Supporters—Two antelopes ar. horned, ducally gorged, chained and hooved or. Mottoes—Through; and, ad honorem virtutis nutum. The origin of the crest, and that of the first of the Hamiltons who crosses the sea, is St. Gilbert Hamilton, founder of the family, having slain John de Spencer in a encounter, fled from the Court of Edward II. of England, and sought safety in Scotland. Before entering the land that he pursued,像素 changed his clothes with two woodcutters, and taking their saws, were in the act of cutting through an oak tree when his pursuers passed by. Perceiving their servant notice them, Sir Gilbert Hamilton cried out "Through," which word, with the oak and saw through it, he took for a crest, in commemoration of his deliverance. The legendary crest appears for the first time on the seal of the first Earl of Arran. Prior to the time at which this was done the Hamiltons bore a boar's head. The Earls of Arran quartered gu. three cinquefoils er. (or sometimes, ar.), for Hamilton; with a galley, sails furled sa., for Abercorn.

Ireland, Kingom of. Az. a harp or, stringed ar.
The ancient arms of the kingdom after the invasion of 1172 were, "A chevron gu. charged with a crescent or, a lion rampant gu. and a stag erased, or, a the last of the third. It is possible the Anglo-Norman invaders, who were arrayed under the banners of St. George and St. Edmund, introduced the bearings of the latter saint as the ensigns of their hereditary arms. Sir Robert de Bessines (E. of Eure, Earl of Oxford, Duke of Ireland, he gave him as a cost of augmentation the arms of Ireland, viz., "Az. three crowns or." Henry VIII. relinquished the old arms for the "harp " and the crown. Sir John de Kympe of King's Cross, London is said, that the three crowns might be taken for the three iliss of the Pope. Since James I. introduced the arms of Ireland among the quarterings of the Royal achievement, the bearings has been "Az. a harp or, stringed ar." From a MS.
in the Bodleian Library (Sir William Ibell of Ch_DEFINITION See appears on the authority of Sir William Segar, Garter, that "Ye trees crowned are ye antient arms of Ireland, but the harp but an ancient badge," and "Is ye tyne of Edward ye 11th a commisshalon and the arms of Ireland it was returned ye 3 crownes were the armes.
The same bearing appears on the reverse of ancient Irish coins. Another ancient coat, as recorded in Ulster's Office, is, A. a king sitting on his throne covered with a canopy, az. in his right hand a spear proper or.
right lower-towered, or from the portal a hart springing ar. attired and hoofed gold. The badge, as settled at the Union with Great Britain, is the harp ensigniled with the imperial emblems of Edward IV. D. and of Elizabeth. (E. and F. 118,) exhibits a banner on either side of the shield, viz., dexter, a king enbronth in his chair of state with a sceptre in his right hand and his left leaning on a cushion all ar., sinister, Tyrrel's house, a crowned lion rampant, smoke in his mouth, or. in the port of the first, and a tree on the dexter side of the second.

Llewellyn ap Tyrny (Lord of Yale, in Denbighsh., 1240-1278), second son and heir of Madog ap Gruffyd, Lord of Mostyn, in Denbighsh. Llewellyn greatly distinguished himself at the battle of Cowen, and his valor was rewarded by his Prince, Gruffyd ap Madoc, Lord of Dinas Bran, for the following circumstance: after the victory with the Prince after the battle Llewellyn accidentally drew his left hand, smeared with blood, across his sword, leaving four blood-stains upon it, which the Prince observing, ordered him to bear those marks henceforth on his shield. He is thus shown in the time of Edward I., at the same time conferring upon him, as a substantial recognition of his services, the lordship of Gelliarsen. The grant is dated in Yale, on the vigil of St. Edwigeus (probably Elijah, as remarked by Sir Sam. Meyer and in his edition of "The History of Violation," vol. vii. p. 185, note 1, December 1 Dec., 1356, Descendants: I. The first edition of the Armoury makes the battle that of Croggen, but it has been said that it was at Cothi, made impossible it could have been Cothen, which was fought nearly a century before the grant made to Llewellyn. Besides, Llewellyn was certainly contemporary with Gwyfod, of the house of Bran, whose grandfather, Gryfod Macmor, a distinguished chief, took part, along with Owen Brogen-ytyn, at the battle of Cothen, and died 30 years later, in 1119, the date of Cothen being 1165.)

The Four Masters record, under the year 1199, that Royst O'Donelly joined a sept of the English of Meath in the siege of the monastery of SS. Peter and Paul, at Armagh). Ar. on a mount in base ppr. a lion gu. and a buck of the second rampant, combattant a dexter hand coupled ar. at the wrist of the third.

O'Donell, O'Donel, or O'Donell. The origin of the arms of this historic family is of remarkable interest and of great antiquity. CONNELL, son of Niall, of the Nine Hostages (1374-402) is recorded, in two of their chief arms, Lives of St. Patrick, to have been converted to Christianity by that saint, who, to reward him for his singular zeal, marked on his shield the sign of the Cross, directing him and his descendants, if murd. after two weeks, to hold the office of victory. The incident is thus related in the Sept. Vita (Tripolite) cap. xcv.: "Et exo cunas baculo suo, quia baculio Jesu diebatur, Crucis Signum ejus Sculto impresso, ascendent nominum, Eternumque dominium in bis recitarunt, ubi baculis ilius in suo scuto impressum gestaret." There can be no doubt that this sign or symbol was borne by his descendants, the Chiefs of Tircroonel, as their emblem, down to the introduction of Heraldry as a science. When Houn O'Donelly, Chief of Tircroonel (thirty-third in descent from Connell) made his submission to the English Government in 1567, and was knighted by Sir Henry Sidney, the Lord Deputy, his arms were then still figured; Arms of Ondonelly, Chief of Tircroonel, s. d. 1567—Or, issuing from the sinister side of the shield an arm fessways vest. cuffed ar. holding in the hand ppr. a cross fitchie flue gu. Motto—In hoc signo vinces. Supporter—Dexter, a lion or; sinister, a bull of the same, both guard. Arms of his son, Hugh Albert, titular Earl of Tircroonel, were precisely the same, as appears by his seal on nominals original issuing from the church of San Idoire, Rome. This line of the family became extinct. The elder branch, i.e., the sons of Cow, son of Calvagh, Chief 1665, have transmitted the descent and the arms to the present day. His three nephews, the last inaugurated Chief, who d. a prisoner in the Tower of London, 1626, from whom descended General Counts DONEL and O'DONEL, Bart., of Newport. Arms of Count
