PREFACE

Samuel Pack (1755-1833), the patriarch of the white (Caucasian) Packs of the upper New River area of present-day West Virginia (sic. Virginia prior to the Civil War), owned slaves (African-Americans) as early as 1801; and his sons and several of his grandsons followed in this tradition. The Pack plantations were concentrated at two locations. The first area was located on both sides of New River both above and below the mouth of Bluestone River. The heart of this area is now located in Summers Co. but is covered by the Bluestone Reservoir.

A second location of Pack plantations was near the headwaters of Brush Creek some 15 miles to the southeast in present-day Monroe Co. Old Samuel Pack obtained original land patents and deeds to lands in both areas and assisted his sons and older grandsons in getting started in plantation farming. Details about the early settlements and land holdings of Samuel and his sons in the upper New River area are provided in Ancestral Families of Robert Lee Pack (by John F. Vallentine; 1998; privately published at 1081 S. 700 E., Springville, Utah 84663).

Over forty years of genealogical and historical research on my white Pack and allied family ancestors of the upper New River counties of West Virginia have proven to be an exciting and rewarding adventure. However, noted over the years were the frequent references to "colored" Packs found in the records of Summers, Monroe, Mercer, Giles (Va.), Greenbrier, and Raleigh Co. From an initial need to identify and separate the African-American Packs from consideration in my research on my Caucasian Pack lineages, it gradually became more difficult to merely discard or set aside these frequent references to the "other Packs." A latent interest in the Pack slaves gradually developed into an active special interest leading to this work. From mere curiosity as to who were these other Packs so often associated with my Pack ancestors, a determination was gradually triggered towards making a full effort to find out more about these mostly unknown individuals and families that eventually chose to bear the Pack surname.

Traditional history suggests the Pack slaves on New River and their near descendants were law-abiding, were respected by their white neighbors, and were enterprising when given the opportunity. No criminal records have surfaced for either the black or white Packs on upper New River during the 1800's. There seems to be little doubt that the Pack slave owners recognized their slaves as valuable personal property and took pride in them, and this was incentive enough for looking after their welfare.

Yet, it seems apparent that a paternalistic feeling and even a degree of comradery was shown by their owners for the Pack slaves. This is evidenced by the numerous special provisions and considerations made by Samuel Pack, his children, and older grandchildren in their wills regarding their slaves and former slaves (refer to Section I, Slave Ownership Records). In his will dated 1833 the elder Samuel Pack, in placing his slave woman Amey in the care of his sons Anderson and Bartley, made of them "a sincere request that they will grant her more than usual privileges and treat her well for kindness to myself and worthy companion (i.e. his wife Mary nee Farley) that has gone before me."

Keeping together the slave families as far as possible was a strong commitment and often formalized in the wills of the white Packs. The Pack slaves were not permitted to legally marry, this in line with legal and community standards of the time, but some form of religious or social marriage was widely accepted. In his 1833 will old Samuel Pack referred to slaves "Old Abram and his wife Fanny" and specified that they were to be allowed to remain in their home on a specified tract of land throughout their lives.
While the Pack slave owners seemingly recognized the extra-legal, ceremonial marriages among their slaves and even supported these as lasting private associations, such events were not recorded in county records nor apparently in ownership records. Following general emancipation at the end of the Civil War, the former slaves were strongly encouraged to legally marry. Such legal marriages became widespread by about 1869, and ordained preachers among the white Packs commonly were found performing the legal marriages for the former Pack slaves.

The delay in performing and recording legal marriages of former slaves for a few years following the end of the Civil War was possibly due to temporary legal restrictions or other impediments or initial lack of interest on the part of the former slaves in becoming legally married. In his will dated 1858, Samuel’s son Anderson offered to some of his slaves an alternative of immediate emancipation or remaining on his estate. For example, if his slave man Tom chose emancipation, he was offered assistance in migrating to a free state to avoid continuing legal entanglements and any suspicion of future mischief among the remaining slaves. Tom chose against emancipation at that time, accepting the alternative that would keep him and his family together. Having no surviving spouse or children of his own, Samuel Pack’s son-in-law Jacob Dickason divided by will his entire plantation and personal property among his former slaves. Other former white Pack slave owners commonly assisted their former slaves in renting or even purchasing and owning small farms or otherwise becoming self-supporting following emancipation.

While this work makes no claim to being a study of the 19th century African-American culture as it relates to the New River Packs during slavery and immediately following their emancipation, yet a few comments will hopefully be appropriate here. Since a single given name and no surname was nearly universal among the slaves, emancipation brought the need to select a surname. While historians seem to agree that only about 10% of freed slaves in the U.S. chose to assume the surname of their former owners, the slaves from the Pack plantations almost universally assumed the Pack surname and many chose to remain in the general vicinity for decades. This strongly suggests that, even though the owner-servant relationship was firmly and legally in place, there was a great amount of common concern and accommodation and respect between the Pack slaves and their slave owners!

An exception to the above scenario may have been the slaves of Augustus and Andrew Pack, sons of Samuel Pack, Jr. These Pack slaves lived in Boone Co. but had disappeared from the area by 1870. Whether they removed from the Boone Co. area, either prior to or after emancipation, or chose other surnames over Pack when freed is uncertain. Whatever the reason, the tradition of Pack slaves taking the surname Pack and remaining in the area does not seem to apply to this group.

Initial efforts failed to locate any compiled records of the African-American Packs, and local and New River area histories made minimal reference to them, often ignoring them altogether. No Pack plantation records have survived to reveal facts about the slaves who lived and worked on them. The earlier generations of white Packs who would have been knowledgeable have now passed on without leaving substantial records about them, and the black Packs have apparently handed down few written records that go back into the slave era. Walter J. Pack (white), b. 1868 on Brush Creek in Monroe Co., W. Va., knew many of the former Pack slaves and their families but made only brief references to them in his later writings and memoirs.

Beginning with the slave schedules of 1850 and 1860 taken in conjunction with the federal censuses in those years and continuing as combined population schedules through 1900 for all races, all Packs in the upper New River counties were helpfully differentiated into "whites", "mulattoes", and "blacks". The designations of "quadroons" and "octoroons" appear not to have been used in this area in contrast with other areas of the deep south. The term "mulatto" was obviously used in a dual role—and this often inconsistently—(1) in designating having a known white ancestor and (2) merely denoting an intermediate skin color. Following the civil war, the two categories of "colored" and "white" were used in recording civil vital events of birth, death, and marriage. While now often being considered as politically incorrect in today's social climate, "color" designation, even with its inconsistencies, has proven historically helpful in genealogical and family history research.

During the last half of the 20th century and beginning the 21st century, many people of all races have avidly searched out their family history. While some African-Americans may still choose to distance themselves from their origins prior to and during slavery, others have joined the new consensus and have concluded that ancestors are to be honored and be proud of regardless of what their lot in life may have been. This works has no agenda to either vilify or aggrandize the institution of slavery that was legally ended during the Civil War—this not until 1865 in the strongly Confederate counties highlighted here—but rather to treat it passively in its historical setting.

The prime objectives of this works is (1) to identify the Pack slaves and their descendants down to about 1920, (2) to arrange them into biological or at least into socially functional families, and (3) document and preserve these findings for historical and genealogical usage. Hopefully, this works will greatly assist present-day descendants of the upper New River Pack slaves in making appropriate genealogical connections, this mostly requiring only that they trace their ancestry back to 1900 through family records and civil vital records. For the descendants of Samuel Pack, this works should also prove interesting, particularly in identifying the African-American Packs that lived nearby, worked along with, and experienced some of the same difficulties and achievements as their white counterparts.

Two descendants of former Pack slaves have given valuable assistance in finalization of this works and in suggesting wording and phraseology appropriate to the subject being covered. Nellie Pack Callahan, Hinton, W. Va. (a descendant of Tandy Pack, b. 1816), has given valuable assistance in reviewing the original manuscript of this works for which appreciation is here expressed. Both she and Robin S. Crawford of Hinton (a descendant of Tom Pack, b. 1796) corresponded with and later met with the author at Hinton in May 2000. Nevertheless, the conclusions and final wording in this works has remained the author's responsibility.

SECTION I. SLAVE OWNERSHIP RECORDS

Slave ownership records found useful as a basis of this work have principally been those of wills, other estate records, and tax lists. Of lesser value have been the slaves schedules of 1850 and 1860 (these giving ages and sex but no names) and the meager slave data in the 1820, 1830, and 1840 regular population censuses. No plantation records or diaries kept by white Pack slave owners are apparently now extant; and the bills of sale widely recorded in the land and property records and in court records found beneficial in other geographical areas are mostly non-existent in the appropriate New River counties. Also, no records of slave emancipation per se prior to the general emancipation in 1865 have been found so far in the county court records. The lists of "free white blacks" available for the pre-Civil War period are minimal and do not include any persons with the Pack surname.

The ownership records that follow are arranged firstly by name of owner and then chronologically. Note that annotations have been frequently placed in parenthesis to help further identify individual slaves, but these annotations do not occur in the original records.

SECTION II. INDIVIDUAL ENTRIES

Attempts have been made in this section to document all known references to each Pack slave and descendant born down to about 1900, including children subsequently born into families begun by marriage prior to 1900. Cumulated under specific given names are all references believed made to that single individual down to about 1880. These named subsections are arranged by given name and then chronologically by birth year; and surnames have been added in the headings only when these persons were known to have assumed surnames after emancipation.

All known documented data about the African-American Packs of upper New River area during the 19th century, that were identified by at least a given name, are included in this section. Much information about children born after 1880 are found under the name of a parent, and here also have been placed total family records such as census records taken by household. However, it should be noted that it was not until 1870 that federal census schedules provided the names of former slaves and their family members. Cross referencing has been employed to help intercept individuals, but the need may also arise to scan family units compiled and presented in Section III to help intercept children born after 1880.

SECTION III. FAMILY SUMMATIONS

The offspring of a slave female automatically became the property of the mother's owner. While a record of the maternity of slave children was therefore a requirement in verifying ownership, the paternity of slave children was not of legal consequence and thus was seldom kept and sometimes not even known. A slave woman did not always have opportunity to select who would be the sire of her children. In general, unless the slave owner chose to recognize a customary husband-and-wife relationship among two of his slaves, he could designate who was to be the sire of each female slave's children.

In some locales mulatto children were more valuable and more marketable than black children, this inducing the owner to intentionally provide white sires; but such economic advantage has not been demonstrated relative to the upper New River Pack slaves. Attempts are frequently made, as in this work, to determine the biological paternity of mulattoes; but such efforts have generally ended in failure since documentation is virtually non-existent and the passage of time has diminished the reliability of traditions handed down through the generations.

Estate records commonly identified slave children by their given name, their age, and the name of their biological mother while ignoring any reference to their biological father. An exception was in the estate records of Anderson Pack son of Samuel when "negro girl Mary" was further identified as the daughter of her father Harden; other sources identify Betsy, Emaline and Harrison, also slaves belonging to Anderson Pack's estate, as three additional children of Harden. Designation of these four as children of Harden is unique and probably was a result of their apparent mother, a slave woman Jenny almost assuredly formerly belonging to Anderson, having died prior to Anderson's death in 1858. Also, unique to this example was the status of Harden Pack himself. While freely associating with the slaves of Anderson Pack, Harden may have been a free man of color emancipated prior to 1858 although not found recorded as such.

In genealogical research the family is commonly defined narrowly as a husband and wife and their common biological offspring. However, a broader definition of family has been required to accommodate African-American families initiated during the slavery era, as follows: a basic unit of society comprised of two adults living together (or even one adult living alone, this commonly the biological mother) who were active in the care and rearing of biological, adopted, and/or foster children. This definition, although with obvious limitations, is much more useful genealogically than that of "household" as commonly used in census records, which is intended to include all persons currently living under the same roof, whether biologically related or not, but generally under one head.

The broader definition of family accommodates the common occurrence of female Pack slaves bearing children both before and after emancipation. Her children born after emancipation and formal marriage are readily assumed to be biological children of the couple; but this broader definition of the family also permits the children born prior to emancipation, these often of unproven paternity, to receive an adoptive or foster paternity. Also, this broader definition of family accommodates children being assigned or assuming different or even alternative surnames. However, maximum effort should be made by every genealogist or searcher of ancestry to prove or firmly evidence the paternity as well as maternity of each child.

In this section only selected family units have been assembled based on the best evidence at hand and arranged by the Pack parent. However, documentation for each family unit is found only in Section II and is not repeated in this section. It should be noted that marriage records, death records, obituaries, and certain other records may provide the names of parents of children born in slavery; but even here the question of whether paternity (and sometimes maternity) being provided is biological, adoptive, or foster paternity should be considered.
