on the departure of ocean steamships for Europe.

Mr. Bush soon found it would be more profitable to him to hire a captain for the sloop and himself remain at home to receive and deliver the freight and to attend to the other business, which was becoming quite extended. Consequently engaging Captain Milner to sail the sloop and placing his son David, then a lad of fourteen or fifteen years, on board to look after the business in Philadelphia, he established a regular mercantile business on French Street wharf, not only freighting to Philadelphia, but buying all kinds of produce and shipping it on his own account to Philadelphia, New York or the West Indies, as he could find the best market. He also kept in store such articles as the people of the surrounding county had need of,—flour, salt, fish, plaster of Paris, etc., etc.,—and soon had a flourishing trade.

About the year 1794, Captain Milner, in company with some other persons, started a sloop of his own for trading between the two towns, and Samuel Bush promoted his son David to the captaincy of the “Nancy.” In the year 1801 he took his son Charles into business, and he remained until his death in 1804, when David Bush took his place, but continued in command of the sloop for nearly twenty years afterward. Another sloop, the "Mary Ann," was built, and a semi-weekly line was put in operation. The firm, as thus constituted, remained unchanged until about 1820, when Samuel Bush, then in his seventy-fourth year, retired from the business, and George, his youngest son, took his place, the firm-name being changed to that of David & George Bush, which name it retained, with one short interruption, until the year 1846, when David Bush, in his seventy-first year, gave up his share of the business to his youngest son, George W., and the firm-name was changed to George & George W. Bush. The senior member of the firm died in 1863, but the business was continued by George W. Bush. In 1873 George W. Bush took into partnership his oldest son, Walter D., who had been raised in the business, and the firm became George W. Bush & Son. Again, in 1882, George W. Bush, Jr., a younger son, was admitted to the firm, and the present name was adopted, viz.: George W. Bush & Sons. The transportation business of the present firm has grown to large dimensions, and though it is scarcely to be recognized as the modest business commenced by Samuel Bush one hundred and fourteen years ago, yet its growth has proportioned itself naturally to the growth of the city of whose history it has for so long a time been a part. The warehouses, barges, tug-boats and wharves now used by the firm in the transactions of their business, both in Wilmington and Philadelphia, have materially assisted Wilmington in all stages of its growth, by affording to the people of this enterprising city convenient and satisfactory means of freight communication with Philadelphia, and, in conjunction with other lines, ready access to the markets of this and of foreign countries.

In the early days of anthracite coal the sale of this commodity was added to the general mercantile business of the house, and this department of the business has grown by side by side with the transportation business to a prominent position in the coal trade. It has been principally during the life of George W. Bush, and through his wise and able management, that the coal department has developed to large proportions. Through the general office at Wilmington, and the branch office at 207 Walnut Place, Philadelphia, the firm places great quantities of anthracite and bituminous coal throughout the Eastern tier of States. Their anthracite coal comes from all three districts of the anthracite region, and the Cumberland region of Maryland and West Virginia furnishes the largest part of the bituminous coal which they market. The larger part of the fuel of the city of Wilmington, as well as of the State of Delaware, is supplied by this firm, and their operations extend throughout the coast States.

During the past few years railroads and builders have learned to appreciate the value of the Southern yellow-pine timber in frame construction, and in 1884 the firm commenced to bring yellow-pine timber from the Gulf States, and from the Carolinas, for use in the Middle and New England States. This department works under the name of George W. Bush & Son Lumber Co., and has already achieved a high position in the yellow-pine trade. Their dealings are at wholesale only, and their yard at Wilmington is used to distribute lumber to inland points on the various railroads which proceed from Wilmington. The recent change of gauge of the railroads in the South from the broad gauge of five feet to that of four feet nine inches, the latter being the standard gauge of the Northern railroads, has opened a means of transporting lumber through by rail from the far South to the North, thus enabling the yellow-pine lumber to be brought through in a few days, when quick delivery is necessary; but by reason of cheaper transportation, a large part of this lumber from the South is still brought to the markets of Wilmington, Philadelphia, New York and Eastern ports by coasting schooners of heavy draft. Georgia and Florida pine has become the synonym of strength and durability in constructive work, and if it is possible to add to the reputation for stability of a commercial house that has been in existence for more than a century, the bringing to our markets of the stanchest building timber would have that effect.

The Charles Warner Company is the successor of one of the oldest transportation and general business houses in Wilmington, and its commercial value to the city has been incalculable. For about a hundred years the present location upon the Christina at the foot of Market Street has been the business home of this firm or its immediate predecessors of the same family. The records or accounts prove nothing anterior to 1794 as connecting the business with the transactions of the present company, but it is well known that the commercial history of the house extends through a hundred years. The wharf was the fourth one built in the city and was owned first by one Robinson, who, before the Revolution, commanded vessels from this port, but afterwards declined a sea-faring life, became a shipping merchant of some note, and dying, left a widow from whom William Warner purchased the property. The earliest information we have of the family in Wilmington shows that John and William Warner and their father Joseph were engaged in the West India trade, and that the last-named was also a silversmith by trade. He was a descendant of one Skippwith, who came to America with William Penn and is believed to have been the first of the family in Wilmington. His son William married a daughter of Joseph Tatnall, who was thus the maternal grandfather of Mr. Charles Warner. Of this ancestor, Miss Montgomery, in her "Reminiscences of Wilmington," says: "Joseph Tatnall was the most distinguished of those worthy men whose memories deserve notice in this community, and the rising generation ought to be informed that Mr. Tatnall was a true patriot. He alone dared to grind flour for the famishing army of the Revolution at the risk of the destruction of his mill."
NEW CASTLE COUNTY

The general wholesale and transportation business in which John and William Warner were engaged certainly as early as 1794, and which was in all probability a direct outgrowth or continuance of the enterprises in which they were associated with their father, was carried on by them without interruption until about 1820, when the senior brother was appointed United States consul to Havana, and then it passed into the hands of William as sole proprietor. The firm had been sorely pressed for means during the War of 1812-15, but maintained its credit and activity and passed successfully the only threatening period the house has ever known.

In 1837 Charles Warner was taken into partnership with his father, under the firm-name of Charles Warner & Company, and in 1845 William died, leaving his son the entire responsibility of the large and rapidly-growing business.

Up to this time the transportation facilities of the house were such as two small sloops afforded. They sailed between Wilmington and Philadelphia, making four trips per week. In 1846, Mr. Warner completed the first steam packet, which he named, in honor of his father's old friend, the "E. I. Dupont," but the enterprise proving immature, she only remained upon the route one season. The sloops "Fame" (the name, by the way, of one of the earlier Swedish ships) and the "Mary Warner," each of about sixty tons burden, were placed upon the line, and they continued to perform the service of four trips per week until 1866, when they were found to be inadequate, and were replaced by the barges "Anna" and "Mary," each of one hundred and twenty-five tons, which were towed by steam tugs and formed a daily line between this city and Philadelphia.

Prior to this time, in 1860, the proprietor took into partnership his nephew, E. Tatnall Warner, and the firm-name again became Charles Warner & Co.

At the close of 1868, Charles Warner, who had seen many years of active business life, and under whose skillful and energetic management the house had led a career of constantly-increasing prosperity, retired in favor of his son, Alfred D. Warner. Since his retirement Charles Warner has resided continuously in Wilmington.

The business was continued under the old name until 1885, when an act of incorporation was obtained creating "The Charles Warner Company" of which E. Tatnall Warner was elected president; Alfred D. Warner, vice-president and treasurer; and E. Andrews, secretary.

Such in brief has been the history of this house; but it remains to give a few facts concerning the growth of its business. And in this connection we may state that the traffic between Wilmington and Philadelphia had so increased that still larger craft than the "Anna" and "Mary" were demanded, and they were superseded by two barges, the "Coleta" and "Minqua," each of two hundred and fifty tons, or double the capacity of their predecessors.

Another large enterprise of the firm was the establishment of the Electric/Steamship Line to New York, for which Charles Warner & Co. had laid the foundation in 1866. The charter of the Wilmington Steamship Company of Delaware, of which Warner & Co. and William M. Baird, of Philadelphia, were the promoters, was passed in 1869, and in the following year the Wilmington house which we have under consideration purchased Mr. Baird's interest, and in turn sold a part interest to George W. Bush. In 1870 a favorable arrangement was made with the Delaware and Raritan Canal Company, enabling the establishment of a safe and advantageous inland route. This line, on which three, and sometimes four, steamers plied, proved reasonably profitable to the passengers and of vast advantage to the city, encouraging, as it did by its facilities of cheap transportation, the development of numerous extensive manufac tories, and especially, perhaps, the iron industry. The line was only discontinued in 1886, its usefulness having been in a large measure neutralized by raiload extension.

The growth of the firm's various lines of business has been most gratifying. In the single item of anthracite coal, of which it is interesting to note this house brought the very first to Wilmington, just after the opening of the Schuylkill mines, about 1830, the increase in tonnage has been immense. The bulk brought to the city now is fully seventy times as great as that which was annually handled twenty years ago. While its transportation and coal interests may be considered as constituting the greater part of its business, the company also makes specialties of a hydraulic cement, sand, coke and lime, and handles them in large quantities,—of the last-named article taking the product of thirty-two kilns. It owns the Philadelphia and Wilmington Propeller Line, better known as Warner's Propeller Line of freight vessels.

CHAPTER XXXV.

WILMINGTON—(Continued).

MANUFACTURERS AND MANUFACTURES.

WILMINGTON had scarcely become the nucleus of an established community before the thrifty and energetic settlers of the colonial period began to plant the seeds that have developed into the vast wealth-producing manufacturing enterprises that now make it hum with industry. In its shipbuilding yards, its car factories, its manufac tories of boilers, engines and machine tools, its morocco factories, and in numerous other branches of industrial undertaking, it has reached a stage of success which its products have made famous in all quarters of the world. While agriculture was the main pursuit of the pioneers of the State, its situation upon the great bay, giving immediate access to the ocean, could not but stimulate commerce, quick upon the heels of which came the impulse toward employing home facilities in the construction of such articles of daily use as might be more cheaply produced in the Delaware country than it cost to import them from abroad. The water-power provided by the Brandywine, as it made its swift tumble from the Pennsylvania hills to the broad estuary of the Atlantic, was available for the economical working of the first flour-mills and fulling-mills, so that when the non-importation and non-exportation acts of its opening Revolutionary era threw the people upon their own resources, Delaware could turn out a very important quantity of food and the material for dress. Then when the epoch of steam came, her forests contributed to firing the first boilers set up. And again, with the use of coal and the introduction of iron, she was within cheap transportation distance of the beds of Pennsylvania and Maryland, and so was enabled to hold her place and even improve it in the swift march of progress.

It was by the early Dutch that manufactures and ship-building were given their birth in the Wilmington neighborhood. Soon after the arrival of the Swedes two ship-carpenters from Holland had settled at the high point called Manathan, just above the mouth of the Christiana, and were the first traders and shipwrights on the Delaware. Peter Minuit says, that in 1642 these men had their work-people and their families there, and made boats and small trading vessels for themselves and other colonists. Campanius records that in 1643 two Dutch cooperers began on Cooper's Island, a small piece of fast land on the north side of the Brandywine, to make kegs and hogheads, and the flat-bottomed sailing shallows in which trade and transportation was conducted up and down and across the bay. From this starting point a small business grew up around Fort Christina and the neighboring settlements of Christianaholm. Before 1679 three grist-mills were in operation on Shellpot Creek, and a fourth was subsequently built by Timothy Stidham, on the south side of the Brandywine, where it was crossed by the Ford road. Soon after the foundation of Willington (Wilmington), in 1736, Wm. Shipley began the queerly-combined business of building vessels and brewing malt liquor in the town. In 1749 the mill seals, formerly Stedhams, were purchased by Oliver Canby, and the mill then built was the beginning of what, in 1764, was known as the Brandywine system of mills numbering eight, four on each side of the stream.

In 1797, John Patterson & Son were manufacturing saddles on the west side of Market Street, next door to the Sign of the White Hart tavern, and Wm. Bryant had a shoemaker's shop near by. Jacob Broom had already built a cotton factory on the Brandywine. It was destroyed by fire in 1797, and at the next session of the Assembly an act was passed authorizing a lottery to furnish funds for rebuilding; but the project appears to have failed—at least the mill did not rise from its ruins. The old stone grist-mill, still standing on the Brandywine above Sixteenth Street, was, as stated by the inscription on the corner-stone, erected by I. Canby in 1800. Originally it comprised two buildings, in which five run of stone were used; but the city has acquired most of the property in connection with the water-works, and only two run of stone remains in operation. In 1802, John Aiken moved his cabinet-making establishment from Philadelphia because of the yellow-fever epidemic there, and located at the corner of Fourth and Shipley Streets, in Wilmington. George Whitelock, at the same time, was a cabinet and chair-maker next door above the Town Hall. The Delaware Paper-Mills at Brandywine were operated by Wm. Young and Robert Gilmour, as Wm. Young & Co., until 1803, when Wm. Young became sole proprietor. In the same year Van dever & Test were engaged in distilling whiskey and rum from rye and molasses, near Queen and Tatnall Streets, and at that time increased the capacity of their distillery. David West made cut nails and other brands at his factory, at Front and Market Streets. James Ross discontinued his cooperage business and engaged with J. Chestnut in the manufacture of rush bottomed chairs. George Young made Windsor chairs at King and Second Streets. In 1804, Chalfant & Dixon were blacksmiths and machinists, on Shipley Street near Sixth, adjoining John Dixon's coach factory.

The large establishment, one of the most extensive of its time, known as the Rokeby Cotton Factory, was originated early in the century, first running five hundred spindles. In 1813 stone buildings were erected and the capacity increased to twelve hundred spindles. In 1823 the mills were operated by John D. Carter, whose employees were accommodated in eleven tenement-houses on the property. A still more ambitious enterprise was the Simmelville Mills, on the Brandywine, a four-story stone structure running three thousand spindles, and completed in 1814 by John Siddall & Co., who in 1823 sold out to John Torbert and Cyrus Lamborn. Joseph B. Simms became the purchaser in 1824. Beginning about 1814, Justus Beckley, Jacob W. Robinson and Benjamin H. Springer made at No. 40 Fourth Street a large quantity of the machine cards used in these mills. The "Upper Brewery" was established in 1814 and in 1825 was owned by Wigmore & Henderson.1

NEW CASTLE COUNTY.

John Sellers & Son, about 1814, engaged in the manufacture of hats in large quantities on Market Street. In 1825 the partnership was dissolved and the son, William R. Sellers, continued the business. About the same time Sylvester A. Bratten & Co. manufactured caps on Third Street opposite the Mechanics' Bank.

In 1822 George W. Metz made brushes, hand-bellows and blacksmith-bellows on the corner of High (now Fourth) and Shipley Streets. James Bannister made and repaired mattresses "near the wharf." In the same year Justin Briggs began the manufacture of "spring-seated and spring-pointed saddles" on Market Street, and James Seborn announced that he would "begin to make strong and table beer at Shipley's brewery as good as any received from Philadelphia.

In 1826 John Sebo was a cabinet and sofa-maker at Seventh and Market Streets. The next year John Guyer moved his tannery from Shipley to Market Streets. The brewery that in 1826 stood on the corner of Tatnall and Fourth Streets was in 1835 conducted by A. Rudman.

The Phoenix Foundry and Furnace, which stood on King Street, was established by William Robinson in 1828, and in the same year Benjamin Potter opened on Market Street a shop, in which he manufactured copper, tin-ware and sheet-iron.

The old foundry at Tenth and Orange Streets was built by William Robinson and James Rice in 1830. Some years later Robinson moved to Philadelphia, and Jonathan Bonney became a partner in the business. Rice enlarged the foundry and was very successful. In 1838, William Wolley and James Siddall formed a partnership as William Wolley & Co., for the manufacture of machine tools, in the former factory of Wood & Rees at the Brandywine Bridge. A foundry was established in 1845 on Front Street, between Tatnall and Washington, by Adams & Co., and in the adjoining building Hall & Aldrich began the manufacture of patent locks.

Elwood Garrett in 1846 invented a machine for manufacturing wood-screws, and C. & W. Pyle began the manufacture of japanned leather on Orange Street. Moore & Chamberlain built a foundry in 1847 adjoining their plug factory. In the same year Samuel N. Pusey started a cotton-mill at Front and Tatnall Streets with forty-eight looms, which were run by a forty horse-power engine. The machine-shop formerly owned by Garrett A. Hollingsworth in the western part of the city was changed into a steam saw-mill, and William Chandler built a steam-mill on Tatnall Street, between Third and Fourth Streets C. H. Gallagher at the same time had a planing-mill and sash factory at Shipley and Seventh Streets.

In 1847 the Wilmington Manufacturing Company was organized with sixty stockholders and a capital of fifty-four thousand dollars. A large building was erected at the corner of Ninth and Walnut Streets. Lewis Thatcher, in February, 1848, moved his sash and blind factory to a new steam-mill on Shipley Street.

In 1849, Betts & Stotsenburg erected a brick foundry on Front Street, at the foot of Washington, for the production of large castings. Soon after beginning operations they moulded a shaft twenty-four feet long and one and a half feet in diameter, weighing six tons. It was cast in a deep well dug in the building and was made for a firm in South Carolina.

M. M. Cook, of Massachusetts, began the business of sailmaking and ship chandlery near the railroad station in 1849. At the Castle Garden Fair in New York, October, 1849, Bush & Lobdell received premiums for the best car-wheels in America; J. Pierson for best patent wheat-drill; Jesse Urmy for self-supporting endless chain and railway horse-power of his own invention. The Franklin Factory, at Ninth and French Streets, was started in 1849, and made muslins and tickings.

E. Belts & Co. in 1850 established an iron, brass and bell foundry at Eighth and Orange Streets. A "gold mill," weighing forty tons, was made by Pusey & Jones in 1850 for use in California mines. Major R. B. Gilpin in 1850 leased the ship-yards at the old ferry and began to operate them.

The cotton factory in Brandywine Village was built in 1855. It was five hundred feet long, one hundred feet wide and one story high. Forty dwellings were built in the vicinity of the same year.

As indicative of the condition of manufactures in the decade prior to the war, the statistics gather-

NEW CASTLE COUNTY. 763

About one million bushels of grain ground at the four Brandywine mills on south side and three on north side of the stream.

The census report for 1880 sets the value of gunpowder manufactured in New Castle County, outside of Wilmington, at $243,365, which is undoubtedly a very low estimate; and of paper, $3,900,000. These additions bring the total up to $14,186,040, as the value of the product for that census year. In the whole State the value for that year was only a trifle over $20,500,000.

Powder-Mills.—The Powder-Mills of E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co.—This vast establishment now and for many years the largest of its kind in the world, was founded upon a comparatively small scale in 1802, by Eleutheran Irénée du Pont de Nemours, and has been gradually enlarged to its present proportions by his descendants, who, in thus adhering to a single industry throughout several generations and for a period stretching well-nigh to a hundred years, have followed a custom of conservative stability which, very naturally, is less common in America than in the countries of Europe. The founder was a Frenchman who had left his native land for political reasons (as is elsewhere more fully set forth), in the last days of the last century, arriving at Newport, R. I., on the 1st of January, 1800. He had been a pupil of the celebrated chemist Lavoisier, who was superintendent of the powder-mills of the French government. Some months after reaching this country an accidental occurrence called Irénée du Pont's attention to the bad quality of the gunpowder made in America, and gave him the first idea of engaging in its manufacture. In January, 1801, he went back to France to procure plans and models, returning in August with a portion of the machinery for the future mills. It now remained to find a suitable site and he determined to engage in its manufacture, and went back to France in January, 1801, to perfect his knowledge of the theory and obtain additional ideas of the practical side of the science. When he returned to America, in August, he was well provided with plans and models, and brought with him some of the machinery for his proposed mills. It is noteworthy that he was urged by Thomas Jefferson, who had been his father's friend, to locate in Virginia, and that he declined, chiefly because of the strength which slavery as an institution possessed in that State, and the effects which it had produced upon the character of the white race. He was deterred by the same reason from locating in Maryland, and preferring the Brandywine to the vicinity of Paterson, N. J., and several other localities which he visited, he bought, in June, 1802, a tract of land upon its banks, four miles from Wilmington, and immediately began preparations for embarking upon his cherished enterprise. This was deemed by many, at the time, a mad or, at least, exceedingly unwise undertaking, for it was thought that the quality of the powder imported from England could not by any possibility be surpassed, and that ruin awaited the man who in this country attempted to equal it. Thus Eleuthere Irénée 'du Pont' had little sympathy or encouragement; but he seems to have been a man well qualified to get along without those aids and comforts. He possessed wonderful confidence, courage and capacity for doing, and it was well he did, for he underwent many bitter disappointments and losses before he made the Brandywine Powder-Mills an assured success. Du Pont's powder almost from the first, however, was of good quality, and Wilson, the American ornithologist, who used it, said that it left no stain on paper when burned—one of the most common but crucial tests of good powder. The powder was put up in packages bearing the picture of an eagle.

"From foaming Brandywine's rough shores it came,
To sportmen dear its merits and its name;
du Pont's best Eagle, matchless for its power, Strong, swift and fatal, as the bird it bore."

By 1810 the aspiring French powder-maker was using a capital of seventy-five thousand dollars. His works gave employment to thirty-six men, had a capacity of six hundred thousand pounds per year, and were regarded as the most perfect in operation. These works, it may be remarked, which are still in operation, and known as the Eleutherian Mills, have now a capacity of five thousand pounds of sporting powder per day, or one million five hundred thousand pounds per year.

The Upper Hagley Mills were commenced by Mr. du Pont in 1812, and the Lower Hagley Mills 1 were built in 1828, and all brought into such perfection of working power that before his death, in 1834, the energetic proprietor had the satisfaction of knowing that his labors had resulted in making these the most extensive powder-mills in the country.

After the death of E. I. du Pont the responsibilities of the great manufactory rested upon his eldest son, Alfred, and it was under his direction that the Brandywine Mills, in the lower yard, were built in 1836. He remained head of the house until 1850, when his brother, Gen. Henry du Pont, became its chief, and later, there were associated with him his nephews, Irénée and La Motte, sons of Alfred, both now deceased, and Eugene and Francis, sons of his younger brother, Alexis, and his own sons, Henry A. and William, constituting the firm as it now exists under the old

1 The site of these works was known as Lower Hagley as far back as the Revolution, when Samuel Gregg surveyed a tract of twenty-three acres there, which he gave to his son "whereto erect and build a forge and other water works." John and Joshua Gibson became associated with John Gregg, and did build there a forge and rolling and slitting-mill, sold, in 1783, to Rumford Dawes. Shortly after 1810 the mills were made cotton works, and two or three years later passed into the possession of the powder company.
name of E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co. Under this company a work of improvement and enlargement has been constantly carried on until the plant has grown to be not only the largest in the world, as stated at the outset of this article, but it is believed also the best arranged and most advantageous for the purpose designed. Beside these, to supply a constantly-growing demand, ten mills have been built or acquired in Pennsylvania, as follows: In Luzerne County—the Wapwallopen Mills, built in 1859, and Great Falls Mills, built in 1869; in Schuylkill County—the Edgeworth Mills, built in 1845; the Tunnel, in 1860; Ginter’s, in 1862; Pine Creek, in 1863; Indian River, in 1866; Locust Creek, in 1869, and the Mahanoy Mills in the same year; also the Paxinos Mills in Northumberland County.

But it is of the Brandywine Mills we have principally to treat in this work. They afford a peculiar and interesting sight. Here are no vast buildings such as one usually finds vast industries housed in—no rushing railroad trains such as one is accustomed to look for in proximity to great industrial establishments. It needs but a moment’s reflection however, to make it clear that these are not a desideratum; indeed, they would be utterly impracticable, if not absolutely destructive. Instead of one or two large buildings, there are about seventy-five or eighty small ones, widely scattered, and the various processes of manufacture being thus isolated, the destruction in case of an explosion is reduced to the minimum. The buildings in which there is greatest danger are, besides, so built as to still further curtail loss to life and property in case of accident. Each has very massive stone walls, except upon the side towards the creek or river, and that is made as light as possible, while the roof is a light shell of frame work. Thus, should an explosion occur, the effect would be almost exactly that of firing a colossal mortar in the direction where there was the least chance of doing harm. The walls, with the exception of the one towards the water, would doubtless remain intact. It is such careful precaution and ingenious devices as this that show the knowledge that has been gained through long experience by the managers of these works. It is obvious that it is not desirable to have locomotives come too near the mills. The nearest railroad station, on the Wilmington and Northern Railroad, is a mile away, but railroad tracks run in and about the works and the cars upon them are drawn by horses, an easy means of handling materials and the finished product being thus afforded. Stationary engines are employed, but there are effective means of guarding against danger from them. Fifteen of these are in use at different parts of the works, but the greater portion of the power here, as at the other works of the company, is derived from the fall of water, and there are ninety-three wheels in use, most of which are turbines.

Besides the mills proper are various buildings in which auxiliary work is carried on. The “Salt-petre Refinery,” with a laboratory attached, is two hundred and fifty-eight feet by ninety-six feet and contains ample appliances for supplying all of the nitre required for the fabrication of powder, and also considerable quantities for the market, for such purposes as require an article chemically pure. Large store-houses are in close proximity. There are three charring-houses for the preparation of charcoal, and adjacent buildings for the storage of the wood from which it is made—chiefly the twigs and the smaller branches of willow, which, in some cases, is grown for this especial purpose, in the surrounding region. There are also attached to the works extensive machine and millwright-shops, where all repairs are made and most of the machinery built; a sawmill, planing-mill, carpenter and blacksmith shops, and capacious buildings for the making of wooden and metallic kegs and barrels and powder cisterns.

It is characteristic of the careful management and far-seeing policy of the “du Ponts” that the company should own a great tract of land surrounding their works, and, indeed, this seems a wise provision, both for the company and, in possible event, for outsiders. In this way the company prevents the approach of endangering establishments, and practically says to the public: “Keep at a distance and you are safe,” indeed, making people keep at a distance. The lands of the company amount to about two thousand five hundred acres, stretching for a distance of three miles along both sides of the stream. General du Pont owns about a thousand acres more. Upon this property are three woolen-mills, a cotton-mill, a merchant’s and grist-mill, and a population of about four thousand people, including three hundred or more employees of the works. The farms of this great estate are in a high state of cultivation, supplied with the best of machinery and utensils, and all have dwellings of excellent character, most of them built of stone. The roads are macadamized for ease of transportation, some at the sole expense of the company, and others at the joint expense of the company and county.

As before mentioned, the nearest railroad station is a mile away. Between this station and the works, and back and forth from their shipping-points, in Wilmington, great six-mule teams ply daily, drawing huge wagons laden with materials or with gunpowder. The passing of these ponderous teams and equipages through the streets of Wilmington forms one of the city’s novel and interesting sights, at which strangers stare in wonder.

The company have about one hundred of these mules and horses at the works here and in Pennsylvania.

The shipping facilities are excellent. The main line of the Wilmington and Northern Railroad, as well as its Kentmere and Rockland Branches, pass through the property, on all of which the firm has one or more sidings for forwarding and receiving freight. The Wilmington and Northern Railroad connects with the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad near Wilmington, and with the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad near Birdesboro, and with the Pennsylvania system at Coatesville and other points. They have also two shipping-points,— one on the river Delaware, with magazines and a wharf at which large vessels can lie; the other on the Christiana Creek, with ample wharfage for cosaters and for landing coal, wood, etc.

Returning to the works, it may be remarked that the original works, built in 1802, have a capacity for producing five thousand pounds of sporting powder per day; the Middle, or Hagley Works, two complete sets in one inclosure, so arranged that both can work on one description of powder, or, if required, each on a different kind, have a capacity of thirty thousand pounds of blasting powder per day; and the Lower Works have a capacity of five thousand pounds per day.
Thus the total capacity for twenty four hours is forty thousand pounds, or, allowing three hundred working days to the year, about twelve million pounds annually. This amount is largely augmented by the mills in Pennsylvania. Including the latter, there were used in the works, in 1886, over sixteen million five hundred thousand pounds of saltpetre and nitrate of soda, the chief ingredients of gunpowder. These figures are enormous, but they are correct. The production of the mills is principally consumed in the United States, the firm having agencies and magazines at all the most important points, with a principal depot for the Pacific States at San Francisco, and agencies in South America and West Indies. The products of the works embrace all descriptions of gunpowder including prismatic, hexagonal, square, mammoth, cannon, mortar, musket and rifle for army and navy ordnance service; crystal grain, eagle, and the various grades of canister and sporting powders, also shipping, blasting, mining and fuse powders. They also supply mealed sulphur and pulverized charcoal to order, refined saltpetre, warranted pure, and Patent Safety Fuses for blasting, and cocoa or brown powder for army and navy use.

To illustrate the progress which has been made in the manufacture of powder in the United States, it is only necessary to recall the fact that during the Crimean War the Allies, to enable them to prosecute the siege of Sebastopol, were obliged to procure large supplies of gunpowder in the United States (one-half of which was furnished by the Brandywine Powder-Mills), and that the American powder compared favorably with the best they could procure in Europe.

The founder of the powder works, Eleuthere-Irénée du Pont de Nemours, youngest son of Pierre-Samuel du Pont de Nemours the eminent French author and statesman, and of Nicole-Charlotte-Marie-Louise Le Dée de Rencourt, was born in Paris on the 24th of June, 1771. His somewhat unusual baptismal names were those selected on account of their significance by his god-father, the celebrated Turgot. Irénée du Pont, as he was commonly called, was a man remarkable in many ways, and his life was full of action and incident, both in his native and his adopted country; it would require an extended biography to do justice to his useful and honorable career, the limits of this article only permitting us to touch upon the more salient features of his life and character. Brought up in the country, in what is now the Department of "Seine et Marne," his tastes turned early towards scientific pursuits, and his father's friend, Lavoisier, whom Turgot had made superintendent of the government powder-mills (Régie royale des poudres et salpêtres), offered to take him in charge and secure his reversion to that important post.
This led to his going to the royal mills at Essonne to acquire a practical knowledge of the manufacture of gunpowder, where he remained until the outbreak of the French Revolution apparently changed his whole future destiny. On the 8th of June, 1791, his father, very prominent in public life and one of the leading advocates of a constitutional monarchy in the Constituent Assembly, established, in the interest of the moderate and law-abiding party, a large printing and publishing house. At its head he placed his son Irénée, whom he had summoned to Paris, and thus, at the age of twenty, the subject of this sketch found himself conducting, almost alone, a great business which was necessarily connected with the political troubles of those stormy times. He was three times imprisoned and in the utmost peril on the 10th of August, 1792, when both he and his father were at the Tuileries among the armed defenders of Louis XVI. Although Irénée du Pont was fortunate enough to save his father's life as well as his own on that fatal day, both were marked for subsequent destruction; the son succeeded in hiding himself at Essonne, and the father, after being concealed for several weeks by the astronomer Lalande in the dome of the Paris Observatory, was able to reach his home in the country, where he was arested some six months later and thrown into prison, the fall of Robespierre alone saving him from the guillotine. After the Reign of Terror, du Pont de Nemours and his son renewed their courageous opposition to the Jacobins, who, finding themselves Alfred Victor Du Pont, upon whom the chief responsibility of managing the powder-house was placed when solicited to accept political power, might have extended his field of usefulness, he de-supporter of the government, and raised a necessary to follow here, and we conclude this section of the history of the company simply by giving the present organization, which is as follows, viz: President, J. Taylor Gause; vice-president and secretary, H. T. Gause; treasurer, Sam'l K. Smith; directors, John Taylor Gause, H. T. Gause, Thomas Jackson, Nathaniel R. Benson, Jr., Alex. Kelley; stockholders, John Taylor Gause, H. T. Gause, Thomas Jackson, N. R. Benson, Jr., Alex. Kelley, Thomas B. Smith, Edward Mahoney, Thomas Johnson, Andrew G. Wilson, Horace W. Gause, T. Jackson Shaw, Samuel K. Smith.

The growth of the company's business and some of the most interesting features thereof must be indicated, although it is impossible to follow step by step the development of the huge establishment of the present from the humble one of 1836. Having in view the magnitude of the present plant of the company, and its world-wide recognition, it is well to pause for a moment and recall its condition for work in 1836. Car-building was at this time the main industry. The works embraced a three-story brick building, sixty-five feet in length and forty-five in depth. In the basement were placed the blacksmith fires where the iron was forged for the trucks, while the cars were built and trimmed upon the upper floors. Here they were also painted and varnished, in readiness for departure, when they were lowered through large traps in the floor to a level with the street. Some idea may be formed of the volume of the firm's trade at this time, when it is stated that the number of hands employed was but twenty; yet with this meagre force they had turned out the enormous amount of $6580.79 of business.

In 1836 the number of employees had increased to forty-five, and the annual production to sixty-three thousand three hundred and seventy-five dollars. The increase of work compelled a change in the direction of larger accommodations to be made in the year 1841, when the old car building was abandoned and more commodious quarters were secured by moving into a new brick building which the firm erected at the foot of West Street, south of the track of the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad, and conveniently near to it for purposes of loading freight.

The main industry up to 1841 was the building of cars, and it was conducted mainly under the direction of Mr. Harlan, who, previous to being admitted to the firm in 1837, had been connected with the concern in the capacity of manager and agent. He was equal to every new obligation that a rapidly-increasing business imposed.

Up to this date the firm was taking work principally for small jobbing repairs, with occasionally large contracts for stationary engines, and machinery for mills. The increasing business made it imperative to secure the talents of some person who was thoroughly familiar with machine work. To this end Mr. Elijah Hollingsworth, then the foreman of the Baldwin Locomotive Works at Philadelphia, was engaged in negotiation which resulted in his purchasing Mr. Pusey's interest, and from henceforth the machine department had a head acquainted with its entire details and management.

Elijah Hollingsworth, the subject of this sketch, was born on the banks of the Brandywine, in New Castle County, Delaware, November 28, 1806, and was the son of Joel and Phoebe (Kirk) Hollingsworth.

Mr. Hollingsworth's grandmothers were first cousins—Mary Chandler married Amor Hollingsworth, and Sarah Chandler married Caleb Kirk.

The family of Mr. Hollingsworth were well known in New Castle County, and had for generations resided in or about the place where he was born.

In the year 1830 or '31 we find him filling the responsible position of foreman of the machine department at the Baldwin Locomotive Works at Philadelphia, where he was employed for more than ten years.

On August 28, 1841, he was engaged by the firm of Betts, Pusey & Harlan to superintend their department of machinery. At the time of this engagement he purchased the interest of Samuel N. Pusey, and was admitted a partner in the concern.

In every successive advance made by the company, the strong individuality of Mr. Hollingsworth was so thoroughly felt in the details of this department, that it is safe to affirm the great success in the history of the firm was in a large degree due to his clear judgment and entire knowledge of that special work. To those who knew him well, Mr. Hollingsworth united a kindly disposition to a cheerfulness that was rarely subject to sombre influences. Whilst he was at all times ready to listen to advice and suggestions, he was nevertheless exceedingly tenacious of his opinions, and demanded the most irrefutable proofs before he would confess himself in error.

Having been brought up a Quaker, he never could be made to comprehend the importance of an open profession of religion, but he always after his marriage (his wife being a member of the Protestant Episcopal communion) regularly attended St. Andrew's Church with his family.

He was a warm personal friend of the late Bishop Lee, and for many years was a vestryman of St. Andrew's Church.

In this connection it may not be inappropriate to remark that Mrs Hollingsworth presented a memorial bell to St. Andrew's Church, and upon asking Bishop Lee for an appropriate inscription for the same, he replied, "The memory of the just is blessed." That bell tolled out the eighty years of the good bishop's life.
Elijah Hollingsworth had nine children, only one of whom is now living,—Mrs. Susan H. Siter, the wife of Edward Siter, of Philadelphia.

Mr. Hollingsworth died at Wilmington, November 9, 1866, and was buried in the Wilmington and Brandywine Cemetery.

The new machine-shop, under the energetic impulse of Mr. Hollingsworth was now fitted up on a scale beyond anything hitherto attempted in Wilmington, and they were quickly in condition to meet every demand for machinery, both on land and water, that was now rapidly being made upon them. The circumscribed space necessarily allotted to the Harlan & Hollingsworth Company in this work precludes the possibility of a detailed account of the successive additions to plant and buildings, as well as the immense increase to the personnel. It may be as well here to record the fact that much of the information contained in this sketch is derived from a voluminous and comprehensive work issued by The Harlan & Hollingsworth Company, 1887.

In the year 1843 the ship-building ventures of the firm began to assume such a magnitude as to take precedence of the car construction. It is here to be noted that the first iron sea-going propeller constructed in the United States was begun at the yard of Betts, Harlan & Hollingsworth in 1843, and launched in 1844. She was delivered to her owners in eight months from the day her keel was placed in position. From this date up to the present time the immense work done in iron ship-building, both for the government, foreign and on private account, has been of such a magnitude as to cause the name of the firm to be recognized at its proper estimation the world over.

In the year 1841, the firm made an important acquisition in its personnel in adding Captain Alexander Kelley to the outside corps of practical men. His services were such as to almost immediately mark him as a rising man.

Captain Alexander Kelley, machinist and boat-captain, now living (January, 1888) as a retired citizen, withdrawn from the active cares of business, in Wilmington, was born in Milburn, New Jersey, February 12, 1813. His father, Patrick Kelley, in his nineteenth year, came from the North of Ireland, and settled at Short Hills (now Milburn), New Jersey, and established himself in business as a merchant tailor. His mother, Barbara McLeod, was seven years old when she came with her parents and one brother, John, to this country from the vicinity of Edinburgh, Scotland. Captain Kelley's father died when he was but twelve years old. Two years later he lost his mother. After the death of his father he went with his mother to the home of his uncle, his mother's only brother, John McLeod. In the four years immediately following the death of his father, while living with his uncle, he attended school in Reading, Pa. Before his father's death he had learned some rudiments in the schools at Short Hills. When sixteen years old, he became an apprentice to learn the trade of a millwright with his uncle at his (Mr. McLeod's) mills on the Brandywine. After entering upon his apprenticeship he still sought to enlarge his stock of knowledge by attending night-school in the vicinity. These mills are now owned and occupied by Messrs. James Riddle, Son & Company, as a cotton factory. They were formerly known as Gilpin's mill. After some time spent here, Mr. Kelley went to Richmond, Virginia, to superintend the erection of a large plant of paper-mill machinery in that city. After seven months spent in this work he returned home to take charge of a large job of machinery erection at Siddle's mill on the Brandywine. This work he finished in the fall of 1838. A new position was now opened to him as master of the United States Dredge, then employed, under the control of the City Council of Wilmington, in dredging about the Delaware and Christiana Rivers. This position first procured for him his title of "Captain." By faithful attention to duties not always pleasant, but always involving responsibility and sometimes perilous, he well earned his title. The necessity for a thorough overhauling of the mill and renewal of the machinery of this boat, in the spring of 1839, brought Captain Kelley into acquaintance with the firm of Betts, Pusey & Harlan, ship-builders, and finally into business connection with them. In the fall of 1840, after voting for General Harrison, the ninth President of the United States, Captain Kelley went to Cuba, in the interests of Messrs. I. P. Morris & Company, to erect a large sugar-mill, put in the machinery and "take off the crop." To do the work indicated by the last phrase, it would be necessary for him to harvest, work up, store, and perhaps ship the season's sugar crop. He did all that he was sent to do with signal success, and after eight months' absence returned home and resumed his calling among his old associates. While on the train between Philadelphia and Wilmington, coming to the latter city, he met Mr. Harlan, of the ship building firm, and the circumstances having naturally led to a conversation about his recent trip to the West Indies, Mr. Harlan told the Captain that he would like to have him "take hold with their concern—in the morning—and hold on." The captain did as Mr. Harlan wished, and devoted himself heartily to the interests of that firm, and has "held on" steadily and is now, and has been long, a stockholder and director in the corporation, well-known as the Harlan & Hollingsworth Company of Wilmington. The first important piece of work undertaken by the captain after he took "hold" was the refitting of the steamer "Sun," which needed a new cylinder, and various new parts.
for her machinery. The successful accomplishment of this undertaking, which at first seemed to be beyond the ability of the firm, marked a new era in the history of the concern, and established it as the first iron ship-building yard in the United States. The details of this "first successful effort" to make an iron cylinder for a large vessel, and of Captain Kelley's success in setting it in place with the accompanying machinery, form an important epoch in the history of ship-building in this country. They may be found more at length in the "Semi-Centennial History of the Harlan and Hollingsworth Company, 1836-1886," pp. 186-190. In 1844 Captain Kelley was sought by Mesara. Charles Warner and Company as a desirable person to put in command of the "E. I. Du Pont," a passenger and freight packet running between Philadelphia and Wilmington. After much urging the captain consented to take the position offered, but finding it unsuited to his tastes, he soon resigned the command in favor of a young man named James Downing, and returned to his position in the ship-building firm. From that time he continued for fifteen or eighteen years to erect all the machinery built by the firm. He was promoted, in 1876, to the more responsible position of superintendent of dock and repairs for the corporation.

Captain Kelley was married, December 14, 1837, to Miss Margaret A., daughter of Cloworthy and Ellen Bellingham, of Wilmington. They have had the following children, viz., Emma Jane, wife of Joseph L. Carter, of Felton, Delaware County, Pa.; Mary A., wife of James M. Williamson, of Wilmington; John M., master carpenter, in charge of the carp-shops of the Alabama and Great Southern Railroad, at Chattanooga, Tennessee; Alexander, formerly a draughtsman for the H. and H. Company, Wilmington, but now deceased; William P., a machinist, now deceased; Samuel H., deceased, and Ellen E., wife of Geo. Wright Pier- son, secretary of the Jackson Lime and Coal Company. For over sixty years Captain Kelley has been a long-standing member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, much of that time an office-bearer of some kind, and is now the president of the board of trustees of Grace Methodist Episcopal Church of Wilmington. Captain Kelley is still quite an active man (January, 1888), and having good health for his age, he enjoys life and the comforts of a delightful home at 213 West Street.

In 1854 the company received another noted acquisition in the person of Captain Benson. Captain Nathaniel Ratcliffe Benson was born April 8, 1820, at Dagsboro', Sussex County, Del. His father, Thomas Benson, was a millwright, who married Sarah Hill Irons, of Dagsboro'. His grandfather, Major Benson, was one of three brothers who came from England and settled first in Virginia, and subsequently removed to Delaware. In 1831, when the subject of this sketch was but eleven years old, his father removed, with the family, to Philadelphia. Mr. Benson's educational advantages were very limited. A few terms in the public schools of Sussex County afforded his first opportunity to learn the rudiments of an English education. But these advantages were enjoyed at an age when he had no adequate appreciation of their value. His surroundings led his attention frequently, if not chiefly, to maritime pursuits, and before he was twelve years old he began the struggle of life in his own behalf as an apprentice cook on a schooner of the type then termed "Shingle Weavers,"—a term applied to vessels that carried shingles and staves from New York to Norfolk. His first voyage was taken, in the capacity mentioned, on the "John McLung," on which he embarked at Philadelphia for Norfolk, Va. This business he followed for three successive years, spending his winters at school in Wilmington.

In 1834 Mr. Benson started as "deck boy" on the wooden side-wheel steamboat "Wilmington," plowing between Philadelphia and Wilmington, his shore duty being to carry the mail to and from the post-office. Three years were passed in this position before another change came to relieve the monotony of his burdensome existence, so distasteful to the active and ambitious life. The next move was on board the steamer "Providence," "Narragansett" and "Mohican," belonging to the Old Providence Line. The work here was that of fireman and stoker,—a step higher than his former occupation. He continued two years in this capacity, and then shipped for one year aboard the towboat "Indians," running between New York and Albany. This brought him to the year 1841 when he was twenty-one years of age. He next went as fireman on the wooden side-wheel steamboat "Balloon," which ran, for her first trip, from New York to Norfolk, Va., for the purpose of opening a route between Norfolk and Richmond. The next year the boat was run between Philadelphia and Wilmington. Captain Benson remained in the capacity of fireman. He next engaged himself, in 1844, as engineer on the wooden side-wheel steamer "Pioneer," running in the Philadelphia route. The "Balloon," "Whildin" and "Pioneer" all belonged to Captain Wilmon Whildin, whose name was long connected with the early history of steamboating on the Delaware River.

For ten years Captain Benson served as captain or engineer on one or the other of these boats, until on August 14, 1854, he entered the employ of the concern, and was, from the first, given his present position of superintendent of hull construction in the ship-yard. Captain Benson has devoted many years of earnest labor to the management of his department, and has advanced steadily in the confidence of the concern, as in the good will of his associates. His services, moreover, have been appreciated by his employers, and his connection with the company as a stockholder gives evidence of the approbation he has merited by his fidelity in the discharge of all the responsibilities placed upon him.

Mr. Benson was married October 5, 1843, to Margaret Purnell, of Smyrna, Delaware, and they have had the following children, viz., Rebecca S., wife of L. E. P. Dennis, manufacturer of fertilizers, Crisfield, Maryland; Susan P., wife of Henry C. English, brass founder, of Wilmington; Sarah H., wife of Geo. Holton, proprietor of stove-mills, Mark Centre, Ohio; Nathaniel R., a superintendent in the works of Harlan & Hollingsworth Company. Margaret P., wife of E. J. Mulhausen, of Wilmington. Thomas, with Harlan & Hollingsworth Company. Nellie H., wife of Harvey F. Smith, train dispatcher at Clayton, Delaware.

In 1883, Mr. Benson purchased and removed to his present handsome residence, at the junction of Delaware Avenue, Jefferson and Eleventh Streets.

The period embraced between the years 1843 and 1860 mark an epoch in the history of the company distinguished by great results and vigorous growth. In 1858 John Taylor Gause was formally admitted to an equal partnership in the concern. The rise and progress of this gentleman, who is now the president of the corporation, has been simply phenomenal. He was born on September 30, 1823, and comes from an English, Welsh and Teutonic stock. His ancestors in 1882 came from England in the company of William Penn, and settled in Chester County, Pa. The boyhood of Mr. Gause was passed on his father's farm, and in his twentieth year he came to Wilmington to seek his fortune. From 1843, when he started in the humble capacity of an errand boy, by diligence and a conscientious performance of his duties, he rose through at least fourteen successive grades until to-day he stands at the head of the corporation where forty-five years before he served in one of the lowest capacities.

During the Civil War some of the most noted ironclads were constructed for the government by the firm, together with vessels of a different character, and it is pleasing to record that these vessels, without exception, fulfilled the terms of their contract to the most minute degree. Up to the present time about two hundred and fifty vessels of all classes have been built.

Constant improvement has appeared to be the policy of the company, especially during the later years. One of the most important adjuncts of the ship-yards was made in 1870, when a dry dock was constructed, with a capacity for vessels three hundred and forty feet in length. New machinery, the most modern power appliances—masting shears, derricks, building ways, etc.—and the best tools are to be found in shop and yard. A railway system extends throughout the works, forming one of its most important and unique features and greatly facilitating the handling of materials, and an elaborate fire apparatus, manned by a regularly organized company of employees, affords strong an assurance of safety as it is possible to secure. The number of employees varies from about one thousand to one thousand five hundred. The total number of engines employed is fifteen, from which an aggregate of four hundred horse-power is obtained.

Perhaps the best idea of the growth of this concern is conveyed by the single statement that while its plant in 1836 covered an area of only forty-five by fifty-five feet (a three-story building), its buildings and ship-yard now include forty-three, acres of land upon both banks of the Christiana—certainly no mean expansion. The buildings number fifty-eight, and there are a little over six acres of ground under roof.

The Pusey & Jones Company.—This company has an immense plant, extending along Railroad Avenue, in the vicinity of the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore passenger station, with offices at the foot of Poplar Street, and manufactures all kinds of heavy machinery, engines and boilers, and builds iron and steel ships. Like many of the large industrial establishments of Wilmington, this had a very humble beginning.

In the year 1848 Joshua L. Pusey and John Jones started the business, which has gradually been developed into its present vast proportions. Their plant, devoted to general machine-making, at that time consisted of a small shop located just back of where the present tool-room stands, and occupied a space of about forty by seventy-five feet. Ten men were employed and the weekly payroll amounted to not more than one hundred dollars. Various changes took place in the constitution of the firm from time to time. In 1851, Edward Betts and Joseph Seal joined the original proprietors, and the firm was known as Betts, Pusey, Jones & Seal. These partners retired in 1857, and Alfred Betts succeeded them, the style of the house becoming Pusey, Jones & Betts. Alfred Betts gave place to William G. Gibbons in 1860, and the firm became Pusey, Jones & Co. In 1866 John Jones withdrew and Thomas H. Savery succeeded him, the firm name remaining unchanged. The present incorporated style was taken in the year 1879, William G. Gibbons being president subsequent to 1886. The management has been in the hands of the following gentlemen: President, Joshua L. Pusey; Vice-President, Thomas H. Savery; General Manager, Chas. W. Pusey; Treasurer, William W. Pusey; Secretary, Samuel C. Biddle.

The plant has been steadily increased until it now covers seven acres, with a wharf frontage of one thousand feet upon the Christians, and consists of a dozen or more large shops splendidly equipped with powerful tools and machinery of the most modern types, for the prosecution of the varied lines of manufacture which form the business of the house. These buildings or departments, enumerating them in rude order from west to east, are: the general machine shop, the second story of which is the pattern shop; the blacksmith shop, the paper machinery department, with the boiler works, tin shop and rivet factory; on the wharf the paint and plumbers' and rigging shops, and the boat-yard shed, in which are the tools used in the construction of vessels, the second story of which is the mould loft. Next comes the furnace shed for building the frames and plates for use in the boat-yard, and then farther east the saw and planing-mill, over which is the joiner's shop; the iron foundry, with capacity for casting eight million pounds annually; the pattern storage house, the brass foundry, store or supply house, and still farther east the marine railway and lumber-yard.

There is much that is interesting to be seen in these various departments. The machinery generally is elaborate and intricate and nearly all of it ponderous and powerful to a degree that one seldom sees surpassed. Eleven steam-engines are used to develop the power required by this large establishment. Huge cranes, some of them operated by steam, are placed here and there throughout the shops and yard where heavy machinery or parts of machines are to be handled. The iron foundry, built in 1873, and the brass foundry, built in 1885, are model ones, and there are facilities for casting almost anything that may be demanded, however huge or complicated. The writer saw here a cylinder for a cotton compress, having an internal diameter of sixty-eight inches, or nearly six feet, and weighing over thirteen tons, but this is by no means one of the heaviest castings that have come from the Pusey & Jones Company's foundry. They cast the large anchors for the Brooklyn bridge, which weighed twenty-three tons each, the dimensions being so great the castings could not be transported by rail, and had to be made at a foundry having direct water communication with New York. A good idea of the imensity and variety of the work done at the establishment is afforded by a tour through the pattern store-house in which the wooden patterns for almost every conceivable form of casting crowd the shelves of a large three-story building, leaving only narrow aisles, in which the genius of the place, who has been seventeen years in the charge of the department, can walk to and fro and lay his hand on any especial pattern that may be desired among the many thousands.

This great plant, in which from seven to nine hundred men are employed at a weekly expense of about $7000 (contrasting strangely with the weekly pay-roll of $100 in 1848), is devoted to the construction of iron and steel ships, the building of engines and boilers, the manufacture of heavy boat-yard and boiler shop tools, large and small castings of all descriptions both iron and brass, the building of improved machinery for paper-mills and also for sugar-making factories, the latter with especial reference to the new process of "diffusion," also machinery for powder-mills and for cotton-presses, building for the latter the famous three thousand ton Taylor patent compress.

The products of this business are not only distributed throughout this country, but are found in foreign lands—paper machinery in England, Scotland, Austria, Switzerland, Russia and Japan; and iron and steel steamers and lighters on the rivers of Mexico, Peru, New Granada, Venezuela, Ecuador, Brazil, and in other parts of South America. Thirty-seven steamers built by this establishment are in service upon the river Amazon and its tributaries, and the fact has been noted that vessels for four nations—viz.: the United States, Brazil, Venezuela and Mexico—were upon the stocks here at the same time. During the past twenty-five years the company has built over one hundred iron and steel steamers for Mexico, Central and South America and the West Indies, many of which were shipped in sections and erected after arrival at destination, this process being a specialty with the company, and thus while their machinery has made them known almost everywhere throughout the civilized world, the name of the Pusey & Jones Company has been carried by their vessels on nearly all the waters of the Western Hemisphere.

Enoch Moore's ship-yard and marine-railway is at the foot of East Fourth Street, and occupies over two acres of ground, including yard, saw-mill, storehouses and railway for hauling vessels out preparatory to giving them such attention as they may require. A steam-engine of about thirty horsepower is used for operating the various appliances, and about fifty men are employed. Mr. Moore builds wooden vessels and ships, from the smallest yawl or yacht up to the large full-rigged ship, but his specialty is the construction of steam freight-barges, and he has constructed a large number of these which have been sent to all parts of the country. He has ample facilities for the docking and repairing of all kinds of vessels, and in this respect his yard cannot be surpassed even in such localities as Philadelphia or Baltimore. A vessel of as great burden as seven hundred tons can be drawn out of water high and dry upon the marine-railway.
NEW CASTLE COUNTY.

Mr. Moore has had a life-long experience in this business, having begun it in the firm of E. & C. Moore as early as 1856, and conducts it as sole proprietor since 1871.

One of the ships built at Wilmington had an interesting history and became widely known. This was the brig "Nancy," built by Barney Harris at a ship yard at the foot of Market Street, and owned by Joseph Shailer, Joseph Tatnall, and other citizens of Wilmington, and commanded by Captain Hugh Montgomery. On the breaking out of the Revolution she was chartered (in March, 1775) by Robert Morris, the great financier, "without whom Washington's sword would have rusted in its sheath," to proceed to the West Indies and procure a cargo of the munitions of war. In March, 1776, she sailed for Porto Rico under English colors, taking the Spanish counsel, Don Antonio Serona, to procure arms and ammunition under a contract previously made with the Spanish government. In order to elude suspicion she made frequent trips to other islands in the vicinity, and while at St. Thomas her captain received the news of the Declaration of Independence and the adoption of the Stars and Stripes as the national colors. Captain Montgomery immediately procured materials and had a flag made, and as he sailed out of the harbor pulled down the English flag and hoisted the Stars and Stripes, saluting it with thirteen guns.

On arriving in the Delaware he was chased by the English fleet and to escape and save as much of his cargo as possible, Captain Montgomery ran the "Nancy" ashore above Cape May and began to unload her. The English kept up a constant fire, which he returned with his guns. At last he succeeded in getting the cargo all landed except a few barrels of powder, but the fire of the British had reduced the brig to a perfect wreck. Determined that she should never be captured, Montgomery made his preparations for blowing her up, and taking the flag which had been floating defiantly from the stump of the mast, he left the vessel and rowed rapidly away. Seeing him leaving the brig, the British sent their barges to take possession and just as they were going on board she blew up, destroying many lives. Of course such a tragic end to a vessel built and owned in Wilmington created an immense excitement in the town, and for that matter throughout the country. Captain Montgomery was complimented and "fitted as a hero and the "Nancy" was the theme of song and story.

CAR-BUILDING.—Jackson & Sharpe Company.—The great railroad passenger car and ship-building plant of Jackson & Sharpe Company, known as the Delaware Car Works, and situated at the foot of Eighth Street, alongside the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad tracks, and between the Brandywine and Christiana, constitute not only one of the largest, but one of the most interesting industrial establishments in the city. It was founded by Job H. Jackson, and Jacob F. Sharpe in January, 1863, the erection of the first buildings immediately following, and the building of cars being commenced in May. The first product of the works, the pioneer peach or fruit cars of Delaware, were finished and delivered in July, and thus was begun the activity of this house, which has been uninterruptedly maintained and constantly increased for almost a quarter of a century. The only change which has occurred in the house came about in 1870, when Mr. Sharpe withdrew, and Mr. Jackson, associating with himself two or three others, secured a charter of incorporation for Jackson & Sharpe Company, with a capital of five hundred thousand dollars. Job H. Jackson became president of this organization, and has continued in that position to the present time. Chas. S. Howland is now the treasurer, and Ellwood C. Jackson, secretary.

Some idea of the growth of this concern may be conveyed to him who reads as he runs, by the simple statement that at the outset the shops had capacity for only six cars, one hundred men being employed, while now the vast buildings contain from seventy to eighty cars in various stages of construction, and the number of employees is from one thousand to eleven hundred. There has been a corresponding increase in steam-power, and the capabilities of the plant have been further enhanced by the introduction of labor-saving machinery, every known device that is an improvement upon an old one being secured without regard to cost of the new or the value of the discarded article. The tract of land on which the works are located consists of about twenty acres, and being bounded by the Christiana and the Brandywine, and by the tracks of the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad, the facilities for shipment are unsurpassed. The buildings, by successive additions and new erections, have extended over about two-thirds of the ground, and constitute an elaborate and convenient system, each of the greater ones being devoted to a specific purpose, and the whole forming such a diversified hive of industry as is seldom met with, even in this city, noted for its colossal manufactories.

But before taking a view of the interior of these buildings let us glance for a moment at what may be called the out-door interests of the Jackson & Sharpe Company. These may be said to be the ship-yard, and the lumber-yard. This industrial house, known chiefly as the builders of cars, curiously enough, has constructed and set afloat, from the yard on the Christiana, about one hundred and eighty vessels, and there is seldom a time when from two to a half-dozen hulls are not to be seen in various processes of construction upon the stocks or floating in the river awaiting the concluding details of finish. These vessels are of every variety (except iron), and most of them are stanch, sea-going ships, whose keels cleave the waters of every ocean of the world, making the name of the builder known in the farthest parts of the Occident, the Orient and the antipodes. The repairing of ships is quite a feature here, and a fine marine railway is in operation, upon which the man-made monsters of the deep can be hauled up high and dry, repaired to any extent and slid back in the water. The lumber-yard in itself represents a vast business. It contains almost always from five to seven million feet of lumber, representing about a quarter of a million dollars. It is kept on hand for several years—undergoing a seasoning by natural processes, and that which is used in the finer work is, in addition, carefully kiln-dried. Here are yellow-pine, ash, oak, white-wood and white pine, for the substantial parts of the car, and cherry, black-walnut and rich mahogany, from Mexico and the West Indies, for the inside ornamental work.

Within the buildings this lumber is rapidly worked into form, for building the cars, by hundreds of machines, many of them costly and intricate. In two immense rooms, which seem perfect wildernesses of machinery and ever running, endless belts, innumerable wheels are whirling, and swift, steam-driven saws and blades are eating their way into oaken planks and beam, and fashioning more delicate ornaments from costlier woods, the drowsy hum of wheels high in air mingling with the more incisive sound of those in contact with the wood. The shrieking saws and rumbling planers make a wonderful conglomeration of noise; but if one listens long enough it seems to resolve itself into a sturdy rhythmic song of the restless and resistless energy of labor and achievement which has a dignity of its own. In these great machinery halls there is no dust, for a complicated system of huge tubes ramifications throughout the building, and there is an open mouth at every piece of machinery, which sucks the saw dust and other fragments of wood away as fast as they fly from the iron, and presto! they are stored in a great brick stack contiguous to the boilers, and thus the waste of the mill is made to drive the engines which keep all of this machinery in motion.

But these men who labor in conjunction with the hundred curious and complicated machines in the wood-working department are, after all, only a small portion of the whole force employed. Elsewhere there are skillful designers, decorators, upholsterers, and hundreds of carpenters, cunning carvers of wood, and in a darksome, far-extending shop, by themselves, a throng of the swarthy sons of Tubal Cain, toiling at their fiery forges and ringing anvils. Here, too, man's strongest servant, steam, is pressed into the service of Vulcans, and strikes more ponderous hammer-blows than can the arm of most stalwart man. The elaborate construction of a modern railroad car, and varied nature of its materials, and the trades and arts employed in building it, are not often thought of, probably, by those who enjoy the luxury of modern travel; but an enumeration of the tradesmen and mechanics who contribute to the structure will convey some idea of the complexity of the work. To begin with, there are the blacksmiths, of whom we have spoken (and the Jackson & Sharpe Company make all of their own forgings), the carpenter, the designer, painter, cabinet-maker, carver, turner, machinist, iron-founder, brass-founder, wheel-maker, spring-maker, pattern-maker, upholsterer, hardware man, lamp-maker, stove-maker, plumber, steam-pipe fitter, china dealer, glazier, gilder, tinsmith, electro-plater, rubber manufacturer, engraver, chaser, letterer, axle-maker, varnisher, carpet weaver, plunger-maker, tanner, the silk, cotton, woolen, thread, oil-cloth and trimming manufacturers, the common laborer, and last, but not least, in this year, 1887, the electrician, who "wires" the car and introduces incandescent lamps.

The process of building a car after the lumber is sawed and planed and otherwise prepared is something like this: It goes first to the setting up building, where is performed the work of laying the sills, framing up and covering in, a process which is about half-way between ship building and house building. Indeed, the cars, arranged much in the same manner as when composing a train, strongly suggest the latter when about half completed, looking not unlike a row of well-built miniature houses. When the wood-work is completed, the car goes on temporary tracks to the painting-house, where it receives a long course of treatment, one coat of paint after another being laid on to the number of six. This is allowed to dry and penetrate the wood, is then rubbed off until a proper surface is prepared for the three coats of varnish which form the finish. After the painting comes the upholstering and ornamenting of the car. The seats have been made ready in the cabinet-shop, the cushions prepared, etc., and the cloth ceilings have received their handsome decorations in a loft set aside for the purpose. The trucks, which have been made in a separate shop, are brought in, and the car being mounted upon them, is trundled out upon the sidetrack to be in due time whisked away to any part of the United States, Canada or Mexico, or perhapes shipped to Australia, Brazil, the Argentine Republic, Central America or the West Indies, for all of these lands and many others pay tribute unto the Jackson & Sharpe Company. The whole time occupied in passing from the crude material to the finished car is about two months, a large portion of the period being taken up in the slow drying of the several coats of paint and varnish. From seventy to eighty cars are constantly undergoing this evolution, and the works have a capacity for turning out about four hundred passenger, sleeping and parlor coaches per year, which, with the ships built, makes a total annual product of upwards of a million and a half dollars value. Since the establishment of the works many thousand cars have been built, and, as heretofore mentioned, about one hundred and eighty wooden vessels have been launched from the ship-yards. The Jackson & Sharpe Company were the pioneers in the building of narrow-gauge cars, the first ever constructed in America being delivered by them at Denver, Colorado, for the Denver and Rio Grande Railway Company, on August 2, 1871. Another interesting feature in the work at this establishment has been the building of palatial private cars, among others one for Dom Pedro, Emperor of Brazil, awarded the medal at the Centennial Exposition. They have also built many for the uncrowned kings of commerce and trade in the United States, many of whom are in the true sense of the term grander characters and possess more power than the sovereigns of foreign countries; but perhaps the most notable item upon the books of the Jackson & Sharpe Company is one which refers to the building of a coach for King Oscar of Sweden. It is a fact to be proud of that a sovereign of the Old World, wanting the best railway car that could be produced, should call into service the brains of New World artists and artisans, and beyond this there is a certain striking and practical significance in the fact that a sumptuous private car for Sweden's King should be built in 1876 within a stone's throw of "the Rocks," forming a natural wharf in the Christiana, where the first Swedish immigrants landed in 1638.

The Jackson & Sharpe Company's works form a model industrial institution, and one exhibiting many admirable features peculiar to itself. The building up and successful maintenance of such a huge industry is always a matter worthy of admiration and respect, and in this case deserving of more than usual praise because exhibiting the results of industry and acumen in a man who has had the benefit of no adventitious aids in life, and made his way by his own resources of ability and energy from a very humble position in boyhood and early manhood.

The Pullman Palace Car Company's Works is another great establishment which is of vast benefit to Wilmington. The works were originally started as a private enterprise in 1871, by Bowers & Dure (Thomas W. Bowers and Henry F. Dure), and were successfully carried on by them for several years. They made all kinds of railway and street cars, and employed as many as three hundred and fifty men. Mr. Dure finally became sole proprietor, and sold out the plant and real property around it to the Pullman Company in the summer of 1886.

This company, notwithstanding its huge plant near Chicago desiring similar shops in the East have erected the present commodious buildings.

The work done here is rebuilding and repairing, and yet, it being the policy of the company to give every one of its cars an overhauling every six months, the aggregate is a huge accomplishment. The shops have a capacity for holding twenty-seven cars, and about six hundred can be handled in a year. To do this work, an average force of six hundred and seventy-five is needed, and also the best of machinery in the different departments driven by an eighty horse power engine. The shops are under charge of Superintendent A. J. Drake, who has been with the Pullman Company about twenty-three years, located at Elmira, New York, and at Philadelphia, until the shops there were burned, and the company located in Wilmington.

The Lobdell Car-Wheel Company's plant is not only one of the very largest and oldest manufactories of any kind in Wilmington, but the oldest car-wheel establishment in the country, and it is claimed the best equipped and most complete for making chilled wheels in the world. The company also does a large business in manufacturing chilled rails, but that specialty is one of comparatively recent adoption. The car-wheel works have been in existence over half a century, having been established in 1856. The founders were Bonney & Bush. It is significant that when they started their small works, Ross Winans, of Baltimore, was the only other successful manufacturer in this line in the whole country, and that now there are about ninety establishments in the land with an annual capacity of about one million five hundred thousand wheels of all kinds. When Bonney & Bush started, they considered it an exceptional day's work to cast six wheels and fit them to axles, while now the works have a capacity of five hundred wheels per day. The maximum capacity reached by this firm in 1838 was thirty to forty wheels per day, with facilities for fitting possibly one-half to axles. In 1838, Mr. Bonney died, and was succeeded by his nephew, George G. Lobdell, the new firm bearing the title of Bush & Lobdell. The business grew to such proportions that in 1844 they were compelled to build a new foundry, with a capacity of one hundred and fifty wheels per day, although it was some time before that many were cast. The fitting capacity at this time was not over fifty per day, the wheels being forced on the axle by means of a screw-press. In 1853 the new foundry was burned down, but was rebuilt as soon as possible thereafter, and a fitting-up shop added; the capacity being increased to two hundred wheels per day, with facilities for fitting about eighty. It was about this time that the hydraulic press was introduced, which greatly facilitated fitting wheels to axles. In 1855, Charles Bush, the senior member of the firm of Bush & Lobdell, died, and the business was conducted by his heirs and George G. Lobdell under the same name until 1859, when George G. Lobdell obtained full possession. The works during this régime were somewhat enlarged to admit of casting an increased number of tires, which had become an important part of the business, reaching, in fact, a total of thirty tires per day. It was not until 1867, however, that the demand required an increased output of wheels. During that year additional ground adjoining the works was bought; the capacity for casting was increased to two hundred and fifty wheels per day, and for fitting to seventy pairs. In the spring of 1867 the Lobdell Car-Wheel Company was organized, and business transferred to that corporation, the officers being George G. Lobdell, president; William W. Lobdell, secretary; and P. N. Brennan, treasurer. The demand increased to such an extent that in 1872 it was found necessary to build an additional foundry and a large machine-shop. In the two foundries three hundred wheels per day were cast, and the fitting facilities approached one hundred pairs daily. The panic of 1873 prostrated the business for some years, as it did nearly all other branches of manufacture, and it was not until 1880 and 1881 that the increased demand overtaxed the capacity of the works. At that time further enlargement became necessary, and as there was no room for additional buildings at the old site, it was thought best to build an entirely new plant on land owned by the company in South Wilmington. Ground was broken in the fall of 1881, and by July, 1882, the new works were ready for occupancy. The new foundry, which is almost entirely built of brick and iron, is two hundred and eighty-six feet by two hundred feet, with an addition one hundred and fifty-four feet by eighty-eight feet for sand-bins, core-ovens, etc. There is sufficient floor-room to cast seven hundred and twenty wheels per day in the main building, and the sorting-room and iron-shed, which adjoin the same, are so arranged that by simply removing a partition of corrugated iron, they can be thrown into the main building and also utilized for moulding purposes. The cupolas, five in number, have a combined melting capacity of sixty tons per hour. The machine-shop, pattern-shop and smith-shop are conveniently located near the wheel foundry, separated from it by the railroad tracks necessary for the receipt of the raw materials and the shipment of the finished products. The machine-shop, besides the machinery for finishing our own fixtures and doing the necessary repairs, contains lathes, mills and presses sufficient to fit up one hundred pairs of wheels per day, and is so arranged that, by putting in additional machinery, this output could be doubled. Situated within a half-mile of the Delaware River and with fine dockage upon the Christiana and connected by side tracks with the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad, the company has as fine shipping advantages as could be desired. In order to further assist their business, the company in 1880 bought three cold-blast furnaces in Southwest Virginia with the necessary ore beds and timber lands to operate them, and thus assuring themselves of a constant supply of the best cold-blast charcoal iron. In the manufacture of chilled wheels—called “chilled” because of the chilling or hardening of the surface through being cast in metal moulds—there have been numerous patents and some of the best by members of this house. George G. Lobdell, in 1861, patented what is known as Lobdell’s Improved Single Plate Wheel, and in 1869 a combination wheel, and in 1876 William W. Lobdell for turning, grinding or otherwise trueing the treads of chilled wheels, thus insuring a perfectly cylindrical shape.

The shop where the manufacture of chilled rolls for paper-machines, flour-mills, etc., is carried on is separate from the car-wheel works, and the offices of the company are in connection with this latter building. The shop is about five hundred feet long, and filled with all varieties of machinery used in grinding the huge rolls down to the perfectly cylindrical form and smoothness which are absolute essentials when the rolls are used in the manufacture of paper and for grinding flour, etc. About one hundred and fifty men are employed here and about five hundred in the car-wheel works. The company casts as well as grinds its rolls and has received premiums upon them at the Centennial Exposition, the Paris Exposition and the International Cotton Exposition at Atlanta, Ga., in 1881. The officers of the company (1887) were: President, George G. Lobdell; Vice-President, W. W. Lobdell; Secretary, George G. Lobdell, Jr.; Treasurer, P. N. Brennan.

Charles Bush was the eldest son of David and Martha Bush and great-grandson of Christopher and Elizabeth Bush, the first progenitors of the family of whom an authentic account exists in this country. He was born in Wilmington in 1805, and was educated in his native city.

At the age of sixteen he went to Baltimore to Machinery — Betts Machine Co. — A firm doing an extensive business in the manufacture of heavy machinery is the Betts Machine Company, of Maryland Avenue. The house of E. & A. Betts was established in 1860, and incorporated under its present title in 1879; the present officers being, president, Alfred Betts; vice-president, William Betts; treasurer, Edward T. Betts. The plant is located on a tract of about seven acres of land, and the buildings are extensive, the foundry having an area of seventy by one hundred and thirty feet, the machine shop four hundred by fifty feet, the pattern shop, blacksmith shop and pattern storehouses one hundred and twenty by forty feet, besides which are the office building, etc. Steam-power is supplied by three large engines. The facilities for shipment from these works are unsurpassed, as the railroad tracks run directly through the yards, and the house possesses about every convenience desirable. The products of the works consist of machine tools and appliances of all kinds, including lathes, planers, drills, slotting-machines, turning and boring-machines, car-wheel borers, cutting-off machines, standard gauges, etc., for the manufacture of all of which the company has the highest reputation in the trade.

The Remington Machine Company occupies an honored place among the workers in iron, and its plant serves also the Hall Steam Pump Company. Mr. George W. Remington started the business, to which the company bearing his name succeeded, in 1872, and it was gradually developed by him until 1886, when it became desirable to organize a private corporation. This was accordingly done. Mr. Remington being elected as president; H. M. Taylor, secretary and treasurer; and J. J. Satterthwait, superintendent. The particular lines of business carried on are the building of engines, boilers, steam-pumps, etc., and also brass casting and finishing. A specialty is the building of Corliss engines. The company has an extensive plant at 411-419 Front Street, the works being supplied with all of the best machinery used in this line of manufacture, and employing about seventy-five skilled mechanics. The market is found in all parts of the United States and Canada. The officers of the company are the same as those first chosen.

Of the Hall Steam Pump Company, formerly doing business under the laws of New Jersey, a partial reorganization was effected by the Remington Company, March 15, 1887. The officers are: president, William G. Pennypacker; vice-president, Frank Taylor (both of Wilmington); general manager and treasurer, E. J. Waring (of New York); and J. J. Satterthwait, of Wilmington, superintendent of the works.

G. W. Baker & Co. — The specialty of this firm is morocco machinery, though the firm are general machinists. The business was established in 1870.
by the senior member, and the present title was adopted in 1833, M. P. Satterthwaite being the silent partner. The works occupy buildings at 214, 216 and 218 French Street and employ about twenty hands. The firm is prepared to fully equip a morocco house with every detail in iron or wood.

A. L. Hendeer, general machinist, is only a trifle younger in business than the house just spoken of, having started in 1872. The plant was removed from Christiana Street only a short time since to Maryland Avenue and Beach Streets, where it occupies a three-story brick building. A specialty of Mr. Hendeer's is the manufacture of boiler tube expanders, which are shipped all over the country. Stationary engines are also made.

E. Hendeer & Co. are engaged in general machine making in the same locality.

The Trump Brothers Machine Company are heavy manufacturers of small machinery, such for instance, are the "Keystone Knitter," and also of bolts and nuts. They are located on Maryland Avenue and carre here in 1873, coming from Rochester, New York. The incorporation of the house under its present title followed in 1879. They were the inventors and patentees of the famous "Fleetwood Scroll Saw," of which they formerly made immense numbers, which were sold throughout the country. Their business is now principally in hose machinery and the articles heretofore mentioned, for the former of which the sale market is in Philadelphia. They employ about fifty men, and their works are well supplied with machinery adopted to their peculiar line of manufacture. The president of the company is Charles N. Trump; vice-president and treasurer, Samuel N. Trump; secretary, George R. C. Hoffbecker; superintendent, C. Frederick; and assistant superintendent, William Frederick. Some of the goods of this house go to such remote parts of the world as Japan, Siam and Australia.

Walker & Elliott, although general machinists, make a specialty of phosphate machinery or fertilizer-mills, with which they have supplied some of the leading manufacturers in the country. The individual members of the firm are V. C. Walker and R. T. Elliott, and their plant is at Second and Lombard Streets. It has been operated since 1880.

J. G. Hirsel, No. 206 East Second Street, commenced business in 1870 and manufactures a bolt and rivet-cutter which he invented, besides which he invented a drilling-machine and a meat-chopper. He is now working on a suction-machine.

Charles Heinel & Son commenced in 1885 on East Second Street, No. 206, and do electric work, modeling, and all kinds of machine work.

Iron.—The Diamond State Iron Company.—The large works of this company, where about seven hundred workmen are employed and the pay-roll exceeds $1000 per day, had their inception in a very small establishment started in 1853, and their present extent and the solidity of the business illustrates what may be attained by the gradual but constant growth of a manufacturing industry under strong but conservative and safe management. In the year referred to, Robert S. Harris, with whom Joshua P. Edge appears to have been associated (but not as partner, or at least not in the possession of property), in connection with a shipbuilding business, put in operation a small "train of rolls" for the manufacture of bar iron, upon the ground now covered by the lower or southern part of the Diamond State Mill. From that time to the present there have been numerous changes in proprietorship and a constant increase in the capacity of the works, of which we will give an outline before attempting to describe the plant as it now exists. To begin with, we find that Robt. S. Harris retained ownership only a couple of years, selling in 1855, to Delaplain McDaniel, William S. Craigie and Joshua P. Edge, who continued under the firm-name of McDaniel, Craigie & Co., until 1857, when Mr. Edge retired, his interest being taken by the two remaining partners. In 1859 they took into partnership John H. Adams, and the firm-name was changed to McDaniel, Adams & Co. In the latter part of the same year or early in 1860 Mr. Craigie sold out his interest to the late Henry Mendinshall, and the firm, of which Mr. McDaniel and Mr. Adams still remained members, continued to do business under the firm-name of McDaniel, Adams & Co., until June 17, 1865, when they sold out to the Diamond State Iron Company, which had received its charter the previous month, and, it is worthy of note, was the first incorporated manufacturing company in the State. The persons forming this company were the same who had constituted the firm just prior to incorporation, and they organized under their charter by electing John H. Adams president, and Henry Mendinshall, secretary and treasurer. Towards the latter part of 1866, Mr. Adams resigned his office and retired from the company, disposing of his interest to Clement B. Smyth, and thereupon Mr. Mendinshall was elected to the office of president (which he held continuously until his death, April 28, 1887), and Mr. Smyth was made treasurer. In October, 1886, George W. Todd entered the company, and early in the following year John T. Davis, a practical iron man, became a member and was made superintendent of the works (which place, by the way, he held until January, 1885, when he was elected general superintendent). Mr. Smyth retained the office of secretary only about two years, or until November 14, 1868, when he resigned, and George W. Todd was elected as his successor. Mr. Smyth was then elected vice-president and still retained the office of treasurer. He resigned the latter in July, 1884, and Mr. Todd was chosen to fill the position, which he did (in addition to performing the duties of secretary) until July, 1887. At that time, when was held the first meeting of the directors after the death of Mr. Mendinhall, Mr. Clement B. Smyth was elected president; Mr. Todd, vice-president (still retaining the office of treasurer); and Mr. Howard T. Wallace was chosen as secretary, and served in that capacity until January, 1888, when he resigned that office to accept another important position with the company, and Mr. Lewis A. Bower was chosen secretary. There have been no changes since.

Up to 1865 the plant consisted of a small building, with only one engine and a large and small train of rolls, the capacity of the works being about fifty tons of finished iron per week, and the number of employees did not exceed about seventy, while the pay-roll amounted only to the comparatively small sum of about $800 per week. Nevertheless, the firm had been quite successful through the war period under the greatly stimulated condition of trade, and it was that prosperity which led to the incorporation of the Diamond State Iron Company, and a very extensive enlargement of the plant. It was at this time that the company began the erection of the large building on Church Street, in which were placed two trains of rolls, four heating furnaces and all the necessary accompanying implements and machinery, by which addition the capacity of the works was more than doubled. In 1869 the company enlarged its possessions by the purchase of a considerable tract of ground contiguous to its mills from the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad Company, and in 1870 a great addition to the works was made by the erection of a large machine shop, and also a spike, bolt and nut shop, both of which were elaborately equipped with the best of machinery, tools, etc., for the manufacture of track-fastenings, plain and angle splice bars, bolts, nuts, washers, spikes and other railroad supplies.

The business of the company was still further increased in 1876 by the purchase of the property known as the Old Ferry Rolling-Mill on the opposite side of the Christiana River, and in 1883 ten acres of land adjoining this mill was bought by the company. In 1877 was begun the manufacture of horse and mule-shoes, which now forms one of its large specialties.

The capacity of the works for the production of finished material of all kinds is over thirty thousand gross tons per year. There are four trains of rolls in the Diamond State Mills, and the number of heating furnaces at this mill is six, and the number of puddling furnaces five. At the Old Ferry Mill there are seven trains of rolls, and nine heating and four puddling furnaces. For the benefit of those to whom these figures do not convey an adequate idea of the mighty work of Vulcan performed here, we may add a few more statistics which will perhaps be easier for the mind inexperienced in iron manufacture to comprehend.

Twenty-one steam-engines are displaying their restless and resistless energy in different parts of the works, the number being greater than in any other of the huge establishments which make Wilmington a well-known name all over the world. They vary in size from quite small ones up to the great two hundred horse power Corliss engine, which is a magnificent specimen of its class. The coal consumption in the furnace and under the numerous boilers in connection with the engines amounts to about one hundred tons per day and some days more than one hundred tons of finished iron are produced with this outlay of fire and steam, laboring in conjunction with the brawn and brain of the hundreds of skilled employees. As we have before said, the number of hands engaged here is about seven hundred.

An inspection of the works is very interesting. The iron from the time it leaves the puddling furnace in a great glowing mass, like the “golden fleece,”—and certainly greater possibilities of wealth than the fabled article for which the ancient Greeks sought,—goes through many processes before the finished product lies in the warehouse. It is gripped and rolled into a cylindrical form in the powerful rotary squeezer, passed back and forth by deft and strong hands through the trains of rolls until it comes out in long bars—the “merchant bar” of commerce—or in bars of other forms to undergo still further manipulations in ponderous machines which fashion it into spikes, bolts, nuts, horse and mule-shoes and many other articles. Some of these machines,—as, for instance, those which form finished railroad spikes from long rods of iron, biting off the proper length and making head and point at a single stroke—exhibit almost the perfection of ingenuity in modern machinery. More striking, however, than anything else in the entire works are the automatic spike-machines, located in the Old Ferry Mill (where, by the way, are also ten ingeniously constructed horse-shoe machines). These spike-machines, unlike those alluded to, are fed with red-hot iron, which, from the time it leaves the rolls is scarcely touched by human hands until, in the form of perfected railroad spikes, it reaches the keggers. The process in brief is this: The iron in the form of a white-hot “faggot” or “billet” is brought from the furnace to the rolls, through which it passes several times, becoming constantly more attenuated until finally, though in bar shape, it appears like a slender, fiery serpent, rearing its head as it comes through the rolls and then gliding and writhing upon the polished iron floor. When the glowing bar, perhaps fifty or sixty feet in length, passes for the last time through the rolls, it glides along an iron trough into another furnace, a long low oven, which serves to keep it hot until it reaches the machines proper. Into these ponderous and complicated masses of wheels two of the bars are creeping side by side. One stroke of the massive mechanism forms a perfect spike, and so fast do these strokes come that the spikes drop from the two machines that one cannot well count them. They are caught by buckets on endless belts, which carry them up still hot and drop them with ceaseless thud, thud, thud, into cars upon a miniature elevated railroad. The cars being run along this tramway high overhead, are opened at the proper place automatically, and their loads of spikes crash down upon the cooling frames, still ruddy from the heat of the furnace. The iron has passed in the space of two or three minutes a distance of a hundred and fifty feet or more from the glowing lump of metal at the furnace to the condition of the finished and fast blackening spike at the "kegger's" hands.

As marvelous as are their spike-machines and various appliances for the production of their standard railroad plain and angle splices, bars and bolts and nuts (which are so well and favorably known by most of the largest railroads of the United States), possibly no part of this establishment is as well equipped with ingenious and modern machinery as their horse-shoe department, where over one hundred different patterns and sizes of shoes are made, and, undoubtedly, no part of their product so much interests the residents of the State of Delaware, as every owner of a horse or mule should desire to have him shod with the latest and best shoe. These shoes are made either of iron or steel, and the fact that during the past year the company have been compelled to double their capacity to make these goods, to meet the requirements of their rapidly-increasing trade, speaks more conclusively than any words we can write, of the appreciation with which they are received by consumers, their trade for shoes extending from Maine to Texas.

The warehouses by Third Street Bridge, one on each side of the Christina River, are kept constantly supplied with the different products of the works awaiting shipment, for which fine facilities are afforded from the four or five hundred feet of wharf. A cooperage, in which all of the kegs used by the company for putting up spikes, horse-shoes, etc., are made, adjoins the warehouses. The works are lighted throughout by electricity, and possess every modern improvement for economic manufacture, as do the offices at the corner of Third and Church Streets for the prompt and rapid discharge of business. In fact, the Diamond State Iron Company's Works proclaim everywhere a wise and far-seeing management, and they constitute an establishment of which the proprietors may be justly proud.

The J. Morton Poole Company, makers of chilled iron rolls and calenders, is one of the large and widely-known Wilmington manufactories, which had an exceedingly humble origin, and grew little by little through constant application and endeavor, into its present greatness. This greatness consists not in immensity of plant or the employment of a host of men, but in the pre-eminence attained in an exceedingly baffling line of manufactures and of the wide-spread acknowledgement of that pre-eminence through patronage, for the whole country and almost every quarter of the globe pay this practical tribute to the establishment we are about to briefly consider. The company are manufacturers of chilled rolls used in the grinding of flour, the making of paper, sheet rubber, cloth, and latterly, linoleum. It at first seems curious, that a large house engaged exclusively in this one specialty should have grown from a very small establishment engaged in the production of a great variety of articles—but it is, in accordance with the spirit which has governed manufacturing generally during the past few years, and which has led to the highest excellence of result. The small establishment referred to, out of which the present one was evolved was a machine shop, started in 1839 by J. Morton Poole, upon the Brandywine where the Bancroft mills now are. Indeed the shop was in the basement of one of the old buildings. Here Mr. Poole, then a young man, carried on the miscellaneous business common to such establishments, made a scantly living, and began that course of practical study and experiment which in after years brought him success. In 1848 he purchased of John Merrick an old building standing on the site of the present works, and removing to this, slightly enlarged his operations. If he had a specialty, it may be said to have been milling machinery. On May 2, 1853, William T. Porter, who had learned his trade with Mr. Poole was taken into partnership. From this time on the business was conducted prosperously enough and without incident of unusual note; except that the shop was destroyed by fire in 1855; but this was perhaps a blessing in disguise, for it enabled the company to build a larger and more convenient structure in which they could carry on the more extensive business which was soon to come to them. In 1867 the manufacture of chilled rolls was commenced, and for twenty years it is safe to say that line of manufacture has been steadily advancing. What is known as "chilled" roll is simply a roller of regular cylindrical shape, cast in a metal mould, by which process the surface is "chilled" or made hard almost to the degree of steel, thus permitting it to be accurately ground or polished and prepar.

...ing it to withstand great pressure. It is the grinding or turning down of these rolls that forms the difficult part of their manufacture. They must be absolutely true, so that pairs of them may touch equally throughout their length and must turn on exact centres. The necessity of this precision is what makes rolls expensive and the rollmaker's work an art and science. It is what made and still makes experiment and study indispensable to this branch of manufacturing. It took a year's time to produce the first roll at these works, and the second was made in a couple of days, but the makers had got their education while bringing to a finish the primal one. The process after the roll is cast is very similar to that of lathe-turning of wood, in fact exactly the same thing except that the motion is exceedingly slow, as no tools could withstand the heat generated by a rapid motion. The roll after being turned down to comparative smoothness is taken to what is called the "grinding machine" which is simply to the eye of the uninitiated a finer, a finishing lathe, but which in reality is a very wonderful piece of mechanism. It is upon this little machine, grimy and greasy, dripping with water and half covered with iron cuttings that the responsibility so to speak, of making a mathematically accurate roll rests. It is a big responsibility, but the little machine never fails to meet it and perform what is expected of it. The iron cylinder here slowly revolvs upon its own axis and passes horizontally backward and forward between two emery wheels which pare off here and there the millionth part of an inch until the roll is perfect and ready to do its perfect work in the paper-mill or some other manufactory. It is in reality performing upon ponderous iron as delicate work as the watchmaker's or that employed by the producer of the finest scientific instruments. The common-place appearing little black machine slowly pursuing the purpose of the man that planned it, slowly but surely brings absolute exactness out of roughness and inaccuracy is a masterpiece of mathematics and mechanics. There is a secret in the simple appearing mechanism which many skilled and scientific mechanics have looked for in vain. There is a secret even in the solid little emery wheels which do the grinding! But to the casual observer the strangest thing about this little wonder is the way in which it is governed. A man stands beside it with a long, light mallet in his hand, and every few seconds or minutes taps gently upon small cranks or levers which regulate the pressure of the wheels upon the roll. Sometimes the top of the mallet turns the crank half way around, sometimes it moves it a distance scarcely appreciable to the eye, but every time it moves it a little backward or forward, and his strokes in the course of a day are innumerable. The marvellous thing about it is that he is not governed by what he sees but what he hears. There is not much to hear at any time, and what there is seems to the common ear drowned in the voice of the many larger machines throughout the shop doing rougher work, but he notes every infinitesimal variation in the grinding sound, and if it indicates too great or too little pressure he rectifies it. And so an ear, more exact than the piano-tuners or musician's, is brought to the work of fashioning a huge iron roll—a work which most people would suppose needed only brawn and ponderous machinery.

It is the extreme nicety thus employed which has made the chilled rolls of the Morton Poole Company, as near mathematical perfection as is possible, and given them a world-wide reputation. Their work achieved distinction in the French Exposition of 1878, and specimens of it have been sent to the paper, cloth or flour mills of almost every manufacturing center of our own country, and to almost every civilized foreign country,—including Australia. The works give employment to about one hundred and twenty-five men, and the value of their annual output is not far from one million five hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. J. Morton Poole died in 1879, but his name was retained when the company was incorporated, and Mr. William T. Potter and the estate of the deceased now carry on the works.

Something of what the late J. Morton Poole accomplished, has been shown in the preceding sketch, but he was so prominent and popular a man it is fitting that a few further details of his personal life should be preserved. He was born July 10, 1812, in Brandywine Village, now a part of the city of Wilmington, and was a son of William and Sarah (Sharpless) Poole. His father was a man of character and ability, a miller by occupation, deeply interested in mechanical matters; a cotemporary and friend of the celebrated Oliver Evans, and intimately acquainted with all of the men there locally prominent in manufacturing and kindred pursuits. He named his son after John Morton, one of the most intelligent and advanced of Wilmington's mechanics. Young Poole obtained the rudiments of his education in the schools of the village and at West-town Academy. He was then apprenticed to a machinist, in Mattawan, N. Y. Thence he went to Philadelphia where he attended the Franklin Institute Lectures, and indulged his taste by studying science and drawing, obtaining much of the practical knowledge that served him well in later years. At this time too he met the lady who afterwards became his wife, and thus this was a peculiarly fateful period in his life—the seed time both of the success and the happiness of his future. From Philadelphia Mr. Poole went to Providence, R. I., and entered into partnership with Edward... and a few others, were called upon to perform that work. Mr. Poole was afterwards a member of the speaking, to that of the horses represented.

MANUFACTURERS OF IRON AND STEEL BOILER PLATES, WILMINGTON, DELAWARE.
extensive iron-industries of the city are the Plate Rolling Mills of the Seidel & Hastings Company, whose plant is located on Church Street, between Ninth and Eleventh. The property having a frontage of about six hundred feet on the street first mentioned and extending back to the Brandywine.
The first industry, located on this side, was a small rolling-mill built about 1845. This passed into the ownership of Henry B. Seidel in 1864, and was carried on by him as sole proprietor until 1867, when Washington Hastings became associated with him under the firm-name of Seidel & Hastings.
Ten years later there was another change, and the style of the house became Seidel, Hastings & Company, the latest partner being Edward T. Canby. In 1884 the house became an incorporated company under the name The Seidel & Hastings Company with Henry B. Seidel as president, Washington Hastings vice-president and general manager and Edward T. Canby as secretary and treasurer.
Such in brief is the partnership and corporate history of this well-known old house. There remains not much more to say, because the most successful careers of companies or corporations, like those of individuals, are very apt to present the least of event. The firm in its several forms has pushed steadily ahead, and steadily gained ground, and held it. They have made gradually great improvements, so that the little establishment, which was the nucleus of the now great one, is completely lost within it. The original mill, built in 1845, was simply for rolling small iron boiler plates. The house now makes both iron and steel plates, for boilers, for ships, for bridgework, etc. They have added two rolling-mills and a forge for making charcoal-blooms, besides many other appliances.
The capacity of the mill prior to 1864 was from six to seven hundred tons of iron per year, and the establishment can now turn out about five thousand tons in the same length of time. That is to say, the output has been increased more than seven fold, besides being extended and diversified in nature. The establishment gives employment to about one hundred and twenty-five men. It contains seven horizontal engines running in power from ten to two hundred and fifty horse-power; three steamhammers, three steam-boilers, seven pairs of shears for shearing iron ranging from ½ to 1½ inches in thickness; it has three sets of rolls, five heating furnaces, five charcoal forge fires and six steam boilers. The company sells about fifty per cent of its iron and steel plates to boiler-makers and shipbuilders in Wilmington, and the rest is sent all over the country wherever there are industries in exsistence which have use for such wares. Considerable quantities have been sent to San Francisco.
The company has a warehouse at 183 Christopher Street, New York where quite a large stock of the different kinds of plates is kept constantly on hand to supply immediate demand. The members of the company which has thus been built up to large proportions from a comparatively humble beginning are all well known Wilmingtonians, and enjoy individually as high a place in the regard of the people in general as their house does in the estimation of the trade.

Washington Hastings, Vice-President and General Manager of "The Seidel & Hastings Company" of Wilmington, plate iron and steel manufacturers, was born in New Castle County, September 15, 1837. When he arrived at the age of twelve he removed to Wilmington and attended for two years the public school which was at the southwest corner Sixth and French Streets, and which is now used as a German Church. He then attended for a year the private school of Theodore Hyatt, at that time in the building now occupied by the Historical Society of Delaware, at Tenth and Market Streets. This ended his school life and being devoid of the many advantages that more fortunate young men have, he was compelled to decide upon a course of life that would fit him for a business career and with this end in view he apprenticed himself to a hardware firm at Second and Market streets. Here he remained until his twenty-first year when he entered the employ as a clerk of the Wilmington Plate Iron Works, now owned by the Seidel and Hastings Company. Here the inherent business ability and tact in the young clerk asserted itself.
Possessed as he was with business capabilities of the first quality, with an early life that had been formed under the direction and care of Christian influence, he soon won the confidence and esteem of his employers, rising to a position of prominence in the manufacturing community of Wilmington that is enviable. Always an ardent Republican, he has been a valued counsellor in the councils of his party, and his ability was recognized in 1881 by his being made a candidate for the office of Representative to Congress. This more than anything else indicates the esteem in which he is held, for in Delaware either party rarely goes out of the bar to obtain candidates for the national congress. The campaign that followed was the most fiercely contested known in the history of the State, the largest vote ever polled being cast, and his election was for a time regarded as more than probable, but—as usual in this State the large Democratic majority was found impossible to be overcome. This is the only office that Mr. Hastings was ever a candidate for.

At the age of nineteen Mr. Hastings connected himself with the St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal Church, and this tells the story as much of his success in life as any other one thing. In 1865, with a number of prominent members of St. Paul's they organized the Grace Methodist Episcopal Church, Ninth and West Streets. Here he has been active ever since, as a member of the Board of Trustees and a teacher in the Sunday school since its organization and of late years its superintendent. He was elected President of the Wilmington Board of Trade in 1874 and a delegate to the Convention of Merchants and Manufacturers held in Washington in 1876. He is also a director of the Artisans' Saving Bank, a manager of the Home for Friendless and Destitute Children of Wilmington, and a number of other benevolent institutions in a quiet way.

He was a delegate to the Republican National Convention held in Chicago in 1884, which nominated James G. Blaine; Mr. Hastings, however, voted for President Arthur on all the four ballots.

September 20, 1864, he was married to Miss Catharine, daughter of the late Samuel McCaulley, Esq., of Wilmington. William P. Hastings now a young man is the only child.

The Ainsworth Boiler and Pipe Covering Company on East Fourth Street, No. 521, was incorporated in 1885, when the company was formed but the business was started about 1872. They employ seven men and cover steam boilers, pipes and steam heated surfaces with plastic cement and felting, using about five hundred tons of material and covering from fifteen to twenty thousand square feet of surface per year.

The McCullough Iron Company occupy about seven acres of ground lying between the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad and the Christiana River, at the foot of Seventh Street. Upon this they have erected the Minquas Iron Works for the manufacture of sheet iron. These mills were completed and first went into operation in September, 1875. The principal buildings are two structures, each about eighty by two hundred feet, built of corrugated galvanized iron and containing machinery, furnaces and apparatus of the best character for the production of fine sheet iron. The total cost of the plant, including the ground, $250,000, and the annual product is three thousand tons. The iron manufactured here is well known among consumers of iron throughout the whole country as "Harvey's Patent Cleaned" iron. This name is derived from the machine by which the finish is imparted to the sheets, being the invention of Mr. E. A. Harvey, the present president of the company. It consists of very ingenious and complicated mechanism for removing the dust and dirt from the surface of the sheets, thereby obviating what had previously been the great objection to the use of the ordinary black sheet iron. About one hundred and fifty men are employed in the mills and the yearly expenditure for wages is about $100,000. The company is incorporated in the States of Delaware and Maryland, and the Minquas mill is one of four mills belonging to and operated by the same company. The largest one of their Maryland mills is situated at North East, Cecil County, and stands upon the site of the old forge and furnace formerly owned and operated by the Principio Company, an English organization which existed before the days of the Revolution. As far back as 1725 the Principio company had acquired land in Cecil County and elsewhere in Maryland and Virginia. They opened extensive ore banks and developed in the course of the next fifty years a very large industry in making pig iron and bar iron. For many years the greater portion of the iron made by them was sent over to England for use in that country. During the Revolution the property of the Principio company was confiscated as belonging to British subjects, and was sold by the State, except two portions, one the share of Thomas Russell, their manager in Maryland, who remained loyal to the Continental government and the other being the share originally owned by Lawrence Washington, brother of George Washington, who received it from their father Augustine Washington, who was one of the original members of the Principio company. The Virginia furnace, named Accokeek, was situated not far from the estate.

The McCullough Iron Company was the outgrowth of a partnership beginning in 1847, when Delaplaine McDaniel, Jethro J. McCullough and E. A. Harvey, all residents of Delaware, joined together to purchase the small iron works at North East, Maryland, then standing idle. Under the name of McCullough & Company they proceeded to put the property in order and began the manufacture of sheet iron. In this they were very successful, and in 1857 they added to their works the mill on the Octoraro Creek. They were incorporated as the McCullough Iron Company, and included with their other property the West Amwell mill, near Elkton, Md., which had formerly been owned and operated for a few years preceding by Mr. E. A. Harvey. In 1875, as above stated, they still further enlarged their capacity by building the Minquas mill. In addition to this they had established in Philadelphia their central office and warerooms and the large galvanizing works, at which is galvanized a large proportion of the sheet iron produced at their mills. The site in Wilmington upon which the Minquas mills are located is the place where the first sheet iron was first galvanized in the United States. In 1853 McCullough & Co. secured some trained workmen from England, and under the supervision of Mr. E. A. Harvey erected a small galvanizing works, which was the starting point of the manufacture of galvanized sheet iron in this country.
The President of the McCullough Iron Company from its organization until his death in 1885 (except during several years of ill health) was Mr. Delaplaine McDaniel, who had been the prominent and active man in the management of its affairs from the beginning. He was succeeded by Mr. E. A. Harvey, the present incumbent of the office. The third of the original members, Mr. Jethro J. McCullough, died in 1878.

H. F. Pickles Foundry Co., Thirteenth and Heald Streets, was established in 1868. They employ from thirty to one hundred men, and do architectural and all kinds of light castings. Capacity, six tons of castings a day.

Cleaver & Hollis, of Market Street, began in 1884 the manufacture of wrought iron house heaters and tin ware, and have developed a trade which in 1887 rendered a new building necessary. An extensive tinning business is also carried on by Rease & Brother, at 6 East Fourth Street.

John Taylor carries on the manufacture of freight elevators and ship steering apparatus, at the foot of Tatnall Street, and has been engaged in the trade for over twenty years.

Saws are manufactured by G. L. Norris, at 222 West Second Street, the establishment being known as the Wilmington Saw Works. The business, which was established January 1, 1886, consists chiefly of repairing.

Boilers are made by S. S. Adams, Jr., at 609 West Front Street. The establishment is a comparatively new one, and makes more pretense to fineness than to magnitude of work.

Machine Tools, Etc.—Hilles & Jones' Machine Tool Works.—In the year 1854 John S. Crossley and Samuel Davis, two machinists then in the employ of Pusey & Jones, of Wilmington, were desirous of going into the business of building machinists' tools, for which there seemed to be a great demand, there being but few tool manufacturers in this country at that time. Their means being very limited, they began in a small way, erecting a building at the corner of Ninth and Church Streets, which at that time was far from the business part of the town. The streets were not paved and almost impassable in winter. This partnership existed but a short time, the firm becoming Crossley & Allen; it was again changed to Crossley & Barr, and then to Robert H. Barr. In 1862 William S. Hilles became associated with Robert H. Barr, forming the co-partnership of Robert H. Barr & Co., and in 1883 Henry C. Jones was admitted without changing the firm name. They now commenced the manufacture of engines and boilers, and also built several wooden vessels, the largest of which was the seven hundred ton schooner, called "William S. Hilles." At the close of the war they abandoned vessel building and gave their whole attention to the machine and boiler building, and were quite successful.

In 1870 Robert H. Barr retiring from the business, William S. Hilles and Henry C. Jones continued it under the style of Hilles & Jones. Mr. Hilles not being a practical machinist, he attended to the finances while Mr. Jones did the designing and managed the business. While the business was not large, yet by constant attention and hard work it grew steadily, and the machinery acquired a good reputation. The firm's financial condition was such as to easily withstand the depreciation of values and panic commencing with 1873. In 1876 William S. Hilles, being in ill health, was advised to go abroad, and while travelling with his son, T. Allen Hilles, died suddenly at Nice, France. The firm continued without change, Mrs. William S. Hilles retaining her husband's interest and Mr. Jones assuming entire control of all the firm's business. He gradually changed it from the production of all kinds of machinery to a special line of tools for locomotive builders, railroad shops, boiler makers and bridge builders. In 1885 T. Allen Hilles, son of the late William S. Hilles, was admitted to the firm, having had experience with all the different classes of work, to give him a thorough knowledge of the business. The works now occupy, approximately, one hundred and fifty feet on Church Street, six hundred feet on Ninth Street, with a good wharf frontage of one hundred and eighty-five feet on the Brandywine River. Railroad tracks in the various shops give direct shipping facilities to all parts of the country.

Gauthrop & Brother carry on at 102 and 104 West Fourth Street, in a handsome building erected by them, the manufacture of plumbors, steam and gas fitters' supplies, and they are also gas fitters and plumbers themselves, and deal extensively in gas fixtures. The manufacture was begun by the father of the present proprietors, Allen Gauthrop, in 1854, the present firm succeeding in 1868. Their great specialty is steamfitting and sanitary engineering. Among specialties handled by them, we will instance Nason & Co.'s Steam Appliances, Knowles Steam Pumps, Consolidated Pop Safety Valves, and H. Belfield & Co.'s Steam Fittings. They are also manufacturers of the Gauthrop boiler for low pressure steam heating. An appliance said to be unexcelled for this purpose. They have introduced steam heating apparatus into the Opera House, School Building, Clayton House, and over thirty private dwellings in Wilmington, besides many elsewhere. Their business extends throughout the peninsula, and parts of Pennsylvania and New Jersey. They employ a large force of highly-skilled mechanics, and the machinery in their works is operated by a thirty horse-power engine, while the boiler, of the same capacity, also supplies steam to heat the building. The factory is supplied with the best of machinery and utensils, and is a model establishment in all particulars. The individual members of the firm are J. Newlin Gawthrop and Alfred Gawthrop.

John C. Brison is extensively engaged in plumbing, and well-known for his excellent work.

Allen Speakman carries on the same business.

Flouring Mills.—The Brandywine Mills, now owned by The William Lea & Sons’ Company, and for over a century in the possession of the family now controlling them, constitute one of the historic institutions of Wilmington, and their story fully written out, giving the details of their development, from the time of their establishment, long before the Revolution, to the present, would afford a complete picture of the rise of the milling interest in the United States. From the time they were built until within a few decades, they held their place as the finest mills on the continent, regulating the price of grain through a very extensive portion of the country, and supplying the bulk of exports to the West Indies and other places. There came a period, indeed, when they were temporarily surpassed, but then later owners seem to have possessed the same vigor and mastery of business which characterized their fathers and predecessors, and renewed their endeavors in the race of excellence. And so it happens that “The Brandywine Mills,” of the present day, bear very much the same relative position that the old ones did, to the industry of the region. The proprietors have availed themselves of all that is best in modern machinery and processes, adding inventions of their own, and the result of their long and intimate experience in the business. Thus these mills enjoy a distinction, different from it is true, but far exceeding that of the primitive ones from which they have been developed. There are larger mills in the country, but none that are better appointed, that do finer work, or whose products are more widely or more uniformly sought.

The great value of the water-power of the Brandywine, obtained early recognition, and we find that even before Wilmington was settled as a village there had come those shrewd enough to avail themselves of it, to stay for a time its rushing, tumbling tide that it might gather strength to turn the wheels of mills. In a deed bearing date of May 1, 1729, for a narrow strip of land along the South side of the stream, which can now be best described as extending from French to Adams Street, mention is made among other buildings, of “Two Grist Mills” and “Two Boulting Mills,” etc. This property (owned as early as 1671, by Dr. Tyman Siddam) was conveyed at the date first mentioned, by Samuel Kirk to John Richardson. It was subsequently repurchased by Kirk and passed in a few years through several hands, a portion in 1749, and finally all coming into possession of Oliver Canby. Heretofore no allusion has been made by local writers to the two grist mills which we have shown by the deed from Kirk to Richardson, to have stood upon the Brandywine, in 1729. Oliver Canby has always been stated to have built the first in 1742, and that he did build one is undeniable, but his mill had certainly two predecessors, however humble they may have been. They doubtless were exceedingly crude affairs, and that fact, together with the additional one, that both were destroyed by fire at an early day, accounts for their lapse into oblivion so far as the memory of man goes. Canby’s was probably the first mill of any importance. It stood by the side of the creek just below the northeasterly termination of Orange street.

To that mill the Swedes and other early settlers brought their grist in small row boats, from the New Jersey shore of the Delaware, as well as various outlets along the Eastern Shore, and up the Christiana. Oliver Canby died about 1755, and the mill became the property of Thomas Shipley, in the following year. It was only a few years after this that Shipley bought land along the creek between the terminations of French and Market Streets, and here he built, in 1762, the structure which became famous as “The Old Shipley Mill.” In this he invested the funds from the Oliver Canby estate, and the mill eventually became the property of William Canby. Other mills were built soon after this one upon the South side of the stream.

It was not believed at this time when the water power was condemned to the owners on the South side, that the North side could be improved, on account of a mass of rock jutting into the river, but nevertheless half the water was reserved to the owners there, and in 1770, James and William Marshall contracted with the owners to build a race and make the necessary improvements there. They also built a mill. The digging of the race, however, proved more of an undertaking than they had expected, and they sold the contract to Joseph Tatnall, who was precisely the man needed at this juncture of affairs, and whose energy was of great utility in developing their great milling business on the Brandywine. He gave up his interests on the South side to his partners, built extensive mills upon the North side, and established a large business there. His son-in-law, Thomas Lea, who became associated with him, was another of the wealthy, enterprising men of the day, and did as much as Joseph Tatnall to utilize this valuable water power. William Poole, William Canby, George Evans, John Morton and John Welsh were contemporaries, and later John Bulkley and Cheney Broom became interested in these mills, though Thomas Shipley and Joseph Tatnall remained the active and vital forces in the enterprise, and to them, with Thomas Lea, must be ascribed the worth and fame which was attained by the Brandywine Mills from the outset. Building went on with almost equal rapidity on both sides of the creek, and as early as 1764 there was in operation a group of eight mills, four on each side.

During the period of the Revolutionary War, the owners of these mills, through Robert Morris, Washington's financier, supplied very considerable quantities of flour and meal to the patriot troops encamped at various times in this region. Shortly before the memorable battle of the Brandywine, Washington ordered the dis-mantling of several mills in Northern Delaware and contiguous portions of Pennsylvania for fear that they might fall into the hands of the British, whom it was apprehended would cross the Brandywine in the vicinity of Wilmington, and be operated by them for the sustenance of their army. These mills were among them. The order, signed by Washington, and cautioning the utmost haste and great secrecy in the removal of the "running" or upper stones to a safe distance, is still preserved. The work was duly accomplished. Soldiers, coming with waggons to the Brandywine, conveyed them to Chester County, Pennsylvania. After safety had been assured, Thomas Lea was sent to ask a return of the stones, and Washington, although signifying his willingness, neglected, amid the hurry and confusion of the time, to give an order. They were ultimately recovered, for by the order of the great commander himself, they had been marked to distinguish them from others taken at the same time.

It was during the Revolution that wheat and flour brought the highest (apparent) prices ever known in the history of milling. The old books at the Brandywine Mills show that in 1780 wheat was bought at twenty-four dollars a bushel, and that some three or four hundred barrels of flour were sold for the gross sum of twenty-one thousand pounds. It is unnecessary to say that the currency was somewhat inflated at that period.

After the Revolution some curious laws, rendered necessary by the condition of those days, were passed affecting the military interest. In 1785 the Legislature of Delaware issued an act compelling certain mills, as those on the Christiana, to grind for the inhabitants of the county (New Castle) on Monday and Saturday of each week; others, as those on the Brandywine, above the bridge, on the road leading from Wilmington to Chester, were excepted, their rule being "first come, first served," but those below the bridge were to be regulated by the Court of Quarter Sessions, which was to "fix and determine which day in every week for the next year the said mills should appropriate to the grinding and manufacturing of wheat and any other grain for the family consumption of the inhabitants of the county.

"Beginning with the mills known by the name of Shipley's and Canby's and Marshall's, and then fixing the days of rotation so that two mills on every day of each week may be employed in that service. This to be advertised at the door of every mill, and also at five of the most public places in Brandywine and Christiana Hundreds." Neglect or refusal to obey this law was punishable by a fine of twenty shillings.

Laws were also framed in the several States prior to the adoption of the Federal Constitution regulating intercourse with foreign nations. The laws bearing upon this matter were much more stringent in Pennsylvania than in Delaware, and consequently a large shipping trade sprung up between Wilmington and the West Indies. Corn-meal was in great demand in this trade and was shipped in large quantities, but it invariably spoiled before reaching destination. It was then suggested at the Brandywine Mills that the corn be dried before grinding. An experiment was tried by drying some in a malthouse, and being found to answer, drying-houses, similar to malthouses, were constructed alongside the mills, with brick floors and heated by flues and turned over with shovels every half-hour. In this primitive way about two hundred bushels could be dried every twenty-four hours. The proprietors of these mills, anxious to improve their facilities, purchased in 1812, of John R. Parry, of Montgomery County, Pennsylvania, for eighty dollars, the right to construct and use his "patent machine for kiln-drying corn, etc." but whether it was found a success is not known. About 1816 one Crook, of New Hope, Pennsylvania, invented the pan-kiln, which, until lately, was used very much as originally constructed; and even now, though large quantities are manufactured in other parts of the country, the Brandywine meal is largely preferred by shippers.

In the old days of the mills there were, perhaps, more conspicuous indications of activity and of huge business than now. For the railroads handle thousands of bushels of grain and flour swifter and with less of outward show of labor than did the cumbersome Conestoga wagons carry their hundreds. These Conestogas, or "inland ships," which brought grist to the mills, were mighty vehicles constructed to carry huge loads, and needing teams of six horses to move them to good advantage on the average road. They came to the mills from a wide circuit, from Dauphin, Lancaster, York, Berks and Chester Counties, in Pennsylvania, usually in companies or droves, of from twenty to thirty, blocking the streets for squares. The rumbling wheels, clattering hoofs, mingled with the noisy shoutings and clamorings of the Dutch drivers, produced an almost prosperous trade. The mills are supplied with the latest im-the Brandywine Mills, and was for a time president of the Bank of Delaware. He died at his residence in Brandywine Village in his sixty-seventh year, universally respected by all who knew him. He was one of the most prominent men of his day in New Castle County, as the following from a paper published at that time shows:

"On the evening of the 4th inst., at his residence in the village of Brandywine, Delaware, Thomas Lea, in his sixty-seventh year. Seldom has woman mourned the privation of a husband more affectionately and attentively; seldom have children that of a kinder father. Extensive and honorable, even liberal in his dealings, the poor man's friend and the council of the rich, the patron of integrity and industry, the communicative and agreeable companion, he had enlisted numerous friends who took a deep interest in his concerns, who now share in the feeling excited by the late event, and who must long cherish his estimable memory. The public has sustained the loss of one of its most exemplary, intelligent, enterprising citizens—an highly distinguished contributor to those modern improvements which grace New Castle County and add much to the respectability of our nation. A fortunate, native and cultivated, rare and equal, enabled him to endure in the declivity of life his various bereavements and afflictions, particularly the last illness, long protracted, with amazing patience and serenity. In the sweetest moments he finally resigned his spirit to Him who gave it, promising to the last his mental faculties, seemingly unimpaired. Few men ever were rendered less sensations by signal successes in business, still ever were so superior to the reverses of fortune."

William Lea, his son, the subject of this sketch, grew to manhood in Brandywine, and was educated at the best schools which Wilmington afforded. Early in life he evinced those strong traits of character which made him a successful business man and a highly-respected citizen. He was first employed with his father at Brandywine, then he engaged in business at Manayunk, Pa., and afterwards, for the benefit of his health, removed to New Orleans, Louisiana. Here he remained for a time, and then entered into business at Terre Haute, Indiana.

In 1837 he returned to Wilmington and settled in his old home at Brandywine, where he spent the remainder of his life. The same year he succeeded his ancestors as one of the proprietors of the Brandywine Mills. This extensive industry afforded an excellent opportunity for the development of his powers as a business man. For thirty-nine years, until his death, he gave his time and attention to the growth and prosperity of the mills, and in that time showed rare tact, superior judgment and fine executive and administrative abilities. His name became known far and near for his correct business methods. By his devotion to the milling interest he amasséd a fortune, and what was still better, acquired an enviable reputation as a man of the highest honor and the most sterling integrity.

He was for many years a director in the Union National Bank of Wilmington, and was also a director in the Wilmington and Brandywine Cemetery Company.

William Lea was of fine presence and address. He was kind-hearted and charitable. His genial disposition endeared him to all, just as his honorable dealings caused him to be respected by all. These qualities led to his being frequently solicited to become a candidate for office, but he always declined such honors. He was greatly interested in the improvement of Brandywine Village, in which he lived, and favored its annexation to the city of Wilmington as the Ninth Ward.

William Lea was married to Jane Scott Lovett, of Middletown, Bucks County, Pa., on the 18th of October, 1836. They had eleven children, seven of whom survived him. He was devotedly attached to his family, and spent all of his leisure hours at home. This brought about a mutual endearment and a mutual tenderness of sympathy and affection in his household, of which he was the most exemplary husband and father. His sudden death at the age of seventy-one years, in the same house in which he was born, was a sad bereavement to his family as well as a great loss to the community in which he lived.

Morocco and Leather.—Pusey & Scott Company.—The oldest house in the city in this line of manufacture is that of the Pusey & Scott Company, at Third and Madison Streets. It was established in 1845 by Pusey, Marr & Scott, the individual members of the firm being Israel Pusey, William Marr and James Scott. They commenced operations in a small building at Third and Tatnall Streets, and remained there until 1866, when they came to the present stand. In the meantime (in 1849), Mr. Marr had left the firm, going to California when the gold fever had sent its infection east. In 1869 the firm became Pusey, Scott & Co., John Scott and William Y. Warner being the silent partners. Then the firm remained unchanged until the death of Israel Pusey about ten years ago, and even after that there was no alteration in the style of the house, the name of the deceased partner and founder being still retained, when in 1883 the house was incorporated as the Pusey & Scott Company, which was constituted by James Scott, J. Winfield Scott and W. L. G. Thomas, who are now respectively president, treasurer and secretary. The capacity of the factory is about two hundred dozen skins per day, and when the business is at its height of activity about one hundred and seventy-five men are employed, the average force being about one hundred and fifty. The building is of brick, four stories in height upon the street, and five stories upon the yard side. It has a frontage of one hundred and eighty-six feet on Third Street, and fifty-eight feet on Madison Street. The works are admirably systematized and divided into departments for the effective prosecution of the work. The specialties of manufacture are known to the trade as brush kids, dongola finish, pebbles, etc. The trade of the house extends throughout the United States and Canada, and for the convenience of the business, the company have established branch houses in Philadelphia and Cincinnati.
full of struggles and severe toil, [some] people believed that his later life was so prosperous. The residence in Camden, owned by Hon. John...
Glancey Jones, and thence he removed on his retirement from active business life. He has forty-six acres of land contiguous to his home, and thus enjoys both town and country life. Mr. Postles’ old age is a healthful and happy one, a proper season of rest well earned by long labor. He has since 1829 been a member of the M. E. Church. Politically he was one of the original old-time Whigs, voted for Bell and Everett, and for Lincoln the second time he was nominated, but finally left the Republican Party because differing from its policy in regard to negro suffrage, and has since voted the Democratic ticket. As before stated Mr. Postles married early in life, a Miss Roe, of Kent County. Her first name was Elizabeth, and she was the daughter of William and Elizabeth Roe. The offspring of this union were Thomas, who died in infancy, William, who was a soldier in the Union Army, and now resides in Camden, James Parke, also a soldier for three years, late Adjutant-General of the State, and successor to his father’s morocco business; Ellen Melisa, wife of John P. Doughten, of Wilmington, and Elizabeth, who died in infancy. Mrs. Postles died January 21, 1848. Mr. Postles married his second wife, January 8, 1850, Elizabeth, daughter of Henry and Elizabeth Casson, by whom he had three children, Elizabeth, who died at the age of seven; Mary Ann, who died in infancy, and Laura Baynard Postles. The mother of these children died August 16, 1875.

Charles E. Frits & Co., began manufacturing at their present place of business, 211 West Third Street, in 1877. They employ about fifty hands and turn out thirty dozen skins per day, the skins being the large ones of the Mexican goat, and the product the finest grade of morocco.

Washington Jones & Co.—This house is another of the old ones in this line of manufacture, having been established in 1858 as Baynard & Jones. In 1864 Thomas H. Baynard died, and Mr. Jones carried on the business alone until 1867, when Daniel Post Price and his son, Charles R., were admitted. Another son, William G., being taken into partnership in 1873, the firm was constituted as it now exists. The plant occupies the five-story brick buildings at 104 to 110 Walnut Street, and includes everything necessary to the most thorough prosecution of the business. The products of the house consist of a full line of moroccos, including pebbles, kid and imitation French kid, and the out-put amounts to about one hundred and fifty dozen skins per day, shipped to all parts of the country where the manufacture of ladies’ shoes is carried on. The skins handled by this house are imported by them from Calcutta, and the sumac is brought from Sicily.

William Bush.—Among the oldest and most extensive morocco manufacturers is William Bush, of 114 Walnut Street (who is a descendant of the Samuel Bush, who, in 1774, founded the transportation line now operated by the firm of G. W. Bush & Sons, elsewhere the subject of extended remark). The morocco house was established in 1858, by G. T. Clark & Co., who commenced business in a small building now lost sight of in the aggregations of later erections. Mr. Bush was the silent partner in this firm, but a practical worker and judicious business man, who contributed his full share to the success attained by the house. In 1866 the firm became Bush, Clark & Co., and in 1870 the present style, William Bush & Co., was adopted. The specialty of the house is the manufacture of black morocco, French kid and maroons of fine and medium grades, made from Cape, Tampa and South American skins. The results of extensive experience, the employment of the most approved methods, and of none but skilled labor, have given the products of the house a high standing in the trade, and there is always a ready market for their goods at the best prices. The firm turns out from six to seven thousand feet of morocco per day, which represents the labor of from one hundred to one hundred and fifty men, using the best machinery and appliances. Every modern device calculated to enhance the quality of the goods or lessen the cost of manufacture is to be found in this establishment. Steam power is supplied from a sixty-horse power engine. The plant is among the most important in the city. The manufactory consists of a five-story brick building, 70x300 feet with an L 125x100 feet in area, and a further extension 35x80 feet.

Charles Baird & Co.—This firm has been known to the morocco trade since 1873, having in that year succeeded to the business of Malritz, Baird & Taylor, which was formed in 1865 and began business on East Fifth Street, near Poplar. They moved to Mr. Baird’s present location, No. 214 West Third Street, the old stand of Pusey, Scott & Co.) in 1866. The silent partner of Charles Baird & Co., for a number of years before his death, was Henry S. McComb, and his estate is still represented in the house. The building in which Mr. Baird carries on manufacturing has been enlarged by him until it covers an area of eighty by one hundred feet, and as it is four stories in height, with a basement, it affords ample accommodation for the large business. It is supplied with the best and latest improved machinery known to the trade, which is driven by a twenty-five horse power engine. About seventy-five hands are employed, and the factory turns out about one hundred dozen skins per day. The product consists of fine kid, in imitation of the French article, pebbles, straight grains, maroons and some finer grades of goods, for which there is always open market and good demand.

John G. Baker is probably the largest morocco maker in the city, and he is the president of the Morocco Manufacturers' Exchange of Wilmington. He bought the building which forms a portion of his present establishment, an old morocco manufactory, of Dr. Porter, and began business in 1867.

The old building fronts on East Fifth Street, and the office number is 708, but the newer and larger buildings front on Sixth Street, and altogether, the plant occupies about three-quarters of a block. The factory is a model one in all respects, employs about two hundred hands, is supplied with an engine of thirty horse power, and an electric motor of ten horse power, and turns out about two hundred dozen skins per day. These are what are known as Mexican, Brazilian, Curacoa, Mocha and East India skins, and the product is chiefly what is designated as "Delaware Kid," for which there is a large demand.

James Bonner, 202 West Fifth Street, succeeded to the morocco manufacturing business formerly conducted by Jones & Richmond, who commenced in 1875. They employed about twenty-five men, and manufactured about fifteen dozen skins per day.

J. Mahoney & Co., 711, 713, West Third Street, commenced tanning morocco in 1878. They employed thirty-five men, and have a capacity of twenty-five dozen skins per day.

Bredenkoph & Bro., 1009 Fourth Street, commenced tanning morocco in 1880. He owns altogether by the sumac process. He employs forty-five men, and his tannery has a capacity of twenty-five dozen skins per day.

W. J. McClary and J. T. Quigley, started in this business in 1881, and they are, therefore, among the newest morocco houses in the city. The factory of the former, which is located at 718 West Sixth Street, consists of a building one hundred and twenty-eight feet by thirty feet, and having six floors. It is admirably supplied with the best appliances known to the trade, employs about sixty hands, and has capacity for turning out from sixty to eighty dozen skins per day. A specialty is the proprietor's own patent tannage in bright and dull finish, formerly known as dougola, but all kinds of morocco are made.

Mr. Quigley's manufactory just alluded to, was originally established by I. T. Quigley & Co. Later the style of the house became Quigley & Mullen, and in 1882 the present proprietor assumed entire charge of affairs. The house has from the first carried on a large business. The manufacture consists of tampico, oil pebbles and straight graining, which is supplied to the trade in the State of New York. The building in which the work is carried on at Fourth and Monroe Streets, is six stories in height and one hundred and eighty feet by thirty feet in dimensions. From seventy to one hundred operatives are employed, and the daily output is from 60 to 80 dozen skins per day. He has also leased John Taylor's tannery near by, and he now has a capacity of one hundred and fifty dozen skins a day, and employs one hundred and twenty-five hands.

B. L. Kent & Co., Front and Justison Streets, started morocco tanning in 1886. Their tannery has a capacity of thirty dozen skins per day.

Charles Mullin commenced the tanning of morocco leather in 1881, on the corner of Front and Monroe Streets. He has the largest tannery in the city, consisting of two six-story buildings, one hundred and seventy by forty feet, and one hundred and twenty-five-story building one hundred and ten by twenty-eight feet, one five-story building one hundred and twenty-five-story building one hundred and twenty-five-story building two by twenty-eight feet, and two stories of another building one hundred and thirty by twenty-eight feet. He employs three hundred men, and the tannery has a capacity of three hundred skins per day.

Ford & Ryan Company, on Webb Street, between Second and Third, have a brick building six stories high, forty by one hundred and forty feet in dimensions, erected in 1886, in which is employed one hundred and five hands, that turn out one hundred and fifty dozen goat-skins, morocco tanned, per day. Most of the tanning in this factory is done by the sumac process.

W. B. Clerk & Co. (formerly of Haverhill, Mass., as Clerk, Lennox & Briggs), began the manufacture of morocco, November 1, 1887, in the old Franklin Mill on Ninth and Walnut. Machinery is now in for an output of one hundred dozen per day.

C. & W. Pyle, Fourth and Van Buren Streets, started a sheep-skin tannery in 1886. They employ eleven men, and their tannery has a capacity of three hundred dozen skins a week. They make fancy colored leather for pocket-books and bookbinders.

Wilmington Oil and Leather Company.—Morocco leather production is one of the newest and most novel and interesting industries of the city. It was very recently introduced by the Wilmington Oil and Leather Company, who, recognizing the possibilities of wealth that lay in the fat and skin of the plump and playful porpoise, organized, in 1886, a stock-company for the purpose of rendering those parts useful to mankind, especially that portion of mankind included in the company. At first they had a plant located on an island off the South Atlantic Coast, but, for the better operation of the business, a factory was established in Wilmington, at Lord and Church Streets. This is a four-story building, of good size and proportions, provided with steam-power and all necessary machinery, some of it of a peculiar nature, adapted to the handling of this new kind of leather.

This leather is of three kinds or qualities,—first, the true porpoise (so-called to distinguish it from the skin of the North Sea porpoise); second, porpoise "calf;" and third, porpoise "kid," made from the skin of the infant animal. Great merit is claimed for the porpoise leather. Among the leading qualities imputed to it being its toughness, pliability, imperviousness to water, smoothness and durability, the company has about seventy-five men fishing for porpoises at the island alluded to, and quite a number at the factory here. They manufacture a lubricating oil from the fat of the porpoise, and a fine watch and clock oil from the creature's jaw.

The officers of the company are Z. James Belt, president; S. L. West, vice-president; Benjamin F. Jackson, secretary; Henry C. Conrad, treasurer; and Colonol John Wainwright, business manager.

C. & J. Pyle Company.—Patent leather is manufactured by only one firm, but that one does a very large business. We allude to the C. & J. Pyle Company, at Sixth and Monroe Streets, which has a history dating from 1844. The business was started in 1844 upon a small scale, on Orange Street between Fifth and Sixth, and removed to the present location three or four years later. The firm was not then constituted as now. It was under the style of C. W. Pyle & Co. and the individual members were Edwin A. Wilson, Cyrus Pyle, William Pyle and James Webb. About 1850 the title became Pyle, Wilson & Pyle, and in 1861 was first known as C. & J. Pyle. The present incorporated company dates its existence from April, 1885. The officers are Joseph Pyle, president; Frank Pyle, vice-president; Willard S. Pyle, secretary; and Fred. Pyle, treasurer. The property embraces a whole square, the offices being at Sixth and Monroe Streets. In addition to this, the company bought, in 1887, a tract of eight acres of ground across the Christians, upon which they erected a second factory, of which the main building is fifty by one hundred and twenty-five feet. The company commenced shipping to England about 1878, and now sends across the water, upon an average, five hundred "sides" of patent leather per week, about one-half of the total output. The services of about eighty men and of a hundred and twenty-five horse-power engines are required, and they are kept constantly employed, for the smoothness with which the affairs of this house is carried on is one of its notable features. The operatives are well treated, and strikes have been an unknown thing. The business has been slowly and evenly developed to its present proportions through all the years since 1844, showing a prudence and care on the part of the managers as well as the possession of rare skill necessary to the production of the best goods and consequent command of the best markets.

Mr. Joseph Pyle, the present head of the house, is a man of practical experience in the manufacture of patent leather and the inventor of a valuable "softening" machine, now in use at the factory.

Rhoads & McComb started in the manufacture of belting and harness at their present stand, Fourth and Orange Streets, in 1877, when they purchased the five-story building from J. T. Kirkpatrick. It had formerly been used as a leather house for about twenty years by I. T. Chamberlain.

Gallaher, Kitzelman & Fox.—Shoes are manufactured on quite a large scale by J. Hayes Gallaher, C. W. Kitzelman and David Fox, under the firm name of Gallaher, Kitzelman & Fox, at Third and Orange Streets. Wilmington at that time, with all of the variety in its manufactories, had no shoe house for several years until this one was set in operation in 1885. It was at first carried on by Barnett, Gallaher & Co., but the firm was organized as it at present exists on the 1st of January, 1886. About thirty-five men are employed, besides those who act as salesmen. Steam-power is employed and operates the latest improved machinery. The goods produced are ladies', misses', and children's fine shoes, and a specialty of the house is the "Eclipse" shoe, said to possess the maximum of merit for the minimum of cost. The market of the house is chiefly in Delaware, Maryland and Pennsylvania, and it also extends westward.

MISCELLANEOUS.—The Diamond Match Company is an extensive organization, formed in 1882, by the consolidation of several local companies, one of which was located here, and was known as Swift & Courtney. Their works were established many years ago, and as carried on now by the new company, employ about one hundred and twenty-five operatives, under C. B. White, the resident manager. W. H. Swift, of the old firm of Swift & Courtney, is president of the now existing company; Joseph Swift is vice-president; O. C. Barber, treasurer; and L. W. Beecher, secretary.

Paper-Making.—The history of the manufacture of paper on the Brandywine dates from the erection, in 1727, of a mill for that purpose by Joshua and Thomas Gilpin. The mill was located on a curve of the Brandywine, about two miles above Wilmington, and at the time of its erection was the farthest down the stream.

Thomas Gilpin patented in 1816 the first endless sheet machine ever used in America. The invention revolutionized the manufacture of paper, cheapened its cost and increased its production, the manufacture being entirely by hand prior to that time. The machine was first put into operation in August, 1817, and the first newspaper to be printed on it was the American Daily Advertiser.

A freshet visited the mill February 22, 1822, carrying away the greater portion of the plant. Three years later a fire destroyed one of the principal mills, and finally, in the spring of 1838, a greater freshet than ever before carried everything away. The manufacture was discontinued, the mills were never rebuilt and the estate was sold.

Six years after the Messrs. Gilpin had erected their mill, William Young, a bookseller of Philadelphia, embarked in the paper manufacture at a place that he named Rockland, three miles above the site of the Gilpin's. Large, substantial stone buildings were erected, and the works were conducted successfully for many years, and after being used as a cotton-mill until 1869, was purchased by the firm of Jessup & Moore.

Bloomfield Haines Moore was born in Philadelphia December 16, 1819. His parents both belonged to the Society of Orthodox Friends, and originally came from Moorestown and Haddonfield, New Jersey. He was educated at Clermont Academy, and then spent some years in the office of the late Jacob Ridgway.

In 1843 Mr. Moore associated himself in business with his father-in-law, Augustus E. Jessup, under the firm name of Jessup & Moore.

In 1845 the firm altered an old snuff and flour-mill situated on the Brandywine, and adapted it to the manufacture of paper. This is now known as Augustine Mill. Subsequently, Rockland Mill was built on the Brandywine, about four miles from Wilmington. Both mills were afterwards destroyed by fire, and rebuilt on a far larger scale.

From 1870 till the time of his death, which occurred from pneumonia, July 6, 1878, he was the entire owner of the business.

Mr. Moore had traveled extensively; he spoke several languages fluently; and his hours of recreation were spent mainly among his books.

During the war he was foremost in every measure to aid the Union, and with his brother-in-law, Alfred D. Jessup, was among the twenty-five men who originated the Union Club of Philadelphia, from which the Union League of America had its origin.

Modern paper-making can be said to commence contemporaneously with the improvements that have been made within the past thirty years in the art of printing. In no other industry have these improvements been so marked. The increase of intelligence among the people, the demand for books and the multiplicity of newspapers so increased the demand for paper that the old method of using only rags, cotton and flax was found entirely impracticable and expensive. In view of this fact, wood was introduced in this country, and in England the Spanish espartograss.

The vegetable kingdom furnishes innumerable materials from which paper can be manufactured; cellulose being the principal. Rags give a very pure white, and are used now for the finest grades of paper, and, in connection with chemical wood, for the medium quality of paper. The rags are procured from a great many sources, but by far the main portion comes from our Southern States and from the Baltic and Mediterranean ports.

The first step in the manufacture of paper is the sorting and dusting of rags. This sorting is necessarily done by hand, and the cutting by a machine which cuts them into pieces. Both before and after the sorting they are passed through thrashers or dusters, which beat them and drive the dust through wire gauze partitions. They are then placed in a large boiler and boiled in lime-water. They are then washed in engines built for that purpose until they are clean.

The bleaching comes next, and is effected with a liquor made by dissolving bleaching-powder in water, although bleaching with gas and sour-bleaching are sometimes followed, but, whatever the method adopted, any excess of bleaching-agent must be removed. The next process is the beating-engines. This process takes from six to nine hours, according to the paper to be made. During the process of beating the sizing and alum are put in the rags. The sizing for printing papers is of various materials, the alum being used in connection to precipitate the sizing. For letter-papers the sizing is done by being passed through a solution of glue after the paper is made. It is then cut off into sheets to suit the trade, and dried. The pulp when beaten is conveyed into large stone cisterns or chests, and from there is pumped to the vat or reservoir at the head of the machine; from there to a screen, made for that purpose, to take out any particles of rags that have escaped the beating process; from there to an endless cloth of very fine wire, carried by a large number of small rolls (the frame and rolls carrying the wire cloth have a shaking motion, which unites the fibres); thence it passes to endless felts, passing over and between rolls until the water is pressed out, then over drying cylinders and between polished chilled rolls, putting a finish on the paper. This finish applies to ordinary books and newspapers, but for the higher grades of writing, plate and school-book papers, an additional finish is added by a series of steel and paper rolls, called "super-calender," which imparts the beautiful finish necessary to print cuts for fine books and writing-papers.

In 1843 Augustus E. Jessup, of Westfield, Mass., and Bloomfield H. Moore, of Philadelphia, Pa., formed a co-partnership for the manufacture of paper on the Brandywine and with them the history of modern paper-making in Delaware commences. The firm purchased the Augustine Mill, which had been used previously as a snuff-mill, and built one of the largest and most complete paper-mills to be found in the United States, where the finest lithograph, map and plate paper is made. It is a fire-proof structure, built of iron and stone, with the latest and best improved machinery to be found. The power is derived from turbine water-wheels and steam-engines aggregating about nine hundred horse-power. The machines for making the paper are the Fourdrinier, two of them being ninety inches, the other seventy-six inches. This firm is now supplying the leading publishers with the finest quality of book, plate and magazine paper, its superior quality giving it the prestige in the trade. It is lighted with electricity, and the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad goes direct to the mill, and carries the raw material and takes the manufactured product to all parts of the country.

The mill is located one mile from Market Street bridge, on one of the prettiest spots on the north side of the Brandywine, and the abundance of clear, pure water furnished by that stream enhances the value of the location. The water is held in large reservoirs, Constant employment is given to one hundred hands, who turn out thirty-six thousand pounds of paper daily, under the superintendency of David Lindsay. The firm next purchased the old Young mill at Rockland, and ran it continuously until April 9, 1869, when it was destroyed by fire. It was then rebuilt of stone and iron, making it a fire-proof structure, and supplied with the latest and best machinery and began operations in August, 1869. It was the first mill to begin the use of cellulose or wood-pulp, and pulp made from straw; it is now manufacturing the best quality of school-book, magazine and other papers used in printing.

The Wilmington and Northern Railroad connects the Rockland Mill with its main road by a track, bringing the raw material to the mill, and distributing the manufactured paper all over the country. Power is derived by steam-engines of eight hundred horse-power and supplemented by turbine water-wheels of two hundred and fifty horse-power, so connected as to be used when water is plenty. Three Fourdrinier machines are used, one of seventy-four inches and two eighty-six inches in width, and they turn out twenty-six thousand pounds of paper daily.

The plant embraces one hundred acres of land on both sides of the Brandywine Creek, and owns twenty-eight comfortable houses, where the men employed at the works reside. Employment is given to seventy-five hands, who are under the management of William Luke, who has had charge of the mills since 1862.

On December 1, 1878, the Jessup & Moore Paper Company was organized, its officers consisting of C. B. Moore, president; D. W. Evans, of New York City, vice-president; F. W. McDowell, of Philadelphia, secretary, and J. R. Moore, of New York, treasurer.

Besides the Augustine and Rockland, the company owns and operates the Delaware Mills on the Christiana, near Wilmington. The daily product of the company is 112,000 pounds.

The offices of the New York house are in the Bennett building, New York. The Philadelphia warehouse is at 28 South Sixth Street, Philadelphia.

The new corporation started February, 1881, the extensive Delaware Mills, located on a tract of seventy-eight and a half acres, at the intersection of the Christiana River and Mill Creek, one-quarter of a mile from the city limits embracing fifteen large buildings built of stone and brick, fitted with the most complete machinery, driven by steam-engines aggregating about eight hundred horse-power.

The railroad facilities are of the best kind—the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad, Baltimore and Ohio, and Wilmington and Northern Railroad have switches into the yard, affording the most complete system of shipping to be found—while a wharf frontage of nearly one thousand feet on the Christiana River, giving a depth of water twenty-four feet, affords the best of shipping points.

Employment is given to one hundred and fifty hands, and a product of forty-eight thousand pounds of pulp is prepared daily. The Delaware Mills are under the management of John Saunders, who is ably assisted by his sons, Samuel, William and John Saunders.

John Saunders, superintendent of Delaware Pulp Works, was born April 29, 1821, in Blockley township, Philadelphia County, Pa. He was the son of William Saunders, Jr., who was born in the same township in 1789, and Mary (Dight) Saunders, born in 1780, and is still living. William Saunders, Jr., died in 1838, and was the son of William Saunders, Sr., born in 1739, and died in 1835. The father of the latter was born in Germany. William Dight, the father of Mary Dight, was also born in Blockley township in 1760. His father was a native of Germany.

The father of the subject of this sketch died when the latter was in his twelfth year, and he was bound out to a farmer, with whom he remained until his sixteenth year, when he was bound to George M. Wagner, of Montgomery County, to learn coach-making, at which position he remained until his twenty-first year. He then went to Allentown to work at his trade. Here his first venture in life proved most unsuccessful, for, after working seven months, he received but five dollars, and had paid his board out of savings previously made. He then came back to Barren Hill, Montgomery County, started a shop of his own and continued there for one year, and moved afterwards into the borough, and after eighteen months decided to quit coach-making, and having a natural taste for machinery, he started into millwrighting with Keily & Nixon, with whom he remained five years, at the end of which time he entered into the employment of Nixon & Feinour, paper-makers, at Flat Rock Mills, Mansuyn, and continued with them two years. He then went to Gray's Ferry, put up a rolling-mill for Edward Buckley, after which he returned to Flat Rock Mills with Martin Nixon, and remained there until 1865, and, upon the completion of the Mansuyn Pulp Works, took charge of the same for Martin Nixon and Jessup & Moore, and remained there until the death of B. H. Moore, the only one of the original firm then living. He then entered the employ of the American Pulp Works, with whom he remained until 1880. The Delaware Pulp Works were completed that year, and Mr. Saunders removed to Wilmington, and took charge of these works, where he still continues.

Mr. Saunders is of that type of men who have, by their own efforts, raised themselves to positions of prominence, and in his adopted home he is respected and esteemed for his integrity and sterling business qualities. He possesses a thorough knowledge of his business, which has always been appreciated by his employers.

In January, 1843, he was married to Hannah Tarter, the daughter of Daniel and Hannah (Bignot) H. Tarter, all of French descent. Mrs. Saunders died in 1886. The children now living, four of whom are employed in the same work with Mr. Saunders, are William, Samuel, Alphonzo, John, Leander, Catharine, Marzilia, Blanche and Jennie.

William Luke, now, for the past twenty-five years, superintendent of the company's Rockland Mill, was trained to the business from his boyhood. He was a native of Scotland, born at Crook of Devon, in Kinrossshire, May 28, 1829. His father had a paper-mill there, which his father (the grandfather of our subject) had operated before him, and which is still owned in the family. In this establishment William Luke learned practically, and in all of its details, the art of paper-making, and when twenty-three years of age came to this county in the hope of putting his knowledge to good use and obtaining benefits which he could scarcely expect at home. He found employment at a paper-mill in New Jersey, went from there to Connecticut, returned to New Jersey, worked for a time in Massachusetts, and then going a second time to Connecticut, was made superintendent of the Rockland Mill, at Montville. He had been there only a comparatively short time when his brother-in-law, David Lindsay, who was superintendent at Jessup & Moore's Rockland Mill, on the Brandywine, died, and he was called to fill the vacancy thus caused. This was in February, 1862. He has since held the responsible position without interruption, and has witnessed a great enlargement and improvement in the mill and had the satisfaction of knowing that it has been in some measure attributable to his own exertions. Mr. Luke's children have followed him in the paper-making trade and two of them have already reached enviable places. He was married in Westville, Conn., August 21, 1856 (then working in Trenton, N. J.), to Miss Rosa T. Lindsay. The eldest son, by this marriage, John G. Luke, has, since 1885, been superintendent of the Richmond Paper Company's mill at Providence, R. I., a house which makes an excellent article of paper entirely from wood. The second son, William A., is in charge of Jessup & Moore's mill, at Modena, Pa., and the third son, David, assists his father at the Rockland Mill. The other children of Mr. and Mrs. Luke are Jean (deceased), Isaiah, James, Adam and Thomas.

David Lindsay, superintendent of the Augustine Mills, of the Jessup & Moore Paper Company, at Wilmington, was born in Norwich, Conn., September 14, 1844. His ancestors for several generations have been engaged in the manufacture of paper. His grandfather, Adam Lindsay, learned the business in Scotland, and about 1830, with his wife, Jean Hogarth Lindsay, and their nine children, came to America, and settled at Saugerties, on the Hudson River, in New York. They subsequently moved to Norwich, Conn., where Adam Lindsay died April 22, 1843. His son, Adam Lindsay, father of the subject of this sketch, also engaged in the manufacture of paper, first at Norwich and afterwards at New Haven, Conn., to which city he moved in 1851, to take the position of superintendent of paper-mills.

He was married to Sarah Lincoln, who died in 1846. He died in 1858. David Lindsay was their only child. Becoming an orphan at an early age, he went to live with his uncle, Thomas Lindsay, under whose care, and that of his grandmother, who also lived in the same family, he grew to manhood. He attended school for seven years in his native town of Norwich, and then moved with his father to New Haven, where he remained in school until he completed his fifteenth year. His uncle then moved to Montville, Conn., to become superintendent of paper-mills. David Lindsay spent two years in school in Montville, and then began to learn the business of manufacturing paper, in which he has since been successfully engaged.

In the fall of 1865 he came to Wilmington with his uncle, who was chosen superintendent of the Augustine Mills of Jessup & Moore. He filled various positions in their mills on the Brandywine with great acceptability to the proprietors, until 1870, when he was appointed superintendent of the Augustine Mills to succeed Thomas Lindsay, who that year moved to Indiana. He was then quite a young man to fill so responsible a position, but he performed the duties devolving upon him with the utmost care and faithfulness to the interests of the firm, and when the Jessup & Moore Paper Company was organized and incorporated, in 1877, Mr. Lindsay became one of its directors and a stockholder. He has the entire management of the Augustine Mills as far as the manufacturing interests are concerned. At these mills are one hundred and twenty employees. The daily product is sixteen tons, mostly book paper.

Jean Hogarth Lindsay, his grandmother, who was born in Scotland, came to Wilmington with her son Thomas in 1865, and in 1870 moved, with him, to Indiana, where she died in 1874, at the advanced age of eighty-four years.

Mr. Lindsay was married, December 23, 1868, to Ella A. Brumley, daughter of Joseph and Sophia Brumley, of Montville, Conn. The children of this marriage are May L., Jennie B., W. Allan, Clara J., David and J. Horace Lindsay. Mr. and Mrs. Lindsay are members of St. Andrew's Episcopal Church in Wilmington. He is a member of Temple Lodge, No. 11, Free and Accepted Masons, and Brandywine Lodge, No. 18, Independent Order of Odd Fellows. In politics he is a Democrat.

Tatnall Brothers' flour-mill and feed and grain warehouse, at 101 Maryland Avenue, was founded by the present proprietor, A. R. Tatnall, in 1879. The firm-name was changed in 1888 to Tatnall Brothers, but there is now only a single owner. One "run" of French burr stones are now in operation and the mechanical facilities are to be considerably increased. At present the business of the house is chiefly in the wholesale and retail handling of flour, feed, grain and hay. A little article, unique at least in Wilmington, is to be seen at this place—a hay-saw, used in sawing in two large bales of hay.

Arlington Cotton Mills.—A cotton factory was started at this place about 1830, by Mr. La Motte. It subsequently changed proprietorship a number of times until about 1880 a stock company was organized with William H. Baldwin as president. The company was incorporated, the buildings were enlarged and the factory is now being operated with John Green as manager and agent. The buildings are brick and occupy two squares in length and one square in width on Vandever Avenue. They employ five hundred hands, run fifteen thousand spindles and four hundred and eighty-three looms, manufacturing about five million yards of colored cotton cloths, mostly ginghams, dress and staple.

Melville Gambrill purchased Edward Pusey’s interest in the cotton-factory in 1886, and has since made extensive improvements. He employs one hundred hands and runs six thousand spindles.

Barlow & Thacher rent a building of E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., which was used as a cotton-mill by Joseph Walker and others for many years. In 1881, Messrs. Barlow & Thacher placed new machinery in the building and make colored twisted warp a specialty. They employ fifty-four hands and run six thousand four hundred and twenty-eight spinners and twisters. They make two and three-ply yarn, one-third of their product being fine yarn. Their machinery is driven by a one hundred and fifteen horse-power engine and sixty-five horse water-power, and their factory is lighted by electricity generated by their own dynamo.

The J. M. Pusey Company, manufacturers of hosiery and hosiery yarns, at Thirteenth and Poplar Streets, is, by descent or succession, one of the oldest houses in the city, dating from 1814, when it was founded by Jacob Pusey. It was later conducted by Pusey Brothers and in 1879 the present title was adopted. The president is J. M. Pusey, the vice-president Jacob Pusey, and the secretary F. T. Webb. In the company’s manufacture, which is a building one hundred by one hundred and thirty feet in area, crowded with the best of machinery, are made knit hosiery and hosiery yarns of high grade. The market for the former is general, and for the latter Philadelphia is the principal destination.

Bakeries.—A steam bakery and candy manufactory, probably the largest in the State, is carried on by the J. Barkley & Bros. Company, at Fourth and French Streets. It was founded in 1868, and the present stock company was formed in 1884. The premises occupied for business purposes comprise a three-story building, fifty-six by sixty-four feet in dimensions, in which from thirty to forty operatives are constantly engaged. The company manufactures crackers of all kinds, biscuits, cakes, confectionery, etc.

A business similar to the above was established in the same year (1868) by W. & J. Lang, who have since carried it on successfully and constantly increased its scope and extent. They employ steam-power and about twenty-five operatives, and occupy a building three stories in height, sixty-seven by one hundred feet, manufacturing everything in the way of crackers, biscuits and cakes. Adam J. Lang is now the sole proprietor.

Rockford Bleaching and Dye Works and Cotton Factory, at Rockford, on the Brandywine, were established as a cotton factory in the year 1831. In early days a grist-mill owned by Job Harvey occupied the site of this extensive industry. Subsequently George Hudson had a machine-shop here and the Rockford Manufactory Company owned the property. Caleb Kirk, William W. Young, John Torbert and E. I. and Alfred du Pont were connected with this company.

John Bancroft bought the site in 1881, remodeled the stone building for a cotton factory and placed in it about one thousand five hundred spindles. He continued the manufacturing of cotton goods, in the meantime increasing the size of the buildings, until 1889, when he added to his industry the bleaching and dyeing of cotton goods. The growth of the business necessitated the erection of additional buildings, which are stone. The oldest part of the building now occupied was erected in 1848. The proprietor took into the business as partners his sons, William P. Bancroft and Samuel Bancroft, Jr., establishing the firm of Joseph Bancroft & Sons. Joseph Bancroft died in 1874, after a successful business career, but the firm’s name was left unchanged and has since continued. In 1874 and since, the buildings have been greatly enlarged and extended to increase the facilities for bleaching and dyeing cotton goods to the present capacity of seven hundred thousand yards per week. In 1885 the cotton factory was enlarged and refitted, and has now seven thousand spindles and one hundred and ninety looms. For thirty years past the preparation of cloth for window shades has been a specialty of these works. Some of these goods are manufactured here, while much the greater part of them are made in New England and sent to the Rockford Works to be bleached and dyed by contract.

The water-power here, which is utilized in running the mills, furnished by twenty-two feet fall of the Brandywine Creek, is probably the best in the State of Delaware. Half of this water-right is owned by the Bancrofts and the other half by E. I. du Pont & Co., who own the land on the opposite side of the stream. The water-power furnished in these works by the stream is equal to five hundred horse-power and is used almost exclusively as a motor during six months of the year. Steam-engines to furnish a power equal to that of the water-wheels have recently been added to the works. The buildings extend along the Brandywine for a distance of six hundred feet. There are here about three hundred employees, most of whom live in the tenement houses erected on the property.

To the south of the works, on a gently sloping hill surrounded by a beautiful lawn and dense shade, is the large stone mansion built by the founder of this industry and now occupied by his widow, and near by it are the homes of the present proprietors, William and Samuel Bancroft, Jr.

Wadding.—Wadding is manufactured by the Lea Pusey Company, at Thirteenth and Lombard Streets.
The house was originally founded in 1854 as J. Pusey & Sons. Later it became Pusey Brothers, and they operated this business, and in conjunction with it the warps and woven goods. In 1882 Mr. Lea Pusey assumed sole proprietorship and so carried on the business until 1887, when the present company was formed. The products of the house are used in making clothing and for other purposes.

Ice is produced by artificial process by the company just spoken of, pure, filtered water being used for the purpose. The same concern deals also in wood and coal. The president of the company is Mr. Lea Pusey, and the vice-president and treasurer is Mr. R.
B. Chilas.

Wilmington Dental Manufacturing Company.—The manufacture of teeth was begun in Wilmington in 1866, by Dr. E. Shelp, who had a small establishment in a building on the corner of Ninth and Market Streets, which subsequently passed into the hands of Dr. J. B. Tantum. In 1879 Dr. J. F. Frantz became a partner, and the business was conducted by J. B.
Tantum & Co., in a little building on Girard Street, until 1882, when H. C. Robinson and Prof. S. J. Willey became interested in the concern, and the Wilmington Dental Manufacturing Company was incorporated with a capitalized stock of two hundred thousand dollars.

The factory is now located on King Street, opposite the Court-House. The company employ from fifty to seventy-five hands, and manufacture about three million teeth annually, which are shipped to all parts of the civilized world. The feldspar and silica, of which the teeth are made, is obtained from Chester County, Pa., and the platinum from the Ural Mountains of Russia. The process of manufacture consists in reducing the crude material to a very fine powder by mills for that purpose, after which it is dried, sifted and compounded in proper proportions; being reduced to a paste-like consistency, it is moulded in brass moulds; the platinum pin that is used to attach the tooth to the vulcanite having been inserted therein, the whole is placed in a Bunsen flame and the moisture is extracted therefrom, giving the tooth form and a certain hardness. All defects are now carefully filed away or repaired by skilful workmen, when the teeth are placed on slides made of fire-clay upon which is placed a bedding of broken quartz, which is not fusible. They are then subjected to a white heat in the dental furnace for about fifteen minutes, which hardens the enamel and gives the teeth a bright appearance. Gold, chemically prepared, is used to give a red or pinkish color; titanium imparts a yellowish hue and platinum tint. These chemically prepared ingredients are blended with the paste by skilful workmen so as to produce the desired effect.

Marble Works.—The marble and granite works of Chas. E. Smith, at Tenth and Tatnall Streets, are the oldest in the city, having been established in 1848 by Chas. H. Smith, father of the present proprietor.
About fifteen workmen are employed. The house also operates steam saw-mill's in Philadelphia, for sawing stone.

The Delaware Steam Marble and Granite Works, at Fifth and King, were started in 1861, by Brown & Davidson. Subsequently the establishment was conducted by Davidson Brothers, and since 1883 Thomas Davidson has been sole proprietor. Thirty or more workmen are employed, and the services of a thirty-horse-power engine are also brought into requisition.
The house does monumental and decorative work and deals in marble and granite. The business is also carried on by William Davidson, at Ninth and King Streets; by John L. Malone, on Delaware Avenue near Madison; and by L. W. Megowan, at 238 Shipley Street.

Fertilizers.—Fertilizers are manufactured on a huge scale by the Walton & Whann Co. The business was established in 1861; the style of the house became Walton, Whann & Co. in 1865, and the present company was incorporated in 1885. The large works are located upon the opposite side of the Christiana from the city, and the store-houses, offices and lab-orousy are upon West Second Street. The house, upon the average, makes about one hundred tons of super-phosphate per day. This involves not only a great mechanical power, but the constant exercise of high professional skill; for this branch of manufacture is a department of applied science. Bones from the Western packing-houses, from the great prairies, from Texas, from the pampas of South America, from the markets of the East, bones from the sea, are brought here by car and ship-loads, and under the powerful machinery join in a "prodigious dance of death." Reduced to powder, they are either sold as "bone meal," or undergoing further processes of a chemical nature, go out as other forms of fertilizer. Some are treated with ammonia, others combined with potash, and a great deal of sulphuric acid is used, all of which is manufactured upon the spot, in great leaden chambers, from sulphur imported from Sicily. Thus a product of the Old World here, under scientific guidance, meets the ghastly bones from slaughter-house and prairies of the two American continents, to form a food for impoverished soils in the farms of the United States.
The company has branch houses at Baltimore, Md.;
Macon, Ga.; and Cleveland, O. Its officers are,— President, E. T. Walton; Vice-President, A. L. Anderson; Secretary and Treasurer, Francis N. Buck; and Superintendent, Geo. A. Le Maistre.

Pipe Covering.—James F. Wood & Co. are the successors of Wilson, Wood & Co., who established the business of making a patent pipe-covering about 1872.
The change in the house occurred over three years ago, and since that time the scope of manufacture has been greatly broadened. The products of their house at Front and Orange Streets now consists largely of a patent pipe-covering, but they also make metal roofing, and are the largest manufacturers in the city of sheet iron, brass and cooper.

Fruit Juices.—Natural juices and flavors. The firm of Smith & Painter began business as druggists on the corner of Seventh and Market Streets, Wilmington, in 1866, and continued until 1885. In the year 1872 an incident occurred which was the beginning of the present thriving industry. An agent for a New York wholesale house, when in the store, drank a glass of soda, the flavor of which was pineapple, and which he particularly liked. A conversation concerning it developed the fact that all the flavors used were made by the druggists. The agent asked hundred feet, connected at the two ends by office and boiler-rooms, to which they removed January 16, 1888. Shipments of their products are made to every State in the Union, and during the busy season from forty to fifty persons are employed.

The Vulcanized Fibre Company, at their works, Tenth and Walnut Streets, manufacture a material, by a more or less secret process, which is made to take the place of leather in many mechanical uses, as, for instance, washers for bolts, and is made into various utensils. The works were started in 1879, with William Courtney, of New York, as president, and after numerous changes he again holds that position. A number of Wilmingtonians are stockholders in the company and Frank Taylor is superintendent and treasurer.

if they could fill an order for the pineapple, and was informed they could. A few days after the agent returned to New York City they received an order for three hundred bottles of pineapple flavor, which was shipped and was followed soon after by orders for other flavors. The demand increased, and in 1874 a small laboratory was erected in the rear of the drugstore, where the juices and flavors were made and put up. In 1878 business had so much increased that a lot was purchased at the corner of Sixth and Tatnall Streets, and a two-story brick building was erected, one-half of which was used for their business, which at that time embraced the preparation of fruit juices and many flavors. In the spring of 1883 the entire building was occupied, and in 1885 so great had become the demand that the drug business was disposed of and the attention of the proprietors was entirely given to the business. In the fall of 1887 a block of land was purchased, one hundred and forty-seven feet on Eleventh Street, extending from Bennett to Church Streets and northward three hundred feet to Brandywine Creek, on which was erected two brick buildings, each thirty-five by one

Thomas Drein & Son and S. T. Bannar are among the leading builders of small boats, the former having been engaged at the trade since 1866 and the latter since 1884. The business of the former house (now carried on solely by Wm. M. Drein) consists largely of the building of Cone's patent life-rafts, adopted by many steamship lines and vessel-owners, and the operations of Mr. Bannar consist chiefly of building metallic boats.

Wilmington Mills Manufacturing Company.—Jute goods in considerable variety—as twine, rug yarn, carpet filling, ropes, etc., are the product of the Wilmington Mills Manufacturing Company, which consists of James Morrow and his sons, James C. and Lewis B. Morrow. The works are located at Sixteenth Street and Railroad Avenue, immediately alongside of Brandywine station on the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad, but have only been there about five years, when originally established, in 1870, being located at the corner of Fourth and Spruce Streets. The chief interest in the history of these works, the only ones of their kind in Delaware, belongs to the period subsequent to 1882, when they were removed to the present site, and hence we pass over the prior years except to say that they exhibited slow and uniform growth and prosperity, culminating in a condition which made enlarged facilities, and therefore removal, a necessity. They took possession of the building formerly used by the Stotzenburg Nut and Bolt Works, which, however, forms but a small part of their present factory. This is a building fifty by two hundred and fifty feet in area, perfectly adapted in every respect to the purpose for which it is used. It is indeed a model factory, well-lighted and ventilated, supplied with the best of protection against fire, and admirably arranged for the economic handling of material. The gearing of the machinery is all enclosed to prevent accident to the operatives and every other precaution is taken for their safety and comfort. The number of employees is about one hundred. The motive force is a Corliss engine of two hundred and fifty horse-power. The machinery, which is for the most part delicate and complicated, is nearly all imported and necessarily very expensive. Jute comes from India, the port of shipment being Calcutta, and the two million pounds or more which is handled annually by this manufactory is unloaded at the doors from cars side-tracked into the yard. The four hundred pound bales being opened and the fibre subjected to a soaking process is passed through a heavy machine which breaks and removes the coarse fibre, after which it is ready for the more delicate spinning machines. Two thousand whirling spindles form it into a kind of yarn from which afterwards it is made into twine, carpet filling and small ropes; in the latter process, lightning-like little machines occupying scarcely a dozen square feet, taking the place of the old-fashioned rope-walk in which "human spiders walking backward," spun so tediously and slow in time not long past. The crude material, entering at one end of the building, passing through its entire length of two hundred and fifty feet, comes out wound in balls and coils at the other end, ready for shipment, if necessary, by the same cars that brought it in. The product is shipped to all parts of the country and the company has a contract with the United States government for 700,000 pounds of its wares this present year. Of this unique and prosperous manufacturing establishment the officers are: President, James Morrow; vice-president, James C. Morrow, and secretary and treasurer, Lewis B. Morrow. The active and practical management of the works devolves upon Mr. James C. Morrow.

Cooperage.—The coopering business flourished in Wilmington at a very early day. Thousands of barrels were required yearly to supply the Brandywine mills, and the other flour mills in the vicinity before the time of the Revolution. The establishment of the du Pont powder mills increased the demand and the number of men engaged in making them. It was a century ago that James Smith made barrels along the Brandywine for Joseph Tatnall, in large numbers. He continued until 1824. John Hayes, William Stewart and others, made barrels for the mills "when Wilmington was but a village." Phillip McDowell at a later day prospered exceedingly well in the business, employing as many as forty cooperers in his shop, making barrels and hogheads for the Brandywine mills. He began in 1832 on French Street, between Twelfth and Thirteenth, remaining there four years, and then moved west of the site of J. Taylor Gause’s residence, and built a dwelling and shop. His workmen settled around him until everybody called the place "McDowellville," a name not yet forgotten, even if it is in the city limits. He died in the Centennial year, and the business then declined.

John Danby, an intelligent Englishman, began the business in his stone house on the Kennett pike, a building still standing between Shipley and Tatnall near Tenth. He made powder-kegs and saltpeter barrels for the du Ponts. Later he built a house on Shipley Street, and increased his facilities for manufacture, employing twenty-five men, and prospered.

Asa Poinsett began on French Street to make powder-kegs. From 1835 to 1842, when the Wilmington Whaling Company flourished, he made all the casks and barrels that it needed, and employed twenty men regularly. He later moved to the Brandywine, increased the number of employees, and made barrels for the Prices at the mills. George McGee, in 1824 and later made powder-kegs, finally moved to Brandywine and made barrels for William Lee. James Montgomery and J. H. T. Rice made large numbers of barrels. During the year 1849, cooperers received seventeen cents for making a barrel. The best workmen could make thirty per week. There were then about two hundred journeymen employed in the different shops in Brandywine village.

John W. Hawkins, now a retired citizen of Wilmington, started in 1840, at the corner of Fifteenth and French Street. His father, Thomas Hawkins, an industrious Swede, began the business at the same site in 1803, and made fluxed casks for the West India trade, beef and pork and flour-barrels, until his son succeeded him. The latter for twenty-five years, with as many men made barrels for John H. and James Price. In 1845 he took charge of the "red cooper shop" over which John Hyndman presided for twenty years previously. In all Mr. Hawkins had four shops going for a considerable time. William Rice in Brandywine village corner of Sixteenth and King, employed twenty-five men, and conducted three shops for a long period. James Caravel and William Morrow did a considerable business. William M. Connell now conducts four shops, making barrels for William Lee & Sons.

Coppersmiths.—The coppersmith works were started by Heisler & Roberts in 1836. This firm was succeeded by B. and R. Heisler, who were succeeded by Heisler, McBride & Co., the present firm. They employ from eight to ten men and do all kinds of copper sheet metal work. A large part of the work done here is copper-piping for steamships. This is the only coppersmith shop in the State.

BRANDYWINE COTTON MILLS.—The Gilpins had erected several stone-buildings for their paper-mill which were partially destroyed by the floods.

About 1838, Riddle and Lawrence purchased these mills and converted them into a cotton spinning-mill, and about 1850 a large five story weaving-mill was erected; this was followed by a picker-house, dressing-house and boiler, dye and dry houses, altogether making a very complete factory with improved machinery. Two hundred and eighty hands are employed to operate twelve thousand spindles, and weave one thousand two hundred pieces of fancy ticking, containing fifty-seven yards in each piece per week. James Riddle associated his son and son-in-law in business with him under the firm-name of Riddle, Son & Co. He was a quiet, industrious man and accumulated a good property. After his death in 1872, his son, Leander, managed the business. He was a progressive man, and introduced the latest improved machinery into his mills. His early death left the business in the hands of the son-in-law, William M. Fields, who has recently rented the mills to C. J. Milne & Co. There is a large stone quarry on the estate, which is being worked successfully.

The Christiana Window-Glass Company operate the works originally known as those of James Bradford, and have done so since the late summer of 1886. It is a stock-company with Edward H. Burns as president. It is conducted on the co-operative plan and consists of seventeen members, among whom are Michael J. Burns the superintendent, and his five sons, who like all of the operatives came here from the works at Quinton, N. J. There are about fifty men on the pay-roll of the company. There is much that is interesting in the work. Even the preparatory processes are peculiar. For instance the “pots” or huge crucibles in which the sand, lime and soda are mixed and fused to make glass, are not completed in much, if any less time than five months. The peculiar clay of this composition which is brought from Germany, has first to be ground and then in a moist state kneaded for about three weeks under a man’s bare feet, no other method than this slow and laborious one having ever been discovered which will give the clay its necessary qualities. The “pot” having been formed—in its inverted position looking like a small dome—must be carefully dried for four months. And after all of this painstaking and time expenditure it lasts in the fiery furnace only about eight weeks! The men who blow glass—especially window-glass, tell harder than any rolling-mill man or other workers in iron, for they have to swing upon the end of a seven-foot tube without leverage, masses of the molten “metal” ore weighing from eighteen to twenty-eight pounds, and blow almost continuously to inflate it to the form of a cylinder fifty-eight inches long by thirty-four in circumference. When not engaged in blowing and swinging this substantial bubble, the workman is engaged in rolling it, by the aid of a helper upon a concave iron or flat wooden surface. After the cylinder is properly fashioned, it is cut longitudinally and flattened out like a sheet of paper. Then comes the annealing process, the cutting, assorting and packing, and finally the glass is ready for the market. The management of the affairs of the company is in the hands of the following gentlemen: Edward Burns, President; Nathaniel Fox, Secretary and Treasurer; James Burns, Edward Fox and Frederick Eberhart. These constitute the board of directors, and in addition, Mr. Michael Burns is General Superintendent.

Carriage Builders.—Thomas Moore was one of the first carriage builders in Wilmington. He had an old rickety shanty where the Wilmington post-office now stands, and built a few carriages after the style of that day, which was very much heavier and more cumbersome than the style of the modern light running carriage. The next builder was Joseph Hunter, who had a frame building on Seventh and Shipley Streets, then John Merrick commenced business, at first in an old cotton factory on Front and Orange—a dissatisfaction sprang up among his employees, which resulted in seven of his workmen withdrawing from his factory and establishing a co-operative factory in an old shop on the corner of Market and Water Streets in 1844. From here they removed across the Christiana Creek into a large wooden shop that Charles Canby erected for them. They did business under the name of Flagler & Co., until they disagreed and part of the company withdrew and went to Baltimore. The remainder of the company continued business for four or five years, when there was another disagreement resulting in Messrs. Frist and Almond withdrawing about 1836, when they established a business on the corner of Seventh and Shipley Streets. Messrs. Flagler and Huntsburger were the only remaining members of the original seven successors in the old firm. They continued in business about three years, and last of all they disagreed also. Flagler, who was determined to never flag, retained the old place and Huntsburger came back across the river and tore down the original building on Water and Market Streets, and built a five-story brick building covering the entire block. These houses all did a large business, enjoying a monopoly of the Southern trade, which at that time was large. More silver-plating was used then than now. Sometimes from fifty to sixty dollars worth of silver was thus used, and it was no uncommon thing for a Southern gentleman to put his carriage in his parlor, but the breaking out of the Civil War destroyed this trade and Huntsburger lost all of his money and died of a broken heart. The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad are now building a freight depot where his building stood. About 1850-55, Wilmington was the first city in the Union in the manufacture of carriages. She does not occupy that position now, but still she does a large business in the local trade and with Philadelphia. Although there is not as much silver-plating used as formerly, yet the workmanship is much finer. Skilled workmen receive twenty dollars per week where they formerly received only eight dollars. Formerly from fifty to sixty carriages were made from one pattern; now frequently only one is made from a pattern and new styles are constantly being designed. Most of the hickory lumber used comes from Pennsylvania, second growth ash from Ohio and Connecticut, soft yellow poplar from Michigan.

Gregg and Bowe, at the southwest corner of Orange and Eighth Streets, commenced carriage making in 1855, and are now the oldest firm engaged in the business in the city. They occupy a large brick building, one hundred and sixty-five by forty-two, on Eighth Street, and one hundred and fifty-five by forty-two on Orange Street, besides having a ware-house on Twelfth and Arch Streets, and a repair-shop on Filbert Street, Philadelphia. They do nothing but the best custom work, employing from fifty to sixty hands and making about three hundred and fifty carriages per year.

Jones, Guthrie & Company, coach manufacturers, are located on the south side of Market Street Bridge. This establishment was founded in 1849 and is one of the oldest in the city. The shops of this company are well adapted to the work and the best material is employed. The firm have a good reputation and keep a large stock of elegant carriages constantly on hand.

Frist & Almon, have a carriage factory on the corner of Shipley and Seventh Streets, wherein excellent light carriages, such as buggies, surreys, brewster Park and pony-phaetons, are made, a specialty. This house was established in 1846 as Flagler & Company, which was succeeded by the present company in 1856. The firm, Messrs. Joel Frist and George Almon are practical men and employ from twelve to twenty workmen. Their factory is sixty-four by fifty-eight feet in dimensions and five stories high.

Cooling Brothers commenced carriage making in 1862, on Front Street above Fourth. They have a large brick building and employ about fifty hands and make from two hundred and fifty to three hundred vehicles of all kinds per year. The firm has a branch on Broad Street near Race, Philadelphia.

Gatta & Kaiser, have been engaged for twenty-five years without change in firm-name or removal from their original stand, in the manufacture of all kinds of heavy hauling and business wagons. They began work in 1862 where they carry on business now at the northwest corner of Third and Walnut Streets.

McLear & Kendall, at present the largest manufacturers of carriages in the city, were the successors, as already shown, of Mr. Merrick. They formed a partnership and bought out his Second and French Street establishment in 1864, and in 1866 purchased from him the building at Ninth and King Streets, which they at present occupy. This is a four-story brick, two hundred and nineteen by seventy-five feet in dimensions. Mere figures, however, give an inadequate idea of the hugeness of this plant. The building is divided into six departments—the iron, wood-working, trimming, painting, repository and offices, and in these the work is carried on in the most systematic manner. A forty-horse-power engine drives the extensive and varied system of machinery, including all of the most improved and the latest invented appliances. Upon the average, one hundred and fifty men are employed, among them many highly skilled in their different departments, and also several designers constantly employed in producing new patterns of vehicles. Extensive as are these works, they do not represent the full scope of Messrs. McLear & Kendall's business, for they have large branch establishments in Philadelphia and Charleston, S.C. The productions of the firm comprise a general line of fine carriages and wagons; in fact, everything from the most costly and elaborate down to the simplest and cheapest form of work—the common road-wagon and buggy, landaous, coupes, coaches, broughams, rockaways, victorias, phaetons, cabriolets, cabs, hansoms, etc. The business has been slowly developed to its present proportions, and the firm has probably done more than any other to give Wilmington its reputation as a carriage-building centre, their goods being shipped to every State in the Union, to Mexico and foreign countries. The individual members of the firm are Henry C. McLear and Caspar Kendall.

S. D. Paschall's carriage manufactory is located on the south side of Market Street Bridge. He commenced manufacturing carriages in 1866, and has one of the largest establishments in the city, employing some seventy-eight men in the manufacture of a large number of extension-top phaetons, coupes, rockaways, physician's buggies, family carriages and business wagons. The ground on which the various shops, office and storage-rooms of this house are located is one hundred and twenty-five feet on Market Street, one hundred and forty-three feet front for wharfage on Christiana River, and sixty feet at the longest part, containing two and one-fourth acres.

C. W. Horn, whose establishment is at 103 Walnut Street and 110 French Street, began business for himself in 1867, but he has been a resident of the city since 1855 and was for a number of years a partner with the veteran carriage builder, John Merrick. Since obtaining possession of his present stand, he has enlarged the buildings several times, and they now afford a floor area of fully ninety thousand feet. The specialties of manufacture are light carriages and sleighs.

John Walther, on the south side of Market Street bridge, commenced carriage-making in 1870. He does custom work principally, employing ten hands and making one hundred carriages per year.

John W. Reeve commenced in 1873-74, and employs from twelve to sixteen hands. He makes about one hundred light buggies per year.
NEW CASTLE COUNTY. 803

E. M. Hammitt, Nos. 501-505 French Street, has a carriage repair-shop and has recently added carriage-making.

The firm of Mills & Combs was organized in 1869 for the purpose of manufacturing wagons, and was under the management of James Mills, who, in 1882, became sole proprietor. The premises now occupied are on the corner of Fourth and Railroad Avenue, and embrace an area of one hundred and eighty-six by two hundred and thirty-five feet, which includes, besides the wagon factory, cool and wood yards.

William H. Cole commenced wagon-making in 1873. He employs from five to ten men and makes some seventy-five carriages and wagons per year.

William Hammond, corner of Second and French Streets, started to make wagons in 1874. He does custom work and employs as high as twenty-five hands, making about one hundred wagons during the winter season.

Novelty Carriage Works, Samuel Keros, proprietor, Second and French Streets. This house succeeded John Green in 1874 and employs about forty hands, producing light carriages, buggies, phaetons, jump-seats, surrey and rockaways, which are sold throughout the country. The factory consists of a three-story building one hundred by forty feet.

Cahill & Co. occupy two buildings on Orange Street, thirty-five by sixty feet and forty-six by sixty feet in extent, making a very complete carriage-factory, having four general departments, the woodworking, blacksmithing, trimming and painting. About twenty skilled workmen are employed under the management of P. J. Cahill, the successor of Hudson & Cahill, who started the business in 1878. The annual production of the factory is about one hundred and twenty-five vehicles, besides an extensive repairing trade.

Rice & White, south side of Market Street bridge, commenced manufacturing carriages about 1880. Their factory consists of two large buildings, one two hundred by seventy feet, used as a factory, and the other, one hundred by sixty feet, used as a showroom. They employ from thirty-five to fifty hands and carry a large stock of light carriages, buggies, phaetons, etc.

McCabe & Darragh, manufacturers of carriages, on corner of Fourth and Walnut Streets, established the business in 1884. Their building is four stories high and one hundred and fifty feet square in area. They employ fifty hands and annually produce about one thousand vehicles, including beach wagons, landaus, carryalls, rockaways, surreys, victorias and express wagons, the latter being a specialty. This firm ship carriages to various parts of the United States, besides having a West India trade.

F. T. Clymer, northeast corner of Third and Orange Streets, has two commodious buildings, and makes a specialty of wagon and carriage bodies of all kinds. He employs from seventy-five to one hundred men, and has over three hundred different patterns, including every style of vehicle, comprising heavy and light carriages, coaches, omnibuses, hearses, etc. One of his buildings is a three-story brick, fifty-four by one hundred and fifty feet in dimensions, and the other is twenty-four by one hundred and thirty feet, and is used principally as a storage room.

Hub Factory.—Stephen Downey has an extensive hub factory on the corner of Third and Tatnall Streets. The increase of carriage manufacturing in Wilmington led Mr. Downey, in 1868, to establish a hub factory, which he has successfully carried on in connection with turning newell-posts, having improved machinery for their manufacture, also for the manufacture of balusters and ship-turning material, stair-building being a specialty with Mr. Downey; this branch of his business is quite extensive.

The Diamond State Brewery, of which Joseph Stoeckle is proprietor, occupies, above Fifth and Adams Streets, the site of the old brewery of Nebeker Brothers, built in 1859. Mr. Stoeckle came to America in 1855 and became the owner of this property in 1871. The building was destroyed by fire in 1881, and he then erected the present imposing structure, five stories in height, surmounted by a tower and adorned with a gigantic statue of Cambrian. Here the proprietor has unsurpassed facilities for the brewing of lager beer and porter, and the products of the establishment have a high reputation throughout the peninsula and Pennsylvania and to a considerable extent through territory further removed. Everything known to the science of brewing is to be found in this house, and some idea of the extent of the manufacture may be conveyed by the statement that an eighty-horse power engine is needed to operate the brewery, the capacity of which is thirty thousand barrels annually.

Hartmann & Fehrenbach's Brewery, at the corner of Lovering Avenue and Scott Street, was originated by John Hartmann and John Fehrenbach, at the same site in 1886. The first buildings used were frame, which were fitted out with a capacity to produce thirty barrels of lager beer daily. They continued with such facilities until 1878, when the old buildings were removed and a large three-story brick building erected and fitted out with improved machinery and apparatus, the entire cost being forty thousand dollars. The motive force is supplied by an engine and two boilers, one of eighty and the other of fifty horse-power. A large refrigerator has recently been placed in the brewery. The present capacity of manufacture is thirty-five thousand barrels annually. The beer made here is consumed in Wilmington and the towns of the Peninsula, and a prosperous business is done. In 1885 an incorporated company was formed with John Hartmann, president; John G. Hartmann, vice-president; and John Fehrenbach, secretary and treasurer. The other members of the company are J. G. Fehrenbach and Charles Fehrenbach. Sixteen men are employed, and the brewery is constantly in operation.
James H. Beggs & Company's Brick-yard is located a short distance out of the city limits, the office of the firm being at Eighth and Shipley Streets. Mr. Beggs has been engaged in brickmaking for twenty-two years. Several years since the firm of J. H. Beggs & Co. was formed, the members being James H. Beggs and John P. Allmond. The deposit of clay suitable for good brickmaking around Wilmington is large, and this firm have an exceptionally good article. Several years ago the firm introduced a new feature in Wilmington brickmaking by importing a number of skilled Italian workmen, who turn out all kinds of fancy and ornamental brick and tile work. The firm turn out from nine to twelve million bricks a year, and employment is given to two hundred hands.

James E. Moore & Co.—This firm is composed of James E. Moore and S. W. Darby, and was started in 1887. The plant is located at the southwest of the city, and turns out three million bricks annually.

Bricks are also manufactured by Alvan Allen and the firm of Pierce & Beeson. Mr. Allen in 1872 bought the old brick-yard of Lewis & Sons, at Front and Du Pont Streets, and in 1882 he established his present yard near the junction of the Wilmington and Northern and Baltimore and Ohio Railroads at Union Street, where he has unsurpassed facilities for shipping. He employs from eighty to eighty-five men, and makes about five million bricks per year.

Messrs. Pierce & Beeson have the yard on Elliott Avenue started by Samuel McClary, Jr., in 1878. It passed into the hands of Forest & Pierce in 1882, and to the present proprietors March 3, 1886. The firm, of which the individual members are J. Eldridge Pierce and Harry A. Beeson, employ over a hundred men, and the production of their yard amounts to about seven million bricks per year.

Lumber.—Quinby & Co., lumber merchants, are the successors of A. H. Quinby, who, in 1839, purchased the business of a firm previously established, thereby dating the business back to 1834. During this time the stand has been removed twice, and now occupies the square of ground on Front and Madison Streets, adjacent to the saw and planing-mill, which are run in connection with the business,—dressing flooring, ceiling, siding and the various kinds of lumber used in the large manufacturing concerns of the city. The firm make a specialty of yellow and North Caroline pine, but handle white pine, cypress and other woods.

Wm. H. Pierson & Son, No. 421 West Front Street, have one of the largest sash and door establishments in the city. Their building, forty by one hundred, and three-stories high. The upper stories are reached by an elevator, upon which is a truck and car track which connects with a car track on each floor. Formerly this house had a factory opposite their storage-room, but now all the manufacturing is done by them at Lock Haven, Pa. The Piersons are among the oldest families in the State. John Pierson was one of the surveyors that helped to survey the ten-mile circle that forms the northern boundary of Delaware. Joseph Pierson, grandfather of William H., kept the Cross-Keys and Lafayete hotels in Wilmington, and his son, Joseph, was the main carpenter and builder in Wilmington for many years. Jacob Pierson, another son, invented the first seed drill that was ever manufactured. Bush & Lobdell manufactured and sold it for many years. He also invented a snow-plow and a book and paper folding-machine.

Springer, Morley & Gause have a large wheel, sash door and blind factory on Third and Orange Streets, which was established in 1861, by L. R. Springer, E. N. Morley and S. I. Gause. They employ fifty men and use modern machinery in doing mill-work for builders, such as sash, doors, blinds, shutters, frames, mouldings and brackets from hard and soft wood. All the mill-work for Machinery and Agricultural Halls at the Philadelphia Centennial were made here. The wheel department is under the control of L. R. Springer, and the wheels of this house are known for their durability, style and finish.

In the line of lumber manufacturing the oldest house in the city is that of S. G. Simmons & Bros., at Front and Tatnall Streets, which was founded just about half a century ago, as Joshua Simmons & Co. The present plant of the firm occupies about two acres and extends to the river, on which it has a frontage of a hundred feet. In addition to the facility afforded for shipping, it may be mentioned that the railroad tracks run directly through the yard. The planing-mill is a two-story building, forty by one hundred and sixty feet, and is supplied with almost everything in the way of wood-working machinery, which is driven by a sixty horse-power engine. The product of the mill includes dressed lumber of all kinds, sash, doors, blinds, mouldings, stair-railings, newel posts, balusters, lath, shingles, etc. About fifty men are employed. The members of the firm are Messrs. S. G., Charles and Jesse G. Simmons.

Another comparatively old house in this line is that of J. Q. Bryer & Co., founded in 1851, by the present senior member, and carried on by him alone until 1887, when Francis E. Jackson was admitted to partnership. The mill is a one hundred and fifty by forty foot building on Tatnall Street, below the railroad. The products embrace almost everything in the wood-workers' line which enters into the builders' trade and much fine work is done, a specialty being wood-bending. The house has a large Eastern trade in addition to its home patronage.

James C. Dillon, of 1323 West Fourth Street, is one of those who have begun in this business comparatively recently. He has an excellent mill, well fitted up with all kinds of machinery known to the trade and is prepared to do the best of work in the line of sash, doors and blinds.

Churchman, Williams & Co. are extensive dealers in long leaf yellow pine, but their mills are located in Georgia.

RAILROAD AND BRIDGE-BUILDERS.—The Edgemoor Iron Company, one of the largest railroad and highway bridge manufacturing establishments in the country, and possessing an immense plant near Wilmington, was organized in 1869, substantially as at present constituted, with William Sellers, of Philadelphia, as president, and their resources have undergone a constant development since then. The lands of the company at Edgemoor are over a square mile in area, with a mile frontage upon the Delaware River. The buildings devoted to manufacture, with the adjacent yards for storing and handling materials and finished products, cover a large area, while the houses of operatives, a good class of structures provided by the company, occupy as much more, and a portion is used for agricultural purposes, though this, too, will doubtless eventually be devoted to the purposes of manufacture, for the indications are that the plant will undergo a large growth. The buildings containing the mechanical equipment are substantially built of bricks, with iron roofs, slate covered, and they comprise the engineering, machinery, blacksmithing, fitting and erecting departments.

The company, in the prosecution of its business, which consists of the manufacture of all kinds of iron and steel highway and railroad bridges and kindred structures, employs the best procurable appliances and machines, many of them specially designed and patented, and in use nowhere else. The tensile members, which form a very large and important portion of such structures, are made by hydraulic machinery, without welding or piling, and thus the connecting portions of the members are made as strong as the body. The compressive members are also manufactured by a plant which is largely special, and by the use of which all constructional strains are avoided. A particularly notable portion of the mechanical plant is a hydraulic upsetting machine, which contains the largest steel casting so far made in America. Forging and riveting are also performed by hydraulic machines.

Among some of the most notable bridges built by the Edgemoor Iron Co. we will instance the following: The entire suspended super-structure of the great East River Bridge, between New York and Brooklyn; the Susquehanna River Bridge near Harrisburg, Pa., on the Pennsylvania Railroad, which is the longest double-track railway bridge in the world; the Sabula River Bridge across the Mississippi, constructed for the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railroad; another high bridge across the same river near Minneapolis; the Kentucky River Bridge, built for the Cincinnati Southern Railroad, which is the highest railway bridge in the country; and the first cantilever railway bridge in the United States; the Schuylkill River Bridge, the elevated railway structure in Philadelphia, built for the Pennsylvania Railroad; a bridge over the Newra River, and a bridge over the Shohal Haven River, in the colony of New South Wales, Australia; also a swing bridge at Adelaide, in South Australia, and the first and, so far, the only iron railway viaduct in Australia, and an elevated railway in Kansas City, Mo., and much elevated railroad work in New York. Among the principal structures now engaging the energies of the company are a bridge over the Missouri River at Sibley, on the line of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe system to Chicago, which consists of three spans of four hundred feet each, three spans of two hundred and fifty feet each, and a viaduct of iron over two thousand feet in length; a bridge over the Missouri connecting the cities of Omaha and Council Bluffs, of more than half a mile in length.

Another important branch of the Edgemoor Iron Company's business is the manufacture of the Galloway boiler, which is now being introduced into some of the most important industrial establishments in the country, among them the Crystal Plate Glassworks, in St. Louis; the works of the Eddystone Manufacturing Company, at Chester, Pa.; the Midvale Steel Co., of Philadelphia; the establishment of Proctor & Gamble at Iverydale, near Cincinnati, Ohio; the Diamond Watch Company, of Akron, Ohio; the Pacific Mills, of Lawrence, Mass.; the works of the Albany and Rensselaer Iron and Steel Company, of Troy, N. Y.; and the United States Mint, at Philadelphia.

In May, 1886, the company met with an irreparable loss in the death of its secretary and treasurer, Mr. Eli Garrett.

The present officers of the company are: President, William Sellers; Vice-President, John Sellers, Jr.; Manager, Henry G. Morse; General Superintendent, George H. Sellers; Treasurer, William F. Sellers; Secretary, William H. Connell.

When the buildings now in process of erection, are completed, as they doubtless will be in 1888, the entire system will be the most extensive of its kind in the country. The number of employees at the works varies from five to eight hundred, and there are about a third as many constantly at work in the field erecting bridges and other structures.

Those of the employees who are married have the privilege of renting, at low rates, excellent cottages, built by the company, who have also erected a convenient and commodious school-house, in which they maintain a school for the benefit of the children of operatives residing there.

Building Operations.—The town of Wilmington contained thirty-five houses in 1735. This number was nearly doubled by the year 1739, when a borough charter was obtained. Its growth was slow and steady.
HISTORY OF DELAWARE.

for the next thirty-six years, as in 1775, at the beginning of the War of the Revolution it had three hundred and thirty-four dwelling-houses. The population of the town in 1820 was five thousand two hundred and sixty-eight. There were then eight hundred and ninety-four dwelling-houses in it, only two hundred and ninety more than were built in the city during the year 1811, when the highest number was erected. In 1832, when the town was incorporated into a city, the houses numbered twelve hundred and twenty-eight and the population seven thousand one hundred and twenty-eight. The first record of the number of buildings put up in any one year was in 1836, when "two entire blocks were erected, besides several foundries and machine-shops, fifty-two buildings in all."

In 1845 Wilmington received a new impetus to its growth and prosperity, which was the result of the erection of a large number of manufacturing establishments. These employed many workmen, and caused a rapid emigration to the city. The population in 1845 (though only about one-fifth of what it is in 1888) was twelve thousand five hundred and thirty-two, an increase of one thousand eight hundred and ninety-three in two years. The Delaware Journal, in its issue of September 9, 1845, says:

"The present year is, beyond comparison, the most prosperous in the annals of our city. Two hundred and fifty dwelling-houses were erected. The population increased one thousand. The most gratifying circumstances in connection with the improvement is that they proceed from no speculative fever. The increasing business of the city fully justifies the movement. Every branch of the manufacturing interest to which our people have directed their capital and energies has increased beyond precedent, and the future is as promising as the past has been successful. If not interrupted, Wilmington will soon attain a commercial and manufacturing consequence which was never dreamed of by her early citizens."

The Philadelphia News, in its issue of October 27, 1847, says: "Wilmington is prospering. We doubt if any city in the Union has made such rapid strides in improvements during the past few years. In 1840 we spent a few days in that city. It then contained a population of eight thousand four hundred and fifty-two. By an enumeration, recently taken, the population is now nearly thirteen thousand, having increased sixty-five per cent. in less than seven years. New buildings have been erected on every side, and new streets have been laid out, many factories established and every branch of business is enjoying the highest degree of prosperity."

"The first continuous row of houses in Wilmington was built in 1822, on Shipley Street, near Tenth, by James Canby. The large majority of the houses, at that time, and since, were put up by the owners of them. Of the two hundred and fifty buildings erected in 1845 nearly all were situated east of Walnut Street. It was in that year that the city began to extend eastward, toward the Delaware River. The artisans, mechanics and other employees in the newly-built manufactories took up their abode in that section. Seventh Street, for a century or more known as Church Lane, in 1846 was extended and paved eastward to the Old Swedes' Church. Long rows of houses were put up in that vicinity this year. In 1846 there were nine millions of bricks made and sold in Wilmington. This was increased to thirteen millions in 1848, when three hundred and forty-two buildings were put up—more than in any previous year. It was in 1848 that an ordinance was passed forbidding the erection of frame houses in the city's limits. A number of handsome dwellings were built on Quaker Hill in 1847 and 1848, and also on the northern part of Market Street, beyond Seventh. The present plan of numbering houses was ordered in 1848. David C. Wilson, in 1845, erected a large mercantile building, four stories high, at the corner of Market and Fifth Streets. He also owned large tracts of land in the eastern part of the city. Pusey, Marr & Scott, at the same time, put up a large building at the southeast corner of Third and Tatnall Streets. Previous to 1845 nearly all the retailers of merchandise did business on Market Street. Stores were afterwards opened in every part of the city."

Some of the early contractors and builders of Wilmington were Elisha Huxley, Philip Jones, James and Thomas Dixon, Joseph C. Seeds, H. F. Dure, Passmore Mitchell, Philomera Chandler and others.

The builders and contractors of Wilmington have done much by their energy and enterprise to make the city its present size, and with the aid of the Loan Associations have made Wilmington as distinctively a "city of homes" as is the "City of Brotherly Love." A feature of Wilmington is that probably one-half of the mechanics, employed in the many industrial interests, own their own homes. The work of the builders has been so appreciated by the Wilmington people that not a single contract for a prominent private improvement of public work has been awarded to outside contractors, with the possible exception of the city reservoir, and even parts of this work were sublet to Wilmington men. On the other hand, large contracts from other cities have been awarded Wilmington firms. Notably among the latter are two of the five main Centennial buildings of 1876, the iron piers at Coney Island and large works of the Reading Railroad Company.

One of the prominent builders of the city was Charles McCloskey, who was born in county Derry, Ireland, in 1826, and came to this country with his widowed mother in 1842, locating in Wilmington. He served an apprenticeship at house-carpentering in Philadelphia, and subsequently went to New York, but returned to Wilmington in 1838 and organized the firm of McCloskey Brothers, contractors and builders. His brothers, Francis and Daniel, like himself, were carpenters. John and Peter A. were bricklayer, and Joseph A. was a painter, and they thus united the most important trades necessary in building operations. The firm existed until the death of Charles, October 11, 1885. They built St. Mary's, St. Paul's and the Sacred Heart Churches, besides other large buildings and hundreds of dwellings. Charles was also the senior member of the firm of McCloskey & McMenamin, also extensive builders. His wife was Ellen, daughter of Matthew Durney. There were nine brothers in all, and six are still living, five of whom are in Wilmington and Richard A. in Philadelphia, where he served fifteen years as an alderman. James, the eldest brother, died, in New Orleans some years ago, and Michael, who was a soldier in the Eleventh United States Infantry, was killed at the City of Mexico during the Mexican War. Francis McCloskey had a brilliant career as a soldier in the Civil War, serving a large portion of the time as a captain, and being breveted colonel, and after returning to Wilmington and resuming the building business being repeatedly elected street commissioner. John McCloskey also became a popular and influential citizen, as did also his brothers, Peter A. and Joseph, the latter of whom, like Francis, was a brave soldier in the late war. Daniel, with his brothers, John and Peter, was employed during the war in the United States Engineers' Department at Fort Delaware. All six of the surviving brothers are useful citizens, enjoying high repute.

Philip Quigley, contractor and bridge-builder, was born in New Egypt, New Jersey, September 28, 1816. He was a son of John Quigley and his wife, Ann Van Horn. At sixteen he commenced his trade as a millwright with his father. In 1841 he removed to Wilmington, and worked there and in the vicinity as a millwright. In 1843 he married Eliza, daughter of John and Elizabeth Groves, of Wilmington, by whom he had five children. About this time he entered the employ of the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad Company, as a journeyman in their carshops, and later had charge of the bridges on the road. Upon leaving the employ of the railroad company, he formed a partnership with I. R. Trimble, of Baltimore, Md., and Daniel Stone, of Philadelphia, and carried on the business of bridge-building for some years, under the firm name of Stone, Quigley & Co. Before the Civil War Mr. Trimble retired from the firm, and the business was continued under a new partnership formed by Messrs. Stone, Quigley & Burton, which continued until 1864, when it was dissolved. After the close of the war Mr. Quigley rebuilt the Orange and Alexandria Railroad, and the aqueduct over the Potomac at Georgetown, and the Georgetown and Alexandria Canal. In 1875 he built Machinery and Agricultural Halls, of the Centennial buildings, Philadelphia, and was the general manager of the Centennial Terminal Agency, Limited, which had charge of the handling of all the exhibits of the occasion, receiving, placing and returning all exhibits entrusted to their care.

In 1877 he retired from active business and died in Wilmington, October 4, 1884. Mr. Quigley was a man of unusual activity, energy and enterprise, and many works of skill and durability remain to attest his fidelity and ability as a master mechanic.

Joseph C. Seeds, a retired carpenter and builder, was born near Chichester, Pennsylvania, July 4, 1801. His grandparents, Adam and Alice Seeds, formerly resided in New Castle, Delaware. His mother was a daughter of Samuel and Rachel Carpenter, who lived about a mile above what is now known as Claymont Station, on the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad. Samuel Carpenter was a tanner in the village of Chichester, Pa. He had ten children five boys and five girls. Aided by the boys, he cultivated a farm of one hundred acres near by, that he had purchased in 1783 from Susan Doane. The house in which the subject of this sketch was born stood close to the line which divides Delaware from Pennsylvania. Soon after the birth of Joseph Carpenter (their eldest child, of whom we write) his parents, William and Hannah Seeds, removed to New Castle, and remained there until 1812, when they moved to Baltimore. When the War of Independence began, his father, William, enlisted in the Colonial army, and left Baltimore with his comrades en route for Washington. Since his departure from Baltimore at that time his family had no tidings from or of him. After weary, anxious, but fruitless waiting, Joseph's mother, with him and her three other children, returned to her father's home, where she endeavored to raise her little family for usefulness. Joseph was put to work in the tannery and on the farm under his grandfather's supervision, and continued to be so employed until 1817, when he came to Wilmington to learn the trade of a carpenter, with Abel Saunders, whom Mr. Seeds remembers and speaks of as "a nice, clever man." Mr. Saunders had one shop on part of the ground where the Clayton House was subsequently built, and another on ground which the opera-house now covers. After reaching his twenty-first year, having remained five years with Mr. Saunders, Mr. Seeds did such jobs of piece-work as he could get. Working thus for a short time, he obtained larger contracts and gave satisfaction to employers to an extent that established him as a complete architect and builder.

Continuing to prosper, he was married, May 6, 1824, to Mary Jane Milligan, a daughter of William and Lydia Milligan, of Philadelphia. She died January 1, 1842, leaving him three children,—William Henry, Anna E. and Joseph M. The last-named died April 24, 1851. He then married Mariana Wilson, a daughter of James and Mary Wilson, of Wilmington. James Wilson was a leading newspaper and bookprinter and binder of that day. Copies of The Watchman and The Mirror, printed by him, are among the archives of the Wilmington Historical Society. Of the three children which are the fruit of his second marriage, two survive, Mrs. Emily T., wife of Robert H. Young, superintendent of printing in the office of the Wilmington Every Evening; and Mrs. Mary W., wife of John B. Bare, a dealer in agricultural implements in Baltimore.

William H., his oldest child, married, first, Miss Paxson, of Philadelphia. This lady died January, 1877, leaving three children. In 1880 Mr. Seeds married Mrs. E. A. Babcock, of Manchester, Iowa, where he now lives. He is, and for twenty years has been, cashier of the Delaware County Bank of Manchester. Anna E. is the wife of Joseph Jeanes, a photographer, of Chester, Pa.

For years after fairly entering upon his career as a builder, Mr. Seeds conducted the Star Planing-Mill, which his growing business compelled him to erect on Front Street, near Justison Street, Wilmington. Here he made his business headquarters until the spring of 1858, when he sold the building to Messrs. Craig & Tatnall. It was used subsequently as a market-house and still remains on the original site. After a somewhat trying contest with the turbulent waters of the Christians, which seemed bent on preventing the secure establishment of a foundation, he came out victorious and built the lighthouse at the mouth of that stream. He also built the first passenger station for the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad Company in Wilmington.

In 1829 he built the well-known St. Andrew's Protestant Episcopal Church, of Wilmington. Bishop Lee, late Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Delaware, says, in the sermon that he preached in 1879, on the occasion of the semi-centennial of that church, that "the building of the church was commenced in May, 1829, and so energetically was the work carried on that it was completed and ready for consecration on the 1st of October following."

In 1839 Mr. Seeds was engaged to put a spire on the building and make other improvements. This work he finished by Christmas of that year. One month afterwards the whole structure was destroyed by fire. Again summoning Mr. Seeds to build, he completed for the congregation a new and larger church by October 15th following. This edifice proving too small for the congregation after a few years, in 1854 Mr. Seeds was yet again engaged to enlarge it by adding one-third to its capacity, at an expense of four thousand dollars. Mr. Seeds' energy and skill were thus recognized three times by the influential church and congregation, of which he has been an esteemed member almost from its organization. For over forty years he never missed attending a service.

Originally he was connected with the Old Swedes' Church, receiving the rite of confirmation from the venerable Bishop White, of Pennsylvania, in June, 1820, but, on account of the more convenient location of St. Andrew's with respect to his residence, he united with the latter organization, and has ever remained with it.

In person, Mr. Seeds is below middle stature, but compactly built, and has always enjoyed good health. He has been but once in his long life seriously ill. In the spring of 1872, while building a house for himself, in which he now resides, at Scott and Thirteenth Streets, he contracted pneumonia, and recovered slowly. After some months of suffering from it, he finally regained his accustomed health.

The advantages of education in his early life were not among his youthful privileges. He enjoyed but eighteen months of schooling, and one-half of that was in a night-school, taught by Samuel Ford, on Shipley Street, in Wilmington, after coming to the city to learn the trade of a carpenter. Mr. Seeds has been throughout his long life prudently abstemious in his habits. He has always lived a regular, temperate life, and has never been addicted to vicious indulgences of any kind. To this, in great measure, he attributes his health and longevity. He also reverently acknowledges his indebtedness to his Creator. Modest, upright and of a retiring disposition, he has not been conspicuous in municipal, State or national controversies. Before the Civil War a Democrat in politics, he voted his sentiments unostentatiously when the time came to vote. During and since the war he has held Republican views. In a ripe old age, but retaining much of the freshness of earlier years, he lives (1887) quietly with his family in their pleasant home on Scott Street, in Wilmington.

The extension of the limits to the west and northwest is more recent. It is this section now that contains the well-designed and beautiful residences, which lend a charm and attractiveness to the enterprising and prosperous metropolis of the State of Delaware.

The loan associations of Wilmington have been important factors in promoting the growth of Wilmington. They have assisted many worthy citizens to the ownership of homes. The moneys handled by them have counted into millions of dollars.

A building association was organized in 1848. It was the first one in the city; David C. Wilson was its president. The Wilmington Loan Association was organized in 1856; James Bradford was president, and Joshua Maris secretary. The original associations were formed on the terminal plan, with one series, continuing about ten years. Then legislation was secured, with the privilege of making them perpetual and enabling the association to issue stock in series, and by the laws of each association regulating the number of series and shares in each series, not exceeding five hundred shares in each series.

William Bright, a leader in building and capitalist of Wilmington, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., April 11, 1814.

He was the son of Capt. Wm. Bright, who for years commanded the "Good Friend," a vessel owned by Stephen Girard. His mother was Miss Sarah Pratt, a native of Philadelphia, who is remembered as an estimable woman of rare attainments and beauty. On account of her death, when her son William was but eight years old, he was deprived of many home advantages. At ten years of age he was placed on a farm under a severe taskmaster. Although promised, while in this situation, that he should enjoy six weeks of schooling annually, he rarely obtained more than three weeks in any year. After reaching manhood, he sought the instruction he needed and desired, at night-school; and adding to what he received there in his personal, private studies, he accumulated stores of valuable information for use in after-life.

In 1829, when in his sixteenth year, he became an apprentice to learn the trade of carpenter, with Wm. Weaver, of Delaware County, Pennsylvania. He remained five years with Mr. Weaver, and thoroughly won the esteem and generous aid of his master. Towards the close of his term of service here he met with an accident which disabled him for a time. Mr. Weaver gave to his young apprentice a home until he recovered. As soon as he could, after his recovery, he came to New Castle County, Delaware. For five weeks he worked as a journeyman, but soon secured a contract on his own account. He offered to build a double house for Harman Tally, a prominent citizen of Delaware, residing in Brandywine Hundred. By the terms of the agreement, Wm. Tally was to furnish the material complete, and give Mr. Bright his boarding and lodging and one hundred dollars. This contract Mr. Bright filled to the entire satisfaction of Mr. Tally, who was so thoroughly well-pleased with the workmanship that he advised Mr. Bright to give his attention exclusively to building. To do this work the young architect had given his best skill and energy, often wading through snow up to his knees, at four o'clock in the morning, to get to breakfast and to his work. Having completed this engagement with so much credit to himself, he began business fully, as a builder, and in a short time had all the work that he could do, even with the aid of apprentices and journeymen. He continued to be thus employed until 1889, when he bought a farm in the neighborhood—the farm on which his wife was born—and for ten years gave his attention successfully to agriculture.

Towards the close of the year 1849 he bought a grocery store of Messrs. John & Jacob Rice, of Wilmington, but impaired health induced him to retire from this business after three years of successful experience in it. In 1852, Mr. Bright turned his energies to transactions in real estate. In this business he had such success that he was able to retire from its active pursuit in 1876, and has not since resumed it. For eighteen years he was a director of the Farmers’ Bank of Wilmington. In 1875 he was chosen president of the Rehoboth Beach Association, but resigned the office in 1878. In July, 1881, he was re-elected and still retains the position. The design of this association is to provide an attractive summer resort on the Delaware coast below the Capes. The enterprise grows into larger proportions and favor with each succeeding year. Mr. Bright has erected a commodious house at the beach, which guests and acquaintances insisted on bearing his name. It is known, therefore, as the Bright House. That he is a citizen of public spirit is well attested in many ways. The Wesleyan Female College, of Wilmington, was purchased by him in order that it might be saved for the work for which it was intended. He has served the city as an efficient member of the City Council, of which, in 1867, he was chosen president. In 1874, his name was prominent as a candidate for nomination as Governor of the State. But while interested in public affairs he has not been ambitious to appear as a politician. He has sought to be useful in other lines of active enterprise, and by his promptness, energy and uprightness, combined with excellent judgment and general capacity for business, he has been successful. When a boy he united with the Methodist Episcopal Church and has served it with zeal and efficiency both as an officer and private member. He has held official position in that church during the greater part of his life. In February, 1837, he was married to Miss Sarah, daughter of Philip and Sarah Rodman, of Brandywine Hundred. His married life has been very happy. Thirteen children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Bright, of whom three died in infancy. A daughter, Victorine, died July 13, 1867, in the twenty-first year of her age. Mrs. Sarah Jennie, wife of J. W. Burney, died in March, 1878, leaving three children. Mrs. Anna P., wife of Thomas H. Rile, of Wilmington, is also deceased.

Other children survive as follows, Mrs. Hannah E., widow of Henry Talley, late of the Farmers' Bank of Wilmington; George W., real estate broker; and Mrs. Laura A., wife of John A. Myers, all of Wilmington. Mrs. Ella D. is the wife of William H. Bowers, of Wilmington. Mrs. Lillie E., wife of John C. Yeager, district superintendent of New York Central Sleeping Car Company, resides with her husband in New York.

Paul Bright is the proprietor of the Union Pacific Tea Company, in Wilmington. O. Percy, after graduating with honor at Yale College, entered upon the study of law in Philadelphia, and is now, 1887, in the closing year of the law course.

Mr. Bright has thus reared a large family of children, most of whom survive to cheer his latest years. He has a delightful home on Eleventh Street (No. 10), in a house designed and built by himself. His career has been eminently successful and has been steadily progressive. Starting in adversity and under hard conditions, he has attained competency, comfort and reputation, and feels, in the evening of life, a serene satisfaction as he recalls his toils and enjoys their reward.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

WILMINGTON—(Continued).

INNS AND HOTELS.

The Foul Anchor Inn, built in 1740, on Water Street "by the banks of the Christeen," was the first house of public entertainment in Wilmington. It was torn down more than half a century ago to give place for the extension of King Street through to the creek. Mr. Charles Moore, the oldest ship-carpenter in the State of Delaware, and who has lived eighty years in his native place, has a vivid recollection of this once popular resort. He describes it as a one and a half-story building with a front on Water Street of thirty feet, and a beautiful lawn in the rear. The painted sign swinging on a post in front of it, was an anchor hanging foul with a cable wound spirally around it.

The Foul Anchor was a place of rendezvous for sailors in the palmy days of Wilmington's importance as a commercial town. The seamen who manned the vessels for trade with Ireland and the West Indies a century or more ago, made it their abode after returning from a long voyage, until they set sail on another. About 1825 when foreign commerce from this port was discontinued, the popularity and the prosperity of this famous tavern was ended, and it was soon thereafter removed.

The Sign of the Ship, later the Happy Retreat, and still later the Lafayette, is remembered by only a few of the oldest citizens of Wilmington, for it ceased to be a public inn in 1855. It stood on the southeast corner of Third and Market Streets, where a part of the building remains, though not the original one. John Marshall, a typical publican of the colonial period, kept this tavern during the War of the Revolution, while some of the American officers made it their headquarters. When the British occupied Philadelphia, several naval engagements took place on the Delaware River and Bay. In one of them the American sloop-of-war "Randolph" was victorious. A traveling artist who gained a precarious living by painting tavern signs was then in Wilmington and painted on John Marshall's tavern sign, a picture of the American sloop annihilating two British three-deckers in the most imposing manner. Says an early chronicler, "When the English fleet lay opposite this town, the sailors passing to and fro were much annoyed by the sign and always made some harsh remarks. One day two sailors dressed in petticoat trousers carrying a bag up Market Street, arrested the attention of a young girl who was a great observer of daily events. They stopped at the foot of the post, emptied their budget, took out an axe and other tools, climbed up the post and drew down the sign and split it to atoms. They then hewed down the post, leaving not a vestige of its former glory." Standing upon the porch of the tavern, John Marshall watched them, not daring to interfere.

"'Tis a vast pity" said he,—pointing to the wreck of the sign as he spoke—'tis a vast pity you did not have pluck enough to beat the little Randolph, for then I would not have had a handsome sign hacked to pieces in that way."

Many incidents of the Revolution related elsewhere occurred at this tavern. George Ross kept it for a few years. Patrick O'Flinn succeeded in 1789. Tradition says he was the most polite man in the town, and an ideal inn-keeper of his time. He had an honorable record as a captain of a company of soldiers in the war of the Revolution. The earliest stages stopped at the "Happy Retreat," as that is what it was called under Patrick O'Flinn. It was a popular resort for the gentry of the town and country round about. Here political matters were discussed and the news of the times received, for newspapers were few then and the arrival of a stage was an important event. It was in 1797 that Captain Patrick O'Flinn, lately an officer in the Revolution, asked for a renewal of his license, after having "favored the public for many years." The request was freely granted, as no reproach was ever cast upon the management of the "Happy Retreat" under its courteous proprietor, for he was a ruling elder in the First Presbyterian church. Washington was once his guest, and slept in "the best room," on the second story of the building. Thomas Jefferson, then Vice-President of the United States, stopped over night, May 12, 1797, on his way to Philadelphia, then the national capital. Louis Philippe, the Duke of Orleans, when an exile in America, dined here thirty or more years before he became King of France, as did President John Adams and his intelligent wife in 1801, on a trip to Washington, then the national capital. Aaron Burr arrived in his own handsome chaise and gaily caparisoned horses, January 10, 1803, and was glad to enjoy the hospitalities of the host of the "Happy Retreat." A deep snow had fallen and as the government at Washington would not run without the Vice-President if Jefferson was at the helm, he remained here three days. Commodore Perry, the hero of Lake Erie, in "a private four-in-hand," drove up to the doorway February 4, 1814, and slept during the night in the same best room that years before had been the resting place of the "father of our country." It was soon after his great victory over the British, and the next day, when he arrived in Baltimore, there was a great demonstration in his honor. Patrick O'Flinn was delighted to entertain such guests, as anyone else would be. He loved to talk about them and their personal traits to the day of his death, July 7, 1818, at the age of three-score and ten years. Two days later his remains were interred close by the side of the old Presbyterian church, and a neat monument placed over them. Alexander Reynolds, his grandson, who died at the age of 18 years, in 1822, was his last descendant.

General James Wolfe was next proprietor, and as he had the honor to prepare the banquet to Lafayette in City Hall, when he visited Wilmington in 1824, he afterwards named it the Lafayette, and placed the portrait of the distinguished patriot in his swinging sign. "General" was not a title but Wolfe's first name. He was a militia captain but aspired to no higher position. Andrew Oliver, proprietor of Indian King tavern, Philadelphia, and G. J. Wolfe, in 1825, bought the Wilmington and Philadelphia stage line, and reduced the fare to one dollar per trip. Robert Eaken began to keep this tavern June 20, 1828, and Harriet Dickenson took charge in 1833. Jesse Sharpe was the last to preside over it as a house of public entertainment. In 1835 the building was purchased of William Seal by Edward Moore and William Morrow. John H. Moore's clothing store and the building above occupy the site.

One of the first circuses in Wilmington exhibited in a yard to the rear of the building on June 27, 1817.

The Washington House, stood on the site of Mealy's liquor store, a short distance above the Bank of Brandywine. In 1786, it was known as the "White Hart," a beautiful white deer being painted on the sign in front of it. William Creery then kept it. Next to the "Sign of the Ship" it was the leading hostelry in town a century ago. In 1797, John West, obtained a license to keep it. His petition was signed by Gunning Bedford, Jr., Eli Mendenhall, William Hemphill, David Kirkpatrick, Thomas Kean and others. The Philadelphia and Dover stages run by Julius Jackson and B. Roe, stopped here then. Edward Thomas, became keeper of it in 1805, and about that time the picture of Washington was placed on the sign, and the name "Washington Inn," was given it. His widow conducted the business for a few years after his death. Joseph Gilpin, succeeded until February 8, 1825, when James G. Jeffries took charge, and James Plumly followed until 1829. In the Spring of 1830, D. J. Thomas, advertised it for rent, stating that "for more than forty years it had been a tavern," and then Samuel Miller, took it. Benjamin Bracken, a loquacious individual, was the next lessee. He claimed to have shot Gen. Packenham, at the battle of New Orleans, but people never believed that he was ever at New Orleans. John Foster, was proprietor from 1841 to 1850, when it was owned by Washington Rice. Samuel Miller, was next to keep it.

The Indian King Tavern, for sixty years or more stood at the southeast corner of Fourth and Market Street, on the site of Sharp's dry good store. George Taylor, was owner and proprietor in 1790, and David Brinton, succeeded him in 1805. For seventeen years, until his death, he presided over it and made it a very popular public inn. In 1806, on a swinging sign at the top of a twelve foot pole, he had painted the picture of a large Indian chief with tomahawk in his uplifted right hand, and a bundle of arrows and a bow on his back. Tradition says he was a fierce-looking fellow, with a haughty bearing and an angry look. William Penn, nor any of his followers could ever have entered into a treaty of peace with him. Many times he was gazed upon by the school-boys of half a century ago, whose books made them believe all Indians were as fierce as he. One beautiful afternoon in June, thirty-two years after he was placed in position all faded so as scarcely to be recognized, he was taken down and consigned to the wood-pile.

David Brinton's tavern was the stage office for many years. In 1802, William Kerlin and George Pearce, ran a line of stages, from Wilmington to Phila-Philadelphia connecting with the line to Dover and Norfolk. In 1812, Brinton & Anderson, started a line of stages, which left Indian King, at 7 A.M., arrived at Philadelphia, at 11 A.M., left Philadelphia, 3 P.M. and arrived here at 7 P.M. They were run in opposition to the "Vesta," which that year was the first steamboat to run between the two cities.

David Brinton at the same time ran the mail stages from the Red Lion tavern on Market Street, Philadelphia, through Wilmington to Dover. They left Philadelphia at 5 o'clock in the morning and arrived at Dover in the evening. The fare for passage was $4.50. When the great mail route extending from Maine to Georgia, was surveyed and opened in 1812, the United States mail coaches all stopped at Brinton's for dinner. They were open wagons and were drawn with great speed, by relays of horses at the end of every tenth mile. One of the exchange stables was to the rear of the Indian King. The driver was accompanied by a guard, who sat on an elevated seat with him and was armed with a huge double-barrelled blunderbuss, to protect the mail if attacked by robbers. In winter these men were heavily clothed with skins and furs. The through passenger stages also stopped at the tavern for meals, but did not take on passengers. David Brinton, who was nearly blind for several years, died in 1822, and in September of that year John M. Smith leased the tavern of his heirs. He came to town from St.
George's Hundred. He told the public in the newspaper that he had "frequently put up at this hotel, and found it a good one, and he hoped to continue it of the first respectability." He owned a line of stages to Philadelphia for a few years, and on March 26, 1833, removed to the Indian Queen. Alexander Porter was proprietor for one year. Collins Denny succeeded him March 1, 1834. Captain Henry Read, who commanded the steamboat "Wilmington" to Philadelphia, took charge of Indian King Hotel April 1, 1836, and died there January 2, 1837. Jesse Sharpe was the next and last person who kept it. In 1841, it was bought of the Brinton heirs, by James Canby and Edward Tatnall, and the following year H. B.
Pennington & Son, opened a dry goods store in it.

The name Indian King was then given to a hotel on the west side of Market above Front, where Quigly & Mullin's wholesale grocery store is. It was kept by James A. Seaverson, Jacob De Haven, John Foster, Jacob Hoppie, Thomas Gibson and last by Alexander Porter. It was a rendezvous for soldiers for a time during the civil war.

The Indian Queen within the recollection of the present generation was the leading hotel in Wilmington.
And it sustained that reputation for many years. It stood on the northeast corner of Market and Fifth Street until its removal, in 1872, to give place to the Clayton House. On the site originally stood the residence of Job Harvey, the merchant trader. The earliest record of it is in 1789, the year of Washington's first inauguration, when Enoch Welsh, the first deputy postmaster, was proprietor.
On the 4th of July, 1797, the prominent citizens of Wilmington partook of a rich banquet at this house, in celebration of the twenty-first anniversary of American independence. It was called the Queen of Otaheite Tavern. About this time an occasional whaling vessel was sent from Wilmington. One of them spent some time in the port of Otaheite, the largest and most interesting of the Society Islands in the South Pacific. This island has always been famous for its beauty and fertility, and when discovered by the Spanish Quiros, in 1606, was the centre of a native sovereignty with an intelligent Queen as ruler. When a vessel returned to Wilmington, with a fair cargo of whale oil and bone, the crew, as was the custom "chaired" their captain. They placed him on a large chair, in the centre of two poles, and four men carried him up Market Street as far as Enoch Welsh's Tavern, while the others of the crew cheered them on their way. Their glowing accounts of the island and its fabled ruler induced Enoch Welsh to call his tavern the Queen of Otaheite, and by that name it was known nearly to the time the French captured the island, in 1846, and called it Tahiti.

The Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Stage Line, run by Kerlin & Odenheimer, in 1797, stepped here. Enoch Welsh and James McCullough at the same time ran stages from Wilmington down the Peninsula and to Norfolk. David Brinton kept this tavern from 1800 to 1803. Charles Hamilton, in 1808, advertised that he had "lately come to this tavern, and provided the larder with all that the epicurious would want, and had also wines and spirits of the best quality." Eli Lamborn moved from the Delaware House to the Queen of Otaheite, and continued there until 1825, when James Plumly succeeded him. For three years Lam-born then ran the Wilmington Stage from his tavern to the sign of the Conestoga Wagon, on Market Street, Philadelphia.

Alexander Porter, afterwards mayor of the city, became proprietor April 1, 1828, and with Jesse Sharpe, owned the stage line from Philadelphia to Newark. In 1829 Martin Van Buren attended a banquet in it given to Louis McLane, before he went to Europe. Porter moved to the American Hotel, and on March 23, 1833, John M. Smith announced that he had moved from "the Indian King to the Indian Queen, one square farther up Market Street, for the genteel accommodation of his friends." He remained for several years, then bought one thousand acres of land on Bohemia Manor, and turned his attention to farming. John Hall was the proprietor in 1846, and the next year the building was enlarged to "double its former capacity." It was made three-stories high. He came to Wilmington from Christiana Bridge, and became known as a good hotel keeper. John Foster succeeded him in 1850.
He was an Englishman, and when he first came

Charles M. Allmond, late of the Eagle Hotel, Philadelphia, came to the Indian Queen in 1856. He was succeeded by Samuel Miller and Marshall Harland.

The Clayton House, the leading hotel in Wilmington and the State of Delaware, stands upon the site of the historic old Indian Queen, at the northeast corner of Market and Fifth Streets, extending through to King Street. The property was purchased March 25, 1871, by the Artisans' Bank and the First National Bank of Wilmington for the purpose of erecting a large and commodious banking building to accommodate both institutions. Feeling the need of a first-class hotel in Wilmington, containing all the modern improvements, the new owners of the site decided to erect a large and commodious hotel. The building committee were William Tatnall, George S. Capelle, George S. Capelle was elected president of the association in 1880. The directors in 1888 are George S. Capelle, George W. Bush, Edward Betts, Henry F. Dure, Joseph L. Carpenter, Jr., C. B. Smyth and Lewis C. Vandegrift.

The Buck Tavern, later known as Sharpe's Hotel, stands at the northwest corner of Market and Front Streets. Thomas Willing in 1731 made a plan for a town on the Christians, and in 1732 on the site of this hotel the first house within the original limits of Wilmington was built. It was constructed of brick, and the date of its erection and the initials J. W. S. were cut in the marble tablet in the gable wall. The plan for Willingtown made narrow streets, and the front walls of this house stood eight feet further out on Market Street than the present one. It was a tavern during the Revolution, and Eli Taylor kept it. He died of yellow fever, and Eli Sharpe was the next landlord. He owned the building, and in 1825 built the one there, placing the original marble tablet in the gable end of his new house where it may still be seen. Eli Sharpe, who had only one leg, kept this tavern until his death. His widow, Phoebe Sharpe, who as early as 1845 conducted it, is still living over ninety years old. Eli Sharpe, in his early days was a farmer, and came to Wilmington from Pennsylvania. His son George was the first to be interred in Wilmington and Brandywine Cemetery. Jesse Sharpe, another son, who was proprietor for a time, became a prominent citizen of Wilmington. He kept this tavern after he left the Lafayette. The old stone barn in the rear of this hotel is nearly a century and a half old. The hotel is owned by the heirs of Eli Sharpe, and has been kept since 1877 by Manuel Richenberger.

The Delaware House, or rather the building above it, was built by Abijah Dawes immediately after the Revolution. Charles Springer was probably its first host, for he was there in 1797. Eli Lamborn was proprietor for a dozen years. By permission he named it the Bayard Hotel. On the swinging sign in front of it was a large portrait of James A. Bayard, the elder. Eli Lamborn was a man of affairs in the town, and for a time kept the Queen of Otahite and the Swan. His brother Cyrus kept a store immediately below Clark's jewelry store, and lived to the age of a hundred years. Late in life he moved to Lancaster County, from whence they both came. Many of the Pennsylvania farmers who brought their grain to the Brandywine Mills stopped at Lamborn's tavern, and were well entertained. From 1820 to 1825, the Wilmington and Philadelphia post coaches drawn by four horses were run by Lamborn; one left his tavern at eight o'clock in the morning, and at the same time another left the Indian King, on Fourth Street, Philadelphia. It was a popular line, and the fare was one dollar. He also ran a line of stages to Elkton and Chestertown, Maryland. Henry Steele succeeded Lamborn in 1825 as tavern keeper, and Gibbons Perry was next, coming in 1828 and leaving

William S. Hilles, Edward Betts and George W. Bush. The hotel, which is five stories high, containing several large sitting-rooms and parlors, and one hundred and five bed-rooms, was completed in 1873 at a cost of two hundred thousand dollars. It was opened in February of that year, with Colonel H. W. Sawyer as proprietor. Isaac C. Pyle succeeded him from 1875 to 1880. George W. Ortlip from 1880 to 1885. Since 1885 Mr. Isaac C. Pyle has been the proprietor, and has had a large and constantly increasing patronage. The offices of the two banks are in the front part of the building.

The Banking House Corporation, the present owner of the Clayton House, was incorporated February 21, 1873, with a capital of two hundred thousand dollars. On the 24th of the same month Edward Betts, William S. Hilles, George W. Bush, Clement B. Smyth, George S. Capelle, Joshua T. Heald and William H. Swift were chosen directors. They organized March 8, 1873, by electing George W. Bush president and Edward T. Taylor secretary.
in 1830. George Winslow then owned the building. Brooke T. Turner, an Englishman, for a quarter of a century or more was the owner and proprietor. He started first on Shipley Street, and in 1844 built the present house. He was a soldier under the Duke of Wellington in the battle of Waterloo, and it was that event that he most loved to talk about, even to the time of his death on April 6, 1867, at the age of seventy-five years. His career in that memorable engagement with the French was very good. There were other subjects, however, that interested Brooke Turner. He was a noted caterer. He changed the name of his tavern to the Delaware House, and under his management it was known far and near. For his table he bought the best game, the choicest steaks, finest vegetables and the most luscious fruits the market afforded. Daniel Webster dined here after he made his great speech in Wilmington during the "Log cabin," "hard cider," "two dollars a day and roast beef" campaign of 1840. David Paul Brown, the noted orator and eminent lawyer of Philadelphia, when attending court at New Castle came to the Delaware House for his dinner.

The Delaware House was famed throughout the State as the headquarters of the Whigs when their party triumphed in the State and National elections in 1840. The mottoes "Old Tippecanoe and Tyler Too," and "Rough and Ready," and "General Taylor never surrenders," in 1848 were inscribed on banners and streamers that floated in great numbers from the roof and balconies of this noted hostelry. "Charley" Brown, a good-natured colored man, was Turner's man Friday. He was the politest and most popular man of his race in "the town by the Christeen." He learned to be a gentleman years before, when he was employed in a similar position by Patrick O'Flinn at the Happy Retreat, who was himself "the most courteous man in town." Charley Brown was a great whistler, and was bugler for a local military company for seven years. He was an enthusiastic Whig, and when Harrison was elected President in 1840, he spent two whole days traveling through Wilmington announcing the event to every one he saw. In the meantime he rang a bell, whistled his favorite campaign tunes, and blew his bugle. He was a weather prophet with as good a reputation in that line as "old Probs" is to-day, and "what Charley Brown didn't know about hunting in New Castle County, was not worth knowing" was a familiar expression. It was said of him that he never lost his temper, and was always happy even to the day of his death, March 28, 1848.

The Delaware House was bought of the Turner heirs, and has since been owned by Catharine McGrena and her brother.

The Gibson House on the south side of West Fourth Street near Shipley, was for seventy years or more known as the Swan Tavern. John Hadden kept it before 1800 and on June 21, 1805, was succeeded by Isaac Anderson who then started a new line of stages from his tavern in Wilmington, to the White Horse Inn, Philadelphia, fare $1.50. Isaac Anderson moved to Philadelphia, conducted a hotel on Chestnut Street but afterwards returned to Brandywine Hundred and finally died in the County Almshouse. Eli Lamborn kept the Swan for several years, moving there from the Indian Queen in 1825. The same year he became proprietor of the United States post coaches, but died September 20, 1825. In 1840 Samuel Hopper went there and in 1852 Allen J. Lemon. Thomas D. Gibson bought it in 1856 and is now (1888) the owner. He kept it from 1857 to 1878 with the exception of four years when it was leased. The proprietors since have been John Dunn, John Dougherty and James Willis.

The Monumental Inn stood in from the street nearly opposite the present site of the First Presbyterian Church on Market Street. It had in front of it a large display sign on which was painted a monument in variegated colors, but no one can now tell what this monument was to commemorate. It was built before 1800 and removed in 1842 or thereabouts. Farmers from the north of town and market people from the same section patronized it. For a time it was known as the Spread Eagle, with that bird as symbol of patriotism, or something else, painted on the sign with spreading wings. Some of the early circuses were held in the yard around it. Later they were held at the Cross Keys. Jabez Bailey and Caleb Clayton were among its proprietors.

The Lafayette Hotel, formerly on the site of the proposed new post-office building, was opened in 1823 under the name of the Black Bear Tavern. Among the early keepers were Joseph Pierson and West, his son. In 1846 James Bradley erected a large building on the site and when Jacob Hoppie, Jr., became proprietor it was named the Lafayette. Edmund Conard took charge in 1862.

This was a very popular stopping place for farmers and market people having long rows of sheds around it.

The White Horse, at Second and Tatnall, was kept in 1841, by Richard K. Jones, as a temperance house. The better class of the farmers round about were his patrons for many years, and he continued in the business until 1862. John Lemon then became the lessee for three years, and in 1835, the heirs of Theophilus Jones sold it to Caleb Miller, who had been for many years a prosperous butcher, and a regular attendant at the city markets. He lived at the hotel and was its proprietor for seventeen years. He then retired to private life and has since leased it.

Cross Keys Tavern, which stood at the junction of Old King's Road and the Kennett turnpike, near what is now southwest corner of Brandywine Cemetery, was a somewhat noted hostelry. Two immense wooden keys painted yellow and made in the form of a cross was the sign of the tavern, but within the recollection of some persons, the keys had changed.

their color. John Washington kept it in 1806, and a dozen years later, Peter Vandeever succeeded in 1818, and while keeping the tavern was elected sheriff of New Castle County. He was a butcher by trade and a descendant of Jacob Vandeever, one of the earliest Dutch settlers. By him the Cross Keys was many years well kept, and for a time it was the political head-quarters. John Schofield, a large fat Englishman and a spindle maker in the old barley mill on the Brandywine, was next in charge of this public house until his death, when his widow continued the business. It is said by some epicures that the best ale in New Castle County was tapped at this hostelry. A jurist of ability testified to that fact on more than one occasion.

The hand of time worked hard upon "The old Cross Keys" as it was familiarly known for more than half a century, and the march of improvement found that it incurred the ground and it was removed in 1863 or thereabout; afterwards the property came into the possession of Joshua T. heal.

The Black Horse was the stopping place for farmers coming from the west and northwest in early days. It stood on the site of Kent's lumbur yard. Thomas Plunly, Jacob Hopple, Joseph Gilbert and Patrick Mellon, each for several years kept it.

The Sign of the Steamboat, at the corner of Market and Water Streets, was owned by Thomas C. Rodgers in 1829. The Delevan Temperance House was opened on Third Street 1848, by John C. Price. Thomas Rodgers in 1832, kept the tavern at the northeast corner of Fourth and King Streets, which was named "Queen of Otaheite."

One of the first taverns in Wilmington, owned by Johan Wilhelm, a Swede, stood on Market Street, between Fourth and Fifth, afterwards the site of Joseph Scott's bookstoke. Craig & Beynolds started the first hardware store close by it.

The European Hotel, at the northwest corner of Front and French Streets, was started by T. B. Merritt, who previously had conducted hotels in the lower part of Delaware. He soon made the Wilmington Hotel popular, not only among the citizens of his town, but also with the traveling public generally.

The Opera House Hotel, on Market Street, opposite the Masonic Temple, is a large and commodious hotel building, owned and conducted by J. A. Boers.

The United States, at the corner of Water and French Streets, was formerly kept by John J. Dougherty.

The Bird in Hand, on Front Street, between Market and King Streets, was one of the earliest taverns in the town. Rachel Montgomery kept it in 1790; Peter Hordon, in 1797; Peter Mercier, in 1803; Joseph K. Robinett, in 1837; and David Shaw 1845. Before 1850 it was discontinued as a public-house.

Some of the other early taverns were the Sign of the Drover, kept by Jacob Broom, in 1795; the Sheaf of Wheat, by James Plunkett; the City Hotel, on Front, between Shipley and Orange, by George Hoskins, in 1846, and by Oliver Widdoes, in 1853; the Sorrel Horse, by Patrick Christy, in 1846; the Railroad Hotel, by J. T. Thrulow, in 1846, and by Dorcas Wasson, in 1853; the Steamboat, on Water between King and French, in 1845.

The New Jersey Inn, at French and Front Streets, was opened by William Holton in 1829. Joshua Baker opened a hotel on Water Street near French, in 1849, for the accommodation of Jersey people. Brandywine Village Hotel, previously kept by Jacob Hooten, was bought, April 1, 1849, by William S. Coyle.

The Green Tree Inn, in the village of Brandywine, stood on the site of St. John's Church. In 1797 Peter Vandeever, the owner, announced that it had been a tavern for many years. John McLean then became its lessee.

The Grand Union, at the northeast corner of Front and French Streets, is owned and conducted by Henry Blouth, who came to Wilmington from Troy, N. Y., and soon thereafter erected the elegant hotel building, which is an ornament to that section of the city.

EARLY MILITARY ORGANIZATIONS.

"The Old Arsenal," as it was familiarly called, was built by order of the United States government in an open field west of Wilmington about 1797. Major Cas, with a detachment of the regular army, had charge of it in 1800. The site of the arsenal is now the square west of Washington Street, between Eighth and Ninth, and is now occupied by handsome dwelling-houses. The entire area of land owned by the government was one acre, and the arsenal was a long one-story brick building. During the War of 1812 it was the place of rendezvous for the volunteer military companies of the town and the United States regulars when stationed there. For thirty-eight years after this event it continued to be used for storing rifles, cannon and ammunition by the War Department. In 1846 Secretary of War William L. Marcy, ordered the entire property to be sold if it brought fifteen hundred dollars. It was offered for sale and withdrawn. In 1850, by order of George W. Crawford, Secretary of War, it was sold to William Lea for twenty-four hundred dollars. The building was torn down soon thereafter and dwelling-houses erected.

The Republican Blues, of the Third Delaware Regiment, and the Second Troop, of the Light Dragoons, gave a farewell dinner at Cantwell’s Bridge on Saturday, November 20, 1802, and then disbanded. Most of the members of these companies were Revolutionary patriots.

Captain, Perry Sheward; First Lieutenant, Benjamin Bracken; Ensign, Abraham Tilton; non-commissioned officers and privates, two hundred.

During the War of 1812 the military spirit was very high in Wilmington. Within a few weeks after the declaration of war seven companies were formed in Wilmington.

The First Legion of Delaware Volunteers was organized in 1822, and commanded by Stephen Baudy, and afterwards by Col. Davis. The Lafayette Guards was a company formed in 1824, a few days before Gen. Lafayette’s visit to Wilmington.

A new militia law was enacted in 1827. The dress required by officers, under the law, was as follows: Major-general, blue coat, single-breasted, standing collar, one row of yellow gilt bullet-buttons, ten in number on breast, eight behind, two gold epaulets; brigadier, same coat with one silver star on each strap; infantry coat blue or gray, standing collar and flat or bullet-buttons, white pantaloons and vest, black cockade hat or cap with yellow or white pompon plume; captain to wear silver epaulets on right shoulder.

The field officers of Delaware Militia for New Castle County, appointed under the law of 1827, were: Major-General, William Cooke; Brigadier-General, Richard Mansfield; Majors, James N. Sutton and Benjamin Whiteley; Quartermaster-General, Joshua Clayton.

The officers of First Regiment were: Colonel, Thomas Robinson; Major, G. J. Wolfe; Major, John Morris; Adjutant, W. McClung; Surgeon, Allen McLane, M.D.

Second Regiment: Colonel, Henry Whiteley; Major, Evan Thomas; Adjutant, P. S. Ogle; Surgeon, Dr. Washington Russell.

Third Regiment: Colonel, John Higgins; Major, Alexander Crawford; Adjutant, William Kennedy; Surgeon, Dr. E. S. Green.

The militia of the county was organized at Red Lion April 14, 1827. There were five regiments in the State.

In 1829 the militia law was repealed “because the system as enforced furnished only the caricature of an army. The meetings were periodical nuisances and brought into contempt the military art, and did not bring the least particle of benefit to the State.”

The State Fencibles was a volunteer company organized in City Hall, Wilmington, in 1827, and the Jackson Guards in 1829, with Jacob B. Robinson as captain.

The Washington Grays, a volunteer company of infantry, was organized February 27, 1827, with seventy-three members. The first officers were John McClung, captain; John Adams, first lieutenant; Archibald Robertson, second lieutenant; Samuel Harker, James A. Sparks, J. Draper and William Kennard, sergeants; J. T. Robinson, William W. Rice, Peter Horn and J. McKee, corporals.

The Wilmington Rifle Corps, fifty men, was commanded by William Hemphill Jones in 1841.

The Rifle Corps was organized in 1842 with Spencer D. Eves, captain; Z. B. Glazier and William Griffen, lieutenants; William A. Bird, ensign; William S. Pink, sergeant; and A. S. Clark, corporal.

The First Troop of Delaware Dragoons was formed in 1844 with the following officers: Captain, Richard H. Bayard; First Lieutenant, John W. Andrews; Second Lieutenant, Richard B. Gilpin; Surgeon, James W. Thomson, M.D.; Assistant Surgeon, J. T. Cardeza, M.D. This was an excellent military organization. John W. Andrews became captain in 1846.

The Keokuk Rifle Company, Captain Marshall, was organized in 1846 with forty-six men. Their uniform was like that of a Western hunter, with a loose blouse and turban. The cap had three large ostrich feathers.

Captain Chaytor, in 1846, organized a company which went to the Mexican War; its history is given elsewhere.

The Independent Light Guards, a volunteer company, in May, 1846, elected as its first officers the following: Captain, William Edwards; First Lieutenant, James L. Devou; Second Lieutenant, Wm. H. Griffin; Third Lieutenant, William R. Pennington; Sergeant, T. J. Allison; Quartermaster, Richard Triggs.

The Delaware Life Guards organized about the same time, with the following officers: Captain, O. S. Tenney; First Lieutenant, M. G. Lottland; Second Lieutenant, John Haddock; Third Lieutenant, Thomas H. Robinson; First Sergeant, Lewis H. Kane; Second Sergeant, James Speakman; Third Sergeant, John Dixon; Quartermaster, Bernard Bradley.

Artillery Company A, with sixty men, was formed by the Washington Band in July, 1846.

First Regiment Delaware Artillerists in 1846 was commanded by Captain William R. Sellers, with George Read Riddle as first lieutenant and Henry G. Banning second lieutenant.

The Delaware Light Dragoons in 1846 had the following officers: Captain, James L. Miles; First Lieutenant, George Holtzpecker; Second Lieutenant, Nathan T. Boulton; Sergeant, Thomas J. Moore; Ensign, Alex. B. Crawford; Surgeon, Thomas F. Cullen.

In 1846 New Castle County was divided into eight regiments and sixteen battalion districts, under the new militia system. Governor Maull appointed Nathaniel Young major-general, Richard H. Bayard brigadier-general, William R. Sellers colonel of the First Regiment, John W. Andrews colonel of the Second Regiment, Samuel Canby, M. B. Ocheltree, James L. Miles and James N. Sutton majors of battalions, David C. Wilson brigade inspector, Dr. A. H. Grimsaw surgeon.

Capt. Biddle, in 1846, commanded Artillery Company A, of Wilmington, and Col. Chaytor Company B. Both were volunteer companies.

The Columbia Rifle Company in 1859 was composed of sixty men, and the following officers: Captain, J. M. Barr; lieutenants, William E. Hyland and John F. Boggs. Armory was in Central Hall, corner Fourth and King Streets.

The Taylor Guards, Capt. Thatcher, was a military company formed in 1848, and named in honor of General Zachary Taylor.

The National Guards, a company of volunteers, was commanded by R. B. Gilpin, captain, with Thomas A Smyth first lieutenant, and Frank McCluskey second lieutenant.

Fort Delaware was destroyed by fire during the night of February 10, 1881. The river was full of floating ice at the time, and it was with difficulty that the one hundred and fifty officers and men garrisoned there escaped with their lives. The flames spread rapidly, and they lost all their clothing and other property. The entire loss was one hundred thousand dollars. It was rebuilt soon after. In 1844 the government appropriated fifty thousand dollars to rebuild it. In 1848 fifty-six thousand dollars more were appropriated.

SECRET SOCIETIES.

Free Masonry. Among the early English settlers of Delaware there were many members of the Masonic order, and as time passed on they and their successors transferred their membership from the parent organizations in the old country to the new organizations on American soil. The close political connection of the Delaware colony with Pennsylvania had, as one of its features, the merging of the Delaware Masons in the lodges and chapters of Philadelphia. In the pre-Revolutionary and Revolutionary era the Delaware brethren were attached to the Philadelphia organizations, and it was not until the nineteenth century that they thought of setting up for themselves. It is not known with entire historical accuracy when, where or under what circumstances the Free Masons, undoubtedly the most ancient of all secular associations, was first instituted.

Written records and traditions unite in support of the assertion that it has existed for many centuries.

There are, however, evidences of the existence of societies of Masons, who were such by trade and occupation, long before and in the early centuries of the Christian era in Egypt, in India, in Greece, in Italy and in other places. They were chartered and patronized by Kings and Emperors, and they had many privileges granted them.

They were free because they were permitted to govern themselves, and, they could go and come as they pleased in search of work and could demand their own terms.

Their lodges, or places of meeting, were places for instruction in science and the polite arts; hence the figures of the school-men, the globes, the columns, the problems of mathematics, as well as the working tools of operative Masons, are the symbols of Free Masonry.

In the course of time they accepted as members persons who were not operative Masons, and thus the whole body came to be known as Free and Accepted Masons.

In Great Britain we find that in the year 975 all the Masonic lodges of that country were called together in a congress by King Athelstan. A charter or constitution was adopted by them. York was fixed upon as the seat of the Grand Master, and Prince Edwin was chosen Grand Master.

From this assemblage arose the name of Ancient York Masons.

In the year 1666 the great fire in London destroyed a large part of that city. After the rebuilding of the burned district, and particularly after the completion of St. Paul's Cathedral, under Sir Christopher Wren, the occupation of operative masons seems to have come almost to an end, and the lodges were almost deserted; and, notwithstanding the favor with which the fraternity was regarded by the King during the latter part of the seventeenth century, the membership decreased to such an extent that there were only four lodges in the city of London.

In order to increase its membership, the Lodge of The Provincial Grand Lodge continued to work under the warrant until 1761, when Wm. Ball obtained from the Grand Lodge of Ancient York Masons of England, a charter for the Provincial Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania, issued by Thomas Erskine, Grand Master, and Lawrence Dermott, Grand Secretary, July 14, 1761.

Under this warrant the Provincial Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania continued to hold Grand Communications and to grant charters for subordinate lodges until the separation from Great Britain, on September 25, 1786, when the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania was formed; while the Grand Lodge of Maryland was formed at Easton, Talbot County, June, 1787.

We are, at this late date, unacquainted with any of the workings of the lodge during the Revolutionary War. But we do know that the tenets of the fraternity were promulgated on the tented field, and its condition and situation in the exciting state of affairs (the colonies having declared their independence of Great Britain) were considered in a Masonic Convention of the army lodges, held at Morristown, New Jersey, in December, 1779, at which Colonel Otho Holland Williams, of the Maryland Line, was appointed a member of the committee to represent the Masons in the military line of the State of Delaware, and we are warranted in stating that men of the Delaware Line were initiated into the mysteries of Freemasonry in the military lodges of the American army; and returning home after the cessation of hostilities, they cherished the memories of dangers encountered, hardships endured, and fellowship formed and cemented, growing out of a common danger and a common purpose, for the benefit of humanity and the enlargement of freedom and patriotism; they participated in the formation of new lodges, there being but three organized in the State previous to the Revolution, and there were five afterwards and before the formation of the Grand Lodge of Delaware.

The lodges in Delaware before the formation of the Grand Lodge of Delaware June 6, 1865, were:

No. 5, at Cantwell's Bridge, Delaware; warrant granted June 24, 1765, by the Provincial Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania; surrendered and renewed March 5, 1798; warrant surrendered January 30, 1816, to join the Grand Lodge of Delaware, and is now working as Union Lodge, No. 5, at Middletown.

No. 14, Christiana Ferry, afterwards at Wilmington, Delaware; warrant granted December 27, 1769; surrendered and renewed January 22, 1789, and a new warrant granted June 6, 1806, as Washington, No. 1, of Wilmington, by the Grand Lodge of Delaware.

No. 18, Dover, Kent County, Delaware; warrant granted August 26, 1775; surrendered and renewed May 31, 1787. It is now Union Lodge, No. 7, at Dover,—the original charter from the Grand Lodge of Delaware having been granted June 27, 1809, and revived June 27, 1857.

year at one place and the ensuing year at the other; warrant granted April 3, 1790, upon the warm recommendation of No. 5, at Cantwell's Bridge; and the first officers were Joseph Israel, Master; Joseph Kilkead, Senior Warden; John Clark, Junior Warden. The warrant was surrendered and renewed March 1, 1790, and on June 6, 1806, a new warrant was granted as St. John's, No. 2, of New Castle.

No. 44, Duck Creek Cross-Roads; warrant granted June 24, 1785, to Daniel Cummings, Master; Samuel Freeman, Senior Warden; James Berry, Junior Warden; surrendered and renewed September 6, 1790. For a number of years it ceased work, but is now Harmony Lodge, No. 13, of Smyrna, Delaware.

No. 63, Lewistown; warrant granted May 28, 1794, to David Hall, Master; John Clark, Senior Warden; James Willey, Junior Warden. The charter was vacated April 7, 1806, but now working as Jefferson Lodge, No. 15, Lewes, Delaware.

No. 96, "The Delaware Hiram Lodge," Newark, Delaware; warrant granted December 6, 1802, to George Read, Master; John Macbeth, Senior Warden; Samuel Mateer, Junior Warden. A new charter was granted by the Grand Lodge of Delaware June 6, 1806. The charter was vacated after removing to Glasgow, but was revived June 27, 1807, as Hiram Lodge, No. 25, of Newark.

The Grand Lodge of Maryland also granted warrants for lodges in Delaware,—No. 10, Georgetown, Sussex County, September 18, 1792. Its first officers were Jesse Green (of No. 3, Washington Lodge, formerly No. 15, of Pennsylvania Register, at Fell's Point, Master; Thomas Laws (of No. 18, Delaware), Senior Warden; Henry Hooper (formerly of No. 10, Pennsylvania), Junior Warden. This lodge was subsequently known as St. John's, No. 10, of Delaware, by resolution of the Grand Lodge of Maryland, May 11, 1794, and is the first lodge mentioned as having a distinctive title. The warrant was forfeited by non-attendance upon the communications of the Grand Lodge, but on June 23, 1800, a new warrant was granted to Jesse Green, Master; Ames Laws, Senior Warden; Marian Ball, Junior Warden; to be known as Hope Lodge, No. 31, at Laurel Town, Sussex County.

On June 6, 1806, nine brethren, the representatives of four lodges, a majority of those working at that time,—viz.: No. 14, Wilmington; No. 33, New Castle; No. 96, Newark; and No. 31, Laurel Town,—met in the town hall, in the borough of Wilmington, and resolved unanimously, "That the several lodges of Ancient Masons in the State of Delaware, there represented by deputies properly authorized, consider it as a matter of right, for the general benefit of Masonry, that they ought to form a Grand Lodge within the said State, and do now proceed to form and organize themselves into a Grand Lodge accordingly, to be known and distinguished by the name of the Grand Lodge of Delaware."

A committee of five was appointed to prepare a constitution and by-laws, and to report at nine o'clock next morning, when twelve brethren were present, representing a constituency of about one hundred brethren in the State, when grand officers pro tem. were appointed, and "the Grand Lodge of Delaware was opened in due form and solemnity, according to the ancient usages of Masonry."

Warrants were directed to be issued to No. 14, as Washington Lodge, No. 1, Wilmington; No. 33, as St. John's Lodge, No. 2, New Castle; No. 96, as Hiram Lodge, No. 3, Newark; No. 31, as Hope Lodge, No. 4, Laurel Town. Then the members present proceeded to vote for permanent officers with the following results: Hon. Gunning Bedford, M. W. Grand Master; General Jesse Green, R. W. Deputy Grand Master; Joseph Israel, R. W. Senior Grapd Warden; John Macbeth, R. W. Junior Grand Warden; Edward Roche, R. W. Grand Secretary; Hon. Thomas Stockton, R. W. Grand Treasurer.

Gunning Bedford, the Grand Master, and Edward Roche, the Grand Secretary, had taken a prominent part in the Revolution—Colonel Bedford in the field of war—and they had felt the quickening impulse which had so powerful an effect among the American soldiers connected with the Masonic order. That impulse was derived in the first instance from Washington, who was, as is well known, a "bright" Mason, and had great faith in the principles of the order. The establishment of the Grand Lodge of Delaware stimulated the Masonic feeling throughout the State, and to it may be traced the subsequent spread of Masonry throughout Delaware. Colonel Bedford served as Grand Master for three years, and the Grand Masters who succeeded him have been the following:

1809, Jesse Green; 1812, Edward Roche; 1814, John Sellers; 1817, Willard Hall; 1819, James Rogers; 1821, James Derrickson; 1824, Joshua G. Brinkle; 1825, Arnold Naudain; 1828, Josiah F. Clement; 1829, Archibald Hamilton; 1830, John McClung; 1833, E. S. Rickards, M.D.; 1834, Joseph G. Oliver; 1836, Geo. W. Frame; 1838, Geo. Frame; 1839, J. P. Loiland, M.D.; 1842, E. S. Rickards, M.D.; 1845, Alex. Porter; 1848, Richard Clement; 1850, W. T. Read; 1853, James Booth; 1855, Alfred P. Robinson; 1858, John R. McFee; 1860, Daniel C. Godwin; 1862, Allen V. Lesley; 1865, John A. Nicholson; 1866, Daniel McClintock; 1868, Edwin J. Horner; 1870, Rev. John McCabe; 1873, John P. Allmond; 1875, George W. Chaytor; 1876, Thos. N. Williams; 1878, John Taylor; 1880, Jos. W. H. Watson; 1882, John F. Saulsbury; 1884, Thomas Davidson; 1886, George W. Marshall, M.D.

Mr. Roche was Grand Secretary until 1811, since when his successors have been in the following order: 1811, Evan Thomas; 1813, John Nielson; 1814, James Booth, Jr.; 1823, William T. Read; 1828, Samuel Harker; 1831, Augustus M. Schoes; 1834, William Clark; 1837, John McClung; 1843, T. Booth Roberts; 1847, Wm. Hemphill Jones; 1848, George

The Odd Fellows.—The Grand Lodge of Delaware of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows was instituted June 27, 1831, P. G. John Scott being elected Grand Master. In less than three months the charter was forfeited by the Grand Lodge of the United States because the membership had been reduced below a quorum, but on March 4, 1833, the latter body was petitioned for a restoration of the charter. On June 6th, in the building at 309 Market Street, Grand Sire Wildey re instituted the Grand Lodge of Delaware with these officers: James S. White, Grand Master; Joseph S. Hedges, Deputy Grand Master; Jacob K. Higgins, Grand Secretary; Thomas Hill, Grand Treasurer; Jacob M. Garretson, Grand Warden; and Simon Robinson, Grand Representative. In 1843 the Grand Lodge moved to Temperance Hall, Fourth Street, between Market and King Streets, and in 1849, to Odd Fellows’ Hall. During the first year of its existence charters were granted for three new lodges, making five in all, but, at the end of ten years, the five lodges then existing had but one hundred and twenty-nine members, and an annual income of nine hundred dollars. The second decade is marked as the most prosperous that the Grand Lodge ever experienced. The report for the year ending 1859 gave twenty-three lodges, nineteen hundred and seventy-five members, with an annual income of seven thousand one hundred and ninety-five dollars. At the end of the third decade four lodges had been added to the roll, with a membership of sixteen hundred and eighty-two. The fourth decade witnessed another increase, the lodges numbering thirty-two, and the membership, twenty-six hundred and seventy-six. This seems to have been the zenith of prosperity. The fifth decade, ending in 1888, showed a slight decrease in membership, the number of lodges being the same, with a membership of twenty-five hundred and forty-eight. There is scarcely a village or hamlet in this jurisdiction without an Odd Fellows’ lodge.

During the fifty odd years embraced in the existence of Odd Fellowship in Delaware, ten thousand persons have been made acquainted with the mysteries of the initiatory degree, and there has been expended for sick benefits and donations the sum of three hundred and fifty thousand dollars. In the ten years ending with 1888 the relief committees of the jurisdiction had charge of 3100 sick brothers and 475 widowed families received pecuniary relief; $87,220 were paid for sick benefits, $31,293 for funerals, $5042 for relief of widowed families, and $2000 for other purposes, the total outlay being $125,555. Nearly every lodge in the jurisdiction owns the building in which it meets, and the invested capital of all the lodges is estimated at $126,000. The semi-centennial of the Grand Lodge was celebrated in 1884, when Isaac W. Hallam prepared and read a history of the order, from which the information given is obtained. The officers in 1887 were: G. M., Samuel T. Smith; D. G. M., John M. Whitford; G. W., George W. Hughes; G. S., Isaac W. Hallam; G. T., A. G. Robinson; G. R., G. L. Alexander.

The Right Worthy Grand Encampment was instituted August 12, 1848. Most Worthy Grand Sire Horne B. Kneass presided on that occasion, when the following officers of the Grand Encampment were elected and installed: M. W. G. P., Henry F. Askew; M. E. G. H. P., Robert B. McDonnell; R. W. G. W., F. H. Reynolds; R. W. G. J. W., William M. Sink; R. W. G. S., John A. Willard; R. W. G. T., Joseph String; W. G. I. S., Edward McIntire; W. G. O. S., George Gill.

On August 12, 1858, the tenth anniversary of the institution of the Grand Encampment, it had so far failed to support it that it appealed to the Grand Lodge of the United States for financial assistance. At that time measures were pending in the latter body for the merging of the Patriarchal with the other branch of the order, and upon the defeat of these measures the Delaware Grand Encampment surrendered to the Grand Lodge of the United States its charter and properties. The charter was restored on March 22, 1865, in consequence of the petition of several of the subordinate encampments of Delaware. Under this reorganization J. J. Foulk was elected Most Worthy Grand Patriarch of the Revived Grand Encampment of Delaware, the officers of which, in 1887, were: M. W. G. P., Isaac J. Wootten; M. E. G. H. P., Wm. Quigley; R. G. G. W., R. E. Lyons; R. W. G. S. W., Edgar C. Pierce; R. W. G. S., Edwin Hirst; R. W. G. T., E. H. Spencer; R. W. G. R., Edwin Hirst.

Delaware Encampment, No. 1, was instituted June 20, 1831, with John Scott, C. P.; James S. White, H. P.; Simon Robinson, S. W.; and James McNeal, Scribe. The other early members were Joseph H. Hedges, William Ford, Zenas B. Glazier, Dr. Henry F. Askew, Bryan Bles, Jacob M. Garretson, Robert McConnell, Frederick M. Rice and Gideon Tindall.

The original meeting-place was in the old academy on Market Street. This encampment was reorganized November 1, 1843. It celebrated its fiftieth anniversary in June, 1881, with interesting exercises.

Reynolds Encampment, No. 3, was instituted June 26, 1847. On June 8th of the same year, cards of withdrawal had been granted by Delaware Encampment, No. 1, to William M. Sink, Levi H. Springer, Curtis Roberts, Charles F. Grant, William H. Lear, Oliver S. Williams, Enos H. Jefferson, Lewis Mason, Jacob Hoppie and William Stamm, who became the former encampment's charter-members. BENEFICIAL SOCIETIES AND BENEVOLENT INSTITUTIONS.

The Female Benevolent Society was organized for the relief of the poor, on the 6th of February, 1800, at the home of Rebecca Martin. It is still in existence, being the oldest charitable society in Delaware. The object of the society was not only for the relief but the employment of the poor, of any race or color, and promote industry by furnishing employment to such as may be able to work.

Flax was purchased, hackled and prepared for spinning, and, when this was done, weighed and distributed to the spinners, and when returned by them it was "sorted, counted and valued," and paid for in produce, provided for the purpose. The revenue of the society in 1801 was $30,814, and the expenditures, $137.66; in 1804 the sales of yarn and manufactured goods amounted to $683.19; the sum paid for flax was $305. Soon after the organization of the society it received as a bequest from Ebenezer Cresson, through one of its members, quoted as follows: "I do give and bequeath to my friend Margaret Canby (daughter of Samuel) 200 Spanish milled silver dollars, to be distributed among the poor, according to her judgment."

The Board of Health in the winter of 1800 gave the society six cords of wood to distribute, and the next season sent fifty dollars for its use. Dr. John Vaughan offered his professional services gratuitously to visit the sick. A bequest of six hundred and eighty dollars from Jacob Broome induced the members to procure an act of incorporation. The interest on it was first paid in 1818, but the bequest was not secured until 1827.

The Humane Society of Wilmington was organized in 1812, the object of which was "the recovering from apparent death by drowning, suffocation by burning charcoal or other noxious vapors, drinking cold water, strokes of the sun, damps of wells, light-

By October, 1819, according to the minutes, one thousand five hundred and sixty Bibles and Testaments had been distributed by this society in the State.

In 1828 the society determined to distribute copies of the Bible among all the destitute of the State. In 1829 auxiliary societies were formed in White Clay Creek, Lower Brandywine, Pencader, St. George's and Newark, and the work greatly encouraged. In 1830 this society gave three hundred dollars to the American Bible Society in its effort to distribute the Bible to all the poor in the United States within the succeeding two years. In 1835, Richard H. Merrick, a minister of the Methodist Protestant Church, distributed in the State, within ten months, eight hundred Bibles and nine hundred and seventeen Testaments. In 1845, Revs. Wyncoop and Hogarth and Judge Willard Hall were appointed a committee to prepare a circular, which was sent to all pastors in the State, to revive an interest in the work of the society. In 1844, Rev. J. P. Knox, one of the agents of the American Bible Society, visited all the churches of the State for the Delaware State Society. He received at this time several encouraging contributions. Joseph Gregg was employed in 1845 to make the second distribution of Bibles in New Castle and Kent Counties, and Rev. Mr. Mustard in Sussex; they all did efficient work. Rev. T. P. McCotley, of Sussex, for many years rendered valuable services to the cause.

At the annual meeting held at Dover in 1859, the State Society recommended that County Societies be formed, and Hon. C. L. Layton from Sussex, Rev. Dr. Cook from Kent, and Rev. George F. Wiswell from New Castle, were appointed to take measures for their organization. Within a year, Kent and Sussex each formed a County Society. In 1860 the third distribution of Bibles was made by the State Society in New Castle County.

In 1861 the soldiers of Delaware in the Civil War were supplied with copies of the New Testament. In 1869-70 the fourth distribution was made in New Castle County. In 1879 and 1880 Miss Eunice Holt distributed in New Castle County one hundred and sixty-eight Bibles and three hundred and twenty-six Testaments. She found sixty-five white and one hundred and forty-five colored families without Bibles in the county. Distribution was made in 1882 by Rev. J. F. McLaughlin, and in 1885 by John and William L. White. In 1884 this society sent one hundred dollars to the American Bible Society and two hundred dollars in 1887.

Dr. L. P. Bush has been president for a quarter of a century. Edward T. Taylor was treasurer from 1847 to 1878, when Charles W. Howland was elected. Rev. Thomas F. Plummer and George W. Sparks each filled the office of secretary. Rev. H. D. Lindsay now holds the office.

The Female Bible Society, of Wilmington, was organized at the residence of Miss Margaret Johnson, December 22, 1839, as an auxiliary to the American Bible Society. Reverend Richard D. Hall, representing the last-named society, made an address to a number of ladies present at the first meeting. The first officers and managers elected were the following: president, Mrs. C. M. Elliott; vice-presidents, Mrs. L. M. Gilbert and Mrs. E. Bently; corresponding secretary, Mrs. A. M. Macmullian; recording secretary, M. Rumsey; treasurer, M. Johnson. Directors: Mrs. Bannard, Miss J. Black, Miss E. Brinton, Miss E. Brobson, Miss E. Bryan, Miss J. Cochran, Mrs. R. Green, Mrs. M. Harris, Miss M. Hamilton, Miss A. Hamilton, Miss L. Harbeson, Mrs. J. Hedrach, Miss M. A. Hendrickson, Mrs. E. Jaquet, Miss S. McClister, Miss R. McClung, Mrs. C. A. McLane, Mrs. C. M. McLane, Miss McNeal, Miss A. Moffett, Miss E. Montgomery, Miss E. Moore, Miss E. Physick, Miss M. C. Smith, Miss H. Y. Warren, Miss A. B. Warrington, Mrs. S. Robinson, Mrs. E. Simpson, Mrs. A. Talley, Mrs. E. Walker.

The society began work with one hundred and ten members. Every member is required to pay one dollar a year. A contribution of ten dollars entitles the person to life membership. Miss S. H. Adams, in 1839, was the first life member. The surplus funds of this society are sent to the American Bible Society. Under the management of this society the city was divided into districts, and each member, at intervals of two years, makes a careful canvass of the district assigned. The poor who do not have Bibles are provided with them. The same practice is still continued, and in addition the society employed Miss Margaretta Barr for five years as a Bible-reader. She went from house to house and visited such as needed attention, read the Bible to them and supplied them if they were without it. During the past three years two Bible-readers are employed ten months of each year. They are Mrs. Annie Irwin and Miss M. C. Meteer. These ladies, by means of their zealous interest and well-directed efforts, have accomplished much good. A charter of incorporation was obtained by the society in 1855, which was renewed in 1875. Anne Brinkle, who served for many years as president of the society, died in 1887. The other officers and managers are: vice-president, Miss A. Semple; recording secretary,
On February 19, 1871, a charter of incorporation was obtained as "a public act free of expense."

The president of the society, Ferris Br unhurst, on the 11th of March, was injured by the explosion of an iron retort while preparing oxygen gas to illustrate a lecture to be delivered before the Workingmen's Institute. He died from the results of this accident, on the 16th of the same month, and Edward Br unhurst, Sr., was elected to succeed him as president.

On June 5, 1871, Dr. L. P. Bush was chosen second vice-president, and Edward Batta, T. D. Webb, Thos. B. Smith, Mrs. J. F. Vaughan and Mrs. George A. Latimer were elected managers.

In 1871 a fountain was erected at the southeast corner of Ninth and Walnut Streets, the gift of Samuel Hilles; another, an "H" fountain with three basins, on King Street near Seventeenth, the gift of Miss Elizabeth B. Hilles; a trough fountain, the gift of Samuel Hilles, on French Street north of Eleventh.

In 1872, a fountain was erected at the foot of Market Street, at a cost of two hundred and twenty-five dollars, mainly by E. Tatnall Warner and Charles Warner & Co., since removed to Middle Depot and one on Front Street near West, supplied with spring water. J. Taylor Gause and wife presented a deed for the site of a memorial fountain dedicated to the first president of the society, Ferris Br unhurst, at Delaware and Pennsylvania Avenues.

It was placed in position in June, and on July 1, 1872, the water was for the first time turned on.

This beautiful tribute of the society to Ferris Brinhurst, has a base of gray granite, column of red Aberdeen granite polished. Capitol of gray granite surmounted by an urn of red polished Aberdeen granite.

Fountains have since been erected by the society at Front and Madison Streets, at Twenty-second and Market, and a trough fountain at the foot of Fourth Street.

Heald's Hygeian Home was planned by Dr. Pusey Heald and built under his direction, and opened with one patient January 1, 1871, under the direction of Dr. P. and M. H. Heald. The home was rapidly filled with invalids and during the fifteen years of its continuance there were over seven thousand patients treated, representing all the States in the Union except two; and from South America, Canada and Europe.

WILMINGTON HOSPITAL.—An account of the Soldiers' Hospital in the city during the Civil War, is given elsewhere in this work. A charter was obtained February 21, 1871, to found the Wilmington Hospital, with the following named corporators:

The object of this charter was never carried into effect owing to the passage of another act authorizing the City Council to appropriate twenty thousand dollars for the purchase of a building on Franklin Street. It was used for a hospital for a short time, and then sold for seven thousand dollars.

Homeopathic Hospital.—Efforts were made in Wilmington during the last few years to establish a free hospital, but with poor success, until the liberal offer of J. Taylor Gause, in November, 1887, made it possible.

An organization composed of ladies favoring the homeopathic practice, was perfected, and to the lady managers on the 26th of November, 1887, Mr. Gause offered the use of the property at the northwest corner of Shallcross Avenue and Van Buren Street, known as “Heald's Hygeian Home” for hospital purposes. The offer was accepted and by slight effort subscriptions to a considerable amount were obtained, and on the 26th of November, the lady managers elected Dr. A. Negendank as medical director, Dr. Leonard Kittenger, physician in charge of the maternity department, and Dr. J. M. Curtis as surgeon.

The building is of brick, three stories high, and contains twenty-three rooms, all of which are heated by steam.

The Home for Aged Women, at the corner of Gilpin and Harrison Streets, is an excellent, benevolent and useful institution. It was founded under an act of the Legislature passed January 30, 1855, as the “Female Society of Wilmington for the Relief and Employment of the Poor.”

The incorporators were: Hannah E. Gilpin, Sarah Brinhurst, Rebecca Gibbons, Eliza T. Canby, Mary Bette, Sarah R. Mendenhall, Martha Cochran, Elizabeth Kean, Mary Latimer, Sarah T. Seal, Lydia Webb, Elizabeth P. Grubb, Hannah Bailey, Maria Chandler, Martha Jones, Fanny E. Askew, Maria Raby, Elizabeth Clark, Olivia Cannon, Henrietta O. Jones and Mary Jack. Mrs. Rebecca Gibbons, who took an active interest in the organization of the society, was elected its first president. A building at No. 609 Shipley Street was purchased for two thousand dollars, and in it the society furnished worthy poor women with employment and compensated them for their work. Those who desired the clothing they made were furnished it at cost. The other clothing made was sold for the benefit of the society. Food was also supplied to the helpless. The society, after continuing its work ten years, decided to change its name, and, in 1864, made it a "Home for Aged Women," and the year following an adjoining building was bought for thirty-five hundred dollars. A charter of incorporation, under the present name, was obtained on January 31, 1866. The officers then were: Mrs. Sarah R. Mendenhall, President; Mrs. Gregg Chandler, Vice-President; Mrs. Emily G. Wollaston, Secretary, and Miss Anne Semple, Treasurer. The object of the Home is to protect and care for women who have reached the age of sixty years, and who have been two years a resident of New Castle County. Inmates, upon entering the Home, are required to pay one hundred dollars. The first inmate, in 1864, was Elizabeth Kemp, and she is still there. In 1869 the society bought a lot of James Bradford for twenty-four hundred and twenty-five dollars, and in 1872 erected the handsome three-story brick building now owned, at a cost of sixteen thousand eight hundred and thirty-five dollars. This worthy institution is supported entirely by private contribution and interests on investments made by the managers of certain bequests left by philanthropic individuals. The late Sarah Shipley, loaned three thousand dollars to the society when the present building was being erected, and the succeeding year generously cancelled the mortgage. A number of other individuals have bequeathed amounts from one hundred to five thousand dollars. This excellent institution is at present and has always been managed entirely by ladies. Dr. Henry F. Askew, Dr. C. Harlan and D. Kittenger have given their services to the society free of charge.

The Board of Managers in 1887 were Mrs. M. L. Chandler, president; Mrs. Emily Moore, vice-president; Miss E. A. Stroud, secretary; Miss Anne Semple, treasurer. Mrs. M. L. Chandler, Miss A. Phillips, Miss E. Stroud, Mrs. A. Loddei, Mrs. A. K. Pusey, Mrs. B. Thomas, Mrs. M. Grant, Mrs. S. P. Moore, Mrs. S. Hilles, Mrs. C. W. Masters, Mrs. E. Kittenger, Mrs. L. Wollaston, Mrs. A. Rumford, Mrs. M. A. Adams, Miss A. Porter, Miss A. Semple, Mrs. C. McClary, Mrs. E. Moore, Mrs. H. B. Brown, Miss T. Richardson, Mrs. S. C. Jackson, Mrs. M. L. Spruance, Mrs. G. Howland, Mrs. L. Poole and Mrs. H. Phillips.

The Home for Friendless and Destitute Children was originated as a private charity by Mrs. J. Taylor Gause soon after the opening of the civil war. There was then a number of children in the city whose fathers had entered the army and whose mothers were left without sufficient means for their support. This induced the founder of this institution to take under her care and direction some who most needed assistance and protection. Her philanthropic efforts resulted in great good. The institution was opened in a dwelling-house at 412 King Street, and within a few months fifty children were under its fostering care. The need of such an institution soon became apparent and other citizens joined her in the benevolent work. A charter of incorporation was obtained March 5, 1863. It provides for the election of twelve male trustees to serve three years and these elect annually a Board of Managers composed of not less than thirty ladies who look after the interests of the children, provide for their wants and see that they are educated and trained to work. The trustees manage the finances of the institution and superintend the buildings. Children under fourteen years of age can be admitted, if voluntarily surrendered by their parents, or those having them in custody, or committed by the judge of any court in the State or by the mayor of Wilmington, on the ground of vagrancy, exposure, neglect or abandonment. They are allowed to remain in the Home during their minority. Some, after being trained and educated, are bound to trustworthy persons, though, while under age, are looked after by the managers. Some learn trades or are otherwise profitably employed. The institution is supported by voluntary contributions from interests accruing from bequests made at various times by philanthropic individuals. During 1887 the income from the first source was one thousand eight hundred dollars and from the second three thousand nine hundred dollars, all of which, together with the appropriation annually of five hundred dollars by the Levy Court, is needed in the management of the Home. In 1877 the Legislature exempted the building from taxation and in 1883 the charter was renewed.

The first annual report made in 1864, states that up to that date eighty-five children had been admitted and forty-eight were then in the Home, forty-two of whom were the children of soldiers and sailors. Up to 1887, about eight hundred have been trained and educated, and the average number is sixty. The good work of the Associated Charities of late years has diminished the annual number of admissions to this Home.

The building on King Street was used until March, 1865, when the trustees bought of Rev. T. M. Cann, a building at Adams and Ninth Streets, erected a few years before as a boarding-school for girls. The price paid was $21,009, of which $1000 was contributed by the previous owner. The amount of $15,000 was at once raised by subscription. Within the year 1887, a site for a new and more commodious building was purchased by the trustees, opposite Riverview Cemetery.

The following were the incorporators and the first board of trustees: J. Taylor Gause, president; William S. Hilles, secretary; Merrit Canby, William Alkman, Charles B. Lore, Charles Warner, Daniel M. Bates, Samuel Harlan, Jr., Mahlon Betts, James S. Dickerson, William Tatnall, George W. Bush. Wm. H. Billany, was chosen first treasurer; John N. Carswell, is now treasurer.

Gawthrop, Miss Sarah C. Spruance.

Associated Charities.—Those of the citizens of Wilmington, who had long been interested in benevolent work, seeing the failure of the indiscriminate methods of almsgiving, determined to organize the charities of the city after the manner of similar organizations in other cities. Accordingly, after a number of preliminary meetings addressed by Mr. Charles G. Ames and Dr. Jas. W. Walk of the Philadelphia Society for Organizing Charity, and others, a general committee was designated to further the enterprise. At a public meeting held October 20, 1884, a special committee composed of J. N. Bennan, D. W. Taylor, Mrs. Kate Hastings, Mrs. Sarah W. Smith, Mrs. Gertrude W. Nields and Mrs. A. D. Warner, was appointed to prepare a plan of operation. Their report was subsequently presented and adopted. At a meeting held November 17, 1884, the following ladies were appointed as representatives from the various wards or districts, according to the proposed plan:

Mrs. Joseph Bellah, Mrs. Mary B. Pyle, Mrs. H. R. Brighurst, Mrs. E. M. Holcomb, Mrs. Margaret C. Pyle, Mrs. Dr. H. Herbst, Miss Mary D. Sisson, Miss Margaret S. Hilles, Miss Maggie Barr and Miss R. J. Warner. These, with the following gentlemen elected by them, constituted the central board of managers:

John H. Adams, J. Taylor Gause, William G. Gibbons, Geo. W. Bush, Geo. S. Capelle, A. D. Warner, Jas. Bradford, L. C. Vandegrift, T. Allen Hilles, Daniel W. Taylor and Edward Betta. A permanent organization was effected December 1, 1884, at which the following officers were elected:

Having secured rooms at Seventh and Market Streets and elected a superintendent, the office was opened for the reception of applicants December 22, 1884. The associated charities of Wilmington became a chartered institution March 19, 1885.

It has been in successful operation ever since and has very materially reduced vagrancy and pauperism within the city. The officers for 1888 are: President, William M. Canby; vice-president, Mrs. A. D. Warner; secretary and treasurer, D. W. Taylor; superintendent, John Massey.

The DELAWARE SOCIETY FOR THE PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO ANIMALS was organized by act of the State Legislature, in 1873, and has been in active operation fourteen years.

It is governed, under its charter and by-laws, by a Board of Managers consisting of twenty members, elected at the annual meeting held in January of each year.

The president and secretary of the society are, ex-officio, president and secretary of the Board of Managers, who meet quarterly, and to them is entrusted the powers and duties of carrying out the purpose of the organization.

The headquarters are in Wilmington, where they occupy an office and employ an agent.

The late Edward Brighurst was elected the first president, which office he held at the time of his death.

The officers elected for 1888 were: President, William Canby; Secretary, Willard Hall Porter; Treasurer, Ann Semple; Attorney, Walter H. Hayes.

Taylor; Quartermaster, R. E. Hayes; Surgeon, A. D. O. Mears; Chaplain, Joseph E. Booth. The post went under the name of Encampment No. 1, until July 19, 1869, when the present name was adopted. It started with good prospects, and its membership gradually increased until 1871, and then for several years no regular meetings were held.

A meeting of veterans who had served in the late war was held in Wilmington, in November, 1879, when it was determined to reorganize the Grand Army of the Republic in Delaware. This work was delegated to General Louis Wagner, Department Commander of the Grand Army of the Republic in Pennsylvania. He performed this duty on January 14, 1880. Gen. Thomas A. CHAPTER XL

WILMINGTON—(Continued).

The Library Company of Wilmington—The initiatory steps toward the establishment of a library in the borough of Wilmington, for the benefit of the public, was taken in 1787. On the 12th of December of that year, a notice appeared in the Delaware Gazette calling for a public meeting in the Town Hall. At this meeting held December 15, Charles H. Wharton, Nicholas Way, Jacob Broom, James Lea, Jr., and Thomas Lea, were appointed a committee to prepare a plan for the contemplated association. Their report which also presented a constitution was read and adopted at the meeting held on January 5, 1788. The name selected was “The Library Company of Wilmington.” The constitution provided that each member should pay forty shillings current money in the State of Delaware, and afterwards one dollar per annum. On January 9th the directors chosen were: Patrick Murdock, Peter Brynberg, William Poole, James Robinson, Jr., William Hempfield, Joseph Warner, John Hayes, John Ferris and James Lea, Jr. Jacob Broom was elected treasurer. Books to the value of £29 14s and 1d were bought March 25th. The library was located in the Town Hall, and on April 14th, opened for the use of members, and regularly thereafter on Saturdays from 3 to 5 P. M., in summer, and 5 to 7 P. M., in winter.

A charter was obtained June 11, 1788, and under it the first election for officers was held on the first Monday of December following, when John Hayes was chosen president; Jacob Broom, treasurer; Isaac Stanton, Patrick Murdock, Joseph Capelle, William Poole, George Clark, Isaac Henderson, Peter Brynberg and Joseph Warner, directors. In 1790 Robert Coram was appointed librarian, and the library removed to his school-house, on Fourth Street, between Market and King.

In 1793 the number of books was eight hundred and ninety-one, and there were fifty-four members of the association. In 1797 a present of twenty-eight pounds was made by a society called the Friends of Justice. In 1803 William Poole, in behalf of the “Amicable Society, lately abandoned,” presented the library with $8.50, and in 1806 Governor John Dickinson gave it five shares of Spring-Water Company stock.

On March 23, 1816, the library was returned to a room in the Town Hall by permission of the Council. An attempt was made in 1817 to sell Rees’ “Cyclopaedia” from the library to liquidate a debt, but the Monthly Meeting of the Society of Friends advanced a loan of two hundred dollars, which was not paid until some time after.

In 1822 Carey & Lea, of Philadelphia, took the “Cyclopaedia” in exchange for other books.

The Franklin Lyceum, in 1846, was merged into the Library Company, and the books, valued at five hundred and fifty dollars, and philosophical apparatus, costing four hundred dollars, were transferred to the Library Company, with the understanding that each member of the Lyceum should receive a share of stock in the Library Company.

In 1851 the library was removed from the room occupied since 1816, in the City Hall, to the building owned by the Athenaeum Company, over the market-house at Fourth and Market Streets. The amount of one thousand dollars was borrowed to pay off all debts. It was then decided to have the library open every evening from seven to ten o’clock.

In 1853 the books of the Botanical and Horticultural Societies were placed in the Wilmington Library. In 1855 it was decided to allow any one the use of the library by paying two dollars a year.

The first attempt to unite the Wilmington Library Company and the Young Men’s Association for Mutual Improvement was made in 1856 and completed December 15, 1857.

The Young Men’s Association for Mutual Improvement was instituted September 22, 1855, and incorporated February 10, 1857, and occupied rooms in a building on Third Street a few doors west of Market.

It was the offspring of a literary society, organized... in 1847. Any person could become a member by the payment of one dollar admission fee and three dollars annually. Its membership increased very rapidly, soon numbering three hundred and fifty, and during a short independent existence displayed great vigor and energy. It had a reading-room in which were placed the leading magazines and newspapers of America and England; had regular courses of lectures, given by distinguished Americans, and obtained the privilege of using the Wilmington Library. In 1857, under the presidency of T. Clarkson Taylor, an attempt was made to form a stock company to build a large public hall. John Wales, C. W. Howland, J. R. Latimer, D. M. Bates, Joseph Shipley and W. Tatnall were appointed a committee to present a plan for a hall. About this time negotiations were entered into which resulted in a union with the Wilmington Library Company, under the name of the Wilmington Library and Young Men's Association. This association agreed to pay and cancel the bond of one thousand dollars against the Library Company. The members of the combined associations of four hundred and fifty members have equal privileges in the library of four thousand five hundred volumes.

WILMINGTON INSTITUTE.—The Wilmington Library and Young Men's Association, formed in 1857 by the union of the two associations, was changed to the Wilmington Institute, the name which it now bears, under an act passed by the Legislature, and approved January 27, 1859. The title, chosen at the time of the union and embodying the names of both the organizations out of which it was formed, was declared to be too long and cumbersome. At the same time a seal was procured containing the date of incorporation and the design of a lighted torch presented by one hand to another extended to recieve it, with the legend "Per Manus Lampas Traditur." Misses Mary and Sarah Hamilton, Hon. James A. Bayard, Hon. William G. Whitely and the heirs of James Canby presented to the library a valuable collection of books in 1859, and the same year nine hundred and twenty-eight new volumes were purchased. The entire library then had over five thousand volumes.

The first officers of the Wilmington Institute were as follows: President, Joshua T. Heald; Vice-President, William S. Hilles and George W. Bush; Recording Secretary, William D. Dow; Corresponding Secretary, Edward T. Taylor; Treasurer, William H. Billany; Directors: Harris Stewart, Charles W. Howell, Hanson Harman, Alexander Kelley, Dr. A. H. Grimshaw, Joshua L. Pusey, William Canby, T. Clarkson Taylor, John P. McLean and Dr. Wm. R. Bullock.

A definite move was now set on foot to procure an eligible site and upon it erect a large building. A committee, of which William Canby was chairman, purchased the property on the corner of Eight and Market Streets, for thirteen thousand dollars, and the corner-stone of Institute Hall was laid on Tuesday, July 24, 1860.

The members of the building committee, who superintended the erection of Institute Hall, were William Tatnall, William S. Hilles, Charles W. Howell, George W. Bush, William Canby and James Bradford.

It is eighty-seven and one-quarter feet front on Market Street, one hundred and eighteen feet on Eighth Street to Shipley. The original library-room was thirty-six by fifty feet, and adjoining it on the same floor was a scientific lecture-room, now part of the library-room. The main audience-room up-stairs is seventy-three by seventy-eight feet and thirty-one and one-half feet high, with seating capacity for twelve hundred persons. The entire cost of site and the erection of the hall was fifty thousand dollars; of this, seventeen thousand dollars was raised by voluntary subscription. S. D. Button, of Philadelphia, was the architect, and Henry F. Dure, carpenter. There were at this time six hundred members, and the certificate of membership was fixed at forty dollars each.

The hall was dedicated January 31, 1861. Samuel Biddle, the president, made the opening speech; Rev. G. F. Wiswell, of Central Presbyterian Church, delivered an address; and was followed by Daniel M. Bates. The Amateur Glee Club furnished the music for the occasion.

A course of lectures was given the next winter by Bayard Taylor, Wendell Phillips, John B. Gough, John S. C. Abbott, Schuyler Colfax and E. L. Youmans.

THE FRANKLIN LYCEUM.—The Young Men's Library and Debating Society was founded by enterprise young men of Wilmington in 1834. The name was subsequently changed to the Franklin Lyceum. It was an organization which prospered for many years. At one time it had a library of eight hundred volumes and philosophical apparatus which cost four hundred dollars. Interest in the association ceased, some of the books were lost, and in 1846 a union was formed with the Wilmington Library Company, to which organization all the books and apparatus were transferred, with the proviso that each member of the Lyceum be granted a certificate of stock in the library company.

The Historical Society of Delaware was organized May 31, 1864. The executive committee of Wilmington Institute took the initiative step by calling a meeting of prominent persons for organization and inviting the attendance of a committee from the Historical Society of Pennsylvania. At this meeting Hon. Willard Hall was chosen chairman and W. D. Dowe, secretary. A committee composed of Hon. John M. Read, LL.D., Hon. Oswald Thompson, LL.D., Colonel J. Ross Snowden and Horatio Gates Jones was appointed by the Pennsylvania Historical Society to be present at the organization of the Delaware society, and to express the interest of the society they represented in its institution. These gentlemen, except Mr. Thompson, were present. Hon. John M. Read spoke in behalf of the Pennsylvania society and Colonel Snowden delivered an address on the history of Pennsylvania and Delaware.

The society organized by electing Hon. Willard Hall, president; W. T. Read, of New Castle, Hon. Samuel M. Harrington, of Dover, and Governor William Cannon, of Sussex County, vice-presidents; Rev. Leighton Coleman, corresponding secretary; W. D. Dowe, recording secretary; J. Franklin Vaughan, M.D., librarian; W. S. Hilles, treasurer; Henry F. Askew, M.D., Wilmington, Rev. George Foot, Glasgow, Major John Jones, Middletown, Hon. J. W. Houston, Milford, Charles M. Cullen, Esq., Georgetown, directors. The original members of this society were Hon. Willard Hall, Daniel M. Bates, Rev. Charles Breck, Right Rev. Alfred Lee, Rev. Leighton Coleman, Rev. William Aitken, Rev. George Foot, Major John Jones, Jacob B. Vandeaver, Dr. Henry F. Askew, William D. Dowe, Esq., Dr. J. F. Wilson, Samuel Biddle, William T. Read, Esq., Samuel E. Thompson, Daniel Lammot, John C. Cole, Francis Vincent, John P. McLean, Alfred Nones, Dr. William R. Bullock, Charles B. Lore, Esq., H. Robert Penington, Governor William Cannon, Chancellor Samuel M. Harrington, Hon. John W. Houston, Charles M. Cullen, Esq., and William L. Hilles. The society now owns and, through the work of the present librarian, carefully arranged in the rooms of the old Presbyterian Church of Wilmington, a very valuable collection of historical material. It is composed of rare books, newspaper files, manuscripts, documents, portraits, relics, etc., of great historical interest.

The following is the list of officers: President, Leonard E. Wales; Vice-Presidents, Thomas F. Bayard, Charles C. Stockley and Chief Justice Comegys; Corresponding Secretary, Dr. L. P. Bush; Recording Secretary, George W. Bush, Jr.; Treasurer, Henry R. Brinthurst; Librarian, Dr. R. P. Johnson; Historiographer, Dr. Horace Burr; Directors, Christian Feibiger, John F. Wales, M.D., Willard Hall Porter, George H. Bates, Esq., and William A. La Motte.

The Female Harmony Society was organized in 1814 in the Hanover Street Presbyterian Church, "for mutual instruction and Christian labor." This society in the same year started the first Sunday-school in Wilmington in the old Stone Church, corner of Fifth and Walnut Streets. The first superintendent was Miss Anna M. MacMullan (afterwards Mrs. George Jones). She was succeeded by Miss Mary Harbison. A charter was obtained from the State Legislature January 28, 1817, for the establishment of Sunday-schools and charity school. The persons named in the act were Mary Read, Ann Porter, Maria Smith and Lydia Monroe. The operations of this society originated the State law of 1822, appropriating money to Sunday-schools and for the teaching of poor children. In 1818 this society erected a building for Sabbath-school purposes on Fifth Street adjoining the old church.

The Harmonic Society, which had for its object the study of sacred music, was organized in 1814 in the old academy on Market Street, where an upper room was fitted up with platform and raised benches. So successful was this society that in 1816 it was composed of four hundred members of the town and vicinity. Each member paid fifty cents a quarter of twelve weeks. Several teachers were employed. Monthly concerts were given and large audiences were in attendance. Instrumental music was introduced into the town largely through the influence of this society. There were a few pianos in the town as early as 1800.

The Female Hospitable Society was organized in 1835 to furnish food and clothing and secure employment for the worthy poor of the city. Among its members then were Mrs. John McLean, Mrs. A. M. Jones, Mrs. Willard Hall, Mrs. George Jones and Miss Jane Cochran. For many years it was instrumental in accomplishing much good.

The Athenæum was a building erected over the east end of the Fourth Street Market in the year 1830 by a literary society of the same name, organized in 1828 in a two-story brick building on Shipley Street, east side, above Fifth. The officers and directors by whom it was built were Charles T. Grubb, president; John A. Duncan, secretary; D. A. Upham, Edwin A. Wilson, Dr. Henry Gibbons, John B. Porter, Dr. Henry F. Askew and John L. Hadden. The Wilmington Library for several years was kept in one of its rooms, and many public meetings and exercises of Literary societies were held in it. From a balcony at the east end of it some eminent speakers addressed political meetings, among whom were Henry Clay and Abraham Lincoln, the latter when a member of Congress in 1848. The Franklin Lyceum held its meetings at this place in 1842, and took charge of the building. It was removed with the market-house in 1843.
NEW CASTLE COUNTY.

A Botanical Society was organized January 16, 1842, with Samuel Hilles, president; Edward Tatnall, vice-president; J. H. Barkley, secretary; Edward Brinthurst, treasurer; Edward Tatnall, Jr., W. S. Hilles and Dubre Knight, curators. The object of this society was "to arouse and sustain an interest in the study of botany, the most pleasant of all the natural sciences." It had an active existence for nine years.

The Ciceronian Literary Society, organized in 1840, for many years held its meetings in a building on Orange Street, between Sixth and Seventh. Colonel H. S. McComb, Edward Bette, Pennock Pusey, Carvon H. Adams, Hanson Harmon, George W. Bush and William Silver were some of its early members. "Aballiboos abangon arriboon Molowa" was the name of a literary society, organized in 1847, by a number of intelligent young men. Any person who could pronounce the name correctly was entitled to membership. In 1849 it is said an applicant choked in the attempt, which caused the society to disband.

The Wilmington Sacred Music Society gave its first concert in St. Paul's M. E. Church, on Thursday evening February 23, 1849. It was composed of members of several churches. This society entertained an audience composed of the "beauty and fashion of the city," Thanksgiving day, 1849. Mr. Marsh was its leader.

Shields' Library Association, in the city of Wilmington, was founded by eight young men, on May 4, 1833. It is named in honor of Gen. James A. Shields, a distinguished officer of the war with Mexico, and of the Civil War. The names of the founders are Robert Elliot, James Sweeney, M. H. Ryan, J. Kane, John Kelley, John McElwee and William McMonagle. They organized by electing James Sweeney, president; J. Kane, secretary; Robert Elliot, librarian. The first place of meeting, and where the library was kept, was in the Mount Vernon House, 308 King Street. Better quarters were next secured in the large building, southeast corner of Fifth and Market Streets. In this place the association regularly met until December 13, 1881, when the building, including the books, furniture and pictures of the library, amounting to nine hundred dollars, were destroyed by fire. The association then met by invitation in the engine-house of the Water Witch Fire Company, until the present beautiful and commodious hall was obtained in the Saville building, southeast corner of Sixth and Market Streets. A charter was obtained January 26, 1869, and renewed February, 1885. The library has a collection of six hundred and fifty well selected books. A large number of the standard daily and weekly newspapers and monthly periodicals are regularly received. The membership is three hundred and fifty seven, each of whom pay five cents a week membership fee. The officers for 1887 were Frank P. Phalen, president; M. F. Keogh, vice-president; John A. Carberry, secretary; and Thomas J. King, treasurer.

The German Library Association was organized March 12, 1873, by Henry Miller, Frederick V. Bourdon, Andrew Wilhelm, Sebastian Burkhartd, Anthony Hauber, and Kassimer Abberger. The library was first kept in the house of Andrew Wil-

1880, when a charter of incorporation was obtained, and the library moved to Hertman's building, on Fourth Street, below Market Street. In 1884 the German Library Association, in connection with the Delaware Saengerbund, purchased the large hall which they now (1880) own, on East Sixth Street, between Washington and French Streets, formerly the Wesleyan Female College. The library has since been in that building. It contains eleven hundred well-selected volumes printed in the German language, and five hundred in English. The officers for 1887 were: President, William Cloos; Secretary, Dr. Emil Hertel; Treasurer, Frederick Bourdon.

The Young Men's Republican Club, whose handsome headquarters are at No. 810 King Street, Wilmington, was organized on July 9, 1880, in the Garfield campaign. Its membership soon increased to eight hundred of the leading young Republicans in the city. Six hundred of its members, under the command of Colonel Samuel M. Wood, First Regiment, Delaware National Guards, were in uniform, and marched with the precision of veterans. The organization was formed by the election of Frederick E. Bach, president; David C. Chalfant, vice-president; George F. Smith, secretary; Elwood C. Jackson, treasurer; and Samuel M. Wood, marshal.

In December, 1880, the club was reorganized and placed upon a permanent basis. The officers were re-elected, and, in December, 1881, were again re-elected. In the mean time the organization had established itself in commodious quarters. In December, 1882, Thomas W. Heisler was elected president, and Nathaniel R. Benson, Jr., secretary. During the following spring the club obtained a charter, the members named therein being Francis W. Heisler, Nathaniel R. Benson, Jr., Henry C. Conrad, Francis H. McCauley, Jacob Eldridge Pierce and Frederick E. Bach. The charter brought renewed prosperity to the club. Secretary Benson was elevated to the presidency in the following December, and T. Jackson Shaw was chosen secretary. In the campaign of 1884 the club took an active part in the election of delegates to the National Convention. Later in the canvass, General Logan, the candidate for Vice-President, visited the city as the guest of the club, which gave him a brilliant reception in the Opera-House. In December of that year Captain Edmund Mitchell, Company A, Delaware National Guards, was unanimously elected president and Harry F. Trigge, secretary. In the spring of 1885 the club purchased the building on King Street, Wilmington, which it now occupies. Elwood C. Jackson was chosen president in December of that year, and Mr. Triggs was re-elected secretary. The club has two hundred active members. The officers elected for 1888 are Edward Mitchell, president; Samuel M. Knox, vice-president; Harry F. Triggs, recording secretary; Henry C. Pickels, corresponding secretary; Lewis B. Morrow, financial secretary; J. Eldridge Pierce, treasurer; and Thomas Holt, marshal.

The Washington Cornet Band, one of the first musical organizations of its kind in Wilmington, was formed at the Washington Hotel, September 2, 1834. It flourished for nearly twenty years. In 1846 it joined artillery Company A, of the city. The Independent Band was formed in 1847, and the Wilmington Street Band soon afterward.

Delaware Saengerbund dates its origin back to March 17, 1883, and has since had a prosperous and active existence. The first members were G. Huber, L. Roeder, L. Grieb, John Henry Mulhausen, John Fehrenbach, Solomon Brill, C. Keiser, Andrew Witz, Reinhart Reinhold, Henry Baker, A. Hilger, John O. Krauch, Jacob Stuck, Valentine Walter, John Bodd-hog and A. Hiller.

It organized with G. Anton, musical director; William Bopameyer, president; J. H. Mulhausen, secretary; H. Bleyer, treasurer; and J. Fehrenbach, librarian. The object of this society was the study of the musical productions of the best German composers.

The present membership is one hundred and twenty. Daniel Maier is president; Henry Zimmerman, treasurer; Henry Koehler, financial secretary; and Albert Amptieiter, secretary. George B. Metzner was secretary for several years. The Saengerbund and the German Library Association conjointly, about 1883, purchased a large building, formerly part of Wesleyan College, on Sixth Street between French and Tattnall, for $7500 and expended $4000 in improvements. In this commodious building the Saengerbund and the German literary and beneficial societies hold their meetings.

The Millard Club was organized January 15, 1875. The original twelve members were Dr. Howard Oglesby, J. H. Lewis, W. W. Lobdell, C. B. Rhoads, George W. Stone, W. D. Kavanagh, Dr. A. B. Mitchell, W. D. Pickels, J. H. Cameron, Henry Baird, Julius Hess and Bradley James. Mr. Rhoads was chosen musical director. The club met for practice on Monday evenings at the homes of members, and gave the first concert in West Presbyterian Church June 17, 1875. By July of that year the membership was increased to twenty-one by the election of L. Curran, B. C. Saville, John W. Todd, D. McClosky, J. Kavanagh, F. Fullmer, M. A. Kelley, William Hamilton and Huxley Harvey. George W. Stone was president. The centennial rehearsal was given June 27, 1876. On "Delaware Day" the club visited the Centennial Exhibition and sung "Comrade in Arms" in front of the Delaware building, to an immense concourse of people. W. W. Lobdell was elected president in 1877. In March, 1878, the club gave a concert in the new court-room at Dover. May 31st, of same year, it gave the first "Floral Concert;" the Mendelssohn Quintette, of Boston, rendered the music, assisted by Miss Ella Lewis. On September 23, 1878, a concert was given for the benefit of the yellow-fever sufferers in Louisiana and seven hundred and ten dollars was sent for that purpose by this club. Harrison Millard and Miss Beebe, of New York, were present and sung on this occasion. In 1879 George W. Stone was president; an executive committee was then elected, composed of Dr. J. M. Curtis, W. W. Lobdell, C. B. Rhoads, George Stone, and Dr. Howard Oglesby. It was then decided to admit ladies to membership and the name was changed to the Philharmonic Society, which was formed with the following fifty-six members: Sopranos, Mrs. J. P. Weeks, Mrs. J. N. Cooling, Mrs. S. A. McAllister, Mrs. M. A. Taylor, Miss Addie Connor, Miss Eva Crouch, Miss M. Monaghan, Miss Etta Springer, Miss M. Horn, Miss Louise Schmidt, Miss Eva Zeb-ley, Miss Sallie Lowry, Miss Mary Connor, Miss Eva Cooling. Altos—Miss Virginia Connor, Miss Agnes Oglesby, Miss Mamie Connor, Miss Alice Lobdell, Miss R. Gallagher, Miss Agnes Monaghan, Miss Ada Carrawell, Miss Julia Huffington, Miss Rose Megary. Tenors—W. W. Lobdell, S. Curran, J. L. Robeson, Thomas Tucker, Joseph Coley, H. P. Rumford, Samuel McCellender Barber, S. F. Osbourn, James H. Cameron, J. Hess, T. Allen, W. H. Sinecock, N. B. Danforth, John Cannon, J. M. Curtis, T. D. Gambrill, E. H. Booth. Bassos—A. B. Mitchell, F. Fullmer, George W. Stone, C. T. Howland, H. Baird, Howard Oglesby, J. H. Lewis, Joseph H. Jones, John Ripperger, J. H. Blyer, W. J. Fisher, W. D. Pickels, Fred Weyl, W. A. Blyer, Alexander Novick. C. B. Rhoads was musical director. The new society, after singing other music for a time, took up "Trial by Jury" and presented it to the public with the following casts: Judge, George W. Stone; Plaintiff, Mrs. M. A. Taylor; Counsel, James H. Cameron; Defendant, W. W. Lobdell; Usher, C. T. Howell; Foreman, J. H. Jones; Director, C. B. Rhoads; Pianoist, F. Fullmer; Stage Manager, Dr. J. M. Curtis. It was repeated before an audience of fifteen hundred people.

Nov. 28, 1879, "Pinafore" was rendered with this cast of characters: Sir Joseph Porter, C. C. B., C. T. Howell; Captain Corcoran, George W. Stone; Ralph Rakestraw, W. W. Lobdell; Dick Deadey, W. J. Fisher; Boatwain, N. R. Benson, Jr.; Josephine, Miss Clara J.Rua; Buttercup, Miss Eva Crouch; Hebe, Miss Ida Carswell. The Philharmonic Society continued an organization for several years and was composed of members who possessed rare musical talent.

The Tuesday Club, composed of ladies and gentlemen, is the most proficient musical organization.
that Wilmington has yet produced. Its members come from the higher circles of society in the city, and many of them are trained musicians. This club since its organization has exerted an elevating and ennobling influence in the community, and is a happy illustration of what can be done when the best musical talent of a community in which there is intelligence and refinement associate themselves together, for further improvement in the highest of all the fine arts—music. It was in the fall of 1884 that Charles T. Howell, organist and leader of the choir in Grace Church, himself a skilled musician, began to train his choir of a dozen members on Tuesday evenings to sing a variety of sacred music of classic selection, and during the succeeding winter gave three public rehearsals or praise services in the audience-room of Grace Church. The next year the membership increased and they began, then, to hold their Tuesday evening meetings for practice in Baynard’s music-room, corner Fifth and Market Streets. In June, 1886, Mr. Howell removed from Wilmington, and, of necessity, severed his connection with his society, at that time composed of forty members. It was then decided to form a permanent organization. The members elected N. R. Benson, Jr., president, with power to choose other persons, who, with himself, constituted a committee to formulate rules for the government of the body and to select a musical director. As a permanent name, “Tuesday Club” was then decided upon and N. R. Benson, Jr., was elected president; James H. Cameron, vice-president; Henry Baird, secretary; W. N. Hamilton, Jr., treasurer; J. T. Clymer, librarian; and John T. Craig, pianist.

The first meeting of the club under its present name was on the first Tuesday of October, 1886, and the membership soon thereafter increased from forty to one hundred. D. H. Morrison, of Philadelphia, was chosen the musical director, whose knowledge of classical music and ability as a leader won the confidence of the members of this club and exerted a beneficial influence in increasing the popularity of the organization. The oratorio of “The Creation” was taken up and rendered with a chorus of eighty-four voices before a large audience in the opera-house January 12, 1887. The success of this presentation established the reputation of the Tuesday Club. In May, 1887, this club repeated “The Creation” with the Memorial Choral Society, of Philadelphia, in the Memorial Baptist Church of that city, and in the latter part of the same month gave a very successful concert of miscellaneous music in the Wilmington Opera-House. In October, 1887, the Tuesday Club began to hold its meetings in the Unitarian Church, on West Street, and took up the oratorio of “Elijah.”

The officers for 1888 are,—President, N. R. Benson, Jr.; Vice-President, Henry Baird; Secretary, H. R. Triggs; Treasurer, W. N. Hamilton, Jr.; Librarian, James H. Cameron; John T. Craig is pianist.

The Choral Club, an active and progressive musical society, was organized with sixty-five members in the month of April, 1887. Its membership has since increased to ninety. The first board of directors were W. J. Fisher, president; N. D. Cloward, secretary; Fred. Weil, treasurer; Frank Kane, John Braunstein, William Gibbons, Samuel McAdams. Mayor C. B. Rhoads, who has for many years been an able and popular instructor in music, and musical director in Wilmington, is the leader of the Choral Club, which first learned the cantata, “Joseph’s Bondage,” and made two public presentations of it in the Opera-House before a large audience during the summer of 1887. The club next took up the “Chimes of Normandy,” under the same musical director. T. Lesley Carpenter is the accompanist, and J. M. Clayton stage manager, and John M. Braunstein chorus master.

The Choral Club is a co-operative organization, and divides the proceeds of its public entertainments equally among its members. It is doing an excellent work in stimulating young people who possess good voices to improve themselves in the art and science of music without cost.

The officers for 1888 are,—President, Frank Kane; Secretary, N. D. Cloward; Treasurer, Fred. Weil.

Shipley Street Theatre.—A theatrical troupe appeared in Wilmington in 1838, and presented several plays in a large room of the Bayard Hotel. An admission of fifty cents was charged. A few months later a hall was fitted up at the corner of Front and Orange Streets, and a number of Shakespeare’s best plays was presented to enthusiastic audiences. Great interest was taken in the histrionic art about this time in the newly incorporated city.

The Wilmington Theatre Company obtained a charter in 1834, and the same year erected a building at the southwest corner of Sixth and Shipley Streets, seventy-eight by forty-three feet, twenty-six feet to the dome, with an audience-room to seat six hundred persons. The architect was John Wisdom, of Philadelphia. The scenery and decorations were executed by James Carr. The opening performance was given December 22, 1834, by Mr. and Mrs. Barnes, with good support, by the presentation of a comedy, “The Soldier’s Daughter.” Admission to “boxes 75 cents, pit 37½ cents, gallery 25 cents. The performance began at seven o’clock sharp.” This company played one week “to houses of the best kind with unbounded applause.” It was invited to remain two weeks longer. A large number of the citizens of Wilmington shook their heads in dismay, and said the whole town was destined to go to ruin if so many of their friends and neighbors patronized “so wicked a thing as a theatre.” It brought forth some lively newspaper correspondence. The character of the performances at this little theatre seems to have been good, and it continued to prosper the first season. In 1855 James R. Hall became manager, and secured good talent for that year. F. C. Wemyss leased it in 1887. The building was used as a theatre until 1889; in the mean time its ownership passed from the hands of a company, and was bought by William W. Baker, M.D.

Odd Fellows' Hall was erected by a company chartered by the General Assembly, February 10, 1847, with a capital stock of twenty thousand dollars, in two thousand shares of ten dollars each. The company elected its first officers January 24, 1848, when Jesse Sharpe was chosen president; Edward McNall, secretary; William Campbell, treasurer; and William R. Sellars, Henry C. Banning, William Morrow, James Elliott, J. Fleming Smith, Zenas B. Glazier, William Thatcher, John H. Stidham, Delaplaine McDaniel and Jacob Barr as curators. Considerable feeling arose in regard to the location of the building; one faction advocated the purchase of a lot at the northwest corner of Seventh and Market Streets, and the other the lot on which the hall now stands, at the northwest corner of Third and King Streets. The cornerstone was laid with the usual ceremonies and a fine display of the order. Among the distinguished guests present were Horne R. Kness, Grand Sire of the Grand Lodge of the United States, and Prof. Patterson, of Philadelphia.

The interesting ceremonies of dedication took place May 28, 1849. It was a public holiday in the city, and thousands of people were on the streets to witness the display of the order with its glittering regalia and gorgeous banners. Hon. H. M. Ridgely on this occasion delivered an eloquent oration in Asbury Church. Odd Fellows' Hall was then the largest building in the State.

The lecture-room was opened by the Germania Society, a musical organization from Prussia. David Paul Brown, the great Philadelphia orator, lectured in this hall in 1849. J. R. Scott, an American tragedian, followed in "Othello"; and an Italian opera company also appeared in it soon afterwards.

This room was refitted in 1865, and in 1878 it was thoroughly remodeled at a cost of two thousand dollars. Other improvements have since been made. The officers of the company since its organization, in addition to a board of nine curators, have been: Presidents—Jesse Sharpe, twenty-six years; Dr. Henry F. Askew, two years; Daniel Farr, four years; John G. Yates, seven years. Secretaries—Edward McNall, one year; Wm. Hemphill Jones, four years; C. P. Johnson, nine years. Treasurers—William Campbell, John McClung, William Graves, Robert R. Robinson, James L. Morrow, Wm. H. Tailey and Joshua Maria, served respectively from one year to six years, until the year 1868, when the office of treasurer was merged with that of the secretary, since which time the present incumbent, Henry Eckel, has been continued in the office, making his term of service as secretary and treasurer cover a period of twenty-six years. Mr. Eckel is the oldest living officer now remaining in the service.

The assets of the company are forty thousand three hundred dollars; liabilities, twenty-eight thousand seven hundred and eighty dollars.

The Masonic Temple and Opera-House.—Efforts had been made at various times to secure the erection of an appropriate building in which the Masonic lodges could hold their meetings. In 1867 a committee, with representatives from each of the lodges in the city, was appointed, and on January 28, 1869, the Masonic Hall Company was chartered with a capital of one hundred thousand dollars, in five thousand shares of twenty dollars each.

On March 22d of that year the following officers were elected: George G. Lobdell, president; James Scott, vice-president; John P. Allmond, secretary. The other directors were Jesse Sharpe, Sr., James H. Beggs, T. M. Ogle, Philemma Chandler, John Taylor, William G. Gibbons, J. H. Simms, Joseph E. Miller, Henry English, Dr. Jacob Derrickson, William S. Hayes and David Woolman.

On the 26th of February, 1870, the company purchased the lot, ninety-two by two hundred and twelve feet, upon which the Masonic Temple and Opera-House of parquet, balcony and gallery is thirteen hundred persons. This place of amusement was managed with varied success from the time it was built until March, 1887, when it was leased to F. F. Proctor, who is the lessee of several other similar buildings throughout the country. He has completed his arrangements to have performances twice every day for forty weeks of the year.

CHAPTER XLI.

WILMINGTON—(Continued).

CEMETERIES.

OLD SWEDES' BURIAL-GROUND.—As the earliest settlers upon the Delaware brought with them the animosities and contentions of their native lands, and besides fighting out in their new homes the ancient grudges of England, Holland and Sweden, often shouldered arms to save themselves from being driven into the sea by the Indians, the establishment of cemeteries, an attendant of peace and civilization, was not a primary object with them. But when the Swedes set up their church at Crane Hook, south of the mouth of the Christiana Creek, they had a burial-place attached to it, and upon the erection of Old Swedes' (now Trinity) Church, in 1698, they laid out a plot of surrounding earth to receive the bodies of their dead. It was then far distant from any settlements, and interments must have been attended with the expenditure of much time and trouble. The earliest graves in this cemetery are unmarked. The following are the inscriptions on some of the oldest tombs and monuments: William Vandevere, born 1656, died Nov. 1719; Breta Cock, died 1726; Catharine, her sister, two days later. John, son of Israel and Susannah Stalcup, 1747, aged 26 years. Ingeborg Stidham, daughter of Peter and Ingeborg Jaquet, born 1690, married Lucy Stidham 1716; died 1748.

Mary Smidd, born 1697, went to Sweden 1714, returned 1721; died Nov. 19, 1750.

Casparus, son of Cornelius and Mary Jaquet, died 1755, aged thirty-five years.

Jesper Poulsen, died 1783, aged seventy-three years.

WILMINGTON AND BRANDYWINE CEMETERY.—In 1843 Samuel Wollaston began to lay off a tract of land of ten acres and fifty-nine perches on Delaware Avenue into lots for a cemetery. The project met with public favor and February 14, 1842, a meeting of citizens was held in City Hall, where it was determined to form a cemetery company, so that each lot-holder would be a proprietor. Wollaston had already disposed of two hundred lots. On March 12, 1844, the Wilmington and Brandywine Cemetery Company was organized with the following officers: Willard Hall, president; Jonas Pusey, secretary; John A. Duncan, treasurer; David C. Wilson, Samuel Wollaston, William Lea, George Craig, Henry F. Askew, M.D., James Canby, Richard H. Bayard, Miller Dunott, directors. A charter of incorporation was obtained February 6, 1845. The grounds then included the Wollaston tract, lying on the north of Delaware Avenue, and east of old King's Road, and an additional tract of five acres and one hundred and nine and a half rods on the north, bought of James Canby. The company afterwards bought adjoining lands of Bishop Lee, of the estate of Dr. Gibbons, and of Isaac Chamberlain, making the present area of the cemetery twenty-three acres, one hundred and fifty-two and one-half rods. George Read Riddle was employed to make a draft or plan of the cemetery, which was adopted May 7, 1844. The remains of George Sharpe were the first to be interred in the grounds on August 12, 1844. The entire number of interments to September 27, 1867, was nine thousand six hundred and nine. Miller Dunott, one of the first directors, was buried here May 9, 1845.

At the time of the decease of Samuel Wollaston the board placed the following on record in the minute-book: "Our esteemed townsman, Samuel Wollaston, deceased October 15, 1875, at the advanced age of eighty-nine years. With him originated in 1844 the plan, and through his efforts was mainly achieved the establishment of the Wilmington and Brandywine Cemetery. At first conceived and entered upon by him individually, he was eventually joined in the project by many of his fellow-citizens. Thus at that early day did his wise foresight anticipate a requirement in this city which later experience has caused to be adopted throughout the country. Through the long period since the organization of the company, he continued to take an active interest, and was a valuable member of this Board, rarely being absent from its meetings. He was an active, useful and upright citizen. "We record this short memorial as a testimony of the respect and reverence entertained by us for him."

Samuel Wollaston, the only son of Joshua Wollaston and Catharine Kirk, his wife, was born at Wilmington, Del., May 29, 1786, and in 1811 married Elizabeth, daughter of Jacob and Esther Fussell.

He was an active, exemplary member of the religious Society of Friends at Fourth and West Streets, Wilmington, Del., and for many years he occupied a prominent position in that body.

In 1838 and 1839 he devoted much time and thought and was greatly interested in the culture of silk, and in the growing of morus multicaulis trees for feeding the silk-worm, and he built upon his own place a cocoonery with racks, etc., for the purpose.

Mr. Wollaston, like a long line of ancestors, was a farmer.

His farm was known as Windsor Farm, upon which a large part of the western part of Wilmington now stands, and also a portion of that occupied by the Wilmington and Brandywine Cemetery.

Mr. Wollaston, in 1844, planned and originated the Wilmington and Brandywine Cemetery, individually conducting and managing the same for some time. Afterwards he was joined by many of his most prominent fellow-citizens.

At that time few similar institutions existed in this country, and in the then small community did his wise forthcoming anticipate a requirement which later experience has caused to be adopted throughout the land.

The enterprise proved a success, and during the long period of his life he was an active and valuable member of the board of directors of that corporation.

To other sterling qualities of head and heart were added the tender ties of family and home.

He was always regular, methodical and very abstemious, to which, no doubt, he owed his long life and good health.

He loved his friends, was cheerful, indulgent to his children, kind to those who served him and hospitable to strangers.

He was dignified in manner, modest and retiring in disposition.

As the evening of his life drew on, he became gentle and lovely as a child, yet to within a few hours of his death he retained his mind clear and faculties bright, at the advanced age of nearly ninety years, honored and respected by all who knew him.

He died October 15, 1875, at his place, 613 Washington Street, Wilmington, Del.

Samuel Wollaston was the son of Joshua Wollaston and Catharine Kirk, his wife.

Joshua Wollaston was the son of Thomas Wollaston and Hannah Johnson, his wife.

Thomas Wollaston was the son of Jeremiah Wollaston and Catharine Robinson, his wife.

Jeremiah Wollaston was the son of Thomas Wollaston and Martha, his wife, who came to Delaware and settled, purchasing in 1667, 69 '69 land in New Castle County, White Clay and Mill Creek Hundreds, Delaware.

The cemetery company are constantly improving and making more attractive their beautiful burying-place, and a large number of imposing and costly monuments have been erected. It is systematically laid off into plats and drives, and distributed through the grounds are fifteen artistically planned flower-beds, as well as trees of many kinds and varieties, the latter furnishing delightful shade.

Judge Willard Hall was president of the cemetery company from 1844 to 1875, when William Canby was elected to succeed him.

Jonas Pusey served as secretary from 1844 to 1847. On June 27, 1847, Albert W. Smith was elected secretary and treasurer, and served in that position to December 12, 1881, at which date Arthur H. Smith was elected.

It has been the aim and purpose of the directors to create a fund from year to year, increasing the same (after making all needful improvements and managing and conducting the affairs of wages and expenses), so that by the time all the lots shall be sold, the fund will be large enough to keep the cemetery in good order, without taxing the lodholders. The directors have every reason to think that they will be able to accomplish this, as the fund now amounts to forty thousand dollars.

Among the beautiful monuments in the cemetery are those erected to the memory of the following:

John Thompson was appointed first superintendent of the grounds, and was succeeded by Samuel C. Penrose. The first interment were the remains of Elizabeth Warren, on July 5, 1872. Since that date to September 24, 1887, there have been issued two thousand seven hundred and thirteen permits for interments. In 1876 Edwin C. Moore was elected vice-president. Jeremiah Mahoney was chosen president to succeed John G. Baker, February 3, 1879; John J. Gallagher, February 2, 1880; and Charles P. Mahoney, February 7, 1887.

Daniel T. Hawkins was elected secretary July 5, 1876, upon the resignation of Joshua Maris, and William E. Hawkins on July 9, 1881, after the death of his father, Daniel T. Hawkins.

CATHEDRAL CEMETERY was opened by the Catholic Churches of Wilmington in June, 1876. It is situated one and a half miles west of Market Street, on the Lancaster pike, just without the city limits. Its area is forty acres, ten of which are inclosed. To October 15, 1887, there were two thousand three hundred and sixty interments, not including a number of removals from other burial-places.

MONTES FIORE CEMETARY, a burial-place for persons of the Jewish faith, is situated at Silver Brook. An act of incorporation was obtained February 2, 1883, by Manuel Richenberger, Bernard Wolfson, Jacob De Wolf, Julius Cobe, Max Ephraim, George Jacobs, Louis Fellheimer, Kaufman Soudheimer, Max Fellheimer, Charles Itale and Meyer Meyers. The officers of the cemetery are Nathan Lieberman, president; Morris Faber, secretary; and Louis Fellheimer, treasurer.

SUPPLEMENTARY TO MANUFACTURING CHAPTER.

PRINTING.—The firm of H. & E. F. James, composed of Hickman and Edward F. James, was established in 1867, at the present location of the Delaware Printing Company. After a few years Hickman James retired and Frank T. Webb took his place, the firm becoming James & Webb. The James & Webb Printing and Stationery Company, incorporated in 1883, purchased the plant and continued the business until October 5, 1888, when the present concern, the Delaware Printing Company, became the proprietors. The officers are, President, E. F. James; Secretary and Treasurer, Warren H. Farrar.

The firm occupy the large five-story building, 224 Market Street, and extending through to Webb Street. In this busy hive every branch of the job-printing and book-binding business is conducted. The concern has an established reputation for the excellence of their work, and at present turn out more work than any other one establishment in the city. In connection with the other branches of the business, the complete stationery-store is annexed. Employment is given to forty hands.

JOHN J. GIBSON & CO.—This firm was started by John J. Gibson and his sons John and James, in October, 1883. In addition to these gentlemen, the only workmen at that time were three other sons of John J. Gibson. The building is located at 225 Adams Street, and originally was seventy-nine by ninety feet. An addition of forty-eight by ninety feet has been added. Thus the business from a very moderate beginning has grown to be one of the leading concerns of the city. Thirty men are employed, and Dongola and all the various varieties of morocco are manufactured.

ALEXANDER KELLEY & COMPANY.—The old building at the northeast corner of Third and Orange Streets was, until its purchase by Frank T. Clymer, the site of the first soap factory in Wilmington. The building was established by —— Hicks, in the early part of the present century. He was succeeded by George W. Spangler, and later by the firm of Moore & Company. The last-named firm continued until the purchase by Alexander Kelley & Company, in 1881. This latter firm had succeeded John M. Kelley, who had in 1879 started the manufacture of fine laundry soaps, at the southwest corner of Third Street and Railroad Avenue. In 1881, Alexander Kelley and George W. Pierson formed the present co-partnership and purchased the plant of John M. Kelley, continuing the manufacture at the old stand and using the office of the old soap-works as the office of the firm. The latter was shortly afterwards removed to the factory.

The firm manufacture a fine line of laundry soaps, in a large building which has a capacity for turning out fifty-five thousand pounds of soap monthly. An excellent article of Borax Linen Soap is the specialty of the business. Employment is given to seven hands. G. Krauter has, for a number of years, conducted a soap-works on West Front Street, near Madison. Fine bath and laundry soaps are manufactured.

WILMINGTON BASKET AND CRATE COMPANY.—Wilmington had never engaged in this industry to any extent until the formation of this company, July 11, 1887. J. H. Hoffecker, Jr., Alfred S. Elliott, Daniel W. Taylor, Franklin B. Colton and Nathan Fitch obtained a charter on the date mentioned and secured the large building on the south side of Market Street Bridge, formerly occupied by S. D. Fauchall for the manufacture of carriages. Work was commenced on the 15th of October, the company having previously organized with Samuel Canby, president; vice-president, Nathan T. Fitch; secretary, William Ferrie, Jr.; directors, Major Samuel Canby, Frederick H. Robinson, Jacob S. Beem, J. H. Hoffecker and Nathan T. Fitch.

The plant embraces two large buildings, two stories in height, the front building one hundred and twenty-five by sixty feet, and the rear building thirty-five by one hundred and seventy-five feet. The baskets are manufactured by the Huey patents, which greatly facilitate the production and cheapen the cost. Two engines of forty-five and twenty-five horse-power, by which six thousand baskets per day are manufactured. Employment is given to fifty men. The firm also manufactures, in large quantities, barrels and kegs.

JESSE SHARPE, for half a century a prominent and influential citizen of Wilmington, was born May 20, 1809, and died December 29, 1873. He was a lineal descendant in the sixth generation of John Sharpe, a native of Yorkshire, England, who emigrated to America and settled in the territory now embraced in Chester County, before the Province of Pennsylvania was conveyed to William Penn. John Sharpe originally was a member of the Church of England, but became a convert of the Quaker faith in his native country through the teachings of George Fox. Upon the arrival of Penn in America, John Sharpe obtained from him a title for a large tract of land in London Grove township, Chester County. It was afterwards divided and subdivided among successive generations of his descendants, the old homestead with all its hallowed associations being still in possession of members of the Sharpe family. The entire tract, at the death of John Sharpe, was inherited by his son Joseph, who accompanied him to America. Joseph Sharpe married Mary Pyle, by whom he had five children,—Joseph, Abigail, Benjamin, Elizabeth and Samuel. Joseph, the eldest of these children, married and in 1794 emigrated to Iredell County, South Carolina, where his descendants now live. Abigail married a Palmer and they settled upon a tract of land near the present limits of Lancaster, Pa. Elizabeth married a Jennings and moved to Hillsboro', North Carolina.

Samuel married Mary Flowers, widow of Isaac Starr, and succeeded his father in the ownership of the homestead and the lands taken up by his first American ancestor, John Sharpe, in Chester County. By this marriage were born six children, four of whom grew to advanced ages. Abigail the eldest, married James Jones and moved to Harford County, Maryland. Isaac married Margaret Bennett Johnson, of Wilmington, Delaware. By this marriage twelve children were born. Mary died unmarried. Joseph, the youngest of these children, became very proficient in mathematics, a talent for which science nearly all of the Sharpe family inherited. He was a very skillful surveyor and assisted in running the boundary line between Virginia and Kentucky. He died unmarried.

Samuel Sharpe was a man of mark in his day and was chosen one of the delegates to represent Chester County in the Continental Congress. A number of interesting and valuable relics and documents, procured by Samuel Sharpe while a member of Congress, are now in the possession of his lineal descendant, Miss Sarah E. Sharpe, of Wilmington.

Benjamin Sharpe, the second son and third child of Joseph Sharpe and his wife, Mary Pyle, was an intelligent and progressive farmer of Chester County. His son, George Sharpe, married a Nichols, and resided in what is now New Garden Township, Chester County, on a part of the original Sharpe tract. They had two children, Samuel and Thomas. A few years after the death of his first wife, George Sharpe married Sarah Chambers, widow of George Gregg. The children of his second marriage were Abiah, Jesse and Eli, the last two being twins.

Abiah Sharpe, the eldest son of George Sharpe and
NEW CASTLE COUNTY.

Sarah Chambers, his wife, at the age of nineteen went to sea on one of the vessels of his ancestors, who were prominent shipping merchants at Wilmington. Later, he engaged in trade on an extensive scale. He prospered in the business, became one of the most famous sea captains of his day, and moved to the City of Philadelphia. He was then half-owner of the "Pacific," one of the largest ships engaged in the East India trade. He subsequently visited every open port in the world at that time, and at the age of thirty-five years retired from a seafaring life, having amassed a fortune. He continued to own his ships. Captain Abiah Sharpe married Ann Taylor, daughter of George Taylor, of Wilmington. Her grandfather was a farmer, owning lands in Brandywine Hundred. The children of this marriage were George, Edward, Catharine, Williams, Lawrence, Ann and Charles Abiah. The five eldest died unmarried.

Of Abiah Sharpe's family, George, the eldest son, finished his scholastic course at an early age, acquiring three or four languages, in which he was so proficient that he could talk fluently as a native. An intimate friend of his father, a French gentleman, desired to place his son in a position to acquire a competency. So they leased a silver mine, within a three days' journey from the city of Mexico, and established their sons in it. George remained until he was required to return home after his father's death, between 1833-34, to allow a settlement of the estate; his brother Lawrence having gone to Mexico sometime previous to assume his interest in the mine, during his brother's absence. Before his return a general revolution occurred, which made it dangerous for foreigners to remain in the country. Lawrence embarked for home from Vera Cruz, was stricken with yellow fever, and died when he was within one day's sail of the port of New Orleans, his body being interred in the waters of the Gulf of Mexico. George died unmarried in 1856. William, another son of Abiah, was a talented and prosperous physician, having studied under Dr. McClellan, and he died unmarried in 1888. Their sister Catherine, a most estimable and generous woman, after her mother's decease, spent the greater part of her time abroad with a younger sister, Ann, who had married, early in life, Samuel Stockton Horner, of New Jersey, and resided twenty-two years in Paris. After her husband's death in Paris they both returned home, Catherine dying in 1876. Charles Abiah was the youngest and only married son, and died in 1868, he having previously married Marianna Shreve, of New Jersey. There are two surviving children, Annie and Mary, who reside in Philadelphia.

Jesse, the second son of George and Sarah Chambers Sharpe, married Phebe Walter, of Chester County, Pa. They had four children—Sarah, Louisa, George and Eber Worthington,—three of whom married and settled within a few miles of the homestead, which the youngest son, Eber, inherited by will, and was occupied by him until his death in 1872. George still lives in New Garden. Jesse served a term as sheriff of Chester County, and for many years, until his death, was an associate judge of the county courts.

Eli Sharpe, the youngest son of George Sharpe and Sarah Chambers, was born in New Garden Township, Chester County. Early in life his brother Jesse and he owned a transportation line between Kennett Square and Frenchtown. About 1814 he purchased and took charge of the historic old tavern-stand at the north-west corner of Front and Market Streets, Wilmington. It was the first house built within the present limits of the city, and stood eight feet farther out on Market Street than the present row of buildings on the west side of that street. In 1825 he erected the present Sharpe's Hotel at the same corner. He was a popular man and very widely known in Delaware, Pennsylvania and Maryland. He was genial and affable in his nature and refined in his manners, inheriting the strong traits of his ancestors.

Eli Sharpe was married to his cousin, Elizabeth, daughter of Isaac and Margaret Johnson Sharpe, of Wilmington, and granddaughter of Robert Johnson, yeoman, and Catherine Hadley. Robert Johnson built the first grist-mill on the Brandywine. It stood immediately above the Brandywine bridge, on the north side of the stream. Elizabeth Sharpe was also the granddaughter of Joseph Bennett, one of the early shipping merchants of Wilmington, whose wife was a sister of Daniel Boone, of Kentucky fame.

The children of Eli and Elizabeth Sharpe were George, Jesse, Thomas, Sybilla and Joseph. George, the eldest, was given every opportunity of acquiring large success in the clothing business, in which he was established at an early age by his father. He died in August, 1844, leaving a widow and three children, all of whom have since died. Thomas learned brick-laying and was engaged in building the greater part of his life. He died in 1875, leaving a widow and seven children, four of whom are now living. Sybilla died at the age of fifteen. Joseph, the youngest son, was of a retiring disposition and most excellent character. He possessed a mathematical education, and never engaged in any business enterprise. He resided in Wilmington, with his aunt, who was his step-mother, until his death, which occurred Oct. 29, 1886. Several years after the death of his first wife, Eli Sharpe married her sister, Phebe Sharpe, by whom he had one child, Sarah E. Sharpe, who, with her aged mother, now in her ninety-first year, in the full possession of all her mental faculties resides in Wilmington.

Jesse Sharpe, the second son of Eli and Elizabeth Sharpe, first attended the Rankin Academy, on King Street, Wilmington, and finished his education, as did also his brothers, at the well-known school conducted by John Bullock in the same city, where he was a diligent student, and excelled all of his schoolmates in the study of mathematics. When quite a young man he received from the government the contract to run the line of mail-coaches from Wilmington down the Peninsula. He next became the proprietor of the HISTORY OF DELAWARE.

CHAPTER XLII.

NEW CASTLE HUNDRED.

This political sub-division of the county lies south and east of Christiana Creek, extending along the Delaware to the Red Lion Creek, thus forming a long narrow strip of land whose general characteristics are those of a low plain. In the northern part the surface is pleasantly undulated and small elevations are also found near Red Lion Creek. Much of the marshy land has been brought under cultivation and the soil generally is very fertile, giving the systematic farmer bounteous returns. Good roads and railroads have aided in developing and enhancing the value of these lands.

The fast lands in the territory embraced within the present limits of New Castle Hundred were warranted soon after the settlement of the country to the adventurous Swedish and Dutch pioneers, whose ambition appeared to be a desire to own baronial estates. The difficulty to hold and improve such large tracts of land in a new and sparsely-settled country, whose status was not yet determined by any line of governmental policy, caused many changes of ownership and also retarded the progress of the country in general. Like the early holdings in the neighboring hundreds, these first tracts of land were designated by local terms which have almost become obsolete. After the long interval of years since they were used, it is difficult to locate definitely all the tracts, but in the main they were, passing up the river from New Castle, Swanwyck, Craine Hook and Alrich's. Along the Christiana Creek were Long Hook, Jacquetti's, Swart Nutten's Island and Lewden's Island. The Commons, Tom's Lands, Alrich's, and the Pigeon Run Lands, occupied the lower part of the hundred.

Swanwyck was on the Delaware about one mile above New Castle, and its history is closely blended with that place. On the 20th of August, 1684, Derrick Fransen transferred his plantation at that place to Ambrose Baker. It had a river front of forty rods and extended back four hundred rods.

On Craine Hook, the next fast land above, the Royal Surveyor of Sweden, Magnus Kling, built his dwelling, facing the river, as early as 1640, but returned to Sweden soon afterward. Other Swedes settled here and a church was established, the predecessor of the Old Swedes' at Wilmington. Title to property was also vested in it, and after its decline this matter was a cause of prolific confusion. Other titles were in frequent dispute after the accession of the English, as may be learned from the following extracts from the court records December 3, 1679:

"Hendrick Lemmens, of Craine Hook, petitions that formerly the Magistrates granted him 100 acres, lying near ye more next to Crainehook from ye Badstone point, up along ye more, and which is not on record, and asked confirmation granted, provided it does not interfere with others granted." To this protest was made next court, January 16, 1680, by inhabitants of Cranehook, William Jans, Jean Matson, Tyman Jansen, Eshell Ambrose and Hendrick Andries, claiming the lands as common, and the granting would be the "utter Ruine" of the petitioners, they having no other place to "fetch wood from." The court decided "it shall remain in common to cut wood from until the lands are hereafter shared and divided."

The ensuing year the court ordered a warrant to issue, authorizing a survey of lands at Crane Hook, and November 2, 1681, Ephraim Herman, surveyor, reported as follows: "Laid out for Hendrick Andriessen, William Jansen and Tyman Jansen, inhabitants of Crane Hook, their land called Crane Hook, being formerly begun by ye surveyor, Walter Wharton, but not completed. The said land being situated on ye west syde of Delaware River, and on ye Lower syde of ye mouth of Christina Creek, 784 acres adjoining swamp divides it from Mount Poulsen's Island—Peter Claessen's land.

"The above-named persons having further aforesaid, each their different shers and proportions in ye above said tract of Land and Lykeways, their Home Lots apart, each different from ye other, wch being Layed out are as followeth, viz.—Hendrick Andriessen, in breadth 68 perches; William Jansen, 36 perches, 4 ft.; Hendrick Lemmens, 18 perches, 2 fl., and another lot 18 perches and 2 fl.; Eshell Andriessen, 18 perches, 2 fl.; Jean Matson, 36 perches, 4 ft.; Tyman Jansen, 86 perches." All lots as given fronted on the river, and ran back into the woods.

In September, 1683, Hendrick Everts owned lands on Crane Hook, previously owned by Hendrick Lemmens, Tyman Jansen and Evert Hendrieks, and the same year, at the court, September 4th, the old troubles between Hendrick Lemmens and the rest of the inhabitants broke out again in reference to the commons. The court then divided the commons and gave to Hendrick Everts six shares and the other eight shares—Hendrick Andries, three; Catharine Jansen, two; Eshell Andries, one; John Matson, two. The commons having been allotted to the inhabitants, the grave-yard was next made the subject for dispute between Lemmens and his neighbors, resulting in an action of trespass October 17, 1683, Hendrick Lemmens against Hendrick Andriessen, defendant. "Witness saw Andriessen take up fence at church-yard about the breadth of 3 pieces."

"Deft. alleges that he could prove ye former owner of Land had given sufficient power for enlarging ye Church-yard, and asked suspension till next court, when he can bring proof."

December 4, 1683, the case came up. Defendant says, "Land in controversy belongs to ye church, being given by ye first owner. Samuel Peters says he gave 30 feet to ye church. Richard Noble surveyed it."

All these lands passed into other hands, some of them two centuries ago, and Crane Hook ceased to have even local importance, after the church went down, in 1698. On November 1, 1699, Peter Mouns, of Brandywine Hundred, bought the Crane Hook Church property, consisting of one hundred acres.

Peter Alrich, who held office under the Dutch until 1674, and who was a magistrate under the English, between 1676 and 1688, reclaimed, in 1677, a tract of land on the south side of Christiana Creek, which had been purchased of the Indians, and which was confiscated in 1663, while belonging to him. This was improved by him and his descendants. One of them, Peter Sigfredus Alrich, lived in a house which is still standing. He died 1764, having willed his property to two sons, Lucas and Sigfredus, who divided it, April 27, 1780. Lucas had one hundred and ten acres on Christiana Creek and Delaware River; Sigfredus seventy-seven acres, of which forty-three were in the homestead, where, in 1785, he built the brick part of the house. The old part, of wood, is said to be over a hundred years older. His son, Peter S. Alrich, succeeded him, and died in 1861. His property was retained for twenty years, when it was sold by his executors, Lucas Alrich and Richard Jackson.

On July 28, 1881, one hundred and twenty-one acres were transferred to the Lobdell Car Wheel Company, of Wilmington. Thus passed out of the hands of the family a property which had been occupied by it for more than two hundred years.

Peter Alrich owned also the land now called Cherry Island Marsh, in Brandywine Hundred, and a marshy island called Apen Island, lying at the mouth of Red Lion Creek, opposite New Castle Hundred. It was one of those islands formed by marshes on the inland side.

It was confiscated in 1663, and June 20, 1665, was granted to William Tom. 1

Gov. Richard Nicolls, in granting this land to William Tom, says: "I have thought itt to give and grant, and by these presents do give and Ratifye, confirm and grant, unto the said William Tom, his heirs and Assigns, a certain island, with a plantation thereupon, heretofore belonging to Peter Alrich's, lying about seven miles below New Castle, toward the mouth of the river, the said island standing confiscated."

The lands on Long Hook were surveyed by Ephraim Herman on a warrant bearing date March 30, 1681, and were three hundred and eighty acres in extent. They adjoined the plantation of Jean Paul Jacquet. The latter had two hundred and ninety acres of land, and lived on it in 1684.

Between Fire Hook and Swart Nutten Island was a tract of five hundred acres, which was granted by Governor Nichols January 5, 1667, to John Erskin, Thomas Brown and Martin Garretson, and was to 1 William Tom, in 1672, became the clerk of the courts of New Castle and Upland, and remained clerk until 1676, when he was succeeded by Ephraim Herman. He was also a justice of the peace. He died about 1679, and was buried in St. George's Cemetery.

be equally divided among them. In 1681 this tract of land was sold to John Watkins and Charles Rumssey.

On the 24th of March, 1669, eight patents for land were issued for a tract of land on Fire Hook or Firme Hook, and Christiana Kill, or Creek, to John Erickson, Peter Meiër, Paul Puesen, Matthys Jansen, Olle Laersen, Hendrick Claess, Paul Laersen and Jurien Jansen for each a piece of land twenty rods on the creek or kill, and six hundred rods into the woods. At the same time the waste land was to be used in common. This tract was on Christiana Kill, southeast side. Arnoldus De Lagrange bought in later years six of the patents, and received a warrant from William Penn, dated February 21, 1683, which was surveyed by Thomas Pierson May 20, 1684, and returned as six hundred acres on the south side of Christiana Creek, within Fire Hook. It was sold to William Bedford in trust for the heirs of Sarah Williams Neering, formerly Sarah De Haes, daughter of Johannes De Haes.

A tract of land called Bank Lots was warranted by Richard Nichols January 1, 1667, as follows: "Whereas there is a certain parcel of Land and meadow ground or valley, situate, lying and being on Delaware River, on Christina Creek or Kill, between Swart Nutten Island, the Fyren Hooke, which is upon the said Kill, containing by estimation 500 acres, bounded on the north with Christina Kill, on west with Swart Nutten Island, on south with a little spring called Bossier, on the east with the said Fyren Hooke." This land was confirmed to John Erskine, Thomas Browne and Marten Garritsen.

Swart Nutten Island, after belonging to Vice-Director Hiniyossa, in 1667 passed to Gerard Otto, Thomas Wollaston and James Crawford, but soon after became the property of John Ogle, who resided there some time.

The latter, on June 3, 1678, for fourteen thousand pounds of tobacco and cash, conveyed to John Darby, of Maryland, "all that certain Island or parcel of land lying on south side of Christina Creek, commonly called by ye name of 'Swarte Nutten Island,' together with parcel of land on the main."

On the 1st of October, 1669, a patent was issued "to Thomas Wollaston for a parcel of land, lying and being on ye south syde of Swarte Nutten Island, bounded by Sergeant Askew's land on ye east and on ye west by James Crawford's, containing about one hundred acres of woodland. It being a hook of land commonly called by the name of Belys, wch said parcel of land lyes unplantid and unmanned, having no particular owner," and it was confirmed unto "Sergeant Thomas Wollaston, who came over into these partes in his Majeste service."

In August and September, 1729, Edward Blake and Jonathan Houston owned the island and "Bellys," and sold to John Lewden. The latter brought property in the hundred as early as 1696, but at the time of his death, in 1744, "dwelt on his plantation on the Island." By will he left five hundred acres of land to his sons John and Josiah, the tract including the "Fishing Place" on Christiana Creek. John had the southeast part of the estate and Josiah the rest. The former built a large brick house in 1770 on his land, opposite Christiana Bridge, where he lived until his death. Here later lived Jeremiah Lewden, his son, who died in 1840, and the homestead since that time has been occupied by his sons, Josiah and John. About two hundred and fifty acres of the original estate remain in the possession of the family.

In the old mansion, which was enlarged in 1815, is some very ancient and antique furniture. There are chairs and tables more than one hundred and fifty years old, and a clock two hundred and fifty years old, which was made at Nottingham by B. Chandler. The elder Josiah Lewden lived opposite Newport, where he built a large hip-roof house, which is still standing. This is one of the very few tracts of land in the hundred in which there has been a family succession since the seventeenth century.

Among other lands located in this section were those of John Ogle, November 2, 1681, who received an order from the court of New Castle for right to take up for his two sons, Thomas and John, each two hundred acres of land, and December 27, 1681, Surveyor Ephraim Herman, on above warrant, located four hundred and thirty-five acres, "called the fishing-place," on the southeast side of the south main branch of Christiana Creek.

In August, 1682, two hundred acres more were surveyed, bounded on the south by main branch of Christiana Creek, the tract being called Northampton.

On the 14th of March, 1782, John Lewden, Jr., purchased of John Watson a third interest in the tract called "Fish Point" (two hundred and five acres), on a small branch of Red Lion Run. On the north side of this stream was the large tract called "Hamburg," a part of which was conveyed to Charles Conner February 18, 1767.

Nearer New Castle, and on the Delaware, a large tract of land was disposed of by a Dutch patent as follows: "Alexander D. Hiniyossa, in behalf of the Right Lord Burgomaster of the city of Amsterdam, Gov. of Del. River, together with the Council, &c., grant unto Garrett Von Sweringer a piece of land consisting of meadow, valley and woodland, lying and being on the other side of the first Marsh, on the south of this fort of New Amstel, consisting in breadth along the Strand 1600 rods, and in length stretching S. E. & N. W. 2000 rods, upon condition to improve, fence, &c., and hold fealty to Lord Burgomaster of Amsterdam." "Signed by Hiniyossa at the forte Nieu Amstel, 3rd July, 1664."

This tract subsequently became the property of John Carr, and was sold at public outcry March 5, 1679, and was described as lying "On south syde of town between Great Kill Creek and Mr. Tom's Creek, extending along the River 1600 rods and..."
reaching back into the woods one mile and no more." The land was put up in four parts. "No. 1, the first quarter seated and improved by Anthony Bryant, who bought it. No. 2, bought by Mr. Peter Alrich for 270 gilders. No. 3, Peter Alrich, 310 gilders. No. 4, the lower quarter, Peter Alrich's, 540 gilders."

In 1683 Peter Alrich had a tract of land containing one thousand four hundred and seventy-three acres, bounded southwest by Tom's Run, and northwest by the King's Road, warranted to him, thus increasing his estate in that part of the hundred.

In December, 1680, Tom's land, including the island, was sold at public outcry by the administrator of the estate, John Williams being the purchaser. In 1702 a re-survey was made of a tract of the Alrich land lying between the mouth of the Red Lion Creek and Tom's Run, there being in all nine hundred and seventy acres. "It adjoined the 178 acre tract of Jacobus Alrich, lying on the Maryland road, &c."

In February, 1701, a tract of one thousand three hundred and seventy-seven acres below the town of New Castle was re-surveyed for Jasper Yeates, of Chester. One end of the land touched the Delaware River, and followed up the main branch of the Great Marsh. This was subsequently sold to other parties. In 1765 the lands on Pigeon Run and Red Lion Creek, one thousand one hundred acres in extent, were re-surveyed by George Deakaye.

In 1739 William Rhodes was the owner of a tract of land on Pigeon Run, called Poplar Neck, being at the confluence of the run with the Red Lion Creek. In 1760 John Elliott became the owner of one hundred and fifty acres of this tract, excepting half an acre thereof, "on which now stands an old meeting-house." On this tract was a grist-mill. It afterwards passed to Dr. James Couper, of New Castle, whose descendants still own it. Near here was the original Red Lion Inn, which was mentioned in 1765 in a transfer of property from Rhodes to Rhodes. This family became extinct many years ago, and part of their former estate now belongs to Samuel Silver.

On this farm is an Indian mound which is about one acre in extent. In shape it is a parallelogram, and rises to a considerable height. Trees and verdure cover its surface, giving the mound the appearance of being a huge emerald. Near by is a mineral spring of good quality. Indian relics have been found in great abundance in this locality, and Samuel Silver has made a collection numbering several thousand specimens.

On the old Lieutenant Porter farm, in this neighborhood, is a brick house built in 1748, which is in good condition. It was at one time a part of an estate embracing eight farms, and, after Porter's accidental death, became the property of General Foreman, of Maryland, through the marriage of the widow, and still later passed to George B. Rodney, of New Castle. Many changes in the ownership of the valuable lands of this part of the hundred have taken place; but the family of William Silver has been one of the largest holders of real estate since 1820.

John Read, the ancestor of the Read family, became possessed of a large estate in the hundred, and resided here part of the time. A portion of the estate was a farm of one hundred and eighty acres adjacent to Christiana Bridge, upon which was a large brick house, a store-house, wharf and landing, from which an extensive business was carried on with Philadelphia.

The Hon. George Read, before 1766, was in possession of a tract of land called "Stonum," which fronted on the Delaware and extended nearly to the southwestern boundary of the hundred. Along the river was an extensive marsh, upon which he expended large sums of money in embankments, which were broken and washed away. After the second freshet, which occurred in 1789, he sold the place.

Outside of the pursuits connected with agriculture, there are but few interests which engage the attention of the people of New Castle Hundred. Nor is its farming history as distinct or characterized by the same individuality as that of other localities in the county. Many large tracts of land are held by non-residents and are occupied by a class of citizens, whose tenure being uncertain, they do not become deeply interested in the affairs of their transient homes. The relation of Wilmington, New Castle City, Newport and other towns outside of the bounds of the hundred has prevented the founding of other villages, with their separate business histories. Nevertheless, there are a few points of local distinction which deserve mention. Fare's Corners (so called from an early settler at that point), a few miles from New Castle, at the intersection of two important highways, is the oldest continuous tavern-stand in the hundred. In 1859 the place was known as Quinn's Hotel, but soon after a new sign was supplied with a green tree painted on it and thereafter it was called the "Green Tree Inn," though the locality was still known as Fare's Corners. After a post-office with this name was established it became applicable to all interests. The tavern, originally a two-story brick building, has been enlarged and improved by the addition of another story. The place has lately become popular as a mart for the sale of cattle. Northeast, three miles from Wilmington, where the railroad crosses the main highway, a railway station, bearing the name of Fare's Corner was opened to the public May 16, 1866. It is a neat brick building in an attractive country. At this place are the fine County Alms-house and Insane Hospital, elsewhere described. And on the highway, nearer the city of Wilmington, is the "Great Northern and Southern Garden and Nursery," established by Randolph Peters. This enterprising horticulturist first engaged in the culture of fruit, especially the pear, at Newark in 1857, but in 1861 located a small garden two miles south of Wilmington, in New Castle Hundred. Finding the soil favorable for such operations, he extended the business, from year to year, until it had assumed large proportions, successfully carrying it on until his death, December 12, 1885. Since that time his family has retained control, with John S. Barnhart as general manager, in 1887. At this time the grounds embraced two hundred and forty-four acres, a large portion of it being set in nursery plants. All kinds of fruit trees are grown, but a specialty is made of the peach, and several valuable varieties have been...

originated here. Green-house and bedding plants are also extensively grown. The business gives employment to twenty-five men. Southeast from this place are the old Lander's Nurseries, which are not carried on as large a scale as in former years. Market gardening has engaged the attention of a number of persons in the hundred, and, although a profitable occupation, the acreage devoted to this purpose is still limited.

Bear Station, on the Frenchtown Railroad, nearly twelve miles from New Castle, is in a rich section of country and has proven a great accommodation for the people of that part of the county. It is a neat and well-arranged structure and was built in August, 1882. Lewis Fisher was appointed the first agent, and Henry W. Van dever at present serves in that position. In this locality was the old Bear Tavern, on the Cooper estate, which has been discontinued. It was kept in a frame building eighty years ago and before the building of the railroad, in 1831, was much patronized. The house was torn down about 1845.

One and a half miles south from Bear Station is the hamlet of Red Lion. It is a post-office and country trading point, having a church, stores, shops and half a dozen residences. The place took its name from the old Red Lion Inn, which was kept in this locality as early as the colonial times. It was on Pigeon Run, near the old Presbyterian meeting-house, and it is supposed that it was destroyed by fire. Another public-house was next opened in the present hamlet some time after the Revolution, which was kept by a French Huguenot lady named Elisie Roussiel. This building was of brick and wood, and the sign which advertised its hospitality to the public bore the image of a rampant red lion. It is still preserved by the Silver family, into whose possession the property, through marriage, passed some time after 1800. This famous hostelry was rebuilt in 1823 and was closed as a public inn about 1837, the railroad having diverted the patronage it formerly enjoyed. Some time before 1823 William Silver erected a store building in which he traded several years. Later he sold goods in the tavern building, which he also used as a residence. Since that time his son—William, Samuel, Albert and Henry M.—have here merchandised, and William F., a grandson, is at present in trade. The above were also the postmasters of the Red Lion office, kept in this store. Another trading-place was opened in 1848 by Richard Groves, which is now occupied by Richard Maloney. Mechanic shops were built by William Silver, and, during the Mexican War, government shoes were made in one of them by James McNamee.

On Pigeon Run, in the neighborhood of Red Lion, is an old mill-site which was abandoned more than sixty years ago, but traces of the raceway may still be seen. In 1769 John Elliot owned a tract of land near this stream of water, and purposing to build a mill, he petitioned, on December 11th, for condemnation of mill-land, and the court granted that he might have six acres upon which to build a good "water grist-mill." William and Robert Polk were owners of this property at a later period. The mill had but a small capacity. Five hundred yards below was a small saw-mill more than a century ago, which was at the head of tide-water navigation, and sloops sometimes loaded there. Since the country has been cleared up all these conditions have been changed and the run is now a very small stream.

Not far from 1848, Dr. Robert Sutherland, a Scotchman, located at Red Lion, and in addition to practicing medicine also taught school. In the latter avocation he was very successful, and introduced many new methods. He was instrumental in having the fine grove of trees around the school-house at Red Lion planted, and lived near the scene of his labors until his death, in September, 1886. The first schoolhouse in this locality was near the Indian Mound, on the Samuel Silver farm, but in 1853, the school-house at the hamlet was built. It was used until the present house took its place in 1882. The latter is an attractive building.

Opposite Christiana Bridge, in New Castle Hundred, a few interests of a business nature existed in former years. John Lewden had a tan-yard about the time of the Revolution, which he carried on until his death, when his son Jeremiah engaged in the same business until it was abandoned.

During the embargo of the War of 1812, Joseph Barr merchandised a short time in the Lewden mansion; and John Allen had a store for ten or fifteen years, nearly half a century ago, occupying a frame building. Later Charles Allen had a tavern at that place. Opposite stood a red house, which was also an inn, and when kept by Solomon Maxwell became a favorite resort for fox-hunters. This building has been removed, and for many years business has been wholly confined to Christiana Village proper.

In the northern part of New Castle Hundred a number of industrial establishments have been built up, but they have lately been taken within the bounds of Wilmington. In this locality was the powder-mill of M. Garresche, which blew up at eleven o'clock, on June 30, 1822, killing seven men. The manufacture of powder at this place has long since been discontinued, though carried on some years after that catastrophe.

The Religious interests of the hundred have ever been closely associated with those of contiguous towns, and some of the early churches were altogether absorbed by societies afterwards organized at Wilmington and New Castle. The Craine Hook Church thus passed out of existence in the seventeenth century, and the Bethel Baptist Church, and the Presbyterian Church on Pigeon Run, in more recent periods. The exact time when the latter was founded is indeterminate, but it must have been before 1730. It does not appear that a congregation was organized, but the building erected seems to have been a "chapel of ease" for the members of the New Castle Presbyterian Church, who resided in this locality. The frame building erected is spoken of in 1760 as an "old church," but may have given greater evidence of age than it possessed, on account of its neglected condition. It was destroyed by fire, and no building was put up in its place, since all those who formerly attended had removed or connected themselves with the church at Glasgow. But the grave-yard in which the church stood has been preserved to the present time. In it are interred members of the Bryan family (one stone bearing date 1738), the Aiken, Stewart, Ferris, Rhodes and Couper families. The latter's representatives keep the old cemetery in good condition, but it is now seldom used.

The Bethel Baptist Church was also begun as an outstation to another church, sustaining that relation to the Welsh Tract Baptist Church, which was nine miles west from the site of this meeting-house. Public services in this section were first held by a Mr. Boggs at the house of David Morton, some time before 1786. On one of these occasions the congregation, being too large for the building, was dispersed by a storm, which led Alexander Porter and John Lewden, two of the prominent citizens of the hundred, who were present, to conceive the idea of building a house of worship in that neighborhood which would accommodate all who might attend. Half an acre of land was secured from Ebenezer and Andrew Morton, the deed bearing date February 8, 1788; but the building may have been begun a short time earlier. The structure was thirty-eight by thirty-two feet, and was in use until the house was abandoned. The congregation worshipping in it became an independent organization in 1839, sixteen persons entering into membership. The church became connected with the Delaware Association, from whose minutes it disappears in 1871, and it soon after became extinct.

The Lebanon M. E. Church.—In 1819, Mrs. William Silver set aside one acre of land near the hamlet of Red Lion, upon which was built that year a Methodist Church with the above name. It was a plain structure of brick, thirty by forty feet, and had a gallery at the end for colored people. This house was used until 1853, when the present edifice at Red Lion took its place, the old church lot being used for burial purposes only. The new church was erected through the efforts of O. D. Jester, John L. Deputy, Mahlon Foster, Richard Graves, Obadiah Clark, Dr. Roderick Sullivan and others.

It is a two-story brick, forty by sixty feet, and is valued at five thousand dollars. Repairs in 1886 have given the church a modern appearance. In 1887 the property was in charge of Trustees Peter Cleaver, Ephraim Sterling, John Hastings, John M. Collins, William F. Silver and H. M. Silver.

The church has a membership of sixty-five, and the Rev. William A. Wise was the pastor since 1886. His predecessors, since being set off to Glasgow as an independent charge, have been the Revs. L. C. Andrews, Julius Dodd and William R. Sears. Prior to 1880 the ministerial service was in connection with other churches in the southern part of the county.

The Union American Methodist Church (Colored) is in the neighborhood of Christiana Bridge. It was built on half an acre of land received from the estate of Jeremiah Lewden, and the first structure was a small frame, put up in 1819. In 1850 the present house was built, a plain brick, thirty by forty feet, with galleries on three sides, in which meetings have since been stately held. The congregations are usually large, those attending coming from a large scope of country outside of the hundred. A part of the church lot is devoted to burial purposes, and among those there interred was the Rev. William Williams, who died February 19, 1878.

CHAPTER XLIII.

THE CITY OF NEW CASTLE.

A period of nearly fifty years elapsed from the time Hendrick Hudson discovered the Delaware Bay and River, in 1609, before a town was regularly built. At various times prior to 1655 small military posts were established on the banks of the Delaware, around which clustered a few habitations. The settlement at Fort Christina began to assume a regular form, when it was almost destroyed at the time of its capture, September 25, 1655. The Dutch soon after rebuilt it more systematically. Under the Swedes this settlement was called Christina Haven, but under the Dutch settlement to April 25, 1657, it became known as Fort Altena, and was known by this title until its abandonment, which was soon after the territory passed into the hands of the English, in 1664.

Early explorers were quick to recognize the advantages of this locality as the site for a town, and took measures to obtain possession of the same. On July 19, 1661, Governor Petrus Stuyvesant purchased from the Indians, in the name of the West India Company, all the land lying between the Minquas Creek (now Christiana Creek) and Bomtide Hoeck (now Bombay Hook), or to the mouth of Duck Creek. About one Dutch mile, or four English miles, below the mouth of Minquas Creek was a promontory of fast land, jutting out into the Delaware. This point, known as Sand Hoeck, and commanding an extensive view up and down the Delaware, was used by Governor Stuyvesant as a site for Fort Casimir, all traces of which have since been washed away. The fort is believed to have been between Harmony and Chestnut Streets, below Front, in the present town of New Castle.

The erection of this fort so near the Swedish settlement created dissatisfaction, which culminated in the conquest of the Swedes, September 16, 1655, when all this territory passed into the possession of the Dutch. When the fort capitulated, thirty Swedes took the oath of allegiance, together with a number who had settled near the fort.

On November 29, 1655, Jean Paul Jacquet, who had been in the service of the West India Company, was appointed Vice-Director on the Delaware Bay and River, with full civil and military powers, and became the founder and first ruler of New Castle.

Vice-Director Jacquet took the oath of office December 8, 1655, and soon appointed a Council, consisting of Andreas Hudde, Elmerhuyzen Cleyen and two sergeants, Gyasbert Bracy and Hans Hopman, who, in addition to their military duties, governed the town.

Among the instructions given to the Vice-Director, concerning the settlements, were the following:

"In distributing land he must, above all, take care that villages be formed of at least ten or twenty families together, and in order to prevent the immediate desire for land, he shall, in places of title, exact from each morgen of land, provisionally, twelve stivers annually.

"He shall not grant building or farm lots on the edge of the valley of Fort Casimir, but in the interior till and the afternoon of the Fort, nor bind him, but he shall reserve the land for reinforcments and outworks of the Fort; likewise, in order to favor more the concentrated settlements on the south side of the Fort, he shall upon occasion clear a good street both in and out of the same, and also lay out a convenient order and lots of about forty to fifty feet in width, and one hundred feet in length, the street to be at least four or five rods wide."

On December 28, 1655, the Council gave a hearing to several Indian sachems in the presence of the Honorable Vice-Director, Andrews Hudde, Gyasbert Bracy, Elmerhuyzen Cleyen, Sanders Boyer and several others. The Indians presented the following propositions:

"First. That some promises had been made to them by the former Commander, Dirck Smith, in regard to the trade, that the goods should be raised.

"Second. They demanded, with great circumspection and ample volubility, changes in the trade, making a piece of cloth for 2 deer and so forth of other merchandise in proportion.

"Third. They requested that whereas it had rather been customary to make some presents to the Chief, it would be proper now in confirmation of the treaty."

To these propositions the Council replied with pledges of friendship; giving the purchasers of Indian game the right to buy where they chose, and promising the presents in a few days. The following day the residents of Fort Casimir "assented willingly to the propositions" of the Indians and signed the appended subscription "with the exception of Isaac Israel and Isaac Cordoa, who refused to give their consent and prepared to leave the river and give up their trade rather than assist, with other good inhabitants, in maintaining the peace of the highway."

The subsidy was as follows:

On February 9, 1656, a plantation was granted to Jacobus Crabbage, on and near Steenbaker's Hoeck, (Brickmaker's Hook), below and adjacent to Fort Casimir. On February 12, 1656, the Council ordered "That by the middle of March every one shall have enclosed his plantation and lot under a penalty of six guilders, for all those who shall be found having acted against this order."

On February 23, 1656, Constantina Eronenburch was granted possession of the "lot of Claes Jans, the carpenter, next to the lot of Reynier Dominicus, on the north side, before the first row," and Elias Guldengreis, was granted a piece of land under the fort where he could erect a house and gain a living.

On November 8, 1656, the whole community was called together at the fort, and informed that it was necessary to appoint two inspectors of tobacco. The meeting elected Moen Andriesen and William Maurit. At the same time the people were informed that a bridge was necessary over the kill, running by the fort, and the following Monday was set apart to build it. It was decided that each inhabitant should fence his fields, and Herman Jansen and Jno. Eckhoff were elected overseers and surveyors of fences.

On January 10, 1657, the community was assembled at Fort Casimir, and informed by the Council that "some people do not hesitate to ruin the trade with the Indians, by running up the price of deer-skins by more than one-third their value to the great and excessive disadvantage of the poor community here."

The community fixed upon a scale of prices, and also decided that for the first violation of them, the person was to be deprived of trading for one year; for the second offense, punished according to orders; and for the third to be expelled altogether from the river, which the Council agreed to have promptly executed. The prices established were, "For a merchantable beaver two strings of wampum; for a good bear skin, worth a beaver, two strings of wampum; for an elk skin, worth a beaver, two strings of wampum; otters accordingly. For a deer skin, one hundred and twenty wampum, foxes, caumants, racoons and others to be valued in proportion."

The Herman Jansen mentioned here was one of the witnesses of an Indian deed, dated April 9, 1649, which conveyed to the Dutch all the land between Rancocas Kill and what is now Burlington, N. J. Alexander Boyer and Cornelius Mauris were parties to the deed, and Thomas Broun (Bruyn), Jan Andriesen, Antony Petersen were witnesses, and were all later identified with the settlement of New Castle.

two by three hundred feet.

On December 19, 1656, the directors of the West India Company transferred by deed to the burgomaster of the city of Amsterdam all the land from Christina Creek to Bompitie Hook (Bombay Hook). The account of this transaction was sent to Peter Stuyvesant, who wrote to the authorities of Fort Casimir, by letter dated April 12, 1657, that the new colony was to be called “New Amstel,” and Jacob Alrichs was appointed the representative of the city. By this change, Christinaham became the fort of the West India Company, its name being changed to Fort Altena, and William Beekman was appointed commissionary October 8, 1658.

On March 20, 1657, Jan Schaggen, one of the settlers at the fort, made a complaint to Director-General Stuyvesant against the Vice-Director Jac-quett, charging him with driving him off from land where he lived with consent of Stuyvesant and of Nicholas Stille, Fiscal Schout, of New Amsterdam, thereby causing the loss of one thousand pounds of tobacco. A similar complaint was also made by others, and on April 20, 1657, Jacquet was removed from the office of Vice-Director by Stuyvesant and ordered to transfer and deliver the property of the company to Andreas Hudde, Jan Juriansen and Sergeant Paulus Jansen, who were to remain in command until relieved. Jacquet was placed under arrest and ordered to prepare his accounts for exca-mination and his case for trial. After his deposition he continued to reside at New Amstel several years.

Under the directorship of Jacquett, the little village at Fort Casimir had grown to considerable importance as the shipping point for South or Delaware River. Wharves and store-houses had been built, streets laid out and many houses erected. Tobacco was the staple product, its manufacture the most extensive industry of the settlers, and it was largely used as currency. Drying and packing-houses were erected in the village, and there were inspectors to examine all tobacco and see that it was properly cured, packed and weighed.

The prosperity of the community attracted the attention of persons interested in emigration, and various schemes for its settlement were devised and encouraged by governmental support. Among others, a company of one hundred and sixty-seven Hollanders, under the auspices of the city of Amsterdam, onorganized a colony to settle in Delaware under the direction of Jacob Alrichs. An agreement was made between the burgomaster of Amsterdam and the colonists, whereby they were to be transported with their families and furniture to Delaware, where a fortified city or town was to be laid out on the river, with streets, lots and a market-place. A schoolmaster was also to be provided. The city was to make provision for one year's clothing, food and garden seeds and build a large store-house. Three burgomstasters were to be chosen from the people and five or seven schepens, whom the Director was to select.
When the town had two hundred families or more, they were to choose a Common Council, consisting of twenty-one persons, who were to act with the burgos-masters and schepens in the government of the town.
A schout or high sheriff was also to be appointed.
The city agreed to divide the lands about the town into fields for plowing, meadow and pasture, every farmer to have as many morgens of land as he could improve and use for grazing. A failure to accomplish this was to result in the forfeiture of the land. Ships from Holland were to bring over corn, merchandise, etc.

The colonists were to have the privilege of chartering private ships, but their cargoes were to be consigned to the city of Amsterdam, which was to provide storehouses, sell the goods and return the proceeds, deducting therefrom two per cent. The colonists were also allowed to cut from the forests, not granted to settlers, any wood they might require for building purposes and to hunt and fish freely in the woods and waters. After the directors of the West India Company had sold to the city of Amsterdam the land below the mouth of Christiansa Creek, they wrote on the 19th of December, 1656, to Petrus Stuyvesant, concerning the “Prins Mauritius” and the other vessels of the colony, that were intending to sail, “That you not only assist herein the Director of said Colony, but also help him in everything, with advice and deed. As we have heard that there lives on the Bowery of the late Mr. Markham a certain party as being well versed in engineering and sur-voying, who consequently might be of service to the New Colony as well as laying out the lots chosen for the dwelling-houses of the Colonists as in other ways, Therefore your Honors will upon request, persuade the engineer thereto and let him make a good begining and location there.”

About the 1st of March, 1657, the colony embarked for New Amsterdam as follows: In the ship “Prins Mauritius,” about one hundred and twelve persons, including sixteen officers and sailors. On the ship “De Beer,” thirty-three persons, on the “Bever,” eleven persons, and some on the “Geldrose Blow.” The “Prins Mauritius,” with Vice-Director Alrichs, on board, was stranded off Long Island and delayed for some time, but subsequently reached New Amstel, and Jacob Alrichs as Vice-Director assumed command about the 1st of May, the same year. On August 10, 1657, he appointed Andreas Hudde secretary and surveyor. On May 8, 1657, Alrichs reports to Stuyvesant the condition of the colony and time. He later established the village of New Utrecht in Long Island.

says they are very much in need of oxen and horses. "As to cows there are but two which give milk and little at that." Pigs were few in number and wild.

Soon after the colonists had located, the ship "De Waegh" and the galliot "New Amstel" began making trips from Amsterdam to New Amstel, with merchandise and returning with tobacco. Alich, in a letter to Stuyvesant, dated September 16, 1657, says: "As to sending the galliot to Fort Orange (now Albany, N. Y.), it would be very useful and necessary, for we need bricks here very much at least for the chimneys, and otherwise, and some boards to make the houses tight, and I have no objection that she were loaded with bricks and boards, to wit, as many thousand bricks as she can conveniently take in with three or four hundred boards. The "New Amstel" went to Fort Orange and returned to the colony of New Amstel on the 7th of November, the same year, laden with bricks in addition to two hundred and fifty boards. About eight thousand of the bricks were given to the commandant of Fort Altena to use in building the fort. On October 4, 1657, Vice-Director Alich wrote that he had purchased thirty cows; and November 14th, says: "For the present I need 8 or 10 barrels of bacon, 4000 lbs. of flour, 30 scheepels of grey peas, 20 sch. of barley, also 100 scheepels of good oats for the horses, as I am scantily supplied with forage for the animals during the winter and have received about 70 head of cattle from Virginia." At this time he was negotiating for a "Horse Mill," as they were "unable to grind corn and other grains."

The winter of 1657 and 1658 was passed in building a store-house, dwelling for the Commissary Gerrit Von Sweeringen (who was supercargo of the "Prins Maurit" at the time she was stranded, and later sheriff of the territory), and adding another story to the house where he lived, in the fort, and in building a new guard-house.

On March 30, 1658, Vice-Director Alich wrote that the farm lots were given by lottery in charge of Hudde and Fabryh Spelen, and June 26, 1658, says: "In regard to the distribution of lots, first at the time of my arrival, about eight days or more passed before I made progress in it, because there was scarcely one lot which could be disposed of, as one or the other or more laid claim to it, and henceforth they were distributed by drawing lots. Andreas Hudde, in June last, surveyed for all and every one, colonists, soldiers and officers, as much as each has asked and signed for. And now the men who wanted one hundred morgens, they were granted without the least objection."

On September 5, 1658, Vice-Director Alich called for another order of Fort Orange brick and says: "I have given them out mostly to the inhabitants to make chimneys, also between seven and eight thousand for the building or the masonry in Fort Altena."

October 7, 1658, he says: "Jan Jouriens, the Commissary, at Fort Altena, has again, de novo, demanded eight thousand bricks for necessary buildings there, which I have partly delivered to him."

The ship "De Meulin" was then at the wharf discharging freight, a part of which was brick. But the following spring Cornelis Herpers De Jager established a brick kiln near New Amstel, in which four men were employed.

On May 14, 1658, Vice-Director Alichre explained to the Governor that the cause of the backwardness of the settlement was failure of the harvest, scarcity of food and great mortality. He said, "I have found that of all the free Netherlanders who were settled here upon our arrival, have as yet, in our time, not gathered one scheel of grain. Those who came with and after us have not done much more, nor could they contribute anything, as the time in the first year was consumed with the erection of their houses and making gardens, as well as with the building and hauling together the materials, that the summer passed without bringing much seed into the ground."

He appealed to the Directors at Amsterdam for assistance, and in the course of time vessels arrived with the necessaries for which they suffered.

On September 4, 1659, Director Stuyvesant wrote to the Directors at Amsterdam, in Holland: "The city's affairs on the South River are in a very deplorable and low state. It is to be feared that if no other and better order is introduced it will be ruined altogether. It is certainly true that the people begin to run away in numbers, as, for instance, while I write this there arrived from there an English Ketch which went there with some provisions from Boston three weeks ago; the skipper, a well-known and trustworthy man, says, that during his stay of fourteen days at the South River, about fifty persons, among them whole families, ran away from there to Virginia and Maryland. This "running away" on the part of the people was caused by the "too great preciseness of Mr. Alich, who refuses passports to these places to the people, who offer to pay their passage."

An earlier letter of Vice-Director Alich to Governor Stuyvesant represented matters in the colony as being in a still more serious way, and spoke of a panic, to which Stuyvesant did not even allude. He said: "We have heard here that Mr. Fendal, who is now in behalf of Lord Balthus Moor (residing in Old England), Governor of Maryland, has strict orders to make a close inquiry and investigation concerning the limits and jurisdiction in his district in these latitudes, and in case they are in some body's possession, to notify the same of it, summon to surrender it and do his further duties according to his power, and the circumstances of the case. This now having become public has caused such fright and disturbance among most of the inhabitants, that thereby all work has been stopped and every one endeavors to fly, to remove and look out, for getting away in safety." He mentions three or four persons, carpenters, who ask for passports to Manhattan, pretending that they wish to purchase provisions, but who return to the "Fatherland," and requests that they be sent back, in the galliot, "to prevent damage and detriment which, through bad seasons, death and continuous sickness and pining, have pressed us here hard enough."

The Directors in Holland wrote to Stuyvesant in reply and urged him to endeavor to modify his "too great preciseness." The effort caused Vice-Director Alrichs to write to the Directors a long and detailed letter, reciting the affairs of the colony, which seemed to be satisfactory to the Directors, but not so to Stuyvesstant, who continued to write against Alrichs. A long correspondence ensued between Stuyvesant and the Directors in Holland, on one part, and Alrich on the other, in which each attempted to evade the responsibility attaching to this state of affairs, but which failed to reconcile the matter before the death of Vice-Director Alrichs, December 30, 1659, put an end to the controversy.

Vice-Director Alrichs was succeeded by Lieutenant Alex. De Hinijossa, who summoned a new Council, John Crato becoming counselor and Gerrit Von Sweeringen secretary, with others to act in extraordinary cases.

Under the directorship of Alex. Hinijossa, differences arose between him and the people, and also with William Beeckman, the commissary of the West India Company at Fort Altena. Complaints against him were made to the proper authorities. A horse mill for grinding grain had been brought here by Director Alrichs, and the testimony in the trial on the complaints held June 8, 1662, at Fort Altena, by Commissary Beeckman, brought out the fact that the ship
"De Purmerlander Kerck," which arrived a few months previous, brought from the city of Amsterdam to the colony mill-stones, a brass kettle, etc., and that Hinijossa had sold these and other property of the company to some Englishmen from Maryland for one thousand pounds of tobacco. The witnesses in this case were all residents of New Amstel, and were in business there,—Francis Creger, Cornelis Martensen, factors; William Cornelis Werckvreyer, merchant; Hendrick Kyp, brewer; and Fopp Jansen Outhout, tavern keeper. The complaints against Vice-Director Hinijossa continued, and he was recalled to Amsterdam, April 11, 1668, but returned and remained Vice-Director until the surrender to the English the next year.

In 1662, Jean Willems, Peter Peterson, Harder and Joos de La Grange were members of the Council of New Amstel, and Jacob de Commer was surgeon of the colony.

On September 27, 1662, Commissary Beekman, of Fort Altena, writes that some Englishmen went to Horekill for one Turck, who was then in the service of Peter Alrichs—at that time commissary at Horekill—who had run away, or was captured by the savages and bought of them by Peter Alrichs. The Englishmen carried him to New Amstel, and on the way Turck attacked them and wounded two of them. He was placed in prison at New Amstel, and Vice-Director Hinijossa refused to deliver him to the Englishmen, on the ground that he had committed a crime in the colony, and ordered that he be hung, his head cut off and placed upon a post or stake in the Horekill. But it does not appear that his sentence was carried out. During the administration of De Hinijossa, several new industries were established which extended the business of New Amstel. Prior to 1662 he erected a brewery in the fort, and a warehouse and store-house were also built, which induced vessels to unload their goods at this point.

On July 28, 1663, "Skipper Peter Luckassen touched here, and landed about sixty farm laborers and girls, with a quantity of ammunition and other commodities."

In the early part of 1663 De Hinijossa sold his house, where the schoolmaster, Arent Eversen, lived, to Jan Webber; and other important transfers of property were made.

After the capitulation of the Dutch, in 1664, New Amstel became the seat of government of the English. Sir Robert Carr was placed in command for a short time, and was succeeded, October 24, 1664, by Col. Richard Nichols. Sir Robert Carr, in his instructions, dated September 3, 1664, was commanded:
"That for six months next ensuing, the same magistrates shall continue in their office, provided they take the oath of allegiance to his majesty."

Col. Richard Nichols, April 10, 1666, in a letter to the Secretary of State, England, asked, in consideration of the services of Sir Robert Carr, Capt. John Carr and Ensign Arthur Stock, that the "Houses and lands of the principal Dutch officers" be conferred upon them as follows: "Gov. Hinijossa's Island to Sir Robert Carr; High Sheriff Garret Von Sweeringen's Houses and Lands, to Capt. John Carr; and the land of Dutch Ensign Peter Alrichs to Ensign Arthur Stock," which was granted. Under English rule the courts were organized according to the instructions given for the settlement of the government on the Delaware River, dated April 21, 1668, which designated as magistrates Hans Block, Israel Helme, Peter Rambo, Peter Cocke and Peter Alrichs, who, with the schout,1 or high sheriff, were empowered to hear and determine all cases.

On October 5, 1670, Capt. John Carr, the commandant of the fort at New Castle, the names of both Fort Altena and New Amstel having been changed by the English, made a proposal to the Council regarding fortifications, markets, etc., in re-response to which it was

"Resolved, That the market-place where the bell hangs was the most convenient site on which to erect a block-house."

In June, 1671, the government, the town and country around New Castle received the attention of 1 The office of schout was changed to high sheriff by a council held at Fort James, N. Y.

the Council at Fort James, N. Y., and several propositions were submitted by Capt. Carr. The Council was asked to protect the trade on the river; to regulate the distillation of liquor and supervise the "Vicuillers or Tappers of Strong Drink;" to empower the authorities to appoint a "Corne Meter," who may not only ye corne duly measure, but prevent sending it thereof abroad foul, by ordering it to be well cleaned; and, also, that ye officer have an inspection, to View the Beef and Pork, that it be well packed and merchantable. These propositions were granted.

On June 14, 1671, it was ordered that "No vessel shall be permitted to go up ye river above New Castle to Traffic," which prohibition was continued nearly two years, being removed January 27, 1673. Distillers were to give their names to the officers of New Castle, and to "pay one gilder per can for all strong liquor, to be applied to the building of a new block-house." A highway was to be cleared between New Castle and Augustus Herman's plantation, Bohemia Manor, "provided Maryland would do her part."

The only road from New Castle, prior to this time, of which any mention has been made, was the one leading up to Tinicum. The first determined movement under English rule toward establishing highways, building bridges and creating ferries began at a special court, held by Governor Andros, at New Castle, May 13-14, 1675. The minutes of that session show that "Capt. Carr's meadow at the north end of the Town being represented to the Court to be a general nuisance to the place and the country as it now is, there being neither bridge nor fitting way to pass by or through it, and that the Town is in great straight for want of it, as they might improve it, it is ordered that the said meadow ground shall be apprized by indifferent persons and the Town to have the refusal; but whoever shall enjoy it shall be obliged to maintain sufficient bridges and ways through the limits thereof with a cartway; the apprizers to be two persons appointed by the magistrates of the place and two more by the Court of Upland and the apprimizement to be returned in to the next court held in this Towne."

At the same court it was ordered: "That these orders about highways and bridges be put in execution by the Magistrates within the space of three months after ye date hereof, or else the Sheriff shall have power to have it done and the Country to pay double the charge."

A ferry boat was also needed and it was ordered that "a Ferry Boate be maintayned at the Falls on ye west side. A horse and man to pay 29 guilders, a man without a horse 10 stivers."

The town dike of New Castle was authorized to be built by the magistrates of the town June 4, 1675. But prior to this the small "Mistress Block's Dike" had been dug, but does not seem to have been kept in good repair. The order for the construction of the sends "That all the inhabitants as above should meet in the Towne, the fourth of June, there to hear read o' determination w as accordingly done in the Church, but after the reading and being opposed (see returning from the Church) by some of this Towne and a number of the inhabitants w out in such a mutinous and tumultuous manner, being led on by Fabricius, the priest, Jacob Van Vere, John Ogle, Bernard Egge, Thomas Jacobson, Juryn Bratesman, Mathew Smyth, Evert Hendrickson and several others, some having swords, some pistols others clubs wth them w as such detestful language, saying they want make neither the one nor the other, that they could not longer be forborne in so much that Capt. Castwell, High Sheriff, by our consent, calling for the Constable, layd hold of the priest and Ogle, and sent them on board of the Sloope, wth intention for New Yerke, to y Honor, but the tumult thereupon arising, upon their going on board, cursing and some crying "fatt them on fatt them on" w being most drunk and wee not knowing w height it might come, they being in such a humor, still crying and all wee were inforced to send for them from on board and discharge them, w asaid mutinous way of proceedings, we hope yo' hono' will not allow it and impossi- ble for us to get justice according to the best of o' knowledge, when all of o' accounts shall be disputed by a plebian faction w will not only force us to leave the bench, but will expose the country to great charges when upon occasion their frenzial braynes please."
NEW CASTLE COUNTY.

He further stated that Mr. De Haes would wait upon his honor in a few days and would transmit his answer and order in the matter, and suggested the propriety of sending two files of soldiers to the river to "keep the people in awe and us in security."

The magistrates gave to the Governor the following reasons for their orders about the dykes:

"First, To obey the Hon'ble General's order concerning roads to be made from one village to the other. No wagon or cart roads could be made unless the aforesaid dykes and flood-gates had been con- structed to keep out the water.

"Second. There are only a few here, who have a knowledge of such work, especially among the people of New Castle, and they have been compelled to pay their workmen from 30 to 40 guilders a day for such work, so that the people who wanted to labor have earned much and nobody would have lost more than five or six hours work on the public dike and three or four hours on Hans Block's dike.

"Third. All inhabitants, country people and strangers, would have been compelled to go five or six English miles through the woods to reach Sweeneuyck, which is not more than one English mile from here. Now that Mr. Hans Block's dike has been made, although he could make his hay without repairing his dike, as it can be made on other marches without dike, he has nevertheless made sixteen parts of his dike at his own expense, besides one-fourth of the dike which had already been made, and has also paid the expenses of making a flood-gate and everything needed thereof; so that the taxmasters had not the least reason or cause to make reflections about it or to vent their foul language.

"Fourth. In case of a war with the savages or other enemies, especially during winter, when the river is closed, it would be very dangerous for us and for our nearest neighbors to go 5 or 6 English miles through the woods in order to assist each other, we need each other in diverse emergencies every day. We request the Hon'ble General to consider the foregoing reply while we rely on your Hon'ble's sound judgment to decide whether we have given the least lawful reason to the community to resist our order and to mutiny."

"H. Block."
"G. Moult."
"Dirck Albertsen."

The Council at New York June 23, 1675, ordered "That some person be sent thither about it. The Governor will think of some fitting person. That with y person to be sent to Delaware two yres of soldiers or some other force will be sent likewise."

On the following day the Council ordered that warrants be sent to Delaware for "Jacobus Fabricius and John Ogle as Ringleaders to make their appearance here to answer y misde manner objected agst. them, touching y late disturbance." The warrants were dated June 26th and forwarded; and on September 26, 1675, it was ordered "That y said Magister Fabricius, in regard of his being guilty of what is laid to his charge and his former irregular life and conversation be suspended from exercising his functions as a Minister or preaching any more within this government, either in publice or private."

The magistrates of New Castle, not in the least intim- idated by the rebellion against their order, directed the people to obey it and, in case of refusal, the high sheriff was to execute the work at the double amount of their expenses. It was delayed, however, for some time, and the order of the magistrates was confirmed by the Governor and the Council, September 15, 1675.

The dikes were built soon after and in November of the same year Walter Wharton was appointed to survey the same. He made report December 5, 1676, "of the length of the Town Dike and Mistress Block's Dike, it being the new works" as follows: "Martin Garretson's part, three hundred and six feet; Hendrick Johnson's part, three hundred and eighteen feet; Peter De Witt's part, five hundred and nineteen feet."

"The whole length of Town Dike, allowing twelve feet for the sluice, is eleven hundred and forty-three feet; Mistress Block's Dike eight hundred and fifty- two feet."

Ten years later the dikes were repaired at the ex- pense of those having a proprietary interest in the commonage, as the former meadow of Captain Carr was then called, and the commonage was subsequently divided by lot, with the understanding that the dikes were to be kept in repair by those holding an interest in it.

In 1676 all vessels going up and down the river were required to load and discharge their cargoes at New Castle.

In the fall of 1681, James Pierson, brickmaker and bricklayer, was given a double lot for a brick-yard.

On November 9, 1682, the establishment of a weekly public market 1 was ordered by the court. The old

1 This market was at a place known as "Market Plain," and occupied part of the square which has since been used by the public of New Castle. At the upper end, about where the Immanuel Church now stands, was the fort and improvements pertaining thereto. In 1689, the proprietor, through William Markham, ordered the bounds of the square to be established, and five years later titles to the lot on which the fort stood were given to Robert French and later to Colonel Win. Markham, who subsequently transferred it to Jasper Yeates, from whom title has descended.
market-place at the fort was adopted as the site and each Saturday from 10 A.M. to 4 P.M. as the hours.

In 1726 leave was granted to Wessel Alrichs by Governor William Keith to establish a ferry from New Castle to Salem, in New Jersey, which increased the trade of the town to a considerable extent.

In 1729 another market was established, with Philip Van Leuvenigh as clerk, and Wednesday and Saturday were appointed market days. Every baker was required to mark, letter name or brand every loaf of bread he baked, each one to be of certain weight, or liable to seizure. The clerk was authorized to erect stalls, or booths, and to rent the same to those wishing them.

On April 5, 1748, the justices of the court at New Castle directed a letter to Richard Peters, one of the Council of the proprietors, stating that French and Spanish privateers were cruising about in Delaware Bay, and as New Castle was exposed to their attacks, and the records were in danger, they asked that John Mackey, prothonotary recorder, etc., be permitted and instructed to remove all the papers and books of the county to some safe and commodious house in Christiana Bridge. To this Richard Peters replied, April 14th, that if, in their judgment, it was best, to let it be done.

New Castle Incorporated.—The authorities at Fort James gave New Castle its original independent local government on May 17, 1672, in the following order:

"That for ye better government of ye Towne of New Castle, for the future, the said Towne shall be erected into a Corporacon by the name of a Balywick. That is to say, it shall be governed by a Bayley and six assistants, to be at first nominated by the Governor, and at ye expiration of a year four of the six to go out and four others to be chosen in their places, the Bayley to continue for a year, and then two to be named to succeed, out of whom the Governor will elect one. Hee is to reside in all of ye corts of the Towne, and have a double vote. A Constable is likewise to be chosen by ye Bench. The Towne Court shall have power to try all causes of debt or damage, to the value of ten pounds, without appeal. That ye English Laws, according to the desire of the inhabitants, bee established, both in ye Towne and all Plantations upon Delaware River."

Captain John Carr was chosen bailiff and high-sheriff; William Tom was one of the assistants. Nothing of importance occurred until the Dutch again came into possession, from the middle of 1673 to the middle of 1674; then those who were in office when the Dutch were in power resumed authority until the recapture the following year, when the late English officials were restored. Subsequently the courts again controlled its affairs until June 3, 1797, when an act was passed establishing the boundaries of the town of New Castle, and its local history became more distinct. Five commissioners were appointed to carry out the provisions of the act. They were Dr. Archibald Alexander, John Crow, John Bird, Nicholas Van Dyke and George Read, the younger, who held their first meeting July 14, 1799, and appointed Daniel Blaney surveyor. A map was made and the plat ordered placed in the recorder's office at New Castle.

The citizens living within the limits fixed by these commissioners were assessed, June 12, 1798, the entire levy being $800.09 on a valuation of $107,105.

The following citizens owned more than four hundred dollars' worth of property each:

New Castle was incorporated as a city under an act of the General Assembly, February 25, 1875, and the first election was held on the second Tuesday in April, 1875, when Edward Challenger, Mark M. Cleaver and William H. Jefferson were commissioners. T. Giffin was elected mayor; Samuel Eckles, president of the Council, and Geo. A. Maxwell, clerk. Thomas Giffin continued as mayor until 1890, and William Herbert was president of the Council from 1877 until 1886. Since that time George W. Dickerson has filled that office. William F. Lane has been treasurer since 1878. L. E. Elison, H. R. Borie, Frank E. Herbert and James L. Rice have served as clerks. From 1880 to 1886, Samuel H. Black was mayor, and was succeeded by the present incumbent, Julian D. Janvier.
The municipal office is in the old Court-House, and the new form of government has resulted in many public improvements. The streets have been gradually improved, and the police regulations have elevated the order and moral tone of the community.

The Union Fire Company was organized in March, 1796, as a volunteer association with twenty-nine members. A fund of four hundred and sixty-eight dollars was subscribed, twenty leather buckets were bought, and Archibald Alexander and John Bird were appointed a committee to purchase an engine, which they secured for four hundred dollars. Among the early officers were: President, James Booth; Secretary, David Morrison; Treasurer, Thomas Bond; Engineers, George Pierce and Thomas Turner. In 1806 the membership included Nicholas Vandyke, M. King, T. Walraven, J. McCalmont, W. C. Frazier, J. Bowman, M. Kennedy, John Bird, James Riddle, Evan Thomas, C. P. Bennett, Kensey Johns, Henry Colesberry, Thomas Bond, Wm. Armstrong, Charles Thomas, John Janvier, Thomas Magens, John Crow, Hugh W. Ritchie, Jacob Bellville, John Panton, Christopher Weaver and Alexander Duncan.

On January 23, 1804, the company became an incorporated body. At different times the Levy Court appropriated money, and in 1823 contributed toward the erection of an engine-house. The Union Fire Company disbanded about 1840. Subsequently to 1820 an opposition company, called the Penn, was formed, and a spirited rivalry existed for several years between the two organizations.

On April 25, 1824, New Castle was visited by the most disastrous fire in its history, resulting in a loss of one hundred thousand dollars. The conflagration originated in the house of James Riddle, and before it was controlled, the residences and stores of James Riddle, J. Bowman, Thomas Janvier, H. W. Ritchie, J. & E. McCullough, Dr. McCalmont, George Read, A. Barneby, Joseph Raynow, Richard Sexton and John Janvier were totally destroyed. This disaster aroused general sympathy, and among the subscriptions received to repair the loss was one from Boston, where an appeal was made to the Council of that city by the Hon. Nicholas Van Dyke, member of Congress and a native of New Castle, and it was urged that the opportunity was now offered to reciprocate the friendship of New Castle for Boston, as practically demonstrated in 1774.1 Boston responded liberally to the appeal, and with the funds received from other sources, aided by the native energy of the people, the majority of the burned buildings were soon restored.

Later the "Good Will" engine was purchased and was in its day a powerful "machine." Thirty men were required to man it, and it had a capacity for throwing a stream fifteen feet higher than the tallest spire in the village. This engine was used until the modern steamers were procured.

The first steam fire-engine was the "Humane," purchased by the trustees of the Common in 1885. At the same time they bought a good hook-and-ladder outfit from the Moyamensing Company of Philadelphia. A portion of this apparatus is still in use.

On May 1, 1887, the New Castle authorities were authorized by act of General Assembly to borrow five thousand dollars, and issue bonds for the payment of the same. With the fund thus realized a fine Sibley No. 4 steam-engine was bought for three thousand four hundred dollars, and placed in charge of Chief Engineer Jacob Sanders, with a volunteer company to assist him. The department now has all necessary apparatus for efficient services, and is well housed in the hall of the Red Men, in the western section of the city.

The New Castle Gas Company was chartered February 19, 1857, and organized September 10, 1867, with a capital stock of fifty thousand dollars in shares of ten dollars. The incorporators were Thomas T. Tasker, Sr., Howard J. Terry, James Couper, John Janvier, James Crippen and Peter B. Vandever. Mr. Tasker was elected president, an office still held by him. Mr. Vandever was made secretary.

In 1887 the officers were T. T. Tasker, President; Wm. H. Clark, Secretary and Treasurer; William Herbert, James G. Shaw, Eimer W. Clark and Samuel M. Couper, directors. Under the supervision of Mr. Tasker works were built, mains laid and gas introduced in 1857. The plant of the company has a capacity of forty-five thousand feet per day. There are five miles of mains and forty-one street-lamps, some of which have been in use since 1857.

The New Castle Water Works Company was incorporated April 1, 1869, by Thomas T. Tasker, Sr., William Herbert, Joseph H. Rogers, John Janvier, Allen V. Lesley, James G. Shaw, Peter B. Vandever, Andrew C. Gray and William C. Spruance. The capital stock was fixed at fifty thousand dollars, with privilege of increase to one hundred thousand dollars. James G. Shaw was chosen president, and is still the executive of the company; Wm. H. Clark, secretary and treasurer; Thomas T. Tasker, Stephen P. M. Tasker, William Herbert, Dr. John J. Black, A. M. Hizar, Ed. Challenger and E. W. Clark are the other directors. Water was introduced by the company in the spring of 1873, the supply being brought from None Such Creek, three miles from New Castle. The water is pumped into a reservoir of one million two hundred and fifty thousand gallons capacity, situated one and a half miles from the city, at an elevation of eighty-seven feet. Five miles of mains have been laid in the streets of New Castle, and forty-five water-plugs erected. Thirty-seven are designed for the use of the Fire Department.

Manufacturing Interests.—In the minutes of the Council of New Amstel, under Vice-Director Jean Paul Jacquet, August 14, 1896, it is noted that "regarding the mill, it is left to the choice of deputy sheriff and commissioners to put it up."

1 During the enforcement of the odious Port Bill, in 1774, Nicholas Van Dyke, father of Nicholas Van Dyke, the Congressman, and George Read, collected nine hundred dollars and forwarded it to Boston for the relief of the victims of the Port Bill.
On October 29, 1657, Vice-Director Aliarchs writes to Director Stuyvesant from New Castle: "I further learn that a horse-mill is ready there, which it was decided to bring here, if the owner of it had not died; and whereas we are without sufficient breadstuffs, also unable to grind corn and other grains, beside doing many more things which necessarily must be done, I therefore would wish that your Honor be pleased and take the trouble to ascertain at once the lowest price, and if it is any way reasonable to inform me of it."

On October 5, 1658, he writes again: "The arrival of the skipper Jacob, with the galiot, is earnestly desired, since the horse-mill not having been finished, on account of Christian Parent's death, we are very much embarrassed here for breadstuff or flour."

Concerning the mill of the widow Barents, Aliarchs wrote later: "I only advised or proposed to her that it would be for her best interests to remain in possession; she would be assisted in completing the mill, with the income of which, through the grist, she would be able to diminish the expenses and live decently and abundantly with her children on the surplus; but she would not listen to advice."

A horse-mill was soon obtained and on December 3, 1659, William Beckman, then in New Amstel, in a letter to Director Stuyvesant, said, "As to my horse-mill, I have no more the disposal of it, as I sold the same to Mr. Hinjossa last August." The latter was at the time lieutenant at New Amstel. Mr. Beekman also writes, May 12, 1682, of the "Company's Horse Mill" at New Amstel.

In November, 1681, Arnoldus De Lagrange petitioned and had granted to him a vacant piece of land "Lying towards ye north end of the Towne of New Castle," also a small piece of marsh land adjoining, on condition that he, "according to his owne proffer, shall build on ye said land a good wind-mill for ye common good of ye inhabitants, and to have for toal of grinding noe more than one Tenth part; and that bee draynes ye marsh and all this to bee done within twelve months after date hereof, otherways and in defect thereof he to forfeit what is now granted."

Of modern mills, the one erected a number of years ago by Thomas T. Tasker and, since 1872, owned by William Lea and Sons Company—S. A. Stewart, superintendent.

The Triton Spinning-Mills, owned and operated by James G. Shaw, were erected by him in 1860-61, and sold under contract to a manufacturing firm in Boston. This firm contracted for the most improved machines to be made in Biddeford, Maine, to fit out the mills. The Civil War began, however, before the machinery was completed, and the Boston firm then gave up its project of engaging in the manufacturing business at New Castle.

James G. Shaw, who then owned the mills, in 1863, secured the machinery contracted for by the Boston firm, and placed it in the Triton Mills. He associated with him James G. Knowles, and engaged in the manufacture of cotton-yarn. In 1871 the partnership was dissolved, and Mr. Shaw has since been the sole proprietor. The main building, as originally erected, was 50 by 500 feet. It has been enlarged 70 by 500 feet. These mills have been twice refitted and are supplied with the best machinery of American manufacture. The mills contain fourteen thousand spindles, and consume three thousand bales of cotton a year. The number of employees ranges from one hundred and twenty-five to one hundred and fifty.

James G. Shaw, the proprietor of the Triton Mills, was born in Chester, county of Delaware, Pennsylvania, October 21, 1828. He is a son of the late Samuel Shaw and Mary Ann Eyre, and comes of the old Sharpless stock that came over with William Penn, and settled in Delaware County. After being educated in his native town he engaged in mercantile pursuits. In 1857 he removed to New Castle, where he purchased the Chancellor Johns farm of one hundred and seventy-four acres and laid it out as an addition to the town. This led to the building of his mills, which he has since operated successfully. About 1864 he sold the land he had purchased to Thomas T. Tasker, and has since devoted himself to his manufacturing interests. He has been an enterprising citizen and an active promoter and advocate of all public improvements in the town. He was married, April 28, 1869, to Miss Virginia, daughter of Major Joseph Carr, of Brandywine Hundred, and they have two children, a son and a daughter.

The New Castle Manufacturing Company was incorporated January 25, 1833, for the manufacture of cotton, woolen and metal goods, by Thomas Janvier, James Couper, Jr., James Rogers, James Smith and Charles I. du Pont.

In 1834 a foundry was built and shops erected to make locomotives. The shops were a long time in charge of Wm. H. Dobbs, and locomotives for use on the New Castle and Frenchtown Railroad were built there. Andrew C. Gray was one of the most active of the company. Subsequently the Hicks Engine Company occupied these shops, which was afterwards used by the Morris-Tasker Iron Works.

The Morris-Tasker Iron Works were established at Philadelphia, in 1821, by Henry G. Morris and James G. Knowles
and soon had a better factory than the one destroyed. In 1886 he built a large addition, put in four more He has the reputation of treating his employees with a kindness and liberality which have won their warm regard, and "labor troubles" have been very rare at his mills.

While keeping a watchful eye on all departments of the factory and upon his business generally, his energies are not confined to it, and he has interests in other industries in Wilmington (which city he has recently made his home) and elsewhere. But Mr. Knowles does not allow business to monopolize his time or talents, believing that there are other objects in life than mere money-getting and money-hoarding. He is a man who finds great pleasure to be derived from books, in mental culture generally, —in the beautiful things in nature and in art, in happy social environment and, above all, in the domestic circle, being devoted to the welfare of his family.

He was married in 1864 to Miss Ella M., daughter of Rev. William Uri, a prominent minister of the Methodist Church, and they have two children—Martha and George.

GENERAL BUSINESS INTERESTS.—In the early history of New Castle, all vessels passing up the river were required for several years to land at the town. Later on, the commercial ascendancy of Philadelphia and other cities higher up the Delaware and the railroad interests ruined the shipping interests of the town. The harbor has been much improved by the government, which erected a number of very substantial ice breakers; yet few vessels touch at this place, and Wilmington has been made the port of entry. Prior to the change New Castle had its collector, health officer and other port officials. Jehu Curtis was collector in 1744, and William Till, who died in office in 1764, was also a collector.

In 1784 an act was passed by the Assembly authorizing John Stockton, William Lee, James Riddle, Kensey John, Isaac Grantham, Archibald Alexander and George Read, to raise twelve thousand dollars, to improve the harbor, at New Castle, by erecting piers, etc. This work was undertaken, although only about four thousand dollars were realized, and was completed some time about 1802. In 1803 Dr. James McCallmont was appointed health officer of the port, by the Governor of Delaware, to succeed Dr. Colesberry. In later years New Castle had a naval inspector, and among those who filled the office were: Captains Montgomery, Geddes, Sawyer and De Lancey. Similar duties were performed afterwards by Thomas Stockton, James Rogers and George Platt. The office is now in charge of Samuel H. Black, as deputy collector.

On April 12, 1775, Joseph Tatlow and Thomas Henderson announced that they had "established a stage line for the term of seven years to carry on business between Philadelphia and Baltimore, via New Castle and Frenchtown." Tatlow had packet boats from Philadelphia to New Castle, and Henderson ran a similar line from Frenchtown to Baltimore.

The stages were run between New Castle and Frenchtown. The New Castle and Frenchtown Railroad succeeded the stages in 1831. The first attempt to run a train by steam was not successful, the engine built by Colonel Long failing to work satisfactorily. An English locomotive, the "Delaware," was brought over and put together at New Castle, and, in 1833, the work of building engines at New Castle was resumed, the mechanics adopting the best features of the imported engine.

In 1832, John and Thomas Janvier began to run a four-horse coach, leaving the "Union Line Hotel" every morning at nine o'clock. The steamboat line to Philadelphia was started April 20, 1828, and the "Union Line" of the Janviers, in connection with their stages, and later the railroad, was a famous enterprise a half-century ago. The southwestern part of the line was operated by the Hendersons. The Janviers had a steamboat built for this line, which they called the "Delaware," Captain Wilmer Whildin, commander. The Janviers were very successful in the transportation business.

Prior to 1837 New Castle was on the main line of travel between Philadelphia and Baltimore, and many celebrities of national repute passed through the town. General Lafayette stopped in New Castle, October 6, 1826, en route to Baltimore, via Frenchtown. President Jackson arrived at New Castle Saturday, June 8, 1833, on the steamboat "Ohio," of the "People's Line," and was met by Governor Bennett, of Delaware, and "a vast concourse of people." When the boat anchored, a salute was fired by the revenue cutter lying in the harbor, and there were other demonstrations of welcome. A public arch bore the inscription, "The Union, it must be preserved." After spending a short time on shore the party returned to the boat and proceeded to Philadelphia. General Jackson again passed through New Castle, on his return from Boston, July 3, 1833. On June 10, 1838, Black Hawk, the celebrated Indian chief, was taken through New Castle, in custody of Major Garland.

In 1845 Samuel L. Hall was granted the use of a wharf for ship-building. Among those actively in trade in more recent years were Thomas Hyatt, on the site of the present Ferris drug-store. Samuel Cooper was one of his business contemporaries. Joseph Sawyer traded in the Nowland stand. Captain James McCullough was in the building now occupied by David Bouldes. Henry and Thomas Frazier occupied a stand which William B. Janvier used successfully. Platt & Elkinson were at the George W. Turner store. James Riddle and John Bird were enterprising merchants on the corner, where Elisha Jefferson afterwards conducted an extensive business as merchant and grain dealer. Jeremiah Bowman was a lumber dealer on the wharf, and later Charles Lambison had a yard at the gas works. In 1887 J. T. & L. E. Elison were extensively engaged in the coal, lumber and machinery trade, and other merchants fully represented every branch of business. Hugh W. Ritchie opened the first drug store after 1820, and Robert G. Algeo was in this business in 1845. In 1849 John G. Chalenger established a pharmacy, which has been carried on by Edward Challenger since 1888. Charles Ferris subsequently opened a drug store, and it has been continued by his son, William J. Ferris.

A branch of the Delaware Farmers' Bank has long been in operation at New Castle, first in an old building on Water Street, and since 1851 in the present banking-house. Kensey Johns was the first president, and his successors were James R. Black, James Booth, Thomas Janvier, Andrew C. Gray and John J. Black. The cashiers of the branch at New Castle have been Francis L. Couch, James Couper, Howell J. Terry, Charles Kimmy and Richard G.
Cooper. W. F. Lane is the present teller.

The following is a statement of the bank as made in January, 1888, followed by a list of the directors of the branch bank at New Castle.

for social conversation and to hear and discuss the news received from travelers. The keeper was frequently a man of marked characteristics, prominent in the affairs of the place, and one whose opinions were usually courted. Occasionally, however, an inn-keeper would be found who did not meet the requirements of the age, and his hostelry soon declined.

Fopp Jansen Outhout, who was a magistrate from 1676-88, was an inn-keeper in New Amstel in 1662, as is mentioned in a trial of that date in which he is mentioned as one of the witnesses.

Ralph Hutchinson was an ordinary keeper at New Castle as early as 1677, and was probably one of the first in that vocation. His place was afterwards kept by his brother, Robberd, who, unfortunately, was charged with dishonest practices, and, as he was also a constable, his case became an object of public consideration. On June 3, 1679, a letter containing the following facts was sent to the Governor asking his advice:

"One Adam Wolles, a mariner, come to this place from Maryland with his chest, and stopped at the house of Robberd Hutchinson. After he had been there a day or two he found that the chest had been opened, things taken out, and again locked. He made the theft known and gave a list of articles he had in the chest. Suspicion was attached to Hutchinson, who, when closely examined, owned up, and the most of the articles were found. After other witnesses were examined he again disclosed more, and threw himself upon the court. He was put in prison."

The Governor in reply commented at length upon the enormity of the offense, but left the punishment to the court. Hutchinson was dismissed from the "constablewrick," and the court "doe order and sentence that hee, the sd Robberd Hutchinson, for example to others, bee brought to the force gate and there publicly whipt thirty and nine strokes or lashes; that hee pay unto Adam Wolles the remainder of ye goods stolen out of ye chest not yet found, together with all the charges and fees of this action, and doe further forever bannish ye sd Robberd Hutchinson out of this River of Delaware and partes adja- cent, hee to depart within three days now next ensuing, leave to chose and appoint any person as his attorney to receive and pay his debts. God save the King." This above said sentence was put in execution and Robberd Hutchinson publicly whipt ye same day in New Castle, etc."

Hutchinson was succeeded June 4, 1679, by John Darby. The property was described as "bounded on the east by the strand, or river; south, by the house of John Hendrickson, drover; west, by the most; and north, by the house and lot of Isaac Tayne." Darby's license was granted with the proviso that "hee performs what he now promises viz.: That hee will keep a good and orderly house; that hee will now begin six beds and in twelve months procure six beds more; to have only privilege to sell drink by retayle. In case none other be admitted more by the Court."

Prior to 1709 John Brewster was an "Innholder" at New Castle, and on February 28, 1709, he and Elizabeth, his wife, sold to "Richard Halliwell, of New Castle, merchant, the lot fifty by two hundred and fifty feet, bounded southwesterly with Thomas Janvier's lot; northeasterly with burying-ground; northwesterly with Presbyterian meeting-house and southeasterly with ye street. He also gave to Richard Halliwell one silver quart tankard and seven silver spoons."

In the latter part of the eighteenth century Robert Furness was the keeper of an ordinary at New Castle, and it was at his house that the first Methodist meet- ings in New Castle were held. He was a man of determined purpose and great force of character.

In 1802 Captain Caleb P. Bennett was an inn-keeper, and at his place the county elections were held. In 1803 he bought "the late residence of George Read, Esq., corner Front and Delaware Streets, and then used it as a tavern, calling it the 'Delaware Hotel.'" In 1824 the hotels on Water Street were burned down, and one of them, after being re-built and carried as the "Stockton House," was again burned in 1870. For many years it was the office of stage lines passing out of New Castle. In the rear of this building there was a steamboat landing which has long since been abandoned. In 1828 Henry Steele was the keeper of the "Spread Eagle Hotel," and James Steele was a landlord later. This place is still kept as a hostelry under another name. John Crow was for many years a keeper of the "Delaware House." The present "Jefferson House" was originally the store and residence of Elihu Jefferson, and was re-modeled for hotel purposes. It is the property of William Herbert.

The Gilpin House, located opposite the old courthouse, is now the oldest hotel in continuous use in the town. It took its present name from the late Chief Justice Gilpin, and for years was the stopping-place of the judges and attorneys of the court.

Old Buildings.—Few very old buildings remain in New Castle. It is believed that the back building of the present Gilpin House is as ancient as any structure in the place, and that it was the meeting-place of the first courts. It was also one of the first places of public entertainment. Near by is a brick building, erected in 1681, where William Penn was entertained by his host Lagrange, when he visited the town in 1682. It had originally a hip-roof, but, in 1858, was remodeled by the present owner, George W. Turner. The famous old tile house was built in 1687, but by whom, or for what purpose, is not known. It was three stories high and its roof was very steep and covered with tile brought from Holland. The rafters were made like the knees of a vessel, all cut out of crooked timber. The brick in its walls were of small size and made of "whitish earth." The building was used for a number of purposes, and became very dilapidated before it was demolished in 1884.
NEW CASTLE COUNTY.

The John Bird house was also built before 1700 and is still standing. It was long the property of Major John Moody. The house of George Read, signer of the Declaration of Independence, was on Water Street, and was removed many years ago. For a short time it was used as a bank building. George Read, the second, built the house now occupied by the family of Samuel Couper. The building, occupied in part by M. C. Rogers as a tobacco shop, antedates the struggle for independence many years. In the time of the Revolution it was occupied by a Dr. Finney.

A part of the old Court-House, used as a State building in William Penn's time, was torn down prior to 1880. Two years later Penn met the court in this building. The building has been enlarged and the interior changed. Some very large timbers have been used in its construction, the main girder consisting of a single piece of timber resting on two pillars opposite the doors. On these pillars it was customary in olden times to place the hands of criminals who had committed manslaughter, while they were branded with the letters M. S. A. The red-hot iron was applied until the room was filled with fumes from the burning flash. The last person so branded was a colored man by the name of Jacob Battle, apprehended for the killing of one Clark.

MARKET SQUARE—NEW CASTLE COMMONS.—This market-house was built by the trustees of New Castle Common, has not been much used for market purposes in recent years. The lot on which it stands is part of a tract of land reserved for public uses as early as the seventeenth century. It has been controlled by various authorities, generally by trustees for the people of New Castle. This office, in the course of years, was neglected, and with a view of placing the property in the care of a perpetual board of trustees, the Assembly on June 13, 1772, appointed a board of Market Square trustees, consisting of David Finney, John Thompson, George Read, Thomas McKeen and George Munro. The surviving trustee was empowered to name his successors. This was first done by Thomas McKeen in August, 1809, when he appointed James R. Black, Kensey Johns, James Rogers, James Riddle, William C. Frazier, George Read and George Munro. On March 13, 1851, James Rogers, the surviving trustee, named Wm. T. Read, John Janvier, Wm. Couper, Charles H. Black and James Mansfield. On April 30, 1877, John Janvier, survivor, by deed appointed George Gray, John H. Rodney, Richard G. Cooper, Joseph H. Rogers and Julian D. Janvier.

On February 20, 1888, the Assembly enlarged the powers of the trustees and authorized them to hold the property for the city of New Castle, the rights of the county to the buildings, if it should want to use them for the purposes originally intended, being reserved. Under this act the square and its improvements have since been controlled.

The citizens of New Castle have also been much benefited by the income arising from the common lands, which, in the last forty years especially, has aided materially in supporting the schools and in improving the city. Ever since the settlement of New Castle the lands lying north of the town have been regarded as the common property of the citizens, and for nearly a century and a half have been held in trust for their common good. Under Swedish and Dutch rule individual rights to the wood and pasture on these lands were exercised, and it has only been within a comparatively recent period that a systematic effort was made to improve the lands with a view to making them more productive. The limits of these common lands were not defined prior to the eighteenth century, but on October 31, 1701, William Penn, as proprietor, "directed Edward Penlington, Surveyor-General of the Province of Pennsylvania and Territories, by a warrant, to survey one thousand acres of land for a common for the use of the inhabitants of the town of New Castle. On April 10, 1704, George Deakyne, surveyor, made a return of the survey, which included one thousand and sixty-eight acres north of New Castle." The acreage of the common lands having been fixed and the location established, "nothing further of importance seems to have been done in the matter until November 17, 1764, when Thomas and Richard Penn, sons of William Penn, and 'true and absolute proprietaries and governors in chief of the counties of New Castle, Kent and Sussex, in Delaware, and Province of Pennsylvania,' recorded a charter incorporating, 'in pursuance of a warrant from our late father, William Penn, Esquire,' the trustees of the common. The inhabitants of New Castle had complained that persons having property contiguous to the common were encroaching upon the town's tract, wasting the timber, etc., and they urged Thomas and Richard Penn to 'incorporate a certain number of them, the said inhabitants of New Castle, and give them perpetual succession, and to confirm to them the said tract of land in common for the use and behoof of all the inhabitants of the said town.'

"The request was favored, and John Finney, Richard McWilliams, David Finney, Thomas McKeen, George Read and George Munro, Esquires, and John Van Gezzell, Zachariah Van Leuvenigh, Slater Clay, John Yeates, Nathaniel Silabee, Daniel McLonen, Robert Morrison, gentlemen, were named as trustees, and they and their successors, forever after, were to be "one body corporate and politic, in deed, by the name of the Trustees of New Castle Common." The tract was deeded to the trustees for 'the use of the inhabitants of the town of New Castle.' The deed, made by the two Penns, declared that the property was 'to be helden of us, our heirs and successors, proprietaries of the said counties of New Castle, Kent and Sussex, in Delaware, as of our manor of Rockland, in free and common socage, by fealty only in lieu of all other services. Yielding and paying, therefore, yearly and every year, unto us, our heirs and successors, at the town of New Castle, aforesaid, the rent of one ear of Indian corn, if demanded.'

"The trustees were endowed with all the powers of corporation—to sue and be sued, and to establish such by-laws, ordinances, etc., deemed just and necessary, provided they were not 'repugnant to the laws of England or to the government of the counties aforesaid.' When a trustee died, removed from New Castle, or was removed from office for misbehavior, an election was to be held, within ten days, for a successor, by such persons as had a freehold interest of forty shillings in New Castle, or who paid a yearly rental of that amount. The trustees were not to hold, as a body politic, by their letters patent, any other lands or tenements except the Common, and they had no power to sell any part of the Common, which were for no other use whatever except for the inhabitants of New Castle. If the trustees failed to obey the provisions, the property was to revert to Thomas and Richard Penn, their heirs and assigns.

"On July 8, 1791 (upon solicitation of the Trustees of the Common, who claimed that the restrictive terms of the grant of Thomas and Richard Penn prevented the inhabitants of the town of New Castle from deriving all those benefits and advantages which would result from a free and absolute grant thereof), "John Penn of Stoke Pogis, in the county of Bucks, Esquire, and John Penn, late of Wimpole Street, in the parish of Saint Marylebone, but now of Dover Street, in the county of Middlesex, Esquire (late Proprietors of the Province of Pennsylvania, in America), formally deeded the Common to Isaac Grantham, Esquire, the Rev. Robert Clay, clerk, and William Lees, merchant, all of the hundred and county of New Castle, then successors and heirs, in trust nevertheless, to and for the use, benefit and behoof of the inhabitants of the town of New Castle, to be transferred or conveyed, by legal means, to the trustees of the Commons. The deed was executed in London and the seal of that city and of the Lord Mayor were affixed.

"In 1792 the General Assembly of Delaware passed an act to enlarge the corporate powers of the Trustees of the Common. It made the trustees a corporate body in deed and in law, with perpetual succession, vacancies to be provided for in the former charter of incorporation; it gave them power to rent or lease, but not for a longer term than thirty years from the commencement of a lease or contract, and it provided that seven trustees were to make a quorum for the transaction of business, and that they must elect a president once a year.

"On July 13, 1792, Isaac Grantham, Robert Clay and William Lees formally deeded the Common to the trustees as per the deed to them by the two John Penns. The witnesses to the deed were John Bird, Jno. Willy, Sen., and Mary Grantham." From this time the title of New Castle in the lands was absolute.

In 1860 Dr. Charles H. Black and his co-trustees had the commons divided into farms, and by 1864, the annual revenue had increased to $7000, and the accumulation enabled the trustees to pay an old debt of $20,000 due the Farmers' Bank for money borrowed to build the town hall and market-house, and for paving streets. During this period the schools had been supported, the town taxes were very light and Common farms free from debt. Since that time extensive improvements have caused a small indebtedness. In 1887 the Common consisted of nine farms and two lots, north of the city of New Castle, producing a revenue of more than eight thousand dollars, which was disbursed by the trustees for the benefit of the city of New Castle. Among the annual appropriations is one item of three thousand dollars, guarantee interest at six per cent., to the New Castle Water Works Company; and liberal appropriations are also made to the Fire Department.

In 1887 the Common trustees were the following:

Prominent Families.—Among the old and honored families which resided at New Castle that of George Read, signer of the Declaration of Independence, was one of the most prominent. He was attorney-general under the British crown. His son, George, was also an attorney as were also his grandsons, George and William T., all deceased. Two granddaughters, Mrs. Anna Reeves and Miss Emily Read, reside at New Castle. Nicholas Van Dyke was another official and local celebrity, who died here. John Stockton held office under English rule and his son, Major Thomas Stockton, was an officer in the army. The latter had sons named Thomas, William and James. Several daughters reside at New Castle. Judge James Booth lived here and reared a large family. A daughter married Attorney-General James Rogers. His son, James Booth, was also an attorney and chief justice; and William Booth was an adjacent farmer. The former was the father of James R. Booth, attorney, and Thomas Booth, civil engineer. James Rogers was a son of Governor Daniel Rogers, of Milford, and was the father of William H. Rogers, attorney, and other sons, James, Eugene, Joseph H., Julian, Robert C. and Daniel, nearly all of whom were professional men. A daughter married J. Nicholas Barney, of the United States navy. Chancellor Kensey Johns was an honored citizen and father of Kensey Johns, Jr., who was also a chancellor. His brothers were Bishop John Johns and Henry Johns. John Johns, son of Kensey, Jr., resides in New Castle Hundred. An older brother, James, was an attorney. John
NEW CASTLE COUNTY.

Bird, merchant, was prominent at the same period. Of his sons, E. M., was a physician, journalist, novelist and dramatist; John, Jr., became a banker; and Henry was a civil engineer. John M. and Thomas Clayton lived a short time at New Castle. Geo. Read Riddle was a native of this place, but removed to Wilmington. Another native of the town was James Booth Roberts, son of Joseph Roberts, who was a celebrated play-writer and author. Judge James B. Black lived in the residence now occupied by Dr. David Stewart, where he died, leaving daughters who married Dr. James Couper, John C. Grooms and William Young. A later prominent citizen of the same name, but not of the same family, was Dr. Charles H. Black, father of Dr. John J. and Samuel H. Black. Dr. James Couper came here from Christiana Bridge, and for many years was the cashier of the Farmers' Bank. He was the father of Dr. James M., William, Samuel and John Couper, all deceased. Another prominent citizen of New Castle, whose residence was of more recent date, was George B. Rodney, attorney, and father of John H. Rodney, also an attorney, and Major George Rodney, of the United States army. John and Thomas Janvier, brothers, were very active in the affairs of New Castle. The former was the grandfather of the present mayor, Julian D. Janvier. Wm. Janvier, a cousin of John and Thomas, was a prominent merchant at the old Frazier stand; and this family is one of the few whose residence here has been continued for more than a century.

SECRET ORDERS.—The first organization of a secret character in New Castle, of which any account has been preserved, was a Masonic Lodge, chartered by the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania, under authority of the Grand Lodge of Great Britain, April 3, 1781. The meetings were alternately held at New Castle and Christiana Bridge, and the principal officers were: Joseph Israel, Master; Joseph Kilkeen, Senior Warden; and John Clark, Junior Warden.

St. John's, No. 2, A. F. and A. M., was chartered June 27, 1848. It has over eighty members. The following are Past-Masters: Hiram R. Borie, Edward Dalby, George W. Ellicott, Gardner L. Jemison, W. Wood Lesley, P. G. T., John B. Lefevere, Robert S. Martin, George A. Maxwell, P. D. G. M., Thomas M. Ogle, P. G. T.

For many years the meetings were held in the old City Hall, but, since the fall of 1890, a handsome lodge-room has been occupied in the Masonic and Odd Fellows' Block. This building was erected under the direction of a joint committee, consisting of William Herbert, M. N. Wier and Ira Lunt, Masons, and Jacob Herman, B. B. Groves and George F. Deskyne, Odd-Fellows. The corner-stone was laid in 1879, and the dedicatory ceremonies were held September 13, 1880. The building is an imposing three-story edifice, fifty by one hundred feet; the lower floors are business-rooms; the second story contains the grand opera-house, and the third story two lodge-rooms for the Masons and the Odd-Fellows respectively, having separate entrances and ante-rooms. The total cost was $30,731.10. In 1887 the trustees of the Masons were, William Herbert, John W. Coffman and John Wills.

Washington Lodge, No. 5, I. O. O. F., was instituted at New Castle, October 16, 1888, the charter having been granted to Lucien M. Chase, William D. Chestnut, David L. Moody, William H. Stayton and John McIntire. The meetings were held in a small brick house on Harmony Street until 1846, when a room was secured in the City Hall until September, 1890, when the lodge occupied its present quarters in the Masonic and Odd Fellows' Building.

In the first fifty years there were admitted four hundred and ten members, and sixty-three died. The relief of sick and disabled members cost $1491.50. In 1887 it had a membership of ninety, and the trustees were Louis R. Hueshebeck, B. F. Lancaster and George W. Eckles. Since 1856 the secretary of the lodge has been William Herbert, and his only predecessor was Lucien M. Chase, whose services extended from 1833. Many of the members have held important offices in the higher councils of the order.

Seminole Tribe, No. 7, Improved Order of Red Men, was instituted February 25, 1869, with the following charter members: Robert H. Palmer, Squire Inherwood, Alonzo R. Wright, John B. Vining, Travis Taylor, James Darling, Richard Bond, Joshua Greaves, Edward Lever, William H. McAllister, Robert Conway, William L. Point, John Haywood, William T. Sutton, and the officers elected were: Prophet, Robert H. Palmer; Sachem, Richard Bond; Sr. Sag. Travis Taylor; Jr. Sag., John B. Vining, Jr.; C. of R., W. H. McAllister; K. of W., James Darling. The tribe met originally in the old court-house, and afterwards in the lodge-room occupied by the Masons and Odd Fellows, when, finding the room too small for their membership, they, in May, 1881, built a wigwam corner of Union and South Streets, on a lot of land forty by one hundred and twenty-five feet, which was donated to them by William Herbert. Gardner L. Jenison was the builder, and Graham & Son, Wilmington, were the architects. The building committee were George E. Temple, James H. Whiteelock, Samuel T. Lancaster, Edward S. Monkton, David M. Castlow, William H. Perry and James B. Lancaster. The wigwam cost $8400, and was dedicated May 1, 1882, by the Grand Council of Delaware.

The first story of the building is occupied by the city as an engine-house, the second story is a public hall and the third is the lodge-room, occupied also by other societies as tenants of Seminole Tribe. In 1895 the tribe was incorporated by act of Assembly. The trustees are George W. Cline, W. G. Wright and George E. Temple. Thomas T. Tasker is the Prophet of the tribe, which has a membership of one hundred and twenty-three.

Harmony Castle, No. 6, K. of G. E., was instituted in May, 1883, with forty members, and has now about seventy-five members. The meetings are held in the old Odd Fellows’ Hall, and the board of trustees is composed of Frank Patton, George Williams and Frank H. Pinkerton. The Past Chief is Delaney Williams.

Adelphi Lodge, No. 8, K. of P., instituted October 15, 1866, has about sixty members. Its meetings are held in a hall corner of Delaware and Union Streets, in a three-story building erected by the lodge, at a cost of $12,000, and dedicated May 1, 1885. This block was subsequently sold, a lease of the lodge-room only being retained. In this building also meet Division No. 8, Ancient Order of Hibernians, which has a growing membership, and Riverview Assembly, No. 6146, Knights of Labor, which was instituted in March, 1886, and newly chartered in August, of the same year. The latter body has several hundred members.

Captain Evan S. Watson Post, No. 5, G. A. R. was chartered December 20, 1881, with twenty-five members, James A. Price, Commander, and Joseph E. Robertson, Adjutant. Until July, 1887, seventy-three members had been mustered, and at that date the post had thirty-five members, with William M. Walls, Commander, and Edward McDonough, Adjutant. The post meets in City Hall. The trustees are Robert S. Martin, George M. Wiley, and Edward McDonough.

General David B. Birney Post, No. 12, G. A. R. was mustered in September, 1888, with eighty-eight members, John J. Gormley, Commander; Joseph E. Vantine, Adjutant. Since that time eight new members have been received, and thirteen have died or resigned. In July, 1887, there were twenty-three members, with Joseph E. Vantine, Commander. The post meets in Herman’s Hall.

Religious and Educational.—The majority of the early Swedish settlers were imbued with a respect for Divine worship, and this piety led them to establish places of worship, soon after their own homes were erected, in which accredited ministers expounded the Gospel. Among the first to serve in this connection was Rev. John Campаниюs, who came over with Governor Printz, in 1642. He preached in the settlements along Christiana Creek and the Delaware River. The tenure of the Swedes being so uncertain, but few churches were built under their occupancy. Under the Dutch more places of worship were established. Coming in colonies, it was invariably arranged that one of their number should be a man of piety, in full communion with the Reformed Dutch Church, to teach school and assist in public worship, often discharging the duties which pertain to the minister’s office when there was no regular minister. About 1657 a regular Dutch Church was organized at New Amstel by Rev. John Polhemus, who stopped here on his way from Brazil to New Amsterdam, where he settled and died. This interest was placed in the care of Schoolmaster Evert Peterson; but the following year Rev. Evardus Welius came from Amsterdam as the first ordained settled minister of the town. He died in 1659. Again schoolmaster Peterson, who was also distinguished for his piety, assumed the ministerial functions. In 1662, Rev. Warnerus Hadson was sent from Holland to take his place, but died on the voyage. In 1678, Rev. Petrus Tassecmakers settled here and was pastor for several years, being probably the successor of the unruly Dominie Fabricius, who was deposed from the ministry. The meetings were held in a small wooden church, which stood between the market square and the river, and near the site of the old fort. By some it is supposed that the present Presbyterian Church occupies a part of the site of the old Dutch Church, and which appears to have been abandoned before 1700. Notwithstanding a number of Huguenots had settled at New Amstel, and a French clergyman died here in 1684, who may have been the minister, the church was not prospering and in the year last named the Classis of Amsterdam sent a pastoral letter in which the dissensions which had arisen are deplored and the congregation was exhorted to promote the Gospel and to secure a minister. The people were then under English rule, and although it had been expressly stipulated “that the people be left free as to the liberty of conscience in church as formerly,” after having taken the oath of allegiance to the British crown in civil matters, there was such a lack of harmony that the church appears to have lost all its influence. The people continued to worship in the old church as an independent congregation, but with diminished numbers, and there was a laxity of public morals, consequently, inconsistent with former practices. Through the influence of the Quaker element there was a demand upon the public authorities for the better observance of those laws which pertained to the sanctity of the Sabbath. In the court records of September 6, 1690, appears this minute:

Whereas the frequent shooting of Partridges within this Towne of New Castle, on ye Sabbath or Lord’s day, doth much tend to ye Prophaning of ye 4th Lord’s day. It is therefore this day, by the Court, ordered that for ye future noe person Inhabiting within this Towne of New Castle shall presume on ye Lord’s day to goe on hunting or shooting after any Partridges as well within this Towne; or any other game upon a penalty of fynes of 10 Gilders for ye first time, 20 Gilders for ye second, and ye loss of ye Gun for ye 3d offense, of which all persons to take notice.

Soon after the proprietorship of William Penn, steps were taken to establish a Friends’ Meeting. This purpose was fully carried out, in 1684, by the Quarterly Meeting of Philadelphia, under whose direction the meeting at New Castle became permanent. The Friends constituting it were few in number, and for a number of years they assembled at the houses of the various members, the first church being built in 1705. Fifteen years later a board of trustees is mentioned, and in October, 1729, they obtained title to a lot of ground, one hundred and twenty by three hundred feet, on Beaver and Otter Streets, the conveyance being from George Hogg, Sr., cordwainer, to John Richardson, Mahala Meers, George Hogg, Jr., and Edward Gibbs. In 1752, John Richardson deeded the property to another board of trustees, consisting of Benjamin Scott, John Leuden, Joseph Leuden, Elijah Garrettson and Joseph Rotheram. In 1758 the Meeting was "raised" finally and the members thereafter attended at Wilmington, the property ultimately passing into the possession of that Meeting, which sold it. What was known in later years as the Quaker meeting-house stood on the corner of Pine and Railroad Streets, and the ground extending to Union Street was set aside for burial purposes. This small plain brick building, antedating the Revolution, was demolished in 1886. Many years previously it stood unused, after having been occupied first by a white congregation and later by colored people.

About the time the Friends' Meeting was established it became apparent that the Dutch Church could only maintain its existence by adapting its services to the new class of settlers in New Castle. The English language was accordingly substituted, in most of the services, and continued to be used until the church ceased to be known as a Reformed Dutch body. Many of the new arrivals were from Scotland and the North of Ireland, where they had been nurtured in the doctrines of the Presbyterian Church, and the transition from one to the other was very easy.

The Presbyterian Church of New Castle is probably the successor of the old Dutch Church. Rev. John Wilson, a Presbyterian, preached here prior to 1708, as in the year named he is spoken of as having been gone half a year. He preached in the court-house, and after his departure there was a desire for his return, and an expectation that a congregation could be permanently organized. He did return and commenced to make preparations for erecting a house of worship on lots purchased from John Brewster and Thomas Janvier. These deeds bear date August 15, 1707, and were executed to Boeloffe De Haas, Sylvester Garland and Thomas Janvier, merchants and undertakers, or agents for erecting and building a Presbyterian Church or house of worship in the town of New Castle. The house built proved too small to accommodate the growing congregation, and in 1712 eighteen feet of ground adjoining was bought of John Brewster in order to enlarge it. Soon after the minister, Mr. Wilson, died, leaving a wife who received the generous support of the church during her life. His field of labor extended to White Clay Creek and to Appoquinimink. A short time before his death White Clay Creek sent a petition to the Presbytery to have the ordinances of the Gospel administered with more convenience and nearness to the place of their abode, promising wituah due encouragement to the minister that shall be appointed to supply them. To this proposition New Castle objected, alleging that it would prevent a number of persons from attending the meetings in their town to worship, and would thus weaken their congregation. The statement made such an impression on the minds of the Presbytery that it decided not to grant the petition for separation; but immediately after Mr. Wilson's death the field was divided into three, and Rev. James Anderson became the pastor of the New Castle Church. One of the most important events of Mr. Anderson's ministry was the division, September 19, 1716, of the Philadelphia Presbytery into three separate Presbyteries, of which one was the Presbytery of New Castle. This embraced the churches of New Castle, Christiana Creek, Welsh Tract, Ammaquinimink, Petuxen and Patapsco. The first session was held in the church at New Castle March 18, 1717, and the home church was represented by Elder David Miller, who served with the Huguenot, Thomas Janvier, in that office, the latter being the first elder. The same year the pastoral relation of Mr. Anderson was terminated by his removal to New York.

The third pastor of the congregation was Rev. Robert Cross, a native of Ireland, who was ordained and installed September 19, 1719. This was the first service of the kind in the church, and the first of the New Castle Presbytery. Thomas Janvier was the representative elder.

The ministry of Mr. Cross continued until the fall of 1722, when he became the pastor of the Jamaica (L. L.) Church, and later of the First Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia.

In 1727 some of the members of the congregation residing in the country, below New Castle, sent commissioners to the Presbytery to request its concurrence in the building of a meeting-house in the centre of their neighborhood. This privilege was granted them, on their promise to continue members of the New Castle congregation, and a house was erected on Pigeon Run, near Red Lion. For many years "it was used as it was designed to be, a chapel of ease to the church at New Castle."

The congregation at New Castle was served many years in connection with White Clay Creek, but, after 1756, a union was formed with Christiana Bridge, which was long continued, and, in 1769, Rev. Joseph Montgomery became the pastor. A distinguishing feature of his ministry was a plan for educating pius young men for the ministry, whereby a fund was to be raised by the joint efforts of pastors and members. The first student educated by this means was James Wilson, who was taken under the care of the Presbytery, in 1773. The labors of Mr. Montgomery were much disturbed by the breaking out of the war, and, in October, 1777, he resigned to become a chaplain in the American army. From this time until the settlement of Rev. Samuel Barr, in 1791, the pulpit was vacant, although occupied occasionally by supplies sent by the Presbytery.

In August, 1800, Rev. John E. Latta was installed as pastor and remained for twenty-four years. On February 8, 1808, the church through his efforts, became an incorporated body.

In 1842, Rev. John B. Spotwood became the pastor. Spotwood, from whose excellent discourse on the history of this church much of the matter in this sketch has been obtained, was born February 8, 1806, in Dinwiddie County, Va. He was a linear descendant of Sir Alexander Spotwood, Colonial Governor of pastor and continued until 1883. His ministry was one of the most important in the history of the congregation, as it embraced the building of the present fine church edifice, which was begun in 1851, but was not dedicated until 1854. The material is brown sandstone, arranged in Gothic architecture, and cost about twenty thousand dollars. It was erected under the direction of Charles M. Black, Andrew C. Gray and Dr. James Couper, who comprised the building committee. In the fall of 1884 Samuel M. Couper presented the old Black homestead to the congregation for a church manse, and two years later the cemetery and church property were improved at an outlay of five thousand dollars. The entire church property is valued at fifty thousand dollars, and the trustees are J. I. Taggart, J. D. Janvier, W. J. Ferris, G. W. Turner, J. J. Black, M. D., William McCoy and Henry Holschumaker.

The congregation had an active membership of over one hundred and the Sabbath-school one hundred and seventy-five members.

Since its organization the pastors and supplies of the church have been the following:

Although the history of the Protestant Episcopal Church in New Castle properly begins with the year 1703, when the movement was successfully inaugurated which afterward resulted in the founding of the Emanuel congregation, it appears that a quarter-century earlier a congregation of the Church of England existed in New Castle for a few years. With regard to this particular religious element the records are not full, and as there was not any mention of it at the organization of Emanuel Church, the presumption is that it was disbanded some years prior to the beginning of the eighteenth century, and that it used the old New Castle Church as a place of worship. On April 4, 1777, the court "further concurreding that the Late and Church Warden, Martin Rosemond, being deceased, some fit person ought to be appointed to supply and administer the said place of s' Church Warden in this Town of New Castle. Have therefore thought fit to appoint Mr. Hendrick Williams and Mr. John Harmens to bee s' Church Warden in the Roome of the deceased for and during the space of one year now next ensuing this date."

On March 7, 1678, the court records state that "Mr. John Yeo, minister, being lately come out of Maryland this day, appearing in Court, did exhibit & produce his Letters of orders and License to Read divine service, administer the Holy Sacraments and preach ye word of God according to ye Laws & Constitution of the Church of England. The Court have accepted of ye s' John Yeo, upon ye approbation of his Honor, the Governor, bee to bee mayntained by the Gifts of ye free Willing Givers, whereof the sd John Yeo declared to be contented."

Also, on June 4, 1678, "The Court referred the Settling and Regulating of ye Church Affairs of this place unto Mr. John Moll & Mr. Peter Alrichs, They to make up ye acct wth ye Reader and Warden, and to make such further orders & Regulations as shall be found most necessary."

That the Rev. Yeo did not devote his entire attention to the New Castle charge is shown by the fact that a petition was adopted July 1678, "To devise and humbly Request his honor, the Governor, to grant us Leave and permission to obtain and have an Orthodox minister, to be mayntained by the gifts of ye free Willing Givers."

On November 5, 1678, the court "Resolved (in regard the Church doth much need Reparation), that Mr. John Moll & Mr. Peter Alrichs take care and order about the same. The charge & costs to bee found and paid by a Tax, if no money be more due upon the former list of ye Readers."

On December 3, 1678, "It was this day by the Court Resolved and ordered that 500 to 800 acres of Land be Layed out for Glubb Land for a Minister with this Court's jurisdiction, wth a fit proportion of Marriagh. To bee in the most convenient place, where Land not taken up can be found, as also a Lot of 100 foot broad A 300 foot long bee Layed out in Towne for to build a house for ye Minister to live on, and that another lot of 80 foot broad bee Layed out for a school, as also a place appointed for the building of Church and a new Church-yard in the most fitplace as shall bee thought convenient and best."

The same day "A nomination for Elders and Wardens being this day delivered in Court this day made the following: "Mr. John Moll, "Mr. Jean P. Januart, "John Smith, "Enochill Lott, "Benjamin Giry, "Samuel Berger, "Will Penyon."

In court, on January 7, 1679, "Mr. Thomas Harwood declared to have given as a free gift towards the Repairs of the old, or the building of a new, church within this Town of New Castle."

On March 4, 1679, John Yeo preferred a petition to the court showing that he came to New Castle December, 1677, "and was received as Minister to bee..."

paid by voluntary subscription of or Inhabitants and that he continued until denied by Capt. Billop, then Commander, without any proof of any crime deserving such suspension." The petitioner desired of the court "an order for a quantum Meritum proportionable to the Tyme of his Preaching to the People of this place, being one-third part of the subscription; and also for other perquisites due to him, Baptising of children, Marriages, Burialls, &c." To this petition the court answered "that since the Petitioner, Mr. Yeo, after he had been some time here, did then in open congregation in y' church voluntarily out of his own accord throw up y's Paper of y's People's subscription, he saying and openly then declaring freely to discharge them, The Court can therefore not charge them again since the Petitioner himself so publicly discharged them and if Capt. Billop (as w*out any order hee did) has given y's Petition that subscription bake, the Court are of opinion that therefore the Petition may have Remedy against him the 6th Capt. Billop, &c., but as for the perquisites of Marriages, Baptisms & Burialls, the Petition ought to bee for y's same what is just and equitable." The Rev. John Yeo purchased an interest in eight hundred acres of land of John Edmonds, November 30, 1677, which lay on White Clay Creek, near Christiana Creek. This he sold April 30, 1678, and he probably returned soon after to Maryland, as his name is not found in records later.

The Emanuel Protestant Episcopal Church of New Castle was founded early in the eighteenth century. On August 11, 1706, some of the inhabitants of New Castle petitioned the Bishop of London "to take compassion on their deplorable condition and to supply preaching by a person in holy orders." Having received a favorable answer, measures were taken to build a house of worship. This purpose led to the establishment of the church in 1704, about twenty families being friendly to the movement. Through the assistance of citizens of Philadelphia and the Presbyterians of New Castle, the church was opened in 1706, with solemn services, Rev. Charles Rudman, Swedish minister at Oxford, Pa., preaching the sermon. At this time the church was described by the Rev. Evan Evans, of Philadelphia, as "a large and fair structure.

In 1705, Rev. George Ross came as the first minister, being sent by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts. Three years later the congregation was much diminished by deaths resulting from an epidemic, which discouraged Mr. Ross, and led to his removal to Chester, in 1709. For this action he was recalled by the society, and ordered to return to England. While on his way to that country he was captured by a French cruiser February 9, 1711, carried to Brest, striped of his clothes and treated in an inhuman manner. On being released he returned to Chester and again resumed his missionary labors at New Castle. During his absence Revs. Robert Sinclair and Jacob Henderson occasionally preached. Mr. Ross remained with the congregation until his death, in 1754. The next three years Rev. Aaron Cleveland, a friend of Dr. Benjamin Franklin, was the minister, and died at his house August 11, 1757. Rev. ,Eneas Ross, a son of the first minister, now assumed the duties of a rector, serving the parish from 1757 to 1782.

After a short interval Rev. Charles Henry Wharton began a ministry which extended from 1784 to 1788. His successor was the Rev. Robert Clay, who became the rector in 1788, and continued until 1833. The successive rectors were Rev. Stephen Wilson Prestman, 1838; Rev. George W. Freeman, 1843; Rev. Benjamin Franklin, 1856; Rev. Richard Wittingham, 1864; Rev. Charles Sidney Spencer, 1867; Rev. P. B. Lightner, 1886.

On the 4th of December, 1716, Richard Halliwell, one of the members of the church, devised by will a glebe of sixty-seven acres, which has ever since been used for the benefit of the church. A later benefactor was John Janvier, who bequeathed the income of $6850.10 for the good of the Episcopal and Presbyterian Churches and Sabbath-schools. The instrument bears date March 28, 1846, and the fund he left was placed in charge of trustees.

In 1724 a gallery was built in the church to accommodate the growing congregation. Four years later the pew-holders were Richard Halliwell's family, Joseph Wood, John Strand, Samuel Kirk, Thomas Dakeyne, John Laud, Peter Jaquett, Cornelius Kettle, Richard Grafton, William Read, Samuel Lowman, Yeates & Custis, Zophar Eaton, John Wallace, Thos. Gaskell, Richard Reynolds, Peter Hance, James Sykes, John Cann.

In 1802 money was subscribed to repair the church, but it was not until 1818 that extensive repairs were actually begun, and completed in 1822. The citizens united in purchasing a town clock, which was placed in the tower, in charge of the Common's trustees. They retained control and kept it in order until June, 1887, when it was transferred to the trustees of Emanuel Church.

About this time the congregation notably increased in numbers. On October 28, 1822, the pew-holders of the church were the following:

- Jesse Moore
- George Pierce
- John Gordon
- John Stockton
- John Wiley
- James Frazier
- John Springer
- William Guthrie

In the spring of 1848 a fine cross, six feet high and covered with copper, was raised on the spire of the church, and two years later the chancel was beautified. In the summer of 1860 the church was enlarged and improved, and other repairs were again made in 1880.

In 1869 a frame chapel was built in the northern part of New Castle, at a cost of $2166.85. In the spring of 1887 a very fine rectory was completed, at a cost of six thousand dollars. In 1887 the vestry was composed of Alfred C. Nowland and John McFarlin, wardens; John H. Rodney, Thomas Holcomb, Eugene Rogers, Benj. R. Ustick, Michael King, J. E. V. Platt and Lewis E. Ellis, vestrymen.

The following is a list of wardens of the church and the years of their election:

Nazareth M. E. Church.—As early as 1769, Captain Thomas Webb, a pensioned officer of the British army, came to New Castle and preached as a Methodist minister. His teachings were received with so little favor that the doors of the Court-House were closed against him, though open to various forms of frivolity. Under these circumstances, Robert Furness, a tavern-keeper, opened his house for preaching, notwithstanding he was fully aware that he would lose much of his custom. Later he joined the Methodists, and preaching continued to be held at his place. In 1780, while Benjamin Abbott was the minister, and was preaching in the public-room of the house, "a pack of ruffians attempted to take possession, and one stood with a bottle in his hand, swearing that he would throw it at the minister's head. But Furness placed himself at the door and prevented such an act, while Mr. Abbott continued to proclaim the truths of the Gospel."

About this time a Methodist Society was formed in New Castle, but did not last long. A second was also disbanded after an experience of a few years, and after having promised to be more permanent like societies organized in neighboring towns. They declined because New Castle had, at that period, no increase of population, and most of the old inhabitants had their church preferences well fixed in their minds. Neither were the meetings held with any great regularity on account of the scarcity of ministers. Those occasionally preaching were Revs. John King, Robert Williams, Richard Boardman, Joseph Pennor, Richard Wright and Francis Aubrey, whose itinerancy extended over a large area of country.

The present society was formed in 1820, and was composed of twenty-one members, with Thomas Challenger as leader of the class. The same year a small church was built in the grave-yard now used by the society, at New Castle, and was dedicated in the spring of 1821. Thomas Challenger, Noah Morris, Samuel Wood and John Hays were the first trustees.

In 1868 a new house of worship was erected upon the same lot, which was enlarged in 1876 by the addition of the chapel in the rear, used for class-rooms and a church parlor. The church is valued at seventeen thousand dollars. In 1883 a parsonage worth three thousand five hundred dollars was built on the opposite side of the street, and in 1887 both were controlled by a board of trustees, composed of S. Atwood Steward, John B. Manlove, Henry W. Frazier, James E. Biggs, Robert C. Gordon, George Williams, Elwood L. Wilson, Isaac Sutton and George W. Vandegrift.

After being successfully established, the church entered upon a career of prosperity. The membership is about two hundred and seventy, in addition to a Sabbath-school of four hundred and fifty members.

In 1820 the church was supplied, in connection with Newport, by Revs. Joseph Rusling, Ezekiel Cooper and James Smith. In 1822 the service was, with Asbury Church, Wilmington, and the ministers were Revs. Lawrence Lawson and John Henry; 1823, with Newport, Rev. Henry G. King; 1826, with Cecil Circuit, Revs. John Goforth and Edward Page.

In 1837 the church became a station. The ministers have been:

The New Castle Baptist Church was organized at a meeting held in the court-house September 30, 1876,
NEW CASTLE COUNTY.

when fourteen persons united in church fellowship as follows: Mrs. Margaret Davis, Sallie M. George, Susan Harrington, Caroline La Boub, Edward Dalby, J. C. La Boub, Joseph Pyle, J. N. Taylor, Joseph H. Whitsett, Sallie G. McMullin, Anna Whitsett, Mattie V. Pedrick, Alice Pyle and Ellen Pyle. The meetings, which resulted in this organization, were held by Revs. W. H. Young and B. MacMackin, students of Crozer Theological Seminary at Chester, and the latter afterward served as the first regular pastor. He remained until May, 1885, when Rev. J. Miller was called and preached until October. Rev. W. W. Ferris next served from the early part of 1886 until March, 1887. At this time there were forty-six members, and Edward Dalby and William Sutton were deacons; W. H. Volk, clerk. Other clerks have been Theo. White, C. F. Lancaster, John F. Garber and J. H. George.

In June, 1877, a board of trustees was elected, consisting of Edward Dalby, Nehemiah Davis, J. C. La Boub and S. Pedrick, and measures were taken to build a church, which was completed December 19, 1879. It is a very neat brick structure, valued at six thousand dollars.

St. Peter's Church. Roman Catholic.—Catholic services were held at New Castle as early as 1804, by visiting priests from Wilmington; and the church founded soon after stood in the relation of a preaching-station to that city for many years. In 1807 an effort was made to erect a small brick church, but several years elapsed before it was completed, when, through the efforts of B. Murphy and others, it was finished. To assist in this work, an act was passed by the Legislature, February 3, 1808, to enable John Bird, John Jauvier, Samuel Barr, James McCalmon and Evan Thomas, as managers, to raise a sum of money not exceeding two thousand dollars by lottery; but it does not appear that this means was successfully employed. The old church was used more than sixty years, and until 1828 Father P. Kenney was the principal priest. Fathers George A. Correll and P. Reily were later ministers.

In 1854 Father Cobbin came to New Castle as the resident priest, and served a parish which embraced all the other Catholic Churches on the Peninsula. In 1868 the church ceased to belong to the diocese of Philadelphia, and became a part of the new diocese of Wilmington, with parish bounds much restricted. Still later all other churches were separated from it excepting Delaware City, which is still connected as a mission.

Father Cobbin was pastor until 1864, when he was succeeded by Father Cajetan Sorrentina, who continued until 1886. The same year Father B. A. Baumeister was pastor for four months, and was succeeded by Father George Borneman, whose ministry extended over a period of eighteen months. Father E. A. Connely was the pastor for nearly a year. In the new diocese Father John Daily was the first priest, remaining until his death, September 5, 1874, and his remains were buried under the church. It was he who began the present edifice in 1870, and who labored unceasingly to complete it. The church was consecrated May 27, 1876, when the present cardinal of Baltimore officiated. The following year the fine pastoral residence adjoining was erected. Both buildings are of brick. The property is worth thirty-five thousand dollars.

The successor of Father Daily was Father Benjamin J. Keiley, who remained until 1880, when Father Francis J. Rebman was pastor until September, 1884. Since the latter period the priest of the parish has been Father Edward L. Brady. The church has one hundred and fifty families in communion. Of the several societies connected with the church, St. Peter's Beneficial Society is one of the most important. It was organized in 1867.

The Union American Church is a plain brick building, having a seating capacity for several hundred persons, and was erected in 1863. The society occupying it is an offshoot of Mt. Salem African M. E. Church and was organized in 1838. The same year eighteen persons withdrew from the membership and established worship of their own, meeting for a time in the old Quaker meeting-house. In 1839 they built a small frame church which was used until the present building took its place. It is worth several thousand dollars and the trustees are William Butler, Joshua Ayers and Edward Handy. The membership of the church was fifty-six in June, 1887, and Asbury Smith was the pastor in charge.

Mt. Salem M. E. Church (Colored) is a brick edifice costing $2000, and was erected in 1878. The society first worshipped in various parts of the town and after 1857 in a small frame building of its own. Isaac Young, a local preacher, was pastor. In 1857 it had a membership of fifty persons with the following officers: Trustees, Parker Balon, Nelson Murray, Benj. H. Harrison, Alexander Terry, Jesse H. Guy, Noah Townsend and Douglas Black. In the new church the regular ministers were Revs. I. H. White, Thomas M. Hubbard, James H. Scott, Wm. Taylor, James K. Adams and James H. Scott.

The New Castle Y. M. C. A. was organized in 1883 and at one time had forty members. D. C. Spafford and Dr. David Stewart were presidents. A reading-room was opened and much benevolent work was undertaken, but a declining interest and removals caused the organization to disband.

An auxiliary branch of the Women's Christian Temperance Union was organized at New Castle in 1880 by Frances Willard and others. Twelve ladies became active members and ten sustained an honorary relation. Mrs. Mary P. Challenger was the first president, but since 1882 Mrs. A. E. Davidson has filled that position. The society has disseminated a great deal of temperance literature and accomplished much missionary work. Since 1884 it has been active in religious, prison and charitable work.

Schools.—Evert Petersen is spoken of as "the schoolmaster" as early as 1658, and a lot was to be set aside for a school-house. Later Abelius Zetascooren was the schoolmaster. In November, 1663, the people at Upland desired his services; but the New Amstel authorities would not give him up. On June 13, 1772, an act was passed "setting aside a part of the State-house lot of land in the northwest corner of the grave-yard of Emanuel Church, on which to erect a school-house, the inhabitants at that time intending to build thereon. David Finney, John Thompson, George Read, Thomas McKean and George Monroe were appointed trustees for erecting the school-house—to be for that use forever." On this lot a house was built in 1800, which was incorporated January 30, 1801, as follows: "Whereas inhabitants of New Castle and vicinity have, by voluntary contribution, erected an academy in the town upon a lot of ground in the public square, which lot was vested in trustees for school purposes, as above." This act of January 30, 1801, provides as "Trustees of the New Castle Academy," Kelsey Johns, James Booth, George Read, Archibald Alexander, James Riddle, James Caldwell, Nicholas Van Dyke, James McCalmont and John Bird. The former trustees were empowered to convey the lot to the trustees here mentioned; and on the 6th of June, 1808, Thomas McKean, the surviving trustee, made such a conveyance "for one cent, lawful money." The schools taught in this building were generally under individual control, the trustees having charge of the house only. Samuel Jacquett was thus a teacher many years, as were also Samuel Hood, James Riddle and others. Later the school was known as the New Castle Institute, and A. B. Wiggins was the principal. William F. Lane held the same position subsequently, also being the head of the public schools after the Free School System was adopted. He was a thorough instructor, and prepared young men for college.

The old academy is still used. The other schoolhouse in the same locality was erected as a United States arsenal, but, after 1831, was a garrison for the troops stationed at Fort Delaware, pending improvements. It has been occupied for school purposes many years.

In 1837 there were nine schools in New Castle, which had an enrolment of four hundred and ninety-five pupils, and J. E. George as principal. The board of directors at the same time were,—William Herbert, president; E. L. Wilson, secretary; J. D. Janvier, L. E. Elliasen, George W. Eckles, William J. Ferris, James Rice, W. Worthington and S. A. Stewart.

William Herbert, president of the School Board of New Castle and State treasurer of Delaware, was born in Philadelphia, Pa., July 9, 1829. He is a son of John and Eliza Herbert and removed with them to New Castle in early childhood. There his father, who was by trade a cooper, engaged in fishing and was drowned while plying his occupation on the Delaware, June 1, 1840. The widow was left with two daughters and two sons, William being the youngest and less than eleven years of age. Although so young, the little fellow manfully resolved to help his mother, borrowed twenty-five cents and began his career as a newspaper boy, being the first that ever sold a newspaper on the streets of New Castle as the agent of the Philadelphia Ledger. He also engaged in other enterprises and left no stone unturned to earn an honest penny. Soon after his father's death he even accomplished the feat of driving a drove of cattle to Philadelphia, being compelled, on account of the sickness of his assistant, to make the latter part of the drive alone.

The attention of the late John M. Clayton was called to the boy and the eminent lawyer proposed to educate him for the law. Although ambitious, the lad proudly declined the offer and determined to stand by his mother, and educate his sister. At the age of fourteen he apprenticed himself to the New Castle Manufacturing Company, of which the late Andrew C. Gray was president, to learn the trade of a machinist. Then he borrowed money and bought his mother a home, which he had paid for at the expiration of his apprenticeship. Meanwhile he studied hard and became an expert mechanic. It was he who put the engine in the first hoop boat built for the California trade. So pleased was the captain of the steamer that he offered young Herbert the position of engineer of the vessel. Some months of his apprenticeship were still due, and Mr. Gray declining to release him, the proposition could not be accepted.

Soon after attaining his majority he engaged in the grocery business, and entered upon a prosperous business career, which he continued until 1866, when he was elected the first Democratic sheriff that New Castle County had had for ten years, defeating Samuel Allen, a very popular Republican candidate. As sheriff he made himself popular with all good citizens and was vigilant and fearless in the discharge of all his duties. Among the many notable instances of his nerve and energy was his prevention of the famous Collyer-Kelly prize-fight on Delaware soil in 1857. A ring had already been pitched about a mile from Newark, and everything was ready for the fray, when the plucky little sheriff stepped into the ring and, despite the threats of the sluggers and ruffians that had thronged to see the mill, compelled them to pull up their stakes and leave. That the fight shortly afterwards took place over the line in Pennsylvania was no fault of his, for it was beyond his jurisdiction. Of the three hundred and sixty-seven prisoners entrusted to his care during this term not a single one escaped, though the New Castle jail has been a very leaky institution at various periods. So valuable were his services that he was induced to remain as deputy under his successor, Jacob Richardson.

From his early boyhood Mr. Herbert has taken an active interest in political affairs and has participated in every campaign, wielding probably a greater influence than any man in his section. His first official position was that of collector of taxes for New Castle Hundred. For thirty years he has been a member of City Council and many years its president. At present he is president of the Board of Education, of which he has been many years a member. On May 14, 1859, he was elected a trustee of the New Castle Commons, and has been treasurer twenty years. In 1875 he was elected county treasurer by the Levy Court, and served by successive re-election until after his election as State treasurer, by the State Legislature, January 20, 1887. In these capacities he has been a regular "watch-dog" of the treasury.

For at least thirty-five years he has attended every Democratic County and State Convention and also attended the National Democratic Convention of 1880, at Cincinnati and 1884, at Chicago, in the interest of Thomas F. Bayard for the Presidential nomination. Mr. Herbert was prominently pushed forward by his friends as a candidate for the Democratic nomination for Governor in 1886, and received seventy votes against one hundred for Benjamin T. Bigge, his successful competitor in the State Convention.

In civil life he has been just as active, and no man in New Castle has done more to promote the interests of the city than he. Every public improvement has found in him an active promoter. To his efforts, in great measure, are due the building of the Grand Opera-House, of which he is president of the board of trustees; the establishment of the New Castle water works, of which he is a director; and the formation of the New Castle Fire Company, of which he is a member. Mr. Herbert donated the ground for the erection of the Red Men's Hall, saved the colored M. E. Church of New Castle from the hands of the sheriff, and has done much to assist worthy men in their business relations. He is secretary and treasurer of the Tasker Loan Association and is treasurer of the New Castle Loan Association. For about thirty-five years he has been a member of Washington Lodge, No. 5, I. O. O. F., and its secretary for thirty-one of the fifty-years of its existence, during which it has had but two permanent secretaries. He has been a representative to the Grand Lodge of Delaware, and has attended the Sovereign Grand Lodge of the United States. He has been a member of St. John's Lodge, No. 2, A. F. A. M., of which he is the treasurer.

Mr. Herbert was married to Miss Annie E. Crow, of New Castle, June 4, 1852, the ceremony being performed in the Town Hall, in the presence of a large concourse of people. Of this union there have been born eleven children, as follows: William Black Herbert, marshal at the Consular Court of the United States at Kanagawa, Japan; Frank Edwin Herbert, notary public, conveyancer and accountant at New Castle; and assistant to the State treasurer; Edwin Mandeville Herbert, a farmer of New Castle Hundred; Allen Lee Herbert, who died in infancy, about twenty years ago; Evan Bayard Herbert, who died October 6, 1885, in his nineteenth year; Harry Warner Herbert, an apprentice clerk in the United States Fish Commission; Annie Virginia, wife of Edward F. Kemp, of Syracuse, N. Y.; Kate May, Agnes Johnson, Carrie Vandeveer and Bessie Lechler, all single and living at home.

The New Castle Female Benevolent Society was incorporated January 28, 1817, with Ann Johns, Anna McCalmon, Sally McCalmon and Mary Riddle as trustees, for the purpose of establishing a charity-school. The project was not successful. A number of private schools have been opened, but few were continued more than a few years.

Public Library.—An effort was made soon after 1800 to establish a library at New Castle, and in January, 1812, the New Castle Library Company was chartered by James Rogers, James R. Black, James Couper, Jr., George Strawbridge, Thomas Stockton, Alexander Reynolds and George Read, Jr. There was additional legislation January 24, 1832, whereby the company was empowered to hold books, papers, etc., not to exceed eight thousand dollars in value. The original president was James Couper, and Wm. B. Janvier was secretary, November 30, 1819, when a catalogue was issued embracing nineteen classes of standard books, carefully selected. The library was placed in the academy building, where it has since remained. An effort was made to build a library hall. An act was passed by the Legislature, in 1812, "for raising by lottery a sum not exceeding eight thousand dollars, for the purpose of erecting a building for the accommodation of St. John's Masonic Lodge and the New Castle Library Company." James Rogers, Thomas Stockton, George Read, James Couper, Jr., and Evan Thomas were named as managers. The first floor of the building, when completed, was to be used by the library company and the second floor by the Masons for the meetings of St. John's Lodge, No. 2. Nothing ever resulted from this movement. The organization of the company has been kept up continuously, and the yearly subscriptions have not only been sufficient to secure the current standard books for a library of this nature, but have contributed to a building fund, which will make the erection of a library hall possible in the near future.

In 1887 the library contained five thousand volumes, which were accessible to the public twice per week. Since 1877 W. J. Ferris has been librarian. Alexander Cooper held the same position many years. The officers and trustees of the company at the same time were Samuel Guthrie, president; B. G. Cooper, secretary and treasurer; John H. Rodney, George F. Tybout, John T. Black and Samuel M. Couper, directors. The library has been one of the most valuable educational institutions of the town.
CHAPTER XLIV.

CHRISTIANA HUNDRED.

This division borders on the Pennsylvania line, and extends to the Christiana Creek, comprising that part of the county which lies between Brandywine and Red Clay Creeks. It thus embraces the hills which border those precipitous streams, causing its general surface to be elevated and broken, excepting along the Christiana, where it expands into low lands, a small portion being of a marshy nature. The soil is generally fertile, and many excellent farms abound, some having costly buildings. There are also a number of country homes, with extensive grounds and other improvements, to enhance the appearance of a naturally attractive country, making this one of the most pleasant sections.

On account of their situation, much of the history of the hundred is blended with that of Newport and Wilmington, but separate interests are detailed in the following pages.

A number of land grants were made in the territory now comprised in Christiana Hundred soon after the English obtained possession of the country. A large tract of land lying between Christiana and Mill Creeks, extending from the mouth of the latter nearly to where Newport now is, and north to Mill Creek, containing about one thousand two hundred acres, was granted by Governor Francis Lovelace, a mill, as shown in the agreement following: "This may certify that, according to agreement of Arnoldus De Lagrange, Broor Sinnexsen and Gysbert Walraven, there is laid out for a mill a certain tract of land, situate, lying and being on ye south side of a branch of Christiana Creek, commonly called Little Falls Creek," eighteen acres surveyed 7th of Second Month, 1684. This mill was bought of the different owners, in 1723 and 1726, by John Richardson, who had begun buying lands soon after the division in 1688. In August, 1687, he purchased the Walraven tract of one hundred and ninety-five acres, and in 1723 the Richardsons built a large stone house on it. Later, another large stone house was built on the same tract, nearer the mill. It was erected by Richard Richardson in 1765, and is located on the Newport turnpike, about one-half mile from the present limits of the city of Wilmington. The land on which it stands was part of the "old mill tract," granted to three of the original Swedish settlers, named Broor Sinnexsen, Gysbert Walraven and Arnoldus De Lagrange, in the year 1688. The whole of the mill tract, comprising about eighteen acres, together with the adjoining property on the south, was owned by John Richardson at the time of his death, in the year 1755; and he by will devised "the mill lands and mill, and the house and improvements which is thereupon," to his son, Richard Richardson, who at that time was a bachelor of thirty-five years. Ten years after, in 1765, he built the house, as shown above, and the year following was married to Sarah Tatnall, daughter of Edward Tatnall, a prosperous miller on the Brandywine. The house is built of stone, quarried presumably on the premises, or taken from the bed of Mill Creek, a few hundred yards away. The wood used in its construction was probably found near at hand, as the adjoining farm land was for many years afterward covered with the best quality of timber. At the time it was built no house in the neighborhood equalled it in size or pretensions. It is related that the residents of Newport, at that time a village of more importance than Wilmington, would come on foot to see the "big house on the hill," deeming it a wonderful production of the artisan's skill. The interior of the house is marked by a spacious hallway, high ceilings, open fire-places in every room, and chimneys that are marvels of strength. The exterior is the same as when built, and for one hundred and twenty-two years no change has marred its original construction either on the exterior or interior. B. Richardson died in 1797, and bequeathed the property to his son Joseph, the oldest of his seven children. Joseph Richardson owned and occupied it during his life-time, and at his death, in 1835, it descended to his seven children, he having made no will. In 1837 Joseph's heir joined in a deed

OLD RICHARDSON HOUSE, (NOW OWNED BY H. C. CONRAD.)

September 1, 1669, to Andries Andersen, Seneca Broor and Gysbert Walraven. Not long after this Andersen died, leaving his property to his widow and five children. The other two-thirds soon after passed to Arnoldus De Lagrange and others. In 1688 the whole tract was owned by De Lagrange, Walraven and Broor Sinnexsen, who had married the widow of Anderson. In April of that year this tract was divided, but they kept in common a tract of eighteen acres of mill land, on which, before 1687, they built of the property to Samuel Richardson, the oldest son of Joseph, and Samuel owned and occupied it until his death, when by will it was devised to Joseph S. Richardson, the only son of Samuel Richardson. In 1887 the house, with fourteen acres of land, was purchased by Henry C. Conrad, Esq., of Wilmington, who is now making some additions and improvements in the property, with a view of making it his home in the near future. As far as known, the place has never had a local name, but Mr. Conrad has recently christened it “Glynnich.”

The descendants of John Richardson continued to live here, and in 1785 rebuilt the mill, which is still standing. Much of the land acquired in the last century is still owned by the Richardson family, but part of the mill tract became the property of Henry C. Conrad.

In the division of the above tract, in 1683, De Lagrange Walraven took one hundred and eighty-one acres, lying on the west side of the tract, adjoining lands of Conrad Constantine, on which Newport was later built. He also had a tract lying near the mouth of Mill Creek.

Guysbert Walraven had his home lot on the creek, containing twenty-nine acres, east of De Lagrange, now owned by the Latimers, and on which the old Walraven house still stands. He also had one hundred and ninety-five acres of land lying on Mill Creek, above Sinnexen and south of the mill lands, which were in a neck; and also thirty acres of marsh land, at the junction of the two creeks.

Brook Sinnexen, who married the widow of Andries Andersen, was instructed by the court that he should enjoy the third part of the estate, educate the minors and when they were of age should pay each five hundred guilders.

These minors were Christian, Andreas, James, Evart and Peter, all of whom attained their majority before 1796.

Sinnexen bequeathed part of his property to his son, James, and after her death, in 1708, the remainder of the estate passed to his wife, Sophia, for life, and after her death to his sons, Brook, John and James.

The Sinnexen lands are mostly owned, at present, by the Lynam family. The last of the name Sinnexen died a few years ago, and was known as Sinnex.

Conrad Constantine, in 1683, was in possession of a tract of land containing six hundred and thirty acres, lying on Christiana Creek, west of the large tract of De Lagrange, Walraven and Sinnexen. One hundred acres of it passed to Henry Parker, who, April 26, 1731, sold it to John Justinia, it being on the east side of Rainbow Run. The rest of the tract remained in the hands of the Constantines until after 1740.

Arnoldus De Lagrange had surveyed to him, in 1684, on the north side of Christiana Creek, and adjoining the lands of Sinnexen, two hundred and fifty acres, and on a warrant bearing date 21st of Twelfth Month, 1682, four hundred acres on Christiana Creek.

July 29, 1685, on a warrant, there was “laid out for Neal Laeson’s friend” a tract of land of eight hundred acres, on the north side of Red Clay Creek, called “Oak Hill” and for Neilis Laeson, March 12, 1684, nine hundred and thirty-six acres.

January 4, 1702, there was laid out for Jacob and Hendrick Hendrickson a tract of three hundred acres, called “Jacob’s Possession,” on the south side of the Brandywine, bounded south by Adam Stidman’s land, called “Adam’s Garden;” north by land of Mathias Defose’s and by Squirrel Creek, which had been taken up March 12, 1684.

On the Brandywine, between Rattlesnake Run and Stony Run, a tract of two hundred and sixty-eight acres was resurveyed, on a warrant, April 19, 1744, for Andrew Hendrickson, Sr., and Andrew Hendrickson, Jr.

The upper part of the hundred was included in the manors of the Penns, and patents were granted for lands lying therein after 1684.

Among the principal ones were the following: In Rockland Manor, William Gregg was granted a warrant, January 26, 1684, for four hundred acres of land, which was surveyed May 11, 1685, and April 23, 1692, was divided by Henry Hollingsworth between John and Richard Gregg, sons of William. It was adjoining lands of Matthias Defose, on Squirrel Creek. Richard Gregg had in the division one hundred and fifty acres. John Gregg had a warrant dated August 18, 1734, for a tract of two hundred and fifty acres of land at the mouth of Squirrel Creek, a branch of the Brandywine.

Thomas Hollingsworth received warrants for several tracts of land as follows: February 4, 1701, eight hundred and eighteen acres; May 20, 1703, two hundred acres; Samuel Hollingsworth, January 27, 1685, three hundred acres. The last-mentioned tract was released to Thomas Hollingsworth and was confirmed by patent May 7, 1705.

On the 20th of May, 1685, a warrant was granted to John Gregg for two hundred acres and confirmed by patent February 18, 1698. Gregg sold the tract to Samuel Underwood, Sr., who, by will, June 11, 1722, conveyed fifty acres on the east end to his son Samuel. The executor sold part to John Gregg, who, February 18, 1733, sold to Jonathan Strange fifty acres, who, April 26, 1744, received warrant for fifty-one acres adjoining his own land and land of Samuel and John Dennis, which was patented May 3, 1744. Upon this land, lying on the Brandywine and a small run, he erected a fulling-mill, grist-mill, saw-mill and other buildings. January 29, 1738, Strange sold to John Smith three acres of the land, which was known as “ye saw-mill lands,” together with “ye grist-mill, saw-mills, bolting-mills, mill-races, dams, ponds, wheels, flood-gates, waste-gates, ditches, etc., together with right to make dam above Jonathan Strange’s fulling-mills as they now stand.”

At a later period John Smith owned considerable land in that part of the hundred. The greater portion of the manor lands along the Brandywine have passed into the possession of the Du Ponts, and have been brought into a high state of cultivation.
Anthony Burgess took out a warrant April 15, 1686, for three hundred acres, which was called "Cole Harbour," in the vicinity of Newport.

On the 8th of May, 1678, a warrant was issued to Tyman Stidham for one hundred acres, for which a warrant for resurvey was granted April 19, 1744, when the tract by diver convervances had been increased to two hundred and sixty-eight acres. Among the later warrants was one granted by the proprietor, March 25, 1755, to Richard Baker, for two hundred acres of land on the road which, in 1811, became the Wilmington and Kennett Turnpikes. William Kil- len, the deputy surveyor, made the following note concerning the property: "It lies on the great road leading from Wilmington to Kennett, 8 miles distant, from said town, and is generally poor stony ground; better than one-half is cleared, with a good stone house, two-story high thereon. Joshua Baker, father of the aforesaid Richard, died possessed of the premises, leaving issue nine children, all of whom except three, that are absent, claim a right in the same."

The Hollingsworth family owned a large tract of land near the Pennsylvania line, and near Hollingsworth Ford one of the members, Joseph, built a small mill to turn out bowls and wooden-ware and to spin wire. The power was abandoned before 1800, and forty years later a poplar tree two and a half feet in diameter was growing on the site of the mill. Joseph Hollingsworth divided his land among three sons—Thomas, Amor and Isaac. The latter built a house in 1769 of yellow poplar plank, four inches in thickness, which is still standing, as the homestead of Henry Swayne. It became the property of Joel Swayne in 1821, and was one of the first Hollingsworth tracts that passed out of the family; but since that time all their lands have been sold and none of that name remain. The old Gregg lands have also passed to other ownerships. A mansion built in 1749 of stone, with walls two feet in thickness, was retained by the family many years, but the place has become one of the Du Pont farms, and but one direct descendant remains near the place of nativity.

George Chandler emigrated to America in 1687 and settled on a tract of land, which has remained in possession of the family ever since it was deeded to it. In 1887 the old homestead was owned by Jesse Chandler, a descendant of a later generation, and many others of the same lineage were honored citizens of the hundred. The J. Poulson Chandler farm has also passed through the hands of several generations. The fine brick mansion on it was built in 1805, by Joseph and Benjamin Chandler, and is not as near the highway as was the old house, which has been removed. Above this tract of land was the home of Alphonso Kirk, the grandfather of Caleb Kirk, the manufacturer. The former owns the land on which stands the Friends’ Meeting-house, near Centerville. One of his sons, William, became a citizen of Chester County, Pa., and from his family have descended many of the prominent people of that section. The name is not perpetuated in Christian Hundred.

South of Centerville, William Dixon made notable improvements, soon after the settlement of the Chandlers, and his descendants later built a mill in that section, which is till standing. Alexander H. Dixon (a son of William of a later generation, born in 1804), is a resident of Centerville. The homestead has become the property of others. But very little of the foregoing lands can be traced to the original proprietors in an unbroken succession of family ownership. Neater the Christians Creek the Crans, Armstrong and Cranston families have for many years been amongst the most prominent and useful citizens of the hundred.

The following is "A List of the Taxable Persons and Estates in Christian Hundred, taken by Robert Hamilton, Col’r of S’d Hundred, September 28, 1787:

NEW CASTLE COUNTY.
railroads, some of the former dating from the settlement of the country, though somewhat modified as to their course in later years. In 1738 the road from Garrett's to the Hockessin meeting-house was laid out, and the road from the Brandywine to intersect this was located in 1735. Prior to this time the roads which afterwards became turnpikes were located, excepting the modification of their course when they became improved highways. The Kennett pike was built in 1812, and the Lancaster pike at a later period, both being excellent roads before railways removed the necessity for their use for other than local travel. In 1887 they were practically common highways, many of the toll-gates having been removed.

The Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad was built through the hundred in 1831, and later, the Wilmington and Northern, in 1869 and 1870, the Wilmington and Western in 1872, and the Baltimore and Ohio in 1886. The last two roads are operated as one system, thus affording extended facilities for the many industrial establishments which have been located in the hundred on the opposite banks of the Brandywine and Red Clay Creeks. Both streams have been well spanned by bridges, the most important ones having been built on the Brandywine, at Smith's Ford, in 1816; at Young & Kirk's Ford, in 1818; Manufacturers Bridge, in 1832; on the Red Clay, at Philip's Mill, after 1802; and at other points on the same stream at later periods. Some of these were replaced by very substantial structures and are more fully noted elsewhere.

After a lapse of more than thirty years a great many of the foregoing industries had ceased to exist, and others had passed under new management. But if the number of the establishments was less, the product and value were far greater on account of the improved machinery and better methods employed. The manufacturing interests became the most important factors in the industrial history of the community and have ever since so continued.

In 1854 the most important industries were:

Alexander H. Adams..................grist-mill
Joseph Bancroft......Rockford Cotton Mill, 28 Tenements
Chas. J. Du Pont Est..........................Bokiey Factory
E. J. du Pont & Co., Upper Powder Mills, 28 Tenements; Hagley Powder Mill, 28 Tenements; Henry Clay Factory; barley mill; Squirrel Run Mill
Wm. E. Garrett..........................two saw-mills
Samuel Richardson..........................grist and saw-mills
Riddle & Lawrence.................cotton factory, 52 Tenements

Most of these are now classed as industries on "Brandywine Bank," and are elsewhere specially mentioned.

At Rockland, Caleb Kirk began his improvements about 1795, building the large stone mansion near the grist-mill in 1797. The fulling-mill on Wilson's Run had been built by Thomas Hollingsworth at an earlier period. The saw-mill was on the site of the present Le Carpentier grist-mill. In the course of years the Kirk grist-mill was sold to the Young family who operated it in connection with their interests on the other side of the Brandywine a number of years, but finally turned it to other uses. About 1812 Caleb Kirk put up a cotton factory, higher up on Wilson's Run, and operated the same eight or ten years. Subsequently this stone building was used as a tin-smith shop, large quantities of ware being there made. It is still standing on the Le Carpentier place, serving as a farm building. This was one of the first cotton factories in the State, but was unfavorably located for extensive business.

William Wilson's old saw-mill, built in the last century, was more than a mile up the Run. About 1885 Jesse Chandler put up a new mill which was soon after burned down. In 1854 Alexander H. Adams had a grist-mill at this site, which is still standing, as the property of the du Pont family. The water power being weak, it has a small capacity.

For its volume Red Clay Creek affords a number of excellent powers, which were improved and utilized soon after the settlement of that section of the hundred. One of the oldest sites in Christiana is that which has so long been the property of the Garrett family. As early as 1749 John Garrett, Jr., was granted title to some of this land, by the will of his father, while another son, Thomas, in the same way, became the owner of property in Mill Creek Hundred. In 1771 this mill is spoken of "as being near John Garrett's, on the Oke Exxon Road." Since 1782 the former has been employed to operate snuff mills, and from a small beginning, on the site of the old mill, have grown the extensive works, operated in 1887, as the business of Wm. E. Garrett & Sons. The property extends half a mile along the creek, from Yorklyn Station down the stream, and the buildings were erected as business increased. In 1846, No. 1 mill was built of stone three stories high, but has been remodeled and much improved since that time. What is now known as Mill No. 4, on the lower site, a four-story stone building was erected in 1849, the brick addition being built at a later day. No. 2 mill was put up in 1874, and No. 4 in 1884. Both are four stories high, the latter being of brick. Nos. 1, 2 and 3 are all connected, and, since 1874, the water power has been supplemented by steam. In 1872 shipping facilities were offered at Yorklyn, by the Western Railroad, (completed that year) and, since 1884, goods have been loaded at the warehouse at the mills, from which a siding was built to the main track. Like facilities are afforded at the lower mill. Since January, 1857, the manager of the upper mill has been Israel Durham, and J. L. Press, manager of the lower mills, having succeeded William Press. The mills are supplied with improved machinery for manufacturing cut snuff, which has a high reputation in the home and foreign markets. The plant also embraces several mansions and tenements and the property is kept in excellent order.

Above Garrett's is a manufacturing site called Auburn, and also formerly known as Pusey's Mills, for spinning cotton. After the late war the property passed into the hands of William Clark, who operated the mill on woolen yarns, working in connection with Henry Clark's mills, in Mill Creek Hundred. In 1869 the mill was destroyed by fire and has not been rebuilt. The plant also included a number of substantial tenements.

At Ashland Station, below Garrett's, is a grist-mill, which includes a part of a building put up in 1715. A stone mansion near by, it is believed, was built the same year, while the brick house on the hill was erected by W. & M. Gregg in 1737. At that time they also owned the mill. Later owners were R. Phillips and John C. Philips, but since 1862 the property has belonged to A. & J. D. Sharpless. In 1883 the mill was supplied with roller machinery.

Lower down the creek, and at the lowest seat on the stream, on the Christiana side, is the old grist-mill of Joshua Lobb, which was also long owned by the Speakman family. James Wilson is the present owner. The mill has been enlarged, but is confined to custom work. A machine-shop formerly carried on at this place has been abandoned.

Near the mouth of Burris Run Hayes Graves is the owner of a saw-mill, which occupies an old site; and higher up the same stream, near the Pennsylvania line, W. Passmore has built a grist-mill within recent years. A site still higher up has been vacated.

The old Dixon Mill, on Dixon's Run, a very aged structure, is still used in a small way as the property of the Edwin Griffith estate; and on Mill Creek remains the time-honored land-mark of Richardson's Mill, for more than a century the property of that family. Its capacity is also small.

The business interests of the hundred, outside of Newport, and what is now comprised within the limits of Wilmington, are confined to a few small villages, of which Centreville is the most important. It has a very pleasant location, on the Kennett Pike, seven miles from Wilmington, on a tract of land said to be the highest in the State. There are a number of fine residences, a good public hall, several stores and an inn. In the locality are houses of worship belonging to the Friends and the Presbyterians, and some old mansions, on highly improved farms, this being one of the richest sections of the hundred.

Centreville was an active business point sixty years ago, and had in 1821 a good store, kept by James Delaplaine, who prospered there as a merchant. William Todd and Ezekiel Bailey each had good inns; and there were mechanics of all kinds, among them being John McCullough, blacksmith; Benjamin Hollingsworth and Bernard Dalton, carpenters; Joseph Hollingsworth, wheelwright; John Kitchen, stone mason; Levi Walker and Henry Jeffers, farmers; and George Matson, drayer.

The inns were taxed to their uttermost to accommodate all the guests, as many as fifty teams stopping in one night. Liquor was freely used, and also sold at the store to the extent of a wagon-load per week. The Bailey stand has been discontinued, but where William and (later) Rebecca Todd entertained the public, stands a hotel remodeled and enlarged by James Lancaster. An early innkeeper at this place was a member of the Twaddle family. Near the State line Charles Twaddle was the keeper of a public house, which has long since been closed, but was a long time famous as the "Delaware and Pennsylvania Inn."

At the Delaplaine stand Thomas Dalton engaged in trade in 1846, and continued until 1877, when he removed to his present place of business, in Odd Fello's Hall. He is now (1888) one of the oldest merchants in the county, and is also the postmaster of the Centreville office.

In 1887 W. C. R. Colquhoun was the druggist of the village and Dr. J. H. Chandler the resident physician. His predecessors in this profession were Doctors J. P. Chandler, George Hamilton and a number of others for short periods, some of them also eminent practitioners.

On the Kennett Pike, below Centreville, was the "Blue Ball Inn," a well-known hostelry in the early part of the century, which was long kept by the Hamilton family. It was removed, after the era of travel on the turnpike, and a farm-house marks its site. The "Buck Tavern," lower down the road, where Peter Hendrickson long dispensed hospitality, has also passed away; and the "Columbus Inn," on the same road, is within the present limits of Wilmington.

At Du Pont's Works goods have been sold by Andrew Fontaine, Jonathan Shipley, James Bratten and Victor Sterling. Since 1856 merchandising in connection with his business at the old hotel and store stand of William S. Fleming, where he has traded since 1875. This old building is a landmark, and was enlarged to its present size in 1820. Lower down the creek, and near Wilmington, is Rising Sun, a locality which took its name from the old public-house of Patrick Higgins, long kept at that point. It was converted into a residence and a more pretentious inn opened, which is known as the "Jefferson House," and having Thomas Toy as the proprietor. In this manufacturing village several stores are maintained, and mail facilities are afforded by the Henry Clay post-office, which was established at the factory of that name. It was long kept at the drug-store of John Wood, but since 1885 Timothy McCarthy has been the postmaster, keeping the office at his place of business. Nearer the city is the suburbs of Highlands, on a commanding tract of land, plated into town lots by the Brindle family. The first residence was here put up in 1878 by John S. Miller.
Above the clustering hamlets along the Brandywine is Greenville, a post-office and station on the W. and N. R. R., where it crosses the Kennett Pike. The office was established in 1871 with W. R. Brinckle as postmaster, who also engaged in business at this point as a coal and lumber dealer. In 1887 Charles Green was associated with him in carrying on this trade. A similar business at Silver Brook has been carried on since 1882 by C. F. White & Bros.

On the Western Railroad post-offices are maintained at Ashland, J. D. Sharpless, postmaster, and at Yorklyn, at the store of E. H. Dennison, who succeeded James W. Robinson in trade at Auburn Mills. Other parties had merchandized at this place; and in other localities of the hundred small places of business have been established which have not attained the character of a hamlet.

Centerville Lodge, No. 37, I. O. O. F.— This society received its charter December 10, 1874, and was formally instituted June 13, 1875, with the following principal officers: N. G., Francis Green; V. G., Joseph Pyle; R. S., George W. Ely; F. S., Dr. Joseph H. Chandler; Treas., Wm. Carpenter.

At the first meeting six persons applied for membership, and five months later the number belonging had increased to sixty-one persons. The lodge has had a flourishing existence reporting one hundred and thirteen members in 1886, when the aggregate belonging had reached one hundred and sixty-two. Its finances have always been on a good basis, more than four thousand dollars being invested for the good of the order, and about three thousand dollars have been paid for sick benefits. The principal officers are: Dr. J. Harvey Day, Noble Grand; Bernard Dalton, F. S.; Dr. Chandler and A. B. Entriken, trustees.

The meetings are held in the third-story of Centerville Hall, a brick edifice twenty-eight by forty-five feet, erected in 1876, at a cost of five thousand dollars, by an association formed for this purpose. The second-story of this building forms a public hall, and the lower floor is used for business purposes. The directing members of the Association in 1887, were Joseph H. Chandler, J. Paulson Chandler, A. B. Entriken, Wm. L. Dilworth, James L. Carpenter and James Dilworth.

Washington Conclave, I. O. of H., was instituted in the above hall, February 22, 1886, with twenty-one members. In 1887, there were thirty-five persons belonging, having as officers: James H. Carpenter, A. W. Wilson, W. S. Salley, W. C. R. Colquhoun, B. Dalton, A. B. Entriken, Joseph H. Chandler and J. Harvey Day. This order is purely benevolent.

Center Grange, No. 11, P. of H., was organized at Centerville, fifteen years ago, and has maintained regular meetings ever since. In this period there have been seasons of growth and declining interest, but in 1887 there were thirty members and the affairs were in good condition. Meetings were held in Centerville Hall.

Eagle Lodge, No. 36, I. O. O. F., was instituted at du Pont's Mills, under a charter granted December 15, 1874, to the following persons: William Allison, Jonas W. Miller, James A. Stirling, Robert Gamble, Samuel Kelley, Wm. B. Wood, Samuel J. Davis, John Ball, Jr., John Q. Stirling, John Rummer, Neal Conley, Joseph Knox.

In 1887 it had a vigorous membership, and was on a good basis financially. This Lodge is an offshoot of Brandywine Lodge, No. 18, I. O. O. F., which was instituted lower down the creek in October, 1847. Its meetings have been regularly maintained since that period, and the membership has generally been large. In 1887 the number reached one hundred and fifty-five, the majority of whom were in good standing.

Since 1871 the meetings have been held in a spacious, well furnished lodge-room, which is also occupied by other societies. The Lodge has a fund of three thousand dollars, and has been of important social factor in the community. The trustees in 1887 were Sam'l Moore, Rob't Printer and Henry Stewart.

Here, also was held the meeting of Union Encampment, No. 7, which yielded up its organization in 1878, although having at that time twenty-one members. Its dissolution was caused by simple lack of interest and nearness to Wilmington.

Du Pont Lodge, No. 29, A. F. & A. M., was instituted under a warrant granted October 4, 1876, and had as its First Master, John Taylor. Other Past Masters are: James Fisher, William H. Miller, John S. Miller, John Q. Stirling and B. F. Sheppard. The lodge has prospered, and had fifty members in 1887.

Wawaset Tribe, No. 9, I. O. of R. M., was instituted July 19, 1871, with eighteen charter members, and the following principal officers: G. H. Dugdale, R. O. Greenleaf, John Gardner, S. J. Davis, James A. Stirling and John Q. Stirling.

The meetings are held in Odd Fellows Hall, and the Tribe has prospered. In 1887 there were sixty members.

Brandywine Lodge, No. 15, K. of P., was instituted in Brandywine Hall, July 11, 1872. For several years the Lodge prospered, but a lack of interest following the meetings were discontinued, and the charter surrendered. There were about thirty members.

Religious Interests.—The earliest organized religious effort was made by the Friends. Some of the first members of the Newark Meeting in Brandywine Hundred, lived in Christians and were regular attendants of those meetings until 1687. In that year George Harlan and others petitioned to have a meeting on the west side of the stream, in winter, on account of the "dangerousness of the ford," which they would have to cross. In 1690 the Meeting established a short time previously became permanent, and in 1708 a small wooden church was built for its accommodation. Monthly Meetings had also been established, and alternated with Newark until they were then...

abandoned, when they were held in connection with Kennett Square, and, in later years, with Hockessin. In 1794 the need of a larger and better meeting-house caused the members to unite their subscriptions to build the same, as follows:

Six acres of land were deeded by Alphonso Kirk for the use of the Meeting, upon part of which was built, in 1796, a brick house, thirty by forty feet, which is still standing, in good condition.

The graveyard was improved in 1857, and 1873, and is also in good order, being enclosed by a very substantial stone wall. On the eastern part of the grounds a log school building was put up before 1800, which was replaced with a stone structure in 1818. This was in use until 1854, when the present schoolhouse was erected, being at that time one of the best in the State. A generous Frenchman, Antonia Biderman, donated one thousand dollars for the erection of this building, being moved thereto by local pride and his interest in the cause of general education.

For many years the meetings at the Centre were the occasions of much edification and large attendance, embracing, in 1821, thirty-nine families. In each succeeding year the members became less in numbers, owing to deaths and changes in population, until, in 1887, but a few families remained. The monthly meetings were permanently discontinued in 1884.

The Lower Brandywine Presbyterian Church has a history as an organized body which is antedated only by that of the Friend's Centre Meeting. Its origin can be distinctly traced back to 1720, when the Presbyterian Synod, assembled in Philadelphia, was asked to supply preaching for "some people in and about Birmingham, upon the Brandywine," and when the Rev. Daniel McGill was instructed to preach to this people as he in "Christian prudence" should find occasion.

The Birmingham here spoken of is the southwest township of Delaware County, Penna., where the first meeting-house was built. For this purpose a tract of land was purchased, October 15, 1720, and a deed therefor executed to "John Kirkpatrick, James Houston, James Mole, William Smith, Magnus Simonson, Ananias Higgins, John Heath, members of the Presbyterian Meeting in Birmingham." The house stood near the foot of what was formerly called "Bald Hill," and was of hewed logs. Near by was a good spring, which may have had something to do in the selection of this spot, being a matter of great convenience for the congregation during the noon hour. The house stood until 1773, and possibly later, the exact time of its removal being unknown. A part of the half acre lot was used for burial purposes, and an interment was made there as late as 1820. It has since become neglected.

In the course of fifty years the church had become dilapidated and too small to accommodate the congregation, many of the members of which lived on the west side of the Brandywine, while the meeting-house, as has been stated, was on the east side of the stream. The question of building a new house being agitated, very naturally the people on the west side of the Brandywine, being in the majority, desired to have the house erected in their midst or at least to share honors with the old site and to have new houses built in each locality. Neither proposition was accepted by the minority and the question of building was a matter of controversy more than three years. In this period many of the members connected themselves with the churches at Wilmington. In the mean time the pastor left and the church was without a regular service several years, which had the effect of still more dispersing the members, and it became apparent that if the organization was to be preserved a new house of worship must be provided. Accordingly it was determined to build on the west side of the Brandywine, and within the bounds of the State of Delaware. This purpose not being approved by the adherents to the old site, that interest soon declined and the old church passed out of existence as a place of worship about 1778.

In August, 1774, the distinctive history of the present Lower Brandywine Church had its beginning. On the 22d of August of that year Jeremiah Smith deeded not quite two acres of land to John Bratton, George Craighead and John Armstrong, as trustees for the congregation, and the work of building a new house of worship was begun. It was a small log building, but for many years accommodated the congregation which could not have had more than forty members when it was completed. There was no means of heating the house, and those attending had nothing but the fervor of the minister's discourse to keep them warm. After 1855 the church was weatherboarded and plastered, thus being made more portable and inviting. It continued in use until the fall of 1861, when the new edifice having been erected it was taken down and used in building horse sheds, but the ruins of its foundation may still be seen.

The movement to build a new church was begun April 15, 1859, when a meeting to determine this purpose was held. The project was received with so much favor that it was "Resolved that the trustees be authorized to proceed immediately to have a new church erected, and that the following persons be appointed a building committee: John Brannen, David Martin, Peter W. Gregg, Samuel Armstrong, Reece Pyle, William Armstrong, J. Paulson Chandler, James L. Deleplain." Work progressed so rapidly that the corner-stone was laid September 1, 1859, and the dedication followed November 8, 1860. It is a plain but substantial brick building, seating four hundred people, and has basement accommodations for Sunday-school and lecture purposes. The cost of the structure was five thousand dollars exclusive of the labor performed by the congregation, which at the time did not number more than twenty persons. The liberal donation of a Mr. Gamble aided much to complete the Sabbath-school rooms of the church, a means which has greatly promoted the welfare of the congregation, which was one hundred and fifty-nine members strong, in 1887. The Sunday-school had a membership of two hundred and ninety-eight at the same time.

At a later period a parsonage was provided near the church on three acres of land, and other improvements made. June 1887, the property was in charge of trustees Frederick Blair, George I. Penn, George K. Woodward, William Carpenter, Henry Chandler and Milliard F. Day.

The Rev. Robert Cathcart appears to have been the first pastor of the church, beginning his ministry in November, 1750, serving also the congregation at Middletown, and continued about eleven years. A vacancy in the pulpit followed, the only preaching being by supplies until April 18, 1769, when the Rev. Joseph Smith was ordained pastor. But owing to the division of the congregation on account of the dissensions arising from the inability to agree upon a church site, this pastorate was continued only a little more than three years.

After preaching was established in the new church, in Christiana Hundred, Mr. Smith again became the pastor and continued until April, 1778. A short vacancy ensued when the Rev. Wm. R. Smith became the pastor of the Lower Brandywine and Wilmington churches, ministering to the latter only after October, 1785. For a number of years there was no pastor, and the congregation had become so weak that its existence was with difficulty sustained; and the preaching was by supplies, the Rev. Alexander Mitchell, filling the pulpit most frequently.

In September, 1801, the Rev. Thomas Grier, entered upon a pastorate of the Lower Brandywine and Middletown Churches, and was pastor and supply a little more than seven years. In the fall of 1809, the Rev. Nathaniel R. Snowden, became the stated supply, and so ministered several years. He was succeeded by a regular pastor, the Rev. Samuel Henderson, who was installed in November, 1813. This pastorate was terminated in less than a year.

A period of ten years now ensued in which there was no regular minister and, consequently, a dearth of spiritual matters. The Rev. James Taylor, next preached, serving in an independent connection. But in December, 1825, the Rev. Thomas Love became the pastor of the church, in connection with the congregation in Red Clay, and entered upon a ministry which was productive of much good. In 1828, the Presbytery of New Castle met with the church, and was entertained the first time in its history without ardent spirits. This was a bold departure from a long honored old custom, but the ladies of the church furnished an acceptable substitute in the tea which they provided, some of the presbyters testifying that "they never left a meeting with better feelings." From this time on temperance sentiment had an assured and steady growth. Closely connected with this feeling was the revival of 1831, which augmented the membership of the church to more than double its former proportions. In 1832, twenty-six more persons were added to the church. Mr. Love's pastorate continued until October, 1856, and was one of the longest and most eventful in the history of the church.

For a period of four years the pulpit was supplied, but in March, 1861, the Rev. David W. Moore became the pastor, beginning a ministry which added many members to the church, and more firmly established its temporal affairs. His pastoral relation was dissolved October 15, 1872, and for several months the pulpit was again supplied. In May, 1878, the Rev. George E. Jones was installed pastor, and acceptably filled that position until July, 1877. After an interval of a few months the Rev. Robert Graham, became the settled minister, and served from the fall of 1877, until October, 1883. Again the pulpit was supplied a short period, but since May, 1884, the pastor has been the Rev. T. R. McDowell under whose ministry the church continues to prosper.

Lower Brandywine has had so many seasons of growth, followed by corresponding ones of decline, but has outlived its vicissitudes, and although other churches of like faith have been established within the bounds of its original territory, it is to-day a strong, vigorous body, whose promise for usefulness in the future cannot be fairly estimated, but whose outlook is beneficent in the highest degree.

Green Hill Presbyterian Church was organized under the direction of the New Castle Presbytery, June 5, 1849. At the same time Alexander Stephens, John Wood and James Scanlan were elected ruling elders; and John McCartney and John Keowan deacons. But before this, Presbyterian meetings had been held in this neighborhood by the Rev. S. M. Gayley and others. The former became the first pastor, serving in connection with the Rockland Church, and remained the minister until 1851. Through his efforts the church building was begun, and the cornerstone laid November 15, 1848. But the edifice was not completed for several years, and the dedication did not take place until September 14, 1851, when the dedicatory sermon was preached by the Rev. G. L. Moore. The church is a commodious brick structure, and was erected under the supervision of John Wood, Alexander Stephens, James Stephens, John Peoples, Joseph Hendrickson, Taylor Crosby and Peter Gregg, who were, also, the first trustees of the Green Hill Cemetery, which became an incorporated body, by an act of the Legislature February 9, 1849. The grounds embrace three acres, situated a short distance from the Kennett Pike, two miles from Wilmington. The church has a central location in the cemetery, which contains many graves. Near by a parsonage was provided, at a later day, and the entire property is valued at twenty thousand dollars. In 1887 it was in charge of trustees J. Q. Stirling, S. F. Stirling, Robert Printer, Samuel Frizzell, Wm. H. Miller, Samuel Moore and J. M. Smyth. The members of the session at the same time were W. H. Oliver, J. Q. Stirling, W. H. Miller, Andrew Fleming, John Moore and James Smyth; and other elders have been Hugh Stirling, William Nevin and Robert Magee. The trustees and ruling elders also attend to the affairs of the Rockland Church, which is now practically a preaching station of Green Hill, and for more than thirty years has had the same ministerial service. In 1851 the Rev. S. M. Gayley was succeeded by the Rev. W. C. Willde, who was pastor three years. In 1855 the Rev. A. Tudhope supplied the pulpit. From 1856 to 1863 the Rev. James Otters was the pastor. The Rev. H. B. Scott occupied the same relation from 1864 to 1869. In November of the same year the Rev. G. L. Moore entered upon a ministry which continued until 1888, when he was succeeded by the Rev. Hugh K. Walker, who was pastor eighteen months. Since April, 1886, the pastor has been the Rev. J. C. Lenhard. In the fall of 1884 the church was visited with a revival of unusual interest, which resulted in fifty-four additions to the church membership. In June, 1887, the members numbered one hundred and sixty, forming an active progressive body. From the ranks of the church have gone as ministers the Revs. James Roberts and Henry Rumer, who have rendered effective service in other fields of labor.

Ebenezer Baptist Church was erected in the southwestern part of the hundred, more than half a century ago. The society which occupied it became extinct many years ago, and Union meetings or general religious exercises were afterwards held in the same house. About thirty years later the building was placed in the hands of a board of trustees, authorized for this purpose, who sold the building, and it was removed. The burial-ground on which it stood is still used by that community.

Mt. Salem Methodist Episcopal Church was founded at Riddle's Banks, on the Brandywine, in 1847, and the first meetings were held in the old Lyceum building. James Riddle was one of the early members and also a local preacher, an office which was shared by Franklin Supplee. John Miller, Jesse Elliott, William Henderson, Samuel Pierce, William Hart and William Henderson also belonged to the first classes. William Wler became connected soon after. Besides the preaching by the local men named above, a shipwright by the name of Kirkman, in the employ of Harlan & Hollingsworth, frequently preached and later came the Rev. Boswell and the regular appointees by Conference. In 1865 the charge became independent, and the ministers since that period have been the following:

Rev. W. S. Pugh------------------1855 Rev. John W. Weston-------------1873
Rev. O. W. Landreth----------1866 Rev. Charles F. Sheppard-------1877
Rev. John D. Higg-------------1868 Rev. G. L. Tomkinson---------1880
Rev. John France---------1873 Rev. R. C. Jones-----------1888

In 1847 the congregation erected its first house of worship, on the beautiful elevation overlooking the city of Wilmington, which appropriately received the name of Mount Salem. It was a two-story structure of stone and stood until it was taken down in 1878, when a new edifice took its site, the same year. The latter was built under the direction of a committee composed of John Macklan, Levi Garrett, William Maine and Lee T. Archer. It was a very fine building, but, unfortunately, was destroyed by fire in February, 1879, three months from the time it was completed. Although a loss of twelve thousand dollars was sustained, the work of restoration was at once begun, and June 14, 1879, the present fine church was dedicated—a worthy memorial to the devotion and perseverance of the membership of the congregation, who again expended about thirteen hundred dollars. In rebuilding, the tower of the old church was used, but the structure is almost wholly new and is one of the most substantial edifices of the kind in the county. The interior is beautifully finished and very inviting. In 1887 the property was controlled by trustees William Buck, Richard Brown, Hiram H. Cloud, George Walker, John W. Haley, John Benson, Moriah Lutton, John Larker and John S. Miller. These serve as an incorporated body, under an act of the Legislature, and also control the fine cemetery on the opposite side of the church. It was opened for burial purposes in the latter part of 1852, and the first person there interred was Ellen McCartney, who died January 1, 1853. Since that time it has become so rapidly filled that it has been found necesary to enlarge it. On part of this ground stands a good parsonage.

Connected with the general work of the church are the missionary efforts at Riddle Chapel and Centreville, giving it a wide field of labor as well as making the church an important factor in the religious history of the county. Although having had many seasons of especial interest, the great revival in the fall of 1848 is still remembered as being of unusual importance. Before its close, in December, ninety-four persons were added to the membership of the church, and its spirituality was greatly promoted. At this time the Rev. John Talley was the minister.

Riddle's Chapel was built by the Rev. James Riddle for the benefit of the people residing at Riddle's Banks, who could not conveniently attend worship at Mount Salem. Before his death he endowed it with a perpetual annuity of one hundred dollars and made a like provision for Mount Salem, making the water right of the Banks liable for the payment of the same. In addition to the occasional preaching in the chapel, a Sunday-school is regularly maintained, which has had as superintendents Samuel Pierce and Richard Brown.

Christ Church, Protestant Episcopal, had its origin in a school established in 1816 by E. I. du Pont and his daughter, Mrs. Bauduy. A building was put up near the powder-mills, in which both secular and religious instruction was imparted on the Sabbath to the youth of that community with such satisfactory results that the school was made a legal body. On the 29th of January, 1817, it was incorporated as the "Brandywine Manufacturers' Sunday-school," with a board of trustees composed of E. I. du Pont, Robert McCall, John D. Carter, Charles J. du Pont, George Hodgson, Peter Hendrickson and William Huston.
The purpose of the incorporation was declared to be "To not only promote the instruction of the youth in manufacturing establishments in the first rudiments of learning, but that Sunday-schools conducted greatly to their good and orderly behavior, by preventing them from spending the Sabbath in idleness and contracting habits of vice and immorality." Although this school was conducted without sectarian bias, the forms of the Episcopal Church were gradually adopted; and later regular church services were established by the Rev. Samuel C. Brinckel, whose home was near Wilmington. Following his preaching was the confirmation, May 2, 1852, of the first class of catechumens, consisting of seven persons, who in this manner became the first members of the school. The ordination of confirmation was administered by Bishop Alfred Lee. A few years later a church edifice was erected on the du Pont property, which was opened for Divine service in 1856. This building was repaired and very much beautified in 1876. A comfortable rectory was also provided by the du Pont family, and a regular parish created.
The Rev. Samuel C. Brinckel was the first rector, priest, and for a time the to his death, in 1863.

In the spring of that year he was succeeded by the Rev. William A. Newbold, whose rectorship continued until the fall of 1869. The following spring the Rev. I. N. Stanger became the rector, and served in that relation about three years, being succeeded, in the latter part of November, 1873, by the Rev. Dudley D. Smith, whose ministry has since been continued.

In 1887 the parish had one hundred and thirty-eight members, the following sustaining an official relation: A. L. Foster and James Conley, wardens; H. A. du Pont, William du Pont, John Conley, Neal Conley, Henry Brown, William R. Wood and William R. Green, vestrymen. A flourishing Sabbath-school is still maintained.

St. Joseph's Church, Roman Catholic. The mis|sionary efforts of that zealous priest, Father P. Ken-
|ney, extended to the neighborhood of Brandywine
|Banks more than sixty years ago, and in 1828 the
|first Mass was here said by him at the house of |Madam Victor du Pont. Though Catholic services
|were occasionally thereafter held in that locality, a |number of years elapsed before a church was built.
|But, in 1841, through the efforts of P. N. Brennan
|and others, aided by the generous donations of the |du Pont family, the present church edifice was erected; and soon thereafter a school-house and pastor's |residence, standing on either side of the church, were |added to the property. At different periods the church
|grounds have been enlarged until they embrace
|several acres, a part of which was set aside for
|a residence for the Sisters who should take charge of |the school. For a number of years this school has |been well attended and has been in charge of the |Sisters of St. Frances. It has materially advanced
|the interests of the parish, which had, in June, 1887,
|a membership of nearly one thousand persons.

The priests of the parish have been the following:
1846 till September 20, 1867, Father J. S. Walsh; 1867 till 1869, Father J. Scanlan; April, 1869, till March, 1887, Father Georgius J. Kelley; since May, 1887, Father Peter Donaghy. The affairs of the |parish are in a very flourishing condition. The |church has recently been placed in good repair and |enlarged, and the area of the cemetery increased by
|the addition of two acres.

St. Patrick's Church, Roman Catholic, is near Ashland Station, in the southwestern part of the hundred. The grounds embrace seven acres of well-located land, two of which were donated by Michael Mullin and Michael Kane. A portion of it has been consecrated to the dead. The church is a neat frame building, thirty-four by sixty feet, with basement, and was dedicated October 10, 1881. The priest's house adjoining was completed the same season.
The entire property has a value of eight thousand dollars, and its existence is due to the labors of Father Peter Donaghy, who established Catholic services in this locality in 1890, there being at that time but a few families of that faith in this region. He served as of the home, so that it lacks but a few things of being a first-class institution of that nature.

The home was opened for the reception of inmates January 1, 1886, and before the close of the year had seventeen inmates, consisting of lads between the ages of nine and sixteen years, and of both colors. Newton Chandler was placed in charge as superintendent, and Mary E. Chandler as matron; and under their supervision the school has been admirably conducted. In the government of the institution the merit system is successfully used, and has been the means of appealing to the better purposes of the inmates, whose connection with the school has been generally beneficial. Instruction in the school-room is imparted ten months in the year, and light manual labor is added to give proper physical development. The future of Ferris Reform School promises to reflect great honor upon the memory of the generous founder, and to be a source of much benefit to the county fortunate enough to have it located in its midst as one of its public institutions.

NEWPORT.—The pleasant borough of Newport is in the southeastern part of Christiansa Hundred, on the Christiana Creek, which is here navigable for vessels of light burden. It is also a station on the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad, a little more than three miles from the city of Wilmington, which absorbed most of its former business. There are two churches, a good school-house, several stores, a hotel and the various interests detailed in the following pages.

Newport was laid out as Newport Ayre by John Justis, in 1735, on part of the Constantine tract, which had been transferred to Henry Parker, a planter of Cecil County, Maryland. On the 26th of April, 1731, the latter conveyed a half-interest in this two-hundred-acre tract to John Justis, reciting that "Whereas Conrad Constantine, by virtue of a warrant, had a tract of land called 'Cold Harbour,' lying in Christiansa Hundred, on north side of Christiana Creek, assigned to Henry Parker, beginning at Christiana Creek at mouth of Rainbow Run, 100 acres."

On the 17th of February, 1785, Justis sold eighteen acres of the above tract to Samuel Marshall, who also laid out village lots and sold the same, among his purchasers being, in the latter part of 1787, Neil McNeil and George Stewart, mariner, from North Britain, who paid twenty pounds for two lots on St. John and St. James Streets. Other sales were made to the following: John Twigg, Alex. Frazer, Isaac Vernon, Abraham Marshall, George Hutchison, James Hays, William Sutton, William Passmore, John Head, Samuel Farra, John Ashmead, Hugh Evans, James McMullin, John Richardson, Joseph Turner, John Read, Owen Owens, Hans Rudolph, Thomas Brown and Joseph Taylor.

HISTORY OF DELAWARE.

James Latimer first began purchasing lots in Newport January 10, 1752, when he bought a lot of Solomon Hersey, adjoining the home lot of John Justis, the founder of the town. January 1, 1753, he bought an interest in a lot, forty feet square, lying on Christiana Creek and Hutchinson's Run, on which was then the wharf of Joseph Jones and William Sutton, upon which they were to erect a dwelling and a storehouse.

On the 16th of May, 1758, he purchased two lots of William Sutton, and is then mentioned as a storekeeper. From this time on he was largely interested in shipping grain and produce to Philadelphia and the West Indies. His store was on the present Groome Corner.

John Latimer, one of the sons, went to China, where he made a fortune in the tea trade. Henry, another son, became a very aged man, dying near Wilmington. After removing from Newport, Latimer built a fine mansion on a piece of fast land, which is still occupied by some of his descendants. It is said that he here attempted to found a city which should be a rival to Wilmington, and, failing in this purpose, the locality became known as "Folly Woods." He was the most active business man of Newport in the period he lived there.

Very many changes in ownership of property took place in the early history of Newport. The place began to decline as soon as the future of Wilmington was assured, and after turnpikes and other improvements directed trade towards the latter place, Newport more fully lost its importance as a commercial point. Before the completion of the Lancaster turnpike to Newport, large quantities of grain were shipped from Newport, and hundreds of teams came from the rich farms of Pennsylvania to unload their produce at this point, and returning were generally laden with merchandise. To accommodate this traffic several wharves and warehouses were built on Christiana Creek, at which half a score of sloops received their freightage. In later years this branch of business was almost wholly discontinued. John McCalmon is remembered as one of the most active shippers of that busy period. He lived in the John A. Cranston house. The names of other traders and shippers may be found in the sketch of Christiana Hundred.

Lewis Stone carried on the tannery business very extensively, having two bark-mills, one on the Tatnall, the other on the present Cranston wharf, where Thomas Seal also tanned. A line of packets left these wharves daily for Philadelphia, one of the regular boats being the "Hannah," having a burden of about forty tons. After she was abandoned she was allowed to founder in the creek, at Newport, where a part of her keel may still be seen. The "Elizabeth" was in the same line, which was owned by Captain Fred Hilyard and others. Aaron Paulsen was a prominent man, living on a farm just outside of the village. Isaac Flinn lived on the present Vincent G. Flinn place. Andrew Justis was a trader in the village, and his son, Aaron, lived on the Dr. Irons place. Robert C. Justis is a lineal descendant of John Justis. Hans Nebiker lived here before the Revolution, his home being near the spring on St. John's Street. Of his seven sons, John has always lived on the place which his father bought in 1803 and where he planted a sycamore tree, which is one of the landmarks of this locality. After 1800 a market-house was maintained on the south side of Market Street, between St. James' and Marshall Streets, but nearly every trace of this building has disappeared. In 1825 Newport was in the flood-tide of its commercial activity, having five good stores and half a dozen inns. These grew less in number each year, and after the completion of the railroad, in 1837, but few had a flourishing business.

Newport had good inns as early as 1788, as the following extract from John Penn's Journal of that date will show: "Newport, within a few miles of Wilmington, has still more houses than Newark, and a good brick tavern which provided proper entertainment for horse and man. The kitchen-door being ajar, I was amused by a war of words between Perrins and Rapilius, two rustics completely drunk, and by degrees becoming less intelligible. Each seemed perfectly apprised of the other's, though unconscious of his own aberration from propriety." In 1797 John Miller was licensed to keep this inn. The present tavern has long been the property of the Isaac Miller estate and a part of it was built in the last century. The "Yellow Hotel," kept by Richard King, was many years its rival for business, but has long since been devoted to private uses. At the former hotel General Cadwallader rested after his duel with Dr. Patton of Baltimore, April 5, 1823, and had his wounds dressed so that he could be taken to his home in Philadelphia. The duel was fought on the Peter Derrickson place, about a mile from the village, and the distance at which the principals stood was twenty-seven feet. At the word "fire," Cadwallader's pistol failed to go off, and in the mean time Patton fired, his ball taking effect in the pistol-arm of his antagonist, which put an end to the combat. Upon seeing the result of his shot, Patton thanked God that Cadwallader was only wounded, and a truce was declared, the two men separating with better feelings towards each other.

The old Latimer Corner is one of the most ancient store-stands in the village. The present William Duff stand was erected at a more recent period by James Robinson. The Kilgore block was erected in 1882. Dr. M. A. Booth opened the first distinct drug store, in which has been kept the Newport Post-Office since December, 1886, James F. Porter being the postmaster.

Among the physicians here located was a Dr. John Morris, who lived on the Robert Lynam place prior to 1837. He was a man of generous impulses, but erratic, and committed suicide by shooting himself. His dying request was that he be buried in a standing position, with his face towards the projected railroad, whose completion he opposed. His wishes were carried out, but subsequently his remains were taken up and elsewhere properly re-interred. Later physicians here have been Drs. Alexander Irons, Isaiah Lukens, Paul Lukens, M. A. Booth and J. M. Flinn, the latter being at present a practitioner.

The Newport National Bank is the successor in business of the old Real Estate Bank of Delaware. The latter was chartered by an act February 22, 1859, and organized for business May 2d, the same year. At that time F. Q. Flinn was elected president and served to January 1, 1860, when the old officers were relieved by a new board. This was composed of Caleb Marshall, president; James Cranston, David Eastburn, F. Q. Flinn, Robert B. Flinn, A. Derrickson, Samuel Cranston, John Mitchell and William G. Phillips. The cashier was Thomas W. Robinson and a banking office was established in a building on Market Street, west of James Street. The capital stock consisted of seven hundred and three shares, at one hundred dollars each per share, secured by mortgages on real estate. Assessments were made until the bank had a cash capital of thirty-seven thousand five hundred dollars and was well equipped for business. October 31, 1862, J. W. H. Watson became cashier, and served during the existence of the bank under its old charter, and ever since being a national bank. On the 5th of January, 1884, Frank Q. Flinn succeeded Caleb Marshall as president. The old bank was merged into the present institution May 9, 1885. Its organization had been effected March 25th of the same year, with a capital of fifty thousand dollars and the following board of officers:

Frank Q. Flinn, president; William Haylett, David Lynam, Jacob Rubencame, Edward Mendenhall, William G. Phillips, Robert B. Flinn, David Eastburn, James Cranston, directors; and J. W. H. Watson, cashier.

Business was transacted in the old bank building until January, 1865, when the present house was occupied. It was erected the preceding year and furnished with all the appliances of the modern bank, making it complete in all its appointments. August 8th, the same year, the capital stock was increased to seventy-five thousand dollars and so continues, giving the bank ample means to transact a large and profitable business.

In 1887 the officers of the bank were David Eastburn, president; J. W. H. Watson, cashier; James Cranston, John A. Cranston, John Mitchell, Reuben Satterthwaite and Charles M. Groome, directors.

General Interests.—Among the later business interests which have given character to Newport is that carried on by Cranston, Newbold & Co., dealers in builders' supplies and machinery. The business was established many years ago by James Cranston, the father of the senior member of the present firm, which has expanded it to the present fine proportions. This firm was constituted in 1882 of J. A. Cranston and John M. Newbold, G. W. McKee being added in 1887. In 1883 a branch of the business was established in Wilmington, which has also been very successful. At Newport the firm owns well-appointed yards, warehouses, and possesses water and rail privileges for shipping purposes. Employment is given to a number of men and the conduct of the business gives the place an active appearance.

Near by, well located between the railroad and the creek, are the works of the J. Marshall Iron Company.

This enterprise was begun in 1873 by a company composed of Calvin P. Marshall, Joseph P. Richardson and John Richardson, for the purpose of making sheet-iron in connection with the work of the Marshall Mill. Steam-power was employed to operate a pair of sheet-rolls and there were three furnaces put in blast August 16, 1873, under the superintendence of Simeon S. Myers. In the spring of 1874 a sheet-iron mill, fifty two inches wide, was added and the manufacture of heavy iron begun. Later, galvanizing works were put up in connection and operated by George Danby. In 1878 the works became the property of John Marshall, and in the fall of that year work was suspended. In April, 1879, work was resumed and carried on four years, James Robinson being the superintendent.

In 1881 the present company was formed by Edward Mendenhall and others, with the following officers: Edward Mendenhall, president; John M. Mendenhall, secretary; Joseph W. H. Watson, treasurer; Francis T. Jones, superintendent.

The machinery operated in 1887 consisted of three puddling furnaces, one heating furnace, two annealing furnaces, two pairs of sheet-rolls and one pair bar-rolls. Sixteen hundred tons of metal are manufactured into refined iron, affording work for seventy-five men.

The J. A. Cranston Company, manufacturers of superphosphates, etc., occupy a site which had been used by a pressed brick factory, carried on by James & Samuel Cranston, and where later was the wagon-spoke factory of Charles Willard—never enterprise being continued a long time. The business now carried on was established in 1870, at Chadd's Ford, Pa., by the Whann Brothers. In 1879 they transferred their interests to Newport, associating themselves with John A. Cranston. In 1885 the present company was organized, with J. A. Cranston president, C. Whann vice-president, J. E. Whann secretary and treasurer. The plant of the company embraces five acres of land, about half of which is required in manufacturing operations.
The main factory is one hundred and twelve by one hundred and sixty-eight feet, two stories high. The motive-power is steam, driving a one hundred horsepower engine, and the works are arranged to give a producing capacity of fifteen thousand tons per year—which is readily shipped by boat or steam-car, the works having railroad sidings and an excellent dock. Fifteen men are employed, and the products have a high reputation in the markets.

Newport Incorporated.—Corporate privileges were bestowed upon the village by an act of the Assembly, passed April 7, 1883, under which it has since been governed. A previous corporate organization was but a short time maintained, and was not productive of any marked results. Under the last act the bounds were established as follows: “Beginning at a point on the west side of Mary Street at low-water mark, on the north shore of Christiana River, and in a northerly direction along the west side of Mary Street, until it intersects a continuous straight line from the northern boundary of Joseph Killgore’s land; then in an easterly direction by the said Killgore’s line and lines of Alexander Irons, M.D., to the northeast corner of said Irons’ land and Cherry Lane; thence in a westerly direction along said Cherry Lane to the intersection of the Christians and Wilmington Turnpike; thence eastward along said turnpike to the eastern boundary of St. James’ Church lands; thence in a southerly direction on a line parallel with Walnut Street until it intersects the Christiana River; thence with low-water mark on said river to the place of beginning.”

The first election was held April 11, 1874, at which time twenty-nine votes were cast, and Joseph Killgore was elected alderman, Robert C. Justis, Lewis Wel- din, Joseph W. H. Watson, John W. Snitche and John W. Killgore commissioners, Alexander Irons assessor, Daniel Green treasurer.

Robert C. Justis was the second alderman being elected to that office in 1884. The same office was filled, in 1887, by J. W. R. Killgore. Ephraim Myers was secretary of the commissioners: J. Elwood Con- lyn, treasurer; J. R. Barrett, assessor; and David Himsworth, bailiff.

Since the incorporation of Newport the streets have been much improved and the village given a better appearance generally. About $400 is annually expended in this direction, involving a tax of fifteen cents on a dollar. In 1887 the assessment roll bore one hundred and seventy-five names and the population was estimated at eight hundred, more than double the number when the village became incorporated.

Armstrong Lodge, No. 26, A. F. and A. M., was in- stituted at Newport under a charter bearing date June 27, 1870, with Joseph W. H. Watson, Master; Robert Lewis Armstrong, Senior Warden; Thomas Brackin, Junior Warden. Since that time the meetings have been stately held in a neat hall in the Killgore block, and in 1887 there were about sixty members and the following principal officers: F. O. Biber- stien, Master; James H. Polk, Senior Warden; John E. Whann, Junior Warden; Joseph W. H. Watson, Treasurer; Alexander Irons, Secretary.

Andantaka Tribe, No. 14, I. O. of R. M.—This body was instituted September 28, 1874, and meets in a good hall in the lower part of the village. From the beginning it has been prosperous and reported fifty members in 1887. The tribe was incorporated Febru- ary 3, 1886.

David L. Striker Post, No. 8, G. A. R., was chartered with twenty-three members and held its first meeting in March, 1883. The post stately meets in the Kill- gore Hall and is prosperous. The membership has been increased to thirty-three and Daniel Green is the present Commander.

Active Lodge, No. 11, A. O. of U. W.—The youngest secret order, a lodge of United Workmen, was instituted May 27, 1885. The charter was granted to Charles H. Davis, John M. Newbold, William A. Mullin and a number of others. In 1887 there were thirty-three members, whose meetings were held in Kill- gore’s Hall.

St. James’ (Protestant Episcopal) Church.—The early records of the Episcopal Church at Newport have been lost, but from an old book found in the attic of the court-house at Wilmington we learn that a lot- tery was held to raise money for the erection of St. James’ Church.

This old book was also used to keep the accounts for building material, labor, etc. The dates begin in September, 1767, and the accounts are for brick, lime, boards, scaffold, poles, etc.

The managers of the lottery in August, 1767, were Empson Bird, Thomas Duff, Thomas Ogle, Morton Morton and John Reece.

Contract was made with Henry Vining for the erection of the church. Nicholas Sellers charged for two hundred and eighteen thousand nine hundred brick, which, however, the trustees could not find, as John Byrne, who laid the brick, only brought in an account for laying one hundred and sixty thousand seven hundred and thirteen. The writer says: “I discovered the error at the time of settlement with Sellers and Conrad Grey, but the Committee was deaf to all I could say.” The rafters and iron-work for the roof were laid November 9, 1769.

August 14, 1771, cash paid James Adams for printing tickets, "when a Miss was Maid by the Printers." Plates were put on in October, 1771.

October 15, 1771, cash paid Mr. Marshall for sundries "When Doct. Smith Preach at St. James.", November 17, 1774, cash paid Henry Vining at a settlement. Capt. Thomas Ogle and Morton Morton were present.

NEW CASTLE COUNTY.

Before this building was completed the War of the Revolution broke out, and in those troublous times it was used to stable a troop of British cavalry. Later, meetings were here again held in the summer in connection with the Episcopal Church at Stanton, the work at Newport being designated as the New Church. In 1787 an unsuccessful attempt was made to incorporate these churches, probably with a view of securing the completion of the building at Newport. In this house the Rev. William Price, rector of the Old Swedes' Church at Wilmington, officiated from 1800 to 1802, but it fell into disuse about 1810, and before this time all Episcopal meetings at this point had been abandoned. In subsequent years occasional meetings only were held by the rectors of St. James', of Stanton, but after the accession of the Rev. Wm. Marshall, in 1857, regular services were established in the Protestant Methodist Church. The house was refitted and made comfortable in other respects. The church was admitted into diocesan relation the same year, and in 1859 the vestry were appointed trustees to hold and manage the ecclesiastical property, including the grave-yard on the old lot. It was deemed best to dispose of the old stone church, and after the building of the new school-house, in 1886, meetings were there held, the location being more central. But early in 1875 measures were taken to build a chapel, the corner-stone of which was laid June 17th, that year. On the 3d of October, 1875, the building was so far completed that lay services were held in it by W. Jenks Fell, and it was formally opened on the 11th of November of the same year. The consecration did not take place until September 6, 1877, when Bishop Alfred Lee performed that service. It is a frame building in the Gothic style of architecture, of plain but not unattractive appearance. The lot is large and very nicely located. The membership of the church has been ever small, and since December 1, 1885, the rector has been the Rev. Wm. A. Alrich. Other rectors of this church, or serving in connection with St. James', of Stanton, have been the following:

The Rev. Robert Clay, prior to 1791; Rev. Joseph Clarkson, about 1797; Rev. Robert Clay, 1799 to 1824; Rev. Stephen W. Putman, 1824; Rev. W. Pardee, 1823-34; Rev. Hiram Adams, 1887; Rev. C. C. Chambers, 1840-43; Rev. W. Mansfield, 1860-54; Rev. G. Sheets, 1864-56; Rev. William Marshall, 1867-72; Rev. Charles E. Fensenden, 1873-74; Rev. Wm. Dent Hanson, 1875-85.¹

Peniel Methodist Episcopal Church of Newport.—As early as 1797 the Rev. Ezekiel Cooper and others preached to a small band of Methodists at Newport, holding services usually in the afternoon, after having preached at Wilmington or New Castle in the afternoon of the same day. John Miller was the only male member at this time, but there were six or eight devoted female members, whose zeal caused the society to become permanent in 1808. Six years later a small frame meeting-house was built on a lot of land secured from Thomas Latimer, which he formally conveyed to the trustees, June 22, 1810. This board was composed of Joseph Lynam, John Miller, Dennis Dougherty, Benjamin Hersey and Samuel Wood, and had become an incorporated body May 16, 1810, a week after its election.

In 1864 the old church building was removed and the present brick structure erected in its place, upon the same lot, a part of which is used for burial purposes. The house has sitting for several hundred people, and is plain in its appearance. In 1842 Sybilla Ann Stone donated the brick house on the adjoining lot, and an acre of land on the opposite side of the street, for a parsonage and the support of the church. A part of the old brick residence antedates the century, but it has been modernized within recent years, and made a comfortable residence. The entire church property was valued at seven thousand dollars in 1887 and was controlled by Trustees Vincent, G. Flinn, Wm. R. Flinn, W. A. Weldon, Alexander Irons, Thomas J. Hanna, John Scarbrough, George W. Davis, Daniel Green and Ephraim Megargal.

The church has sustained many different relations to the Conference with which it has been connected, but, since 1865, has been classed as a station, and the ministers since that period have been the Revs. Wm. H. Fries, W. H. Bodine, Joshua Humphries, John Allen, John D. Rigg, H. S. Thompson, J. E. Bryan, E. H. Nelson and John D. C. Hanna. As local preachers, Daniel Green and Vincent G. Flinn were reported, both having served in that relation many years.

The church has a large membership, numbering about two hundred in 1887, and also maintains a flourishing Sabbath-school.

The Newport African Methodist Church is a small stone building, north of the village. Originally it was erected by an organization of white Methodists, which had among its members Joseph Lynam, Robert B. Flinn and others. This society disbanded thirty years ago. Later, Episcopal services were there held, and subsequently the property passed into the hands of the present body, which has but a small membership.

Near Newport John R. Phillips erected a house for the holding of religious meetings, but it was never occupied by a regular society, and in the course of years it was torn down and the material used in other buildings. Phillips subsequently became a resident of Newport, and was noted for the eccentricities of his character.
CHAPTER XLV.

BRANDYWINE HUNDRED.

Brandywine Hundred is the name applied to the northeastern section of New Castle County, and embraces all that territory comprised south of the State line and on the waters of the Delaware and Brandywine, excepting what has been joined to the city of Wilmington, in the southeastern part of these natural bounds. The surface partakes of the characteristics of Southern Pennsylvania and is, in general, well undulated. Outcroppings of rock appear in many localities, preventing a fertility of soil, while other sections have fine and highly improved farms, whose proximity to the markets have made them valuable property. Along the streams, whose descent to the level of the Delaware is precipitous in places, are valuable deposits of blue stone and granite, which are being profitably developed. On the hills are groves of natural timber, giving the country a pleasant appearance and no other section in the State excels this in the variety and beauty of its landscape scenery.

The territory embraced within the present bounds of Brandywine Hundred does not appear as a distinct division until the year 1687, when a list of taxable persons residing on the north side of Brandywine Creek was prepared. 1

But at that time the name hundred was not applied to the division, that appellation not being adopted until a much later period. For many years different sections of the hundred were known by the old local names.

These were, beginning at the mouth of Christiana Creek and going northward, Vertrecht Hook Marsh (later Cherry Island Marsh), Vertrecht Hook, the "Bout" or "Bocht," Grubb's Manor Lands, Naaman's Creek Lands and west from all of these, Rockland Manor.

The Swedes, as has been stated were the first settlers. They located on Vertrecht Hook (also called Trinity Hook), that being the first desirable fast land on the Delaware above Fort Christina, which was built in 1638, and which afforded them protection.

Upon the surrender of Fort Christina, in 1654, the Swedes were much concerned as to their rights, as one of the terms of the capitulation was that they should leave their lands and locate in villages, which was distasteful to them. Accordingly, on the 19th of January, 1656, "There appears at the meeting of Council the free Swedes who live upon the second point 2 above Fort Casimir and request that they may remain on the land and that they are not willing to change their place of habitation nor to build in the village which is to be established, but they adhere to the promise made to them by the Hon* * Peter Stuyvesant,

1 This list appears in the General History of this work.
2 The first point above New Castle, or Fort Casimir, was Crane Hook and the second was Vertrecht Hook.

that they should resolve what to do after the expiration of a period of one year and six weeks granted to them by the capitulation." This request was presented to the Governor, and on August 14th in that year the deputy sent by the Governor read the instructions and conditions which were delivered to Gregorius Van Dyck, sheriff. The exact purport of the conditions is not known, but the greater portion still resided on Vertrecht Hook, and on May 20, 1657, forwarded a request to the authorities to establish villages. The request was granted by letter, June 12th the same year, and Gregorius Van Dyck, was ordered to concentrate them in villages, either at Upland, Passayunk, Finland, Kingsessing, or on the "Verdritte Hook." It was at the latter place that the Swedes were then living without title to land, except the right of discovery and occupation, as no patents were granted by Queen Christina to any one within the territory now embraced by the State of Delaware. Here they located in considerable numbers with their families, each having a narrow river front and running back into the woods, and using the marsh lands in common for wood and pasture. Some of them obtained titles under the Dutch, and which, in 1664, were renewed by the English. In 1662 the place was known as the "troublesome corner" and in that year Vice-Director Beckman, of Fort Alten, in a letter dated June 21st, writes, "Sixteen or eighteen families mostly Fins, residing in our jurisdiction to whom great offer have been made by Mr. d'Hinjiossa, intend to move into the Colony; They are to have eighteen years' freedom of all taxes, with their own judges and decisions up to 100 guilders, also free exercise of their religion—these families intend nevertheless to hold on to their lands in our jurisdiction and to sow grain on them, until they have cleared land in the Colony. In my opinion we may seize the deserted land and settle Dutch farmers on it if it were possible to get them." These families remained on lands they had located, mostly on Vertrecht Hook and the "Bout;" a few, however, were at Tran Hook or Craine Hook and Swanwyck. 3 Only one or two in the early days lived below New Castle, until about 1675-76, and then but few more settled there.

The English came into possession of this territory, by the surrender of the Dutch, February 7, 1668, on condition that the inhabitants, principally Swedes, should be protected in their rights. Their lands became escheated, but were restored again to them by patents from the English Governor, Richard Nicholls. The first grant on the Delaware, to individuals, after the surrender, was given March 5, 1668, about a month after the capitulation of the Dutch. It was granted to Niels Nelson, Sr., Hendrick Nielsson, Mathyes Nelson and Niels Nelson, Jr., "for each of them a plantation with a proportion of meadow ground for hay for their cattle on a certain piece of land att Delaware situate, lying and being on the Trinity Hook or that corner of land so extending to the Stone Hook.

and obliging them to build their houses near unto one another.” This grant was confirmed June 15, 1664, and reconformed, January 8, 1667. At the time of the first grant Fort Christina, although virtually surrendered, did not yield until forced to do so by the presence of an armed force under the command of Sir Robert Carr, August 27, 1664. This grant was probably the first issued by the English in this section of the country.

Fort Christina was near “the rocks,” now in the yard of the McCullough Iron Works, in Wilmington. Opposite, in Brandywine Hundred, was a piece of fast ground, which, in 1648, was called Cooper’s Island, by reason of two Dutchmen living there and making barrels and casks. It later became known as Vandever’s Island, and was the property of Jacob Van de Vere. He first appears in this country as a sergeant in the garrison at Fort Altenus, in 1660, and in that year he asked that he might be discharged in the spring, “as he desires to leave with the first vessel after the river was open.” He did not leave the country, but obtained title to property in New Castle April 8, 1661, and lived there a number of years. He probably took up his land in Brandywine soon after the above purchase, but received no patent until March 24, 1668. Later, he had a warrant, dated March 2, 1652, for one hundred and forty-seven acres, the tract containing the island. He also received another tract by warrant dated May 18, 1684. These tracts were all re-surveyed April 6, 1688, and contained five hundred and thirty-two acres, including marsh. The map of survey shows the land to be bounded on the southeast by Shellpot Creek, on the northwest by Brandywine Creek, and on the other sides by lands of Hans and Usin Peterson.

“The Island,” as it was called, appears to have been the neck of land where the railroad bridge now crosses, and the house was marked as being close to Brandywine Creek. The survey shows the King’s road to have passed through the upper end of the tract. It runs from Philadelphia, in the rear of the river lots, to near the head of the island (whose eastern boundary was a marsh, rather than a stream), and then turned and ran nearly parallel to the creek, until it reached the “Falls.” It was at this place that the court, on May 18, 1675, ordered “a Ferry to be maintained at the Falls on ye west side.” A bridge was built later by Jacob Vanderwer, lower down, which was called Van Dever’s Bridge, and was used until 1764, when it was ordered to be destroyed by the act of 1761, and a new bridge built where the present Market Street bridge over the Brandywine now stands.

The Vandever tract embraced Brandywine Village (the lands formerly Edwin Bellah’s), the settlement about Eleventh Street Bridge, on the east side, and where an old Vandever farm-house still stands. The elevations on it have been known as “Timber Island,” “Thatcher’s Hook,” etc. It was for over one hundred and fifty years in the hands of the Vandevera, when it was subdivided, and passed into the hands of many owners.

A tract of land lying below the above, on Christiana Creek, and below Vertrechte’s, or Trinity Hook, came into possession of Peter Alrichs, nephew of Vice-Director Jacob Alrichs, and who himself occupied many offices under both the Dutch and the English. Upon the occupation by the English Alrichs’ property was confiscated, but later he came into favor with the English and was a magistrate many years. This tract of land was also confiscated, and, with an island and plantation farther down the river, was granted to William Tom by Governor Richard Nicolls, June 20, 1665, who, after reciting that the land formerly belonged to Peter Alrichs, describes it as follows:

“I doe likewise hereby give and grant unto the said William Tom a certain piece of meadow-ground, or valley, lying at the mouth of the said river of Delaware, between Christiana Creek or Kil, and Vertrechte’s Hook, being bounded on the Back Kil, coneyning by estimation five hundred acres.”

This land Mr. Tom held until his death, when it was sold to Arnoldus De La Grange. During the occupancy of Mr. Tom, and at a special court held at New Castle, 13th and 14th of May, 1675, the inhabitants of Vertrechte’s Hook complained that Mr. Tom “molesteth them in enjoyment of meadow-ground next to their plantations.” The matter was compromised by Mr. Tom’s proposal that the inhabitants and some other neighbors who stood in need, might have the same liberty and equal benefit of some of the meadow next unto them; he, Tom, reserving freedom of commanage for himself, and also opening his own meadow-ground, of which they complained.

The latter tract was all marshy and was rarely used. In the course of years it appears to have lost ownership, but, September 1, 1748, it was taken up and resurveyed in the name of William Bedford for the De Haez heirs. It is now (1888) known as the Cherry Island Marsh, and has been redeemed from its waste condition by an improvement company of the same name.

Vertretege (or Vertrecht) Hook extended from the marsh lands upward along the Delaware one and three-fourths miles. The stream running through it terminated at du Pont’s Landing. The name signifies grievous or tedious, owing to the character of the navigation in the streams here, which were more subject to tidal influences in those days than at present, and permitted the entrance of sloops. North were the lands of Charles Peterson, below the “Bout,” northwest was Rockland Manor, and west was a tract of land owned by Hans Peterson. His house was northwest of the forks of Shellpot Creek. This tract of land was resurveyed on a warrant dated May 20, 1688, and granted by William Penn to Henry Toose, John and Pieter Moupsen, Anneck Lawesen, Jacob Clementeen and John Neilsen. The latter, it will be noticed, was the only one living on the original grant in 1603. Each of the above five places contained 165½ acres. The lower tract belonged to John Neilsen, and was narrow on the river, with a house on the first fast land beyond and above Cherry Island Marsh. His land was wider in the rear, and ran back of part of Jacob Clementsen's land. Clementsen also had a house near the river front. The next division above Clementsen was Anneke Lawson, which was of equal width, as were also the other two above. In Lawson's lot was a stream that ran down through it to the river, and his house was on the southerly side of the stream. The next lot was John and Peter Mounsen, who also had a house by the river. Peter Mounsen,¹ November 1, 1609, bought the Crane Hook Church property, consisting of one hundred acres. Henry Toonen owned the upper lot and had upon it two houses, one on the river front and the other near the upper end and on the lower side of the old King's road, which ran through all the lots here mentioned.

Above the Vertrecht Hook tract was a belt of land having a front of one hundred rods along the river and extending back to the Rockland Manor Lands. It was patented May 28, 1669, to Barrent Egge, who disposed of it to other parties about five years later. A portion of it was assigned to Charles Petersen.

The "Bout" or "Boight" was a tract of land lying on the Delaware, above Vertrecht Hook, extending along the river about two miles and running back to the Rockland Manor Lands. It was first occupied by the Swedes without titles to their lands, but under the Dutch they were permitted to remain, and after the English accession warrants were issued and patents granted. One of the first was issued April 16, 1673, for three hundred acres, and was granted to Ole Fransen, Peter Mounsen and Neil Neilsen.

On the 16th of June, 1675, Governor Andros granted a patent to the above and Marcus Lawrensen for the three hundred acres already patented and four hundred acres additional, with a stipulation "that the inhabitants of Verdrige or Vertrecht Hook shall have and enjoy the privileges and freedom of Stony Creek and the mill which they have built on the same."

The mill on Stony Creek (now Quarryville Creek) was owned by a company, and was sold February 10, 1688, by Hans Petersen, Niel Neilsen and Ole Fransen to Peter Boynton, who then owned part of the Bout tract. Boynton was a merchant at New Castle, and July 9, 1684, bought of Ole or Oola Fransen one hundred and thirty-four acres on the lower side of the tract, and bounded on the upper side by Stony Creek. Subsequently he bought more land in the Bout, and on the 14th of October, 1693, he sold to Ebenezier Perkins, "late of New England, husbandman," a portion of this land; and on the same day Joseph Perkins, a brother of Ebenezer and also of New England, bought of the "Bout" lands adjoining of Thomas Noxon. The descendants of the latter still own and occupy part of the same premises.

¹ He was a deacon in Crane Hook Church in 1675.

The jurisdiction of the Upland Court extended down to the south line of the Bout, and September 13, 1681, Morgan Drutt was a juror at that court. He purchased five hundred and thirty-two acres of the Bout tract, for which, under Penn, he received a warrant for survey in 1688. In the survey it was named "Newport." He left the property to his son, William, who died there and left it to his son John, who lived at Salem, N. J., who, August 6, 1726, conveyed the Newport tract of five hundred and thirty-two acres to Reuben Ford. "On the 7th of May, 1727, he gave to his son, Reuben Ford, Jr., 95 acres; to his son Benjamin, 75 acres; to his son Joseph, 58 acres, and to his son John, 115 acres."

Of the ninety-five acres of land of Reuben Ford, Jr., Jasper Justin, his executor, sold fifty acres to Samuel Lodge, April 10, 1742. Benjamin Ford later moved inland and resided there, his descendants being active in the early affairs of the hundred.

On the 18th of March, 1777, the court at Upland was petitioned for a warrant to Johannes De Haes for a tract of "land in the Boght between the land of Ole Fransen and company and ye creek called Naaman's Creek, w' se ad. land was not yet surveighed, so that the Petition" is uncertain of the quantity of the sd. land, and therefore desired that the court would bee pleased to give order, and withal a warrant, for the laying out of the sd. land." The court granted the request, and ordered a warrant for its survey.

De Haes had received a patent for this land, before this period, from Governor Lovelace; but being in the Upland jurisdiction, the survey had been delayed. A portion of this tract was later a part of Rockland Manor, and that part from the Bout to Stockdale's Run was divided into two parts, bearing the names of Stockdale's plantation and Mile's End. In 1785 these tracts were owned by the following: Adam Bulkley, ninety-five acres; Emanuel Grubb, ninety-five acres; John Grubb, fifty-six acres. On this tract was Grubb's Landing, and that family long owned the improvements connected therewith.

Between Stockdale's Run and Naaman's Creek was a tract of three hundred and forty acres of land, included in the De Haes tract, but which was resurveyed January 21, 1721, and divided into three parts, of which John Bulkley was placed in possession of one hundred and fourteen acres, north of Stockdale's Run; Joseph Grubb, next above, had one hundred and eight acres, and Benjamin Moulder, still above, and on Naaman's Run, had one hundred and eighteen acres. Benjamin Moulder left his land to his two sons, Benjamin and William, who received patents July 12, 1746.

On the 18th of July, 1766, there was granted by patent to Charles Jansen, Ole Fransen, Ole Neilsen, Hans Hopman, John Hendrickson and Hans Olleson, a tract of land laid out for one thousand acres, the larger part of which was in what is now Delaware County, Pa., but it embraced all that portion of Delaware north of Naaman's Creek. Claymont is partly on this land and partly on the land owned in 1734 by Benjamin Moulder.

Hans Petersen, who lived southwest of the Vertrecht Hook settlers and on Shellpot Creek, was located before 1668, as his patent bears date November 14th, that year, and called for one hundred and fifty-seven and one-half acres. He later owned more property, and, in 1677, had a dispute which ended in a suit in court, over title to land claimed by others.
He was a member of Crane Hook Church, and one of the founders of “Old Swedes’” Trinity Church.
He was, with the most of the Swedes in the vicinity, mentioned as one of the confederates of the “Long Finn,” who was tried, in 1675, at New Castle, for insurrection and banished.

Before 1681 he had other tracts of land warranted to him, most of it located around Shellpot Creek and on Chestnut Hill. One tract, which had been confirmed by Governor Lovelace to Andreas Matson, November 14, 1668, was on a stream described as follows: “Whereas, there is land situate at place called the Indian or Wilde Hook,’ in the tenure and occupation of Andreas Matson, a small run of water bounding on east, running by Shellpot Hill 100 rods in breadth, and back into ye woods 600 rods.”

A part of the Hans Peterson lands was re-surveyed, December 1, 1748, for Mark Elliott. In this locality Henry Webster had a re-survey made before 1794, for seventy acres which were bounded by the lands of Mark Elliott, John Houston, John Allmond, Vertrecht Hook and John Penn. The heirs of the latter at that time owned the Shellpot Mill. Webster’s other land lay farther northwest, and is still owned by his descendants.

Rockland Manor was set off by William Penn, in 1682, as one of the many manors in his vast domain.
It embraced all the lands in Brandywine Hundred except those heretofore mentioned, including the narrow neck of land extending to the Delaware River, between the “Bout” and Naaman’s Creek, also above described. The first warrant for lands in the manor was made to Henry Hollingsworth, February 20, 1688, and was for two hundred acres lying on the south side of the head-waters of Shellpot Creek, and adjoined the lands of Thomas Hollingsworth, purchased about the same time. The next notable sale was to the Pennsylvania Land Company, of London, which bought of William Penn, “on the 17th of 6th mo., 1699,” sixty thousand acres of land, four thousand one hundred and twenty acres of which were in New Castle and two thousand acres in Rockland Manor, in Brandywine Hundred. It was resurveyed in 1718 by Isaac Taylor, and a few sales are recorded after 1721, all the lands being closed out before 1765.

Reuben Ford bought, in 1713, seventy-five acres on the head-waters of Naaman’s Creek and adjoining the land of Wm. Stockdale, from whom Stockdale Run took its name. Wm. Ford purchased lands in 1722, which were located both in Delaware and Pennsylvania. In 1734 Benjamin Ford, who had formerly lived on the “Bout” on the Delaware River, became the owner of one hundred and two acres on the Circle, in both States. July 10, 1759, he and Samuel Reynolds, of Chichester, Delaware County, Pennsylvania, were owners of three parcels of land, wherein they built a grist-mill, saw-mill, and other buildings. These theysold to James Cummins, of Nottingham, Bucks County, Pennsylvania. They were all on the west branch of Naaman’s Creek, one being at the fork of the creek with the west branch, and adjoining lands of Edward and William Cloud, “to contain as much land as was necessary to set up a mill-dam.”

In 1722, Thomas Strode became the owner of one hundred and ten acres on the Brandywine and the county line, and the same year Emanuel Grubb purchased one hundred acres more in the interior of the hundred.

In May, 1760, the following purchases were made:

In a number of instances descendants of the above remain on the purchases made by their ancestors more than a century ago.

Earlier than the above were the conveyance of two hundred acres of land, on Naaman’s Creek, by Isaac Warner to Wm. Talley, in 1695; and Peter Lester to John Ford, one hundred acres on the Brandywine, in 1796. The Talleys were nearer the Brandywine than the Grubs, who were on the road east towards the Landing, living on both sides of the highway, and were large land-owners. Isaac Grubb at one time possessed one thousand acres. Samuel was the father of Isaac and he was a son of John, who died in 1757.
The family first lived on the Delaware, below the Landing, where Emanuel Grubb was born, one of the first English natives in the hundred. The Grubs and Buckleys (Bulkley) intermarried, and the latter were also large land-owners. A part of their holdings now belong to Amor G. Forwood. Some time before 1700, Daniel Buckley built a brick house, on part of his estate, which remained in a well-preserved condition until it was rebuilt by William C. Lodge, about 1847. The Lodge family settled on the Druitt tract, a part of which is still owned by William C.
Lodge. The latter is a grandson of Samuel Lodge and son of George, who died early in 1880, aged eighty-three years. For many years five generations of this family resided contemporaneously in Brandywine Hundred.

The Forwood family has descended from William Forwood, who was born in Ireland in 1692. After emigrating to America he reared a family of ten children. Of these, William, born 1728, died in 1814, was the progenitor of the Forwoods of Delaware, Maryland and Pennsylvania. The old homestead was on the Marsh road and is still owned by descendants.

Francis Day was also a purchaser of Rockland Manor lands, in 1760, and made improvements on the same, on the present Concord pike, which have remained in the family six generations. In 1887 this place was the property of John W. Day.

ROADS.—The first road in what is now Brandywine Hundred was an Indian path, later used as a bridle-path, along the river from New Castle to Tincum. It was probably not much used, as the communication between distant points was mainly by slopes on the river and other streams. The second well-defined highway was the King’s Road, inland a mile, more or less, from the river and on the higher lands. Its course was essentially the same as that of the Wilmington and Philadelphia Turnpike.

"The road to ye ferry at Christina Creek," on the Van dever tract, was established 1680. The roads in the western part of the hundred were located at later periods. The Concord Pike subsequently took the course of the principal one from Wilmington to Chester County. Bearing off from this is the Faulk Road, running north into Delaware County. The principal roads from the river to the Brandywine are the Naaman’s Creek Road, the Grubb’s Landing Road and the highway leading from Shellpot Creek to the Concord Pike. The latter was located prior to 1789, and the others very much earlier, possibly in the seventeenth century.

A bridge was built over Naaman’s Creek, before 1682, as the road that passed over it was the first in the State and was used long before that time, it being the road from Fort Casimir or New Amstel (now New Castle) to Tincum. The bridge had been rebuilt and repaired several times, and in 1800 the Levy Court commissioner appointed William Poole one of their number to contract for and superintend the erection of a stone arched bridge over the creek at the place now known as Claymont, which is nearly if not quite at the place where the old Indian path and King’s highway crossed the creek. Mr. Poole wrote a letter to Thomas Robinson, residing at or near the place, July 30, 1800, informing him of the fact and requesting him to superintend the erection in his absence. The contract was made with Adam Williamson and the bridge was completed in 1802. Thomas Robinson, June 8, 1802, made the following indorsement on the back of the letter of Mr. Poole:

"Agreement to the annexed Request, I have observed with satisfaction the attention of Mr. Williamson in Building the Bridge over Naaman’s Creek, and 'tis my Opinion that he has used every necessary care and Industry in the erection thereof."

"Naaman’s Creek, June 8, 1802."

Thomas Robinson.

The bridge was made a toll-bridge by the county. Toll-gates and house were erected and a keeper appointed. It was continued by the county until the Philadelphia and Wilmington Turnpike was opened, when it was leased to the Turnpike Company, March 25, 1831, but ceased to be a toll-bridge in 1832. The bridge is still in excellent condition.

The Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad and the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad traverse the hundred on lines almost parallel with the river, and about one mile apart.

MANUFACTURING INTERESTS.—The excellent water-powers afforded in early days by the Shellpot and Brandywine Creeks soon attracted the attention of the enterprising Swedish and Dutch settlers, who sought and obtained privileges to improve the same. In later years the various industries established and carried on at these sites were sources of great wealth to the State, and contributed more than any other means to augment the population of Brandywine Hundred. It is interesting to trace the development of these industries, and to compare the mammoth establishments of to-day with the small beginnings more than two hundred years ago. One of the first attempts in this direction was made in the spring of 1658 by Joost Andriessen and companions, when they forwarded to the Director-General of New Netherland the following petition:

"To the Noble, Honorable Director-General of New Netherland, etc. Show with due reverence Joost Andriessen and companions that they are willing to erect a saw and grist-mill below the Turtle’s Falls, for which the place and some land belonging to it has been granted to them by provisional Commissary of the Honorable W. I. Company, subject to your Honor’s approval, therefore the petitioners respectfully ask that your Honor will please to approve the same and issue letters patent for it, which doing, etc.

(Signed) Joost Andriessen & Co.

On May 6, 1658, "The request is granted, provided that they shall not ask more for the grinding of grain than is paid at the Honor’s Company’s grist-mill."

The place designated as Turtle Falls was Shellpot Creek (designated on the map of Lindstrom, the Swedish engineer, as “Skillpaddle Follet” (Swedish), and “La Cataракт des Tortues” (French), or Turtle Falls), in Brandywine Hundred.

It is evident from the extract below given, from a letter of Director Beeckman, dated Altena, May 12, 1662, that although permission was granted in 1658 to certain persons to build a grist-mill on Turtle Falls, it was not done at that time. He writes,—

"With your Honorable Worship’s approbation, I have granted last year to some inhabitants the Turtle Falls Kill, about half an hour’s way from here to put up a grist-mill there; which they now would carry out, provided they could get a title deed."

It was granted to them under the condition that the "Honorable Company should have free grinding for the garrison, which it would do well to insert in the title deed. We are very much bothered with the grist; very often we have to turn back disappointed from the old Swedish Mill (which lies about six leagues from here), and must take the grain at great expense for the Honorable Company to the horse-mill at New Amstel."

Soon after the “Proprietors of the Grist-Mill at the Falls of the Turtle Kill”—Jan Stalcof, who re-
NEW CASTLE COUNTY. 905

cided at Altana, and owned land adjoining the fort; Hans Block, who resided at Swanywck, on the river, above New Amstel; and Lucas Pieterson—forwarded the following petition:

"To the Noble and very Worshipful Gentlemen, the Honorable Director-General and High Council of New Netherland:

"Show due respect and humility the undesignated petitioners, viz., John Stalcop, Lucas Pietersten and Hans Block that a certain time ago they erected a water grist-mill at the Falls of Turtle-Kill, for the accommodation of the community here and of those who might need it, and whereas it is necessary that a person should live near the said mill to take care of the same, who necessarily must have some land for cultivation and to secure the mill aforesaid; therefore the Petitioners request the latter-mentioned for the aforesaid land and mill might be granted them."

A Dutch patent was granted May 16, 1688, for land lying near "Mill Creek, that falls into Shellpot creek."

"Shellpot Mill Lands" contains seventy-eight acres of fast land and was re-surveyed October 23, 1690, by Ephraim Herman for Jan Stalcorp, Peter Dewitt, Mary Block, Hans Petersen, Peter Hendricks and several other persons.

It was at the head of the Shellpot Creek and on both sides and adjoined Vertrechts Hook. They were sold, June 2, 1685, by Mary Block, Barbara Miaslander and Christian Stalcorp. to Cornelius Emponent. On the 26th of May, 1688, Empson made an agreement with Salif and Erasmus Stidham "for free grinding of corn for them and their horses forever."

"UNDER ENGLISH AUTHORITY."

"A petition was granted to Andries Andriessen & Company to erect a mill on a creek called Andries ye Fynnes creek on Delaware Ryer, and Francis Lovelace, Esq., etc.; whereas, there is a certain creek in Christiana Kill, in Delaware Ryer, commonly called & known by ye name of Andries ye Fynnes Creek, whereupon there is a convenient place to erect a mill. The week is recommended by ye owners thereof to be set up by Andries Andriessen & 19 more in Company, whose names are here under written for an Encouragement to ye said undertaking, it tending to a publicke good. Know ye that by virtue of ye Countre & Authoritie under me given, I have granted & by these present doe grant, ratifie, confirm and grant unto ye said Andries Andriessen & Company, their heirs & assigns, liberty to erect a mill in ye most convenient place in ye Creeks aforesaid mentioned. To have and to hold, etc. The grist rent is Bushnell Wheat. The Patent dated ye 1st of October, 1669."

On the same date

"A petition was granted to Robert Scott, John Marshall, John Coudas & John Boysar for a parcel of land in Delaware River, by Francis Lovelace. Whereas, there is a certain parcel of land in Delaware River lying & being on the East Syde of ye Christiana Kill, bounded on ye west on ye creek or Kill commonly called ye Mill Kill or Andries ye Fynnes Kill, or ye east on ye bounds of Christian Towne or John Stalcop's land, containing about four hundred acres be it more or less, ye said parcel of land hath been laid out by ye officers at Delaware for four Soldiers . . . . to the end that the said land may be measured and planted."

It is probable that this tract of land was below the "Mill Tract" before mentioned, and that the mill had caused it to become a desirable location.

But a little earlier than this a patent was granted to Peter Alrichs, February 15, 1668, for two islands in the Delaware River, the largest of which was called Matineconoeck, the Indian of which was Koomenakonokouck. Near the smaller island was a small creek "fit to build a mill thereupon." There was granted "the said island and premises appertaining, as also the small creek aforesaid nearer unto the lesser island, running up a mile within land to have liberty to erect and build a mill thereupon, where shall be found most convenient, as also a convenient proportion of land on each syde of the said Creek for Egressee and Regressee to and from the Mill, and for other necessary accommodations thereunto belonging."

It does not appear that this mill was erected, and the locality even is in dispute, but it shows the interest in improvements of this nature and how eagerly the sites were seized upon.

In May, 1675, Governor Andross, in a letter to the "three several courts of Delaware Bay and River, recommended Justices of Courts to, without delay, examine all Mills and Banks to be well fitted up and repaired, and if they see cause to have others built, to do so in convenient and fitting places. To regulate Tolls for grinding, and to give encouragement to all owners of Mills, whether Public or private."

Two years later he issued an order in relation to "a complaint that ye owners of a certain mill standing on a creek in Christiana Kill are deburred from cutting wood for repareyn thereof, by the parties owning the land on each side the saide Creek. These are to give notice and order that ye persons to whom ye said Mill belongs bee no way hindered, but are to have free liberty to cutt wood for said use, upon any land not in fence according to law."

The country being now settled more densely, new mills were erected, and, in the early part of 1679, the court decreed: "Upon the petition of Charles Persen desiring a grant for one hundred acres of Land for a new mill by the Petition and some more p. sons built in the Run of the Shellpot Kill above the old mill. The Court granted the Petition's the Request provided his honor the Governor's orders and regulacons bee observed and yt this new mill and Land doth not prove prejudicial to the old first built mill; alsoe that the Land bee not granted or taken up before, and that the water bee not stoppt up or hindered from the lower mill."

On the 6th of June, the same year, Olle Olleson petitioned to set up a watermill "in ye run of Shellfalls Creek above the two Lower Mills." It is not known whether this was granted or not. Olle Olleson was one of the patentees of Vertrechts or Trinity Hook and the land on which he proposed to build this mill was on the rear of his tract. The other portion above, on the river, was known as Horse Neck or Parde Hook.

In 1682, Wm. Markham, the deputy of William Penn, made the following order relating to a mill on the Brandywine: "At the request of Jacob Vandeaver, who is now about building a grist-mill on his land on Brandywine Creek in said county of New Castle, that we would grant him to make use of the water of the said creek on his own land for the service of said mill. We do hereby grant the same, he yielding and paying yearly to the proprietary, his heirs or assigns, half a bushel of wheat."

Many of these old mill-sites have been abandoned so long since that it is difficult to locate them. It is believed that the first mill on the Shellpot Creek was at the point called Herring Rocks, a place where large quantities of that kind of fish are caught, traces of the race-way may still be seen. The second site was probably above the turnpike, below the next natural falls, and required a long race-way. Here are the Webster Mills, which, after being burned down, were rebuilt and are at present operated as the property of John Webster. The Almond Mill is on the power higher up the stream and is a very old structure, having machinery of limited capacity, but like the old Grubb mill, on the west branch of Naaman's Creek, proves an accommodation for the neighborhood in which it is located. The latter mill, after having been the property of the Grubb family many years, passed into other hands, and, in 1887, was owned by Lewis B. Harvey.

On the Delaware, near the city of Wilmington, are the extensive Sellers Iron Works, whose location at that point was the means of building up the industrial village of Edgemoor. A full account of this enterprise is elsewhere given in this work. A mile higher up the river, at Riverside Station, on the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad, the works of the Delaware Extract Company are favorably located, occupying buildings which had been erected for the manufacture of bestsugar. That enterprise proving unprofitable, the present business was begun in January, 1887, by a company having the following management: William Pennypacker, president; Frank Pyle, vice-president; Frederick Pyle, secretary and treasurer; and J. Henry Grim, superintendent. The buildings have been supplied with machinery capable of extracting forty thousand pounds of licorice per week, whose operation gives employment to fifteen men. The motor is steam, from a ninety horse-power engine, and the material consumed is imported from Asia Minor.

Near Quarryville, Jacquet, Carr & Co. opened large quarries of Brandywine blue stone about 1827, shipping extensively for the Delaware Breakwater by means of slopes through a canal from the quarries to the river. Later the "Bellevue Granite Quarry Company" carried on operations at this point, making shipments by means of a track to the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad. At one time as many as two hundred men were employed, and the quarries were equipped with all modern appliances. Work was suspended in the summer of 1886. On the Shellpot Creek, where the Philadelphia turnpike crosses that stream, P. P. Tyre opened a quarry of superior granite in 1885, from which blocks of stone four feet in thickness have been taken. The quarrying of granite in the hundred is still in its infancy, but will prove an important factor in adding employment and wealth to many of its citizens.

Other industries not here noted are given in connection with the villages in which they are carried on.

Hamlets and Villages. — Since Brandywine Hundred sustains a suburban relation to Wilmington and Philadelphia, no large towns have been built within its bounds. Nevertheless, the points named below are centres of interest in the localities in which they are located, which make them worthy of notice in these pages.

Rockland has a picturesque location on the Brandywine, five miles from Wilmington, and is situated on both sides of the stream. Its principal activity is the paper-mill of Jessup & Moore, whose employees constitute a large proportion of the population. There are about two hundred inhabitants. Methodist and Presbyterian Churches are maintained. Alexander Colquohoun is the merchant of the village.

Talleyville is a small but pleasantly located hamlet on the Concord Pike, one and a half miles from the Pennsylvania line, and derived its name from the Talley family, early residents in this locality. Among its business interests was a public-house, called the "Spread Eagle," which has been discontinued. William Day had a store and kept the Talleyville post-office in a building which has been converted to private uses. Later the office was kept at the house of Rev. John Talley, a local minister. After this the office was discontinued and Graceville post-office established near Grace Church. Within the past few years Talleyville post-office was re-established with John McCray as postmaster, and a daily mail supplied. Below this place John Fraim is engaged in merchandising. There are also several mechanic shops and a fine grange hall.

Since the spring of 1885 Dr. Francis Harvey Day, who graduated from the University of Pennsylvania that year, has been a medical practitioner at this place, having his office on the homestead, which has been in the possession of the family six generations. Dr. Williams and others also practiced medicine at this point.

The "Blue Ball" inn, on the Concord Pike, below Talleyville, was one of the best known public-houses in the hundred. Its history antedates the century, but no authentic account of the time it was first opened can be given. In 1809 George Miller was the keeper, and public elections were there held. At this time it was a fair-sized stone house, whose capacity was taxed to accommodate the teamsters going to Brandywine Mills. Robert Galbraith and Isaac Anderson were later keepers. Many years ago the building was enlarged and converted into a farmhouse, thus removing this old landmark.

Above Talleyville, where Naaman's Creek road crosses Concord Pike, James Dutton was the keeper of a popular old-time inn, before 1820 and later. In subsequent years this became the property of Oliver H. Perry, who very much enlarged the house and preserved its popularity until his death. It is still kept for tavern purposes, but the former public-house of Thomas C. Smith, in the same neighborhood, is now a common farm residence. East from this was formerly Graceville post-office.

Beaver Valley is a hamlet on Beaver Run, where that stream crosses the Pennsylvania line. The place is also locally known as Chandler's Hollow, being situated in a deep vale, through which flows the run to mingle its waters with those of the Brandywine, a short distance below. The improvement of the mill-sites of this small but precipitous stream gave this locality much importance in former years, but the failing water-power has caused these interests to decline. Half a century ago a woolen-mill was operated above the hamlet, which was swept away by a freshet August 5, 1848, and the power has since been idle. Daniel Ferris and others improved the next lower power, which is now in use to operate the manilla paper-mill of Frank Tempe. The capacity is small, but a good quality of paper is produced. A small woolen-mill was on the next power, but in the course of years Stephen Broadbent there manufactured Turkey carpets. The building was next occupied as a clover-mill, but, about thirty years ago, was used as a plow factory by William Morrison, Amor Jeffries, Horace Mousley and others. The water-power was made to operate a trip hammer and other heavy work, the plows being finished at a co-operating factory in Pennsylvania. This industry was discontinued about fifteen years ago.

The flouring mills of Joseph Brinton and Isaac Smith occupied the lower sites and were well known in the early part of the century. The mill so long owned by the Smith family is now the property of William P. Talley, and though not operated extensively, is still a public convenience. Above it, in Pennsylvania, was Twaddell's Forge, which was in operation as early as 1780. Smith's bridge, across the Brandywine at this point, was built on piers in 1816. Six years later a freshet swept it away. It was rebuilt and again swept away in 1828.

Amor Chandler had the first store at Beaver Valley. In 1835 Charles and Martin Palmer were in trade. Lewis Talley followed later and with some partners manufactured shoes in connection with the store. John Chandler was also in trade, and since 1876, A. H. Chandler has been a merchant here. These merchants have also been postmasters of the Beaver Valley office. The hamlet has about a dozen houses and shops.

Hanby's Corners, on the Naaman's Creek road, two and a half miles from Claymont, is a hamlet of six or eight buildings. Richard G. Hanby here made the first improvements of a business nature, building mechanic shops. Alfred D. Hanby engaged in merchandising, but the store was discontinued ten years ago, and there is but little to distinguish the place from a farming community.

Grubb's Corners are a mile south of the above place and not quite three miles west from Grubb's Landing, on the Delaware. In this immediate neighborhood are Grubb's mills. At the hamlet are a few houses, shops and an Odd Fellows' Hall. In the latter Thomas Phillips has merchandised since 1882 and kept Grubb's post-office since 1884. The first improvements of a business nature were the mechanic shops of Samuel Grubb and others of that family.

Grubb's Landing, on the Delaware, was one of the first shipping points in the hundred. Here sloops touched and carried away the produce of the early settlers, bringing in the simple commodities at that time in use in a sparsely-inhabited country. It was originally the property of John Grubb, who lived on the banks of the river, a short distance below, until his death in 1757. In the times of the Revolution British sloops sometimes landed here and on one occasion a cannon-ball was fired from the deck of a sloop which passed through the walls of the old "Practical Farmer" inn. For some time a wharf was maintained at the landing, but it has long since ceased to be used by the public. The property is now known as the summer residence of Colonel John H. Taggart, but the name is perpetuated in the flag station of the Philadelphia and Wilmington Railroad here located. Near by is Holly Oak station, on the same railroad, where fishing clubs have erected a number of buildings for the accommodation and diversion of their members.

The "Practical Farmer" Inn, on the hill overlooking Grubb's Landing, was a very noted tavern one hundred years ago. It was erected before the middle of the last century. From its midway location, on this turnpike, it became one of the most popular stopping-places for stages and teams between Chester and Wilmington, and had the patronage of many noted travelers of that period. After the steam packet came in more general use, the character of the inn changed somewhat, becoming the centre of local gatherings, such as horse-races and "watermelon fairs." The latter were occasions of orgies and hilarities, which often continued several days, and were participated in by many Jerseymen and Pennsylvanians. The latter brought cattle to be sold or exhibited and loads of whiskey were on hand to be exchanged for the watermelons of the Jerseymen, who seemed to have had a peculiar fondness for the distilled grain of the Keystone farmers. The horse-races, on the course in the old Indian field, attracted thousands of people; and here some of the best horses of the country were speeded. The track was one and a quarter miles long and cedar trees grew on the outside, giving it an attractive appearance. It was obliterated nearly half a century ago.

In 1808 the inn was the property of a Mrs. Trevans, the widow of a refugee from the Island of San Domingo, who lived in a mansion on the opposite side of the road, but it soon after passed into the hands of James Grubb, Esq., who was a popular landlord. In time it became the property of his son, James, and while owned by him the old building was destroyed by fire, July 4, 1872. The present inn was then erected by him, but it possesses little of the fame of the old house. South from the "Practical Farmer" was the "Swan Inn" of Charles Truitt, by occupation a piano-maker. After his death his most prominent lumber merchant in the State of Delaware, was born at Darby, Pa., May 12, 1811, and died in Wilmington, February 24, 1871. He was of the sixth generation in direct line of descent from John Churchman, a native of Saffrin Walden, in Sussex, England, who, in 1692, at the age of seventeen years, immigrated to America and settled in Pennsylvania under William Penn. The distinguished mathematician and philosopher, John Churchman, born 1758 and died in 1805, was a descendant of the same John Churchman. His brother, George Churchman, was a noted minister among a Society of Friends, and was the first person to make a complete map of the peninsula comprising Delaware and the Eastern Shore of Maryland.

George W. Churchman, the subject of this sketch, grew to manhood at Darby, Pa. He was the second son of Caleb and Martha Churchman. Their other children were: John S., Frances, Ann, Rebecca, Henry L., Sally and Martha. Their father was a farmer and cattle dealer; he also owned a bark-mill at Darby and was a neighbor and intimate associate of Stephen Girard.

George W. Churchman early in life acquired many of the excellent business methods of that great financier. After leaving school he engaged in business at Darby with his father, until he reached the age of twenty-one years. In 1832 he purchased the historic saw and gist-mill property at Naaman's Creek, now the site of Claymont, and the same year moved to Delaware and took charge of his mills. He engaged in the manufacture of lumber, and also bought in much of the grain from the surrounding country and ground it into flour for the trade. He prospered in all his business operations, and soon enlarged and improved the entire mill property, making it the most complete industry of the kind in the State.

In 1838 he became interested in the development of the lumber interests of Central Pennsylvania. He purchased large tracts of timber-land in Cameron and Clearfield Counties, in that State, and at once began operations. He spent much time in the lumber region, superintending the work of felling the trees, hewing the logs into square timber and forming the rafts which were conveyed down the Susquehanna. He was very successful in this business and soon made a fortune, all of which was lost by a freshet on the Susquehanna, the entire production of one year having floated down the river. Much of his valuable timber lands were yet uncleared and his credit was good. He went diligently to work, and within a very few years recovered from his disaster. He continued with great success in the business and, at the time of his death, owned pine and hemlock timber lands in Central Pennsylvania to the value of two hundred thousand dollars.

The preparation of this timber for the market was an exceedingly interesting and profitable business, and in the early years of George W. Churchman's career was one of the chief industries of the great George W. Quayleman, for a third of a century the career was one of the chief industries of the great
State of Pennsylvania. The timber came out of the mountain districts down the small streams in rafts to Lock Haven, then the greatest lumber market in the United States. From this point they were floated in charge of pilots, with the current down the Susquehanna to Marietta, where new pilots took charge and safely steered them through the dangerous rapids of the river to Peach Bottom. From thence other men piloted them to Port Deposit, the place of delivery, and the head of tide-water on the Susquehanna. From this point the rafts were towed down the Chesapeake Bay, up Elk River into Back Creek, where they were made into “lockings” of sufficient size and length to readily pass through the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal and its locks, to Delaware City and thence up the river. Nearly all rafts were sold by their owners at Lock Haven or Marietta, both of which were lively business towns, during the rafting season of the early spring months of each year. George W. Churchman prepared thousands of rafts on his lands in Pennsylvania, and sold them to the trade in New York, Philadelphia, Wilmington and elsewhere. The rafts sold in New York were towed up the Delaware to Bordentown, and from thence taken through the Delaware and Raritan Canal to their place of destination. A large amount of his own timber he conveyed in rafts to his saw-mill on Naaman’s Creek, and there manufactured them into lumber on orders from nearly all of the leading shipbuilders and manufacturing establishments in Wilmington and the surrounding country. He also sold square timber and lumber to the Philadelphia and Chester market.

His extensive business operations brought him into close relation and intimacy with a great many prominent business men of Pennsylvania, Delaware and Maryland, in all of which States he was known as an upright man of the highest honor and most sterling integrity. His indomitable energy, rare tact and comprehensive knowledge of the lumber trade made him one of the most prominent business men of his day in Delaware. In 1867 he moved to Wilmington, though he continued his interest in his timber trade until his death.

He was one of the organizers and became a director of the Mechanics’ Bank of Wilmington, and was one of the promoters in the establishment of the First National Bank of Wilmington, which institution he lent his best influence, to further its growth and development.

In politics George W. Churchman was originally a stanch Whig, and later was the founder of the Know-Nothing party in Brandywine Hundred. When the Republican party was organized, he became an earnest advocate of its policy and principles, and continued a member of that party through the remainder of his life.

The lottery business, which had long been conducted in Delaware, contained many obnoxious features to the citizens of the State. Mr. Churchman was one of the foremost in advocating the passage of the law to abolish it. In November, 1858, with that object in view, he became a candidate for the Legislature to represent Brandywine Hundred, with the avowed purpose of attempting to secure the passage of the required legislation. A bill was introduced and during the same session was passed, accomplishing the object desired. The efforts of Mr. Churchman in this work were appreciated by the people, and in 1860 he was re-elected to the same office and served as a member of the Legislature of Delaware during the first two years of the Civil War.

He was a member of the Society of Friends, and inherited the strong traits and marked characteristics of that religious people. With all his neighbors and associates, of all political parties or religious sects, he was universally popular and very highly esteemed. Especially was this the case in Brandywine Hundred, where he spent most of his useful life. He was instrumental in securing the establishment of a post-office and railway station at Naaman’s Creek (now Claymont) and erected nearly all of the first houses in the village.

George W. Churchman was married January 31, 1838, to Ann Eliza Shull, of Delaware County, Pa. Their children were: Caleb, Frederick A., William H., George, Maria S. and Charles (deceased).

Amos H. Slaymaker and Benjamin Hartley merchandised many years ago at this place. Joseph McNamme was long successfully in trade, and was succeeded by George W. Lodge and others. This old and well-known stand is now occupied by Robert Casey, Jr. Claymont post-office is kept at the station by E. N. Baldwin, holding his appointment since 1885. The railroad through Claymont was completed in 1888, but a regular station was not established until many years later.

Since 1846 Dr. J. T. M. Cardeza has been a practicing physician in the hundred, and has been located at Claymont the past forty years. He graduated from the University of Pennsylvania in 1842, as also did his son, Dr. J. D. M. Cardeza, in 1877, and has been associated in practice with his father since that time. Since 1850 the elder Dr. Cardeza has been engaged in the collection of geological and numismatic specimens, having, in 1887, one of the finest collections in the State. He has separate buildings containing scores of casts and thousands of specimens, whose value has been placed at twelve thousand dollars.

At Claymont were fought several duels of historic note, and which created unusual interest at the time of their occurrence. The most important was fought Sunday morning, March 21, 1830, by William Miller, an attorney from Philadelphia, and Midshipman Charles G. Hunter, of the United States navy. The place was on the present Ford farm, near the State line. Miller fell mortally wounded, and his death was greatly deplored, since he had been drawn into the contest by his friendship for one of the principals. of the quarrel. Hunter was dismissed from the navy by order of President Jackson, but was subsequently restored to his former rank, and distinguished himself by his service in the Mexican War. Nevertheless, his life seemed blasted, and he died a disappointed man. He also acted in the duel out of friendship’s sake, and the fact that he had no enmity against poor Miller caused many of the leading men of the country to condone his offense and to unite in a petition for his restoration. Miller was at that time one of the most promising young lawyers of the city of Philadelphia, and very respectfully connected.

The next duel was fought near where the turnpike crosses the State road, on the 4th of June, 1842, by General James Watson Webb, of New York City, and the Hon. Thomas F. Marshall, of Kentucky. This was brought about by a political quarrel in Congress, and had been anticipated some time before it occurred. Both parties cherished bitter and hostile feelings, and met with a purpose to do deadly work. Webb was wounded in such a way that the fight could not be prolonged beyond the first fire, much to the disgust of Marshall, who insisted upon having another shot. Through the intervention of friends the principals retired with their sense of honor partially satisfied, and, in time, the breach was still further healed.

Another duel was fought on the State line, near the large beech tree, on June 9, 1845, by Washington Keith and Morris Meredith, both of Philadelphia. At the first fire each was wounded, though not fatally, when a settlement was effected, and they retired nominally friends.

The Edgemoor Buoy Depot, of the Fourth District, is on the Delaware, below du Pont’s wharf. The improvements were begun in 1880, and completed two years later, some of them being transferred to this point from the Christiana light-house. They consist of a wharf four hundred feet long, on which is a fog-bell and light-house of the fifth order; a depot building fifty by one hundred and forty feet; and a keeper’s residence, on three acres of land. This is occupied by W. W. Simmons. The buoy depot was opened in 1881, and placed in charge of Capt. N. L. Henderson, who is still in control of the interests connected with it. This yard is the general depot of the district, which has forty-two lights within its bounds, placed from Barnegat, N. J., to the Virginia coast. About three hundred buoys are kept in stock at the depot of Edgemoor, some of them being sixty feet in length. The general supplies of oil and wood are also here kept, making it one of the most important stations of the kind on the coast.

Du Pont’s wharf, next above the Buoy Depot, was established in the early part of the present century. But it has been important for a less period of time on account of the immense quantities of powder shipped from the du Pont works, about five miles distant. After 1825 several brick magazines were erected, from which the vessels transporting the powder were laden.

These are still in use, but on account of better shipping facilities near the works, most of the transportation has been diverted to those points.

Star of Bethel Lodge, No. 19, I. O. O. F., was instituted at the house of John Faulk, on Naaman’s Creek road, July 10, 1849. The following were original members: John Faulk, John W. Lodge, Samuel Hanby, Isaac N. Grubb, Thomas I. Clayton, Benjamin F. Hanby, Samuel L. Grubb, John Smith, Samuel Hewes, Jr., Isaac Booth and John Free.

In 1853 Odd Fellows’ Hall was erected at Grubb’s Corners, and the meetings of Bethel Lodge have been held there ever since. It is a three-story building, valued at two thousand five hundred dollars, and has also been used by other societies. Bethel Lodge has prospered generally, and in 1887 had forty members.

Morning Star Lodge, No. 9, K. of P. was instituted in the above hall October 20, 1868. Its charter bears the names of Geo. K. Lloyd, Alexander Valentine, Charles Williams, Joseph Proud, Jacob K. Hanby, James Leach, William McKee, Owen Zebble, George Phillips, Alburtus Phillips, Wm. Phillips, Jesse M. Clair, John W. Kruby, Edward C. Pierce, Joseph W. P. Casey, William S. Orr, Uriel Pierce, Jacob Gurdy, Ezra Pierce and Thomas Phillips. Its organization has since that time been successfully maintained, and in 1887 there were fifty members.

Lodges of Red Men, Good Templars and a Grange of Patrons of Husbandry for a time flourished in this hall, but have ceased meeting and surrendered their charters.

West Brandywine Grange, No. 13, P. of H.—This society was organized at Sharples’s school-house, August 9, 1874, with fourteen charter members, and John W. Day, Master. From the beginning the Grange succeeded in drawing to itself an aggressive, vigorous membership, which numbered one hundred and five in June, 1887, and comprised the best citizens of the western part of the hundred.

In 1886 a fine hall, thirty-eight by forty feet, and two stories high, was erected by the Grange, at Talleyville, which has been occupied since its completion. The committee having the work of building in charge was composed of Thomas J. Day, William A. Talley, J. A. Welden, John F. Sharples and Lewis M. Miller. The hall is valued at fifteen hundred dollars and was controlled by Trustees Clark Webster, J. Walker Perkins and J. Atwood Weldin.

Religious Interests.—As early as 1682 several families belonging to the Society of Friends, or Quakers, settled within the bounds of Brandywine Hundred, and held their meetings at private houses. But in 1687 Valentine Hollingsworth gave the ground for a meeting-house and burial-place, where was soon after built the Newark Meeting-house, a small structure of popular logs, which served its purpose about sixty years. In this building the Newark Monthly Meetings were regularly held until 1704, when they alternated with Centre, in Christiana Hundred; but in 1707 they were wholly abandoned at Newark, though the name was long retained (until 1760), when it was changed to Kennett Monthly Meeting, the meetings having been held at the latter place since 1721.

Weekly Meetings of Friends continued to be held at Newark until 1754, when they were also raised, most of the members having removed or deceased. The burial-ground was continued, though it fell into neglect after the Revolution; but it is believed that the old log church was removed to near Centreville, in Christiana Hundred, where it served as an outbuilding in later years.

Within the last fifty years a movement was set on foot by the citizens of the central part of the hundred to restore the former conditions of Newark. Accordingly, the acre of ground was inclosed with a substantial stone wall, and a Union Meeting-house was built adjoining, in the upper part of the road leading to the highway. Active in this work were Thomas Babb, George W. Weldin, John Beeson, Henry Bee, Edward Beeson, George Miller, Thomas Carmell and others. The property, consisting of the cemetery and a plain stone church, is now controlled by a board of trustees, consisting of Henry L. Guest, William L. Wilson, Amor G. Forwood, Penn Lykens, Isaiah Mousley, John F. Sharpley and Joseph Miller. Services have been held in the church by nearly all the denominations worshipping in this part of the county, but no regular organization claims it as its exclusive home. The cemetery is tenanted by the dead of many of the oldest families of the central and southern parts of the hundred, and is fairly well kept.

The Calvary Episcopal Church, half a mile north of the old Newark Union Church, was built on land donated by Mrs. Barbara Carr. The corner-stone was laid September 28, 1862, and the dedication took place January 22, 1863. The organization of the congregation was effected earlier, in 1862, and before this Episcopal meetings were held in the Union Church for the accommodation of members of the Grace and Ascension Churches residing in this locality. Later, the rector of the latter church preached to a small membership, but it has been found impracticable to maintain regular worship, and for some time the church has not been occupied. It is a small but neat Gothic chapel of native stone, whose erection reflects credit upon the neighborhood in which it stands.

The Bethel Methodist Episcopal Church.—The services of the Methodist Episcopal Church appear to have been established next after those of the Friends, and some of the most active members of the new organization were early members of that society. It is stated that Isaac Tussey, who lived on Shellpot Hill, was one of the first Methodists residing in the northern part of the county. But that faith was soon after professed by Thomas Webster and David Ford. The latter was an active, thinking young Friend. In 1768, when but eighteen years of age, he visited Marcus Hook and there listened to the impressive preaching of Captain Thomas Webb, the pioneer expounder of Methodism in Delaware. His eloquence was so marvelous that men of all conditions were enchanted, John Adams saying of him, after hearing him preach in 1774: "He is one of the most eloquent, fluent men I ever heard; he reaches the imagination and touches the passions well, and expresses himself with great propriety." David Ford became a convert to Methodism, and after he was married, a few years later, had preaching held at his house. Subsequently his son Jesse became a well-known Methodist minister.

In 1775 a Methodist Society was formed, which embraced among its members the above and William Cloud, whose sons, Robert and Adam, also became Methodists. In 1780 a small church was built, on part of the Cloud place, near the State line, which was long known as Cloud's Chapel, but which, in later years, became Bethel Church. The original building was enlarged, in 1799, until it became quite a spacious stone structure, though very plain in appearance. It is still standing, though not used as a regular place of worship since 1783. That year the elegant new Bethel Church was erected on an adjoining lot at a cost of nearly fifteen thousand dollars, and has since been occupied. It is a commodious two-story brick edifice, with a front of serpentine green stone, and is very attractive in its general appearance.

But its completion at a time when the country was suffering from financial stagnation was a heavy burden to the membership. Lying between the two churches is a large and well-kept cemetery, and in the same neighborhood is a parsonage, which was completed March 1, 1886, at a cost of thirteen hundred and fifty dollars. This property was controlled, in

In addition to the early membership already mentioned, Robert and David Pyle, Daniel Clayton, Thomas and Clark Webster, the Talleys, Isaac Grubb, Joseph Wier, Robert Johnson, John Day and Benjamin Day took an active interest in the affairs of the church in the early part of the present century. In 1887 there were one hundred and forty members, some residing in the State of Pennsylvania. The Revs. Wm. Miller, Samuel Hance, Mifflin Frain and John Talley have served as local preachers.

One hundred years after the formation of the society Bethel Church became a separate charge, and, since 1873, the ministers have been the following: 1874, Rev. H. Sanderson; 1875-76, Rev. E. H. Nelson; 1877, Rev. T. B. Hunter; 1878, Rev. T. B. Kiliani; 1879-81, Rev. Wm. B. Gregg; 1882-94, Rev. L. W. Layfield; 1885-96, Rev. T. B. Hunter; 1887, Rev. J. W. Hamersley.

The previous circuit relations embraced connection with churches in Pennsylvania and other Methodist Churches in Brandywine Hundred, changes occurring with so much frequency that they cannot be here traced.

Grace Church, Protestant Episcopal.—The preliminary meeting to organize this body was held at Talley's school-house, December 30, 1885, Doctor A. Prince being in the chair and James A. B. Smith secretary, when the following heads of families agreed to form a church:

On the 6th of February, 1836, the old school-house near the "corners" was purchased and fitted up for a church, and, about the same time, Isaac Smith and Dr. Abner Prince were elected the first wardens. The Rev. William J. Clark became the first rector of the new parish, serving in that relation several years. The subsequent rectors of the church have been the Revs. Samuel C. Shatton, L. H. Mansfield, J. B. Clemson, S. F. Hotchkiss, C. M. Callaway, William H. Jeffries, N. G. Schon, Robert N. Wright and, since 1886, L. H. Jackson.

In the fall of 1872 the parish decided to purchase ten acres of land for church purposes, the same being finally located on the Concord Pike, north of Talleyville. Here a large tent was pitched September 12, 1872, to celebrate the anniversary of the Sabbath-school, and it was an occasion of much interest, leading to a firm purpose to erect a fine house of worship on the grounds at an early day. The work of securing funds was begun, and on the 1st of October, 1874, the corner-stone of the new edifice was laid by Bishop Lee, assisted by Rector Hotchkiss. Henry M. Barlow became the builder of the church, which was opened for public worship July 4, 1875. The farwell services in the old church had been held the previous Sabbath, and the building, no longer used, has gone to decay. In building the new church, generous aid was extended by Louis Smith, William P. Cresson, Francis Tempest and the subscriptions secured by the ladies—Laura Smith, Mary Forwood and Elizabeth Forwood—helped much to make it the beautiful structure it is. The material is native stone, in fine Gothic style, and, standing centrally in the spacious grounds, it is a very attractive object. Its cost was about eight thousand dollars. Entering the grounds, part of which has been consecrated to the dead, on the left-hand side is a good sexton's house, while on the right-hand is the spacious rectory, completed in 1886, and presented to the parish by Mrs. Mary Cresson. Altogether this is one of the most attractive church properties in the county.

In June, 1887, the church had fifty-two communicant members, and the following vestry controlled the affairs of the parish: William P. Cresson and Louis Smith, wardens; Benjamin Atwell, Hugh Ramsey, Christopher C. Righter, Robert Beatty, Jr., and Stewart Ramsey.

The Sabbath-school maintained in the church is in a very flourishing condition and has more than one hundred members.

Church of the Ascension, (Protestant Episcopal), at Claymont.—The services of the Episcopal Church were held in this locality as early as 1843, the Rev. Alfred Lee, D.D., Bishop of Delaware, preaching at the school-house at Naaman's Creek. These meetings, held statedly several years, awakened a desire for a consecrated house of worship, and early in January, 1851, this purpose had been so far carried out that a building committee was appointed to superintend the work of erecting a church which should bear the name of the "Ascension." This committee was composed of Thomas Clyde, George Lodge, Wm. Gray, George Williamson and William C. Lodge. At the same time the Rev. G. W. Ridgely, was elected rector of the new parish, serving eleven months, when he was succeeded by the Rev. L. W. P. Botch, whose rectorate continued several years. A lot of land was donated by the Rev. J. B. Clemson, rector of the church at Marcus Hook, who resided in this neighborhood, upon which the church was built and completed in 1854, being consecrated September 14th, of that year, by Bishop Lee. It is a Gothic frame structure, of simple beauty, and has an unusually fine site. At this time sixteen communicants were transferred from the church at Marcus Hook, and the parish now entered upon a period of its history which proved remarkably prosperous. In the first twenty-five years of its existence three hundred and fourteen persons were baptized, one hundred and fifty-nine confirmed and one hundred and seventy-one communicants added to the membership. More than eight thousand five hundred dollars were raised for mission and charitable purposes. The rectory near the church was remodeled and much improved in 1884, making it an elegant home for the rector. Here have resided the later rectors, preaching also part of the time at the Calvary Church, several miles southwest from Claymont, but more recently the Church of the Ascension has been a separate parish. Its membership, through unavoidable circumstances, has been much reduced, numbering but thirty-five in June, 1887. At that period the vestry was composed of the following:

Wm. C. Lodge, Wm. Cloud, Thomas Habbert, George Lloyd, J. D. M. Cardeza and Charles Groff.

In 1862 the Rev. J. B. Clemson became the rector of the parish and served in that relation twenty-two years, having the assistance, the last fourteen years, of the Rev. F. Hotchkim. Their successors were the following: Rev. Cha. S. Betchter, 1876-78; Rev. R. Heber Murphy, 1879-82; Rev. P. B. Lightner, 1883-86; and, since June, 1886, the Rev. Edward Owen.

Claymont Methodist Episcopal Church is located about a mile from the station, on the Philadelphia Turnpike, on a beautiful tract of woodland. It is a fine stone chapel, built in Gothic style, in the summer of 1866, largely through the efforts of Thomas Kimber, an energetic member of the Society of Friends, whose home was in this neighborhood. He had the co-operation of John McKay, the Rev. Thomas T. Tasker, Wm. G. Valentine and the Rev. Wm. M. Dalrymple, as associate members on the building committee. The latter was the first minister of the congregation, which had been organized the previous May, in a small building, near the mills, of persons connected with the church at Marcus Hook, Pa. Among the most active members were Wm. G. Valentine, Enoch Ayars and Abner Vernon, and others soon connecting themselves formed a growing and vigorous class. The Sunday-school previously established proved very successful and aided in building up the church, which now began to sustain circuit relations with the neighboring churches.

In 1887 it became a separate charge, and, in June of that same year, reported a membership of thirty persons. In 1885 the church property was improved by the building of a sexton's house. The affairs of the church are in a prosperous condition.

The Mt. Pleasant Methodist Episcopal Church.—This old and well-known house of worship is on the west side of the Philadelphia Turnpike, four miles from Wilmington. The site is eligible and includes a grave-yard, where lie buried some of the oldest settlers of this section of the hundred. The building is a plain stone structure and was erected in 1838, but was thoroughly repaired in the summer of 1883, and reopened in October, that year, under the direction of the pastor, Rev. W. B. Gregg. The parsonage, on an adjoining lot, did not become church property until 1878.

Prior to the building of the church, worship was maintained in this neighborhood, among the early members being Jacob Weldon, William Phillips, Eliza J. Talley and their families, and the ministers were usually those of the old Chester Circuit. In 1873 the church at Claymont and Mt. Pleasant became a separate charge, having the Rev. H. H. Bodine in charge. The following year the latter church became a station and has since so continued, the church at Edgemoor being connected as a preaching-place since the spring of 1887. Since being a station the ministers of Mt. Pleasant have been the following: 1874-75, Rev. J. E. Kidney; 1876-78, Rev. A. D. Davis; 1879, Rev. J. W. Pierson; 1889, Rev. G. W. Wilcox; 1889-84, Rev. W. B. Gregg; 1885-86, Rev. J. W. Hammersley; 1887, Rev. Julius Dodd.

The members of the church numbered sixty-five in June, 1887, and constituted three classes. The church property has an estimated value of four thousand dollars and was controlled by Trustees Jacob R. Weldon, John S. Beeson, Geo. W. Weldon, Geo. W. Talley, J. Atwood Weldon, Joseph Habbert, Joseph Talley, Joseph Miller and Isaiah Mouseley.

A Sabbath-school of seventy-five members is connected with the church.

The Edgemoor Methodist Episcopal Church is a Gothic frame edifice, thirty-two by fifty feet, which was dedicated May 29, 1887. The lot on which it stands was donated by the Edgemoor Iron Company, and generous subscriptions made it possible to complete a very attractive place of worship, at a cost of twenty-five hundred dollars. This was placed in charge of Trustees John V. Bradbury, Thomas Steel, Robert M. Biddle, A. W. Young, Wm. H. Cook, R. A. Shipley and James B. Coleman. The church has twenty-five members and the same ministerial service as the charge at Mt. Pleasant.

The Rockland Presbyterian Church.—Prior to 1800 William Young, a staunch Presbyterian and an eminently pious man, came from Philadelphia and erected a paper-mill at the locality which has become widely known as Rockland. Soon after he set up preaching services, bringing a minister from Philadelphia, and in 1802 a substantial stone church was built through his efforts on the hillside, above the mill. The church sustained an independent relation more than a dozen years, but before 1820 passed into the hands of the Presbytery of Philadelphia. In the latter year the Rev. John Smith became the stated supply and, after a period, was succeeded by the Rev. S. W. Gayley, who was the minister many years. Since 1854 the church has been united with the Green Hill Presbyterian Church of Christiana Hundred, having the same session of ruling elders and the same board of trustees. The church building, though old, is in a fair state of repair.

The Mt. Lebanon Methodist Episcopal Church was organized at Rockland in 1838. Soon after a lot of land was donated by Thomas J. Aldred, upon which was built, in 1834, a stone church, forty by sixty feet, by a board of trustees comprising T. Talley, Curtis Talley, Casper Mundew, John Frain and Thomas Underwood. This building has been kept in good repair and is estimated worth three thousand dollars. In June, 1887, the trustees were Thomas Wilson, John W. Day, Robert Wilson, James E. Hornby, Charles W. Day, Evans Righter and James Davis. The church has sustained a number of circuit relations, and has also had a separate ministry. The membership is small.

CHAPTER XLVI.

MILL CREEK HUNDRED.

MILL CREEK HUNDRED is situated in the north-western part of New Castle County, and is bounded on the north and west by the Circle, on the east by Red Clay Creek and on the south by White Clay Creek. The hundred abounds with streams favorable for manufacturing, and, doubtless, on this account received its name. The land was early taken up and improved, and is in an excellent state of cultivation. The hundred is principally noted for the number of manufacturing industries that have existed, and still exist, within its bounds. A branch of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad runs through the northern and eastern parts, and affords facilities for travel and shipping. The climate is healthful, and the land fertile, producing wheat, corn and oats in abundance. The assessment list of 1804 contains the names of four hundred and sixty-three taxable. At that time there were in the hundred ninety-nine log houses, forty-eight stone, twenty-one built of brick.

There are numerous small hills in this hundred, the highest of which is "Meeting-House Hill." On this, in the summer of 1852, '53 or '54, a corps of engineers encamped, and erected an observatory about eighty feet high, on which their instruments were mounted. Their object was to survey the coast from New York to the mouth of Chesapeake Bay. For this purpose signals were erected on poles, within a range of from ten to a hundred miles; and whenever the view was obstructed by woods openings were cut. The party was there three or four months, and had a guard of United States soldiers. A few years since another corps of engineers erected an observatory on "Drummond's Hill."

Charles Rumsey, a native of Wales, emigrated to Charleston, S. C., in 1665. He resided there and at New York for several years, and finally became a resident of Maryland. While there he obtained patent for considerable land in Mill Creek Hundred. On the 25th day of March, 1676, Gov. Andros granted five hundred and seventy acres of land lying on Red Clay and White Clay Creeks to Charles Rumsey, Walraven Jansen and others. On December 4, 1679, Rumsey sold two hundred acres of this tract to John Watkins, who sold the upper part of it to John Cann, April 6, 1680. On December 3, 1679, Rumsey and Arient Jansen Vanderburgh petitioned the court of New Castle for a grant of land "behind Bread & Cheese Island." Rumsey obtained two hundred acres, with half of a marsh, and Vanderburgh one hundred acres, with the other half of the marsh. Rumsey sold one hundred acres on the 26th day of January, 1680, to Samuel Barker, who conveyed the same tract to John Cann September 5, 1682. Rumsey also owned other land in the hundred, and part of it was purchased from him by William Guest. Walraven Jansen, by his will dated March 1, 1681, devised to his son, Guysebert Jansen, one-half of his land, which included a portion of the five hundred and seventy acres above-mentioned, for the maintenance of his wife and children. In addition to the land patented to Rumsey, and which afterwards came into the possession of John Cann, there was surveyed to Cann a tract of three hundred acres on White Clay Creek. Mill Creek flowed through this land, and made a junction with White Clay Creek at the terminus of this tract. On September 5, 1682, he conveyed to Joseph Barnes a tract of land on the west of land owned by John Moll (late by Charles Rumsey), extending two hundred and sixty yards along White Clay Creek to land of John Nommers, and thence the same distance into the woods, on which tract a house had been built by Cann. On the same day Barnes bought of John Nommers that portion of his land which lay on the north side of White Clay Creek. On October 2, 1677, Broor and Andreas Sinnexsen obtained a grant of six hundred acres called "Claseburg," situated on the north side of White Clay Creek, near "Mill Brook." On the 13th day of April, 1685, Broor Sinnexsen conveyed to Humphrey Bert and Edward Green two hundred and twenty acres, and to Christian Juriansen, his son-in-law, one hundred acres, both being parts of a tract containing three hundred and twenty acres, called Water Land. Humphrey Bert and Edward Green sold half of theirs to John Crampton, and Juriansen's portion finally came into the possession of William Keith. On October 14, 1683, there was surveyed, for John Ogle, a tract of four hundred and thirty acres, called "Hop Yards," situated on the north side of a branch of Christians Creek, called White Clay Creek. On December 11th, of the same year, William Welch obtained a warrant for one thousand acres of land on the north side of White Clay Creek.

John Moll, who was the president justice of the Court of New Castle County from 1676 to 1682, and of whom a sketch will be found in the Bench and Bar, became a resident of the hundred. He purchased a tract of land of Charles Rumsey, who soon after died, and on July 2, 1749, Catharine, his widow, declared herself ready to stand by the sale of her husband’s plantation and part of his land at White Clay flats Kill to Mr. John Moll, who was also the owner of one thousand acres in Red Lion Hundred, of which mention is made in that hundred. He lived upon the Mill Creek plantation, except when engaged in his court duties, until about a year after his retirement from the bench, when he, with Peter Bayard, Peter Suyter, Arnoldus de La Grange and others, purchased, August 11, 1684, three thousand seven hundred and fifty acres of land lying on the waters of the Chesapeake. This tract embraced the four necks of land east from the first creek that empties into Bohemia River. But little is known of his later career.

On June 9, 1684, William Guest obtained a grant from William Penn for a certain tract of land in the county of New Castle, on the north side of one of the branches of Christiana Creek called White Clay Creek, and on the east side of a branch of White Clay Creek, known by the name of “Millin,” and about two miles from Bread and Cheese Island. This tract, known as Wedgebury, contained seven hundred acres, two hundred and thirty-eight of which Guest bought of Charles Rumsey and the remainder was taken up on a grant. On the 20th of October, of the same year, he procured fifty acres more adjoining the above tract on the north side. On May 9, 1685, articles of agreement were drawn up by Thomas Sawyer and William Guest, whereby Guest “shall have liberty from time to time and all times hereafter to dig upon a certain hill or knoll of ground for raising trees or other metal whatsoever he shall find there and carry away to his own use, &c.” The hill here referred to contained two or three acres. On the 4th of November, 1702, he obtained five hundred and thirty acres on the western side of Red Clay Creek, near Bread and Cheese Island, and touching White Clay Creek. In this connection mention is made of “a white oak stump standing on a bank by the mill.”

Probably the earliest settler in what is now Mill Creek Hundred was Thomas Wollaston, who settled upon a tract in this hundred and resided until his death, which occurred in 1686. In February, 1666, Colonel Richard Nichols granted to Sergeant Thomas Wollaston, John Ogle, John Hendrick and Harman Jansen a warrant for a tract of land containing three hundred acres lying “in White Clay Kill, near unto Christiana Kill, bounded on the east by land of Hans Boner, on the south by James Crawford’s land, on the west by Fresh or Rum Creek (now Mill Creek), and on the north by the waters at the head of Bread and Cheese Island.” John Ogle resided at New Castle and vicinity until his death, in 1684. Jansen was a resident of Crane Hook. Sergeant Wollaston took out warrants under Governor Lovelace at the following times: In 1668, for one hundred and eighty acres; in 1669, for one hundred and ninety-two acres; in 1675, Swart Nutten Island; and in 1680 for two hundred and twenty-four acres. He also bought other adjoining lands in the same hundred. He was one of the signers for the mill-seat near what is now Stanton, in October, 1679. On February 7, 1677, soon after the reorganization of the court at New Castle, he was appointed under-sheriff of New Castle and its precincts by Sheriff Edward Cantwell. He was also appointed marshall and crier of the court. These positions he held until 1679, when he was succeeded by Samuel Land. He was foreman of the jury July 10, 1686, in a suit between Cornelius Empson and Jacob Vandeveer, on title to land on north side of Brandywine, above the Vandeveer tract. On the same date he sold two hundred acres of his own tract to John Crampton, who also bought of Humphrey Bert and Edward Green one hundred and ten acres of land—the half of a tract of two hundred and twenty acres lying in White Clay Creek Hundred, which they had purchased of Broor Sinnexson. From this transaction of Wollaston with Crampton a lawsuit sprang up, and Crampton obtained a judgment in the court at New Castle, which continued some time. It was finally carried by Wollaston to the higher courts or powers in Philadelphia, where the decision was reversed. Thomas Wollaston died in 1686, and Martha, his widow and administratrix, and John Hendricks, August 21, 1705, conveyed the half-interest in the first tract purchased, including the half of the mill property at the island, to Cornelius and Richard Empson. Cornelius Empson, by his will, December 12, 1710, left the mill on White Clay Creek (Stanton) to his daughters Sarah and Elizabeth. Thomas Wollaston left two sons—Jeremiah and Thomas. The latter, on February 2, 1730, conveyed to his brother Jeremiah the tract of two hundred and twenty-four acres, warranted to their father in 1680. This land was on or near White Clay Creek, near the old Presbyterian meeting-house, where Jeremiah at the time lived. Jeremiah Wollaston lived and died on the place. His son Joshua came to Wilmington and resided there all his days, as did his son Samuel. Two daughters of Samuel—Catherine and Elizabeth—became the wives respectively of Elwood Garrett and Albert W. Smith, both of Wilmington, where they now reside.

On August 3, 1668, a patent was granted by Governor Nichols to Olie Poulson, Thomas Jacobs and Thomas Snelling for the land on Bread and Cheese Island. The origin of the name for this island has not been ascertained. On the 4th of June 1679, John Anderson, who had purchased a sixth interest in the island, sold his share to Olie Poulson. At this time Abram Mann was also a part owner, and on February 4th, of the following year, purchased from Olie Poulson all his right and title (which was a third interest) in Bread and Cheese Island. At the same time he also bought of Olle Poulson a one-sixth interest in two hundred and forty-eight acres of land, lying near and adjoining Bread and Cheese Island. This tract was patented by Governor Andros to Olle Poulson, Thomas Jacobs and Arient Jansen (John- son), November 17, 1679, on a warrant and survey made for them in 1675. The Thomas Jacobs portion of this tract was inherited by his son, Olle Thomas, and by him devised to his son, Peter Thomas, who died without issue. It then passed into the hands of his brother, Paul Thomas, and was by him devised to his daughter Eleanor, who was the wife of John Twigs. The part belonging to Arient Jansen came into the possession of Andrew Vance. Twigs and Vance united, February 21, 1737, in conveying their portions to Edward Robinson, who, by various conveyances, was also the owner of Bread and Cheese Island, which he still held in 1755.

During the latter part of the eighteenth century there was a ship-yard on this island, managed by Barney Harris, William Woodcock and Simon Cruston. During the War of 1812 they were driven from home by the British, and they withdrew to Jones Creek, Kent County, where they erected a brig. The ship-yard has not been opened since that time. The island now belongs to David R. and George M. D. Lynam, by descent from their father, David Lynam, who purchased it in 1833.

William Penn, wishing to suitably provide for his two younger children, William and Letitia, directed Henry Hollingsworth, surveyor, by warrant bearing date February 17, 1699, to lay out some land for them. In the following year thirty thousand acres were surveyed for them in Chester County, Pennsylvania, and New Castle County, Delaware. This entire tract was known as "Staing Manor." To William Penn, Jr., was granted fourteen thousand five hundred acres, mostly in Chester County, and a small part in Mill Creek Hundred. The remaining fifteen thousand five hundred acres, described in the patent as "a certain tract of land situated on the south side of the Brandywine Creek, in the province of Pennsylvania," were conveyed, October 23, 1701, to Letitia, who afterwards married William Aubrey, of London. The lands of Letitia were named "Letitia Manor." Power of attorney was granted to James Logan and Reese Thomas to convey the property. The first sale from the tract was made August 17, 1702, when John Gregg purchased two hundred acres. The land purchased by Gregg extended from the circle eastward through the hundreds of Mill Creek and Christians to Burns' Run. Red Clay Creek passed through the tract and on the stream Gregg erected a grist-mill, which he conveyed to his son William, April 10, 1730. William, by his will bearing date January 10, 1746, devised his estate to his sons, Harmen, William, Joshua and Jacob, each an interest. Jacob, August 20, 1769, conveyed his interest to his son Harmen, a miller. The mill is situated in Christiana Hundred, and was owned in 1804 by John Phillips and later by Baldwin & Chandler.

The following persons were purchasers of the Staing Manor lands at the dates given:

- February 8, 1713. William Cooks, 300 acres.
- May 10, 1723. Caspar Garretson, 500 acres.
- August 2, 1723. Simon Haddley, 93 acres.
- September 15, 1723. Henry Dickson, 130 acres.
- September 11, 1725. Thomas Yeastman, 150 acres (on the circle).
- November 8, 1725. Henry Dixon, 100 acres.
- November 8, 1725. Caspar Garretson, 80 acres.
- June 2, 1726. William McMechen, 901.5 acres (on the circle).
- March 2, 1728. Jeremiah Lockery, 190 acres.

The land of William McMechen, purchased June 2, 1726, was in three tracts, one of two hundred and forty-one and three-fourths acres on the circle adjoining lands of John Jordan, Josiah Ramage and Francis Bridley. The second tract, also on the circle, contained one hundred and sixty-three acres, and adjoining lands of John Jordan, Thomas Duke and John Montgomery. The third tract contained five hundred and sixty acres, and adjoining lands of Henry Dixon, William Cooks, Thomas Hollingsworth and Thomas Yeastman. Dr. William McMechen lived at Christiana Bridge and practiced medicine in the vicinity for many years. He became the owner of large tracts of land in different parts of the county, and in addition to his land in Mill Creek, above mentioned, he bought on Peck (Pike) Creek, four hundred and two acres, March 21, 1729, of Thomas Craighead, and November 19, 1734, sold two hundred and fifty-three acres of it to Andrew McMechen. A tract of five hundred and ninety-three acres was patented October 8, 1701, by Bryon McDonald, who, by will dated February 23, 1707, devised to his son William two hundred and fifty-three acres, which at his decease, May 20, 1730, passed to William McMechen.

One of the families who long resided in this hundred was the Englands, who were represented by John England, who was a Friend and one of the proprietors of the Principio Furnace, in Cecil County, Maryland. He came to this country from Staffordshire, England, in 1728, as manager of the furnace, and in 1726 purchased lands on White Clay Creek, in Mill Creek Hundred, at the mouth of Muddy Run. He also purchased land in Pencader and Christians Hundreds. These tracts contained iron ore, and it was to advance the interests of the furnace that they were purchased. He resided part of the time on the east side of the Muddy Run, on land purchased of Toby Leech, where he soon afterwards built a dwelling-house and a grist-mill, which has since been known as England's Mill. John England died in May, 1734. Joseph England, a brother, came to this country the same year that John emigrated, and purchased a large tract of land in West Nottingham, Chester County, Pennsylvania, and settled there.
NEW CASTLE COUNTY.

Soon after the death of John, Joseph took charge of the lands on White Clay Creek, and removed to that place. On February 24, 1741, Allen and Joseph England, sons of John, who had remained in England, conveyed this property to Joseph England. The estate then contained four hundred acres. He became a Friend in 1730, and was an active member of the West Nottingham Meeting. In 1747 he built the present brick manor-house, and the mill was at that time or soon afterwards rebuilt. He died August 29, 1748, and by his will devised the mill property to his son Joseph, and the Nottingham property to his son Samuel. A daughter, Joanna, married John Townsend, of Baltimore, and their descendants are now living in Baltimore and Philadelphia. Joseph, the second, resided at the mills all his life, and died February 5, 1791. He devised the farm to his son Joseph. Elizabeth, a daughter, married William Wollaston, a descendant of an old family in the vicinity. Another daughter, Sarah, married Capt. Robert Kirkwood, and settled at Odessa. Capt. Kirkwood was well and favorably known on account of valuable services in the Revolutionary War, during which he served in thirty-two engagements. Joseph England, the third, to whom the mills were left, by his public life was identified with his county, having served in the Legislature between 1800 and 1828. He died April 24th of the latter year, while a member of the Senate. Of his family was Joseph Townsend England, who removed to Baltimore and became an agent of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and was one of the founders of the Mercantile Library Company of that city. He died in 1876, leaving a son Charles, now a merchant in Baltimore. Another son, James B. England, is an attorney-at-law residing in Philadelphia.

RELIGIOUS MATTERS.—The land on which St.
James' Protestant Episcopal Church stands was patented to Arien Jansen Vanderburg on July 12, 1885. He, by his will bearing date November 20, 1701, devised a portion of his estate to Rev. Eric Biorck and the Swedish Church, to be disposed of as they saw fit. On June 29, 1714, Rev. Biorck and Barbara, widow of Vanderburg, conveyed the entire one hundred and ten acres, originally patented, to James Robinson. Ten acres of this tract Robinson deeded to the Honorable Society for the propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts for the only use of St. James’ Church. The deed bears date but 1720 and recites that “the land is granted in consideration of the dutiful affection, love and good will which I have and do bear unto the Church of England and members of the said church, . . . of which I profess myself a member, have to the only proper benefit and behooves of the said church and school-house wherein youths may be educated according to the principles of the said church, to and for the only use and service of my well beloved brethren and neighbors. The present minister of a certain part of the said church, commonly known or distinguished by the name of St. James’ Church, at White Clay Creek, and their successors.” From this it appears that St. James’ Church was constituted before 1720. The first building was a log structure which was supplanted by a frame edifice. The present church building is the third one on this site, and was erected in 1822. It is a one-story stone building, forty by forty-five feet, with a gallery on three sides. A marble slab on the outside of the church bears the following inscription:

“St. James Church, Founded 1720, Rebuilt 1822.”

The number of communicants at the present time is sixty-two. The Sunday-school is composed of five teachers and fifteen scholars. The church is governed by a board of trustees instead of wardens and vestry, as is usual in Episcopal churches.

The following persons compose the present board:

- John Lewden
- Robert C. Justis
- Robert L. Armstrong
- Thomas W. Jones
- Alonzo Newlin
- Thomas Brackin
- J. Taylor Pierson

The cemetery surrounding the church is filled with the graves of the early settlers in this vicinity.

The following is a list of the rectors since 1799:

- Rev. Robert Clay, from 1797 until April 21, 1821.
- Rev. Richard Hall, installed July 21, 1821.
- Rev. Stephen W. Freeman, installed April 19, 1824.
- Rev. Mr. Pardee, from April 4, 1833, until December 25, 1834.
- Rev. Mr. Adams from April 4, 1833, until April 14, 1838.
- Rev. W. Chambers, from October 16, 1839, until July 20, 1843.
- Rev. Mr. Freeman, from June 16, 1844, until September 22, 1844, when he was appointed Bishop of Arkansas.
- Rev. Walter E. Franklin, from January 12, 1845, until June 6, 1847.
- Rev. William Traspell, resigned April 13, 1848.
- Rev. J. H. Mannfield, from May 14, 1847, until June 20, 1850.
- George Sheats.
- Rev. Bred Betcheller, until August 15, 1857.
- Rev. Charles Fosmanden, from March 17, 1873, until October 6, 1874.
- Rev. W. D. Hannon, from January 16, 1875, to July 5, 1880.
- Rev. Wm. A. Alrich, December 1, 1885.

White Clay Creek Presbyterian Church was organized about 1721. During the first few years the church had no regular pastor, and occasional services were conducted by Revs. Daniel McGill and Robert Laing. The first mention of a church edifice at this place is found in the minutes of the Presbytery of June 5, 1723, and is as follows: “Appointed, that our next Presbytery meet at White Clay meeting-house the first Wednesday of August next.” On September 22, 1724, Rev. Thomas Craighead was installed as the first regular pastor of this congregation. He was a native of Ireland and came to this country in 1715. A call was extended to him by John Montgomery and John Campbell, representatives of this church, which he accepted in 1724, and continued until 1733. The land on which the church stood was owned by him, and on April 10, 1727, he granted one acre to John Montgomery, William McMeachen, William Steel, William Nevin, Hugh Clark and Josiah Ramage, trustees, for the consideration of “one peppercorn yearly if demanded. It was for the use of the people called Presbyterians, belonging to the Presbytery meeting at White Clay Creek.”

The second church was built on a half-acre adjacent to the Old Presbyterian Meeting-House land, about 1785. Tradition says that it was a log building twenty-five by forty feet, and was still standing in 1772. In 1797, Rev. Charles Tennent became pastor of this church. He was also a native of Ireland, and came to this country in 1716. He served the church here till 1768. From 1741 till 1769 a bitter dissension occurred in the church, which was happily ended in the latter year.

The trustees in 1740 were James McMeachen, of White Clay Creek Hundred, and William McCaughey, William Nevin, Alexander Montgomery, David Nevin and William Coughran, of Mill Creek Hundred. The deed for the present church site was given May 20, 1752, by Joseph England (miller), to William Steel, John Deal, Wm. McCrea, James McMeachen, David English, Evan Rice, William Gallagher, Neal Morrison, William McMechin, Charles Black, Robert Boggs and Hugh Randles, “members of the Presbyterian congregation, whereof the Reverend Mr. Charles Tennent is at present pastor.” The church then erected was thirty-six by sixty feet, contained sixty-nine pews, and stood one hundred and three years. Rev. John McCrery, the third pastor, was ordained May 10, 1769, and continued till his death, which occurred June 18, 1800 (Rev. McCrery was a graduate of Princeton, of the class of 1764). The stone wall around the church was built in 1785. From 1800 till 1812 the church depended upon supplies. In 1827 Robert Crawford and Alexander Guthrie, each about seventy years of age, were elders of this church. Rev. Andrew K. Russell was installed pastor on April 8, 1812. He was a valedictorian of the class of 1806, at Dickinson College. He ministered here until his decease, in 1839. In 1815 there were only thirty-eight communicants of this church. In 1816 ten were added, and in 1833 forty-five were received into membership. During the last thirteen years of his ministry the ruling elders were Douglas Morrison, Dr. Thomas W. Handy, Alexander Guthrie, Jacob Whiteman and George Springer. Rev. Wm. R. Work was installed December 3, 1840, and continued until April 8, 1846. Rev. Joseph Barr, the next pastor, was installed June 2, 1846, and ministered here until October, 1853.
Rev. James Vallandigham, D.D., was called to this church and the Head of Christiana in October, 1853. On May 31, 1857, each church was made a separate station, and Dr. Vallandigham remained in charge of the Head of Christiana.

Rev. Wm. D. Mackey acted as stated supply of this church until April 11, 1885, when he resigned.

Rev. James B. Umberger, the present pastor, was installed November 6, 1886.

The present two-story brick church building was erected in 1855. The dedicatory services were conducted by Rev. H. S. Clarke on May 1, 1856.

The membership of the church at the present time is one hundred and eighty.

A Sunday-school of one hundred members is under the superintendence of J. H. Walker.

The following are the officers of the church at present: Pastor, Rev. James B. Umberger; Elders, Wm. Hawthorn, Thos. Hawthorn, Samuel Lindsay, George D. Medill, Samuel S. McCoy, Andrew Rambo, Wm. J. Stroud, James H. Walker; Trustees, Samuel Lindsay, Samuel Morrison, Chas. A. Morrison, Wm. Hawthorn, Mansell Tweed, Milton Steel, Robt. T. Rankin.

Red Clay Creek Presbyterian Church.—Services were held in the vicinity of this church as early as 1713, but no steps were taken for the organization of a church till 1722. In this year the several Presbyterians in this neighborhood were constituted a church. They depended upon supplies till December 17, 1755, when Rev. William McKennan was ordained and installed as pastor. He filled this pulpit and a portion of the time preached at White Clay Creek Church until his death, which occurred May 15, 1809. The next pastor, Rev. Samuel Henderson, ministered to this congregation until 1811. From this year until 1823 the congregation again depended upon supplies. In the latter year Rev. Thomas Love was installed pastor, which position he held until 1862. He was also pastor of the Lower Brandywine Church until 1856.

Rev. Sterling M. Galt served this church and the one at Newark from August, 1863, until his death, October 24, 1865.

From this date to the present time the pulpit has been filled by Revs. W. A. Rankin, S. H. Higgins, A. C. Jenkins, R. P. Kennedy and Dr. Porter.

A stone slab in the present commodious building states that it was founded in 1761 and rebuilt in 1853.

The church has a membership at the present time of one hundred and twenty-five.

The present elders are George Klar, Egbert Klar, Henry Claran and Archibald Armstrong.

The present board of trustees is composed of the following persons: George Klar, Lewis McElvee, John R. Crosson, Dr. Swithin Chandler, Franklin Gebhart.

The Presbyterian Church at Stanton was erected and dedicated in 1875. The dedicatory services were conducted by Rev. Mr. Marks. The erection of the church is due to the labor and influence of Rev. Robert Graham, who filled the pulpit for a year after its completion. At that time there were seventeen members. This number was increased by additions both by letter and on probation, until it reached thirty in 1877. After the removal of Rev. Mr. Graham, the church was connected for a short time with the Christiana Church, and ministered to by Rev. Mr. Snyder. With the exception of these two pastors, the church has depended entirely on supplies. The building is a frame edifice, one story high, thirty by forty feet, and was erected at a cost of $2250. The membership has gradually decreased until there are at present but ten communicants. The present officers are,—Elders, James R. Foote, B. W. Dickey; Trustees, John H. Narvell, C. H. Dickey.

Ebenezer Methodist Episcopal Church.—Previous to 1824 the Methodists in the central part of Mill Creek Hundred held meetings in private houses. In that year a stone church, twenty-four by twenty-eight feet, with a gallery, was erected. In this building they worshipped for thirty-five years. They then removed the stone building, and erected a one-story frame building, thirty-five by fifty feet, which is still in use. The new church cost about $2500. At present the membership is sixty. The present board of trustees is composed of the following persons: A. J. Whiteman, John W. Worl, Joseph Guthrie, I. B. Eastburn and John K. Chambers. The class leader is Joseph Guthrie. The Ebenezer Church has been connected with the Newark, Christiana and Hockessin Circuits, and has been supplied by the pastors in charge of those circuits.

Stanton Methodist Episcopal Church.—In January, 1877, members of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Newport, under the leadership of their pastor, Rev. H. S. Thompson, commenced a series of religious meetings in the school-house at Stanton. As a result of these meetings, there were many conversions. In February an unoccupied building was rented and fitted up for a chapel. The congregation immediately began to take steps for the erection of a church. A lot was purchased, and the corner-stone of the church was laid on June 12th. Bishop L. Scott officiated, assisted by Revs. W. J. Stevenson, D.D., C. M. Pegg, J. B. Quigg, J. France, G. R. Bristor, L. E. Barrett, G. W. Burke and "Father Pegg." The church was dedicated November 1st of the same year. Appropriate services were conducted by Rev. R. L. Dashell, D.D., and others. The church is a frame building, Gothic in style, and its dimensions are thirty-five by fifty-five feet. It was erected at a cost of $2900. The present membership is fifty. The church has been served by the following pastors: Revs. H. S. Thompson, J. D. Rigg, J. E. Bryan, E. H. Nelson and J. D. C. Hanna. Present Trustees: Edwin Cranston, Joseph Derrickson, John Turner, William Mullen, Seth F. Whiteley.

Hockessin Methodist Episcopal Church.—In April, 1881, a Methodist meeting was held in a wheelwright shop, belonging to Mrs. Brackin, at Brackinsville, by Alban Dalton and a few others. A short time after this meeting a Sunday-school called “Friendship was organized, and the meetings were held at this place. In the fall a room in Odd Fellows’ Hall was secured for holding divine services, Rev. W. H.
Hendrickson at this time conducted the meetings. In December it was decided to build a church, and a committee of eleven was appointed to solicit subscriptions for its erection. A discussion arose at this time as to a suitable location, and it was finally decided that Hockessin was the more desirable place of the two. On the 21st day of July, 1882, the following persons were elected and incorporated as the trustees of the church: Wm. Howard, Israel Durham, Thos.
W. Feree, Alban Dalton, Edwin Golding, Reese W.
Chandler, James McDowell, Ellis F. Kinsey.
On the 21st of the following month the contract for the erection of the church, except the gallery, classrooms and seats, was awarded to Thomas M. Robinson, whose bid was $1727.50. The corner-stone was laid November 5, 1882, with appropriate services conducted by Rev. J. E. Bryan and others.
On February 18, 1883, the church was dedicated to the worship of God. Services were conducted in the morning by the Rev. Dr. Stevens, in the afternoon by Rev. M. A. Richards, and at night by Rev. Adam Wallace. At the present time there are forty-five members. The following pastors have labored here:
Rev. J. E. Bryan, Rev. Wm. R. Sears, Rev. Julius Dodd, Rev. Joseph Dare.
The present officers are: Pastor, Joseph Dare; Class-Leader, Moses Golding; Trustees, Moses Golding, Jacob Broomhall, T. W. Feree, Edwin Golding, A. L. West.

Friends.—The earliest record of a meeting at Hockessin is in 1730, when a week-day meeting was held at the residence of Wm. Cox, by permission of the Newark Preparative Meeting.

In 1737, Henry Dixon and some other Friends settled in Mill Creek Hundred, and a first and weekday meeting were established among them. On the 17th of Tenth Month of that year two tracts of land were deeded to John Baldwin, Jacob Hollingsworth, Henry Dixon and John Dixon, trustees. The one tract of two roods and twenty eight perches was granted by Wm. Cox and Catharine, his wife, the other of one acre and forty-six perches, by Thomas Dixon and Hannah, his wife. In the following year a meeting-house, which is part of the present meeting-house, was erected. This was enlarged to its present size, thirty by forty-five feet, in 1745. Meetings for worship were held under the supervision of Kennett and, perhaps, Newark Monthly Meetings, until 1808, when business meetings were established.
The Monthly Meetings were known as “Centre Monthly Meetings,” and were held alternately at Centre and Hockessin until 1787, when they were divided and each made a separate meeting-place.
The wood-work on the building has been repaired at various times and out-houses built more recently.
The building is now in a good state of preservation.
There are at present about twenty-five families and parts of twenty more families connected with this Monthly Meeting.

Mill Creek Meeting-House.—In 1838 James Thompson and thirty-two other Friends petitioned the New Garden Monthly Meeting for the privilege of holding a meeting for the worship of God. A committee was appointed to ascertain the advisability of establishing another meeting in Mill Creek Hundred. The committee, composed of Sarah Michener, Sarah Wilson, Martha Hilles, Jonathan Lamborn, Ephraim Jackson and Benjamin Ferris, reported favorably and permission was granted. Services were conducted in the residence of James Thompson until 1841, when a one-story stone meeting-house, thirty by forty feet, was erected at a cost of about eight hundred dollars. In this building the services have since been held, and there are at present fifty members.

White Clay Creek Meeting was established in 1751, by the consent of the Chester Quarterly Meeting. In 1784 they were allowed to hold preparative meetings, and in 1803, at their own request, the name was changed to Stanton.

The first meeting-house was built many years ago and remained till 1873, when the present one-story brick building, thirty by forty-two feet, was erected at a cost of two thousand five hundred dollars.

There are present about seven worshippers.

Benjamin Cranston is the clerk of the meeting.

The Union Chapel, situated between Stanton and Marshallton, was erected in 1896. It was built par-tsicularly to afford a suitable place for holding Sunday-school, which previous to this was held in the district school-house under unfavorable circumstances.
Religious meetings are held in it every Sunday night, consisting either of prayer-meeting or preaching. The Sunday-school numbers over a hundred attendants, and is under the superintendence of William Mullen. The building is a one-story frame edifice, thirty by sixty feet, and was erected at a cost of two thousand one hundred dollars.

St. John’s Roman Catholic Church.—The first Catolic known to have resided in Delaware was Cornelian Hollehan, a wealthy Irish gentleman, who emigrated to this country about 1730, and settled in Mill Creek Hundred, on part of Staning Manor. He named his homestead “Cuba Rock,” and here he entertained the early Catholic clergy, and at his house the first Catholic services were held in Delaware. He later purchased another tract, called “The Old Homestead,” on which the present Catholic church stands.
The growth of Wilmington and the establishment of Catholic churches there drew to them the Catholic population in the vicinity, and not until 1882 was the present church founded, and the church edifice was erected and completed in 1883.

There was a small log church known as “St.
Mary’s,” and cemetery at a place called “Coffee Run," on the turnpike, about three miles nearer Wilmington. The cemetery dates back to 1786. The first pastor was Rev. Father Whalen, who was succeeded in 1796 by Rev. P. Kenney.

The Ashland church, at Ashland Station, called St. Patrick's, with an adjoining parsonage and cemetery, was commenced in 1881. The Rev. Peter Donaghy became the first pastor of Hockessin and Ashland churches, and resided in the parsonage at Ashland. He was succeeded in June, 1887, by the Rev. James Travers Farley, the present incumbent.

SCHOOLS.—The necessity of educating the youth was early felt by the residents of Mill Creek Hundred, and for this purpose private schools were opened, affording educational advantages to such as were able to pay for them. On January 20, 1808, an act to incorporate a school near St. James' Chapel was passed. Joseph Ball, Humphrey Hill, Joseph Burn, Wm. Reynolds, Andrew Reynolds, David Morris, Caleb Harlin and Edward Marshall were appointed trustees. A building was erected, which is still standing. Private school was conducted here until the adoption of the common school system, when the building was converted into a school for the education of all classes, and was so used many years. The names of Henry Hasson, John Runk, Thomas Stapler, Gideon Wakeman, Ruth Bonsall, Mark Gibson, Evan Rice and James N. Williams are still remembered as early teachers in this hundred. The old stone school-house at Stanton, which was the first used for public school purposes, is still occupied for those purposes.

At Marshallton the schools are divided into two departments and occupy a commodious building. There are at Marshallton one hundred and twenty pupils. The old and, in most cases, badly constructed and worse ventilated school buildings have been supplanted with neat, convenient and healthful structures. The system has been improved at various times and better qualified teachers employed.

ROADS AND BRIDGES.—The roads of the present day in Mill Creek Hundred are in a good condition, and present a striking contrast to the ones constructed by the early settlers, both as to convenience and number. The earliest roads, built and known as the King's Highway, are treated in the chapter on internal improvements. From time to time, as the wants of the people have demanded them, roads have been built. On February 26, 1752, the viewers appointed to review "the road formerly laid out, leading from Joseph England's to the county line," made a favorable report, which was confirmed.

In August, 1768, a petition was presented to the Levy Court for the opening of a road from Newark to Cuckoldstown, adjoining the plantation of Jeremiah Wollaston, and extending to the old Presbyterian Church, and thence till it intersects the road from Newark to the Circle, near the school-house of Robert Boggs. In 1771, John Reese and John Fouk built a bridge over White Clay Creek. In the March term of Levy Court, 1813, a committee was appointed to contract for the erection of a bridge over Red Clay Creek at William Fouk's Mill. On March 5, 1816, one thousand dollars were appropriated by the Levy Court for the erection of a bridge over White Clay Creek, at Tyson's Ford, near Meteer's mill. This was built during that year at a cost of $1771.83, which was paid February 17th of the following year. In March, 1822, two hundred and forty dollars were appropriated for repairing this bridge. In March, 1832, one thousand dollars were appropriated for a bridge over White Clay Creek at Harmony Mills. The bridge was constructed and cost one thousand seven hundred dollars. At various other times roads have been laid out and bridges constructed till the present excellent state of affairs has been attained.

INDUSTRIES.—Sir William Keith, Governor of Pennsylvania from 1712 to 1756, was attracted to the county of New Castle by the iron in Iron Hill and vicinity. Swedenborg, writing in 1734, says that Sir William Keith, in 1725, had a furnace on Christina Creek. Bishop also says he manufactured iron in New Castle County. An examination of the records discloses the fact that on October 29, 1722, Sir William Keith purchased two hundred and sixteen acres of land in Pancader Hundred, on the south side of Iron Hill, of Philip James, and on July 16, 1724, one hundred acres of land lying on the north side of White Clay Creek in Mill Creek Hundred, of "James Espy, of Keithsborough, of New Castle County, merchant." This tract was part of a larger tract which was originally granted to Broor Sinnen Xen, and was on both sides of White Clay Creek. The part in Mill Creek Hundred, which lay above the mouth of Mill Creek, was deeded by Sinnen Xen to Christian Juri ansen, his step-son, from whom it passed to others, and in 1723 to James Espy. From papers of John England, manager, and afterwards part owner of Principio Furnace, and at one time the owner of Keith lands, James M. Swank, in "Manufacture of Iron of All Ages," quotes the following concerning the purchase: "Sundry lands and tenements in New Castle County, Delaware, upon which lands there was a small iron forge, and supposed to be a great quantity of iron ore." Thus it will appear that there was a forge upon some of the lands purchased.

Keith also bought of William Battel, sheriff, September 5, 1725, four hundred and seventy acres of land, lying on both sides of "Christina" Creek, and November 16th the same year, two hundred acres on the same creek. He also purchased two lots containing respectively fourteen and a half acres and ten and a half acres, on one of which was a grist-mill. On February 3, 1726, he bought of Hewell James two hundred and fifty acres of land on Christiana Hundred. All of these tracts he conveyed, February 22, 1726, to John England, who, October 5th following, bought of Toby Leech six hundred acres on the north side of White Clay Creek, resting also on Muddy Run. The six hundred acres were part of a larger tract originally located by John Guest. Upon it, as late as 1829, a grist-mill was run by Joseph England, probably a descendant. It was above the James Epy tract and probably joined it, separated only by Pipe Creek.

It is related in the “Manufacture of Iron in All Ages,” by James M. Swank, that about 1725 one John Ball was operating a bloomery on White Clay Creek near St. James’ Church. A John Ball was in possession at that time of four hundred acres of land called “New Design,” lying on the west side of Mill Creek, and in a deed April 29, 1735, he is mentioned as a blacksmith, and conveyed forty acres of the tract to his son William, also a blacksmith, and one hundred acres of a tract adjoining. He had conveyed a part to a son James in 1729, and May 17, 1737, conveyed to John Ball, Jr., two hundred and two acres, and July 15, 1738, one hundred and three acres to his son William. It is quite probable that the father and son carried on a bloomery a few years as ore could be obtained from Iron Hill. The Abbington Iron Works Company were then operating at that place.

The excellent mill-sites afforded by the streams of this hundred were conducive to the erection of mills at an early date. The assessment list of 1804 contained the following names as mill-owners: Joshua Johnson, fulling-mill; John Armstrong & Samuel Meteer & Co., paper-mill and saw-mill; James Black’s estate, grist-mill; Henry Brackin, grist and saw-mills; Joseph England, grist and saw-mills; William Foulk, grist and saw-mills; Caleb Harlin, Sr., grist and saw-mills; Isaac & Benjamin Hersey, grist and saw-mills; Robert Johnston, grist and saw-mills; John Marshal, grist-mill; James Mendenhall, grist and saw-mills; John Phillips, grist-mill; Robert Phillips’ estate, grist and saw-mills; John Reece’s estate, grist and saw-mills; John Robinson, grist-mill; Andrew Reynolds, grist-mill; Thomas Stapler and Joshua Stroud’s estate, grist-mill; Jacob Wollaston, grist and saw-mills; William & Abraham Barker, saw-mill; Ephraim Jackson, saw-mill; William Little, saw-mill; Thomas McDaniel, saw-mill; and David Morrison’s estate, saw-mill. Some of these were built at a much earlier period, and mills are now on the sites occupied by them. Others have fallen into decay and disuse, and a few have been entirely forgotten.

Those forgotten are the mills owned in 1804 by James Black’s estate, Robert Johnston, John Phillips and John Robinson. Of those no longer in use are the mills of Joshua Johnson, Henry Brackin, Andrew Reynolds, William & Abraham Barker, William Little and David Morrison’s estate. Of the mills in use in 1824, the following have been discontinued: Jesse Trump’s cotton-factory, afterwards used by James Broadert as a carpet-factory, and during the war operated as a woolen-factory by James Taylor. The old building still stands. The William Stapler fulling-mill at Stanton, not operated for many years; Robert Crawford’s tanyard on Muddy Run, afterwards converted into a bark-mill, but not operated since 1860; Robert Squib’s tanyard at Stanton, not run since 1880; Joshua Johnson’s mill was last operated about 1855 by his son, Samuel, and was on the John Ridgeway property; John Reese’s mill was built in 1773 on land now owned by David Eastburn, and was last operated about 1816; Henry Brackin’s mill was near Brackinville; has not been in operation since 1860. William Little and David Morrison owned small saw-mills on Pike Creek, and are almost entirely forgotten. Andrew Reynolds’ mill was built in 1799, and operated for a number of years by him. It was next owned by Samuel Anthony, by whom it was sold to Abraham Cannon. While in the possession of Cannon, it was last operated about 1877 by William Robinson. It was also used one year for a spice-mill under the management of Franklin Fell. It was a three-story building, thirty-five by forty-seven feet, and was situated on Mill Creek. It was torn down 1887 by R. Thomas Lynam, the present owner of the land. The Roosevelt cotton-factory on White Clay Creek, once an important manufactory, was burned about twenty years ago, and has not been rebuilt.

The earliest mill in the hundred was built at Stanton on an undivided tract of land owned by Charles Rumsey and John Watkins, planters, both of White Clay Creek. On October 14, 1679, they made an agreement for the erection of a mill with some of their neighbors.

A portion of the agreement reads as follows:

“There being a convenient place to set a mill and that ye neighbors dwelling on Chesoe & Broad Island do desire to build a mill there was doe of these present find ourselves... to grant to these people hereunderwritten, that certain place lett it belong to either of us when that Land is cleared, and on consideration of ye convenience of some good thing for our own use as well as these, wee doe by these presents give and grant to either or all of these parties here sects their hands free Liberty to build a mill to them their heirs for ever, to cut timber at all times for use of ye sd. A mill was built at the place mentioned and later a half-interest was purchased by Cornelius and Richard Empson. The latter sold to Cornelius, who, by his will, December 12, 1710, conveyed his portion to his daughters, Sarah and Elizabeth. It was then used as a saw-mill, and it was stipulated that three thousand feet of boards should be sawed for some person not named. No further account is obtained of the mill property until 1772, when it is learned that Stephen Staples and Samuel Smith obtained condemnation of lands for a grist-mill. They had built a race, dam and corn or grist-mill, and on May 18th, in that year (1772) they made arrangements with John —, who owned lands above, whereby they could build their dam higher. At this time they owned two hundred and seventy acres on Bread and Cheese Island and on White Clay and Red Clay Creeks, and also a lot on the west side of the creek opposite where they built a mill-race. They set thirty acres apart as the mill property, and on October 10, 1780, sold a fourth interest to Caleb Bynars.

On the 18th of April, 1795, Samuel Smith and Jonathan and Daniel Barnes, heirs of Caleb, sold to Joshua Stroud the equal undivided parts in the mill and property. On March 3, 1812, John Stapler, grandson of Stephen, sold to Stephen Stapler, his brother, the quarter-interest held by him. Stephen Stapler already owned a quarter-interest in his own right. Joshua Stroud conveyed his one-half interest to Jonathan and Daniel Bynars, May 15, 1812, and bought it back in June following. On January 7, 1818, he sold it to Stephen Stapler, who operated the mill until it was sold July 10, 1816, on a judgment for Francis Haughley, sheriff, to James Brian. On the 10th of October, 1820, Brian sold a merchant mill, saw-mill, and all machinery, buildings and tenements, and fifty-four acres to Samuel Bailey. The mill was old and built of stone. A frame mill was built by Mr. Bailey and operated by him until 1852, when Joseph Tatnall and a Mr. Lea became the purchasers. In 1864 Mr. Tatnall became the sole owner and continued so until the mill was destroyed by fire in November, 1885.

In October, 1777, there was patented to John Anderson alias Stalcop, a tract of land, on the east side of a branch of Christiana Creek called "Red Clay's Kill," containing six hundred acres, known as "Southern Land." He was also the owner of the land which is now occupied by the city of Wilmington. A portion of the six-hundred-acre tract was conveyed at an early date to Thomas Bird, and descended to his son Empson, who sold to Robert Phillips, May 8, 1778. On it was an old log mill known as the "Swedes' Mill," which remained till 1812, when it was torn down, and on part of the foundation a stone mill was erected to be used as a woolen manufactory. In 1790, in the rear of the log mill, the present frame mill, forty by sixty feet, three stories high, was erected. The woolen-mill was operated but a few years and then connected with the grist-mill. In 1828, the mill property was purchased by John C. Phillips. It was next owned and operated by Isaac D. & William G. Phillips till 1876, when Isaac D. Phillips became the sole owner and has since operated it. Some of the machinery was purchased by Oliver Evans. The buildings have been remodeled several times. The grinding is done by burrs and consists of merchant and custom work. The mill is situated on Red Clay Creek.

On January 12, 1747, six acres of land in Mill Creek Hundred were condemned for the use of the mill, at that time in the possession of David Robinson and Alexander Montgomery. The mill was situate on Mill Creek, and in 1804 was owned by Caleb Harlin, Sr. In 1815 the old mill was torn down and the present one erected. The mill is operated by water-power and the grinding done by burr, and is mostly custom work. The mill is now owned by Samuel Chandler.

The mill owned by Thomas McDaniel in 1804 was situate on Pipe Creek. In 1827 the old mill was torn down and the present building erected by John McDaniel. In 1875 it was sold by his heirs to G. M. D. Robinson. Dr. Swithin Chandler, the next owner, conveyed the mill to W. M. Logan in 1886. The capacity is twenty-five barrels per day. There is a saw-mill in connection capable of sawing from twelve hundred to fifteen hundred feet of lumber daily.

The mill of Ephraim Jackson was at Hockessin, and was sold by his heirs to George Springer, who conveyed it to John Mitchell the present owner. The mill is at present seldom operated. It is leased to G. C. Gallagher, who has fitted up a portion of the mill as a creamery, in which he manufactures one hundred and seventy-five pounds of butter per day for Baltimore and Wilmington trade.

John England, one of the proprietors and the manager of Principio Furnace, built a grist-mill before 1734, which passed by deed to his brother Joseph, February 24, 1741, and was retained in the family for many years. In March, 1840, it was sold by the heirs of Joseph England (3d) to David Eastburn, who held possession of it till 1872, when he sold the mill to Oliver and Charles Allen. They operated it for two years and then sold it to Edward Wilson, who conveyed it to Thomas W. Jones. The old mill still stands and is situated on White Clay Creek. In 1887 it was refitted with rollers and has a capacity of forty barrels per day.

The mill owned by Jacob Wollaston in 1804 is still standing. It is situated on Pipe Creek, and has been operated for the past few years by James Ward as a spoke factory.

The grist and saw-mills owned by James Mendenhall in 1804 still remain in the family. They are situate on Mill Creek, and are now operated by John Mendenhall, great-grandson of the man who erected them. They have also been operated by each successive generation. The work performed here is solely custom work.

The grist-mill at Marshallton was at an early date owned by Solomon Hersey, and later came to Isaac and Benjamin Hersey, by whom they were owned in 1804. It next came into the possession of Jesse Trump, by whom it was sold to James Buckingham. John Marshall, who erected the rolling-mills there, became the next owner. The present mill is owned by J. R. Brinthurst.

On July 16, 1782, Charles Evans sold to John Evans, Theophilus Evans and Oliver Evans four hundred acres of land. On this they soon erected a stone grist-
NEW CASTLE COUNTY.

mill, a saw-mill and a cooper-shop. The Evans' were of Welsh descent, and were born in the vicinity. Oliver, the most prominent of the three, was born in the year 1755.1

On May 26, 1792, the mills were sold by Sheriff Thomas Kean and purchased by David Nivin. He sold a one-third interest to Charles Anderson, who, March 15, 1795, sold it to William Foulk. The remaining two-thirds were purchased of Nivin by Foulk on February 24, 1798. After his death the property descended to his heirs, and May 9, 1820, his son John purchased the interest of the remaining heirs. From this family the hamlet received the name Faulkland. John Foulk retained possession till May 28, 1828, when it was purchased by Jonathan Fell and turned into a spice-grinding establishment.

Previous to this the grinding was done in Philadelphia, but on the purchase of this mill the situation in that city was converted into a warehouse. The manufacture of spices here by this family was continued until March 17, 1874, when the second mill was burned. The old mill was burned in 1867, but was immediately rebuilt.

The mill was last operated by C. J. Fell & Brother. Their spices had a world-wide reputation and were shipped to all the principal cities. Near the old site is a grist-mill owned by Franklin Fell.

On May 19, 1792, John Reece purchased a tract of land on Red Clay Creek, which was sold at sheriff's sale as the property of John Thomas. In the deed of conveyance no mention is made of any mills, and from this the inference is drawn that there was none there at that date. A grist-mill and a saw-mill were erected by John Reece and operated by him until his death, when they became the property of his son, John Reece, Jr. He retained possession of the mills until April 22, 1811, when he conveyed the land and mills to Mordecai McKinney, who, September 17th of the following year, sold them to Thomas Lea. Mr. Lea improved the mills and in addition erected a cotton-factory. In February, 1823, Edward Tatnall and James Price, assignees of Thomas Lea, offered for sale a cotton-mill named "Endeavor," with one thousand four hundred and fifty-two spindles, two pickers, four carding-engines, also a grist-mill and cotton-factory named "Auburn," on Red Clay Creek, with one thousand three hundred spindles. The sale of the mills on Red Clay Creek was not consummated till June 30, 1826, when they were purchased by Joseph and Jesse Mendinhall. They retained the mills twelve years, and October 4, 1838, conveyed them to Thomas Garret and David Smith. They were operated in partnership until September 23, 1846, when Garret's share was purchased by Smith. He continued in possession of the mills until November 1, 1849, when they came into the possession of Cyrus Hibborn. On April 24, 1858, they were exposed at public sale by the sheriff and purchased by Joseph Mendinhall, who, September 1st, of the same year, sold them to James Cranston. On March 25, 1864, Cranston sold to John Wright, who, June 21st, conveyed the mills to William Dean, John Pilling, Joseph W. Bullock, Benjamin Bullock and George T. Jones. By them, on December 30, 1864, the mills were conveyed to the Kiamensi Woolen Company, which was incorporated October 20, 1864. At some period previous the saw-mill had been abandoned and the grist-mill removed or converted into a portion of the cotton-factory.

When the Kiamensi Woolen Company came into possession of the factory it was operated partly on cotton and partly on woolen goods, the woolen feature having been introduced by Wright. They immediately removed all cotton machinery and converted the mill into a manufactory for the exclusive manufacture of woolen goods. Carding and spinning were also done there until 1884, when the Independence Mill, at Stanton, was purchased, but since that time this work is performed at the latter place. By annual additions the factory has doubled its capacity since it came into the possession of the present company. The mills are fitted up with improved machinery and have telegraphic and telephonic communications as well as automatic sprinklers. The raw materials and the manufactured products are conveyed to and from the mills by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, which has a station in close proximity. With ten sets of cards in operation, one thousand two hundred dollars' worth of goods are manufactured per day. The mills are the chief means of livelihood for many of the residents of this section of the hundred, employment being given to one hundred and fifty operatives. The capital stock is one hundred and thirty-three thousand and three hundred dollars, which is divided into two thousand six hundred and sixty-six shares, of which all but one hundred and seventy shares are owned by the Pilling family. The mill is the largest and most successful woolen-mill in the State. Much credit is due to the president, Thomas Pilling, who has resided in the vicinity and had personal supervision of the factory since 1864. The present board of directors is as follows: President, Thomas Pilling; Secretary and Treasurer, John Pilling; H. T. Pilling and John Pilling, Jr. In addition to the mills the company owns twenty-six dwellings.

John Pilling, manufacturer, was born at Chowbent, Lancashire, England, March 6, 1830. He was a son of Richard and Susan Bradshaw Pilling. His father being a silk weaver in limited circumstances, John left school at the age of seven and a half years and served a boy's apprenticeship at making shoe-nails. His daily task was four thousand nails at six cents per thousand, one-half of his wages going to his employer for the use of the shop. When he was but eleven years of age he came with his parents to the United States and located in Philadelphia, where both father and son worked in cotton and woolen-mills until 1842. Then they went to Brookfield's.
carpet-mills in Brandywine Hundred, Delaware. After six months spent there they removed with Broadbent to his new mills in Mill Creek Hundred, about four miles from Newark, and remained in that establishment until 1845. During the next three years they worked in various mills, but in 1848 they entered the employ of Joseph Dean & Son, at Newark. Although John was then eighteen years of age, he received but four dollars a week, but he gradually worked up to ten dollars. Then he resigned to accept a position of man-of-all-work at five dollars a week, in order that he might learn all the practical details of the business. In 1857 he became the superintendent of the mills of Robert Kershaw in Philadelphia, which were soon stopped by the panic, and from 1858 to 1860 he managed the mills of Shaw & Armstrong, in the same city. In May, 1860, he returned to the Dean Mills. On February 1st, following, Joseph Dean retired and Mr. Pilling formed a copartnership with his son, William Dean. These mills were the first in the vicinity of Philadelphia to manufacture army goods and clothed the first company that went down over the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad. During the whole war the mills were largely engaged in government contracts, and contributed many thousands of dollars in money to the cause of the Union. During the panic of 1873 the mills were never stopped except for repairs. In 1872 the Dean Woollen Company was formed, with Mr. Pilling as president and manager, and Mr. Dean as secretary and treasurer. In January, 1884, he resigned his dual office in the Dean Woollen Company, though he was then and is still, next to Mr. Dean, the largest stockholder. Since then he has given his undivided attention to the mills of the Kiamensi Woollen Company, at Stanton, Delaware, of which he is treasurer and manager. Mr. Pilling went to Europe in 1867 to attend the Paris Exposition and visit the mills of England, France, Holland and Belgium. Again, in 1880, he went to Europe for the benefit of his health, which had become impaired by close application to business.

Before the war he was a Democrat in politics, but since that time has been prominently identified with the Republican party. He has held nearly every local office in the town of Newark, where he still lives in a handsome dwelling. Twice—in 1866 and in 1889—he was elected a member of the State Legislature, where he became a leader, and backed by the trustees and friends of Delaware College, in 1867, secured the passage of a bill aiding that institution, a charter for the Pennsylvania and Delaware Railroad, and other important measures. In 1881 he was largely instrumental in securing the passage of the Baltimore and Ohio bill. For fourteen years he has been a director of the First National Bank of Newark, and has been connected with all important public enterprises in the town.

He was married in 1851 to Elizabeth B. Kelley, of Chester County, Pennsylvania. Of their children, Kate died December 17, 1872, while Isabella, wife of S. J. Wright, of Newark, Susan Estella and John Pilling, Jr., are still living. His wife died December 21, 1873, and on October 4, 1877, he was again married to Mrs. Ellen Glenn, daughter of Nathaniel Bayne, of Newark.

In 1882, Gregg & Breilly fitted up a building, formerly used as a woolen-factory, with the necessary machinery for spinning silk and yarn. Two years later Gregg was succeeded by Mr. Smith, who after one year's experience sold his portion to Derrickson. The factory is now operated under the style Derrickson & Breilly. There are eight hundred and sixty spindles in operation, with a capacity of nine hundred pounds per week. The mill gives employment to fourteen operatives.

The factory of E. J. Cranston, at Stanton, is now operated by H. E. Holstizer & Brother. It is fitted up with eight hundred spindles for spinning cotton and woolen yarn, and has a capacity of six hundred pounds per day. Employment is given to twelve operatives.

In 1848, Messrs. Curtis & Brother purchased the property near Newark known as the Meteor property, and called the "Millford Paper-Mills." This paper-mill was owned in 1804 by John Armstrong, Samuel Meteer & Company, and had probably been built some time previous. It was operated until 1841 by the Meteers, and then sold by their administrators to several parties, by whom it was successfully conducted, and when it came into the possession of the present owners was in ruins. It was by them rebuilt, and has continued in full operation until the present time. During the Rebellion, and for many years previous and afterwards, the mill was run on government contracts almost exclusively. Since 1868 the principal business has been the manufacture of envelope, card and fine colored paper, finding a market in all the principal cities, mainly, however, in Philadelphia and New York. In 1884 the senior partner, F. A. Curtis, died, and the surviving partner, S. M. Curtis, having settled the affairs of the firm, retired from the business. The firm now consists of the two sons of the deceased partner, Alfred A. and F. W. Curtis and Walter C., sons of the retired partner.

After the long period of thirty-nine years, the old mill was found to be in such a dilapidated condition, and so far behind the needs of the continually increasing demands for more and better, as well as the cheaper paper, that the new firm reluctantly concluded to erect a larger and more modern plant. On April 18, 1887, the old mill so long a source of revenue to so many worthy people of the town, was taken down, the old machinery sold, and at the present writing a new and beautiful as well as modern structure is being erected.

The capacity of the old mill was only three thousand pounds per day, while the new one will probably produce eight thousand pounds.

The very best machinery is being placed in it by well-known and reliable firms, and the intention is to manufacture only first-class paper.

The rolling-mills at Marshallton were erected and opened in 1836 by John Marshall, who operated them two years and then associated with himself Caleb Marshall under the style C. & J. Marshall. There was then only a single mill, with one pair of rollers, giving employment to eleven men. The mill was operated thus until 1862, when Caleb Marshall sold his portion to Edward Medinhall, who remained a partner until 1869, when his share was purchased by Calvin Marshall.

In 1871 John Marshall conveyed his interest in the rolling-mill to John and Joseph P. Richardson. In 1874 J. R. Brighurst purchased a one-fourth interest in the rolling-mills from Calvin Marshall, as the portion belonging to him, and in 1877 he became sole owner. In 1880 he built a steam mill, and in 1884 another one, and at present has three sheet-iron mills, one barn-mill and one paddle-mill. These mills are fitted up with three grate furnaces, two reverberatory heating furnaces, three double puddling furnaces, one box annealing furnace and one English furnace. The rolling-mills have a capacity of 2500 tons of finished sheet-iron per year, and give employment to one hundred and twenty-five persons. Five pairs of rollers are in use. The mills are lighted by electric light. The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad runs to the mills and affords excellent facilities for shipment. The "Star" and "Delaware" are the principal brands.

In 1829 John Smith and Edward Gilpin built a rolling-mill on Red Clay Creek. Smith's portion was shortly afterwards purchased by Gilpin, who was sole owner in 1824. In 1828 Joseph Whitaker commenced operating the mill, but soon discontinued it. It was then leased of the Delaware Bank by James Wood & Son, and operated until 1832. Dr. McLane then managed it for several years. He was succeeded by J. Wood & Brother, who were proprietors until 1844, when the mill was purchased by Allen Wood, who conducted it until his death. His son operated it until 1885, when a stock company was formed and incorporated as the "Allen Wood Company," with the following officers: President, Howard Wood; Secretary and Treasurer, Jonah R. Jones; Superintendent, Joseph Boughman.

The mill is about twice the size of the original building, and is devoted exclusively to the manufacture of sheet-iron. It is fitted up with a pair of rollers, a grate furnace and an annealing furnace. It is operated chiefly by water-power. The capacity of the mill is four hundred tons per year. The iron is shipped principally to Philadelphia.

In the vicinity of Hockessin there are large deposits of kaolin, a clay used in the manufacture of pottery. Since 1872 the digging and drying of this substance has become quite an industry. The principal persons engaged in this business are John W. Borgess and Golding & Sons Company. By these two parties twelve thousand tons of kaolin are shipped annually to Trenton, N. J., and other markets. Employment is given to two hundred persons in the works.

A. L. West opened a machine-shop in Hockessin in 1884. Attention is particularly given to engines, boilers and clay presses. Eight men are employed.

Post-Offices.—The post-office at Stanton was established in 1825 with Frederick Cray as the first postmaster. He was succeeded in 1830 by Abraham Boys. Aquilla Nebaker, Springer McDaniel, Levi Workman and Joseph Chambers have been postmasters here. Joseph H. Kirk, the present incumbent, was appointed April 22, 1885.

The post-office at Marshallton was established February 27, 1878. J. R. Brighurst was the first postmaster and continued until April, 1886, when he was succeeded by David Ecow, the present incumbent.

The Pleasant Hill post-office was established in 1855, with Samuel Lloyd as its first postmaster. The position of postmaster has been held successively by Isaiah B. Eastburn, Alvin Buckingham, Sr., and Alvin Buckingham, Jr.

On January 1, 1868, a post-office was established at Hockessin. Miss Jane Griffith received the appointment of postmistress to this office. She was succeeded by N. M. Palmer. On October 1, 1877, J. C. Way was appointed his successor. K. S. Chandler, the present incumbent, received his appointment February 20, 1886.

The post-office at Mermaid was established in 1844 or 1845. Josiah Walker, the first postmaster, filled the position until 1849. In that year Milton Steel was appointed his successor. The present incumbent, W. H. Pennock, was appointed in September, 1882.

Wooddale was established a post-office in 1873, and Henry Boughman appointed postmaster. He was succeeded by George M. Bennett, Newlyn Pierson, Sarah Pierce and John Connor, the present incumbent.

Villages.—Stanton is the oldest village in Mill Creek Hundred and was formerly called Cuckoldstown. When Stephen Stanton became the owner the name was changed to Stanton. It is situated in the southeastern part of the hundred, near the junction of White Clay and Red Clay Creeks and about a half-mile distant from the depots of the Baltimore and Ohio and Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroads. It contains three churches, a school-house, post-office, hotel, three general stores, millinery store and about four hundred inhabitants.

Marshallton is situated about a mile and a half north of Stanton. It was so named in honor of John Marshall, who started the rolling-mills at this place. It has grown rapidly since the enlargement of the mills by J. R. Brighurst, and some of the residences are lighted by electricity. Two depots of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad are within five minutes' walk of the village. It contains three general stores and has a population of three hundred and fifty.
Hockessin is situated in the northern part of the hundred, on a portion of an eight-hundred tract of Letitia Manor granted to John Houghton August 2, 1715. The name is an Indian word, said to mean "good bark," and was so called on account of the excellent quality of white oak found in this locality. The village has grown considerably since it has railroad facilities. It now presents three churches, five stores, a hotel, post-office, school-house, station on a branch of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad and about four hundred inhabitants.

Milltown, Greenbank, Loveville, Brackinville, Mermaid, Corner Ketch, and Pleasant Hill are small hamlets containing a few dwellings.

John G. Jackson, surveyor, civil engineer and astronomer, was born in New Castle County, Delaware, September 8, 1818. He was the second son of Thomas and Jane Jackson, who at that time occupied one of the oldest farm homesteads in the fertile valley of Hockessin, an aboriginal name of uncertain derivation, but said by some to mean "Good Bark Hill." Anthony Jackson, of Lancashire, England, emigrated to Ireland in 1649. Among his children was Isaac Jackson, who, with his wife, Ann Evans, became the parents of a large family and emigrated to America in 1725, and settled at Harmony Grove, in Chester County, Pa., which has continued to be the residence of descendants of the family until this day. To use the Scriptural phrase, Isaac begat William, William begat James and James begat Thomas, the father of John G., who thus appears to be the sixth generation from Anthony Jackson, of Lancashire, England. A sesqui-centennial of the tribe of Jackson was held at Harmony Grove, Eighth Month 25, 1875, and John G. Jackson had the honor of presiding. From his address the following is an abstract: "Our worthy progenitor, Isaac Jackson the elder, whose notable advent with his family into this beautiful part of Pennsylvania, one hundred and fifty years ago, we this day join in celebrating, was a member of the Society of Friends, called Quakers, and such his descendants have largely been. It would appear that not alone as Quakers were the ancestors of the Jacksons noted as representative men, of strong religious convictions, with firm individuality and independence of character—hard to drive against their consciences—persistent in effort. The martyr blood of Ralph Jackson, burned at the stake during the reign of Queen Mary, 6th March 27, 1556, and the boldness with which his friend, John Jackson, another dissenter, about the same era, withstood priestlydictation in matters of religious faith, fully indicate the spirit of our remote ancestors. Even the armorial bearings of the ancient feudal Jacksons, when warlike qualities were at a premium, 'the greyhound and the dolphin,' 'swiftness by land and sea,' was no mean device as indicating their standing before kings and princes."

Jane Jackson, the wife of Thomas Jackson and mother of James C. Jackson and John G. Jackson, was the daughter of John Griffith, of Quakertown, Bucks County, Pa., and was of almost pure Welsh ancestry, descending direct from Llewellyn Griffith, said to have been one of the last native princes of Wales, and occupying a castle on the coast of County Cardigan. They, too, are of the Quaker strain, and members of the Griffiths as well as of the Jacksons have been prominent as preachers and leaders in the Society of Friends. While John G. Jackson is not now a member of the Society of Friends, he is an ardent admirer of the simplicity of their lives and practical integrity of character. He is proud of their record as defenders of individuality of thought and true liberty of conscience. For himself he is now only ambitious to be known as a member of the great human brotherhood, and a seeker after truth in all its highest and purest manifestations. He says that the pursuit of science has revealed to modern minds an infinite cosmos; that the more it is studied the more plainly does it indicate one grand unity of universal nature in the perfect co-existence and co-adaptation of the material, the mental, the spiritual, seemingly pervaded by one Supreme Divine intelligence that, "without variableness or shadow of turning," controls the whole by, and through, the maintenance of laws above, and that of these controlling laws, the law of growth and development is one of the most persistent and important. Being thus impressed, it follows that the subject of this sketch should join the thousands of philosophic minds who lament the conservatism that clings to the religious theories and dogmas of people less developed by growth, and possessing less knowledge than those of today. Instead of seeking salvation in the schemes and inventions of men of a more barbarous age than this, he advocates the seeking of it by acquiring a knowledge of and a yielding due obedience to the Divine and inexorable laws of our own being. Instead of reading the ancient histories of the peoples of the past and regarding them as the "Word of God,"—histories that scholarship is continually proving to be less and less authentic, more and more mythical and legendary,—he pleads for the reading of the "Word of God" in the great book of nature, the grand cosmos of co-adapted material, mental and spiritual being, and in that grand, ever-open book the finding of confirmation of all truths of the past worth preserving and the condemnation of all errors that should be outgrown.

The early tuition of Mr. Jackson in the "three Rs" was received from his parents at home and in the neighboring schools at Hockessin. This was supplemented by a library of the neighborhood, whose books he read, and he acquired his first taste for the study of astronomy from the works of Robert Ferguson found therein. His mother stated that when a small boy he boasted that he would become an almanac-maker when he became a man. About 1832 he was sent to Westtown Boarding-School, in
NEW CASTLE COUNTY.

Chester County, Pa., an institution established in 1799 by the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of Friends, and which is now being rebuilt, enlarged and improved. There he was under the instruction of Enoch Lewis, a noted mathematician and philosopher, and after remaining a few terms as a scholar he became an assistant teacher. Finally, about 1838, he was appointed teacher and lecturer on astronomy and other branches of natural philosophy. In 1837, with the aid of the best tables of the planet Venus then accessible, he made the needed calculations for the projection of the transit of that planet across the sun's disk to occur in 1882, forty-five years thereafter. This last phenomena had last been observed in the United States by David Rittenhouse in 1769,—the one that occurred in 1874 was invisible here, and was then and is now, though in somewhat less degree, regarded as very important, as one of the few means of determining the parallax, and thence the vast distance of the sun, so needful to be known as the grand unit of measure of the solar system, and of the immensities of the stellar spaces.

Leaving Westtown on account of failing health, Mr. Jackson was compelled to enter upon an active out-door life, and about 1839 procured the needed outfit and commenced the business of a surveyor and conveyancer, after reading Blackstone and serving a brief apprenticeship with Thomas Williamson, a prominent conveyancer of Philadelphia. In the autumn of 1840, in company with another young man, he drove from Philadelphia to Pittsburgh, requiring nine days' travel, a distance now requiring scarcely more than nine hours by express train. Then they took a boat at Pittsburgh and passed down the Ohio River to Cincinnati and spent the following winter at the United States Land Office in that city, in transcribing the field notes, and constructing maps of government surveys in Northern Ohio, then only being first surveyed into townships and sections for location. In the spring of 1841, after having witnessed the departure of General Harrison by steamer from the levee at Cincinnati, he joined with an enterprising school-teacher of Hamilton County in a tour through some of the counties of Southern Ohio, lecturing on philosophical subjects, and hauling through the deep spring mud a respectable set of apparatus for illustrative experiments, such as electrical machines, air-pumps, etc. They did not make a fortune on their lecturing tour, and in the June following Mr. Jackson purchased a house in Cincinnati, and rode in the saddle diagonally across the southeastern Counties of Ohio, fording the river at Wheeling, and thence over the mountains of Virginia and Pennsylvania to his home at Hockessin.

On the Ninth Month 15, 1842, John G. Jackson was married at the Friends' Meeting-house at Parkersville, Chester County, Penna., to Elizabeth Baily, daughter of Jacob and Elizabeth Parker Baily, sister of Judge John P. Baily, late of West Chester, and formerly civil engineer in the United States service, and engaged on the construction of what is now the great Pennsylvania Railroad system, and other branch lines; sister also of the late Hon. Joseph Baily, of Perry County, formerly State treasurer, a member of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, and a member of Congress during the administration of the honored and lamented Abraham Lincoln; sister also of Abraham, Ephraim, Jacob, Jr., Mary, Susan, Eleanor and Sarah Baily, all persons of strong character. Abraham was a contractor on the construction of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad, and Sarah was for many years a useful teacher in the Westtown school.

The young couple located at the old homestead at Hockessin, where he became a surveyor, writer and farmer, and assisted in the opening and development of the limestone quarries and kilns, which soon became famous, and which furnished the Jackson lime, largely used for building and manufacturing purposes in Wilmington and other parts of New Castle County, as well as the contiguous counties of Pennsylvania and Maryland. In 1848, the old homestead having become antiquated, he built a substantial stone house on the hill above the mists of the valley, and for twenty-seven years it was the home of himself and family.

In 1856 the ominous murmurs of political troubles that culminated in the War of the Rebellion and the overthrow of American slavery grew louder and more influential. Mr. Jackson was one of the three hundred and seven voters of Delaware who cast their ballots for Colonel John C. Fremont and William L. Dayton for President and Vice-President of the United States in that year. It was an era that marked the spontaneous disintegration of the old Whig party, and the equally spontaneous growth of the Republican party. At the outbreak of the Rebellion he was exempted from military duty by age, and having been educated in the schools of a sect whose standard testimony was against all wars, he took no part in the contest beyond the furnishing of material needed in the extended operations of the government. At that time he was operating a large steam saw-mill in connection with his lime quarry and kilns, and he supplied large quantities of lumber for the building of cars, ships, etc.

About 1857, through the influence of Jesse Chandler, a family connection and a prominent Democrat, and a friend of Governor Peter F. Causey, Mr. Jackson was commissioned a notary public. After exercising the functions of this office for a term of seven years, in connection with his business as a surveyor and conveyancer, he was reappointed by Governor Cannon, March 12, 1864, the late Samuel M. Harrington, Jr., being then Secretary of State. Shortly afterward he was unexpectedly nominated and elected as a Republican to the State Legislature, and consequently resigned his office as notary. After attending the regular session of 1865, and the extra session of 1866, he was elected State Senator for four years, and served in that capacity in 1867 and 1869. Although in the minority in both Houses, he was a working member and exercised considerable influence in matters of legislation, especially in the line of various railroad corporations, then incipient, but which have since become important factors in the internal progress of the State. Among these was the Wilmington and Western Railroad Company, and after the expiration of his Senatorial term he actively assisted in its organization, and was a member of its first board of directors, of which the late Joshua T. Heald was president. He was active in this capacity until elected chief engineer of the road, and he held that position until it was completed in 1871. The general financial depression that followed affected railroad interests especially, and proved fatal to the financial success of the new road. It accordingly passed into new hands, and was reorganized as the Delaware Western, and as such was operated until its purchase by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, since which time it has been operated as the Landenberg Branch of the Baltimore and Philadelphia Railroad. From 1871 to 1880, Mr. Jackson, though financially embarrassed, continued his lime quarries and kilns, and finally disposed of the quarries and land adjacent. In the autumn of 1878 there was an effort made to organize a Greenback party in Delaware, and after solicitations by a committee appointed for the purpose, and an interchange of views, Mr. Jackson consented to allow his name to be placed on the Greenback ticket as a candidate for Congress. There being no Republican ticket in the field that year, he received about one-fourth of the vote of the State. This he esteemed a special honor, since he believes it largely owing to the confidence his Republican friends felt in his integrity of intention. Had there been an active canvass made at that time, his chances of election, with other parts of his ticket, would doubtless have been good. He has no regrets that, without expecting an election, he allowed his name to go upon that ticket and to go down to posterity with the many good men, dead and living, whose views corresponded with his own—that a limited metallic basis for currency is not conducive to the completest industrial health of the world, and that well-regulated representative money, founded upon the whole wealth of a State, in quantities kept duly proportioned to population, is the true medium of exchange for civilized, established and enlightened people.

Though Mr. Jackson is now in his seventieth year, and has retired somewhat from life’s activities, he is still at times actively engaged in the field as a surveyor and engineer, in his office as justice of the peace and notary public, or in his observatory as an amateur astronomer, watching the sun, moon, planets, comets and stars unnumbered, in the depths of infinitude. In 1892 he accurately observed the transit of Venus, co-operating with other amateurs, and being encouraged and assisted by Professor Harkness, of the Washington Naval Observatory, who was president of the Transit Commission. He has also figured to some extent in the field of literature. In addition to several poems that have attracted attention, he has been a pungent prose writer, and a voluminous contributor to the local newspapers on the current topics of the day.

Recently he has built for his wife and himself, on a small piece of the old, Jackson land, a home which they call Sunset Cottage, appropriately named not only on account of its pleasant southwestern exposure to the setting sun, but also because it will probably be the place that shall witness the sunset of their lives on earth, and in which they are awaiting until “The shadows have a little longer grown.” He and his wife have been married forty-five years, and have seen their only two sons well established in life. William B., the elder, owns the homestead erected in 1848, with the larger part of the farm then belonging to it, situated on one of the main frontages of the Hockessin Valley. Thomas, the younger, after giving efficient assistance to his father in the engineering of the Wilmington and Western Railroad, obtained a position in the engineering corps of the Pennsylvania Company in charge of the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne and Chicago Railroad. He has continued in that employ ever since. Having married Anne R., daughter of Spencer Chandler, of Hockessin, in 1875, he and his wife lived for a time at New Brighton, Pennsylvania. Now they own a fine residence at Fort Wayne, Indiana, and Thomas is engineer of maintenance of way on the western division of the road from Clevelend to Chicago, and apparently enjoys the full confidence and respect of his employers. Mr. and Mrs. Jackson are justly proud of their four grandchildren, worthy scions of the Jackson and Chandler name, that gather around their fireside. One of them is named after the martyr, Ralph Jackson, and though the days of martyrdom are past, they predict that he will prove a worthy descendant of the Jackson blood.

Hotel.—At the present time there are only two hotels in Mill Creek Hundred, one at Stanton and the other at Hockessin. As early as 1797 Peter Springer obtained a license for a hotel at Stanton. The hotel was kept in the stone house now owned by Solomon Hersey. The hotel was next kept by Joseph Springer, William Simpson, David Johnson, Thomas Beatty, Thomas Pierce, Levi Workman and William Anthony, and has been abandoned for many years. The present hotel was built in 1808 by James Stroud, and opened as a hotel about 1830 by Abraham Boys. He was succeeded by Springer McDaniel, John Moore and Jacob Hyatt, the present proprietor. The hotel at Hockessin was opened about ten years ago by Daniel Creeden. After his death the license was revoked for several years, but was again granted to his widow, who conducts the hotel at present.

There was also a hotel at Mount Pleasant, which was opened for over a hundred years. Robert Mont-
NEW CASTLE COUNTY.

Elizabeth Taylor, of his native hundred; Hannah, who became the wife of Samuel Cranston, son of Simon and Hannah Cranston, of Stanton, Delaware; John, the subject, who married, in succession, Sarah and Margaret, daughters of David and Elizabeth Eastburn, of New Castle County, Delaware; Harlan, Joseph and Harlan (2d) all of whom died in childhood; Abner, who married Jane, daughter of Daniel and Jane Thompson, of New Castle County, Delaware; Joseph, who married Hannah, daughter of William and Elizabeth Cloud, of Chester County, Pa.; Sarah, who became the wife of Stephen, son of David and Sarah Wilson, of Hockessin, Delaware.

Sarah Mitchell, the mother of these eleven children, died Fifth Month 14, 1834, at the age of forty-two years. On the 17th of Third Month, 1836, Joseph Mitchell was married to his second wife, Martha, daughter of Ephraim and Susan Jackson, of Hockessin, Delaware. He was the owner of three hundred and seventy-five acres of land and lived to see all five of his sons who reached the age of manhood engaged in agricultural pursuits on adjoining farms. He was a consistent Friend, held high offices in the meeting and died Fourth Month 22, 1876, in the ninety-third year of his age.

John Mitchell married, Third Month 17, 1847, Sarah, daughter of David and Elizabeth Eastburn, formerly of Montgomery County, Pa., but now of Mill Creek Hundred. Of this union came seven children as follows: Elizabeth, who died in the fourteenth year of her age; Thomas C.; Stephen H., who married Mary T., daughter of Samuel P. and Mary Dixon, of Ashland, Delaware; William J.; Anna M., wife of Irwin D., son of Matthew and Susanna Wood, of Delaware County, Pa.; Henry E., who died in the twenty-sixth year of his age; and Mary R., who died at the age of three months. In 1861 the wife and mother was removed by death and the little flock of children was left to the father's care. In 1864 he married Margaret Eastburn, a sister of his former wife, by whom he had two children,—Sarah E., who died in the fifteenth year of her age; and John C., who is still living. He has also three grandchildren—his daughter, Anna M. Wood, has two, named Wilmer and Sarah, and his son, Stephen H. Mitchell, has a daughter named Alice. All his sons are farmers, making four successive generations engaged in agricultural pursuits. No member of the family ever uses tobacco or intoxicating drinks.

The subject has had an active business career for a man who has devoted almost his whole energies to agriculture. In 1847 he purchased the Mendenhall farm, near Brandywine Springs, where he remodeled the house, built a new barn and made other extensive improvements. Next he bought a farm near the Mecannon Church, on which he also built a new barn and an addition to the house. Having sold it he bought the Dr. McCabe farm, where, as usual, he made many improvements, enlarging his barn, etc. This in turn he sold, and bought the fine farm (with a large deposit of kaolin, which is now worked) on which he now lives, near Hockessin. Afterwards he bought the Jackson place at Hockessin, where he overhauled the house, built an addition to the mill, put in a steam-engine and started a creamery.
Since then he has purchased the Dixon farm, on which he has repaired the tenant-house and made other improvements. For twenty years past he has been a director in the Newport National Bank and has also been a member of the School Board, besides making the general assessment of Mill Creek Hundred.

FRIENDSHIP LODGE, No. 22, I. O. O. F., was instituted in 1850, with but three charter members.
Since that time the membership has rapidly and steadily increased, until at present there are one hundred and five members.

On June 9, 1887, their new building at Hockessin was dedicated with proper ceremonies by Grand Master S. T. Smith. The new building is of brick fifty by fifty-two feet, and is three stories high. The first story will be used as a store-room, the second as a public hall, and the third for lodge purposes.
The building committee was Thomas J. Jones, J. M.
Shakespeare, H. B. Klaar, T. A. Potts, G. P. Lacey, H. E. Durnall and A. L. West. The following are the present officers: Edward Duncan, N. G.; A.
Lincoln West, V. G.; Henry B. Klaar, Treasurer;
Jacob Hannas, P. S.; K. S. Chandler, R. S.

BRANCH NO. 469, OF THE ORDER OF THE IRON

There is every indication that the society will be a very prosperous one. At present there are twelve-six members. The following are the present officers:
Dr. G. W. Boughman, P. C. J.; Thomas J. Jones, C. J.;
Dr. L. H. Ball, V. C. J.; J. H. Kirk, Accountant;

THE STANTON SOCIAL CLUB was organized November 25, 1881. Its objects are the acquisition of knowledge and social enjoyment. A well-selected library is kept in the club-room for the use of the members. During the winter regular literary exercises are conducted by the members. The membership at its origin numbered twelve, and at the present time twenty-eight. The present officers are: President, C.
P. Dickey; Secretary, Lewis Dickey; Treasurer,
John W. Bennett.

FAIRVIEW LODGE, No. 8, I. O. G. T., was instituted at Pleasant Hill, in the fall of 1885, with a membership of twenty-eight. Rapid strides have been made by this organization, and it now boasts of one hundred and sixteen members. The lodge meets on Saturday evening in winter and Wednesday evening in summer, in Fairview School-house.

WHITE CLAY CREEK Hundred.

WHITE CLAY CREEK Hundred is bounded by White Clay and Christiana Creeks, Pencader Hundred and the Circle. It derived its name from White Clay Creek, which was so called on account of the deposits of white clay on the banks of this stream. The territory included within these limits is of an irregular shape and comprises eighteen thousand four hundred acres of land; the most of which is in a state of cultivation. The surface is uneven being broken by numerous hills. The land is well-watered by many small streams, which rise and flow within its bounds.
The soil is of a clay-nature, and produces the usual cereals, fruits and vegetables in abundance. The climate is wholesome and invigorating. The Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore, the Baltimore and Ohio, and the Newark and Delaware City Railroads pass through this hundred, and afford excellent facilities for travel and commerce.

EARLY SETTLERS.—The first settlements in White Clay Creek Hundred were made more than two hundred years ago by the representatives of several nations driven here by the persecutions at home, or impelled by the love of adventure. These settlements were made with the intention of securing permanent abodes, and were not merely of a transient nature.
The pioneers were well-adapted to undertake a life devoid of all comfort save that afforded by the home.

About 1672, Governor Nichols granted a patent for a tract of eight hundred acres, known by the name of "Muscle Cripple," to Thomas Wollaston, John Ogle, John Hendrick and Harmon Jansen or Johnson.
This tract was on White Clay Creek, near the head of Bread and Cheese Island, and extended about half a mile up the stream. John Ogle assigned all his rights to this tract to John Edmonson, and the sale was confirmed by patent, January 15, 1675. On April 30, 1677, Edmonson assigned his rights to John Yeo, an Episcopal Minister, from Maryland, and he conveyed his estate to John Smith, in 1678, for sixteen thousand pounds of tobacco in Casques. Smith was the owner in 1702, and at that time the tract included one thousand and sixty acres, and reached from White Clay Creek to Christiana Creek, and the road to Christiana Village ran through this property. It is probable that at this time he was the sole owner.
The property is now owned by Henry L. Churchman and the heirs of Thomas Clyde.

On April 13, 1676, a patent for two hundred and twenty acres of land, along White Clay Creek, was granted to Peter Thomason, a native of England.

John Nomers, or Nommerson, a Swede, settled on a tract of land which he bought of the Indians, and also asked for a grant of the land. On the 3d of October, 1677, he presented a petition in court "showing that he had bought of ye Indians a piece of land in ye Wittekleys Valley, containing three hundred and forty acres, and ye same land was since surveyed by Mr. Wharton, after which he had got a Patent for ye same."—(March 25, 1676.) He also showed that he was hindered from seating the land by John Edmonds, and desired the Court to give him peaceable possession, which was granted. He also was one of the owners of the Mill Plot. His land lay on both sides of White Clay Creek. On September 5, 1682, he sold one-half of the land on the north side, to Joseph Barnes, and the other half to Thomas Wollaston, and reserved for himself the land on the south side, where he resided. He received a warrant for one hundred acres of land on the south side of the White Clay Creek, September 5, 1682, which was surveyed to him, September 13, the same year.

On August 16, 1682, "Northampton," a tract of two hundred acres, was surveyed. This tract was bounded on the south by the main run of the Christians Creek. Also a tract of seventy-four acres, on the north side of the Christians, called "Eagles Point," which was surveyed December 9, 1688. Both of these tracts were owned by John Ogle. John Ogle settled in this country about 1667, and lived for a time at New Castle. He purchased large tracts of land in different parts of the county, and for several years resided on "Swart Neuten Island," later known as "Lewen Island," which is in Christians Creek and New Castle Hundred. He also purchased other land on White Clay Creek, lying in Mill Creek Hundred, containing four hundred and thirty acres, which were surveyed October 14, 1683. The property of John Ogle was inherited by his sons, Thomas and John. On July 28, 1739, Thomas procured seven hundred and ninety acres, lying on the northwest side of Christians Creek. On October 18, 1739, he took out a warrant for a tract of land containing seven hundred and forty acres, west of the land above mentioned, and extending nearly as far west as Newark. He settled at the place now known as Ogletown, which place bore that name before 1667, as in that year a road was laid out from Ogletown to Elk River. Thomas Ogle made his will January 26, 1768, and died in 1773, and is buried in a private burying-ground, near Ogletown. Several children survived him, of whom a daughter, Mary, married Dr. William McMechen. Dr. McMechen resided at Christians Bridge, on the Dr. Reese Jones lot, which was inherited by his wife from her father's estate. The grist-mill, saw-mill and appurtenances, and all land lying on the fork of the road leading from Ogletown to Elk River and Newark, was devised to his sons, Robert, Joseph, James Howard and Benjamin, and was divided among them by an Act of partition. James Ogle resided on the homestead, at Ogletown, and Joseph and Benjamin near by, on parts of the farm land apportioned to them.

Thomas Ogle, of Wilmington, and Benjamin N. Ogle, of Delaware City, are sons of Howard, and grandsons of Benjamin Ogle. Catharine Ogle, another daughter of Thomas Ogle, of Ogletown, became the wife of Peter Lamoyne, and inherited two hundred acres from her father. This was sold in 1784, by her and her husband, as follows: Sixty-four acres, July 8, to William McClay, who, August 12, of the same year, sold the same to James and John Black; twenty acres, July 28, to Solomon Maxwell; July 28, ten acres to John Hall, tobacco-tenant; ten acres, July 28, to John Hannah; five acres, August 7, to James Couper; eleven acres, August 19, to Robert Porter, merchant; ten acres, August 19, to George Wirt, inn-keeper; August 7, lot to James Caldwell, butcher; and August 12, lot to John Palmer, cooper. This land was probably in and near Christiansa Village.

The entire estate has passed out of the hands of the Ogles. The other son of John Ogle, also named John, on March 16, 1696, purchased a tract of seventy-five acres, at Christians Bridge. On the same day he sold three hundred acres, at White Clay Creek, to John Crawford, who, on the same date bought a plantation on St. George's Creek, of Edward Gibbs, High Sheriff. On August 15, 1699, Ogle purchased of Joseph Clayton, four hundred and forty-four acres of land, at White Clay Creek. On January 10, 1684, a warrant was granted to Broer Sinnex or Sinnenex, for three hundred acres of land called "Water Land" lying on both sides of White Clay Creek, above Dividing Run Creek. He also owned a tract called "Middleburgh," on north-side of Christians Creek, obtained on same date as above. It extended to Mill Creek, and contained sixty acres of swamp, and four hundred and forty-five acres of forest land. This land is probably part of the territory on which Christiana is located.

On December 24, 1684, a warrant was granted to William Rakestraw for a tract of land in White Clay Creek Hundred, bounded on the south by Christians Creek and on the west by land of Thomas Langshaw, containing five hundred acres. This land was surveyed March 24, 1686, and sold to Rakestraw to Colonel John French, September 11, 1716. This land is situated near Platt and Elkinton's Mills. On August 11, 1699, the Pennsylvania Land Company purchased a tract of land containing thirteen hundred and sixty acres, and situated in this hundred. Of this tract the following amounts were purchased in 1762: by David Evans four hundred and seventy-five acres, March 27; by James McSparran ninety acres, February 26; and one hundred and thirty-six acres by Samuel Armitage, May 9.

On August 19, 1707, two hundred and fifty acres of land, the property of Joseph Moore, was sold by Colonel John French, sheriff, and purchased by John Steel, who came from Ireland and settled at Philadelphia, and John Steel purchased other lands in White Clay Creek Hundred which, at his death, passed into the hands of his son James. Most of this land was inherited respectively by Alexander, Allen, Thomas, and is now owned by James T. Steel. Reese Jones, sometimes mentioned as a tanner and at other times as a doctor, was the owner of considerable property in this hundred. In 1737 he owned a tract of land, near Christiana Village, in the forks of a road that separated at the end of the village. One part extended from the town toward Conestoga, and the other towards Battel's Mills (now Platt & Elkinton) and the Welsh tract. On November 19, 1739, he purchased a tract containing two hundred and forty-eight acres of patent land, and forty acres of warrant land, which had been successively owned by Daniel James, Allen Dunlap, Melchior Rogers, Reynold Howell, and Catharine Leoline. He also purchased a tract of one hundred acres, which was warranted to Alexander Frame, July 26, 1715, and surveyed December 24, 1739. Dr. Jones also owned other land in this and Pennecader Hundred. Rev. George Gillespie, pastor of head of Christiana Church, purchased from John Ogle, March 17, 1715, a tract of land containing forty-one acres, which was part of a larger tract patented to Ogle, October 26, 1702. He also purchased, on the 15th of May 1728, one hundred acres, which was part of five hundred acres surveyed to John Ogle, and by him sold to Morgan Patten, January 23, 1702. On the 2d of August 1710 Patten sold to Geo. Polley, who, on August 7, 1718, conveyed to Nicholas Mears, from whom Gillespie purchased. These and other tracts, afterwards purchased, were inherited by his children —Samuel, George, Elizabeth and Agnes. The forty-one acre tract, above mentioned, was part of the land owned by Jonas Asken, who also sold one hundred and forty acres, called "Westminster," to John White, clerk of the Court at New Castle. By reason of a warrant granted to Samuel Allen, November 8, 1739, there was surveyed to him a tract of one hundred and ninety-four acres, lying on both sides of a road leading from Welsh Tract to Christiana, "including an improvement which by the best information I could get has been settled eighteen or twenty years." On October 18, 1739, a patent was granted by the proprietaries to Benjamin Gibbs for a tract of six hundred and sixty-eight acres, on the northeast side of Christiana Creek, five hundred of which were sold by Gibbs, in 1742, to Samuel Meter. On August 25, 1767, four hundred and fifty-four acres of land in White Clay Creek Hundred was surveyed by John Stapler, deputy surveyor of New Castle County. This was divided among the following persons: James Simpson, two hundred and twenty-two acres; Neil Morrison, fifty acres; Allen Gillespie, forty-six acres; Samuel Wilson, sixteen acres; Paul Jaqueta, one hundred and seven acres. These tracts passed through various hands until they became vested in the present owners, some by descent which are few and others by purchase.

The following is a copy of the assessment list of White Clay Creek Hundred for the year 1804:

NEW CASTLE COUNTY.

Schools.—Previous to the organization of the public school system, various private schools were held throughout the hundred. The names of James P. Smith, Thos. Barry, Reese Stroud, William Stapler, Stephen Willis and William Medill afterward Governor of Ohio, are remembered as teachers in this hundred during the early part of this century. The Newark Academy was also patronized by those living in the vicinity of Newark. The school divisions are not confined to White Clay Creek Hundred, but in several cases overlap and include part of the adjacent hundreds. By the first division of the hundreds into school districts there were five—Nos. 40, 41, 42, 43 and 44—lying wholly within the hundred and two—Nos. 38 and 39—which included portions of territory of White Clay Creek and Mill Creek Hundreds. The idea of taxing all the inhabitants for school purposes was liked by some and by others disliked. Some of the schools were well attended and at others the pupils were few. The first public school at McClellandville was taught by Miss Martha Chambers, and on the first day there were but three scholars, Andrew McBride, Mary J. Smith and John M. Singles. The building was poorly constructed, and furnished without any attempt at comfort or convenience. There are now several school buildings neatly constructed and well furnished for school purposes.

Roads.—Soon after the first settlers came into this hundred roads became a necessity and were constructed. The date of the construction of the earliest roads is no way of ascertaining. The records show that in 1723 a road was laid out "from the head of Elk to New Castle and Christine Bridge," and that previous to this the New Munster Road had been located, and that it ran near the present site of Newark. In May, 1765, the report of the commissioners appointed to view a road from Newark towards Lancaster was confirmed. The return contains the following clause: "We went upon the sd road and viewed it, and Layd out the same by Courses and Distances in a general way, as the old road now is only staking several courses of the same." That the road from Ogleton to the head of Elk River was constructed previous to 1774 is obvious from the fact that in that year a petition was made to have some parts of it altered, which petition was granted.

On March 5, 1812, the Levy Court ordered a stone arch bridge to be built at Christiana at a cost of $1200. The contract was awarded September 1, of the same year to Thos. Justis, of Mill Creek Hundred. On February 1, 1813, a Turnpike Company, which proposed opening a road from the New Castle Turnpike to the Maryland line, through the villages of Christiana and New Castle, was incorporated. In March 1832, the report of the commissioners appointed to view a road from Ogleton to A. K. Russell's meeting-house, via. England's mill, was approved. In February 1834, the bridge over White Clay Creek at Price's mill, which was commenced in 1833, was completed at a cost of $1642.86. At various other times and from other locations roads have been constructed and altered and bridges built, until at the present time the roads are numerous and in first-class condition, and the streams spanned with neat and durable bridges.

REligIOUS MATTERS.—Head of Christiana Church.

The organization of this church was effected in 1708, by the Alexanders and other Scotch-Irish settlers, who previous to this time worshipped at New Castle. From this year until 1713, services were conducted semi-monthly by Rev. John Wilson, pastor of the church at New Castle. The first meeting-house was a log-building and stood in the graveyard north of the present church. Rev. George Gillespie, a native of Glasgow, Scotland, and graduate of the University of that city, came to this country in 1712, and in the following year became the regular pastor of this church.

In 1732, James Steel made a lease to Samuel Johnson, John Cross, Alexander White, William Semple, David Alexander, Andrew Wallace and their successors, for a tract of land containing two acres "already laid out for and towards the Erecting and Building thereon a new House for the exercise of Divine Worship by those protestant Dissenters commonly called presbyterians." On this tract of land the church, in 1750, was erected. It is said that no fire was allowed in the old church on account of the danger thereby incurred. Rev. Gillespie faithfully labored here until his death, which occurred in 1760.

In 1735, he wrote "A Treatise against the Deists or Free Thinkers, Proving the Necessity of Revealed Religion," which was printed by A. Bradford, of Philadelphia. November 15, 1749, the elders and trustees released to George Gillespie, a tract of land, a part of two hundred acres patented to John Ogles, January 23, 1709, and by him sold, August 2, 1710, to George Pelleg, who conveyed it to Nicholas Mears, August 17, 1718, and by him sold to George Gillespie, May 15, 1728, who, July 26, 1738, gave it to the elders and trustees of this church. The land was released to Gillespie upon condition "that he would release it back again for the pious use to help build a brick meeting-house near or close by Mr. Gillespie's old meeting-house, the members being poor again." Andrew Wallace, John Rankin, Nathaniel Brier, William Wallace, Thomas Weer, Joseph Wallace, Moses Scot and John Steel were at this time the elders and trustees of the "protestant Presbyterian session of the Protestant Presbyterian Congregation of Head of Christiana Church." In 1750 a new brick building was erected for holding services, which was destroyed by fire on Sunday March 14, 1858, despite the efforts of the assembled congregation to save it. Action was immediately taken towards the erection of a new building and such progress was made with the work that the church was nearly completed the same year. On September 1, 1757, the congregation of this church elected Joseph Wallace, Thomas Rankin, William Price, James Kerr, Samuel Evans, William Thompson and George Gillespie, trustees. On the 19th day of March, 1859, the congregation assembled to see the new edifice dedicated to the service of God. Since that time the church has moved along without any drawbacks or hindrances. Since its organization its pulpit has been filled by only six regular pastors, viz.: Rev. George Gillespie, John McCrery, Andrew K. Russell, Elijah Wilson, Joseph Barr and James L. Vallandingham, who has been stationed here since 1853. The cemetery to the north of the church dates as far back as the erection of the first church. The date of death on the oldest grave-stone is 1758. Revs. George Gillespie, John McCrery, A. K. Russell, John Waugh, Pierce Chamberlain and Hugh Hamill, are buried here.

The following inscription is on the tomb of the Rev. George Gillespie in the cemetery of Head of Christiana Church, he being the first ordained pastor of said church:

"SACRED TO THE MEMORY OF The Rev. Mr. George Gillespie, who was a sound Divine,
An useful, practical Preacher, Eminent for Piety,
Zeal for the Honour of Christ's House and every social virtue;
A tender Husband and indulgent Parent,
A good master, a warm friend;
Courteous, Hospitable, never discontented.
With an income narrow & very uncertain,
He spent much time in Prayer & Meditation
And longed to leave this world & be with Christ.
He was born and educated in Glasgow,
There licensed to preach the Gospel in 1712,
Ordained Pastor of this church in 1718, Called to his War-dress to his crown
January 24, 1760, Anno Domini 77."

Christiana Presbyterian Church.—This church was organized at some period between the years 1730 and 1738. In the latter year a site for the erection of a church was secured, and the building was completed, in 1745. Rev. Charles Tennent commenced his pastorate here at the organization of the church, and remained until 1756. This church was under one pastoral charge with that of New Castle from 1757 until 1828. Revs. Daniel Thom, Morgan, Kirkpatrick, Joseph Montgomery and others filled the pulpit until 1777. From this time to 1791 there was no minister in charge. Rev. Samuel Barr officiated from that year until 1796. From 1800 to 1828 the church was served by Revs. John E. Latta and Joshua N. Danforth. The union of Christians and New Castle churches, which had existed for seventy years, was now dissolved. Since that time the pulpit has been filled by Revs. Morris Williamson, Carpenter, Crosby, Samuel Bell, Nicholas Patterson, W. R. Work, J. Barr, George Foote, J. Elliott, V. D. Collins, W. A. Crawford, J. H. Beal, David Kennedy, William D. Mackey, Robert Graham and A. J. Snyder. The present church is a neat brick building, 60x40, and was erected under the pastorate of Rev. George Foote. The corner-stone was laid September 8, 1857, and the house was dedicated June 8, 1858, by Rev. J. Jenkins, at that time pastor of Calvary Church, Philadelphia. During the past three years the church has not been in a prosperous condition, and has had no regular pastor.

Christiana M. E. Church.—In 1830 the Methodists in and around Christiana village purchased a frame house formerly used as a store, and moved it to the location on which the present church stands. This was furnished and used for divine worship until 1857. When the church was organized there were about forty members. To this number were added new members, and in 1855 the membership was doubled. In 1857 a new brick church was built at a cost of $4000. During the past few years many Methodists have removed, and at present there are thirty-five members. The following ministers have been stationed here:

- Rev. James B. Ayres
- Rev. John Bayne
- Rev. Christopher Crouch
- Rev. Stephen Townsend
- Rev. Michael E. Day
- Rev. Benj. T. String
- Rev. Valentine Gray
- Rev. Josiah Kidney
- Rev. George W. Burke
- Rev. D. F. Waddell
- Rev. George Crozier
- Rev. Joseph Aspall
- Rev. William M. Green
- Rev. Henry Sanderson
- Rev. Joseph Dare
- Rev. Edward Davis

Previous to 1855 the inhabitants of the north-western part of White Clay Creek Hundred attended divine services at the Flint Hill Church, situated near Strickersville. In that year the church burned, and the several members could not agree upon a site for the erection of a new building. William Smith, William Kennedy and William McClelland favored the erection of a church at McClellandville. In 1854 the Wesley M. E. Church was commenced and completed at that place. The edifice is a frame building, one story high, and cost $1500. The membership at that time numbered twelve. The church was connected with the Newark circuit until 1868, when the Newark Church became a separate charge. In 1875 it was again placed in charge of the minister stationed at Newark. The church has been steadily increasing, and now numbers forty members. The same ministers, mentioned in connection with the Newark M. E. Church from 1855 to the present time, have preached to this congregation, with the exception of the years mentioned above, during which time Revs. John France, G. W. Burke and Joseph Dare officiated. Services are held every Sunday afternoon. The Trustees are J. F. Williamson, William H. Smith, Robert Montgomery, James P. Smith and William Kennedy.

The Salem Methodist Episcopal Church is situated in White Clay Creek Hundred about two miles south of Ogletown. Previous to 1807 meetings were held by this denomination in the residence of William Wright and — Hersey.

The first meeting of the Trustees of this Church was held October 10, 1807. On the fifteenth of the same month and year Robert McFarlin, Schoolmaster, deeded to Abram Heagy, Richard Sneath, William McIntire, William Wright, James Bradford, Isaac Tyson and Neal McNeal, Trustees for the Salem Meeting House, two lots adjoining each other on which they were to build a meeting house for the Methodist Episcopal congregation. On the following day the trustees were incorporated. The present brick Church thirty by thirty-six feet was soon after erected. The boards for the floor and ceiling were furnished by Abraham Heagy. The building was repaired in 1848 and again in 1884. The Church was connected with the Cecil County Circuit until 1864, and in 1867 formed part of the Christiana Circuit and was supplied with ministers from these circuits. The Church is now in a prosperous condition and has fifty communicants. A flourishing Sunday-School of seventy pupils under the superintendence of John W. Dayett is connected with the church.

The following are the present officers of Salem Methodist Episcopal Church:

Christiana Bridge Meeting House (Friends). In 1772 a committee appointed to meet with the Friends at Christiana Bridge reported in favor of a meeting being established among them. In pursuance of this report it was decided to allow meetings for worship to be held there on the first and fourth days of every week at the house of Hannah Lawden.

Manufactories.—The Dean Woolen Factory.—On September 11, 1702, John Guest obtained a patent for a tract of land situate in White Clay Creek Hundred containing two hundred and twenty-three acres which included the site of the Dean Factory. On August 14, 1704, Guest conveyed this land to Samuel Lowan who May 19, 1715, sold it to Samuel Johnson. Johnson by his last will and testament bearing date April 2, 1737 devised it to his two sons, Naphthy and Daniel. On October 7, 1738, a division was made of the land, Naphthy taking sixty-three acres and twenty-six perches, the mills and other improvements, and Daniel the remainder of the estate. The exact date of the erection of the mills cannot be ascertained, but it was some period between 1715 and 1738. On August 18, 1740 Naphthy conveyed the mills and his portion of the estate to Rachael Jones, a widow who afterwards was married to David Davis. The mills were in her possession until December 8, 1848, when she and her husband sold them to Edward Miles who on April 16, 1759, conveyed them to John Smith. Smith was the owner of the mills for two years and then Andrew Fisher and Mordecai Cloud purchased them. The estate remained in their joint possession until May 5, 1768, when Mordecai Cloud sold his portion, which was a two thirds interest, to Moses Pyle. For ten years there was no change in the ownership. At the termination of that period John Simonton became the owner and managed the mills until 1806, when he sold them to Isaac Tyson. Benjamin Watson was the next owner, and in 1831, the mills burned but were rebuilt by him. The succeeding owners were Dr. Palmer Chamberlin, James Kennedy and Samuel Thomas. In 1845 Thomas sold them to Joseph Dean.
In 1840, he married Margaret, daughter of Thomas...
In 1840, he married Margaret, daughter of Thomas Pondence during his European tour, of 1881, and his frequent contributions to the local newspapers on various public issues. Mrs. Dean died March 31, 1881, but two sons and three daughters are still living—Joseph, president of the Dean Woolen Company, lives in Newark; Sue is the widow of the late John H. Hill, of Newark; Thomas A., died in infancy, as did his brother, Robert Kernshaw; William Kernshaw lives at Newark; S. D. Hill, Florence J., and Harriet L., live at the old homestead, at Deandale. Anna Bello, who married Joseph S. Lawton, a solicitor of Leeds, England, died in November, 1882. Seven grandchildren also survive, of whom Joseph has three boys, William Kernshaw has three daughters, while Mrs. Hill has one daughter. Mr. Dean's funeral, in 1887, was attended by a large number of the most distinguished men of the state and nation. His remains were interred in the Newark M. E. Cemetery.

On November 26, 1765, Col. John French, then sheriff of New Castle County, purchased a tract of land containing four acres, the present site of Buford Mills, and the same year dug a mill-race and erected a grist and a bolting-mill. This land, with some other afterwards purchased, he conveyed to Captain William Battell, June, 1723. For seven years Captain Battell conducted the mills, then known as Battell's Mills, and November 25, 1725, desired "WB" to be recorded as his brand-mark.

Arthur Clayton and Robert Chapman, August 1, 1730, purchased of Battell five hundred acres of land, together with the grist and bolting-mills and other improvements. This land is situated on Christiana Creek, between Rum Branch and the east side of Latham's Run, now Leatherman's Run. On March 19, 1731, Chapman sold his one-half interest to Arthur Clayton, thus vesting in him the whole title. This tract was sold by Henry Newton Sheriff, and purchased by Joseph Peace, a miller, of Trenton, N. J. The deed bears date May 24, 1738. On July 4, 1741, Joseph Peace received a new warrant and resurvey for five hundred acres. On September 1, 1742, Joseph Peace conveyed this estate to Francis Bowers. At this time a distillery had also been erected. In 1745, William Patterson purchased from Bowers all the land, mills, bolting-mills, stills, stillhouses and other buildings. William Patterson owned the entire estate until July 28, 1780, when he sold two hundred and ninety-two acres, containing the mills, etc., to Samuel Patterson, his son, who convoyed the same to Joseph Israel, of Philadelphia, on January 31, 1784. In 1795, Mr. Israel built the gristmill which is still used. The mill is a three-story building, with a basement and attic, and is fifty feet by seventy-five feet. The mill was next owned by William Inskip and by him sold to William F. Smalley. In 1883, Emily F. Platt became the owner. In that year it was leased by Platt & Elkington, and called the Buford Mills. It was refitted with modern machiney and converted into a full roller-mill. An engine was put in order that steam might be used when the water was deficient. The mill has a capacity of fifty barrels per day, and is run on full time. Four men are required to operate it. The flour is manufactured chiefly for local consumption. The sawmill is still in existence, but seldom used, and then only for custom work.

McLaughlin Mill.—In 1795, Thomas Phillips purchased a tract of land in White Clay Creek Hundred, of Mary Steel. Between that year and 1798 he erected thereon a grist-mill and a saw-mill. These were sold at sheriff's sale in 1824, and purchased by James Ray. He conveyed them to Wm. H. Robinson, who, in 1854, sold them to Constantine McLaughlin. The scarcity of timber in this neighborhood rendered a saw-mill no longer necessary, and it was torn down in this year. McLaughlin was owner and proprietor of the gristmill until his death, in 1882. From that time to the present it has been managed by his heirs. The building erected by Phillips, is the one used to-day, with but few if any repairs. It is a three-story building, two stories stone and one story frame. Until 1885, the old machinery was also used, but in that year it was re fitted with modern machinery and is now a full roller mill. Three men are employed in its operation. The capacity of the mill is thirty barrels per day.

Rotheram Mill.—In 1799, Joseph Rotheram purchased at sheriff's sale, a tract of land on which was situated a saw-mill and grist-mill. In 1775, this tract by descent and purchase vested in his son Joseph, who operated the mills until his death. It was sold by his executors in 1795 to Thomas Latimer, Joseph Israel and Henry Goddis. The mills in 1802 came into the possession of James Price, and after his death, in 1840, passed by devise to his daughter, Mary Canby. The old saw-mill fell into disuse, and about ten years ago the stone grist-mill was burned, and has never been rebuilt. The land is now owned by William F. Smalley, and on it is situated a warehouse.

Tweed Mill.—Some time previous to 1798, Thomas and Joseph Rankin erected a grist-mill, a saw-mill and a bark-mill in the northwestern part of White Clay Creek Hundred, on the White Clay Creek. In 1803, this property passed into the hands of James Crawford, who in 1841 sold it to William McClelland. John Tweed in 1855 purchased the estate, and in 1869 rebuilt the grist and saw-mills. At the decease of John Tweed in 1875, the property came into the possession of his son, Mansell Tweed. In 1880 the bark-mill was converted into a flint-mill. The old apparatus still remains in the grist and saw-mills, and nothing but custom work is done. The capacity of the flint-mill is six tons per day, and eight men are employed in operating it. The flint is hauled by teams from a quarry about three miles distant.

Previous to 1798 Benjamin Chambers erected a saw-mill on the White Clay Creek, in the northwestern part of this hundred. After his death the mill and property came into the possession of his son Joseph, who tore down the mill. In 1849 this property was sold at Sheriff's sale, and purchased by Daniel Thompson, who erected thereon a saw and grist-mill.
In 1850 Lambert and Pyle conducted the mills and they were succeeded by Joseph Eldridge. The mills have not been used since 1881 and are partly fallen. They are the property of Joel Thompson of Newark. On August 9, 1799, Maxwell Bines, Sheriff of New Castle County, sold to Thomas Henderson a small tract of land on White Clay Creek. On this land was a log dwelling and a fulling mill. On April 3, 1811, John and Thomas Glenn, paper makers, purchased this tract of Henderson and an adjoining one making in all thirty-three acres. The fulling mill was converted into a paper-mill, and shortly afterwards sold with the land to James Falls. After the decease of James Falls, the property was vested in his son John. In 1851 Thomas Gibson became the owner, and used the mill for manufacturing cider. In 1858 Levi Hutton bought the property of Gibson. He proceeded to fit up the mill for a cotton manufacture. The building was not strong enough for the purpose, and the undertaking was abandoned. The building was not used after that and was finally removed.

About 1800 a mill was erected near Stanton station by Wm. T. Smith and Samuel Richards. In 1835 it was purchased by George Platt, and by him managed until July 16, 1843, when it was purchased by Andrew C. Gray. While owned by Mr. Gray, the mill was burned. Shortly afterwards the site and land connected with it were sold to the Farmer's Bank of the State of Delaware. Jesse Sharp purchased the tract from the directors of the bank, July 2, 1861, and conveyed it to William Dean, June 10, 1864. On 18th day of July 1866 William Dean sold the land to Ashton Butterworth and John Pilling, trustees. A cotton-factory was erected and conducted for several years under the style of A. Butterworth & Company. The building was then refitted with machinery for the manufacture of woolen goods, and in 1873 was made a part of the Kiamensi Woolen Mill. The main building is one hundred by sixty feet, two and a half stories high, and is built of brick. The picker-house is thirty-five feet square and one story high. It is the last water power mill on the White Clay Creek, and is used solely for carding and spinning. Thirty-five operatives are employed.

In 1832 John Macbeth conveyed to his son Alexander a tract of land, on the Christiana Creek, on which was a saw-mill. In 1834 William Johnson became the owner of the mill, and while it was in his possession he sawed a large quantity of timber. In 1838 he entered into partnership with Jacob Casho and George A. Casho. The business was extended, and in connection with the saw-mill they erected a manufactory of farming implements. For three years they conducted the business, and then admitted C. W. Blandy & Brother into the partnership. In 1857 George A. Casho withdrew, and two years later William Johnson sold his interest to the remaining partners. In 1861 the partnership was dissolved, and Jacob Casho became sole owner. Two years later a partnership was formed between him and Hudson Steele which lasted until 1865, when William Reynolds bought Mr. Steele's interest. The firm was then known as Casho Reynolds & Company. A year later Walter E. Turner succeeded Mr. Reynolds, and the business was conducted under the style of Casho & Company until 1872. In that year "The Casho Machine Company" was incorporated. The first board of directors was Frederick A. Curtis, John Pilling, James H. Ray, John W. Evans, William Green, Jacob Casho and Constantine McLaughlin. Mr. Curtis was elected president and served until October, 1880, when he resigned and James H. Ray was elected. Mr. Ray resigned in July, 1881, and was succeeded by Thomas S. Bellah, the present president. During 1882 new buildings were erected, and a thirty horse-power engine procured to be used in connection with the water-power. The present organization is as follows: President, Thomas S. Bellah; secretary and treasurer, Charles T. Dure; directors, James Hossinger, Samuel Lindsey, George G. Kerr, S. M. Curtis and Thomas S. Bellah; superintendent, F. A. Spencer. The company at present occupy four buildings for manufacturing, and employ thirty men. The capacity of the manufactory is $75,000 worth of machinery per year. They manufacture wagon-axles, wool-washing machinery and agricultural implements.

William Chandler established a bone and phosphate mill near Stanton Station in 1877. The mill has been operated by him since that period. The capacity of the mill is twenty tons of phosphate or four tons of bone per day. It requires five men to operate it.

The bark mill located near Ogletown and run by the Armstrongs, in connection with the tannery at Newark, was sold by Thomas B. Armstrong in 1888 to the Philadelphia, Wilmington & Baltimore Railroad Company, and by them removed.

CHRISTIANA.—This village, formerly called Christiana Bridge, is situated in the eastern part of White Clay Creek Hundred. The excellent advantages of location, being situated on Christiana Creek, at the head of tide-water navigation, as well as on the main road leading from Philadelphia to Baltimore, were conducive to its early settlement. Warrants and patents for land on the site of the present village were granted over two hundred years ago and settlements made. The village grew slowly, and in 1737 there were ten dwellings here. At this time the business interests of the village were awakened, and Christiana Bridge was one of the principal markets for the products not only of the immediate vicinity, but also of the northeastern part of Cecil County, Maryland. The produce was transported by boat from here to Philadelphia. The village was the meeting place of several commissions previous to the Revolutionary War. The one in 1764, appointed to make a new survey of the twelve-mile circle, which was accomplished shortly afterwards. The other, in 1766, composed of commissioners from Maryland and Delaware, who were appointed to decide upon the boundary line between these two provinces. The commission agreed, and the line was surveyed and located at a later period. During the blockade of the ports in the Revolutionary War, provisions and other merchandise were carried from Philadelphia to Baltimore in the following manner: from Philadelphia to Christiana Bridge by boat; from this place they were conveyed overland to Elkton, and thence by packets to Baltimore. In 1781 General Lafayette, with twelve hundred troops en route from Trenton to Elkton, landed at Christiana Bridge, and thence proceeded on foot to Elkton. The expedition was against Bendict Arnold, who was devastating the land along the Chesapeake Bay. In 1785 Levi, Henry and Jacob Hollingsworth, with several others, established a line of "Stage Boats" to ply between Philadelphia and Christiana. By these, large shipments of flour were made, which were brought to this village for transportation by the millers on the White Clay and Christian Creek and the Elk River. The shipping industry thence commenced, increased, and in the early part of the present century four packets ran semi-weekly to Philadelphia. The owners of wharves at this time were Levi Hollingsworth, Sylvester Welsh, Levi Adams and Solomon Maxwell. Considerable bustle and confusion attended the loading and unloading of a packet, and the street by the wharves was lined with conveyances. In 1830 the village was in a flourishing condition, and numbered as many inhabitants as at present. The construction of the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad, a few miles distant, dealt a blow to the shipping industry of Christiana and to the village itself. Another, and, in many cases, more convenient method of transportation, was open to the public, and shipping gradually declined, until at present only an occasional boat is floated by the tide to and from Philadelphia. The Levi Hollingsworth wharf is now owned by A. C. Weber & Bro., and is the only one in use. Several efforts have been made to procure railroad communications with the village, but in vain. Christiana at present contains two churches, a school-house, a post-office, two blacksmith shops, and about four hundred inhabitants.

The merchants of the town are A. C. Webber & Bro., Wier & Marshall, Benjamin Peters and James H.
Smalley.

OGETOWN.—This village was so named in honor of Thomas Ogle, who at that time was the owner of the land on which it stands. When it was first named is unknown, but it was previous to 1767, for it was in that year mentioned in an order to lay out a road.
It is a small hamlet, situated near the centre of the hundred. Near it, in 1864, George Talbot, one of the Council of Maryland, built a fort on land then belonging to widow Ogle. In relation to this fort, Johnston says, "it was described by those who had seen it as about thirteen feet long, ten feet wide and covered with slip wood."

The garrison consisted of "six or seven men who were esteemed Catholics and behaved peaceably towards the inhabitants, among whom they frequently went." One Murray was commander and Thomas Mansfield preser-master. The fort was held about two years, and till after Talbot went out of power.
The following occurrence happened at a council held at Philadelphia, 30th of the Fourth Month, 1684, at which time Samuel Lands was deputy sheriff:

"Samuel Lands' letter was read concerning Col. Talbo't's going with three musketeers to ye' houses of Widow Ogle, Jonas Erskine and Andrew Tille, and told them that if they would not forthwith yield Obedience to ye' Lord Baltimore & Own him to be their Proper, and pay rent to him, he would Turns them out of their houses and take their Land from them."

The village at present contains a store kept by Levi
Ruth, a post-office and about half a dozen residences.

MCCLELLANDVILLE is situated in the northwestern part of White Clay Creek Hundred. This village derived its name from William McClelland, one of the earliest residents within its bounds. The first and only store opened in this village was owned by William Kennedy, in 1860. A blacksmith-shop was opened by the same gentleman in 1851. The store is now owned by George I. Smith, and the blacksmith-shop by George W. Coile. In addition to the store and blacksmith-shop, the village contains a postoffice, church, school-house and about ten dwellings.

POST-OFFICES.—It is impossible to ascertain the exact date in which the post-office at Christiana was established, but it was at least one hundred and fifty years ago. The following gentlemen have been postmasters from 1803 till the present time: Joseph Janvier, George Pratt, James A. Briscoe, Nathaniel Wolfe, Howard Ogle, Frank Bradley, Abraham
Egbert, Daniel H. Egbert, Dr. Elziah Robinson, James R. Vincent, Thomas Oliver, William H.
Leavy.

The post-office at McClellandville was established in 1850. William McClelland was the first postmaster. He was succeeded by William B. Mackey, the present incumbent.

Ogetown was made a post village in June, 1886, with James M. Dougherty as the first postmaster.
Joseph C. Mann, the present incumbent, succeeded him May 9, 1887.

HOTELS.—The only hotels in this hundred outside of Newark are situated in Christiana. These are managed in a proper manner, and afford excellent accommodations. For about seventy-five years previous to 1870 there was also a tavern at Ogetown, one of the first proprietors of which was Jehu Hopper.
This was last kept by a Mr. Willey, in the year above mentioned, when it was converted into a store, which is now in possession of Levi Ruth.

The Christiana Hotel was opened at an early date, which cannot be definitely ascertained. Shortly after 1800 the hotel was owned and managed by David Armstrong. The tavern is a brick building, and is still standing. It has been conducted respectively by Nathaniel Wolfe, Joseph Eccles, Thomas Laymond, Richard Wright, James Stroup, Frank Bradley, Philip Marvel, Stephen Stradley, James King and W. B.
Carrinder, the present proprietor.

The Shannon Hotel, so called, after William Shan-
HISTORY OF DELAWARE.

John, a famous caterer, in the latter part of the eighteenth century, was built previous to the Revolutionary War. In this hotel tradition says that General Washington, while on a journey to Philadelphia, dined here. In 1797, William Shannon obtained a license, and the record of it shows that he kept the hotel previous to this date. Under his management the reputation of the hotel was very good, and persons traveling within twenty-five miles of it would go there to take a meal or spend the night with him. It was next conducted by Isaac Price. He was succeeded by David Armstrong, James Adams, William Simpson and John Allen, by whom it was converted into a store in 1855. The hotel was reopened, and is now owned by John Mealy.

Christiana Lodge, No. 9, I. O. G. T., is located at Christiana. It was organized in 1885, and numbered sixteen members. Since its institution the lodge has been in a prosperous condition and constantly increasing in number, and at present there are twenty-five members. The officers at the present time are as follows: James B. Vincent, W. C. T.; Alice Appleby, V. T.; James T. Scott, P. W. C. T.; Mrs. McCrea, Secretary; John Whitman, B. S.; Jane Morrison, Treasurer; David Appleby, D.; Clarence King, M.

NEWARK.

The town of Newark, situated in the western part of White Clay Creek Hundred, was settled more than two centuries ago by natives of England, Wales and Scotland. The name is probably taken from the Newark in the old country mentioned by Scott,—

"There Newark's stately tower Looks out from Yarrow's kitchen tower."

The growth of the village was slow, and nothing important is known concerning it until 1797, when James McMechan and others applied to William Denny, Acting Governor of the three lower counties on the Delaware, for corporate privileges. He referred the matter to King George II, Sovereign of England, who, on April 13, 1758, granted the following, which may be considered its first charter:

"George the Second, by the Grace of God of Great Britain, France and Ireland King, Defender of the Faith, and so forth. To all unto whom these presents shall come, Greeting:

"Know ye that we, the said James McMechan, John Howard, William McCrea, William Ewynn, William Armstrong and David Wilkin, of our County of New Castle, within the government of our counties of New Castle, Kent and Sussex, have been at great expense in building houses and making improvements in a piece of land ten miles west of New Castle, at the intersection of two very public roads, the one leading from New Castle to the Cross-roads in Chester County, and the other leading from Kent and Sussex to New Garden in order to erect and make a town there, which is called Newark, in the County of New Castle. And, whereas, the said James McMechan, John Howard, William McCrea, William Ewynn, William Armstrong and David Wilkin, with divers others, the proprietors of houses and lots of ground in and near the said town, have humbly besought our trusty and well-beloved William Denny, Esq., with our royal approbation Lieutenant-governor of the county aforesaid, under the Hon. Thomas Penn and Richard Penn, Esquires, true and absolute proprietors of the province of Pennsylvania and county aforesaid, for our letters patent under the great seal of the government of the said counties for granting to the present and future inhabitants of the said town or village called Newark, the powers and privileges of having fair days and one weekly market there, for the encouragement of trade and better accommodating and supplying the inhabitants thereof with provisions and other necessaries. Therefore, know ye that we, favoring the petition and good purposes of the said James McMechan, John Howard, William McCrea, William Ewynn, William Armstrong and David Wilkin, being willing to encourage the trade and industry amongst all our subjects, and to promote, as much as in us lies, their welfare and utility, have of our special grace, certain knowledge and further motion, granted to the aforesaid town aforesaid, called Newark, shall and may from henceforth have and hold, and aforesaid town aforesaid, called Newark, shall and may from henceforth have and hold, and to the said town aforesaid, called Newark, that is to say, on the third Thursday and Friday in the months of May and October in every year, for the buying and selling of meat cattle, oxen, cows, horses, sheep and hogs and all other given, wares and commodities, and also a weekly market, to wit: on every Thursday, together with the free liberties, customs, profits, privileges and emoluments to the aforesaid fair and markets belonging or annexed hereby forever. And we do further grant for our heirs and successors, to the present and future inhabitants of the said town, and all our liege subjects, that it shall and may be lawful for them to assemble themselves together at the said town called Newark, for holding the aforesaid fair and weekly market on the respective days and times hereinafter limited and appointed at such places within the said town as the inhabitants thereof from time to time shall appoint. And we do hereby further grant and ordain that David Wilkin, of the said town of Newark, shall be the first clerk of the market who (and all succeeding clerks of the market of the said town) shall have some of bread, wine, beer, wood and other things, and to execute and perform all other things belonging to the office of clerks of the market within the said town. In testimony whereof we have caused these, our letters patent, and a great seal of our government to be hereunto affixed. Witness, William Denny, Esq., with our royal approbation Lieutenant Governor and Commander-in-Chief of the province of Pennsylvania and counties aforesaid, this thirteenth day of May, in the year of our Lord, one thousand seven hundred and fifty-eight, and in the thirty first year of our reign."

"This is signed by William Denny, Esq., to the greatpNext of the province of Pennsylvania is carefully affixed by a blue ribbon. Outside it is endorsed "Charter.""

"WILLIAM DUNNY, ESQ., GOVERNOR, To JAMES MCCROMEN, &C.
For a fair market and in Newark, in the county of
New Castle.
Recording, No. 8-10.
"Recorded in the Rolls office at New Castle, in Board, B, p. 307, at Givens under my hand and seal this 17th day of June, 1772."

"R.M. WILKINSON, Recorder of Deeds."

In a paper published in 1770 Newark is spoken of as "a suitable and healthy village, not too rich or luxurious, where real learning might be obtained." In 1772 an act was passed establishing two market-days, namely, Tuesday and Friday, and special provisions for regulating the market. The principal prohibitions were buying or selling provisions elsewhere than in the market; killing cattle, sheep or hogs in Academy Square or the market-house; selling unwholesome meat; using false weights, and exposing for sale any flesh-meat on Monday or Tuesday in each week, except during June, July and August. The bakers were also required to stamp their bread in such a manner that it could be identified. In the same act the boundaries of the town are thus given:

"And for preventing all uncertainty and disputes that may arise, touching or concerning the limits of the said town of Newark: Be it enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the lines and bounds hereinafter mentioned are and always hereafter shall be reported, deemed, allowed and taken to be the boundaries and limits thereof, That is to say, Beginning at the south end of the road near an inn now known by the name of Saint Patrick, and extending thence along the road leading to New London township, in Chester county, to a small stream or run to the mouth thereof, where it enters into White Clay creek; and from thence down the said creek to the most easterly line of the land now of Doctor Samuel Platt; and by the south boundary of the said Platt's plantation to the coast to include the said lands within the said town, to the land now of David McMechan, and from the corner of the said James Simpson and, David McMechan, and from their land to the south line of Saint Patrick's lane, and thence by a right line to the place of beginning."

The market-house was situated near the northeast corner of the Academy yard, near the present site of the Washington Hotel. In 1788 John Penn came from Lancaster and passed through this section of the country. In his journal of that year is the following:

"April 17th. The country is pleasantly varied in the ride from this place to Wilmington. At Newark is the most considerable collection of houses I have seen since Lancaster. The Elk is crossed upon the road and the country is plentifully watered here by small streams."

In 1811 an act was passed making it lawful for James Titon, George Russell, Levi Boulden, Andrew Gray, Frederick Holtzbecker and John Herdman, or their successors, as managers, to carry on a lottery for raising a sum not exceeding four thousand dollars clear of all expenses, to be expended in turnpiking or paving the main street in Newark, and for repairing the English school-house and market-house. In 1851 a new charter to lay out the boundaries of the town was granted by the Legislature of Delaware, and John W. Evans, Isaac Ferris, Robert Ochiltree, Benjamin Caulk and John G. Turner were appointed commissioners. The present boundaries of the town, which are the ones laid out by the commissioners, inclose a nearly coffin-shaped tract of land and are as follows:

"Beginning at the corner of lands now of Nathaniel Wilson and Daniel Field, on the road leading to Port Deposit, thence by the line of the lands of the said Daniel Fields to the center of the road leading to New London township, in the State of Pennsylvania; thence by a straight line to the southeastern corner of the lot attached to the Methodist church; thence to a point in the west line of Samuel G. Finley's lands, four hundred feet north from the centre of the present road leading through Newark to Wilmington; thence in a straight line to the southeastern corner of lands of Elizabeth Thompson and Albert C. Lewis; thence along said Lewis' line to the southwest corner of George G. Evans' land on the Elk road; thence in a straight line to the corner of land of Elihu Holtzbecker and John Whann, being in a line of land of the estate of Thomas Blandy, and from thence to the place of beginning."

During the Revolutionary War, just previous to the battle of Brandywine, the whole British army passed through Newark. When General Washington moved southward toward Yorktown, a detachment of his troops passed through this town. During the War of the Rebellion thousands of troops were conveyed by rail to the South, and passed a short distance from Newark. The growth of this town, though at no time rapid, was gradual and certain. The business increased from day to day and reached its greatest height in 1887. The destruction of the Dean Woolen-Mill on December 25, 1886, was a severe blow to the interests of the town. Numerous persons were thrown out of employment, and compelled to move away. Despite this, the town is in a prosperous condition. On April 21, 1887, Newark was re-incorporated, and is presided over by a Council of seven men instead of five commissioners, as heretofore. It is impossible to obtain a list of the commissioners previous to 1866. The following persons have served as commissioners from that year to the present:

1866. John Pilling, pres.
   James Armstrong. Samuel B. Wright.

1867. John W. Evans, pres.
   James Armstrong.

The population of Newark at present is about one thousand three hundred.

SCHOOLS OF NEWARK. — The citizens of Newark have always taken deep interest in educational affairs. This is evidenced by the support given to the Newark Academy, the oldest institution of its kind in the State, and by the fact that it contains the only college in Delaware. Numerous private schools have been patronized by the citizens in the past, some of the most noticeable of which were the seminaries for ladies, conducted by Rev. Samuel Bell and Mrs. Pierce Chamberlain, and the Franklin Seminary. The school opened by Miss Wilson in 1869, and still in existence, received hearty support. In all of these institutions have been found students not only from all parts of Delaware, but also from the adjoining States. On October 11, 1830, the first meeting was held to organize a system of public schools. In the following year a school-house was erected in what was termed District No. 39, and shortly afterwards a school was opened in District No. 41. Both districts are within the limits of the town. The first annual meeting of the School Board was held on October 8, 1832. Both schools were conducted separately until 1873, when they were joined and called United Districts No. 39 and 41. In 1884 a new two-story brick building was erected at a cost of $10,000. This building is divided into four rooms, over which four teachers preside. The number of pupils at the present time is 185. Prof. V. A. Groves is principal and his assistants are Misses Fannie Briscoe, Annie Waters and Sallie Lumb.

Newark Academy.—This institution, so famous for learning in the latter half of the eighteenth century, had its origin in a school opened in 1741 by Rev. Francis Allison, pastor of the New London Church, situated in Chester County, Pa. A few years previous to this Rev. Allison, a native of Ireland and graduate of Glasgow, came to this State and entered the family of Gov. John Dickinson as tutor. In 1741 he received a call to minister to the spiritual wants of the New London Church. During this year he received several young men into his family as pupils and schoolmates of Gov. Dickinson's son, and this formed the nucleus of the present Academy. Some years previous to this date the Synod of Philadelphia, representing at that time the Presbyterian Church of America, was impressed with the need of a suitable school for educating and preparing young men for the ministry. In 1739 the Synod determined to found a seminary, and a committee was appointed to proceed to England and solicit funds for this purpose. The war then raging between England and Spain interrupted this project for a time, but it was revived in 1743 and the next year the school started by Rev. Allison was adopted by the Synod as its own. The plan of conducting the school adopted by the Synod was as follows: "That all persons who please may send their children and have them instructed gratis in the languages, philosophy and divinity. That the school be supported for the present by yearly contributions from the congregations under the Synod's care. That if any funds remain after paying the salaries of the master and tutor they shall be expended in the purchase of books and other necessary for the school." From this arrangement originated an academy, the first of its kind in this country, and the alma mater of many of the leading men of that period. Dr. Allison continued rector until 1752, when he was appointed vice-provost and Professor of Moral Philosophy in the Philadelphia Academy, now the University of Pennsylvania. Dr. Allison was succeeded by Rev. Alexander McDowell, who moved the school to Elkton, where it remained for a short time. In 1767 the school was located at Newark, where it now is. In 1769 Thomas and Richard Penn, proprietaries of Pennsylvania and the "Lower Counties," granted a charter to the Academy as an institution of learning. In 1773 Rev. Dr. Ewing and Dr. Hugh Williamson were sent to England and Scotland to secure funds for the Academy. They were successful in their undertaking, and the generous donations of the Penns and others enabled them to erect a substantial building, and formed the basis of the present endowment. On February 17, 1774, Morgan Edwards, of Newark, conveyed to the trustees of Newark Academy a lot of land, on the Main Street of the town, adjoining the lot of Rev. Thomas Reed, containing seven acres and fifty perches. This tract was sold by them to Alexander McDeath, March 26, 1777, for £250 10s. The Academy was in active operation until the latter part of 1777, when, on account of the Revolutionary War then raging, it was closed, and so remained till 1780. During this period the building was used for the manufacturing of shoes for the Continental army under General Washington. The prevalent idea that the Academy was closed during the entire war is dispelled by the fact that the trustees approved and paid a bill of John Bratton's for teaching in 1776 and 1777, and in 1783 granted a gratuity of £50 to William Thomson in consideration of his meritorious conduct in undertaking the employment of teaching "for near three years past under many discouragements." Governor Thomas McKean, in a letter to General Washington dated Newark, Delaware, October 8, 1777, says, "On my arrival, I found that all the records and public papers of the county of New Castle and every shilling of the public money, together with the fund belonging to the trustees of Newark Academy, &c., had been captured at Wilmington." The minutes of the trustees of the Academy during and previous to the Revolutionary War, by some misfortune, were lost. The first entry in the new minute book procured in 1783 is as follows:

WILMINGTON, 5 June, 1783.
``In consequence of previous notice the Trustees of the Academy of Newark met at this place:``
````````````````````````
``Present:``
``Rev. Dr. John Ewing, Rev. William McKennan, Rev. Thomas Read, Mr. John McKiny, General Sam'l Patterson, Mr. James Means, Mr. John Thomson.``
````````````````````````
``Absent:``
``Rev. Mr. Wilson, Rev. Joseph Montgomery, Mr. Chas. Thom- son, Hon. Ismae, Hon. John Evans.``
````````````````````````
``Dr. Ewing laid before the Board an account of the money be- longing to the fund in his hands, which is as follows: Continental Certificates, for $3200, dated March 27, 1777: " Continental Certificates, for $3200, dated March 27, 1777: 450 0 0 Continental Certificates for $2000, dated 8th Novem- ber, 1777, equal in specie: 31 4 2 Continental Certificates for $500, of different dates, equal in specie to: 36 10 145""" for devotion to religion, education, and the welfare of the country. It is estimated that five thousand persons have been educated within the walls of the Academy, most of whom have become good and useful citizens. Among the early students of the Academy after it was located at Newark were George Duffield, D.D., associate chaplain of Congress with Bishop White; Alexander McWhorter, D.D., an eminent Presbyterian clergyman; Edward Miller, M.D., an eminent physician and Professor of Practice of Physic in the University of New York. Among the alumni of the Academy are found such men as Charles Thomson, secretary of the First Congress; Rev. Dr. John Ewing, provost of the University of Pennsylvania; Thomas McKean, Governor of Pennsylvania, and many others of equal merit known throughout the entire Union.

The following is a list of the principals from the opening of the school to the present time: Rev. Dr. Allison, Rev. Alexander McDowell, Mr. William Thompson, Mr. Johnstone, Rev. John Waugh, Rev. Francis Hindman, Rev. A. K. Russell, Mr. Thomas Madden, Mr. N. Z. Graves, Professor Wm. S. F. Graham, Mr. W. W. Ferris, Rev. Matthew Meiggs, Mr. J. W. Weston, Rev. Whitman Peck, Professor E. D. Porter, Miss Hannah Chamberlain, Joseph L. Polk and Albert N. Raub.

Corps of Instructors.—Albert N. Raub, Principal; Assistants, Professor Edgar L. Raub, Miss Gertrude M. Bridgman and Miss Martha Chamberlain; Teachers of Music, Miss Georgia Bemness and Miss Nora A. Raub.

Newark M. E. Church.—Previous to 1812 the Methodists of Newark held their meetings in private families, and occasionally in the Academy building. In that year an organization was effected and a church erected at the present location of the Methodist Cemetery, on land then the property of Isaac Tyson. On April 8, 1813, Samuel Brumley, Abraham S. Keagy, John Stoops, William Silver, Abraham Egbert, Jacob Tyson, Isaac Tyson and Abraham Heapy were elected trustees. On the same day they purchased of Isaac Tyson a half-acre of land on condition “that they shall keep and maintain, in good order and repair, the house now erected and built on the same, and to be finished for the use of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in the United States of America.”

This was used as a house of worship until 1851, when, through the efforts of John F. Williamson, and a few other active members, a new building was erected on Main Street, at a cost of five thousand dollars. In 1861 this building was burned down, and services were then held in the Village Presbyterian Church. In the spring of the following year the erection of the present edifice was begun on the same location, but was not completed until the fall of 1864. This is a commodious two-story brick building, and cost ten thousand dollars. The dedication sermon was preached in January, 1865, by Rev. Pennell Combs.

Newark Presbyterian Church.—From 1839 to 1860 there were two Presbyterian Churches in Newark, the one known as the Village Church and the other the First Presbyterian Church of Newark. The former, or New School, was organized in 1835, with a membership of sixteen. This congregation met in the schoolroom of Rev. Samuel Bell, who had charge of a female seminary at that time. In 1843 it was decided to erect a church, the corner-stone of which was laid on September 25th, of that year. The building was completed the following year, and dedicated March 28th, with appropriate ceremonies.

Dr. Gilbert, then president of Newark College, was the first pastor. From this date the church enjoyed a season of prosperity. Dr. Gilbert was succeeded by Rev. J. P. Wilson in October, 1847, and he officiated until the end of 1849. During this period twenty-five persons were added to the church-roll. Dr. Wilson was followed in regular order by Revs. George Foote, Professor Graham, John W. Elliott, Henry A. Barnes, Nicholas Patterson, V. D. Collins, W. A. Crawford, Ellis J. Newlin and Mr. Peck. In 1860 the two churches united, and have since worshipped together. The church building was sold to the Catholics. The First Presbyterian, or Old School, was organized in August, 1839, by a committee of New Castle Presbytery. The congregation, numbering nine members, was composed of persons who previously worshipped at White Clay Creek and Head of Christiana Churches. Rev. Alexander Heberton for a short time preached as stated supply. He was followed by Rev. Elijah Wilson, who officiated from June, 1842, till 1846. During his pastorate the church building was erected. During the following seven years the church was closed, with the exception of an occasional service. In December, 1853, Rev. James L. Vallandingham accepted the charge, in connection with the churches at White Clay Creek, and Head of Christiana. He resigned in 1860. In that year the two branches were united, and Rev. Sterling M. Galt was chosen pastor. After his death, in 1865, James Hamilton ministered to the church until 1870, when ill health compelled him to resign. During his pastorate the old church building was torn down, and preparations made for the erection of a new edifice. For a few months Rev. Michael Burdett filled the pulpit. In 1871 Rev. George J. Porter was elected pastor. The new building was completed and dedicated June 13, 1872. The church is now in a flourishing condition, and numbers over a hundred members.

The Christian Church was organized in 1884. As yet they have erected no church edifice. Their first pastor, Rev. T. B. Knowles, began his ministrations in Newark in March, 1887, and still labors there.

St. Patrick R. C. Church.—In 1866 a Catholic Church was organized at Newark, and the Village Church, erected by the New School Presbyterians, was purchased for a meeting-house. The church was dedicated in that year by Bishop O'Hara. The congregation at that time numbered about three hundred communicants. The first priest in charge was Father Blake. He was succeeded by Father William Dollard, Father Peter Donaghy, Father John A. Lyons. During Father Lyons' priesthood a new two-story brick edifice, sixty by eighty feet, was erected, at a cost of twenty thousand dollars. The successor of Father Lyons is Father J. D. Cary, the present priest. During the past year many members of this church have moved from the town. There are at present about two hundred communicants.

St. Thomas' Protestant Episcopal Church was erected in 1843, and dedicated to the worship of God, on February 25, 1845, by the Rt. Rev. Alfred Lee, D.D., LL.D., bishop of the diocese. The first services were held August 1, 1842, at which time the congregation was organized. The vestrymen were Thomas Blandy, Benjamin Gibbs, William S. Wilson, William Couch and James S. Martin. The church edifice was erected at a cost of about $4000. Rev. Walter E. Franklin was the first rector. The parish has about seventy-five communicants. The present rector is Rev. George M. Bond.

St. John's A. U. M. P. Church.—The first meeting of the congregation of this church was held in 1855, in a log house situated where the present church stands. In 1866 it was decided to erect an edifice, which was completed in 1867, at a cost of $1100. The number of members has increased from sixteen to forty-two, the present membership. The following ministers have officiated: Revs. Solomon Benson, Daniel Russell, John Morris, N. E. Collins, Benj. Scott, Moses Chippery, Edward H. Chippery, J. J. Broadman.

The Foundry.—In 1851 a foundry was built by Dr. Palmer Chamberlain, on a site nearly opposite the Deer Park Hotel. In 1854 C. & H. P. R. Blandy purchased the plant and conducted the business until 1875, when Lewis L. Allen became the proprietor. Allen was the proprietor for eleven years, and then Edward R. Wilson, the present owner, purchased it. The business was never carried on very extensively and was unprofitable. Since 1886 nothing at all has been manufactured in the foundry.

In 1886, John A. Bedwell established a manufactory in the limits of Newark, in a building erected for a sash-factory, Mr. Bedwell manufactures hammocks and gauze goods of every description. There are ten looms in the factory and fifteen employees are required to operate them. The factory has a capacity of four hundred hammocks per day. The products of this manufacturer are shipped to New York.

BRICK-YARD.—In 1882 the Newark Brick Company commenced manufacturing bricks within the boundaries of Newark. Their annual production amounted to one and a half millions of bricks per year. Twelve men were employed. Two years later the brick-yard was purchased by A. J. Hayland & Co., who ran it for a year. Johnson & McMichael are the present owners and proprietors. They have in their employ six workmen, and manufacture annually five hundred thousand common bricks. The clay bank is in close proximity to the yard.

In 1885 Jacob Casco and C. Mandenhall began the manufacture of road-machines. The business was carried on for a year, during which time twenty-six machines were made. The inability to sell the machine led to the abandonment of its manufacture.

In 1831 Robt. M. and William B. Armstrong conveyed to Thos. B. Armstrong a tannery located in Newark. In 1836 Alexander Walker purchased the tannery and conducted the business until 1852, when he failed. The tannery has since been torn down.

HOTELS.—St. Patrick.—It is impossible to ascertain the exact date of the erection of this hotel, or by whom it was built. In 1750 John Pritchard was the landlord and owner. When Mason and Dixon, with their corps of assistants, made their surveys in 1764, St. Patrick’s Inn was their headquarters. In describing the boundaries of the town of Newark in 1772, the St. Patrick’s Inn is mentioned. The hotel remained in the Pritchard family for nearly a century, being owned respectively by John, Tobias and John, and was often called Pritchard’s Hotel. In 1848 James S. Martin purchased the property, and in 1851 tore down the building and erected a four-story brick hotel, sixty by forty, and called it the Deer Park Hotel. This hotel has been owned successively by Jacob De Haven, J. Marshall Harlan, Alexander A. Laws, Colonel Joshua Clayton and John E. Lewis, the present owner. The hotel is successfully managed by Mr. Lewis.

Newark Hotel.—The date of the erection of this hotel or the names of the earliest proprietors cannot be definitely ascertained. The earliest accurate information in regard to it is that a license was granted to Joseph Hossinger in May, 1797, to keep a hotel in Newark, and some of the oldest citizens remember hearing the hotel called Hossinger’s Tavern. The hotel was successively owned by John Herdman (who was proprietor in 1828), John W. Choate, and in 1890 was purchased by the Newark Hall Company and torn down. The present Exchange building stands on the site occupied by this hotel. Tradition says that General Washington passed a night within its walls during the Revolutionary War.

Washington Hotel.—This building was erected about 1825 by a Mr. Botta. He was proprietor until 1838, when he sold it to Mr. Blandy, who built an addition to it and remodeled the part already built. The next and present owner is James A. Wilson.

POST-OFFICE.—The post-office at Newark was established at a very early date, which cannot be accurately ascertained. The present office is in the Exchange building. The following are the postmasters from 1840 to the present time: Thomas Bennensc, Mathew Maclain, James L. Miles, Jonathan Dreunen, John Miller, S. R. Choate.

The Newark Building and Loan Association was instituted in 1867. The association is conducted on the serial plan and is in a very prosperous condition. This organization has been of great assistance in building up and improving the town. The present officers are: President, E. S. Gilmour; Vice-President, Joseph Dean; Treasurer, Miller R. Barton; Secretary, George W. Williams.

The Newark Library Association was organized in October, 1878. The library now contains six hundred volumes of choice books of every description. Additions are being constantly made of the latest literary works of merit. Shortly after its organization there were eighty members, but at present only fifty are in good standing. The library is kept in the store-room of William M. Wilson, and is under the supervision of Wilbur Wilson, librarian. The officers are: President, Joseph Dean; Secretary, Miss Sue Evans; Treasurer, Dr. H. G. M. Kolloch; Librarian, Wilbur Wilson.

TELEPHONE.—W. A. Woodrow in 1882 opened a telephone office to communicate with Wilmington. Only one wire was then in use. In the following year Miss Lilian Gray took charge of the office and in 1884 secured seven subscribers. From that time the office has been known as the Telephone Exchange. At the present time there are twelve wires, ten of which are used and by means of which communication can be held with all parts of Wilmington.

National Bank of Newark.—The Bank of Newark was charted as a State Bank with a capital of fifty thousand dollars. Daniel Thompson was the first president of it. James L. Martin, Frederick A. Curtis, William McClelland, James L. Miles, Benjamin Gaulk, John Miller, Daniel Thompson, Solomon Leeche and Joseph Hossinger were appointed commissioners to open the books, secure subscriptions for stock and to attend to the general business incident to its opening. In 1864 it was converted into a National Bank. The capital stock is fifty thousand dollars, and the surplus twenty-six thousand dollars. The present officers are: President, Joel Thompson; Cashier, George W. Lindsey; Teller, George W. Williams.

RED MEN.—A lodge of Red Men was instituted in this town in 1885. The number of members at that time was sixteen. The lodge has been prosperous and gradually increased in numbers till there are now forty-three. The organization is known as Minnebaha Tribe, No. 23, I. O. R. M. The present officers are: Sachem, S. Raymond Choate; Senior Sachem, George E. Powell; Junior Sachem, Frank M. Smith;
Keeper of Records, S. I. Sweet; Keeper of Wampum, J. W. Miller; W. P., T. A. Mullen.

MAONS.—In the minutes of the Newark Academy of 1806 mention is made of a petition of "Lodge No.
96, of Masons," for use of the academy, which was not granted. Nothing definite can be learned of this organization. In 1816 Hiram Lodge, No. 3, was instituted and it continued till 1825. In January, 1870, Hiram Lodge, No. 25, A. F. A. M., was or-organized. The charter members were John France, Walter E. Turner, Edward D. Porter, John W. Evans, Charles C. King and James H. Ray. At the close of that year there were sixteen members. The lodge is in a prosperous condition and numbers fifty-two members. The officers at the present time are: M., E. S. Gilmour; S. W., W. H. Simpers; J. W., Dr.
Frank L. Springer; Treasurer, John C. Shivler; Secretary, S. M. Donnell.

KNIGHTS OF PYTHIAS.—Ooseola Lodge, No. 5, K. of P., was organized on June 5, 1868. The number of members at that time was sixteen. During this year and the following the society was in a flourishing condition and numbered eighty members. Since that time it has gradually diminished and now there are but eighteen members. The following are the present officers: C. C., James Morris; V. C., George Ferguson; Premate, Isaac Wainwright, M. of E., J. C. Shivler; M. of F., William B. Kearns; K. of R. and S., Paul Gillis;
M. at A., Nathan Davis.

Oriental Lodge, No. 12, I. O. O. F., was instituted at Newark February 11, 1847. Robert Fulton, Robert E. Payne, A. C. Alexander, John Hamilton and Hiram Austin were the charter members. At the ternimation of that year there were twenty members.
A hall was built by this order in 1850 and is still owned and used for lodge purposes. Since its organization the order has been very prosperous and now numbers ninety-two members. The present officers are; N. G., William Gamble; V. G., Clayton C. Choate; R. S.,
Joseph T. Willis; Treasurer, William H. Simpers; P.
S. George W. Williams.

GOOD TEMPLARS.—Newark Lodge, No. 3, Independent Order of Good Templars of Newark, Delaware, was organized on the 8th day of March, 1888, in the Methodist Episcopal Church of aforesaid town, and composed of twenty-one members. Henry W. Morrow, of Wilmington, Sr. P. G. T. C., and a Mr. Hargraves, of Philadelphia, instituted the lodge. During the four years nearly two hundred successions have been made. Present membership about sixty members. Lodge meets on Saturday evening in Red Men's Hall, Main Street.

ANCIENT ORDER OF UNITED WORKMEN.—Anchor Lodge, No. 4, A. O. U. W. was organized and instituted in September 1881. The membership for the first year numbered twenty-three. Many of this order have recently removed from the town. At present there are thirty-five members. The officers of the society are: Master Workman, Jas. A. Wilson; Foreman, William H. Stephenson; Overseer, William M.
Gamble; Recorder, S. R. Choate; Receiver, Dr. H. G.
M. Kollock; Financier, E. S. Gilmour.

Newark Grange, No. 6, F. of H., was instituted April 6, 1874. In that year a store was opened by this association in the room now occupied by Dr. H. G. M. Kollock. This was shortly afterwards discontinued and a co-operative store opened, which occupies at present a portion of the Exchange building and is under the superintendence of B. F. Tillium. The organization has rapidly increased in numbers and there are now seventy-five members as against the original twelve charter members. At present the Grange is officered by the following persons: Master, James Hossinger; Overseer, Thomas Brackin; Steward, James R. Deight-ton; Assistant Steward, John McKame; Lecturer, W.
L. Skinner; Chaplain, John McKeon; Treasurer,
Samuel Lindsey; Secretary, J. H. Clark; Gate Keeper,

O. of O. F., was organized July 19, 1875, with a membership of forty-one. The number of members at present is forty-two.

Mt. Carmel Lodge, No. 14, A. F. A. Y. M., was instituted August 7, 1875. The membership in that year numbered forty-two. The lodge now numbers thirty-five members.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

PENCADER HUNDRED.

This hundred is a long, narrow strip of land on the Maryland line, and is bounded on the north, east and south by the hundreds of White Clay Creek, New Castle, Red Lion and St. George's. It is the only division of New Castle County that is not confined within natural boundaries. The greater part of the Welsh tract and a small portion of what in early days was known as St. Augustine Manor comprise the territory of Pencader. The early Welsh families settled in this hundred, principally around Iron Hill.
This being a hill of considerable elevation, gave rise to the name Pencader, which is a Welsh term and signifies "the highest seat." The larger portion of the land is in a state of cultivation, and the remainder, chiefly in the vicinity of Iron and Chestnut Hills, is well wooded. The soil is a red loam with a clay sub-soil, and yields well. The land is watered by several small streams which flow through it. The Delaware, the Newark and Delaware and the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroads pass through Pencader. In 1801 surveys for the Ches-appeake and Delaware Canal were made and a route was selected. It passed near Glasgow, where a large reservoir covering one hundred acres of land was commenced, but discontinued in 1803 for want of funds. The feeder was from Big Elk Creek to the reservoir, and $100,000 were spent upon its construction. Several arches then built are still standing. In 1829 a new route for the canal, passing through the southern part of the hundred, was selected. The bed of St. George's Creek was used as the channel. The canal was completed in 1829. Further information concerning it will be found in the chapter on Internal Improvements.
NEW CASTLE COUNTY.

The southern part of Pencader is land that in 1671 was granted by Lord Baltimore to Augustine Herman, and was part of what was known as St. Augustine Manor, and embraced land from the Delaware, between Appoquinimink and St. George's Creek, westward to Bohemia Manor. This land, however, was in dispute, and Governor Lovelace protested against the usurpation of Herman and others, in taking up this land. The land west of the Delaware State line retained the name. Herman, not satisfied with his title for the portion in Delaware, obtained a warrant for it from the authorities at New Amsterdam.

In 1714, Matthias Van Bibber purchased a portion of St. Augustine Manor from Ephraim Augustine Herman. Four sons—Jacob, Adam, Matthias and Henry—and two daughters—Sarah and Rebecca—survived him. The portion of land in St. Augustine Manor owned by him was devised to his daughters. Rebecca acquired the portion situated in Delaware. She was married to—Cazier and at her death the property descended to her son—John, Jacob and Matthias. On the 21st of March, 1790, John sold his interest to Matthias and Jacob. In this deed the property is mentioned as a tract of land.

"Commonly called or known by the name of St. Augustine's Manor all that which laid in the boundaries of Maryland before the establishment of the line between Maryland and Pennsylvania, containing in the whole about two thousand acres, more or less, wherein a certain Loyal Delancy owns one-half and Reel Boardley one-fourth and Robert Haughly one-eighth's part, and the heirs of Rebecca Cazier one-eighth's part situated now a small part in Pencader Hundred, and the greatest part in St. George's Hundred and county of New Castle, . . . now a chief part in the tenure of Robert Haughly and a small part in the tenure of Jacob and Matthias Cazier."

A large portion of this land descended from Jacob Cazier to his son Henry, and is now in the possession of Jacob Benson Cazier.

Mr. Cazier is now a retired farmer, near Kirkwood, New Castle County, and was born on the White Hall farm—the old homestead of his ancestors for several generations—December 25, 1833. He is the son of Henry Cazier, whose wife was Sarah Johnson, of New York City. He is the grandson of Jacob Cazier, whose first name he bears, who, in turn, was a grandson of Matthias Van Bibber, an eminent and opulent man of his day, who came from near Philadelphia (German town), and settled in Maryland in 1702, and in that year and in 1711, bought lands that had formed part of the famous Labadie tract on the Bohemia River. Matthias Van Bibber was contemporary with the Hermans, and bought from Ephraim Augustine Herman the St. Augustine Manor, which comprised all the lands east of Bohemia Manor to the Delaware River, and south of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal to Appoquinimink Creek. At the time of the purchase this tract was claimed as a part of Maryland, and an alienation fee was paid on it to the proprietary of Maryland. These lands were but a part of his large landed possessions. Mr. Van Bibber was held in high repute among the early settlers of the Peninsula, as a man of learning and intellectual ability. He was chief justice of Cecil County, Md., when the court-house at Court-House Point, on the Elk River, was built in 1717–19, and was presiding judge on the 8th day of March, 1719, when the court met for the first time at that place. He held this position of honor and responsibility for a long time. Many of his descendants were noted for their patriotism during the War of the Revolution in 1776.

The father of Matthias Van Bibber, Jacob Isaac Van Bibber, came to this country from Holland after the birth of Matthias, and was one of the first settlers of Germantown, Pa. Henry Cazier, the son of a grandson of Matthias Bibber, was thus a worthy descendant of sturdy Holland progenitors on his father's side, and of Scotch Presbyterian ancestry on his mother's side, his mother being the widow of Rev. James McCoy, a Presbyterian clergyman. Henry left two children—Catharine Eugenia and Jacob Benson, the subject of this sketch, the former born February 26, 1830. Sarah, a daughter, born October 8, 1832, died in infancy. Catharine Eugenia married Rev. Samuel Dickey, of Oxford, Pa., October 8, 1850. She died March 16, 1862, leaving the following children: Sallie Eugenia, born August 11, 1858; Mary Irvine, born August 21, 1857; and Henry Cazier, born February 3, 1860. He died August 17, 1868.

Until his fourteenth year he attended the schools of his neighborhood, when he was sent to the Academy at Newark, then in charge of Rev. Matthew Meigs, afterwards consul to Greece. After a thorough preparatory course of two and a half years he entered Delaware College, where he remained till about the middle of the senior year, when he left for the purpose of making a general tour of the United States. He spent about two years in visiting the principal cities and points of interest in the northern, western and southern sections of the Union. Returning home, he entered upon the active pursuit of agricultural occupations on the old homestead farm. After the death of his father, in 1859, he retired from the practical work of farming and removed to "Mt. Vernon Place," his beautiful home, a cut of which appears in this volume. In this farm Mr. Cazier has taken great interest, and, with pardonable self-satisfaction, has made it one of the most productive and valuable estates in the country. He owns also the old homestead, "White Hall," and in 1873 purchased the lands that had been devised by his father to his father's brother, John Cazier. The three tracts of land, being contigious, make one solid body of about thirteen hundred acres, bounded on the south by the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal. He has also other farms, amounting to about two thousand acres of improved and valuable land, which he devotes principally to cereals. In 1878 Mr. Cazier took away all of the old family residence except a portion of the outside walls, and rebuilt in modern style, after plans of his own, making for himself one of the most commodious, richly-finished and elegant mansions in the State. Mr. Cazier enjoys a wide influence and popular favor. He is one of the principal stockholders, and a director in the Citizens' National Bank of Middletown, and also one of the largest stockholders in the National Bank of Oxford, Pa. He is a large shareholder in the Sharon (Pa.) Land Association, which holds very valuable property on the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad, between Ridley Park and Philadelphia. He has large investments in real estate in Pennsylvania, Maryland and Delaware. In politics Mr. Cazier is an Independent Republican, and an unwavering advocate of a stable government, but he has no aspirations for political honors. He was married December 18, 1878, at Elkton, Md., to Miss Hannah B., daughter of William Magens, late of Wilmington, by Rev. James McIntyre, who was long a pastor of the Glasgow Presbyterian Church. He is an adherent and liberal supporter of the Presbyterian Church at Glasgow. He has two children,—Edna, born August 19, 1880, and Henry M., born December 21, 1882.

Mr. Cazier is a man of medium stature and of affable manners. Neither spare nor corpulent, he is well-proportioned, and very active and energetic. Temperate and regular in his habits and methodical in business, he is an indefatigable worker in the supervision and management of his affairs. His flourishing farms attest his almost ubiquitous presence and judicious oversight.

The Welsh tract is a large tract of land, the greater part of which is in Pencader Hundred, and the remainder in Cecil County, Maryland. Settlers were upon the land in 1684, and were driven off by George Talbot, the Governor of Maryland, who claimed the land as within his territory. The distinguishing feature of the tract is Iron Hill, which was known by that name in 1681, and is mentioned in a letter from Vice-Director Alexander D. Hinjoasa, May 15th, as being the place where four Englishmen were murdered by the Indians in April preceding. It is evident that iron ore was then known to be at the place in considerable quantity; hence the name. A Welsh settlement had been made in what is now Delaware, Chester and Montgomery Counties, Pennsylvania, and on the 13th of First Month, 1694, William Penn granted to the settlers 40,000 acres of land which was known as the Welsh tract. A number of them, attracted in part probably by the iron ore in the Iron Hill and vicinity, sought this locality and petitioned Penn for a tract of 30,000 acres, which was granted October 15, 1701, to William Davis, David Evans and William Willia. The grant stated that they were to have "thirty thousand acres if there be so much vacant in the place hereafter expressed; that is to say, behind the town of New Castle westward, extending northward and southward, beginning to the westward seven miles from the said town of New Castle, and extending upward and downward as there shall be found room by regular strait lines as near as may be." A few settlers were upon the tract at the time of purchase and had made some improvements, but without any show of title; they were soon dispossessed and the Welsh immediately after survey began to locate upon the land. Soon after the survey was completed, John Welsh selected 561 acres, and a little later 590 acres. Of the latter, he sold 500 acres, August 17, 1727, to Thomas Lewis. Another part of this land was sold to James Sykes, and by his executors 281½ acres was conveyed to Robert Faries on February 16, 1730. Robert Faries was a native of Ireland, who came to this country and purchased land in Red Lion Hundred. After his death in 1749, the above-mentioned tract was inherited by his son William. In the following year William Faries purchased from Henry Whiteside a tract of land containing 113 acres. In 1760 he died intestate, leaving two sons and a daughter,—Jacob, Samuel and Margaret. In 1770 Jacob purchased his sister's share, and three years later his brother's portion. He also purchased several other tracts adjoining his land. He died September 1, 1818, leaving seven surviving children. The property was next owned by Jacob, Jr., who procured it by descent and purchase. The next owner was William W., who obtained possession after the decease of Jacob Faries, Jr. D. B. Ferris is the present owner of nearly all the land above mentioned.

One of the first to choose was James James, who selected Iron Hill and northward to the Christians Creek, embracing 1244 acres of land. A deed was granted by Davis, Evans and Willis, June 27, 1702, and confirmed by Penn February 21, 1703. Thomas James took up 1250 acres by a deed dated October 8, 1702, and David Price 1050 acres, deeded June 5, 1702. John Morgan took 1030 acres April 22, 1702, and also 1028 acres on the head-waters of Dragon Creek nearly to the boundary of Red Lion Hundred, and John Thomas took 632 acres, March 16, 1702. John Griffith took up 222 acres, William Jones 1568 acres, and in 1702, 1379 acres. Howel James took up 1040 acres, and Philip James 525 acres the same year.

Howel James, by his will bearing date August 17, 1717, devised 250 acres to his son, Howel, and 200 acres each to his other sons, James and Philip. James sold his portion to his brother Philip, May 12, 1726. Philip conveyed 200 acres on which a mill was located, to John Jones, boltier, of Philadelphia, May 10, 1737, and 210 acres lying on the north side of Christiana Creek to Samuel Allen, November 8th, of the same year. Among other things devised by Howel James, Esq., to his wife was an annuity of ten pounds to be paid out of his mills and plantation. Some difficulty arose concerning this, and Alexander Hamilton was consulted. His opinion was as follows:

"I am of opinion that the devise by Howell James of ten Pounds to his wife Phebe, to be laid out of his mills and plantation in such proportion as in the said Will hereunto annexed is directed, and to be paid yearly, is a good devise to Phebe for her life. But she cannot arrest the possessor of the mills or Land for the money, the same being a charge against the Estate and not against the person of the heir or possessor of the mills and Land.

"A. HAMILTON."

John Watkins and many others selected lands from the Welsh tract. One hundred and sixty-seven acres of the land of John Watkins passed to David Williams, August 6, 1736; Thomas Johns, November 10, 1729, bought 1156 acres; Philip James sold to Francis Land, January 6, 1729, 400 acres on the southeast side of Iron Hill; David Evans, November 15, 1723, sold to John Edwards 450 acres in two tracts, and the next day 300 acres to William Reese. Before 1736 David Evans removed to Cape Fear, North Carolina. In a deed to his son Samuel, dated April 10, 1736, he conveyed to him 200 acres, "whereon I have lived, formerly of Pencader, now of Cape Fear, North Carolina." April 21, 1738, Solomon and David Evans unite in conveying 594 acres of land to Thomas Evans, the 200 acres formerly conveyed to Solomon being part of the original tract. A part of the James James land came to his son Samuel by deed of gift, June 3, 1723, on which soon after he built a forge, and, by his success and the fact of there being plenty of ore near at hand, interested the leading ironmasters of Pennsylvania to the locality to such an extent that on October 15, 1725, an octopartite agreement was drawn out and signed by Samuel James, millwright; Reese Jones, tanner, of Pencader; Samuel Nutt, of Chester County, ironmonger; Evan Owen and William Branson, merchants, both of Philadelphia; Thomas and John Rutter, smiths, also of Philadelphia; and Caspar Wistar, brass-button maker, also of the same city. These men formed a company, each holding an eighth interest, for the purpose of erecting a furnace to be known as the "Abingdon Furnace," and to purchase lands in connection with it for the use of the furnace. They made arrangements for the purchase of over 1000 acres of land in the vicinity, and on one acre and three-quarters of it on the bank of Christiana Creek, which was purchased of Samuel James, and conveyed by deed to Evan Owen and William Branson, on May 28, 1726, they erected the furnace and a forge, which were called "Abingdon Iron Works." At the time the deed for the furnace lot was made out, the eighth parts had been divided into sixteenths, and John Leacock, William Fishbourn, Edward Bradley and William Monington were partners in interest in the Iron Works Company. On October 21, 1727, Gabriel Gouldney, of Bristol, England, became the purchaser of one-sixteenth interest, and from the deed of conveyance made at that time, the above-recited facts are obtained. It is not ascertained how long the works were maintained by the company, but probably not for many years. It was continued by Samuel James until 1734, when, upon a judgment obtained against him in the February term of court of that year, his property was ordered to be seized and sold. The sale was made by Henry Newton, sheriff of New Castle County, September 18, 1735, to Abraham Taylor and John White, the owners of the judgment. The property is then mentioned as the Forge commonly called Samuel James', with all the tools and utensils of the same, a lot of blacksmith tools, and also the one-eighth interest in the "furnace commonly called or known by the name of the Samuel James or the Abingdon Iron Works," together with the eighth part of land, tenements and appurtenances belonging to the furnace. It does not appear that the forge or furnace was continued by the purchasing parties, but it is still mentioned as such when sold by the sheriff January 4, 1748, to Andrew Fisher (Miller). The land on which the furnace was situated is now owned by William McConaughy. A part of the old wall and a heap of cinders on land now owned by Cooch Bros. marks the site of the old forge.

A short time after purchasing this property Fisher erected thereon a grist-mill and a saw-mill. This, after his death in 1804, passed into the hands of his sons, John and Samuel. The mill property and 45 acres of land was sold August 19, 1808, to Thomas Bradley, and May 23, 1810, to Alexander Forester. In both of these cases the property came back to the grantees, and in 1815 vested solely in John Fisher. On the 11th of April of the same year he conveyed this estate to Jacob Tyson. Since that period the mills have been successively owned by William Shakespear, Azariah Smith, Thomas Bradley and Joel P. Woodward. In 1863 the overshot wheel was replaced with iron wheels and the old saw-mill torn down, and a department for sawing arranged in the space formerly occupied by the overshot wheel. The grist-mill was a two-and-a-half-story building, forty by sixty feet, with a capacity of twenty-five barrels per day. The capacity of the saw-mill was 200,000 feet of lumber per year. In July, 1883, the mill was burned and it has never been rebuilt.

Among the settlers in Pencader in the vicinity of Iron Hill, from 1709 to 1720, are found the following names: John Devonalt, Lewis Phillips, Philip Trueax, David Miles, Rees David, Thomas Evans, Thomas Edmund, Arthur Edward, John Phillips, Thomas Morris, Jenkins Jones, John Boulton, Richard Edward, John Griffith, Hugh Evan, David Lewis, Samuel Evan, Hugh David, Anthony Mathew, Simon Mathew, Simon Butler, Arthur Melchoir, George Eaton, Elias Thomas, Thomas Evans, Philip Rees, John Bentley, David John, Richard Lewis, Benjamin Griffith, Emlin David, John Miller, John Jones, Richard Witten, Griffith Thomas, David Davis, Thomas Richard, Cornelius Vansant and Richard Herbert. These formed the nucleus of the Welsh Tract Baptist Church, and many of them, after residing here a few years, moved to other places for the purpose of founding new churches.

Rev. Morgan Edwards, author of the "Materials towards a history of the Baptists in Delaware State," was born May 9, 1822, in the parish of Trevethin, Monmouthshire, Wales. He obtained his early education in Wales, and was a student at the Bristol Academy, under the celebrated Dr. Bernard Foskett. In 1788 he became a member of the Baptist Church, and nineteen years later was ordained a minister of that church in Ireland, where he remained for nine years. Upon the recommendation of John Hill, D.D., he was called to the pastorate of the Baptist Church of Philadelphia, where he arrived May 23, 1791. In 1771 he resigned, and moved to Pencader Hundred, Delaware, near Newark, where he resided until his death, January 28, 1795.

In 1684, Joseph Bowle, living near Iron Hill, was disturbed in his possessions by Colonel George Talbot. An interesting account of his troubles can be found in the general history on page 115, of this work.

In 1738, Samuel Kerr came from Scotland, and purchased two hundred acres of the Welsh tract from Reese Jones. He resided there until his death, when the premises came into the possession of his son Andrew, who devised them to his son, Andrew. The premises, with a few changes made by purchase or sale, are now owned by George G. Kerr, whose residence and adjoining property is in White Clay Creek Hundred.

Thomas Cooch came from England, and, in 1746, purchased a tract of land in Pencader, containing two hundred acres, being a part of the land warranted to William James. He resided in this hundred, and purchased other lands in the vicinity of the tract above-mentioned. On the 8th of July, 1776, there was resurveyed to him two hundred and twenty-nine acres on a warrant of resurvey granted June 5, 1776. In September of the same year, while the British were in this neighborhood just previous to the skirmish, they had their headquarters on land of Thomas Cooch, at the present site of J. Wilkins Cooch’s residence. During this skirmish the mill on these premises was burned by the British.

At the time of his death, in 1791, Mr. Cooch was the owner of eight hundred and fifty acres and one hundred and forty-two perches of land in the Welsh Tract. This property was divided among his heirs, and the larger part of it has descended and is now in the possession of William and J. Wilkins Cooch. The old forge, erected in connection with the "Abbingdon Iron Works," is on land owned by them. Among the papers of Thomas Cooch was found an assessment list of Pencader Hundred, with the amount of tax paid by each person. The assessment was made by Thos. James, and contained the following names and amounts:

schools.—In the early history of Pencader the schools were few, and these chiefly held in private residences. As the population increased, school buildings were erected, and subscription schools were opened. Among the early teachers are found the names of Robert Porter, William Jackson, Mr. Dean and Mr. Pippin. The advantages of the scholars were very limited, and their progress accordingly. On January 27, 1803, an act was passed to incorporate trustees of “Glasgow Grammar School, in the County of New Castle.” John Hyatt, William Coch, Jacob Faris, Solomon Underwood and Robert Middleton, as trustees, were empowered to take subscriptions.

The act of Assembly, passed in 1829, worked a revolution in educational matters. This hundred was divided into five school districts, numbered successively from fifty-four to fifty-eight. School buildings were erected, and the opportunities of acquiring an education were extended to all classes. William Jackson was one of the most widely-known school-teachers in the hundred, and taught many years under the common-school system. Curtis B. Ellison was the first public school-teacher in the southern part of Pencader. The building in which he taught was an old-fashioned octagonal structure, and was built of brick. The schools have gradually improved in quality and efficiency, and are at present in excellent condition.

roads.—The early ways of entrance and exit in this hundred were mere paths. As the number of settlers increased, the roads were improved and new ones constructed. The earliest roads in Pencader were the ones extending from New Castle and Christiana to the head of Elk River, and were constructed as State roads. The former are mentioned in the chapter on White Clay Creek Hundred, and the latter in the chapter on Internal Improvements. In 1806 the Levy Court ordered a review to be made of the road from Glasgow to New Castle, intersecting at Glasgow the road from that place to Buck Tavern. On March 3 1825, three hundred dollars were appropriated for building a bridge over Shive Run, near Glasgow, and in February, of the next year, two hundred and thirty-nine dollars more were appropriated for closing the account. In 1832 a bridge was needed over Christiana Creek, near Coch’s Mill. The commissioners reported that a stone-fording would answer every purpose, and in the following March one hundred and fifty dollars were appropriated for this work. The present roads are kept in good condition.

Religious Matters.—Welsh Tract Baptist Church.

In June, 1701 Thomas Griffith, Griffith Nicholas, Evan Edmond, John Edward, Elisha Thomas, Enoch Morgan, Richard David, James David, Elizabeth Griffith, Lewis Edmond, Mary John, Mary Thomas, Elizabeth Griffith, Jr., Jennet David, Margaret Mathias and Jennet Morris, having previously been constituted a church, sailed from Milford, and landed at Philadelphia, September 8th. They were advised by their friends to settle at Pennepek, which advice they followed, and there remained a year and a half, when they procured land in New Castle County, from Messrs. Evans, Davis and Willis, the grantees of the Welsh Tract. While at Pennepek the following accessions were made: Rees Rhuddrach, Catherine Rhuddrach, Esther Thomas, Thomas Morris, Hugh Morris, Peter Chamberlain, Mary Chamberlain, Mary Chamberlain, Jr., Mary Sorensen, Magdalen Morgan, Henry David, Elizabeth David, Samuel Griffith, Richard Seree, Rebecca Marpole, John Greenwater, Edward Edward, John James, Mary Thomas, Thomas John, Judith Griffith and Mary John. In 1703 they removed to the land purchased by them in Pencader Hundred, and built a meetinghouse on the site of the present church. In the same year the membership was increased by the addition of Thomas John, and Rebecca, from Wales; and John Wild, Thomas Wild, James James, Sarah James, Jane Morgan, Samuel Wild, Mary Nicholas, Richard Bowen, David Thomas, Mary Bently and Jane Edwards, by profession of faith and baptism.

During the next few years numerous accensions were made, both by members from the churches in Wales and by conversions. In 1736 a portion of this church went to South Carolina, and founded a church there, on the banks of the Pedee River, in a portion of the country now bearing the name Welsh Neck. In 1746 the present church was built on a lot containing six acres, four of which were given by James James, and the other two purchased from Abraham Emmet. The edifice is a neat brick building, thirty feet square. At various times portions of the congregation separated themselves from the main church for the purpose of organizing other bands of worshippers. It is the mother church whence sprung the Pedee above mentioned, London Tract, Duck Creek, Wilmington, Cowmarsh and Missipilion Churches, concerning which information will be found elsewhere. “Welsh Tract Church was the principal, if not the sole means of introducing singing, imposition of hands, ruling elders and church covenants in the Middle States.” An act of Assembly was passed February 3, 1783, enabling religious denominations to be incorporated. On the 9th day of February, of the following year, this church was incorporated with Abel Davis, Robert Shields, Ebe-
NEW CASTLE COUNTY.

Near Morton, Andrew Morton and Francis Gattier as trustees of the Welsh Tract Baptist Church and Congregation, at the foot of Iron Hill. The church has steadily increased since its organization, and regular services have been held nearly the entire time. The church is at present in a prosperous condition. The following pastors have labored here since its organization.

Rev. Thomas Griffith, the first pastor, was born in 1645 in parish of Lanvernach and county of Pembroke. He was one of the constituents of the organization, and arrived at Philadelphia with his church September 8, 1701. He died at Pennepek and was there interred July 25, 1725.

Rev. Eliash Thomas was the successor of Rev. Griffith. He was born in Carmarthren County in 1674, and came to Philadelphia with the church in 1701. He died November 7, 1790, and was buried in this grave-yard.

Rev. Enoch Morgan succeeded Rev. Thomas. He was born at Ablt-goch, in the county of Caerddigan, in 1766, and was also one of the constituents of this church. He died March 25, 1740.

After the decease of Rev. Morgan the Rev. Owen Thomas took charge of the church. He was born in 1676 at Gwrgodiysa, in the county of Pembroke, and came to America in 1707. He filled the pulpit here till May 27, 1748, when he resigned, and moved to Yellow Springs, where he died November 12, 1760.

Rev. David Davis was the next pastor. He was born in the parish of Whitechurch and county of Pembroke in 1708. In 1710 came with his parents to America; was baptized in 1725, and ordained in 1734, when he became pastor of the church. He continued his pastorate until his death, August 19, 1769.

Rev. Mr. Davis' successor was Rev. John Sutton, who labored from November 3, 1770, until 1777, when he resigned, for the purpose of going to Virginia.

Rev. John Boggs was born in East Nottingham, April 9, 1714, and was brought up as a Presbyterian. In 1771 he became a Baptist, and at his ordination December 5, 1781, he took charge of this church, and died there in 1802.

The Rev. Gideon Farrell was born in Talbot County, Md., in 1763, of Quaker parents, but was baptized in 1770 by Rev. Philip Hughes. He was ordained to the ministry at Churchhill in 1779. He assisted the Rev. John Boggs as pastor of the church for several years before his death, and became his successor, and continued until his death, in 1820 or 1821. His successors were as follows: Rev. Stephen W. Woolford, from 1822 to 1830; Rev. Samuel Trott, 1831 to 1882; Rev. William K. Robinson, from 1833 to 1836, and possibly later; Rev. Thomas Barton, 1889 until his death in 1869 or 1870 (he had spent forty-five years of his ministerial life as pastor of three of the churches in the bounds of the Delaware Association); Rev. G. W. Staton, 1871 to 1872; Rev. William Grafton was pastor in 1879. He was succeeded by Rev. Joseph L. Staton, the present minister.

The Pencader Presbyterian Church.—The Presbyterians of the Welsh Tract were constituted a church as early as 1710. Rev. David Evans, son of David Evans, one of the grantees of the Welsh Tract, was the first pastor. He was licensed in 1711 and ministered to the church for a short time and then took a course at Yale College and was graduated in 1713. He returned to this congregation and was ordained and installed on November 8, 1714. He served the church as pastor until 1720, and then went to Pennsylvania and New Jersey. He continued preaching until his death in 1751. He was succeeded by Rev. Thomas Evans, a relative and native of Wales, who filled the pulpit until 1748. According to tradition, he opened an academy here which he conducted until his death in 1748. On November 2, 1742, Margaret Williams, widow, of Roger Williams, of Pencader Hundred, conveyed to David Howel, Thomas Thomas, Joseph Thomas, Thomas James, Simon James, Nathaniel Evans and Nathaniel Williams, all of Pencader, a lot of ground containing one acre and thirty-eight perches, on the road from New Castle to Head of Elk. This was part of a larger tract granted to Roger Williams by William Davis and David Evans.

It was given for the purpose of allowing "full and peaceable liberty to the Presbyterian congregation belonging to the meeting-house that is built upon the above tract of land . . . for the true worship of God in the said place according to the presbyterian Rule, Discipline and Doctrine . . . and will be submissive to the rules and direction of the Presbytery of New Castle and the Synod of Philadelphia." Rev. Timothy Griffith, the successor of Rev. Mr. Evans, filled the pulpit from 1748 until death put an end to his labors in 1754. For the following twelve years the church had no regular pastor. From 1767 to 1773 the pulpit was filled by Rev. Alexander McDowell at that time principal of Newark Academy. The following ministers have been stationed here since that period: Rev. Samuel Eakin from 1776 to 1783; Rev. Thomas Smith from 1788 to 1801; Rev. John Burton from 1801 to 1808; Rev. Samuel Bell from 1808 to 1838; Rev. Hugh Hamill from 1833 to 1837; Rev. James McIntyre from 1837 to 1849; Rev. Horatio S. Howell from 1849 to 1852; Rev. J. B. Jarvis from 1852 to 1857; Rev. George Foot from 1857 to 1866; Rev. Edward Webb from 1866 to 1871; Rev. Jason Rogers from 1871 to 1879; Rev. George Rodgers from 1880 to 1882. Rev. T. Anderson, the present pastor, began his labors here in 1882. The present church is a two-story brick building, sixty by one hundred feet, situated in the village of Glasgow. It was erected in 1852 at a cost of five thousand dollars. The church is in a prosperous condition and has a membership of ninety. The present officers are: Elder, D. B. Ferris; Trustees, Samuel Airichs, W. T. Skinner, M. D. E. Janvier, J. W. Cooch, John McIntyre, Robert M. Cann.
The First Methodist Episcopal Church at Glasgow was a brick building erected in 1832 and dedicated in 1838. Rev. Mathew Sorin conducted the services. The membership at that time numbered thirteen, of whom Isaiah Stanton, Joseph Roop and Abraham Eves were the first officers. In 1857 the brick church was torn down and a sandstone one built at a cost of three thousand two hundred dollars. This building was dedicated by Rev. Mr. Hickman, of New Jersey. In 1884 the present edifice was erected at a cost of two thousand five hundred dollars. It is a two-story frame building and was dedicated in October, 1884, by Rev. Andrew Manship. The number of members at the time of the erection of the church building was thirty, but recent additions have increased the number to seventy-five communicants. The following is a list of the pastors who have ministered here:

Summit Methodist Episcopal Church.—Previous to 1876 the Methodists in the southern portion of this hundred held services in Boulden's Church, in St. George's Hundred. This was originally erected for the use of the Baptists, and it was through their kindness that other denominations were allowed to worship there. During 1874 and 1875 the building was in need of repair, and the Methodists endeavored to purchase it, with the intention of remodeling it. Their offer was refused and this led to the erection of the present edifice. The corner-stone was laid August 18, 1876, with appropriate ceremonies conducted by Bishop Scott. The building was completed in 1876, and dedication services were conducted in the morning by Bishop Scott, in the afternoon by Rev. George R. Bristor, and in the evening by Rev. J. H. Caldwell. It is a one-story frame building, sixty by thirty feet, with a capacity for seating four hundred persons and was erected at a cost of $5000. The membership at the erection of the church was one hundred, and is now sixty. Services are held every Sunday afternoon.

The officers of the church are as follows: Class-Leaders, T. W. McCracken and J. F. Kane; Trustees, T. W. McCracken, Wm. Cleaver, P. B. Alricha, L. Catts and J. F. Kane.

The Sunday-school in connection with the church is under the superintendence of Mr. S. T. Davis.

Manufactories.—On October 26, 1701, William James obtained a warrant for a tract of land containing 1390 acres, which were surveyed June 3, 1702. This land was purchased from the proprietors of the Welsh Tract and was part of the 30,000 acres of land granted to Davis, Evans and Willis. In 1707 execution was issued on a judgment against William James, and two hundred acres, on which had been erected in the interval since his purchase a grist and saw-mill, were seized and sold at public sale. Howel James, Esq., was the purchaser. He, by his will bearing date August 17, 1717, devised this tract to his son, Philip James. The mills were managed by Philip James, and on the 2d of December, 1725, he desired P I to be recorded as his brand mark. On May 10, 1787, he sold the mills and premises to John Jones, of Philadelphia, who four days afterwards conveyed them to Joseph Brown. Brown successfully operated the mills until the 20th of January, 1746, when he sold to Thomas Cooch, a native of England.

He made application to the February term of court in 1770 to have some land viewed and condemned for use of a grist-mill. The freeholders made a view and condemned six acres adjoining land on which Thomas Cooch's "present mill stands." In his application he states that the water, corn or grist-mill now wants rebuilding or altering and needs more water-rights.

The mills were operated until September, 1776, at which time they were burned by the British. In 1791 this property came into the hands of his grandson, William Cooch, and the following year a new grist-mill was erected by him. This mill was managed by William Cooch until his decease in 1838, when the property was inherited by his son, William Cooch, Jr. In this year a new location was selected and the present mill erected at a short distance from the old mill, which is still standing, but no longer used. In 1870 the mill tract became vested in the heirs of Levi G. Cooch, and in the following year they conveyed it to J. Wilkins and William Cooch. They are the present owners and proprietors, and trade under the style of Cooch Bros. The mill is a five-story brick building, fifty feet square. It is situated on the Christiana Creek and is run generally by water-power. In 1884 the building was remodeled and refitted with machinery. A boiler and engine were attached to be used when the water supply is insufficient.
NEW CASTLE COUNTY.

It is now a full roller-mill with a capacity of seventy-five barrels per day. Four men are required to operate it. Some of the flour is sold in this neighborhood, but the larger part is shipped to Wilmington and other points.

On the 18th of May, 1760, Hugh Muldrach sold to Alexander Porter a tract of land in Pencader. At this time there was no mention of a mill on this tract. Alexander Porter, by his will bearing date December 15, 1769, devised this land to his two sons, David and Samuel, as well as a grist-mill therein erected. The mill and eighty-two acres of land were sold by them, May 3, 1781, to Hugh Bolton, and Jacob Wirt, Jr. On July 31, 1789, Bolton purchased the half-part belonging to Jacob Wirt, Jr., and became sole owner. He, by his deed dated June 9th, sold this property to Morgan Jones and Robert Shields. After the death of Shields his undivided one-half part was sold by his executors, August 28, 1793, to Isaac Hersey, who conveyed the same to Morgan Jones, September 11, 1794. In 1799, Samuel Eccles purchased this property, and it continued in his possession until March 21, 1804, when it came into the possession of Joseph S. Gilbert, who, April 11th of the same year, sold it to Jonathan Shakespeare. On March 11th of the following year Shakespeare sold to Jesse Gilbert, who retained possession until April 2, 1845, when he sold to William McNamee. He was the owner until his death, and then it vested in his heirs, who conveyed it to Adam Dayett, the present owner, March 24, 1853. The building was remodeled in 1880, and again in 1886, at which time it was refitted with full roller machinery. The mill at present is a frame building, twenty-eight by fifty-four feet, and two and a half stories high. Three men are required to operate it. The capacity is thirty-six barrels of flour per day. Most of the flour and feed manufactured by this mill is consumed in the immediate vicinity. There is a cider-mill in connection with the grist-mill with a capacity of forty barrels per day. On the assessment list of 1823 mention is made of a nail-factory on James Snow's estate. When the factory was built, what its capacity was and how long it was managed have not been learned. Jacob Casho, of Newark, remembers fishing in the pool above the factory when a boy. The nail-factory has not been in use for the past sixty years.

The first authentic information obtained in regard to Batten's Mills is contained in a deed from John Janvier to William B. and George McCrone, dated March 5, 1839. In the recital of the title of the tract of land containing one hundred and twenty-nine and a half acres, with a grist-mill and a saw-mill thereon, it is mentioned as the same premises and mills that were conveyed by Kensey Johns to John and Thomas Janvier, April 5, 1812, and that afterwards Thomas Janvier conveyed his portion to John Janvier. These latter conveyances are not recorded. On the assessment roll of 1798, John Porter is mentioned as the owner of a mill. On the measures used in the mill is the brand-mark J. P., and as Kensey Johns purchased land of John Porter in 1799, it is fair to conclude that the mills were one and the same. The mills were next owned respectively by James A. Kendall, Edward Tatnall and William Kyle, the present owner. The mills derived their name from the Batten family, who have operated them for many years. The saw-mill was torn down in 1865. The grist-mill is a two-story building, fifty by twenty-five feet. The grinding is all done by stones and no flour is manufactured.

SAW-MILL.—A saw-mill was built on the Christiana Creek by William McConaughy in 1841. The mill is a frame building, eighteen by ninety feet, with a capacity of two thousand feet per day. For many years it was a merchant mill, and shipped large quantities of lumber. Eight men were employed in operating it. During the past five years timber has become scarce in this neighborhood, and the mill has only been used for custom-work. Mr. McConaughy is the present owner.

The Delaware Wagon-Works are located at Summit Bridge, and were opened in 1868 by A. P. Carnegy, the present owner. In addition to the manufacture of wagons, farming implements are also made and repaired. Four men are employed, and the capacity is a wagon per day, and from five thousand to seven thousand dollars' worth of agricultural implements per year. The products of the manufacture are disposed of in the vicinity.

ORE-PITS.—The finding of iron ore on Iron Hill undoubtedly attracted the early settlers to this neighborhood. The ore was mined in small quantities at a very early date, and quite extensively from 1725 to 1734, during which time the Abbington Iron-Works were managed. After the discontinuance of the iron-works the ore-pits came into the possession of Abel Davis, who, by his will, bearing date April 13, 1780, devised them to his heirs. In the course of descent they passed into the hands of Isaac Davis, who sold a tract of land on Iron Hill, containing ninety-four acres and embracing the pits, to David C. Wood, an iron-master of Philadelphia, October 28, 1841. They were worked by him for a number of years. In 1862, George P. Whitaker, the owner of Principio Furnace, became the possessor of this land. The ore was mined by him until December 25, 1884, since which time nothing has been done. Employment was given to about twenty men in mining and washing the ore, which was then shipped to Principio Furnace, Maryland. The property is part of the Geo. P. Whitaker estate, and contains an abundance of ore.

In 1873, William McConaughy opened an ore-pit on Chestnut Hill. He employed forty men, and had an output of twenty-five tons per day. The ore was washed and shipped principally to the Montgomery Iron-Works, Pennsylvania, and Wright & Cook, Montour, Pennsylvania. The failure of ore caused its abandonment in 1884.

VILLAGES.—Glasgow is a small hamlet situated near the centre of Pencader Hundred. It was formerly known as Aikentown, being so-called after Mathew Aiken, who, June 14, 1791, purchased from James Stewart a large brick house, store house and lot of ground at this place and kept a hotel. In 1803 a feeder for the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal was commenced near this village, but discontinued two years later. The village has no railroad communications and has increased slowly. At present there are two churches, a school-house, a post-office, two stores, kept respectively by George Boulden and Samuel Alrichs, a hotel, a blacksmith and wheelwright-shop, and about twenty-five residences.

Kirkwood is a small village in the southeastern part of this hundred. A portion of the hamlet also lies in Red Lion Hundred. It was originally called Kemp's Corner and afterwards St. George's Station. This name was changed in 1862 and the present one given in honor of Colonel Robert Kirkwood. At present there are here a passenger and freight depot of the Delaware Railroad; three stores, kept respectively by J. A. Benson, J. T. Cann and W. C. Carnagy, a hotel, a school-house, a blacksmith and wheelwright-shop, and about fifteen dwellings.

Summit Bridge is situated in this hundred south of the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal. It is near the boundary lines of Red Lion, St. George's and Pencader Hundreds. The village was so called on account of its proximity to the canal above mentioned, over which was constructed a very high bridge on the road leading to this place from Kirkwood. It contains a church, a post-office, the Delaware Wagon Works, two blacksmith-shops, a hotel, three stores, the proprietors of which are A. P. Alrichs and Harry Salmon, and about fifteen residences.

There are several hamlets in the hundred, at which there are post-offices and one or two dwellings, viz.: Cooch's Bridge and Porter's Station. The former is on land formerly owned by the Cooch family. The latter is on land purchased from Thomas Porter and also contains a store managed by Brown & Brother.

POST-OFFICES.—There are only four post-offices in this hundred, situated respectively at Glasgow, Cooch's Bridge, Porter's and Summit Bridge. Since Kirkwood has been treated in this chapter, the post-office at that place, though in Red Lion, will also be here considered. Information has not been obtained in regard to the date of the establishment of the offices at Glasgow and Cooch's Bridge, but the mails have been distributed here for many years. The postmasters remembered in connection with these officers are as follows: Glasgow, Robert T. Cann, William Alrichs, Miss Margaret Adair, Samuel Alrichs and George Boulden, the present incumbent; Cooch's Bridge, William Cooch, J. Wilkins Cooch and M. E. Cooch. The office at Porter's was established March 10, 1886, and W. S. Brown appointed postmaster, which position he still fills.

The office at Kirkwood was established May 11, 1881. J. A. Benson was appointed the first postmaster. He was succeeded by Charles Hares, Zachariah T. Hares and W. C. Carnagy, the present incumbent.

The post-office at Summit Bridge was established, April 20, 1825. Robert Keedy was the first postmaster. Since that time the following persons have served as postmasters; James Nicholson, R. W. Mulford, J. P. Eliason, A. P. Alrichs and Harry Salmon.

HOTELS.—The earliest hotel in this hundred concerning which any information has been ascertained is the one located at Glasgow. On June 14, 1791, James Stewart sold to Mathew Aiken a large brick house, a store-house and lot of ground known as Aiken Tavern, located on the east side of the road leading from Newark to Middletown. This lot adjoined the tract of land occupied by the Pencader Presbyterian Church. On May 22, 1797, a license was granted to Daniel Cooke to keep an inn, but whether he managed this hotel is not positively known. At a later period the hotel was torn down, and a new one erected on the other side of the road, nearly opposite the former site. This hotel has been owned and conducted by — Murray, James Bates, James Bates Jr., John Lemon and William H. Guthrie, the present proprietor, who purchased it in 1867.

The hotel at Kirkwood was opened in 1861 by J. A. Benson, by whom a license was procured in May of that year. He was succeeded respectively by William B. Ford, Charles Shears, Frank Richards and William E. Smith, the present proprietor. A livery stable is connected with the hotel.

The old "Buck" Tavern was situated in St. George's Hundred, on the upper King's Road. In 1797 Jacob Glinn was the proprietor. Previous to this the hotel was under the management of Dr. James Snow Patt for several years. The hotel was known at a very early date. The present hotel was built some years since. The present proprietor is Frederick Hagmeyer. This hotel is situated in Red Lion Hundred.

CHAPTER XLIX.

RED LION HUNDRED.

This hundred, the smallest in the State, is bounded on the north by a creek of the same name, on the south by St. George's Creek, on the east by the Delaware River and on the west by Pencader Hundred. The soil is rich and productive, and some of the finest farm-land in the State is to be found within its borders. In 1831, it is said, the first peach orchards in the State were introduced in this hundred, and they yielded abundantly for about thirty-five years, but since that time have been a failure, and are no longer planted. Much of the land is marsh, and requires embankments to prevent the river from overflowing, and ditches to drain it. Large parts of it were used in early times for grazing cattle. The village of St. George's extended partly in St. George's Hundred, and to remedy the inconveniences thereby occasioned, an act was passed for the extension of the boundaries of Red Lion Hundred, on March 1, 1876.

The territory thus added to this hundred is described as follows:

"The said enlargement or extension shall begin at a point on the Ches. & Del. canal, at the line dividing the lands of Jno. P. Hudson from the lands of Jno Robson; thence and with said division line in a southerly direction to the public road leading from Summit bridge to the town of St. George's; thence in a northeasterly direction with the middle line of said road to the road leading from Odessa to the said town of St. George's; thence crossing said road to the line of the lands of Mrs. Letitia How, being the northern boundary of the road dividing the lands of the said Letitia How from the lands of Mrs. Margaret A. Osborn; thence and with said line and road to the line dividing the lands of the said M. A. Osborn from the lands of Francis McWhorter and Brother thence with the line dividing said lands to Scott's run; thence down said run to the Ches. & Del. canal, and thence with said canal and with the original division lines of said hundreds to the place of beginning."

In 1661 Jacob Young, who was residing at Upland, eloped from that place with the wife of the Reverend Laurentius Laere, and went to Maryland and resided at or near Bohemia Manor. While there he obtained, by warrant and purchase, land in Red Lion and St. George's Hundreds. On the 5th of November, 1675, a warrant was granted to him by Governor Edward Andros for a tract of one thousand two hundred and eighty acres known as "St. George's Neck," situate on the north side of St. George's Creek and extending to Dragon's Run. By the death of Jacob Young the land vested in his two sons, Jacob and Joseph. They, by separate deeds, dated November 10, 1700, granted a portion of the estate to Charles Anderson and the remainder to John Cocks. Four hundred and thirty-seven acres of this was sold by Anderson and Cocks on July 20, 1708, to Joseph Neall. At the decease of John Cocks his land passed to his sons—Charles, John and Augustine Cocks. By partition and survey, made by George Deakynne, October 20, 1720, the estate was divided among the three sons, each receiving two hundred and thirty-four acres. Augustine's was the eastern part, Charles the middle and John the western part. John sold his two hundred and thirty-four acres June 24, 1729, to Francis Land. He died in June, 1731, and left some other land, westward of the above tract, to his wife, Rebecca, and his son, Gabriel Cocks. This large tract has, since the purchase of John Cocks, in 1700, been known as "Cocks Neck," a name still familiar to the residents of Red Lion Hundred. Augustine Cocks died soon after his father, and November 20, 1730, his executors sold his share to Jacob Gooding.

Lawrence Higgins, an Ulster Presbyterian from Belfast, was the first of his family to settle in America. He emigrated in 1750, and married a Miss Susan Wilson, of the Welsh emigration. Her family moved to Virginia shortly after her marriage, and further knowledge of them is lost. He died in 1789. His son, Jesse Higgins, was the executor of his will. He first owned a farm near Fort Penn, and afterward that now owned by John C. and Anthony Higgins, bordering upon the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal and the town of Delaware City. He is known to have been an ardent Whig in the War of the Revolution. He was resident agent for the purchase of supplies for the Continental army, and speedily exhausted both means and credit in his zeal for the cause of independence. His surviving family were four sons—Jesse, Anthony, Samuel, David—and a daughter who married one Armstrong, and went to Ohio.

Jesse first married a niece of George Read, the signer, a daughter of his brother. Their son, John Read Higgins, lived to the age of ten. Jesse Higgins early became a widower, and married Mary Witherspoon, daughter of Thomas Witherspoon, of Middle-town, who was treasurer of Drawyers Presbyterian Church in 1764, and upon the committee which built the present church, upon or near the site of an older one, in 1772. His uncle, David Witherspoon, was a member of the Council of Delaware in 1762. He was a native of Londonderry, in Ireland, and was a trustee of Drawyers Church in 1746. He died in 1769, leaving his nephew, Thomas, his heir.

Susan, the wife of Thomas Witherspoon, was the daughter of Dr. Sluyter Bouchelle, whose wife, Mary Ann Byard, was the sister of Peter, Samuel and James Byard, who were the sons of Samuel Byard, who settled on Bohemia Manor about A.D. 1700.

Samuel was the son of Peter Byard, the son of Nicholas Byard, whose wife, Anneke, was the sister of Governor Peter Stuyvesant, who, with her sons, accompanied him from Holland to New Amsterdam in 1647.

John M. U. Rodney has a French psalm-book which she brought with her, and which has descended in seven generations to him.

Dr. Sluyter Bouchelle was the son of Dr. Petrus Bouchelle, who was the son of Legede Bouchelle.

Dr. Petrus Bouchelle was the son-in-law and favorite heir of Petrus Sluyter, the leader of the Labadists, who settled on Bohemia Manor in 1684.

Jesse Higgins lived at Damascus, a mill-seat on the Dragon, one mile north of St. George's. He was a man of intellect and deep research, a logical and impressive public speaker, and probably the most influential man of his day of the laymen of the Jefferson Democrats. He was often invited to become a member of the bar, but in his settlement of Dr. Bouchelle's estate he had to bring and resist law-suits, and was thus involved in litigation. He conceived a strong antagonism to the profession of the law, believing that "an honest man could not be a good lawyer."

In pursuance of this feeling he wrote a pamphlet entitled "Samson against the Philistines," in which he sought to prove that arbitration could be properly, cheaply and effectively substituted for suits at law. The edition was promptly bought by the lawyers, as far as possible suppressed, and another was not issued. Its publication in the Aurora gave it a wider circulation. William Duane, the editor and publisher of the Aurora, was also the publisher of the pamphlet. As a vigorous and sincere expression of views it is not without interest now after the lapse of nearly a century. The following letter from Mr. Duane will better describe Jesse Higgins than any present testimony:

"WASHINGTON, Nov. 19th, 1804.

"To Mr. Jesse Higgins, St. George's, Delaware:

"Dear Sir,—My son has forwarded to me yours of the 28th of October.

"The pamphlet, you know, I proposed not to publish before the first week or fortnight of the meeting of our Legislature. Accordingly, I brought it with me to this place, where I can under my own eyes see it printed. The thirty-second page proof I read this morning and shall have the whole ready as proposed. In about ten days I shall begin to advertise it so as to prepare the minds of readers for its reception.

"You will have seen an essay in the Aurora signed 'More,' which I wrote for the same purpose to meet our legislators at their own homes before they set out to Lancaster.

"The lawyers of Penn, have agreed to run me down! so that it is now, who shall! And tho' the force is formidable, you must know, from times past, that I am not easily dismayed.

"I had a conversation with your excellent Rodney yesterday. He asked me who was the author of the essay signed 'More.' I did not tell him. He said there is an extraordinary man in our state; I am told he has sent several things on that subject to your paper; his name is Jesse Higgins. When you want any discussions on that subject apply to him, for, to my knowledge, he has been more than once more than a match for Bayard. . . . He spoke highly of you as a man of virtue and intellectual power and confessed that he believed your going into the legislature would produce a very serious change in the state. . . . In this place we will have nothing new beside what you have seen in the papers —the happy state of things under our general government—

"I am, with great esteem, yours,

"WM. DUANE."

But whatever may have been the "happy state of things" at Washington, the fight at home between Federalist and Democrat was a warm one, and from the above it appears that in those heated political controversies Jesse Higgins met from time to time, and was not warped by, the most brilliant Federalist of that era.

Old men described to the generation just gone the great meeting at Glasgow, when these men met in alternate speeches.

Jesse Higgins' daughter, Susan, married Henry Fromberger, and their daughter, Susan Maria, married Thomas M. Rodney, son of Caesar A. Rodney, and by this dometic tie further cemented the friendship of the previous generation.

A son of Jesse Higgins bearing his father's name became a midshipman in the navy. He was upon the "Essex" with Commodore Porter, and a diary now extant gives a history of his experience upon that historic ship.

The second prize taken by the "Essex" was an English vessel from Liverpool for New Brunswick. A George Pearce was appointed prize-master, and Jesse Higgins his next officer. They sailed for Boston, but were captured by the English sloop-of-war "Atalanta," and sent to St. John's, N. B.

They were placed upon the prison-ship for a few days only, were paroled, and permitted the liberty of the town within certain limits for a few months, and then paroled until exchanged. They were in all respects kindly treated during their stay at St. John's and on August 31, 1812, left for Boston, in a schooner which they had purchased for four hundred pounds. Quite a large American colony were included in this shipload.

Only six weeks later, October 20, 1812, Jesse Higgins, Jr., died of pneumonia, contracted during his voyages of a few months.

Anthony Higgins, second son of Lawrence, succeeded his father and became one of the foremost farmers of his time, leaving six hundred acres to his children. He was a man of great mental and physical energy, of iron will, yet genial and social in disposition. He had an unusually fine voice and musical talent. His Revolutionary and hunting songs were the delight of his generation, and some of them have been handed down to his descendants. He delighted in the music of hounds and made the chase a double factor in his life, as it gave him the exercise which his tendency to corpulence made a necessity. His hospitality was largely extended.

Anthony Higgins was twice married,—first to a Miss Rankin, of which marriage there was no issue. On March 22, 1792, he married Martha Witherspoon, the sister of the wife of his brother Jesse. Three sons,—John, Thomas Jefferson and Anthony Madison,—and a daughter, Harriet, survive their parents. John Higgins, the eldest, was born in 1794, and died in 1848. He married Ann Sawyer, daughter of Capt. Joseph Sawyer, of New Castle. They lived for twenty-five years at Fairview, built by his father and now occupied by his nephew, John C. Higgins. He was the father of the public schools of Delaware City, giving them unwearied attention, although himself childless. He was a colonel of militia, member of Legislature, always a patriotic and public-spirited citizen, and popular and beloved to a rare degree. His brother, Thomas J. Higgins, did not marry. He led a quiet, thoughtful life, was keenly alive to the political situation of State and nation, and was the only man who voted for Fremont in Red Lion Hundred in 1856. Their sister Harriet was long the relict of John DuShane Eves.

David Higgins, third son of Lawrence, left a son William, who married Elizabeth Reynolds, of Middletown, who has long survived her husband and lives with her children in Missouri.

Of the names mentioned in this sketch, Lawrence Higgins, Dr. Sluyter Bouchelle and Thomas Witherspoon are known to have suffered pecuniary loss in the cause of American Independence. Dr. Bouchelle was a trustee of the Forest Presbyterian Church, at Middletown, upon its erection in 1750. He left a large estate, principally in land, a part of which lies in Burke County, North Carolina. He removed thither and died there in 1796.

The first land purchased by Lawrence Higgins, the first settler, was on the lowest point of Cocks' Neck, bounded on the south by St. George's Creek, and on the north by Dragon Run, and afterwards the land now owned by John C. and Anthony Higgins. On this latter place he built a house which was standing in 1840 and bore the words "Our Grandfather's Log Cabin, a Whig of '76." It was soon after torn down.

Jesse Higgins, the eldest son of Lawrence Higgins, was born in 1763. Soon after arriving at manhood he purchased a farm adjoining his father's, and built a residence within three hundred yards of an old landing for vessels at the head of navigation on St. George's Creek. This landing was a great convenience to the people in this vicinity and afforded the only outlet for water conveyance to Brandywine Mills or Philadelphia for more than one hundred years previous to the permanent inclosure of St. George's Creek.

On the 19th of February, 1790, he purchased a grist-mill, brick mansion and a plantation of one hundred acres, which was known as "Damascus," and the place still retains the name. It was situated one and a half miles north of the town of St. George's and was sold by Sheriff Thomas Kean as the property of Jacob Cannon. The Cannons were a prominent family who came to this hundred in 1724. In November of that year Isaac Cannon purchased "Damascus" of Samuel Griffith, who purchased it October 16, 1719, when it was sold by Sheriff Rowland Fitzgerald as the property of Henry Hanson. After the death of Jesse Higgins "Damascus" passed into the hands of his son-in-law, Henry Fromberger. Shortly afterwards the dam broke and was never repaired. "Damascus" is now owned by Mrs. George H. Smith.

He subsequently purchased the paternal estate and devoted his time to farming and grazing, in some years selling as many as sixty head of cattle to the butchers of New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore. In 1822 he built a brick house within two hundred yards of the place where he was born, which, on account of its location, he called "Fairview." He died in 1832, leaving a widow and six children—three sons and three daughters. He devised legacies to his daughters and his estate to his sons, to be divided when the youngest should arrive at age. Anthony Madison Higgins, of Red Lion Hundred, a prominent citizen of Delaware in his day, was born November 22, 1809, on the place and near the spot where he died. This place is known as Fairview. His father, Anthony Higgins, and grandfather, Lawrence Higgins, had cultivated the same farm, and it is now owned and tilled by John C. Higgins, his eldest living son. For several generations the family has lived in Red Lion Hundred, not far from Delaware City.

The subject of this sketch, after preparatory course of instruction, first with Rev. Wilson, of Middle-town, then with the late John Bullock, of Wilmington, and subsequently at the Newark Academy, entered Jefferson College, at Cannonsburg, Pa., in 1829, and received his diploma from that institution in 1831. As a student and as a member of the Literary Society of his choice, he stood in the foremost rank, giving promise to his friends by his collegiate achievements of future eminence in some field of literature.

In those days railroads did not exist among the mountains of Pennsylvania. Living steeds were the main dependence for transportation of travelers and freight. Romantic interest and peril, in the more sparsely-peopled places, would therefore attend a journey at that time on the routes from Wilmington to Western Pennsylvania. In order to enjoy the scenery along the way and gratify his taste for natural enjoyments and equestrian exercise, Mr. Higgins, after graduating, in company with four college mates—Messrs. David D. Clark, of Cumberland County, Pa.; Maxwell Kennedy, of Lancaster County, Pa.; L. P. Bush, M.D., of Wilmington; and Hon. Addison May, now of West Chester, Pa., of whom the two last named were classmates—returned home on horseback. Each member of the party left his companions at the point on the route which was nearest to his own home. This agreeable journey from his alma mater was remembered and mentioned in after-years with genuine pleasure. His standing and activities in class and society, while at college, had led his acquaintances to suppose that after graduation he would devote himself to the profession of the law, but his rural environments and tastes controlled his choice and decided his career for the farm. Hence college life was to him but a more complete equipment and preparation for life as an agriculturalist. He gave his cultivated energies, both of mind and body, to the culture of his farm. He settled upon a place situated north and west of the village of St. George's, and almost adjoining his paternal estate. Here, for more than thirty years, he pursued actively his chosen vocation with signal ability and success. He then withdrew from the active labors of the farm, and for twenty years enjoyed the life of a retired country gentleman, at his home at Linden Hill. Much of this time he devoted to reading, in which he took great delight. He traversed a wide field of literature with a desire for knowledge that was apparently insatiable. In this domain, his acquisitions, on almost every subject of general interest, were large. On all matters of local and domestic interest he was an encyclopedia. These two decades of his life were notably happy years, yielding memorable pleasures both to him and his family and his friends. In these years the personal traits of Mr. Higgins, which pre-eminently constituted his individuality, were freely developed and plainly seen. Conspicuous among them was an unselfish, even self-sacrificing fairness towards others with whom he dealt. To observers he seemed to forget himself in his scrupulous care for the interests of others to an extent which made him appear in a transaction as more careful of their welfare than of his own. He was highly favored in his marriage relations. His wife was a woman of rare courage and force of character and was a potent factor in the successful life of her husband. Her death deprived him of his most efficient coadjutor and left a void that was never fully filled and a sorrow of no ordinary kind. Although capable as a writer to an unusual degree when he chose to use his pen, Mr. Higgins has left comparatively little to indicate his skill in this particular. He devoted himself so completely to his agricultural interests that he had but scant time or inclination to put his thoughts upon paper. The most that he did as a writer, upon subjects of general interest, was done for the Department of Agriculture at Washington City, for which he prepared, by request, several valuable communications on topics relating to the agricultural resources and industries of New Castle County. In the last two years of his life he was overshadowed by another deep grief, occasioned by the death of his eldest daughter, to whom he was devotedly attached, and who, after the death of her mother, had done what she could to supply her place. After this bereavement his health and comfort became so much impaired that he abandoned Linden Hill as a home, and spent his remaining days at the homes of his children.

Mr. Higgins was not one of the class of men who are content with inferior methods when better may be employed. He believed in going forward to the attainment of the best possible results. Hence, it is not surprising that he made the farm which he tilled advance from an inferior condition to the very front rank of handsome and productive rural estates. He was devoted heartily to his calling and labored in it intelligently and with assiduity. As an intelligent citizen he always took a lively interest in the public welfare. But he did not abandon his life-work to do so. In politics he was originally a Whig, later in life he was known as a Republican. He was always in earnest in whatever he did, having clear and decided convictions upon all questions which his duty required him to consider. Twice he took upon him the cares and responsibilities of public official position—once as a trustee of the poor of New Castle County, and once as a member of the State Legislature.

The latter position he held as the choice of the people in the stormy period of 1860, when his name was placed on the Lincoln-Bell fusion ticket. In the Legislature he did much by his consistent, intelligent, conscientious fidelity towards preserving his native State in the position which she had been the first to take in relation to the National Constitution. As public offices were not congenial to his tastes, he served but one term in any official position, and returned willingly to his agricultural pursuits when public duty permitted. Possibly the conspicuous candor and unsuspecting truthfulness of his character may, in part, explain his reluctance to engage in the competitions of political life. He was married, in 1833, to Sarah C. Corbit, a daughter of Pennell Corbit. His wife died on the 28th of February, 1871. Five children survived their father,—John C. Higgins, near Delaware City; Anthony Higgins, attorney-at-law of Wilmington; Thomas Higgins, a merchant of New York City; Pennell C. Higgins, a journalist of the same city; and Mary C., wife of Daniel Corbit, of Odessa. His oldest daughter, Martha, died in February, 1886, at Nassau, New Providence, Bahamas Islands, where she had been taken by her father for her health.

Mr. Higgins died July 29, 1887, and was buried in St. George's Cemetery, near the centre of the inclosure, in the family plot, and in full view of the beautiful home which he had established more than half a century before he died. He was an elder in the Presbyterian Church, and his obsequies were conducted according to the ceremonies of that denomination. Mrs. Higgins, his wife, (Sarah Clark Corbit,) was a granddaughter of Governor John Clark, son of Captain William Clark, whose valor was well proved at the head of his command in the Revolutionary Army. He led into the battle of Monmouth a company of seventy-five men, raised principally between Smyrna and Cantwell's Bridge. Forty-five of these brave men perished on the field. In a hand-to-hand conflict Captain Clark killed with his sword a British officer who had attacked him. The sword with which he had saved his life and vanquished his antagonist was long retained and highly valued among the heirlooms of the family, but was eventually stolen by some person who was supposed to have coveted its mountings.

Mr. Higgins is remembered as an intelligent, energetic farmer; a man of unswerving rectitude and purity; a generous friend, a patriotic citizen, an unusually well-informed Christian gentleman, interested in all his active years in every good work that he could personally aid, and always a warm advocate of every worthy enterprise. Such men do not die—they only pass to other spheres beyond.

"The human forms to primal dust return, Their deeds, perennial, live from age to age."

On February 2, 1788, during Jesse Higgins' first term in the Legislature, a supplementary act was passed for stopping St. George's Creek, and draining a quantity of marsh and cripplle on both sides of the creek, being about three thousand acres, situate in Red Lion and St. George's Hundreds, and for keeping the dykes and drains in good repair.

Henry Ward Pierce and Mathew Pearce were the owners of a portion of this tract. On the 18th day of April, 1796, they conveyed thirteen hundred and seventy-eight acres to Solomon Maxwell, William Guier and Adam Diehl, wealthy merchants of Philadelphia. In 1799, Maxwell sold his interest to Joseph Clark. While this tract was in their possession the hotel at St. Augustine Piers was erected and managed by them for more than twenty years. The marsh was inclosed and ditched and converted into pasture-land, on which numerous cattle were fattened, and found a ready market in New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore.

The tract was divided into three portions or farms and assigned by lot. Joseph Clark became the owner of the farm in St. George's Hundred; Adam Diehl drew the middle farm; and William Guier received the upper farm, which extended as far north as the present location of the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal. Clark's property was at a later period purchased by John Barney, and is now owned by Wm. S. Lawrence, of New Jersey. The William Guier farm is now owned by Arthur Coleburn, of Philadel-
NEW CASTLE COUNTY.

In 1828, Adam Diehl sold his farm to Captain George Maxwell, who, in 1843, conveyed it to J. J. Henry. John P. King was the next owner, and he sold it in October, 1861, to William Beck, the present owner, who came from England in 1848. St. George's marsh now comprises some of the finest farm-land in the State. On this tract, in 1831, the first peach orchards in the State were planted. The tidal wave in 1878 swept away the entire embankment and since that time $37,000 have been spent in rebuilding and repairing the barns and ditches along this marsh.

In 1872, for the better draining of this land, there was stationed on it a thirty-six-inch pump with a capacity of twenty-five thousand gallons per minute. It was operated by an eighty-five horse-power engine.

John Roll, of whom a more complete history is given elsewhere in the chapter on "Bench and Bar," in 1876, bought of William Currier and William Goldsmith a tract of six hundred acres, which was patented to them January 13, 1875. On June 27th of that year this land was surveyed to him, and an additional four hundred acres "which had been seated for several years with good stock and good improvements thereon." A patent was granted to him for these one thousand acres on the 8th of August, 1879.

This tract, known as "The Exchange," was situated on the Delaware River, south of Red Lion Creek, and extended to Dragon Swamp. It was adjacent to the "Reed Island" tract patented to Henry Ward. Articles of agreement for the sale of "The Exchange" were drawn up September 3, 1883, between John Roll and Gabriel Rappe, who was acting as agent for Daniel Duthy, a merchant of London. The terms of the contract were not complied with, and the land was awarded to John Roll by a board of arbitrators. On the 19th of March, John Roll sold this land to Hans Hanson, who, on July 7, 1885, took out a warrant for a tract of land called "Lowland," situate on the south side of Red Lion Creek, and containing four hundred and twenty-five acres of fast land and marsh. Below "Lowland" was a tract which at this time was owned by Lewis Davis, and afterwards easement was granted to Joseph Hanson, son of Hans. On December 25, 1701, it was surveyed to him in two tracts containing four hundred and three hundred acres respectively. At his death, Hans Hanson devised all of his property to his two sons, Peter and Joseph, who then owned nearly the entire northeastern portion of Red Lion Hundred. This land has passed through various hands and is now principally owned by the Reybolds and Clarkes.

A small stream called "Cedar Creek" flows through this tract, and in some parts the land is marshy. From an early date a bank has been necessary along the Delaware to prevent the river from overflowing the land in this vicinity. In 1784 the bank was in need of repair, and on February 5th of the following year an act of Assembly was passed enabling the owners of meadow marsh and crippler on Cedar Creek in Red Lion Hundred, and County of New Castle, to erect a new bank in part, and to keep the residue of the old bank, dams, sluices and flood-gates in repair. On February 5, 1811, a supplement to the act of 1785 was passed. By it Francis Haughhey, Benjamin Merritt, William Kennedy, Dr. David Stuart and Adam Deighl were appointed commissioners to go on Red Lion bank and view the situation, for the purpose of ascertaining whether it was advisable to repair the old bank, or build a new one on another site. Andrew Jamison, Peter Hanse and Thomas Marsh Foreman were appointed managers to superintend the repairing of the old bank, or the erection of a new one and the laying out of sluices.

The commissioners met at Red Lion Inn on April 30, 1811, and made their report. They recommended the erection of a bank to be five feet high, measuring from high-water mark, and sixteen feet wide at the base. They advised the building of a wharf forty rods long, and parallel to the bank, for the better protection of eighty perches of the most exposed portion of the bank. They also directed that forty rods of the bank be protected by piles arranged in rows at the base of the bank, and that a sluice ten feet wide and five feet deep, with flood-gates, be made where the old sluice was.

The suggestions of the commissioners met with approval, and the work was performed. At frequent intervals since that time the embankments have been rebuilt, and new sluices dug.

In 1701 Joseph Hanson sold a portion of his estate to John Boyer, who in 1703 conveyed it to Henry Packard (Flaker). At his death he devised his estate to his wife, with remainder to his children. On May 27, 1720, George Hadley leased two hundred acres of the heirs of Henry Packard. Hadley came from New York City, at which place he owned considerable property. He died at Dover while there attending to some business. He was reported as being immensely wealthy, and rumor said he had buried a large quantity of treasure before taking this trip. Numerous were the requests made by different persons, who claimed they had dreamed concerning this wealth and where it was located, for permission to examine certain places on the premises. According to tradition almost the entire farm was overturned in the search. It was never discovered, or, if so, was enjoyed in silence. By his will, bearing date December 28, 1782, he devised his estate to his wife, Mary, who the following year married John Clark. Clark was a mariner and surveyor and was the son of a captain of a boat that sailed between New Castle and New York. He purchased other land in this hundred and at the time of his decease owned four hundred and ninety-one acres, valued at £1359 2s. 6d. The estate was taken at the valuation by John, the eldest son, who died in 1791, and by his will devised one-half of his real estate to George, his eldest son, and a life estate in the other half to his wife, with remainder to George, who was to pay certain legacies to the other. children. William D., Levi H. and James C. Clark were sons of Major George Clark. He died December 5, 1888, and devised to his youngest son, Levi H. Clark, all of his real estate subject to the legacies of the other children. Levi H. sold some of the land, and March 28, 1863, conveyed the remainder to his brother, John C. Clark, who, July 28, 1865, granted it to his son, James H. Clark, the present owner. The Clerks of Red Lion Hundred are all descendants of the John Clark who married Mary Hadley, and are influential citizens of this hundred. The old homestead, except the kitchen, on the James H. Clark property was destroyed by fire on St. Patrick’s day, 1897. In 1875 William D. Clark erected a granite shaft near the old kitchen with the following inscription:

“John Clark.

The estate on which William D. Clark resided until his death was also a portion of the John Moll tract. In 1802 it was conveyed by Henry Ward Pierce to Joseph Holmes and Clayton Earl. On May 16, 1810, the executors of Joseph Holmes sold his one-half interest to Clayton Earl, who, June 9, 1819, conveyed it to Hugh Exton, whose executors granted it to William D. Clark March 15, 1837. The estate is now owned by the heirs of William D. Clark.

Peter Hanson, who was grandson of Hans and son of Joseph, and inherited half of his father’s estate, by will dated April 5, 1729, devised his property to his children, Hans, Magdalen, wife of Michael Butcher, Rachel, wife of Thomas Tobin, and John Hanson. Michael Butcher and Magdalen, his wife, conveyed their portion to Hans and John, and Patrick Porter purchased the share of Thomas Tobin and Rachel, his wife. The land was divided and the portion received by John descended to his two sons Nathaniel and John. On March 28, 1776, Nathaniel sold his land to Alexander Porter, whose daughter, Mary, married Thomas M. Foreman, and inherited portion of this land. On January 1, 1820 Philip Reybold purchased six hundred acres of Thomas M. Foreman.

Major Philip Reybold, of Delaware City, Red Lion Hundred, a man of more than ordinary physical vigor, and endowed with strong common sense and indomitable energy, was descended from Dutch ancestors, of whose history no record remains. He was born in Philadelphia, May 5, 1788. His father dressed sheep for the Philadelphia market, and from his only son, Philip, required and received, even in his childhood, such aid in his business as proved him to be a boy of remarkable capacity. Although but ten years old when his father died, he had an intelligent understanding of the situation in which his mother, his sister and himself had been left. With characteristic courage, foresight and energy, he struggled with the adversities that confronted him, and managed to obtain favor, employment and some compensation. Some time after his father’s death, his mother married Dr. Albertus Shilack, a physician of some means, in Philadelphia. She did not long survive her second marriage and left no additional children. Aided, no doubt, by the step-father, Philip continued to work at the business that he had learned, in its rudiments, with his father, and, in the absence of better facilities, he wheeled his dressed sheep to market on a hand-cart or wheel-barrow, and sold his meat to his customers. Thus he continued to work with increasing success until October 25, 1801, when, in his nineteenth year, he was married to Elizabeth Dilcart and laid the foundation of a home which was afterwards blessed with surprising prosperity. Major Reybold continued to acquire means by diligent attention to his occupation in Philadelphia until about 1810. At this time his family had been increased by the birth of his four eldest children. Having a decided taste for rural occupations, stock-raising, grazing and such pursuits, he thought about this time that he would do well for himself and his growing family by removing to the country and engaging in agriculture. Accordingly, after inquiry, he decided to remove to a farm in Red Lion Hundred, Delaware, which he purchased on equal shares with one Worknot, from Clayton Earle. The tract thus bargained for contained over one thousand acres, and included lands now embraced in the estate of the late William D. Clark, also in the property of George F. Brady, in Jefferson Clark’s estate, the Delaware City Cemetery, and in fields now belonging to many others. Such a venture on such a scale gives some idea of the courageous energy of the man. To realize what was invested and obtain additional profit demanded extraordinary skill and vigorous effort—perhaps more than his experience at that time prepared him to exhibit, though not more than he was capable of displaying under favorable circumstances. Fortunately or unfortunately, he was handicapped by his partner, Worknot. Whether the name had significance or not, his partner did not make his payments as promised, and as the result, the farm was lost to Messrs. Reybold and Worknot by a foreclosure of the mortgage held by Mr. Earle. Not discouraged, however, by this event, Mr. Reybold subsequently rented the same property from Mr.
Earle, and, unembarrassed by a partner, he embarked in the business of raising merino sheep.

By diligence and prudence his plans prospered, and Mr. Reibold gradually advanced in means and influence. To purchase the property that he had lost, through the failure of his partner, Mr. Reibold had sold his half-interest in the estate of his stepfather, which, after the death of his mother without additional heirs, had been left to him and his sister, their stepfather having died previously. Having lost all his own early savings and his patrimony, by the disastrous termination of the Workout partnership, the situation would have been discouraging to a faint heart. But to Major Reibold it afforded chiefly an incentive to greater effort; for his heart was not of the "faint" kind. Robust energy that knew not how to faint or fail and was determined not to learn to do either, was, more than in most men, his predominant characteristic. After a profitable experience in raising merino sheep, Mr. Reibold rented what was known as the Newbold property, on part of which Delaware City now stands. On this farm he gave attention to raising and presssing castor beans for oil. The making and sale of castor oil proved so profitable that from what it and his other farming operations produced, he was able, in 1819, to purchase the Marsh Mount property, upon which, in 1820, he finished building the large and commodious mansion, in which he resided for more than a quarter of a century, and which is now occupied by his son, William. After removal to Marsh Mount farm, of which eighty acres was woodland, he gave the most particular attention to the improvement of it. Here, besides maintaining all the ordinary work of a cereal farm, he raised choice stock and conducted the culture of castor beans on a large scale. He had over four hundred acres under complete cultivation, of which he devoted fifty or sixty acres to beans for oil. The product of these acres was exceedingly profitable. Major Reibold, so far as is known, was the first castor-oil producer who used the cold pressure and put the famous cold-expressed castor oil in the market.

While engaged in these industries, the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal was projected. Mr. Reibold and John C. Clark entered into a contract with the canal company to build that part of the canal which lies between Delaware City and St. Georges. This section offered to contractors the greatest difficulties to be encountered along the entire line, as much of it lay through heavy marsh land. The company had tried in vain to obtain a suitable person to supervise the work on this section. It required a man who could successfully control rough and reckless workmen, as well as know what they must do. Mr. Reibold had the necessary qualifications. He was sagacious, prompt and physically large and strong. He exceeded six feet in height, and was well proportioned. He succeeded to that part of the work of which John Randel had been in charge, and remained on it until the canal was finished. While carrying on his part of the excavation and construction, he also contracted to supply meat and bread to the men on the entire line, from Delaware City to Chesapeake City, and filled the contract successfully. The magnitude of this undertaking is more easily imagined than described; but the difficulties were all surmounted and satisfactorily overcome. After the completion of the canal, he gave attention to the manufacture of brick, and carried it on upon an extensive scale. He supplied, under contracts, the brick for buildings erected by Girard & Ridgeway, of Philadelphia; also for the almshouse of that county on the west side of the Schuylkill. Many of his brick were sent to New York, as he was able, because of superior facilities for their manufacture, to supply them at cheaper rates. His transactions in this industry reached up in value to millions of dollars. He was also largely engaged in peach culture, being personally interested and occupied in it, more or less, from 1835 to about 1850. Although a very busy man through all these years, he found time between 1840 and 1845 to erect a new house for his residence at a place about a mile from Marsh Mount. To this new home he gave the name of Lexington, at the suggestion and in honor of Henry Clay, whom he greatly admired and who visited him here, in company with Hon. John M. Clayton and other prominent public men. Mr. Reibold had removed from Marsh Mount to the Lexington country seat in December, 1846, and his distinguished visitors, just mentioned, came to see his large, productive peach orchards in August, 1847. Their visit gave him great pleasure.

Mr. Reibold was, without doubt, a masterful man, full of energy and resources. That he was a man of no ordinary mould may be judged from his portrait, as well as from his achievements. His face and figure will suggest to an observer of the oil-painting, which preserves his features, a by no means remote resemblance to Washington. In enterprise he was nothing small. He was gigantic. It enlarges one's conceptions of things merely to recite his undertakings and remember the disadvantages under which he labored, both in his individual deficiencies of equipment in early life and in the absence of mechanical facilities, which since his day have become so abundant. But as a strong man who delights to run a race, those things which might discourage less energetic persons seemed to be stimulating incentives to him, and he literally strode through and over stupendous obstacles with a sort of Herculean vigor. There are such men, and he was one of them. It is willingly conceded by those who knew him, that he was the leading pioneer in improvements of a practical kind in the neighborhood where he lived. In these he was equally fertile and skillful both on the land and the water. Canal, river, bay, boats, barges, wagons, cars, farms, fruits, grains, herds, flocks and people all felt the force of his genius and the value of his directing skill. And the evidences of his efficient labor remain and are apparent still, both on the land and waters of the State of Delaware.

After removing from Marsh Mount to his new country-seat at Lexington, the infirmities of age began to be felt, and he withdrew more and more from active life. He felt a desire and need for rest. He was blessed with a true wife, who was also a faithful mother. She was a true and efficient helpmeet, and contributed largely to her husband’s success. She died in August, 1852. Both his wife and he were members of the St. George’s Presbyterian Church, of which at the time Rev. Mr. Howe was pastor. They raised a family of twelve children. Of these three sons survive (1887). They are William and Barney Rebold, of Red Lion Hundred, and Anthony Rebold, of Wilmington. The Major died February 28, 1854, leaving behind him the memory and proofs of a life that abounded with energy, skill and usefulness.

In the foregoing sketch it has been impossible to do more than give the most condensed account of this busy, enterprising man. The half has not been told. And he was never concerned so much about what might be said of him as he was about the work that he had in hand. To this he gave himself with unreserved energy, preferring that his works should be his record and his monument.

Patrick Porter also purchased one hundred and eighty acres of land sold by Sheriff Duff as the property of Thomas Dunn in 1765. On this property there was an old fulling mill. At his death, Patrick Porter devised his estate to his son David, who died without issue. The property then passed into the hands of his two sisters, Mary and Janet. Mary married Whitehead Jones and had two children, John and Mary. On this farm there was a saw-mill operated for several years by Whitehead Jones. The land was next vested in Purnel Veach. After passing through several hands it is now owned by James Gray. Samuel McCall also owns a portion of the Porter land.

Henry Vanderberg was the owner of considerable land in Red Lion Hundred. On October 1683, a warrant was granted to him for six hundred and four hundred acres, called New Utrect, situate on the north side of main branch of St. George’s Creek, “above ye bridge adjoining Dragon Swamp.” A tract of four hundred and forty acres patented the 30th of the fifth month, 1684, to John Harins was assigned to him by Harins. On June 4, 1696, he sold this tract to John Donaldson. On November 17 of the same year he sold four hundred acres at St. George’s Creek to Richard Aaken.

Schools.—Among the private schools in the hundreds previous to the adoption of the public-school system, the Randall Hall and Franklin schools were well known. The Randall Hall school was situated about a mile and a half from Delaware City, and was attended by pupils from that town. The Franklin school-house was built in 1829, by Major George Clark and Major Philip Rebold, of bricks manufactured by Major Rebold on his farm. Frank Brint was one of the earliest teachers. The adoption of the free-school system was the cause of considerable complaint by some of the citizens. The necessary school buildings were erected, however, and school opened in them for all classes. This system has gradually improved and is now highly valued. At present there are several school houses in the hundred, and instructions given to a large number of pupils.

The three schools for colored children have enrolled one hundred and ninety-nine pupils, and an average attendance of one hundred and thirty-eight.

INDUSTRIES.—With the exception of the creamery and canning factory there are no industries in this hundred. On August 21, 1732, Samuel Clements purchased a lot in Red Lion Hundred, on the north side of St. George's branch, containing one acre and thirty-two perches, also a part of the land on which "Hugh Watson now dwells, and which may hereafter be overflowed by a mill-pond, intended to be made by Clement." If there was a mill erected it was in existence but a short time, as no mention is made of it afterwards. The mill at St. George's was undoubtedly the first industry in the hundred, and was last conducted by Enoch Thomas, in 1832. On the assessment list of 1804 there are three mills, owned respectively by Enoch Thomas, Jesse Higgins and Whitehead Jones. Jesse Higgins owned the "Damascus" mill seat, and the mill was run only a short time after his death. The Whitehead Jones saw-mill was a small affair on the property now owned by James Gray, and has not been in operation for many years. In 1888 Dr. James M. Sutton built a mill which was used as a saw-mill and afterwards converted into a mill for grinding plaster and feed. It has not been in use for some years. Smoking-tobacco was prepared by Sutton and Harvey, Harvey and McWhorter (successors to Sutton and Harvey), and finally by John P. Belville, from 1869 till 1873 in St. Georges. The factory had a capacity of one thousand pounds per day, and gave employment to ten persons. There was another grist-mill in the town of St. Georges, erected in 1838 by William Hudson, and afterwards owned by George W. Townsend. This was operated for a few years and then discontinued. It is now used as a wheelwright shop. Bricks were manufactured by Major Philip Reynold from 1820 until 1832. About two and a half million were shipped annually to Philadelphia; some were used in building the Blockley almshouse, and others were purchased by Stephen Girard.

On April 4, 1887, a creamery was opened by Webb Brothers, about two miles from Delaware City, on the farm of Theodore F. Clark. The Devel system of separating the cream from the milk by centrifugal force was adopted and has since been used. The capacity of the creamery is about one thousand pounds per day, but only one hundred and fifty pounds are made, on account of the inability to get milk for more. The butter is all shipped to Philadelphia.

On April 4, 1888, the St. George's Fruit Packing Company was incorporated with the following members: James Garman, Mark H. Pierce, Geo. W. Simpler, John C. Stuckert, Joseph Heisel, Alfred Hudson, John P. Hudson, Jr., Clayton M. Riley and W. S. Smith. The canning establishment was erected the same year on Main Street, on the south side of the canal. The main building is forty by sixty feet and the packing house is a one-story frame forty by eighty. Tomatoes are canned principally, and during a season 20,000 cases are packed. Employment is given to one hundred and twenty-five persons for two months of the year. The company manufactures its own cans and employs ten men at this work for nine months each year. Contracts are made this year for the tomatoes grown on one hundred and fifty acres. New York and Philadelphia are the markets for the goods packed in this locality. The present officers are, president, Jas. Garman; vice-president, A. L. Hudson; secretary, Geo. W. Simpler; treasurer, J. C. Stuckert.

TOWN OF ST. GEORGE'S.—Quinquennial is supposed to be the original name of St. George's and of the Welsh congregation there. When the first settlement was made here and how long it was called Quinquennium is not known. In 1730 the streets were laid out as they are to-day, and lots were owned by John Gill, Thomas Griffith (cooper), Jacob Van Bebber and others. Van Bebber purchased a lot eighteen and one-half by thirty-five feet, of William Parker, of Philadelphia, on May 25th of the year above mentioned. In 1742 he inherited considerable land in St. Georges Hundred from his mother, Harmonia Van Bebber, who was the daughter of Adam Peter-on. In 1735 he was the proprietor of the hotel in the village, but shortly afterwards sold it to Gabriel Cox. On Aug. 17, 1737, Cox sold the hotel and four acres of land on the main road to John McCoole. After the death of Gabriel Cox, which occurred in a short time after the death of Magdalene Cox married John Gill. In April 1742 she conveyed a lot of land to the Presbyterians, and in May sold sixty-one acres adjoining the meeting-house lot to David Howell. The old mill-dam and the mill in St. Georges was built long before 1730, by whom it is not known. It was the nucleus of the present town. In 1749 it was owned by David Thomas and afterwards, by his son Enoch and grandson Nathan, of whom it was purchased by the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal and removed. The mill-race is still in existence.

John Sutton came from England and settled at St. Georges at an early date. In 1743 he married Jane Allen and had six children. John, his son, was the father of Dr. James Sutton who was a prominent physician and citizen. The family is represented at St. George's by A. N. Sutton, the son of James. The house in which he resides is one of the oldest in the town.

John Watson was a surveyor appointed by Pennsylvania to assist in making a survey of the state lines between Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Delaware. In a diary of a trip from New Castle to Cape Henlopen, made in the year 1763, is the following entry: "Had occasion to spend a night at a tavern in St. Georges and the mill-dam at that place was the resort of large flocks of water fowl."

In 1762 David Thomas sold to William Robinson a lot in St. Georges which he had purchased of Andrew Jubart, Nov. 18, 1759. In 1762 the "King's Highway" passing through St. Georges was laid out. The village gradually increased in size and February 7, 1825, it was incorporated as a town. George Clark, Philip Reybold, William Guier, John Randall and Jacob Vandenegrift were appointed commissioners and directed to take with them a skillful surveyor, make a survey of the town, fix the limits and boundaries and lay out, open and regulate the streets. The opening of the canal in 1829 has afforded the inhabitants of St. Georges facilities for shipping since that time. On March 1, 1877, an act was passed for the re-incorporation of the town. James Garman, D. B. Stewart, A. D. Taylor, J. V. Clark, A. N. Sutton and J. B. How were appointed and constituted a town council and directed to lay out the town. With the assistance of G. W. Townsend, surveyor, the town was laid out as follows.

"Beginning at a Stone in the centre of the road leading from St. Georges to Odessa and running thence through the lands of the late James C. Gow, South 62°, East 279.5 chains; thence continuing thourgh said how's land to F. S. McWhorter, North 40°5', East 19.34 chains to a corner in a hedge, a corner for Eliz Hedges and F. S. McWhorter; thence with their land North 29°4', West 2.70 chains north 34°2'; West crossing the canal 14.73 chains to a ditch in the marsh of H. E. Beckard, died; thence with said ditch North 28 West 10.81 chains to a stone wall at a bridge in the road leading from St. Georges to Delaware City; thence through lands of S. B. Sutton North 35°; West 20 chains to lands of A. M. Higgins; thence across the lands of said Higgins North 77°5', West 5.74 chains to the side of the road leading from St. Georges to the Red Lion; thence crossing said road & continuing through lands of said Higgins & crossing the road leading from St. Georges to Kirkwood South 54°3', West 17.90 chains to a Locust tree at the end of a stone wall in a line of W. J. Hurlock, died; thence through lands of said Hurlock & crossing the canal South 22 East 45.40 chains to a point in the lands of said How & at the edge of canal; thence through lands of said How 79°3', East 8.90 chains to the place of beginning."

Since its re-incorporation considerable attention has been paid to its improvement with gratifying results. The town is nicely located and has good facilities for shipping by the canal. The railroad is two miles distant. The population is about five hundred. The merchants of the town are Bentz & Stewart, Pierce & Simpler, A. N. Sutton, H. Hamilton, E. W. Jester, Mrs. W. S. Smith, J. W. Perkins, D. W. Cush, John H. Stewart, D. Adams, J. S. Stuckert, D. B. Stewart.

The following are the Town Council since the re-incorporation:

1878. — James Garman (president), D. B. Stewart, B. D. Longland, A. D. Taylor, I. V. Clark, A. N. Sutton.
1882. — James Garman (president), Frank Shonk, W. A. Reutter, Joseph Hise, A. N. Sutton, Dr. I. S. Vallandigham.

In 1885 three members of the Council were elected for two years and three for one year, and thereafter, the term of the Council was two years. The following were elected:

One year:- Dr. J. W. De Witt (president), Joseph Heisel, D. B. Stewart, two years— W. H. Bentz, M. H. Pierce, A. Reutter.
1886.— Dr. J. W. De Witt (president), D. B. Stewart, Joseph Heisel.
1887.— William H. Bentz, George W. Townsend, J. W. Perkins.

SCHOOL.—On March 24, 1804, Enoch Thomas conveyed to John Sutton and Jesse Higgins, trustees of St. George's School, a "lot of land whereon stands the St. George's school-house, now under the direction of James Townsend, preceptor." This was situated on the road leading from St. George's to the Presbyterian Church. The school-house referred to was a small brick building built a few years previous by John Sutton, Jesse Higgins and Anthony Higgins. On the 19th of October, 1830, this school-house and lot were sold to John Higgins, Elihu Jefferson and Daniel Newbold, public school commissioners. School was opened on the 21st of the same month by Alexander Cooper. Wm. D. Clark, Levi H. Clark and George Z. Tybout were pupils at this time. In 1842 the present school-house was built on same site by Dr. Sutton and Anthony M. Higgins, who constituted a building committee.

Private schools have also been taught by Mrs. Youngman, Miss Belville and Mrs. Tilden. The school is divided into two departments, and has two teachers. Miss Hettie E. Wilson is principal. A new building will soon be erected at a cost of two thousand and five hundred dollars. In the last year there were seventy-seven pupils registered.

Dr. J. W. DeWitt, John W. Carrow, Sr., and Wm. H. Bentz are the present school commissioners.

RELIGIOUS.—St. George's Presbyterian Church.—

The exact date of the organization of a Presbyterian Church at St. George's is a matter of uncertainty. It is contended by the members of the church that it was founded in 1698, this date being obtained from a rafter in the roof of the old church. Another version is that the congregation sprang from the Drawyers Church in 1742. Dr. Read who was pastor of St. George's Church in 1768, in a history of these churches says "About the year 1742, the Drawyers Church divided. The party that withdrew, being called the New Side, were formed into a society, and erected a meeting-house about six miles north-east of Drawyers meeting-house, and formed a large and respectable congregation, denominated St. George's congregation, and very shortly after invited a Mr. Robinson to be their minister. Rev. George Foot in an address on "The Drawyers congregation with all the churches since organized on its original territory," delivered May 10, 1842, very strongly advocates the latter opinion. The former is maintained by Rev. Jas. C. How, who was pastor from 1831 until 1858, and during that time carefully prepared a written history of this church. He states also that Rev. Henry Hook was pastor in 1722, in connection with the Appoquinimink Church. But abandoning conjectures, and dealing with certainties, it is a matter of record that Magdalen Cox, widow of Gabriel Cox, on the 23d of
NEW CASTLE COUNTY.

April, 1742, conveyed to Isaac Cannon, Samuel Clement, James Craig, John Dod, Peter Anderson, Valentine Duhan, Isaac Duhan and David Howell in the name of the congregation of St. George's, and the subscribers towards the erection of a meeting-house, a tract of ninety-seven perches, beginning on Kings road at a corner of land of James Anderson and Jacob Van Bebber. It was granted to them, "to the above and only use (as a house of worship), of such Presbyterian ministers as the majority of said congregation shall call as their minister from time to time." A brick church was built shortly afterwards on this lot, and in 1748, Rev. William Robinson was called to this charge. Rev. Robinson, was the son of a wealthy London Quaker, and officiated here until his death, which occurred three years later. Rev. Samuel Davies, who was born in this vicinity, and at a later period, president of Princeton College, was the next pastor. He was succeeded by Rev. John Rogers, who was installed, March 16, 1749. At this time it was known as the "Brick Meeting House of St. George's." In 1765 he was called to be pastor of Wall Street Church in New York city. He was also the moderator of the first General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States. During his ministry here he built an addition to the front of the church. His wife, the daughter of Col. Peter Bayard, died in 1763, and her remains were placed under a slab in the centre aisle, in front of the pulpit. In 1776, Rev. Elisha Seuer was called, and he remained four years. He was succeeded by Rev. Thomas Smyth, during whose pastorate, St. George's and Middletown became separate charges. Rev. Mr. Smyth remained with the Middletown branch, and St. George's was vacant until 1781. Rev. Daniel Jones then took charge and ministered one year, when he was succeeded by Rev. Jno. Burton, who continued until 1794. In 1787 the trustees were: John Thompson, Christopher Vandergrift, J. Monro, Anthony Duhan and John Hyatt. Christopher Vandergrift, William McKennan, Charles Jones, Nathaniel Kerr, Samuel Eccles, Isaac Cannon, William Whan and Joseph Rhodes, were elders in 1798. On May 9, 1798, Peter Hyatt and Ebenezzer Bothwell were elected elders. Leonard Vandergrift and William Stewart were chosen elders May 5, 1802. On September 1, 1797, Rev. John Collins was installed as pastor of this church. At a meeting of the session held January 9, 1798, the following agreement was made:

"The session considering the wickedness and immorality arising from the use of strong drink at Funerals, and lamenting the prevalence and strength of this custom, do hereby agree and solemnly bind themselves to each other as a Christian Society that they will, in no case, use strong drink at Funerals in their families, and further they agree that they will use their influence, as far as they prudently may, to dissuade their friends and connections from the use of liquors in all such cases."

Rev. Mr. Collins officiated until his death, which occurred in 1804. In 1808 Rev. Samuel Bell was elected pastor, and he continued until 1830. He was succeeded by Rev. James C. How, who was installed in November, 1830. At this time the elders were John Sutton, John C. Clark, Levi Clark, John Mc-Coy and Thomas Bird. In 1844, during the pastorate of Rev. Mr. How, a lot was procured in St. George's, and the erection of a church commenced. The new brick edifice was completed, and dedicated July 27, 1845, and since that time services have been conducted in this building. John Sutton, John C. Clark, Robert Ochelsree 'and John McWhorter, were the elders at this time. Rev. Mr. How was pastor until his decease, August 13, 1855. Since that time the pulpit has been filled successively by Revs. D. H. Emerson, David J. Beale, Justus T. Unsted, Henry Rumner and Chas. A. Walker. In 1856 a new parsonage was erected, by the side of the church, at a cost of three thousand one hundred and fifty dollars.

A Sunday-school of sixty pupils, under the superintendence of Theodore F. Clark, is held in connection with the church. The scholars have the use of a small, but well selected library.

The Episcopal Church at St. George's—The history of this church is shrouded in obscurity. When the church was founded, and at what date it was abandoned as a place of worship, are unknown. The congregation was Welsh, and was organized previous to 1707. Rev. Evan Evans, in a letter from London in that year, says: "There is a Welsh settlement between Apoquinnim and New Castle, to which the Rev. Mr. George Ross has preached frequently in the English tongue since his arrival; but that gentleman not understanding their native language, is not so capable to answer the end as the Rev. Mr. Jenkins would be, who is going missionary to Apoquinnim, who has a competent knowledge of the Welsh tongue." The church stood on a spot afterwards used as a limekiln, near the locks of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal, and occupied a portion of the twenty-five acres granted to the congregation by Penn. In the memory of no one living were services held here. In 1825 the canal was dug, and it passed through the cemetery, and several bodies were exhumed. At that time there were several tombstones standing, but they have since been destroyed, and with them have passed away all traces of this church and congregation.

The St. George's Methodist Episcopal Church was erected in 1852. Previous to that time the nearest Methodist Episcopal church was Asbury, about four miles distant. In 1846 an effort was made to erect a church in St. George's, meetings being held in the mean time in the school-house. A subscription was started and land purchased in that year, but nothing definite was accomplished until about five years later, under the pastorate of Rev. Elon J. Way and James Brindle. Plans were prepared and a building committee was appointed composed of the following persons, who were also the first trustees: George W.
Townsend, Samuel Boggs, Steven LeCates, Isaac Morris, E. M. Richardson and J. H. Calder. The present brick structure, thirty-eight by fifty feet, was then built at a cost of three thousand dollars. A Sunday-school was at once organized with J. H. Clark as superintendent. He retained the position for two years and was succeeded by J. H. Calder, who was superintendent for twenty years. The present superintendent is George McKee, and the membership is over a hundred.

In 1880 a large and comfortable parsonage was built by the congregation of this church. The church building was repaired in 1883 at a cost of one thousand seven hundred dollars.

The present membership of the church is one hundred. When the church was built there were eight saloons and drinking places in the town, now there are none. The last one, through the vigorous efforts of the pastor, Rev. Layfield, was closed in 1885, and since then the town has enjoyed local option.

POST-OFFICE.—When the first post-master was appointed at St. George's has not been learned, but it was at a very early date. In 1820 the post-office was in charge of Dr. James M. Sutton. The mail was brought by the stage running from Wilmington to Dover. After his decease, his widow took charge of the office for a short time and was succeeded by Webb, Robert W. Tawresy and E. W. Jester were the next post-masters. A. N. Sutton, the present incumbent, received his appointment in 1885.

THE ST. GEORGE'S LIBRARY ASSOCIATION was organized in the town of St. George's on the 23d of January, 1872. In March of the following year it was incorporated in General Assembly, with Anthony M. Higgins, I. S. Vallandigham, M. D., William H. Newton, Albert G. Osborne, Captain Charles Corbit, Theodore F. Clark, Daniel B. Stewart, Thomas J. Craven, Eli Biddle, James Garman, Andrew D. D. Taylor, John P. Belville, and others, as incorporators of the St. George's Library Association, for the term of twenty years, from the passing of this Act, and no longer.

The first officers of the association were: President, I. S. Vallandigham, M. D.; Vice-President, Captain Charles Corbit; Secretary, William H. Newton; Treasurer, D. B. Stewart; Librarian, Frank Belville; Executive Committee, J. P. Belville, T. J. Craven, Captain Charles Corbit, D. B. Stewart, A. D. D. Taylor, J. F. Reynold, I. S. Vallandigham, M. D., William H. Newton, F. S. McWhorter.

There are four classes of members, viz.; active, life, perpetual and honorary. In 1874 the library contained three hundred and nineteen volumes. This number has been increased by the addition of standard works, and at present there are one thousand volumes.

The present membership is twenty-five. The association has been of great value to the inhabitants of the town, and deserves a better support. It is offered at present as follows: President, Charles Corbit; Vice-President, I. S. Vallandigham, M. D.; Secretary, J. F. Reynold; Treasurer and Librarian, A. D. D. Taylor; Executive Committee, D. B. Stewart, J. C. Stuckert, F. S. McWhorter, James McMullen, William H. Bentz.

ST. GEORGE'S CEMETARY COMPANY.—On March 8, 1871, it was enacted by the Legislature of Delaware "that William J. Hurlock, Ell Biddle, George Maxwell, Curtis B. Ellison, Anthony M. Higgins, Albert O. Newton, Thomas W. Belville, James M. Vandergrift, William Reynold, Thomas Clark, Thomas Craven, George Z. Tybout, William D. Clark, John P. Belville and Francis S. McWhorter, and all who now are, or may hereafter become, owners or possessors of burial lots in any ground that may thus be obtained by purchase or otherwise, be and they are hereby constituted a corporation by the name of the St. George's Cemetery Company of Red Lion Hundred."

The object of the association was to procure the burying-ground connected with the Presbyterian Church, join to it additional land and lay the whole out in plots. In the same year in which they were incorporated they obtained from the trustees of the Presbyterian Church a grant for the burying-ground. They also purchased two acres of William J. Hurlock, which gives the present cemetery a contents of five acres. The first officers elected by the company were as follows: President, George Z. Tybout; Secretary and Superintendent, John P. Belville; Treasurer, Barney Reynold; Directors, Curtis B. Ellison, Anthony M. Higgins, James M. Vandergrift, William Reynold, George Z. Tybout, Thomas J. Craven, George Clark, Arthur Colburn, William D. Clark.

The ground was carefully and skilfully laid out and has since been attended in an excellent manner.

The present officers are: President, George Z. Tybout; Secretary and Superintendent, A. D. D. Taylor; Treasurer, E. C. Reynold; Directors, James M. Vandergrift, Joseph Cleaver, William Reynold, Dr. L. F. Ellison, J. F. Reynold, Barney Reynold, Jno. C. Higgins, Geo. Z. Tybout and George W. Townsend.

In this cemetery are buried many of the old settlers and from the tombstones we have taken the following names.

HOTELS.—At the present time there is not a hotel in Red Lion Hundred outside of Delaware City. As early as 1735, there was a hotel at St. Georges kept by Jacob Van Beber, and a little later period by Gabriel Cox and John McCoole. The Booths were proprietors of the hotel as early as 1800. In 1830, a hotel was opened by Dr. James M. Sutton. Another hotel was opened about ten years ago. These passed through the hands of several owners and proprietors and were in the possession of Mrs. Gam and Thomas Guessford, when the licenses were revoked in 1885. They then refused to accommodate the public, and since then there have been no hotels in the hundred.

NATIONAL LODGE No. 32, I. O. O. F., was instituted at the town of St. Georges, on May 5, 1865.
The charter members were, Charles H. McWhorter, George H. Hamlin, Edward R. Wright, James T. Pont, Charles Seiter, James N. Forman, Samuel R. Lawson and James W. Jester. DELWARE CITY.

On November 5, 1875, Governor Edward Andros granted a warrant to Henry Ward for a tract of land lying between Dragon Creek and St. George's Creek known as "Reedon's Point." The warrant called for four hundred and sixty acres, but on survey there were found to be two thousand acres included within its boundaries. Henry Ward was chosen one of the justices of the peace in September, 1876, and he served until 1879. After his decease the property vested in his son Henry, who, by his will bearing date April 13, 1738, devised his estate to his daughter Margaret, who married Benjamin Pierce. As a result of this marriage two sons, Henry Ward and William, were born. William died without issue and the entire estate vested in his brother, Henry Ward Pierce. On September 14, 1789, he sold sixteen hundred acres of this tract to Mathew Pearce, of Philadelphia. On March 25, 1801, Henry Ward Pierce and Mathew Pearce united in conveying this tract of land to John and Barzina Newbold, capitalists of New Jersey.

The portion of this tract which is included within the present limits of Delaware City, by deed of partition, became vested in John Newbold. The adjoining land on the south side of the canal became the property of Daniel. The commencement of the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal impressed upon the Newbolds the importance of the location of their property, and suggested the laying out of a town. In 1826, Daniel and William, the sons of John, each drew a plan of the town they intended to found, and which they named "Delaware City." For a short time previous to this it was known as "Newbold's Landing" and was so called on account of there being a landing-place where the present coal wharf stands. These plans differed somewhat, but not materially, the main difference consisting in the naming of the streets. Both plans included land on both sides of the canal and the intention was to found a city like Philadelphia. The rapidity of the growth of the town did not equal the expectations of John Newbold, and October 8, 1828, he sold to Manuel Eyre and Michael Newbold three hundred and ninety-three acres, including the greater part of Delaware City. On November 25th of the same year Michael Newbold sold his interest in the above land to Manuel Eyre, thus vesting in him the entire title. Manuel Eyre was also the owner of land in St. George's Hundred, as well as a tract in Red Lion Hundred, on the north side of St. George's Creek and on the south side of Surrency's Gut or Creek, adjoining land formerly belonging to Thomas Witherspoon and at one time to Jesse Higgins. In 1827 there were within the limits of Delaware City about ten dwellings already erected or in course of erection. On July 4th of that year a grand celebration was held there, which was participated in by the several military companies in this vicinity. Major John Jones was the originator and manager. A dinner was prepared by Thomas Craven and served on a table extending from Washington to Clinton Street, near the present residence of Dr. F. S. Dunlap. Mrs. Isaac Hunter says it was the largest celebration ever held in this city. A short time after obtaining possession of this land Manuel Eyre began selling lots. Among the earliest that he sold are the following:

On December 16, 1828, a lot on the northwest side of Clinton Street, to George W. Karner; same date, a "two-story brick house" on west corner of Washington and Second Streets, to John Jones (bricklayer); same date, lot on south corner of Clinton and Second Streets to Elihu Jefferson; same date, lot on southwest side of Second Street, between Bayard and Hamilton Streets to Isaac Roach; same date, lot on southeast side of Clinton Street eighty feet northeast from corner of Clinton and Second Streets, to James Fountain; same date, lot on south corner of Clinton and William Streets to John A. Hopper; February 27, 1829, lot on northwest side of Clinton Street to Edward Evans; September 3, 1829, lot on northwest side of Hamilton Street to Samuel Van Amringe; November 4, 1829, lot on east corner of Clinton and Front Streets to the same; December 29, 1829, lot on northeast side of Harbour Street (now Delaware Avenue) to the Pennsylvania, Delaware and Maryland Steam Navigation Company; July 6, 1830, a lot on northwest side of Adams Street to Jonathan P. Smith; April 28, 1831, lot on southeast side of Clinton Street to the same; same date, lot on northwest side of Hamilton Street to John T. Hall; July 24, 1830, lot on the northwest side of Clinton Street to Thomas Folwell; December 29, 1829, lot on southeast side of Clinton Street to John McIntire; November 1, 1832, another lot on same street to the same; December 20, 1831, a lot on northwest side of Clinton Street, and a lot on the west corner of Clinton and Second Streets, to Robert Polk. In the following years the sale of lots on the north side of the canal continued and by degrees streets were opened, Clinton being the first. The first store was kept by George Carson, who commenced business in 1826. His store was on the corner of Washington and Second Streets, where Charles G. Ash's residence now stands.

Dr. C. H. Black was the first physician in Delaware City and had an extensive practice. On the first page of a day-book opened by him on August 13, 1830, is found the following:

"This book, like the head of a modern Böhm, contains a great quantity of matter, yet when sifted through the screens of wisdom & reality it will be found nearly all chaff."

"BLACK."

By an act of Assembly, passed March 5, 1851, the town was incorporated under the name of the Town of Delaware City. By the act of incorporation, John D. Dilworth, Charles H. Black, John P. Cochran, Abraham Vandegrift and Daniel Corbit were appointed commissioners, and directed to take with them a skillful surveyor and make an accurate survey of the town of Delaware City, aforesaid; to fix and establish the boundaries and limits thereof, but in no case to go upon the south side of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal. The surveyor was James Houston. The charter of incorporation being found incomplete, in the following year an attempt was made to have a supplement passed, but proved unsuccessful. In 1853 the application was renewed by the citizens of the town, and a supplement, as prepared by them, was passed. Commissioners were appointed and authorized to bound and plot the town. They surveyed the town and fixed the following lines as the boundaries of the town: "Beginning at the lock on the Delaware, of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal, thence running northwardly up the river to Clark's line, thence southwardly to Fifth Street along said line, thence southeasterly along said Fifth Street to said canal, thence northeasterly along said canal to said river and place of beginning." At the first town election, which was held on Saturday May 3, 1851, the following officers were elected:

Commissioners, James B. Henry, Isaac Hunter, John A. Barr, M.D.; Assessor, Jesse Alexander; Treasurer, George A. Davidson.

The early commissioners devoted their time and labor to opening new streets and improving those already opened. On March 12, 1859, the first town ordinance was passed. This prohibited the removal or deposit of dirt on the streets or alleys, and the driving of vehicles on the foot-paths. In 1852, George A. Davidson, town treasurer, died, and his administrator endeavored to collect the tax, but met with difficulty. A meeting of the citizens was called and the subject discussed, when it was decided that the commissioners return the money collected, and collect no more.

The town gradually increased in size and population, and on February 14, 1871, an act of Assembly was passed to extend the limits. By this act it was directed:

"Section 1. That the commissioners of the town of Delaware City be, and are, hereby, authorized and empowered to extend the limits of the town of Delaware City as follows, to wit: from its present boundary at the intersection of Fifth Street with the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal to the culvert (passing under said canal) thence with the northwest side of Main Drain to the Dragon creek, thence with the north-east side of said creek to the North Drain, thence with the south-east side of said drain to the stone bridge on the public road leading from Delaware City to Clark's Corner, thence by and with the north-east side of said public road, to the north-west boundary of William D. Clark's land, thence with said north-west boundary of said Clark's land to the river Delaware, thence by said river shore south-westery to the present town boundary, and the said commissioners are further authorized and empowered to lay out new streets, and to extend the streets of said town, as they are laid down on existing plots, through the lands hereby authorized to be included within the limits of said town, and to regulate and to keep the same in repair.

Section 2. That the said commissioners of the town of Delaware City shall have full power and authority, and they are hereby empowered and directed, to subscribe to the capital stock of the Delaware and Pennsylvania Railroad Company, the sum of thirty thousand dollars, and to provide for the payment of the same, they shall issue the bonds of the said commissioners of the town of Delaware City, the said bonds to be of such denomination as they may deem best, bearing interest not more than six per cent. per annum, and payable in a time not less than ten years, and not exceeding twenty years from the date of their issue, and to provide for the payment of the interest on said bonds, the said commissioners shall have power to raise, annually, by taxation of the persons and property within the limits of said town, according to the provisions of this act, and all previous acts, in regard to the assessment and collection of taxes within said town, such sum as may be necessary for this purpose.

In accordance with this act on July 1, 1871, sixty five hundred-dollar bonds, with interest at six per cent., were issued and exchanged for stock in the above-mentioned road. In this year John T. Cheairs was appointed by the town commissioners to attend the meeting of the railroad and cast the votes of the town for directors of the railroad. On July 1, 1881, the bonds were called in and new ones issued to the amount of twenty-eight thousand dollars, bearing four and one-half per cent. interest. At the present time the indebtedness is twenty-seven thousand five hundred dollars, of which the Council are prepared to pay one thousand dollars.

On March 12, 1875, Delaware City was incorporated as a city, and placed under the control of a mayor and three commissioners. The boundaries of the town, as laid out in 1871, were retained and the streets opened according to the original plan. On October 28, 1878, Clinton Street was flooded as far as Front Street by the overflowing of the canal and river, caused by a tidal wave, but no serious damage was done. On February 8, 1881, Francis S. Dunlap, M.D., Benjamin N. Ogle and Edmund D. Cleaver were appointed a Board of Health, whose duties should continue till their successors were named. On January 7, 1887, a fire broke out on Clinton Street, in the business part of the city, and destroyed eleven buildings before it was extinguished. Nine of them were frame and two brick houses. They were composed of seven stores, one hotel and three dwellings and belonged to William Beck, Mrs. Alice Clark, estate of W. C. Robertson, George B. Money, James Calvin's estate, William R. Bright, Mrs. S. E. Bradway and Philip Bigger. The loss was twenty thousand dollars, and the insurance twelve thousand dollars. Buildings are being rapidly erected by the owners of this land.

From its earliest foundation to the present time Delaware City has gradually grown and improved. It is located on the Delaware River, at its junction with the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal, and is forty miles south of Philadelphia. It is laid out with a carefulness and precision seldom seen in places of its size. The shipping facilities of this city cannot be excelled. The river is open to navigation at all times, even during the most severe winter weather. A fine river-front, with a sufficient depth of water, makes it a safe and desirable port. The steamers "Reybold" and "Delaware," of the Philadelphia and Salem Navigation Company, ply daily between Philadelphia and Delaware City, and during the summer the "Clyde," of the same line, traverses this route. By means of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal, which flows through the southern part of the city, the Ericson line of steamers makes daily trips between Philadelphia and Baltimore, and the New York and Baltimore Transportation Line between New York and Baltimore. Both lines stop at Delaware City. It is also the terminus of the Delaware City and Newark branch of the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad, and eight trains are run daily. Despite these advantages, Delaware City has never been extensively engaged in manufacturing pursuits. With the intention of making it an object for manufacturers to locate here, the following act was passed March 17, 1887:

"An act to exempt from taxation certain property in the city of Delaware City.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives in General Assembly met:

"Section 1. That the real estate of any person or persons or body corporate within the city limits of the city of Delaware City not exceeding five acres upon which any manufacturing or other industrial improvements for the employment of labor shall be erected and occupied after the passage of this act, or any real estate upon which any buildings are already erected and which after the passage of this act shall be used for any manufacturing or industrial pursuit as aforesaid, not before prosecuted or carried on there, shall be exempt for a period of ten years after the same shall be first assessable, from assessment and taxation for State, country or municipal purposes."

FIRST PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF DELAWARE CITY.—The earliest devotional services in Delaware City were held by the Presbyterians under the lead of Rev. Samuel Bell, then pastor of the Presbyterian Church at St. George’s village. The meetings were held in private houses until the erection of the old school-house, when they were continued there by Rev. J. C. How, the successor of Rev. Samuel Bell.

Manuel Eyre deeded to George Clarke, John Sutton, Levi Clark, Philip Rebold, William J. Hurlock, Robert Rhodes and Thomas J. Higgins, trustees of St. George’s Church, a tract of land in Delaware City, to be held “solely in trust for the use and benefit of the inhabitants of Delaware City and its neighborhood who are professors of the Presbyterian religion, for their use only as a place of worship or religious in struction and burial-ground, and always to be kept and used for those purposes.

In 1835 a story brick church, thirty-one by forty feet, was erected by John McIntire. Rev. Mr. How administered to the spiritual wants of this congregation and the one at St. George’s for ten years after the erection of the church. In 1846 the two churches, which to this date had been united, were separated and formed into distinct organizations. On May 11th of that year, the property was deeded to trustees of Presbyterian Church at Delaware City. On September 4, 1846, the First Presbyterian Church of Delaware City was organized, having forty-seven members, of whom John Addison, William D. Clark and John Exton were the elders. In the same year a frame chapel, twenty-two by forty feet, was erected as a convenient and suitable place for the Sunday-school. Rev. William R. Dwinett was the pastor of this congregation from 1847 until 1851, when he was succeeded by Rev. T. R. Smith, who officiated until October, 1858. The next pastor was Rev. James Morton, who supplied the church from 1854 until 1859. From this date until 1861 there was no pastor stationed there but services were conducted by Rev. J. Walker Macbeth, president of Delaware College. In 1861, Rev. H. J. Gaylord was selected as pastor and he continued until 1867, when he was succeeded by Rev. S. R. Schofield, who began his labors in February of that year and continued until 1875. In 1872, during the pastorate of Rev. Mr. Schofield, the church was enlarged and remodeled. The building was extended twenty feet in length, making the present building thirty-one by sixty feet. Rev. W. W. Taylor began preaching in 1875, and was unanimously elected pastor in the following March. He officiated until 1881, when he resigned. Rev. George A. Paul, the present pastor, was elected in 1882, and since that time has faithfully served the church. At the present time there are one hundred and thirty-seven communicants.

A flourishing Sunday-school, containing one hundred and fourteen members, is held in the chapel. For nearly half a century William D. Clark was the able and efficient superintendent. After the decease of Mr. Clark, on February 9, 1887, Edmund D. Cleaver, the present superintendent, was elected. In connection with the Sunday-school is a well-selected library of five hundred volumes. The present valuation of the church property is $7000. In 1886 a commodious parsonage was erected near the church, on a lot formerly occupied by District School No. 76. The lot and building cost $4900.

On the following dates the several elders were elected and ordained:

The following are the present officers of the church:

DELAWARE CITY: M. E. CHURCH.—The first Methodist meetings held in this city were conducted by Rev. Benson, in the residences of Rev. I. Hunter (now Dr. F. S. Dunlap) and Elihu Jefferson (now occupied by John Roberts), in 1827. Three years after this a union Sunday-school was opened by Isaac Hunter, Samuel Tindal, a Baptist, and a few Presbyterians. The services were held in the district school-house, and was shortly afterwards converted into a Presbyterian organization by Rev. J. C. How, of St. George's village, and considered an auxiliary to the Sunday-school at that place. In 1838, Rev. Elliphalet Reed, an itinerant minister of the Philadelphia Conference, began holding services in the school-house regularly once in four weeks. A little difficulty arose in regard to the hour of services between this congregation and the Presbyterians, who were also worshipping here. Mr. John Eagle kindly offered a portion of his residence to the Methodists as a place of worship, and his offer was accepted. A revival occurred in 1834, in which Henry Hickey was the first convert. As a result of the revival, a class was formed and comprised the following members: Isaac Hunter (leader), Henry Hickey, John Hickey and wife, George Hickey, Elias L. Bateman and wife, Mrs. Samuel Walker, Hester Barnes (afterwards wife of Henry Hickey), Elizabeth Craig.—McPeat, Anna Bowen, Edward Handy, Prudence Bowen, Mary Davidson and Jane Davidson. Of those there are still living Henry Hickey, George Hickey and Prudence Bowen. In the fall of that year the erection of a church was commenced, which was completed and dedicated two years later. It was a one-story brick building, thirty-two by forty feet, and cost $1,458.98. It was built on a lot deeded by Manuel Eyre to the trustees of the Methodist Church of Delaware City, and was situated on the southwest corner of William and Jefferson Streets, "being sixty feet on William Street, thence running at right angles with William Street, adjoining other land of Manuel Eyre, one hundred and forty-two feet six inches to a Lot of Ground granted and now occupied for a Presbyterian church and Burial Ground, thence along line of said Lot South East, sixty feet to Jefferson Street, thence along Jefferson Street North East, one hundred forty-two feet six inches to the place of beginning."

In 1843, Isaac Hunter, Elias L. Bateman, James McMullen, Jacob Groes, Isaac Woods and P. H. Jones, trustees, relinquished all the claims they had against the church. In 1876 it was decided to build a new church. William Beck, Wm. J. Robinson, Jase Alexander, Henry Hickey, Geo. W. Craig, Wm. Wingate, Dr. J. M. F. Hemp and Reuben Anderson were appointed a building committee. A suitable lot was procured, and the building was commenced in August, 1876. The corner-stone was laid by Bishop Levi Scott, September 2d of the same year. The church was completed and dedicated October 18, 1878, by Rev. R. L. Dashiell. In 1883, through the efforts of Wm. Anderson, a bell was purchased and placed on the building. Sunday-school was held in the old church until 1886, when it was torn down and the material used for the erection of a chapel beside the new church. This was completed in November of that year. In 1896 a parsonage on Clinton Street was purchased, and has been occupied since that time by the different pastors. On October 12, 1884, the fiftieth anniversary of the church was commemorated with appropriate services. At present there are one hundred and seventy-five members. Geo. C. Hutchinson is the superintendent of the Sunday-school, which numbers one hundred and twenty members, thirty-five of whom are over fifteen years of age.

Christ's Protestant Episcopal Church was organized at Delaware City, in 1848, by the Revs. Andrew Freeman and Thos. F. Bilbopp, of New Castle. Articles of organization were drawn up and a vestry composed of A. S. Pennington, F. S. Dunlap, A. Von Culin, John A. Barr and James B. Henry was elected. On February 16, 1849, a tract of land, on the corner of Clinton and Third Streets, two hundred and eight by one hundred feet, was granted by John Ashurst to the rector, wardens and vestrymen of Christ Church and their successors. The erection of the church building was commenced in 1849. The cornerstone was laid with appropriate services by the Rev. Thos. Bilbopp, of New Castle, Del. The consecration services were performed December 13, 1857, by the Rt. Rev. Alfred Lee, D.D., Bishop of Delaware. A portion of the certificate of consecration is as follows: "Be it known that on this 13th day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty-seven, with the rites and solemnities prescribed, I have consecrated and set apart the said House of Worship; separating it henceforth from all unhallowed, ordinary and common uses; and dedicating it to the service..." of the Eternal God, for reading his holy word, for celebrating his holy sacraments, for offering to his glorious majesty the sacrifices of prayer and thanksgiving, for blessing his people in his name, and for the performance of all other holy offices, through Jesus Christ, our blessed Lord and Savior, and according to the Rites and Worship of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America." The building is a brick edifice, thirty-six by sixty-six feet, and was erected at a cost of five thousand dollars. In 1870 the church was very much improved and a parsonage erected, at a cost of four thousand dollars, on a lot on the corner of Washington and Third Streets. The funds required for the erection of the rectory were raised through the indefatigable labors and energy of the ladies of the congregation, assisted by Revs. W. H. D. Hatton, John P. Du Hamel and Elias Weil. An adjoining lot was also purchased by them, for the use of the sexton. The church is in a prosperous condition and numbers fifty communicants. A Sabbath-school of forty-five scholars, under the superintendence of W. W. Chesairs, is held in connection with the church. The first rector called to this charge was Rev. Andrew Freeman, who was installed in 1848. He was succeeded by the Rev. Hiram R. Harrold, who was ordained November 22, 1849, and continued until August, 1853. The next rector was Aas S. Colton, who was succeeded by Rev. W. H. D. Hatton. Rev. Hatton ministered here until June 26, 1858, and his successor was Rev. R. T. Keeling, who remained until 1862. Rev. John P. Du Hamel was rector from 1862 until 1869, in which year Rev. Elias Weil was called. He took charge April 15, 1870, and resigned the first Sunday in Advent, 1878. Since that time the following have served as rectors: Rev. H. L. Phillips, January, 1880; Rev. Mr. Howard, July, 1882; and Rev. Mr. Starr, December, 1886.

The present vestry is composed of Peter Kline, senior warden; N. G. Price, junior warden; J. R. Pennington, Isaac H. Ubil, Chaas. Corbit, Clement Reeves, W. W. Chesairs, Chaas. G. Ash.

CATHOLIC CHURCH.—For several years previous to 1852 the Catholics of Delaware City held their services in the dwelling of Mrs. Ellen O'Neill, who resided on Washington Street, in a building now occupied by Augustus T. Cann. In that year, through the efforts of Father Cosgrove, permission was given by Bishop Newman to erect a church in Delaware City. A lot of land was obtained from John Ashurst and the erection of an edifice began in 1852. Father Donahue, who came from Dublin, superintended the work. It was completed and dedicated in 1853 by Father Suran, who was at that time acting bishop. The church at that time belonged to the Philadelphia Diocese. The building is of brick, one story high, thirty by forty feet, and was erected at a cost of $2,200. For the first year a priest came from Wilmington and held services once a month. Then Delaware City and New Castle were formed into a parish and a priest assigned to them. This arrangement has been in operation since that time, with the exception of two years during Father Donahue's priesthood, when Delaware City was made a separate charge. Since the first purchase, several other adjoining lots have been bought and the grounds extended. The membership is about the same as when the church was organized, and numbers about one hundred and sixty. A Sunday-school, with a membership of seventy, holds meetings every Sunday, under the superintendence of Michael Mulligan.

The following priests have labored here: Father Corbin, Father Susantini, Father Cormeley, Father Dalley, Father Donahue, Father Bourneman, Father Kieley and Father Brady.

The present trustees are Peter Mulligan, William Morris., Edward O'Neill, John Lang and Patrick Calaghay.

SCHOOLS.—On February 10, 1829, Manuel Eyre granted to Adam Diehl, John Exton, John Higgins, John Jones and Daniel Newbold, incorporated as the trustees of the school in Delaware City, a tract of land on Fifth Street, opposite the present residence of B. M. Ogle. On this land a brick school-house was soon erected, which was known as "District School No. 52." The territory from which pupils were entitled to attend this school was bounded as follows:

"Beginning on the Delaware River, at the mouth of Cedar Creek; thence up said creek to the intersection of the public road leading from Delaware City to Bowensville; thence along said road to Reboud's road (Clark's Corner) and down said road to the Dragon Creek, and down said creek to the Dividing Line between land of (the late) John S. Adams and (the late) William H. Higgins, and running thence with that line to the public road leading from Delaware City to St. George's; thence down said road to the junction of A. M. Hidde's lane, and running from thence down said lane to St. George's Creek, thence down said creek to the Delaware River, and up said river to the place of beginning."

Manuel Eyre also deeded to the "Trustees of the School in Delaware City" a tract of land twenty-one feet three and a half inches by one hundred and sixty-one feet eight and three-quarters inches by one hundred and sixty-three feet one and three-quarters inches, "To be appropriated forever hereafter by the said Trustees, their successors and assigns to the use and service of a house for religious service to be erected thereon or nigh thereunto upon a lot adjoining the above described and which said lot is granted or about to be granted, by Daniel Newbold to the said Trustees of the School in Delaware City for the use and service of said House for religious worship thereon to be erected and to be made free of access for the purpose of religious worship to all denominations of professing Christians."

The house therein mentioned was never erected, but the school-house was thrown open for worship, and was the place where the Methodists and Presbyterians both held their first services. As the town grew the number of pupils increased, and in 1850 it was found necessary to divide the district. The new district was called No. 76 and a frame school building was erected on the location now occupied by the Presbyterian Church, at the corner of Madison and
NEW CASTLE COUNTY.

Second Streets. The districts remained separate until March 4, 1875, when an act of Assembly was passed consolidating the two districts. The schools were graded at this time and the higher branches taught at No. 52. At this time the buildings were not commodious enough and an effort was made to erect a new school-house. This was so bitterly opposed by some of the citizens that its accomplishment was abandoned for the time being. In 1877 it was found necessary to open a primary school on account of the crowded condition of the other schools. A room was procured in a building belonging to the estate of William C. Robertson, and Mrs. Ida L. Bigger was elected teacher. However, in the spring of 1883 an act of Assembly was passed, authorizing the directors to purchase a lot and erect a new building at a cost not to exceed six thousand dollars. In accordance with this act, a lot on Clinton Street was purchased of George B. Money. On the 7th of August, 1888, the contract to erect the building was awarded to West & Dunlap, of Wilmington. The work was immediately commenced, and on January 21, 1884, the contractors delivered the building to the trustees. Some alterations were made and the rooms were furnished with desks and other necessary paraphernalia, and on the 21st and 22d of February the building was open for public inspection, and on the latter day music was furnished by the Delaware City Band. On the 25th it was opened for school purposes and to this use has been devoted since that time. The building is of brick, forty-three by sixty-five feet, and is two stories high. The second story has hitherto been used as a public hall, but is now required for school use. On September 1st the lots occupied by schools No. 52 and No. 76 were sold to L. C. Justis, Jr., for nine hundred dollars. On the same day six one-thousand-dollar bonds were issued, bearing six per cent. interest, payable semi-annually. The bonds are redeemable yearly, the first being due September 1, 1885. Since the consolidation the following principals have served: Benjamin W. Shafer, L. F. Morgan, Rev. Henry L. Phillips, M. C. Smith, E. W. Dawson and W. A. Storrie. The present number of pupils is two hundred and fifty-four, who are instructed by Principal W. A. Storrie and Assistants Miss Georgina Arnold and Miss Ella Cleaver. The School Board is composed of six directors, who are elected for a term of two years. The following persons have served in this capacity since the consolidation of the two districts:

1873. Francis McIntire, Benjamin N. Ogle./ion, 2 yrs.
1874. Francis S. Dunlap.
1875. John T. Chesaip. 1 year.
1877. John T. Chesaip. 1 year.
1880. F. S. Dunlap. 2 yrs.
1881. B. N. Ogle.

1881. E. D. Cleaver, W. A. Juster.
George A. Clark.

W. E. Cleaver. Isaac E. Sadler.
Wm. Morris.

F. S. Dunlap. George B. Money, 1 year.

DELWARE ACADEMY.—For several years previous to 1856 private schools were taught and well attended by the pupils of Delaware City. In that year it was decided by some of the citizens to erect an academy. A contract was made for a tract on Fifth Street, between Clinton and Hamilton Streets, with James B. Henry, who deeded it to the trustees December 30, 1862. The contract for the erection of the building was awarded to L. R. Morgan for four thousand two hundred dollars. On account of some difficulty, the building was not completed by him, but was finished in 1858 by G. B. Money. A residence was attached in 1862, and made the entire cost of the property five thousand dollars. The contributors toward the accomplishment of this undertaking were James T. Ash, William Bennett, William Beck, 'Dr. John A. Barr, Martin D. Ball, William B. Bright, William D. Clark, John C. Clark, Thomas Clark, Levi H. Clark, T. Jefferson Clark, John Carson, George G. Cleaver, George G. Cleaver, Jr., Edmund D. O'leaver, James Colvin, Amos E. Davidson, John Exton, Joseph Ellison, James B. Henry, John J. Henry, Anthony M. Higgins, John P. King, David Martin, James McMullen, George B. Money, George Maxwell, M. H. Paxson, M. C. Reybold, F. K. Reybold, John Reybold, Barney Reybold, Anthony Reybold, William Reybold, Clement Reeves, Wm. C. Robertson, George Z. Tybout and L. J. Vanheke. In February, 1859, the Delaware City Academy was chartered as an institution of learning. The school was opened in October, 1858, with J. W. Macbeth as principal. He was succeeded respectively by J. E. Scott, Rev. D. G. Mallery, L. R. Baughner, Joseph Nelson, B. Gould, A. E. Warner and A. S. Minor.

S. J. Clark was the first president of the board, and was succeeded in 1863 by Wm. D. Clark, who served till the closing of the academy. Jesse T. Ash, the first secretary and treasurer, was succeeded in 1867 by George B. Money. The school was a first-class institution, and numbers some of the most prominent citizens of Delaware City and vicinity among its graduates. The largest number of pupils enrolled during any term was eighty.

In 1876 the school was closed and the building sold by the trustees to T. Jefferson Clark, whose heirs are the present owners. A private school has been taught in this building during the past few years by Miss Harlow.

BANKING INTERESTS.—On February 3, 1849, an act of Assembly was passed at Dover "To Incorporate a Bank in Delaware City under the name of The Delaware City Bank." Joseph Cleaver, George Maxwell, Philip Reynold, George G. Cleaver, Cephas G. Childs, Robert Polk, A. Von Culin, Robert Ocheltree, F. S. Dunlap, John C. Clark and John McCalla were appointed commissioners to procure and open suitable books for registering the subscriptions for stock, and to perform the other duties preparatory to opening the bank. One thousand shares of stock, each valued at fifty dollars, were issued, making the capital stock fifty thousand dollars. A short time afterwards the bank was opened for business, and was officered as follows: President, George Maxwell; Directors, Philip Reynold, George G. Cleaver, John C. Clark, Joseph Cleaver, John M. Kennedy, Alexander J. Derbyshire; Cashier, John P. King; Teller, W. W. Ferris.

The parlor of a residence on Clinton Street, then occupied by John Carson, was fitted up and used for banking purposes until the present bank building on the corner of Washington and Williams Streets was completed. In October, 1856, Cashier John P. King died, and Teller W. W. Ferris was chosen his successor. Edmund D. Cleaver was elected teller, which position he held until July, 1862, when he resigned, and Francis McIntire was chosen to fill the vacancy. George Maxwell was president from the organization of the bank until its close. In 1866 it was decided to discontinue the business of the bank, with a view of organizing a national bank. The National Bank was organized, and on July 8, 1865, the following resolution was adopted by the directors: "Resolved, that the Cashier be and is hereby directed to give public notice that this bank, with a view to the early liquidation of its affairs, will, after the 31st inst., cease to receive deposits or discount new loans, and that the notes of the Bank will after that date be redeemed on presentation at the counter of the Delaware City National Bank." The officers at this time were,—President, George Maxwell; Cashier, W. W. Ferris; Teller, Francis McIntire; Directors, John C. Clark, William Reynold, Wm. J. Hurlock, Wm. D. Clark, Wm. M. Kennedy.

The Delaware City National Bank was authorized "to commence the business of Banking" by Freeman Clark, comptroller of the currency. The certificate of incorporation bears date June 23, 1866, but there is evidently a mistake in the month, May being intended instead of June. From the opening of the Delaware City National Bank, May 30, 1865, until the closing of the Delaware City Bank, July 31, 1865, both banks occupied one room, and had the same president, cashier and teller. This is shown by the facts that the bank was opened May 30, 1865, and when another certificate was applied for in 1885 the comptroller said that the former certificate expired in May instead of June.

The capital stock at the opening of the bank was eighty thousand dollars, and was owned by John C. Clark, William J. Hurlock, Barney Reynold, Wm. A. Tatem, Anthony M. Higgins, Edmund D. Cleaver, George B. Money, Samuel B. Cleaver, Geo. Maxwell, Wm. D. Clark, James B. Henry, John C. Clark, Jr. Wm. W. Ferris, John M. Kennedy, Anthony Reynold, Geo. W. Bennett, Wm. Reynold.

The following persons were elected for the first officers: President, George Maxwell; Cashier, Wm. W. Ferris; Teller, Francis McIntire; Directors, John M. Kennedy, John C. Clark, Wm. J. Hurlock, Wm. Reynold, Wm. D. Clark, Geo. W. Bennett, Edmund D. Cleaver and William W. Ferris. With the exception of William J. Hurlock, who was succeeded in 1868 by Barney Reynold, the same officers continued until 1870. In that year there was a change in several of the directors. The new board was composed of Geo. Maxwell, Wm. Reynold, Wm. D. Clark, Edmund D. Cleaver, Barney Reynold, John C. Higgins, John M. Kennedy, George Clark, W. W. Ferris and continued unchanged until 1873. At the election of directors held in January, 1873, the following persons were elected: George Maxwell, William Reynold, William D. Clark, Barney Reynold, Arthur Coleburn, Clement Reeves, Henry Cleaver, William M. Kennedy, William W. Ferris.

On March 4th, of this year, Francis McIntire was elected cashier to fill the vacancy caused by the death of William W. Ferris. This position has been held by Mr. McIntire since that date. On the 18th of March Edmund D. Cleaver was chosen teller, which position he still holds.

In 1874 the number of directors was reduced to seven and were the same as those of the preceding year with the exception of William M. Kennedy and William W. Ferris. They also served during 1875. On December 11, 1875, President George Maxwell died and Vice-President William D. Clark performed the duties of president until the January election, when he was chosen president and continued so until his death, which occurred February 9, 1887. Charles G. Ash, the present president, was elected February 14, 1887.

William D. Clark, farmer and banker, was born in Red Lion Hundred, New Castle County, September 9, 1812. He was the youngest child but one of George and Esther (Bryan) Clark. The sterling qualities of a long line of honored ancestry had descended to him, as the foundation of a character and life in which the most positive elements were happily blended with a striking modesty and an unaffected gentleness.

Until he became of age he united to the studies of his youth the practical duties of a farmer's life. With his father and brothers at the paternal homestead, he devoted his intelligence and energy to the development of the fine estate, which had been in the possession of the family for generations. The habits of industry thus early and effectually formed, and the thorough knowledge acquired, together with the more general culture of an inquiring and energetic mind, laid the solid basis of an active and most useful life, whose interests, while never detached from their Wm. A. Tatem, Anthony M. Higgins, Edmund D. whose interests, while never detached from their original channels, broadened out into a much wider sphere.

For a time, however, Mr. Clark had ardently cherished a different purpose. His studious disposition and earnest piety had led him to think seriously of the high office of the Christian ministry. With the consent of his parents, and expressly with the warm sympathy and encouragement of an excellent mother, to whom he opened his heart most freely, he entered duly upon a course of study. In May, 1834, he became a student in the preparatory department of Lafayette College, at Easton, Pa. Remaining there but a single term, he transferred his relations to a more convenient institution, Delaware College, at Newark, which had recently been organized, and whose preparatory department he entered in the autumn of the same year, combining with the regular course some of the studies of the college proper. The labors of two studious years, however, told severely upon a constitution which was energetic, but never robust. On his reaching the freshman class in the fall of 1836, it became evident that he could not continue his exacting mental work without serious risk to his health and even to life itself. He consulted anxiously with skillful physicians and judicious friends, and as a result he felt himself constrained, with sorrowful reluctance, to abandon his dearly cherished project, and return to the active duties of his original vocation.

In 1837 he purchased the beautiful farm, near Delaware City, which continued to be his home until his death, and which he not only enriched by the science of a trained agriculturist, but adorned with the attractions of a refined and happy domestic life.

In February, 1844, Mr. Clark was united in marriage to Miss Mary Frances Hurlock, the daughter of Mr. Wm. J. and Mrs. Wilhelmina Stuart Hurlock, with whom he lived a life of enviable happiness, until her lamented death, May 29, 1886. His household was a reproduction of the delightful experience of his youthful home. The finest family affection, combined with a munificent and warm-hearted hospitality, distinguished both alike, and rendered these homes a perpetual charm to the inmates, and an unceasing attraction to a wide circle of friends. Mr. Clark’s cup of domestic happiness was full. The peace of God, waiting upon and sanctifying the natural affection of a united and devoted family beautified and blessed the lives of all. A sincere, but unaffected and unostentatious piety was a marked feature of Mr. Clark’s character. Beyond the limits of his private life this was especially marked in his untiring consecration to the interests of the Presbyterian Church of Delaware City, in which, for half a century, he was a ruling elder and the superintendent of the Sunday-school.

In 1853 Mr. Clark was elected a member of the Levy Court of New Castle County, in which he served for twelve years, acting as its president during the greater part of this period. It was owing to his own wish alone that he relinquished the duties of the position.

In politics he was originally a Whig, and subsequently a Republican, cherishing a reverent regard for the principles of the national constitution and a loyal devotion to the welfare of his country. Yet with a broad and deep interest in public questions, and a high sense of his duties as a citizen, he had no ambition for office, and declined to hold any official trusts beyond those of a local character.

In 1873 he was elected vice-president of the Bank of Delaware City, of which he became the president in 1876, on the death of his predecessor and beloved captain, Captain George Maxwell. It is needless to say that his wise administration contributed to the prosperity of the institution. The bank, the well-cultivated farm, the hospitable home, the interests of the town near which he lived, and the county of which he was a citizen, the church he loved so dearly and for which he labored with so untiring a perseverance, furnish abiding monuments to his sagacity, his enterprise, and self-sacrificing devotion. While he courted no publicity, his life in reality was one of generous breadth, with a wide comprehensiveness of important interests, and it has left behind it enduring marks of a cultivated and well-rounded character.

In person, Mr. Clark was tall and slightly built, with a physique never vigorous, yet singularly capable of endurance, and always prepared to respond to the claims of duty. His face rightly indicated great strength of character, while his gentle temper saved his strong convictions and resolute purposes from any appearance of arbitrariness and severity. He was one to be respected for his manliness, and loved for his winning graces.

Two children, Miss Emma Clark and Miss Julia Newton Clark, survive their father, and continue to reside at Greenlea, the home which he made so lovely both in outward embellishment and in the spirit which prevailed beneath its roof. A beloved son, Wm. Hurlock Clark, passed away in early life, July 18, 1856.

Mr. Clark died at his home February 9, 1887, leaving a name, whose honors are the richest heritage of his children, and the pride of the community which loved him in life, and tenderly lamented his death. “The memory of the just is blessed.”

In January, 1876, the number of directors was increased to eight. The board was as follows: William D. Clark, William Reybold, Barney Reybold, Clement Reeves, Arthur Coleburn, Henry Cleaver, George F. Brady, Charles G. Ash. With a few exceptions, these directors were continued to the present time. In 1878 the number was increased to nine, and the additional seat filled by John P. Hudson. In 1881, Barney Reybold was succeeded by Charles Corbit. In 1883 the number was again reduced to eight, and the seat of John P. Hudson vacated.

On November 1, 1883, the capital stock was reduced from $80,000 to $60,000. The surplus is $16,000.
Present officers: President, Charles G. Ash; Cashier, Francis McIntire; Teller, Edmund D. Cleaver; Directors, William Reybold, Clement Reeves, Arthur Coleburn, Henry Cleaver, George F. Brady, Charles Corbit and John C. Higgins.
