The Gazette Monitor and Young gentleman was first issued April 12, 1876, with D. P. Stentz as editor and proprietor. It was a seven-column paper, nineteen by twenty-five inches, Democratic in politics. In 1873 it was enlarged to eight columns. During the first year of the paper's existence the office was in the lower story of the building in which it is at present. It was then removed to Odd-Fellows' Hall, and remained there about one year. From there it was removed to the present office on Spring Street. The circulation of the paper is now eight hundred. Mr. Stentz has been sole editor from the time of starting until the present, except that C. L. Miller was associated with him for a short time in the fall of 1874.

The Baptist Messenger, a three-column quarto, ten by fourteen inches, issued its first number at Connellsville in April, 1879. The editors were Rev. W. H. Cooper and Rev. E. C. Morgan. Mr. Cooper retired after about a year. The paper is now edited by Rev. Mr. Morgan, and published at the office of the Monitor.

The Connellsville Tribune was commenced in the early part of December, 1874, by R. M. Sibbett, under whose editorialship the paper was Republican. Its changes have been numerous. In 1878, S. J. Hayes was editor, and the paper became "Greenback" in politics. It was soon after sold to Tilghman Hawes, who had edited a paper at Meyersdale, called the Meyersdale Independent, which he sold, and then published a paper there, called the Connellsville Chronicle, which he moved to Connellsville and merged with the Tribune, retaining the latter name. About the 1st of May, 1879, the office was closed, and the press and part of the material was purchased by the Keystone Publishing Company. The paper was made Republican again under Mr. Hawes. When first published the office of the paper was on Water Street, in the building now the "Baltimore House." Later it was removed to Greenland's building on Apple Street.

The Keystone Courier was first issued July 19, 1879, by the Keystone Publishing Company, H. P. Snyder, editor; E. V. Goodchild, manager. Democratic in politics. The office was at first in the Reasinger building, on Main Street. On the 1st of April, 1880, it was moved to its present location on Water Street. The circulation of the paper is fifteen hundred.

Schools.

In the charter of the town of Connellsville, granted by Mr. Connell in 1793, it was provided that "Whereas it is the desire of the said Zachariah Connell that the inhabitants of said town should be accommodated with a commodious seat whereon to erect a house or houses for public worship, and school or schools, he for that purpose alone appropriates the lots Nos. 88 and 96 on said plan for that purpose, free and clear of purchase money or ground-rent forever to the inhabitants of said town, their heirs and successors, to be held in common for the purpose aforesaid, or jointly, as the inhabitants may choose." On the ground so set apart for that purpose the first school-house of Connellsville was erected by subscriptions of the citizens. It was a log building, and stood on the site of the present Union school-house. The date of its erection is not known, but is probably 1806. That it was built prior to October of that year is evident from the tenor of the following extract from the minutes of the Town Council, viz.:

"At a meeting of the Council of the Borough of Connellsville, convened on the [illegible] day of October, 1886, agreeably to notice given by the Town Clerk, a paper was presented to the Council, signed by a majority of the freeholders in the Borough, requesting them to vest the school-house in the Burgess and Town Council and their successors in office forever. The Council agreed accordingly. On motion, it was then resolved that the school-house should be rented to a Teacher for the sum of eighteen dollars per year, and that the money so obtained should be applied to the discharge of the debt which is owing to Messrs. S. & C. Trevor, and to repairs when they must necessarily be made.

"On motion, Resolved that James Francis and Charles Williams be appointed as a Committee to repair the house and to make an offer of the same to George Routes, provided he will engage to pay the annual rent, but in case of his refusal they are to make the same proposal to William Powell, and then make report to the Council."

"On motion, Resolved that George Mathiot, Caleb Trevor, and James Blackstone be a Committee to collect the subscriptions made to the school-house which have not been already paid, and that the Clerk notify them accordingly."

On the 21st of April, 1807, the Council passed an ordinance "vesting the right, jurisdiction, etc., of the school-house and lots thereto belonging in the Burgess and Town Council, and also for regulating the school." This ordinance purported to empower the Council to employ such teachers as they thought fit, and they were required to attend at the school on the first Wednesday of the last month in each quarter, to examine the school and note the improvement made by the scholars. At the same meeting the Council passed the following:

"Resolved, That the hours of tuition to be observed by the present teacher, Mr. Donogh, shall be from eight o'clock till twelve, and from one o'clock till half after five in summer, and in winter from nine o'clock till twelve, and from one o'clock till four."

"Resolved, That each scholar shall pay twelve cents and a half per quarter, or fifty cents per year, for the rent of the school-house, and that Mr. Andrew Donogh, the present teacher, shall collect the same when he receives his payment for his tuition."

In April, 1809, "The Council ordered the clerk to notify Andrew Donogh that unless he proceeds immediately to collect the arrears of rent due for the school-house, and pay the same over to the Council, to be applied to repairs, they will hold him responsible for the same and act accordingly."

April 17, 1809, it was by the Council resolved "that every Preceptor who shall be employed by the Council shall be enjoined and required, as soon as he shall have his subscription completed, to lodge an accurate copy of the same with the Town Clerk." After which Benjamin Evans offered himself as a preceptor, and after some debate was accepted of condition that he should commence a school on or before the first day of the next June, and continue the same for three months without an intermission, "at the end of which term he is to be allowed twenty days, after which he is to continue six months longer if agreeable to the Council."

At the next meeting of the Council (April 24, 1809) Caleb Trevor was appointed "to superintend and cause to be done what repairs are necessary to the school-house for the reception of the teacher and his scholars, and that he be paid for the same out of the borough treasury." On the 15th day of May, 1809, it was resolved "that it shall be the duty of the Town Clerk to inform Benjamin Evans that he must give his Bond for the payment of twelve and one-half cents per quarter for every scholar which may be sent to school, and that unless he agrees to comply therewith and make out a new article binding the subscriber to make such payment they will discontinue him at the end of the First Quarter." Two days later (May 17th) a long discussion was held upon this subject, and "it was concluded that B. Evans should go on to teach school as was first contemplated, without endeavoring to obtain a new subscription."

In September, 1809, the school-house again needed repairs, and Caleb Trevor and Joshua Gibson were appointed to see that necessary repairs were made.

The following extracts from the borough records have reference to teachers and other school matters.

"Oliver Sproul, schoolmaster, ended his first quarter July 1, 1811; had 37½ scholars."

"April 8, 1812, Settled with Oliver Sproul at a meeting of the Council this day, and took his note to Treasurer for $222 in full of Arrearages until this day." Settlement was again made August 10th.

On the 17th of April, 1812, Council "resolved to accept the two lots on the east of the former school lots, it being the present from Alexander Addison to an English school or schools." The deed for these lots was executed by Zachariah Connell (a present from Alexander Addison), May 30, 1812.

March 12, 1814, a meeting was held by the Council "for the purpose of considering whether they will continue to employ the present teacher of the school; they agree to employ him for another half-year at the same rates as heretofore."

July 13, 1814, "Council directed the clerk to call on William Beaty, schoolmaster, for a copy of his School Articles, and to give a Bond for Rent of 12½ cents each scholar per quarter." Clerk reported at next meeting that Mr. Beaty refused to give copy or bond, and at the next meeting, July 30th of the same year, the Council "took the matter into consideration, and agreed to continue Mr. Beaty in the School for three Months longer, without conditions."

In November, 1814, "the Council considered whether they will employ Seth Elias as schoolmaster. After consideration, they agree to confer with him on Wednesday, the 9th inst." No further action in reference to this man is found recorded.

Oct. 7, 1815, the Council ordered two writing-tables made in the school-house, fifteen feet long and seventeen inches wide on each side; "also to have the thinking made tight with sufficient mortar, and the windows glazed and putted."

Aug. 15, 1816, Council resolved that Oliver Sproul be "continued as School-Master at the Borough School-House another quarter." There is nothing found to show whether or not Sproul had been teaching in the borough school continuously from the date of the previous reference to him.

Sept. 22, 1817, "Mr. A. Baldwin, Chairman of the Council, suggested that the Sunday-school was an infringement on the ordinance and supplements thereto for the regulation of the Borough School. A motion was made by Esg. George Mathioli, and seconded, to take the sense of the Council on the above subject, which was done, and determined in the negative. Mr. Abraham Baldwin only in the affirmative."

In 1818 the name of Oliver Sproul again appears as teacher of the borough school.

March 6, 1819, George Bell, schoolmaster, made application to the Council "for the privilege of the Borough School-House, to teach a school therein, which was granted." Oliver Sproul's account was approved, which was apparently the closing up of his service as teacher in the Connellsville school. March 16th, repairs on the school-house were ordered, with new benches, etc.

July 12, 1819, it was by the Council resolved "that Mr. G. Bell be, and he is hereby, requested to continue his school three months longer, under and subject to the same rules which he has heretofore established."

And at the same time an ordinance was unanimously passed "That the 3d sect. of the 23d ordinance, inflicting a fine of $20 on the Burgess or any member of the Council who may directly or indirectly encourage any other teacher except the one who is employed by a majority of the Council, be, and it is hereby, repealed."

On the 1st of October, 1819, "The Council being informed that Mr. Bell, the present teacher in the borough school-house, declines teaching after the expiration of the present quarter, and having an opportunity of supplying his place immediately by Mr. James Killin, a young man of seventeen years of age, have agreed to receive him on trial, they to be at liberty to discharge him at the end of one month if they do not approve of him as a teacher." It appears, however, that James Killin did not then enter upon duty as teacher, neither did Bell retire, for on the 19th of April, 1820, "George Bell's time as teacher being expired, proposals were laid before the Council by William Jessup. The question whether he be employed being put, was decided in the negative." On the 29th of April in the same year Dennis O'Keefe proposed to the Council to engage as teacher of the borough school, and the Council accepted his proposition.

Among the papers brought to light in the demolition of the old Herbert house was an article of agreement between the borough of Connellsville and Dennis O'Keefe, teacher, dated Nov. 11, 1829, which sets forth that the said O'Keefe "doth agree to teach an English School in the Borough School-House; that he shall teach Reading, Writing, Arithmetic, and English Grammar; that when his School shall consist of over forty scholars he shall employ one of his best scholars as an Assistant Teacher."

The school return of the teacher O'Keefe for the quarter ending in February, 1821, embodies the subscription paper, by which certain subscribers agreed to pay him "The sum of $2.50 each, together with 12 cents each, which is for the rent of the school-house, and an equal portion of coal towards each scholar we respectively subscribe or send for each quarter." To this was appended the following names and certification, viz.:

"Lester L. Norton, Treasurer of the Borough of Connellsville."

"The above is a correct Return of the Borough School for the third quarter, ending in February, 1821."

"Yours with respect,"

"D. O'Keefe."

In the minutes of Sept. 18, 1822, "Schoolmaster Clemens" is mentioned. Under date of March 28, 1823, appears as follows: "William Clemens Dr. to the Borough for School-House rents for the first quarter, $15.18."

It appears that Mr. Clemens neglected the business of his school so much that the Council ordered him to account to that body at its next meeting. This order brought from Mr. Clemens a statement, and action of the Council upon it as follows:

"William Clemens (Borough teacher) exhibited his account, which was reduced. The amount rendered by Mr. Clemens is as follows, viz.:"

"Amount due for rent up to 28th inst., $14.32, due for school-house rent. Mr. Clemens presented his account against the borough, which was examined and adjusted and approved to amount of $2.571. Bal, due to the Borough, $17.42."

Clemens was succeeded, by a Mr. Fleming, who taught the borough school in 1826. A school was opened by D. S. Knox, on Peach Street,—the lot now owned by Isaac Taylor, where Mrs. Russell lives. After a time an arrangement was made to combine the two schools, and some of the citizens of Connellsville still recollect the day when the pupils of the Knox school were marched in a body from Peach Street to the borough school-house.

July 16, 1827.—It was by the Council "Resolved that Mr. Lewis be permitted to teach in the Borough School-House for one year from date, without rent, he to make all repairs, and the Borough to have the use of the house for elections and other meetings."

July 31, 1828.—Mr. McGlaughlin was "permitted to teach in the Borough School-House for one quarter, free of rent, except repairs."

On the 27th of October, 1829, the Council resolved "That the wreck of the school-house be exposed to public Sale on Thursday, the 8th instant." On the 8th of February following the Council

"Resolved, That whereas a subscription has been got up by the Citizens of the Borough for building a School house on one of the Lots owned by the Borough for such use, Resolved, That the building committee who may be appointed by the citizens be and they are hereby authorized to cause said school-house to be erected on such part of said lot or lots as they may think proper or the Citizens direct. Resolved, That the proceeds of the sale of the wreck of the old school-house be and are hereby appropriated towards erecting said school-house, and that the Burgess draw his order in favor of the Building Committee for the amount of said proceeds. Resolved, That the said Building Committee, or any person they may contract with, have liberty to make brick for said school-house on said lot or lots, or the street adjoining the same, and to use the clay thereon for the purpose, provided they fill up any holes they may dig in the street in a reasonable time."

June 30, 1839, a special meeting of the Council was held to receive a memorial of the citizens of the borough and acting on it. It was presented, and after deliberation the Council "Resolved that if a Majority of the Taxable inhabitants sign a paper and present the same to the Council in the following words, to wit: We, the undersigned, Taxable inhabitants of the Borough of Connellsville, do object to the building of a borough School-House, or any other improvements within the Borough, by the collection of a tax or otherwise the present year," then the present Council do hereby Resolve to repeal the ordinance regulating the Borough tax, passed June 3d instant."

With occasional resolutions by the Council to build a new school-house, and remonstrances against the same by the inhabitants of the borough, nothing was accomplished, and Connellsville remained without a borough school-house from the sale of the "wreck" of the old building until several years after the passage of the free public school law in 1834. By the provisions of that law, authority over the schools was transferred from the borough to the board of school directors. Such a board was constituted for Connellsville by the appointment of William Davidson and Henry W. Lewis by the court at its January term in 1835. They were succeeded by Valentine Coughenour and James G. Turner, who were elected in March of the same year.

In 1838, John Fuller and Dr. L. Lindley were elected school directors. At that time Connellsville was still without a school-house, all schools having been taught in rented rooms after the abandonment of the old school-house in 1829. Prominent among the schools so taught during the period referred to was the school taught by Robert Torrance, at his house on Church (Pittsburgh) Street, where he had an attendance of about eighty scholars. But when Messrs. Fuller and Lindley became the school directors they determined to erect school-houses, even if on that account it should become necessary to close the schools for the year for lack of money. It may be questionable whether they kept entirely within the requirements of the law in this regard; but however this may have been, they succeeded in erecting three buildings. One of these, located on Mount Huff (present school-house grounds), was the brick building which is still standing there; another was the Quaker graveyard school-house, built on a lot purchased of Henry Blackstone, and the third was the school-house on the "Pinnacle." The first teacher (or certainly one of the earliest) in the brick house on Mount Huff was James Melvaine, who had charge of that school in the year 1840.

The school-houses erected by the efforts of Messrs. Fuller and Lindley were continued in use for the schools until the completion of the present fine and commodious school-building. The "Pinnacle" lot and school-house was then sold to John K. Brown. The "Mount Huff" school-house is now the janitor's house on the public school ground. The Quaker graveyard school lot, which was purchased of Henry Blackstone, is still owned by the borough school district.

The borough of Connellsville was erected into a separate and independent school district by the Court of Quarter Sessions of Fayette County at the March term in 1852. Six directors were to be elected, and on the 5th of April of the same year the following-named persons were so elected to form the first school board of the district under the new organization, viz.: Stephen Robbins, for one year. Josiah Kurtz, for one year. Abram Shellengerber, for two years. John Taylor, for two years. John Collins, for three years. George White, for three years.

On the 14th of October following, the borough was divided into five sub-districts.

The project to build a new and commodious school-house of sufficient capacity to accommodate the schools of the borough began to be agitated in 1865, and on the 11th of March, 1866, it was resolved "to build a three-story School-House, sixty by sixty-six feet," and to borrow money on borough school bonds for that purpose. No further action of importance was taken in the premises during that year.

On the 6th of May, 1867, a plan for a school-house was submitted by Barr & Mosier, architects, of Pittsburgh. The plan was adopted, and on the 14th of the same month a contract for the building was awarded to Christian Snider at $14,000.

May 21, 1867, a petition was presented signed by thirty-eight citizens of the borough protesting against the erection of the school-house, also a petition from others praying that the contract be carried out.

On the 5th of August following the board of school directors received a communication from the Town Council of Connellsville as follows: "To the Board of School Directors of Connellsville Borough: Gentlemen,—At a meeting of the Town Council of said borough, held on Saturday, Aug. 3, 1867, the following proceedings were had: 'Resolved that the School Directors of Connellsville Borough be notified to stop proceedings in regard to building a school-house until said Directors shall have conference with said Council in reference to the construction of said house.'"

In reply to this communication the school board "Resolved that as the Charter of the Borough of Connellsville, as well as the Deed from Connell, donates or conveys the public ground for school-houses and churches, and as since the organization of the public system the said ground has already been granted by the Borough to the School Board, and one School-House already erected thereon, therefore the said Board have a right to continue to occupy said ground for the purpose of erecting additional school-houses thereon without further permission from the Town Council. We therefore respectfully ask said Council to show cause, if any there be, why said ground shall not now be used for the purpose of erecting a school-house thereon." No further collision occurred between the board and the Council in reference to the matter.

In February, 1868, Christian Snider's contract for building the school-house was cancelled, the board paying him for expenses already incurred. The plans of the building were then slightly changed, and on the 4th of May following a new contract was made with John Kilpatrick for a brick building, fifty-five by seventy feet in dimensions and three stories high, for eleven thousand two hundred dollars.

Work upon the new school-house was commenced and continued through the summer and fall of 1868 and spring of 1869, and on the 11th of June in the latter year the board accepted the building from the contractor, who was paid in the settlement as follows:

On Monday, June 14, 1869, the new house was first occupied by the schools of Connellsville under S. P. Espy as principal. He was succeeded by M. L. Baer, the present principal.

There are now (June, 1881) seven hundred and sixty-two scholars, under twelve teachers, in all the departments. The total receipts from all sources for the year ending June 1, 1881, were $8594.72; expenditures, $7977.28. The directors for 1881 are Stephen McBride, President; H. P. Snyder, Treasurer; L. P. Norton, Secretary; Dr. Smith Buttermore, Dr. P. J. Staufer, William B. Miner.

CHURCHES.

Connellsville Baptist Church.

The Baptist Church in Connellsville was constituted June 26, 1796, with the following-named constituent members: David Lobdell, Samuel Trevor, Caleb Trevor, Joshua Lobdell, Michael Bryant, Sarah Muirs, Sarah Trevor, Nancy Bryant, and Mary Lobdell,—all being members of regular Baptist Churches in Europe and America.

In the early days of the church the deacons were Samuel Trevor and David Lobdell. Its records even at this early period show that the church was purely apostolic in doctrine, practice, and discipline. During the first thirty years of its existence its members were ministered to by evangelists and chosen ones of their own number having ability to teach. The first regularly installed pastor was Elder James Frey, who served from 1804 to 1809, inclusive. In 1810 the Rev. George Watkin became pastor, and served in that office till 1815. From that time to 1830 the church was served by James Estep, afterwards D.D., who labored with this congregation in word and doctrine. He was succeeded by the Rev. Lester Norton, who served in the pastorate for two years.

In 1832 the pastoral charge of the church was assumed by the Rev. Benoni Allen, a popular preacher, mighty in the Scriptures, and a giant in debate. During this period the minutes of the church show that there was rarely a meeting held in which there were no converts seeking admission into the church. It numbered at that time one hundred and fifty members. In 1835 the Rev. J. P. Rockafeller became pastor and continued until 1837, when the Rev. Mil-

The date of the erection of the old stone house of worship on the hill has not been ascertained, beyond the fact that it was prior to the year 1811. It has been said that Zachariah Connell, the founder of the town, and a member of the Methodist Church, donated the lot and building to the society. This state-

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

Much that pertains in general to the early history of the Methodist Episcopal Churches of this section of country, including that at Connellsville, will be found in the history of the church of this denomination at Uniontown, to which reference may be had. When Robert Ayres and John Smith were appointed to this circuit by the Conference in 1786, there is little doubt that Connellsville was one of their preaching-places. In 1789 Ayres became a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church of Brownsville, where he resided many years. In 1848 the Rev. P. McGowan collected and recorded all the information that could be found in reference to the history of this church. He says of 1789,—

"There is reason to believe that there was a society at Connellsville at this time. Anthony Banning, who resided at Connellsville, was received on trial in the traveling connection this year, but located in 1791, and afterwards resided in the same place." Of 1792 he says, "It is believed that about this time Connellsville was attached to the Pittsburgh Circuit." In 1802 Connellsville was in the Baltimore Conference, Pittsburgh District. McGowan says of 1811, 'This year the circuit is named Connellsville, and the uncertainty under which we have labored, ceases as it respects the circuit with which this appointment has been connected. The writer is not at present able to state with precision the date of the erection of the stone meeting-house on the hill. It was previous, however, to this year.'

The preachers on the circuit in that and succeeding years were:

1811.—John Meek, Jacob Gorwell.
1812.—Simon Lanch, Louis R. Fechtige.
1813.—Thornton Fleming.
1816.—John Mackerles.

ment may be true, but it is not fully authenticated. The old edifice was used for many years, but finally abandoned as a place of worship, and was sold to John Taylor, who sold it to Geibhart, Freeman & Co. It was afterwards used as a foundry for about ten years. In 1871 it was sold to the Roman Catholics, and by them demolished to make room for their new house of worship.

In 1836 the society purchased by contract for one hundred dollars a part of lot No. 132, situated on Apple Street and Meadow Alley, which property was deeded by the Presbytery, and by them demolished to make room for their new house of worship.

The present membership of the church is about three hundred. There is in connection with the church a Sabbath-school of about one hundred and twenty scholars, under charge of twenty-four teachers and the superintendent of Charles Whitley.

PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF CONNELSVILLE:

"The first notice of Connellsville in the minutes of Presbytery is the record of the presentation of a memorial from the inhabitants of Connellsville, praying for leave from Presbytery to obtain occasional supplies. This was laid on the table." (Min. Pres., vol. iv, p. 52. Saltzsbury, Ind. Co., Oct. 5, 1830.)

"At this time there were but few members in Connellsville, among them Alexander Johnston and family, Wm. Little and family, and Isaac Taylor and family. These were members at Tyrone, and Mr. Johnston was an elder. The next mention occurs in the minutes of the meeting of Presbytery at Reddick, Oct. 4, 1831. A memorial from the inhabitants of Connellsville was then presented to Presbytery, praying to be organized into a congregation, also to obtain supplies, which was granted. The records of this church, which are preserved from the beginning, state that application was made by the members of the Presbyterian Church residing in Connellsville and vicinity to the Presbytery of Redstone, and the application was granted, and all those persons members of the churches at Tyrone and Laurel Hill residing in Connellsville were set off and authorized to organize a church at the latter place. This seems to have been an organization, as no further reference to it is made, and the church of Connellsville appears in the spring of 1832 in a statistical report of Presbytery."

The names of the original members of this church were as follows: Alexander Johnston (elder), Mary Little, Isaac Taylor, William Little, Sarah Turner, Joseph Rogers and Elizabeth Rogers, Elizabeth Carson, Nancy Norton, Louisa Norton, Margaret Francis, Harriet Fuller, Margaret Little, Caroline Trevor, Mary Barnett, Samuel Finley and Mary Finley, Samuel McCormick and Elizabeth McCormick.

Besides these there were four communicants set off at the same time who resided at Indian Creek, who continued in connection till 1842 or 1843, when the church at Indian Creek was organized.

The services of this church were first held in the Baptist house of worship, and communions in the old Methodist Church on the hill,—the site of the present Catholic Church. In the church record bearing date Jan. 6, 1839, occurs this passage: "On this day the church erected for the use of the Presbyterian Church of Connellsville was opened for the occupancy of the congregation. The occasion was marked with appropriate religious services."

This building continued in use till March 29, 1863, when it was destroyed by fire. The church record of that date says, "Our church was destroyed this morning by fire." The walls of the building remained standing, and the church was soon rebuilt as at present. In the summer of 1871 two lots were donated on Peach Street (one by John Taylor, the other by J. R. Johnston and T. W. Watt). A parsonage was erected at a cost of $3116.

The first meeting for the election of elders was held in the Baptist Church Aug. 2, 1832, at which time and place William Lytle, Isaac Taylor, Joseph Pauli, Joseph Rogers, and Samuel Russell were elected to that office. On the 7th of March, 1844, Robert Trevor, Noble C. McCormick, and Joseph H. Cunningham were elected; in March, 1850, Mr. Mccrea and John Taylor; Sept. 27, 1851, Samuel A. Russell was elected an elder, he having then recently been received from the Laurel Hill Church. On the 26th of March, 1866, Robert Beatty was elected elder; James Allen was elected Feb. 24, 1868; John R. Johnston and James L. Paull were elected Jan. 19, 1873; Henry C. McCormick and A. B. Hosack, in February, 1874; William Barnett and Adam Armstrong elected June 6, 1875, and ordained November 28th same year. Charles N. Boyd and Jacob May were elected Feb. 1, 1878; ordained April 28th same year. Mr. Boyd was dismissed to Somerset (where he is now ruling elder) May 18, 1879. James Calhoun and Hugh M. Kerr were elected May 18, 1879, and ordained December 7th same year. The present bench of elders consists of James Allen, H. C. McCormick, William Barnett, A. Armstrong, Jacob May, James Calhoun, and H. M. Kerr.

On the 28th of April, 1874, the Presbyterian Church of Dunbar was set off from this church by the Presbytery, and Joseph Paull, John Taylor, James L. Paull, and Thomas W. Watt were transferred as ruling elders.
The first religious services regularly held by Presbyterians in Connellsville were conducted by the Rev. T. M. Chestnut, who was sent here by the Board of Missions. This was before the organization of the church had been effected. When the application for organization was granted by the Presbytery, as before mentioned, the Rev. Robert Johnston and the Rev. A. O. Patterson were appointed as supplies to Connellsville. The church minutes (Dec. 15, 1831) state that the Rev. J. L. Hawkins, of the Presbytery of Washington, having been invited by the members of the church, entered upon this field of labor as a missionary, under direction of the General Assembly's Board of Missions, laboring alternately at Connellsville and Indian Creek. He remained in this field till 1837. The church of Connellsville obtained leave to present a call for him before the Presbytery of Washington. On the 29th of June, 1837, he was received into the Presbytery of Redstone on certificate. A call from this church was presented to him and accepted. He was installed as pastor. The Rev. H. Gillett preached the sermon, and Rev. Mr. Johnston delivered the charge. This pastorate continued until April, 1843, when it was closed at Mr. Hawkins' request. The church was supplied until April, 1843, by the Revs. James Davis, H. Gillett, W. W. McLane, J. B. McKee, A. G. Fairchild, Findley, Eaton, Wilson, Guthrie. In 1845, Mr. R. Stevenson became a stated supply here. He was a licentiate under the care of an Ohio Presbytery, and in April, 1845, he was called by the congregation of this church to take its pastoral charge. On the 13th of June, 1845, Presbytery met at Connellsville, on which occasion Mr. Stevenson was ordained to the work of the ministry, and was installed as pastor of this church. This relation continued until October, 1852, when, after a period of seven years, he requested and was granted a dismissal.

In the spring of 1853 the Rev. James Black accepted a call, and was installed as pastor in April of that year. He remained until April, 1869, when he was called to a professorship in Washington College, and resigned his charge in Connellsville. The church was then variously supplied until March 29, 1863, when a call was extended to Mr. N. H. G. Fife, which he accepted, and on the 29th of April, 1863, was ordained and installed. He requested a dismissal Nov. 29, 1867, which was granted him, after a service of four and a half years. The Rev. Mr. Fields preached as an acceptable supply during the winter of 1867-68, and was called to the pastorate Jan. 22, 1868, and was installed on the second Tuesday of February, the Rev. J. M. Barnett presiding. This relation was dissolved June 1, 1869. In August or September of that year a call was extended to the Rev. J. M. Barnett, which he accepted in April, 1870, and was installed on the third Monday in May of that year, the Rev. N. H. G. Fife preaching the sermon, the Rev. W. W. Ralston delivering the charge to the pastor, and the Rev. D. W. Townsend the charge to the people. Mr. Barnett still remains as pastor of the church.

The original membership of this church (1831) was twenty-two. A report of membership in 1843 showed one hundred and eleven in communion (including members at Indian Creek); in 1853 the membership was one hundred and nine, in 1863 one hundred and thirty-one, in 1873 two hundred and thirty-seven, and at present it is two hundred and sixty-seven. Connected with this church is a Sabbath-school of two hundred and fifty scholars, of which James Calhoun is superintendent.

Methodist Protestant Church.

According to the best information that can be obtained, this church was organized in the Baptist house of worship in Connellsville in November or December, 1830, by the Rev. George Brown; John Wesley Phillips being class-leader. Moses Scott, who was a weaver in the New Haven factories, and a local preacher, labored long at this place and through the neighboring section of country, and succeeded in organizing several societies. His labors resulted in the formation of the Union Circuit, which was connected with the Ohio Conference. By that Conference Moses Scott was ordained deacon in 1831, and appointed to this circuit, which at that time was extensive, containing twelve appointments. In 1832 he was appointed elder and sent to Georgetown Circuit. William Marshall became an assistant to Scott, and left this circuit in 1832.

The Methodist Protestant church edifice on Apple Street in Connellsville was erected in 1852, largely through the earnest and indefatigable labors of J. W. Phillips. The preachers here at that time were William College and James Porter. The first sermon preached in the church building was by John B. Lucas, from the text, "How shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation?"

In 1833 the trustees of the church were Asher Smith, John W. Phillips, Isaac W. Francis, Thomas Kirkpatrick, Samuel Freeman, John Stillwagon, and John Semple.

DISCIPLES' CHURCH.

This church was organized in Connellsville about the year 1839, under the leadership of Lester L. Norton, Abram Shellenberger, Joseph Herbert, and others, its nucleus being formed by a few persons previously Baptists, but who had become dissenters from the doctrines of that church and adopted the views and teachings of Alexander Campbell, who often preached in Connellsville. Services were first held in private houses, with preaching by James Dorsey, J. B. Pratt, — Young, and others. A stone church building was erected about 1840, on a lot on South Alley donated by Joseph Herbert. It was sold to the Lutherans in 1874, and the present church edifice of the Disciples was built on Pittsburgh (or Church) Street, at a cost of $10,000. The dedication sermon was preached by Prof. Charles L. Luce, of Bethany College. The church was for several years under the care of Elders Norton, Shellenberger, and Davidson.

Among the preachers who have ministered for the church have been Alexander Campbell, G. D. Benedict, and others. The present minister is the Rev. Mr. Hyatt. The church now has fifty members, and connected with it is a Sabbath-school of sixty-five scholars, under the superintendency of M. L. Baer.

LEUTHERAN CHURCH.

The organization of this church was effected in 1874, by John Hertzel, John Wilhelm, Jacob Siller, Jacob Wenzler, and Christian Snyder. For a time their services were held in Odd-Fellows' Hall, after which the society purchased the building of the Church of the Disciples, on South Alley, which has since been its place of worship. This church, being under the same charge as the church in West Newton, was first served by the Rev. H. J. H. Lempeke, who remained its minister until the summer of 1876, and was then succeeded by the Rev. P. Doerr, the present pastor. The church is composed of Germans and English. Preaching in the German language is had in the morning services of alternate Sabbaths. The membership is now one hundred and fifty. A Sabbath-school of fifty scholars is under charge of Jacob Wenzler, superintendent.

UNITED PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

On the 30th of October, 1876, the Rev. T. P. Patterson, of Laurel Hill, Rev. A. E. Linn, of Freeport, and Elders Wymer, of West Newton, and Walter T. Brown, of Scottsdale, organized the United Presbyterian Church in Connellsville, with eight constituent members. Services were first held in Armory Hall, Odd-Fellows' Building. In the fall of 1876 two lots of ground on Pittsburgh Street were purchased of Mrs. Dr. Joseph Rogers and Mrs. Henry Blackstone for one thousand dollars, and on these a church edifice of brick has been erected at a cost of about five thousand dollars.

In the spring of 1877 the Rev. A. R. Rankin became pastor, and remained until April, 1878, since which time the church has been without a pastor. It is now ministered to by the Rev. J. A. Brandon as stated supply. The present number of members is thirty-five.

IMMACULATE CONCEPTION CHURCH (ROMAN CATHOLIC).

The Catholic Church in Connellsville numbered in 1871 one hundred communicants, under the Rev. Robert Waters, who is still the pastor. In that year the Catholics purchased the old Methodist meeting-house (which had been for some years used as a foundry), demolished it, and built on its foundation a new church, which was consecrated by Bishop Dominick in July, 1873. The church has now about eight hundred communicants.

BURIAL-GROUNDS.

The first written mention of a cemetery ground in Connellsville (except that embodied in the charter when Zachariah Connell donated one acre of land for a public graveyard) is found in the minutes of the Town Council, where it is recorded that on the 17th of April, 1812, it was by that body “Resolved, That the Grave-Yard be run out, and sufficiently mark'd out;" and on the 10th of July following, the Council made settlement with James Shaw, and issued an order on the treasurer in his favor for $72 "for fencing the Grave-Yard," which shows that the work had been done before that time. Interments had been made there, however, several years before; and it is recollected by Provance McCormick, Esq., that as early as 1806 the old ground contained quite a number of graves, some having head-stones, and others unmarked save by the mounds.

May 29, 1817, the Council "Resolved to appoint a sexton (there having been none previously appointed) for this borough, whose duty it shall be to take charge of the graveyard, keep it in good order, and keep the gate locked, and in case of deceases to dig graves and inter all dead bodies, except those who have been hanged or have committed suicide; such are not to be buried in the graveyard." . . . And Peter Stillwagon, Sr., was appointed sexton.

The location of the old graveyard is between Church Street and Mountain Alley, and adjoining the south side of the public school grounds. Within it are interred the remains of members of most of the old Connellsville families, but it is now neglected and overgrown with brushwood, and seldom used for burials.

The Old Quaker graveyard, embracing about one-fourth of an acre of ground, substantially inclosed by a stone wall, is located on the high bank of the river, in the northwest corner of the borough. It was donated by the Gibson family, Quakers, for the use of that sect. Burials were commenced in it before the year 1800, and nearly as early as those in the ground donated by Mr. Connell. Members of the Gibson, Rogers, and other early Quaker families have been interred within its inclosure. The last burial in this ground was Joseph Paull, son of Col. James Paull.

The Connellsburg Hill Grove Cemetery was chartered Dec. 8, 1868, the charter members being John K. Brown, John Johnston, William Cooley, William C. Johnston, Stephen Robbins, John Taylor, Thomas R. Davidson, James C. Cummings, Joseph Johnston, and Thomas W. Watt. The following were elected officers of the association: John K. Brown, president; John Taylor, treasurer; John Johnston, secretary. The cemetery grounds, comprising seventeen acres, were purchased of John Taylor, at $150 per acre. The location is outside the borough limits, on the north side of the Springfield road leading from Connellsville. The ground was inclosed and laid out in the summer of 1869. It has since been beautified and embellished, and many handsome monuments have been erected in it.

The present (1881) managers of the cemetery are Stephen Robbins, president; John K. Brown, treasurer; Joseph Johnston, secretary; William C. Johnston, P. S. Newmyer, Thomas W. Watt.

The Chestnut Hill Cemetery Association was formed in 1868. On the 9th of October in that year a number of persons, subscribers to the project, met at Odd-Fellows' Hall, when the sum of $1,225 was reported as having been subscribed, and a committee was appointed to examine lands for the cemetery. Two weeks later this committee reported, recommending a lot of fourteen acres lying beyond Rogers' Run, belonging to Mr. S. Freeman, which could be had at $100 per acre. This they were directed to purchase.

Organization was effected Oct. 30, 1868, by the election of Alfred Witter, president; J. T. McCormick, secretary; Aaron Bishop, treasurer; and a board of directors consisting of A. Witter, L. Lindley, J. Wilhelm, H. L. Shepherd, Thomas M. Fee, J. D. Stillwagon, and Peter Demult. At the same time the name of "The Connellsburg Cemetery Company" was adopted, but a few weeks later it was changed to "The Chestnut Hill Cemetery." The association was chartered by the court March 1, 1869. From the land purchased by the association a lot of two and a half acres has since been sold to the Catholics for a cemetery, and a larger lot to Mr. John T. Hogg. The grounds devoted to the purposes of the cemetery have been handsomely laid out and beautified in the modern style, and contain many beautiful and costly memorial stones. The present officers (1881) of the Chestnut Hill Cemetery are J. D. Stillwagon, president; Aaron Bishop, treasurer; J. T. Greenland, secretary; J. D. Stillwagon, J. T. McCormick, Aaron Bishop, J. T. Greenland, Henry Shaw, J. R. Balsley, A. B. Moton, directors.

RAILROADS.

The Pittsburgh and Connellsville Railroad was chartered in 1857, but so many delays and obstacles were encountered by the company in its construction that it was not until the year 1859 that the line was opened for travel from West Newton to Connellsville. The Fayette County Railroad, connecting with the Pittsburgh and Connellsville, and extending from this borough to Uniontown, was opened for travel between these two points Jan. 1, 1860. The latter road was afterwards leased to the Pittsburgh and Connellsville Company, and by them to the Baltimore and Ohio, as is more fully mentioned in the general history of the county.

The borough of Connellsville voted the sum of $100,000 in aid of the Pittsburgh and Connellsville Road, and bonds to that amount were accordingly issued and delivered. Afterwards the railroad company made a proposition that the borough should pay $15,000 in lieu of the bonds (which had been hypothecated for that amount), and receive back the entire issue for cancellation. Upon this proposition a number of the wealthy citizens of Connellsville furnished the money, which was paid to the corporation, and the bonds were thereupon returned and cancelled, the citizens who had furnished the money being in due time reimbursed by the borough.
HISTORY OF FAYETTE COUNTY, PENNSYLVANIA.

On the 14th of July, 1857, permission was granted by the borough to the railroad company to occupy twelve and one-half feet in width of Water Street next the river, and "to occupy so much of the Public Ground between said Water Street and the river as may be necessary for the laying of additional tracks, and for their convenience in the general conduct of their business as a railroad company." The railroad southeast of Connellsville was opened through to Cumberland in 1871. The Pittsburgh and Connellsville and Fayette County Railroads were leased in December, 1875, to the Baltimore and Ohio Company, by whom they are now run and operated. The Connellsville depot of the Baltimore and Ohio line is on the river front, nearly opposite the foot of North Alley.

OPERATIONS OF THE BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAILROAD AT CONNELLSVILLE.

Connellsville is the headquarters of repairs for the Pittsburgh Division of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and all supplies for that division are kept at this point. The repair- and car-shops (located just north of the passenger depot) were built and put in operation by the Pittsburgh and Connellsville Company before the lease of that road to the Baltimore and Ohio, and these have been continued by the latter company since the leasing. Passenger- and freight-cars are built here, and locomotives are repaired and rebuilt. Engine No. 1 of the Pittsburgh and Connellsville Road is still in service on the Pittsburgh Division, being now numbered 792 of the Baltimore and Ohio. The passenger-car shop is 75 by 120 feet in dimensions, admitting the building of two cars at the same time. The round-house has a capacity for twenty-four locomotives.

About one-fourth of a mile lower down the river and track is the freight-car shop, located on ground donated for the purpose by the Connellsville Mutual Building and Loan Association. The main shop is about 50 by 250 feet in size, with a wing 50 by 125 feet. In this establishment there is in operation a machine for boring joint-blocks, which was invented here, and is the only one of the kind in use in any of the railroad shops of the country. In the yard at this place the company has appliances for manufacturing all the coke required in its operations on the Pittsburgh Division of the road. The number of men employed here is something more than three hundred.

The general office of the division superintendent is at McCoy's Run, on Water Street. The offices of the machinery department and shops are located west of the depot. The officers in charge are Thomas M. King, general superintendent of the division; J. E. Sampsel, master of machinery; G. M. Serpell, master of roads.

The general freight agent at Connellsville is T. D. Turner. The amount of freight on shipments of all kinds over this road, and billed at Connellsville in each business day in the month of May, 1881, is as follows: $3,475.83, $4,767.20, $4,572.71, $4,811.93, $2,715.51, $4,399.51, $4,997.87, $2,648.46, $3,289.95, $4,462.43, $2,669.94, $2,869.03, $2,842.09, $2,239.03, $3,337.19, $2,402.85, $1,933.48, $4,289.42, $3,699.56, $3,773.70, $4,774.54, $2,673.12, $4,459.79, $4,824.00, $4,162.73, $3,766.82; total for the month, $91,566.72.

This amount includes freight on coke shipped on the Fayette County branch between Uniontown and Connellsville, and shipments of coal from the gas-coal region. The freight in the month of June, 1881, were less than one-half those of the preceding month, aggregating $42,963.09. The express business of that month at the Connellsville office amounted to $1,000.

The passenger agent at Connellsville is John A. Armstrong. The monthly receipts from passenger traffic at this station, from August, 1880, to June, 1881, inclusive, were as follows:

Aug., 1880 . . . . $2,950.17  Feb., 1881 . . . . $4,771.65

SOUTHWEST PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD.

This road was opened for travel through Connellsville and as far south as Mount Braddock in 1875, and was completed to Uniontown late in the fall of the next year. The following amounts were received at Connellsville from passenger traffic on this road during the first half of the year 1881, viz.:

March . . . . 1,291.66  June . . . . 1,849.17

Total for six months, $7,990.76.

In the same month the freights at this station were in amount as follows:

March . . . . 2,166.18  June . . . . 2,831.89

Total for six months, $11,245.99.

Below is given the number of pounds of coke shipped on this road and manifests at Connellsville (being the coke from Pennsville and Davidson's, the last including Moyer's) during the two months ending July 2, 1881:

Showing an aggregate of fifty-seven million three hundred and sixteen thousand seven hundred pounds of coke manifested at Connellsville in two months for shipment over one of its two railroads, and representing the shipments of that product from only two out of the thirty-six stations from which coke is shipped on the Southwest line between Fairchance and Greensburg. From these figures and facts some idea may be had of the magnitude of the coke production and traffic in the region of which Connellsville is the most important centre.

MANUFACTORIES.

THE CONNELLSVILLE MACHINE AND CAR-WORKS.

On the 9th of September, 1865, James McGrath, then foreman of the smith-shops of the Pittsburgh and Connellsville Railroad at Connellsville, leased from Robert W. Francis for the term of ten years a piece of ground fifty-five by ninety feet, located on North Alley, near Water Street, for the purpose of erecting thereon a machine- and smith-shop. On the 16th of the same month he entered into partnership with Bernard Winslow, and they erected a wooden building thirty by fifty feet, and with three smith-fires and one old lathe, commenced business under the name of McGrath & Winslow. Their manufactures consisted mainly of railroad frogs and switches and oil tools. On the 27th of February, 1866, Winslow sold out to George B. and J. T. McCormick, and the firm-name changed to McCormick, McCormick & Co. On September 1st same year William B. Stout and James B. Caven were taken into the partnership, the firm-name remaining unchanged.

The company now added some new machinery, and began to extend their business. Machine-shops of this kind were until then unknown in this region, and people were slow to believe that machine-work and heavy and difficult forgings could be done at Connellsville, but the senior partner, Mr. McGrath, having served his apprenticeship at the extensive works of Charles C. Delaney, of Buffalo, N. Y., and worked in some of the principal work-shops of the country, soon gave evidence that intricate as well as heavy work could be done here as well as in the cities, and soon the company had more orders than their little shop could accommodate. About this time the coke trade began to assume large proportions, and on account of the scarcity of railroad cars several operators began to provide their own. As these cars, owing to the bad condition of the new road, were being continually wrecked and broken, it became necessary for somebody to repair them, and the firm of McGrath, McCormick & Co. undertook the business. Having no suitable place to erect shops, they obtained privilege from the railroad company to lay a track along the bank of the river, immediately south of the present depot, and there, in the open air, for two years they did all the car repairing for the local coal companies, their carpenter-shop consisting of one end of the body of an old passenger-car, the other end being occupied by the railroad company as a car inspector's office and pattern-shop.

On the 13th of March, 1869, the company succeeded in leasing to P. McCormick the lot adjoining their smith-shop, and immediately erected thereon a small car-shop twenty-five by eighty feet, and began the erection of coke-cars, mine-wagons, and all the various tools used in the making of coke.

On the 1st of May following the remaining partners purchased the interest of George B. McCormick, and changed the name of the company to "The Connellsville Machine and Car Company." Business now increased rapidly, and it soon became necessary to seek a better location and to erect works of much larger capacity. Accordingly, on the 26th of March, 1872, the company purchased from the "Connellsville Mutual Building and Loan Association" a tract of land lying on the Pittsburgh and Connellsville Railroad at the mouth of Mounts' Creek, about one-quarter of a mile north of their former location. Here, in the year 1872, they erected a car-shop thirty by one hundred and twenty feet, and on May 21, 1873, they purchased additional ground adjoining, and erected a machine- and forging-shop and foundry of the same dimensions as the car-shop. Later other land was
The company purchased land of D. R. Davidson, adjoining the Pittsburgh and Connellsville Gas-Coal and Coke Company, and erected thereon a frame building about two hundred by seventy-five feet on the ground, and one story (about thirty feet) high. The operations of the company were not successful, and the business had continued less than a year when it was abandoned. The place and the ruins of the building are still known as the 'steel-works,' but these and the name are all that remain of an enterprise which was commenced with high hopes of success and the promise of permanent advantage to the growth and prosperity of the borough of Connellsville.

Connellsville Gas-Works.

The Connellsville and New Haven Gas and Water Company was incorporated March 7, 1871. The corporators were Joseph Johnston, Christopher S. Sherrick, Edward Dean, David Welsh, and Dr. Ellis Phillips. On the 23d of September, 1871, the stockholders met and elected the following-named directors: Joseph Johnston, Edward Dean, Ellis Phillips, David Welsh, John D. Frisbee, J. T. McCormick. The board elected Joseph Johnston, president; John D. Frisbee, treasurer; J. T. McCormick, secretary. On the 31st of July, 1872, a committee appointed for that purpose reported that they had secured a lot of land from the Connellsville Mutual Building and Loan Association on which to erect gas-works. The location chosen for the works is near Mounts' Creek and the Youghiogheny River. A contract was made with Connolly & Taylor to build the works complete and lay all gas-mains ready for use on or before the 1st of November following for $22,000, which was done, and J. T. McCormick was appointed superintendant of the works. At present (June, 1881) J. D. Frisbee is president, and J. M. Kurtz, secretary, treasurer, and superintendent. One of the objects in view in the formation of the company was to supply the borough with water, which is authorized in the incorporation, and which will doubtless be accomplished in the near future.

Civil List of the Borough of Connellsville.

No official account is found of the officers elected on the 7th of April, 1806, the first election after the incorporation of the borough. THE TOWNSHIP.

Connellsville township lies on the east and northeast side of the Youghiogheny River, extending from the stream back into the mountains. The river forms its southern as also all of its western boundary, except where for a short distance at its northern end it joins the township of Tyrone, and excepting also that part where the borough lies between it and the river. On the north and north-northeast it joins Bullskin township, and on the east and southeast it is bounded by Springfield. Next to the Youghiogheny, its largest and most important stream is Mounts' Creek, which enters the river just below the borough. The population of the township by the census of 1880 was thirteen hundred and sixty-six.

The earliest inhabitant of any part of the territory now comprised in Connellsville township was Providence Mounts, who came before 1772, and settled on a tract of four hundred acres of land lying on the Youghiogheny River, and extending from Broad Ford to, and a considerable distance up, Mounts' Creek, which stream received its name from him. On this tract he built his log house and erected a mill, at which he also carried on wool-carding. At the time of his death, in or about 1782, he had received no warrant for the tract on which he settled more than ten years before. It was afterwards warranted and surveyed to his son Abner, Sept. 7, 1786. Providence Mounts left a will, devising property to his sons, Caleb, Joshua, Jesse, and Abner. These emigrated to Kentucky, and the property passed into possession of Stewart H. Whitehill, and in 1826 was purchased by Alexander Johnston.

Next south of Mounts' tract, on the Youghiogheny, was that of William McCormick, whose very early settlement has been mentioned in the history of the borough of Connellsville.

Above the borough and in the southeast part of the township, at a place which afterwards became known as "Trump's Hollow," settled John Trump, son of Henry Trump, who located farther to the southeast.
near the mouth of Indian Creek, in what is now the township of Springfield. John Trump, at his settlement in what is now Connellsville township, erected a small saw-mill, but never gave much attention to running it. He spent most of his time in hunting deer, bears, and bees, having usually a large number of swarms of bees, and selling a good deal of honey. He lived a very secluded life, the greater part of which was spent in hunting. Mr. Joshua Gibson says he was personally acquainted with John Trump for more than fifty years, and in all that time never saw him but twice in the borough of Connellsville. He died since the year 1875, at his home in Trump's Hollow, at the age of seventy-two years. Michael Trump, a brother of John, settled in Connellsville borough, where he lived for many years, and died there. He was a good millwright and carpenter, and a highly respected citizen.

John Gibson came from Chester County, Pa., in 1793, and was concerned with Isaac Meason and Moses Dillon in the erection of the old Union Furnace, in Dunbar township. In 1795 he removed with his wife, his sons, Thomas, Joseph, Joshua, and James, and his daughter Elizabeth, to the McCormick tract, a portion of which (about ninety-two acres) he had purchased, where now are the ruins of the stone mill on the river. Here he built a stone house on the bank of the river, also a grist-mill, saw-mill, rolling- and slitting-mill, and nail-shop, having a tilt-hammer in operation. All these buildings are now in ruins, except the stone house, which is owned by the railroad company.

Of the sons of John Gibson, James died while a young man, at the old stone house; Thomas lived in the south part of the township, where Joshua Gibson (Joseph's son) now lives. He was interested in the Mount Etna Furnace, and had a saw-mill and large landed property both in Connellsville and in the State of Ohio. Joshua (son of John Gibson) was drowned at the Yough Forge in 1808. Joseph was concerned with his brothers in their various enterprises, and was the owner of the land where is now Gibsonville.

Joseph Page, a native of New Jersey, emigrated to Fayette County in 1801, and on the 26th of October in that year purchased of Zachariah Connell the tract of three hundred and two acres called "Confidence," which had been warranted to John Mugger Dec. 20, 1773, and which passed from Mugger through the hands of John Vanderen to Connell. On that tract, where Joshua Gibson now lives, stands an old mill, built by the Pages. In the erection of this old mill, Noah Miller was the millwright, and his two sons were his assistants. The race, one-fourth of a mile in length, was dug by James Rogers.

The sons of Joseph Page were Jonathan, John, Samuel, Joseph, and William. Jonathan was a shoemaker, and lived in the house still standing near Joshua Gibson's. He removed to the borough of Connellsville, where he followed his occupation (shoemaker), and where he died. His daughter Rebecca married D. S. Knox, well known to the citizens of Connellsville and Brownsville. She is still living, and resides at Brownsville, as does also her sister, Miss Mary Page.

Samuel Page (son of Joseph) purchased his father's property July 5, 1814, and in 1815 purchased the tavern stand known as the Banning House, in Connellsville, and lived there many years. His son, Henry Page, still lives in Connellsville. A daughter of Samuel married William Templeton, of Brady's Bend, Pa. Another daughter married John C. Beeson, of Uniontown. Joseph Page (son of Joseph) lived and died in New Jersey. William married a daughter of Zachariah Connell, and removed to the West.

Jacob Buttermore, with his brothers, Peter and George, were early settlers in Connellsville. The two former lived on Mounts' Creek. George's location was on the Mount Pleasant road. They were farmers and teamsters, in the latter capacity working at the hauling of goods between Connellsville and Pittsburgh.

William Glenn came from Ireland, and settled in the vicinity of the old Etna Furnace. He was killed at or near that place in 1830, by a fall from the frame of a house. He had two sons, Nathaniel and William, the latter of whom emigrated to Kentucky. Nathaniel lived at the furnace, and worked there and at the other works in the vicinity nearly all his life. He is still living, about two miles east of Connellsville, near McCoy's Spring, at about the age of eighty-one years.

Azariah Davis lived in the mountains, about five miles southeast of Connellsville borough. He was employed at the salt-works that were built by Isaac Meason in 1810-11. He lived to an advanced age, but moved away from the place in his later years. He was a blacksmith by trade, and was celebrated in all this section of country as a rapid and untiring pedestrian.

John Lemon, from Cecil County, Md., settled here at an early day. He worked as a foundryman nearly all his life, and died on the furnace lands. He was noted as a man of extraordinary memory.

James Carr, an Irishman, was an early settler. He was an ore-digger. In his later years he moved to a new location on the Allegheny River, where he lived till his death, at the extraordinary age of one hundred and five years.

An early settler named Langebaugh lived in the mountains, about two miles southeast of Connellsville borough, in a "Hollow" which still carries his name. He was a mighty hunter. Little or nothing is known of the time of his settlement or when he died.
"Actora Tom," a man part negro and part Indian, was well known in Connellsville township in the years that preceded the close of the last war with Britain. He was a worker in the forges, and had the reputation of being the strongest man west of the Alleghenies. It was said of him that he could carry two forge-hammers at once, one under each arm, each weighing fully six hundred pounds; run an arm through the eye of each hammer; and that he could, and did, throw a fifty-six-pound weight over the drum-beam of the forge (about fourteen feet high) by the power of his little finger alone.

Amos Pritchard was a forge-man in Connellsville township. Afterwards he removed across the Youghiogheny, and died in Dunbar, at the old forge on Dunbar Creek. Maj. Benjamin Pritchard, of Connellsville, was his son.

John Reist was an early settler in the township. He was a farmer, fisherman, and ferryman. He was living at Broad Ford at about the beginning of the present century, and remained there for many years. He had a small plat of land cleared, and his log dwelling stood on the bank where is now the pumping-house of the railroad company. This was afterwards replaced by a stone house. Below it lay the large canoe, or "dig-out," on which he ferried passengers to and fro across the Youghiogheny. He also had an oil-mill, which was in operation as late as 1823.

Mr. Joshua Gibson recollects the following-named persons as having been among the early inhabitants of the township, viz.:

John and Martin Stouffer carried on a little grist-mill on the Youghiogheny, a mile below the borough, which in dry times did grinding for a large section of country. It was in operation in 1823, but how long it continued in use is not known. It fell into decay, and was never rebuilt.

ERECPTION OF CONNELSVILLE TOWNSHIP.

At the March term of the Court of Quarter Sessions of Fayette County in 1822, Isaac Meason, Moses Vance, and Thomas Boyd were appointed commissioners "to enquire into the expediency of dividing Bullskin township, and forming a new township out of part thereof, to be called Connellsville township." At the October sessions in the same year this committee reported to the court "that in pursuance of said order (made by the court at the March sessions), and approving of the propriety of dividing said township, they have divided the same agreeably to the annexed diagram of the courses and distances and natural boundaries, viz.: Beginning on the bank of the Yongh River, below the Broad Ford, at the mouth of Reist's Run; thence up Reist's Run to the mouth of Newcomer's Run; thence up Newcomer's Run to a perpendicular fall in said run at the mouth of Abraham Newcomer's lane, which said runs are the present division line between Bullskin and Tyrone townships; thence south 44°, east 366 perches to the middle of Mounts' Creek in Whitehill's meadow; thence up Mounts Creek to the mouth of White's mill-run, alias Laurel Lick Run; thence up the last-named run to the mouth of Yellow Spring Run at the Connellsville and Berlin new State road; thence along the middle of said road to Salt Lick township line; thence southwardly along the Salt Lick township line to the Yongh River; thence down said river to the place of beginning; which said courses and distances and natural boundaries as above set forth will comprise Connellsville township." This report of the commissioners was approved and confirmed by the court, which thereupon ordered the erection of Connellsville township, to comprise the territory embraced within the boundaries established by the commissioners and described as above in their report.

SCHOOLS.

Until the year 1852 the township and borough of Connells ville were destined in common, and prior to 1831 the schools at which the children of the township received the rudiments of education were chiefly taught in the borough. In that year the law was passed establishing the system of free common schools, and by the operation of that law, granting public money for purposes of education, additional schools were opened in Connells ville as elsewhere in other townships. In conformity to the requirements of the law the Fayette County Court, at the January term of 1835, appointed William Davidson and Henry W. Lewis school directors of the township. In March of the same year a township election was held, resulting in the choice of Valentine Conghenaour and James G. Turner as school directors. On the 14th of September following these directors reported to the treasurer of the county that they had complied with the requirements of the law. The amount of money then apportioned to the township from the State funds was $88.17, and the amount from the county for school purposes, $176.55; total, $264.52.

From the records of the school directors of the township of Connells ville, commencing in 1818 (none earlier having been found), are given the following extracts having reference to the schools of that time:

Oct. 2, 1848, the directors "Resolved to rent an extra house for the use of the schools." March 30, 1849, a committee was appointed to make an estimate of the cost of a brick school-house sixty feet long, twenty-two feet wide, and eight feet high, for the use of two schools. The question of building the house was submitted to the voters at a meeting held on the 12th of May following, and was decided in the negative, thirty-seven to thirtieth.

Notwithstanding this negative vote the directors, on the 30th of May, directed the secretary to give notice that a contract would be let June 30th for building a school-house. The contract was so let to John Shellenberger for $556. On the 7th of July, 1848, a protest by a large number of the inhabitants of the township against building the school-house on the public grounds adjoining the graveyard (in the borough) ; "and," proceeds the record, "as the situation had been recommended by persons living in the vacant districts, and as the people were for several months fully aware of the designs of the board to build upon the said ground, and no opposition having been shown until after the sale for building the said house, and as no suitable situation for building can be had in the vacant districts, Therefore be it Resolved, That the present board have nothing to do with the matter. John Taylor, Secretary."

On the 30th of October, 1849, David Barnes, J. D. Stillwagon, and James Mitchell were examined and passed as teachers. At that time, besides the three schools in the borough, two other schools were taught in the township, viz., at the school-house near Bradford's and at the Narrows. Eight teachers were then employed in the five schools of the township (including those of the borough).

In September, 1850, David Barnes was in charge of School No. 2, and Joseph Shoemaker of the Bradford School. On the 5th of October following J. D. Stillwagon was appointed to School No. 1, Joseph T. McCormick to the North Bend School, and Mrs. Margaret Collins to the Clayton School. The wages then paid to male teachers were twenty dollars per month, and to females twelve dollars and fifty cents.

In October, 1851, Jane Cramer was appointed teacher in the Narrows school-house, and Margaret Collins was given charge of the small school in the Ratcliff house. In this year School No. 2 and the North Bend School were graded. From the 5th of April following, the schools of the township and those of the borough were under separate directions, the borough being formed into a separate and independent district.

After the separation of the borough from the township in school matters, the township contained four school-houses and supported the same number of schools. In 1854, David Barnes taught in the North Bend school-house, Joseph Hale in the Snyder house, George Gregg in the Gibson house, and — Halpin in the school-house at the Narrows. In November, 1855, James Whaley was placed in charge of the Gibson School, J. D. Stillwagon of the North Bend School, and Joseph Cramer of the school at the Narrows. No school was taught in the Bradford school-house during the succeeding winter season.

The Gibson school-house lot was sold in July, 1857. In that year only two schools were taught in the township, viz., at the Narrows and at North Bend, Jesse Smith teaching at the former place and W. McDowell at the latter.

The township now comprises three school districts, viz.: White Rock, the Narrows, and Rock Ridge. Number of school-houses, schools, and teachers of each, three; number of pupils, three hundred; value of school property in township, three thousand dollars.

Following is a list, as nearly as can be ascertained, of school directors elected in Connellsville township since 1853, no names of school directors being found in election returns of the township prior to that date:

1853. Henry Gibson, Daniel B. Davidson.
1854. Hirum Snyder, William Dennison.
1855. A. Huntly, John Buttermore.
1856. Thomas Buttermore.
1858. John Taylor, George B. McCormick.
1860. Philo Norton, Peter Stillwagon.
1866. Jesse Smith, Robert Beatty.
1869. Jesse Smith, John Covert.
1873. David Blackburn, Joseph Sisson.
1874. Isaac French, George B. McCormick, Jesse Smith.
1875. Jacob S. Hiltiberan, Jacob May.
1877. Strickler Stacey, George B. Shaffer.
1878. Jacob May, George Swank.
1879. Albert Nicholson, Stewart Darbin, Jacob Wilhey.
1881. Henry Blackstone.

MANUFACTURING ESTABLISHMENTS.

The old "Rogers Paper-Mill," the earliest manufacturing establishment within the territory now comprised in the township of Connellsville, was erected in 1810 by Daniel and Joseph Rogers, of Connellsville, and Zadoc Walker, of Uniontown. Its location was on the right bank of the Youghiogheny River, a short distance above the present village and railroad station of Gibsonville. The "Pittsburgh Almanac" for 1812 says, "D. and J. Rogers erected lately a Paper-Mill on the Youghiogheny River above Connellsville."

The Messrs. Rogers and Walker were succeeded in the proprietorship of the mill by D. S. Knox, M. Lore, and John Scott, who, as a firm, continued the manufacture of paper until March 21, 1836, when the business was closed and the firm dissolved, its affairs being wound up by D. S. Knox.

The paper manufactured at this mill was of very superior quality, caused, as it was said, by the clearness and purity of the water which was used, that of the Youghiogheny River. The product of the mill was shipped by the boat-load to New Orleans and other points on the lower river. The business done here, both by the original proprietors and by Mr. Knox and his partners (but particularly by the latter firm), was very large, and quite a little village grew up in the vicinity of the mill. Only an old stone house and a mass of ruins now remain to show the location of the once prosperous manufactury and the neighboring dwellings.

The Pittsburgh and Connellsville Gas-Cool and Coke Company's Works are located on the railroad at Davidson's Station, north of the borough limits, on a tract of about four hundred acres of land purchased of Daniel R. Davidson and Faber & Miskimmons, of Pittsburgh.

About 1856, Norton, Faber & Miskimmons commenced operations at this place, and had sunk a shaft about eighty feet in depth when circumstances compelled a suspension of the work. Norton sold out his share to the two other partners, whose interest was afterwards purchased by the company as above mentioned.

The company was organized about 1860, with a capital of $200,000. Having purchased the Davidson lands and the Faber & Miskimmons interest, they commenced work at once, sunk a shaft, and built and put in operation forty coke-ovens, which number was increased by John H. Dravo, who took charge in 1868. The business has been successful from the beginning. The shaft is 150 feet in depth, with drifts (one a mile... in length) tending towards the surface. Tenant-houses and a store are connected with the works. The company has now 295 ovens, and the extent of its operations may be judged from the amount of coke shipped, as shown in the railroad statistics embraced in the history of Connellsville borough. The works are under charge of Charles Davidson, manager. The directors of the company are James M. Bailey, president; John F. Dravo, secretary and treasurer; Alexander Bradley, William Van Kirk, Richard Grey, and Daniel R. Davidson, of Beaver, Pa.

The Overholt Distillery, located on the bank of the Youghiogheny at Broad Ford, and widely known and famed for the high grade of its product, was erected and put in operation by Abraham Overholt in the year 1853. At that time it had a capacity to distill one hundred bushels of grain per day. Soon after the starting of the establishment Mr. Overholt took in as partners his two sons, Henry and Jacob. The latter died while a member of the firm, and in 1863, Henry Overholt sold out his interest, and A. O. Tinstman became a partner with Abraham Overholt. In 1867 the present distillery building was erected. It is four full stories high, with attics, and sixty-six by one hundred and twelve feet on the ground, with two wings twenty-five by twenty-five feet each, and three stories high. Business was commenced in this building in 1868.

After the death of Abraham Overholt, in 1869, the business was continued by the executor of his estate and A. O. Tinstman till 1872, when Tinstman purchased the Overholt interest, and carried on the business alone till the latter part of 1874, when C. S. O. Tinstman became associated with him. In 1876, C. S. O. Tinstman and C. Frichman became proprietors of the distillery. In 1878, James G. Pontefract was added to the firm, and soon after Tinstman & Frichman sold their interest to Henry C. Frick. The establishment is now under the management of J. G. Pontefract. The buildings contain an aggregate of about one and a half acres of flooring, and the works have a capacity for distilling four hundred bushels of grain every twelve hours.

GIBSONVILLE.

The land on which Gibsonville is located was taken up by John Mugger, Dec. 29, 1773, in the tract of 392 acres called "Confidence." On the 12th of January, 1774, it was conveyed to John Vanderen, and in the same year it came into possession of Zachariah Connell. He, on the 26th of October, 1801, sold it to Joseph Pace, who conveyed it to Samuel Page, July 5, 1814. May 1, 1817, it was purchased by Thomas and Joseph Gibson.

In March, 1836, the property of Thomas and Joseph Gibson was divided under an order of the court, and the site of Gibsonville fell to the heirs of Joseph Gibson. On the 1st of April, 1844, Joshua Gibson (son of Joseph) purchased the interest of the other heirs in the land.

In the spring of 1860 the only inhabitants of the place which is now Gibsonville were Isaac Carr, Isaac Hale, and Sarah and Elizabeth Hale. In the fall and winter of 1863 the brick-works were constructed there by Jackson Spriggs, of Washington County. In the winter of 1867-68 the Lumber and Stone Company erected here a steam saw-mill, dwelling-house, office, and stables, under the management of Hugh Holmes.

In the spring of 1870 the first store in the place was opened by Edward Collins. A second one was opened soon after by A. B. Hosick, and two years later a third was started by Joshua Gibson. In November, 1870, John Hilkey opened a shoe-shop in a building near the railroad bridge.

Gibsonville was platted and laid out by Joshua Gibson, on the 5th of December, 1870. The population of the place on the 13th of January, 1871, was ninety-six persons. In March of the same year the auger-works were built by Thomas St. John.

In May, 1879, Joshua Gibson donated a lot (No. 15) in the town plat to the Presbyterian Church of Connellsville, on condition that they should erect a chapel on it within two years. On the 1st of the same month the name of the railroad station at this place was changed back from "White Rock" to "Gibson's." On the 20th of January, 1880, Gibsonville contained a population of 205. It now contains about three hundred inhabitants.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

JOSEPH GIBBS GIBSON.

Mr. Joshua G. Gibson is one of the most esteemed citizens of Fayette County. He resides within the limits of "Gibson's Station," on the line of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, near Connellsville, where he was born, March 15, 1811, in what has been since the downfall of the celebrated Crawford's cabin the oldest house ever built in the region by a white man. The house is made of logs, and was erected about 1776 by William McCormick, and was weather-boarded for the first time about 1840, and now has the appearance of a modern wooden structure. In this house Mr. Gibson spent the years of his early boyhood.

He is of English Quaker stock on the paternal side; on the maternal of New England extraction. His great-grandfather, Thomas Gibson (whose father was a Quaker preacher), came from England in 1728 and settled on Brandywine Creek, Chester Co., Pa., where Mr. Gibson's grandfather, John Gibson, was born, and where he owned grist- and saw-mills on the banks of the creek a mile below the celebrated Brandywine battle-field. He was wont to relate seeing the blood-stained water course by his mills on the day of the battle, which he with his neighbors climbed the hills and witnessed.

In October, 1795, John Gibson removed with his family from Chester County to Fayette County, and settled near what is now the “Union Furnace,” and there assisted Isaac Meason and Moses Dillon to erect the second blast-furnace put up west of the Allegheny Mountains. He had five sons and one daughter, of whom Joseph Gibson, the father of Joshua G. Gibson, was the second child, and was born in Chester County. He was reared mainly in Fayette County, and became an iron-master, though considerably engaged in agriculture, owning with his brother a large tract of land. In 1815 he erected the old .Etta Furnace in Connelsville, which was in active operation for about thirty years. About it he put up many log and frame houses, which years ago tumbled down in decay. Joseph Gibson died in 1819, when only thirty-nine years of age, but worn out by hard work and exposure to the inclemencies of the climate.

About 1810 he married Anna Gibbs, a native of Connecticut, who had come from that State into Fayette County some years before with a relative. She died about three years after the death of her husband, leaving four children, of whom Joshua was the oldest.

Mr. Gibson received his education from an old Englishman, a Revolutionary soldier, who fought on the side of the rebels, and after the war pursued teaching and clerking at the iron-works in Connelsville. At about sixteen years of age Mr. Gibson went into both the timber business and farming, which he conducted as his chief business for about fifty years. In January, 1824, he moved upon the farm and into the stone house which he still occupies on the bank of the Youghiogheny River. In 1870 he laid out a portion of this farm into village lots, and has erected thereon about eighteen houses himself, and sold several lots upon which others have built.

Mr. Gibson has always been an industrious man, domestic in his tastes, temperate, and social in disposition, but never mingles intimately with his intermediate social surroundings outside of his family, though noted for his jocularity and salient wit. But withal he is, in some respects, a peculiar man, indulging idiosyncratic tastes at times, as is illustrated by the fact that it has been his habit for a period of over forty years to take annual excursions alone to the Atlantic seaboard, or among the Indians of the lakes or of Canada, among whom he usually spends two or three months, by them being called “the Pennsylvania Quaker,” or “Waco,” which is understood to be the Indian translation of the former designation. Visiting with these people Mr. Gibson finds great diversion, and thinks he thereby conserves his health. He returns home invariably buoyant in spirits, finding the old home with its comfortable surroundings a new Eden, wherein he settles down again in quiet and peace. Thus he renew his age and his home, and escapes for a while each year the perplexities of business and the corroding temptations of avarice, and so will, doubtless, lengthen out his green old age far beyond the Scriptural allotment of life to man.

Mr. Gibson was an Old-Line Whig in politics, and is now a Republican, but “never bothered with partisan politics.” In 1832 he married Mrs. Ellen Simonson, of Connelsville, by whom he has two daughters and a son.

THOMAS R. DAVIDSON.

Among the distinguished men of Fayette County who have passed away, stood eminent in professional and social life, Thomas R. Davidson, who was born in Connelsville, Oct. 6, 1814, the son of William and Sarah Rogers Davidson, both of Scotch-Irish descent. William Davidson, the father, was an old iron-master, State senator, and a man of great mental vigor. Thomas R. Davidson received his education at home and at Kenyon College, Ohio, and after being admitted to the bar, practiced law for some years in Uniontown, where he married Isabella Austin, daughter of John M. Austin, then one of the leaders of the bar in his section of the State. Of this union were two children,—Mary D., now wife of P. S. Newmyer, of Connelsville, and William A., at present practicing law in Cincinnati, Ohio. Shortly after his marriage he located in Connelsville, his old home, where he continued during the remainder of his life in the duties of his profession, and engaged in various enterprises for the advancement of the community in which he was interested. He was very cautious and reticent in business pursuits, but was quite successful and accumulated a handsome estate. He had no desire for political advancement, preferring the more congenial walks of private life, though he once accepted the honorary office of presidential elector. Mr. Davidson died Nov. 3, 1875.

His appearance was very commanding, he being in stature six and one-half feet, finely proportioned, and weighing two hundred and forty-two pounds. Perhaps a more correct estimate of his character and standing could not be given than that expressed in the following extract from a tribute by James Darsie, who knew him long and well:

“His departure from our midst has left an aching void which cannot be filled. No other man can take his place, do the work, and command the confidence that was reposed in him by the entire community. He was indeed the rich man’s counselor and the poor man’s friend, and was universally esteemed, honored, and beloved as a man of lofty principle, generous and magnanimous impulses, and of spotless integrity. I have rarely met one who had so great an abhorrence of a mean, dishonorable, or dishonest act as he; indeed, the love of truth and justice was in him innate. While in principle stern and unbending, even to severity, in heart and sympathy he was tender as a child. He never disappointed the hopes and expectations of his friends, or betrayed a trust committed to his hands. He practiced his profession not so much for profit as to heal the animosities, adjust the difficulties, and restore the peace and confidence of neighbors. I presume I may safely say he settled more disputes by his sagacity, wisdom, and moderation than he ever did by the hard process of law, and oftentimes prevailed upon his clients to amicably settle their disputes rather than risk the vexation and uncertainty of an appeal to a legal tribunal. He was, indeed, a peacemaker in the highest sense of that term, and had a far more honest satisfaction in amicably settling a difficulty than in gaining a suit before a judge and jury. In one word, he filled the full outline of that sentiment happily expressed by one of England's noblest bards,—

"An honest man's the noblest work of God."

The following testimonial to his great worth is quoted from resolutions by the bar of Fayette County:

"It is with heartfelt sorrow and unfeigned regret that we are compelled to submit to the loss of one so endeared to us all by long and pleasant associations. His genial, warm, and affectionate disposition, his tender regard for the feelings of others, his uniform courtesy and affability, and, above all, his high sense of honor and strict integrity secured to him the love and respect alike of bench and bar. This bar has lost a sound lawyer, an able counselor and upright man, whose honor and integrity were only equalled by his unassuming modesty and affability."

DR. LUTELLUS LINDLEY.

The Lindleys of America trace their English lineage through Francis Lindley, who came to this country with his Puritan brethren from Holland in the "Mayflower." Demas Lindley, the grandfather of the late Dr. Latellus Lindley, migrated from New Jersey, and settled on Ten-Mile Creek, Washington Co., Pa., about the middle of the eighteenth century. There the Rev. Jacob Lindley, Dr. Lindley's father, was born in a block-house, the resort for protection against the Indians of the white settlers of the region. The Rev. Jacob was educated at Princeton College, and early in his ministerial life removed to Athens, Ohio, and took active part in the building and establishment of the Ohio University at that place, of which he held the presidency for over twenty-five years. His oldest child was the Rev. Daniel Lindley, the famous missionary, under the American Board, to South Africa, where he remained for some twenty-seven years. He died in New York at the venerable age of eighty years.

Dr. Lindley, born Feb. 1, 1808, was educated at the Ohio University, under his father's charge, and was prepared for graduation at the early age of sixteen, but on account of ill health deferred it for two years, till 1826, when he went to Virginia, and there taught a private school composed of the children of several neighboring planters. In 1831 he betook himself to Ten-Mile Creek, read medicine with Dr. Henry Blatchley, a daughter of whom, Maria, he married in 1833; and in March, 1834, he removed to Connellsville, where he practiced medicine with great success for about forty-seven years, and died Oct. 25, 1881.

Dr. Lindley was singularly devoted to his profession, but enjoyed a great reputation, not only for professional skill, but for urbanity, a generous hospitality, and scrupulous integrity, commanding the affection as well as confidence of his neighbors and a wide circle of acquaintances.

His first wife, Maria Blatchley, died in June, 1841, leaving a son, Henry Spencer Lindley, now a physician practicing in Perryville, Allegheny Co., Pa. In July, 1842, Dr. Lindley married Mary A. Wade, daughter of James Wade, of Fayette County, by whom he had four sons and one daughter, all of whom are now living save the first-born son, Clark, who was accidentally killed while a member of the junior class of Allegheny College, Meadville, in the twenty-first year of his age. The daughter, Carrie Lou, was graduated at Beaver Female College in 1863, and in 1864 became the wife of Rev. C. W. Smith, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and attached to Pittsburgh Conference. Latellus W., Latellus' second living son, graduated at Jefferson Medical College, and practices in partnership with his half-brother, Dr. Henry Spencer Lindley, before named. Frank M., the third son, studied medicine at the same college, and practices his profession in Connellsville. Charles D., the youngest son, resides in Butler City, Montana, engaged in mining.

DANIEL ROGERS DAVIDSON.

Somewhere in Beaver County, Pa., near Brighton, we believe, now resides, and of Pittsburgh makes his business centre, Col. Daniel R. Davidson, who belongs rather to the State of Pennsylvania than to Fayette County, in which he was born, and where he passed perhaps fifty years of residence, and in which county he still holds large business and proprietary interests and spends considerable time, a sketch of whom it is our lot to prepare for the history of Fayette County.

Mr. Davidson took great interest in the history of his native county during its preparation for the press, and rendered willing aid to those who were engaged in it whenever he could, contributing to whatever department of the work he was requested to assist in until a biography of himself was demanded, when the proposing interviewer was met with the polite but positive refusal of Mr. Davidson to furnish any item whatever regarding himself, he easily baffling the inquirer with the naive remark that he never knew anything about himself, never understood himself as boy or man, and could not, therefore, say anything of himself; in fact, he would prefer that nothing be said, and he left no uncertainty about his quiet but firm declaration that whatever might be written of him for the history must be obtained from others. However, persistent inquiry evoked from him the statement that he believed himself to have been born at Connellsville, Jan. 12, 1820; but subsequent inquiry of others casts doubt upon this date, and leaves the writer unable to say whether Mr. Davidson was born a year or two before or a year or two after that time.

Mr. Davidson is so markedly sui generis in character, as everybody who has his acquaintance knows, or should know, that it is quite unessential to mention herein, as in biographical sketches in general, the mortal stock of which he is a derivative; and yet it would seem that somewhat of his physical and spiritual nature is inherited; as his father, the late Hon. William Davidson, of Connellsville, is represented by old citizens who knew him well as a man of large mould and extraordinary mental powers, as well as of a very sensitive and potent moral nature (mixed with a degree of religious sentiment which in the last years of his life made him an extreme though consistent zealot); while his mother, Sarah Rogers, some years since deceased, is pictured as a lady of remarkable gifts, a woman of great energy and extreme perspicacity.

William Davidson was born in Carlisle, Cumberland Co., Pa., Feb. 14, 1783, and came into Fayette County about 1808. He was at first manager of the Laurel Furnace, and afterwards an iron-master at Break Neck. He was several times a member of the State Legislature, at one time president of the House, and was also a member of the Senate. He was highly esteemed as an active, intelligent, and honest legislator. It appears that the first or immigrant Davidson ancestor of William, came from the north of Ireland and lived in Londonderry during the famous siege.

Mr. and Mrs. William Davidson were the parents of three sons and two daughters. Daniel R. was their fourth child. It is learned that he went to a common school in his extreme young years; but he was never known by his schoolmates to study anything. The every-day mystery to them was how, without study, "Dan" got to know more about everything than did they who studied hard. Of course the boys he played with had no capacities to comprehend him. They knew nothing of him any more than they did about the mysteries of the attraction of gravitation when they fell off the dunce-block, or why the water ran down the Yonghiogheny, gliding past their school-house.

Frank always, but not bold in utterance, Daniel Davidson grew up to sixteen years of age, as little understood by his father, it is evident (and perhaps by his mother too), as he understood himself; and the fear being that this uncomprehended boy would never amount to anything of himself, and would ever be "a ne'er-do-well," he was at that age taken from the school which he cannot be said to have "attended" and banished "from Rome,"—that is, sent into quarters over which the central power or home government held empire, but of which the boy was given experimental charge,—a sort of procuratorship. It was an act of despair on the part of his father when he made, as he thought, a fixture of Dan on the Davidson farm, north of the borough of Connellsville, which farm it was supposed Dan would need all his life to glean necessary food from. So little did the paternal mind understand the boy. But, lo! Dan, who now had a world of his own to move in, at once began to exhibit extraordinary executive ability. He greatly improved the farm, and reaped a revenue from it which surprised everybody; and then it was that his career commenced. The peculiar, great-souled boy had with one stride stepped from youth to mature manhood, and was already putting to himself large problems of a practical character, and projecting in his clear head how they should be solved,—problems concerning the public weal and involving the elements of his own private fortune.

It was at this time of his life, when near twenty-one years of age, that he became interested in the project of a railroad from Pittsburgh to Connellsville (the present Pittsburgh Division of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad). He threw his great energy into that matter, against the advice and solicitation of his hopeless friends and even the demands of his father, the people regarding him as little less than wild. But he kept straight on courageously and with immense industry in his course. He foresaw what none others perceived, the vast advantages to the county and to himself of the project; and tirelessly he pursued his path, securing rights of way from this and that one through his earnest eloquence in picturing the bright future, and from others by sagacious conditional bargains; and got charters, too, by piecemeal, fighting and out-plotting all the old heads in opposition. He, let it be remembered, was the only man (and then an untried boy) who had the energy to do this tremendous work. At this matter of the railroad he spent some five years, not, however, neglecting his farm improvement and culture, and attending meanwhile to other important things which had come to his hands to do. At last the road was built and equipped. Crowds gathered at Connellsville on the day on which the first train ran into the borough, bearing an illustrious Pennsylvanian protectionist on the running-board of the engine, and by his side Daniel Davidson, who, as the train stopped in the midst of the people, shouted, "Here's the end of the Pittsburgh Road, with 'Tariff Andy' on its back!" and the doubters, who of course jeered and condemned him years before, now also of course applauded him to the echo, and literally bared their Before Mr. Davidson left his farm as a place of family residence, indeed early in life, he foresaw what a mighty work would yet be done in the coking coal fields of Fayette County. We cannot go into detail here, but it is meet that we make note that he started in the business (first helping others to enter upon it before seeking to secure especial advantages to himself, however) when everybody said he was crazy for so doing. (He has always been “insane!”) He was one of the great prime movers in the vast enterprise of developing on a huge scale the mineral resources of the county; indeed, he was the one intellectual power which moved it. Others furnished brawn and ignorant energy. In his time he has owned more extensive coking coal lands than any one else who can be named. In the measure of upbuilding the business of Fayette County through her coal-beds, he ran against the popular “judgment,” as he had done in many other matters, but, as in this case, he always carried his measures to final popular approval and indorsement.

But we are giving this article the full length of a preface to the book which might be written of the man and the great part which Daniel Davidson has played in the world, and when we took up our pen we had no purpose to do more than make a synopsis of a preface; but the subject is an inspiring one, and the material concerning it voluminous. The labor is not in expanding but in coming to a half; for every year of Davidson’s life for the last four decades would build a volume of record. It is not easy to biographize the living, since regarding them one may not be so direct and personal as if talking of the dead. Too much truth about either, a stupid public (general readers) will not usually bear, but whoever shall live to write of Davidson when he shall have gone will have a subject full worthy of the greatest pen, and may write the full truth about whatever may be his faults and failings; but to the writer of this Mr. Davidson’s faults seem quite unworthy of notice, as really no part of him,—incidents of his life, not outgrowths of his character, not of the man any more than his worn-out and torn boots or old coat. There are some men whom faults do not blemish more than do spots of thin rust a tried Toledo blade. They are the current records or telling symbols, not vital parts of a great life of sturdy warfare. Indeed, there have been and are men whom crimes do not solly. Bacon was one of them. But meanness too low for the law to classify into misdemeanors even, these are the things which stain the soul, or the rather, they are the exponents of essential natures, proofs that the soul guilty of enacting them is not great, whatever the man’s frontispiece before the world. Of such the world accuses not Davidson; and while the history of Fayette County will be searched in vain in the chapters of her illustrious dead for one native born the superior of Davidson in all that goes to make great manhood, so among the living of Fayette County heads before him. Cannon were fired, and the great uproar of praise shook the sky. William Davidson, the father of Dan, the banished, “luckyless wight,” looked on in silence that day, and then turned away, walking speechless into his house near by. Perhaps he grieved over his wild boy’s victory, perhaps he was proud. Since that day sensible people have not questioned Daniel Davidson’s judgment, his prognostic powers, his great capacity and energy.

From this point on, we might proceed recounting the struggles and conquests of this man, but our space is too limited to permit much detail. Many have not forgotten the time, not long after the railroad was finished, when a mob of Connellsville people of “high respectability” threatened dire things against Mr. Davidson on account of sundry bonds connected with the building of the road, and to pay money loaned on which, to the matter of twenty thousand dollars or so, it was feared they were to be heavily taxed. How they raged and fumed is a matter of history, as well as how Dan laid a plan by which they were lightly taxed, and the bonds gotten back by him into their hands in indemnity, they severally receiving bonds in proportion to the amount of their taxes; and how some tore theirs up or burned them in rage and contempt and punished themselves, while others kept theirs and eventually profited by them some six hundred per cent.

And while we are talking of railways, it must not be forgotten that in later years it was this same Dan who was a principal promoter of the Fayette County Railroad, which took the county-seat and its adjuncts out of the night of decay that was settling down upon them and gave them new life, while many gave him the encouragement of gibes and scoffs, sneeringly declaring that a four-horse coach could carry all the passengers the railroad would ever convey! The county also owes to Mr. Davidson more than to any other man the advantages which she has for years enjoyed through the Southwest Pennsylvania Railroad. He was the originator of the project of its building, rendered indispensable services in obtaining its charter or charters, and gave his time and talents whenever needed to the work.

Mr. Davidson resided for years on his farm near Connellsville, and became universally sought for counsel in business, politics, and confidential affairs. It is probable that he settled more neighborhood and domestic difficulties than did all other men during his time in Connellsville. In politics he became a great diplomatist. In extensive and subtle combinations in political fields, in making men see things as he saw them, and in pointing out the way to easy, safe, and self-sustaining victories, he became recognized among leaders as a power long before the gray hairs began to creep into his locks. He liked politics intensely for the field it opened for the play of his forces, but he cared not for office. Indeed, he has been pressed to take important offices, but has always refused. and of Western Pennsylvania a similar search would surely also be vain. He has once been aspersed and thrust into the civil courts, and he came out thoroughly a victor, and justly and nobly triumphant over the attempted wrong and persecution.

Mr. Davidson has a wide acquaintance among the leading men of the country, especially those of the South and West, and commands their esteem, as he does that of the people of his own State. Where, when, or how in his strong-willed, successful career he has gathered to himself the funds of information which he possesses upon many topics is unknown to the writer, for he cannot learn that Mr. Davidson has been a close student of books. But Carlyle, it is said, could exhaust five octavo volumes a day. He turned over the leaves of a book, read here and there a page, caught the key-note, and saw the manner of treatment of a subject, and could talk more wisely then of the book than another man who had spent three weeks in reading it. Mr. Davidson evidently possesses some such power or art, and we are told that his memory is prodigious. But over all his powerful, logical brain reigns; and we are inclined to think that out of the depths of his own being, by the accretions of his own mind, more than from acquirements of any sort, is it that the successes of Daniel Davidson have been builded. But however made, or created, or modified, sure it is that no son of Fayette County was ever his superior in intellectual and moral forces, in mental equipoise, in quiet but tremendous energy given to great works of a practical character for the well-being of the county; in that mental forecast which amounts to prophecy in the power to move and persuade men by gentle means, opening their eyes that they may see, and, seeing, believe the things in practical life hidden to them, but clear to his keen vision. In these and many other things Davidson stands unsurpassed, felt as to his power in every part of the county, but yet "unknown," save only to the wise few, but by them understood but partially, and careless, we think, as to whether or not he shall ever be understood by the masses.

EDWARD K. HYNDMAN.

Edward K. Hyndman, though a native of Carbon Co., Pa., and present resident of Pittsburgh, resided in Fayette County for a period of about eight years, and holds large business interests therein.

Mr. Hyndman is of Scotch-Irish descent, being the son of Hugh Hyndman, who was born in the north of Ireland in 1800, and Catharine Huff, a native of Danville, Pa., born in 1805, both still living in vigorous old age. He was born in Mauch Chunk, Pa., the great anthracite coal region, in 1844, and growing up there became a civil engineer at about eighteen years of age, and was employed more or less in the construction and operation of railroads in their various departments until at twenty-five years of age he became the superintendent of the Lehigh and Susquehanna Railroad, from Easton to Scranton (now a part of the New Jersey Central Railroad system), in the superintendency of which he continued till 1872, when he resigned his post to take the superintendency of the Pittsburgh and Connellsville Railroad (now the Pittsburgh Division of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad), in charge of which he remained, residing at Connellsville, for the period of eight years.

In his official position, while living there in charge of the railroad, Mr. Hyndman enjoyed peculiar opportunities for studying the Connellsville coke business and the extent and position of the coking coal field, and was so impressed with the vast present and future importance of the business that he took measures to secure some eight thousand acres of the best of coal lands in one body, and organized a company under the name of the Connellsville Coke and Iron Company, with Hon. John Leisenring as president, and other of his old Eastern anthracite coal friends as members, with a capital stock of one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, for the purpose of developing the coal property. He then resigned the superintendency of the railroad, and accepted the position of general manager of the above-named company. Mr. Hyndman remained in that position until the company was thoroughly established and in working order, he finding meanwhile that his early experience in the anthracite district availed him much in the new field. He then resigned the management of the company, though still its consulting engineer, and removing to Pittsburgh, accepted (in June, 1881) the office of general manager of the Pittsburgh and Western Railroad, which office he now holds, together with that of president of the Pittsburgh Junction Railroad.

Mr. Hyndman is also largely interested in various enterprises in and out of the State. Among these may be mentioned that of the Virginia Coal and Iron Company and the Holston Steel and Iron Company, having their centre of operations in Southwestern Virginia, and in which Mr. Leisenring and others of the Connellsville Coke and Iron Company are also interested. The above-named Virginia Coal and Iron Company possesses over 70,000 acres of coal and iron lands, upon the development of which they have already entered, having commenced the construction of a railroad seventy miles in length in order to reach their new fields from Bristol, Tenn. The coke to be manufactured in this field will readily supply markets not accessible from the Connellsville coke region.

Feb. 25, 1873, Mr. Hyndman married at Philadelphia, Miss Guilielma A. Brown, daughter of the late William Brown, Esq., of Bethlehem, Pa., and Mrs. Susan I. Brown, his widow, who now resides in Philadelphia. Mr. and Mrs. Hyndman have two sons.
JOHN LEISENRING.

Among the many eminent business men and capitalists whom the treasures of the Connellsville coal basin have attracted from other regions, to make large investments in mineral lands, mining, and the manufacture of coke in Fayette County, one of the most widely known and prominent is the president of the Connellsville Coke and Iron Company, Hon. John Leisenring, whose home is at Mauch Chunk, Pa., but who is a native of Philadelphia. He was born in 1819, his paternal ancestors being of Saxon descent, and his maternal ancestors Scotch. His great-grandfather came to America and settled in Whitehall township, Lehigh County, on the Lehigh River, in A.D. 1765, on a farm bought from the original proprietors, while Indians still occupied that portion of the State. This farm still remains in the possession of his descendants. At the time of John Leisenring's birth his father was a morocco-dresser in Philadelphia, which business he left to engage in the war of 1812. In 1828 he removed to Mauch Chunk, where the family have since resided. John's education was directed with especial reference to the profession of civil engineer, which he entered at an early age, under the direction of E. A. Douglas, principal engineer of the L. C. & N. Co., then controlled by Josiah White and Erskine Hazard, who were engaged in constructing a slack-water navigation of the Lehigh River from Mauch Chunk to White Haven, and also building a railroad from White Haven to Wilkesbarre.

Mr. Leisenring, at the age of seventeen years, had full charge of a division of the canal and railroad, while George Law and Asa Packer were contractors on the same division, and remained in charge until its completion. After completing this work, the Morris Canal Company, who were then enlarging their canal from Easton to Jersey City, through their chief engineer, Mr. E. A. Douglas, secured his services as assistant, and he was placed in charge of the division between Dover, N. J., and Jersey City. He was also engaged in locating and surveying the railroad now known as the Belvidere Delaware Railroad, in which work he was associated with E. A. Douglas and Gen. H. M. Negley, who now lives in California. About this time he engaged in the coal business, then in its infancy, which he saw was to be the controlling business of the region. He also built the Sharp Mountain planes, on the property of the Lehigh Coal and Navigation Company, for conveying the coal which he and others mined. From Ashton, Carbon Co., where he had lived nine years, he removed in 1854 to Eckley, Luzerne Co., where he opened the Conwell Ridge mines, which are now operated by him, as well as many others in the same locality, he being especially identified with the coal from Buck Mountain vein, producing together in 1881 about one million tons. He organized and is still president of the Upper Lehigh Coal Company, known as one of the most successful anthracite mining companies in the country.

On the death of E. A. Douglas he was chosen as his successor in charge of the works of the Lehigh Coal and Navigation Company, during which the navigation from White Haven down was almost totally destroyed by the great freshet of June, 1862. The works from Mauch Chunk to Easton were repaired with wonderful rapidity, and Mr. Leisenring's energy and efficiency in their reconstruction were on all hands commended. The navigation from Mauch Chunk to White Haven was not restored, because in the judgment of the subject of this article the destruction to life and property had been so great as to be sufficient ground for declining to incur the risk of a repetition, and in order to retain the business he suggested and recommended the building of a railroad between the same points.

After completing this work, which gave the company a line of railroad from Wilkesbarre to Mauch Chunk, Mr. Leisenring saw that to secure the full benefit of this road it would be necessary to have a railroad from Mauch Chunk to Easton, to connect with roads in New Jersey, so that the operations of the company need not be suspended during the winter months, but that business could go on continuously. In carrying out this plan, which was promptly adopted, the road was laid out and completed with steel rails, which were the first importation of any consequence, and the whole fifty miles are still in use and doing good service, showing the forecast and sound judgment of its promoter. The iron bridges crossing the two rivers, Lehigh and Delaware, at Easton have been considered a masterly piece of engineering, both in their location and construction. In view of the large business which he expected from the Wyoming region, he designed and built the three inclined planes which were used to raise the coal from the Wyoming Valley, a height of about 1000 feet, divided in planes of about a mile in length each. These planes are constructed with a capacity to raise 2000 cars, or 10,000 to 12,000 tons, daily, at a cost of but little more than the minimum cost per mile of transportation on a railroad of ordinary grade, thus saving to the company over four-fifths of the cost of hauling the same coal in cars by locomotives, as it would have required over thirteen miles of railroad to overcome the same elevation. These are thought to be the most effective planes in the world.

Having brought to a successful issue all these plans for the Lehigh Coal and Navigation Company's canals and roads, the increasing cares of his various enterprises made it necessary for him to resign the active charge of the Lehigh Coal and Navigation Company's extended business; and the company being loath to lose his services, urged upon his acceptance the position of consulting engineer and member of the board of managers, which latter position he still holds. About this time there came a struggle among transporting companies to secure control of coal lands, in which, owing to his well-known familiarity with the
The coal was furnished by the Dickson Manufacturing Company, of Scranton, Pa., a corporation well known for the excellence of its work.

The second opening, for ventilating purposes and for the escape of the miners in case of accident to the main shaft, has been commenced. This opening is required by law, as well as for the safe and economical working of the mines, and will be prosecuted to an early completion.

Additional houses for the accommodation of the workmen, also coke-ovens, tracks, etc., necessary for the prosecution of the business will be commenced early the coming spring.

The present selling prices of coke at the ovens afford a handsome profit to the producer, and the marketing of which is limited only by the means of transportation, which it is reported are entirely inadequate to do the business that offers. We are informed, however, that the carrying companies are arranging to greatly augment their rolling-stock.

Within the last three or four months an entirely new market has been found for coke by the introduction of machinery for breaking, screening, and sizing it, to be used for domestic purposes in competition with anthracite coke. It is believed it will hereafter become a very important factor in the net profit account of coke producers; doubtless the company will find it to be to its interest, in the near future, to combine with its regular coke business this new industry.

The branch railroad being constructed by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company to connect our works with their main line is progressing rapidly towards completion, and we are assured that it will be connected with our tracks at the ovens by the 1st of May, and by the 1st of June the company will probably be able to ship coke from their mines in a moderate way.

The board desire to congratulate the stockholders on the possession of so fine a property in Fayette County; doubtless it is among the best tracts of coking coal land in the State, and probably in the world. Its value has already appreciated to nearly or quite double its original cost, when compared with the prices at which coke lands have recently been sold in the vicinity, and when the limited amount of this kind of property is considered, and the rapid increase in the consumption of coke is taken into account, your property has the elements for one of the best future paying enterprises in the country.

The Connellsville coking coal basin is about thirty miles long by an average of two and one-half miles wide. The company’s property occupies about six miles in length of the heart of this basin, and lies as nearly as may be about midway in the longitudinal axis of the same. The coal is very unlike that in the adjacent basins, although geologically the same sheet of coal, but thinning out as it rolls over the anticlinals into the contiguous basins on either side, losing at the same time its coking qualities and turning into a gas and steam coal, costing to mine from seventy-five to eighty-five cents per ton, whilst the Connellsville coal is readily produced at a cost for mining of only twenty-five to thirty cents per ton. Furthermore, the coal produced outside of the Connellsville basin requires (owing to the large percentage of sulphur: with which it is charged) to be crushed and washed and ized to rid it of a portion of the sulphur before subjecting it to the coking process, whilst the coal contained in your property, owing to its moderate percentage of sulphur, is taken directly from the mine and dumped into the ovens, without any desulphurizing process whatever. The cost of producing Connellsville coke is therefore at least fifty cents per ton less than that of the neighboring regions located as before stated. These facts, together with the advantages before mentioned, demonstrate the great value of the company’s estate."
Shaft No. 1, located at "Leisenring," near the eastern end of the property, is now in operation, furnishing coal for about 200 ovens. The construction of 200 additional ovens is now under way, and will be completed by June next, and 300 more will be added by the close of this year.

Shaft No. 2, near the western line of the property, has been sunk to the coal a distance of about 150 feet, and houses and ovens are being built with the view of a business of 1000 tons of coke daily. Locations have been made for three additional plants, with a capacity of each of 1000 tons per day, making in all five plants, with a total capacity of producing 5000 tons of coke daily, 1700 acres of land having been assigned to each plant.

The following officers and board of directors are as follows: John Leisenring, F. A. Potts, Samuel Dickinson, John S. Wentz, E. B. Leisenring, M. S. Kemmerer, Henry McCormick, Daniel Bertseh, John Fritz.

Officers elected by the board of directors: President, Hon. John Leisenring; Vice-President, E. B. Leisenring; Superintendent and Engineer, J. K. Taggart; Consulting Engineer, E. K. Hyndman; Secretary and Treasurer, W. B. Whitney; Chief Clerk, John A. Esser.

COL. JAMES M. SCHOOONMAKER.

Col. James M. Schoonmaker, though a native and resident of Pittsburgh, has large business interests in Fayette County, in the development of coal-mines and the manufacture of coke, and is therefore more practically identified with the welfare of the county than are many of her own children.

Col. Schoonmaker is of New York "Knickerbocker" stock, his paternal ancestors subsequent to 1660 having been born in Ulster and Orange Counties, N. Y. Hendrick Jochem, one of his paternal ancestors, came to America from Holland in 1660 and settled in Ulster County.

James Schoonmaker, the father of Col. Schoonmaker, removed from Ulster County to Pittsburgh in 1836, at the age of twenty-three years, and embarked in the drug business. In 1841 he married Mary Stockton, a daughter of Rev. Joseph Stockton, of Pittsburgh, by whom he has had nine children,—five sons and four daughters,—of whom James M. is the oldest. Both parents, as well as all the children, are living.

James M. was born June 30, 1842, and was educated in private schools and in the public schools of Pittsburgh, and attended the Western University of that city, which institution he left at the age of nineteen years, and entered the volunteer army in the war of the Rebellion, being attached as a private at first to the Union Cavalry of Pittsburgh, which joined the Army of the Potomac. With this force he served a year, being meanwhile made a lieutenant of Company A of the First Maryland Cavalry Regiment, to which the Union Cavalry was attached. In August, 1862, he was ordered from the front to return home and take command of the Fourteenth Pennsylvania Cavalry, which was then recruiting in Pittsburgh, being partly made up of three companies from Fayette County,—Company B, under Capt. Zadoc Walker; Company E, under Capt. Ashbel F. Duncan; and Company F, led by Capt. Calvin Springer (late sheriff of Fayette County). Many of the surviving members of these companies are now living in Fayette County.

In November, 1862, Col. Schoonmaker received his commission as colonel, and took his regiment into the field. At that time Col. Schoonmaker, being a little less than twenty years and five months of age, was, it is believed, the youngest officer of his rank in the Federal army. He commanded the regiment till Jan. 1, 1864, when he was assigned to the command of the First Brigade, First Cavalry Division of the Army of the Shenandoah, and remained in that command till the end of the war, after which, with his brigade, still in service, he was sent by the War Department to guard the overland stage-route from the Missouri River to the Rocky Mountains, serving in that campaign till August, 1865, when the brigade was mustered out of service at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas.

During his military career Col. Schoonmaker was constantly in the field, and participated in all the battles of the Army of the Shenandoah, under Gen. Sheridan, the campaigns of which were especially severe. At one time his brigade was for forty-two consecutive days and nights in the saddle, engaging the enemy daily, and took part in the three decisive battles of the Shenandoah Valley, which practically ended the war by destroying the enemy's forces.

After the mustering out of his brigade at Fort Leavenworth, Col. Schoonmaker returned home and entered into business with his father, remaining with him until some time in 1872, when he went into business with his father-in-law, William H. Brown, in the mining of coal and manufacture of coke.

In 1879, Mr. Brown having meanwhile died, and his business being divided or assigned among the members of his family, Col. Schoonmaker came into possession of the Connellsville coke branch as his interest in the partnership business, and has ever since been exclusively engaged in prosecuting that. A good portion of his works are located in Fayette County, 463 coke-ovens being situated at Dawson's Station, he being also chairman of the Redstone Coke Company (Limited), which has 300 ovens near Uniontown, Col. Schoonmaker owning one-third of this property. He also owns the Alice Mines, in Westmoreland County, comprising 200 ovens, and is chairman of the Morewood Coke Company (Limited), of the same county, and running 470 ovens, of which prop-
CONNELLSVILLE BOROUGH AND TOWNSHIP.

A. O. Tinstman, now a resident of Turtle Creek, Allegheny Co., Pa., resided in Fayette County from 1859 to 1876, and there conducted enterprises and aided in laying the foundations of important works which are in active operation, developing the wealth and forming an important part of the business of the county to-day.

Mr. Tinstman is of German descent in both lines. His paternal great-grandfather was born in one of the German States, and came to the United States, locating in Bucks County, Pa., and from thence removed to Westmoreland County, Pa., residing near Mount Pleasant, where he had his home until his death; he was a farmer by occupation. A. O. Tinstman's paternal grandfather was Jacob Tinstman, who was born in Bucks County, Pa., Jan. 13, 1773, and on Dec. 11, 1798, was married to Miss Anna Fox, of Westmoreland County, Pa., her birthplace having been Chester County, Pa., Aug. 8, 1779.

Jacob Tinstman and Anna Tinstman had ten children, whose names were Mary, Henry, Adam, John, Jacob, Anna, Christian, David, Sarah, and Catharine. Jacob Tinstman was a farmer and a man of fine education.

John, the father of A. O. Tinstman, was the fourth child and third son, and was born Jan. 29, 1807, in East Huntingdon township, Westmoreland Co., Pa. He was brought up on the farm, and attended subscription schools. He held important township offices, was an excellent citizen, an energetic and prudent man, and made a competence for himself and family.

He died at the age of seventy years.

A. O. Tinstman's maternal grandfather was Abraham Overholt, also of German descent, and who was born in Bucks County, Pa., in 1774, and came to East Huntingdon township, Westmoreland Co., Pa., about the year 1800, and settled on a farm on which the village of West Overton now stands. He married Miss Maria Stauffer, of Fayette County, Pa., and both being of frugal, industrious, and economical dispositions, accumulated property rapidly, lived together harmoniously, and left as monuments of skill and judgment in building and improvements some of the most substantial buildings of East Huntingdon township, having built the entire village of West Overton, including mill, distillery, etc.

A. O. Tinstman's mother's maiden name was Anna Overholt, who was a daughter of the aforesaid Abraham Overholt. She was a lady highly esteemed for her kindness and gentleness, traits of character for which her mother, Mrs. Abraham Overholt, was particularly distinguished. She was born July 4, 1812, and was married to John Tinstman about 1830, and died in the year 1866.

The fruits of their marriage were ten children, viz.: Maria, who died at fifteen years of age; Jacob O.; Abraham O.; Henry O.; Anna, widow of Rev. L. E. Leasure; John O., who died when a soldier in the army during the Rebellion; Elizabeth, who died at three years of age; Abigail, who died at nineteen years of age; Emma, wife of Dr. W. J. Kline, of Greensburg, Pa.; and Christian S. O. Tinstman, who is now conducting business in partnership with A. O. Tinstman, under the firm-name of A. O. Tinstman & Co. Abraham O. Tinstman was born Sept. 13, 1834, in East Huntingdon township, Westmoreland Co., Pa., on the farm upon which are now located the Emma Mine Coke Works. He received his education in the common schools, attending them during the winter season until about twenty years of age, and continued laboring on the farm with his father until he became twenty-five years old, when he went to Broad Ford, Fayette Co., Pa., to take charge of his grandfather Overholt's property at that place, the business consisting of the manufacture of the celebrated Overholt whisky, the cutting of timber by steam saw-mill into car and other lumber, and the farming of the lands connected with the Broad Ford property. He thus continued to manage and do business for his grandfather until 1864, when the two formed a partnership, named A. Overholt & Co. He, however, continued to conduct the business until the death of his grandfather, A. Overholt, who died in 1870, in the eighty-sixth year of his age.

During Mr. Tinstman's residence in the county and his partnership with his grandfather he caused the erection of the most important buildings in Broad Ford, some of which are the large mill and distillery now there, as well as many houses for the use of employees.

In 1865 he and Joseph Rist bought about six hundred acres of coking coal land adjoining the village of Broad Ford. Mr. Tinstman thereafter (in 1868) sold one-half of his interest in the same to Col. A. S. Morgan, of Pittsburgh, Pa., and with him established the firm of Morgan & Co., who put up one hundred and eleven coke-ovens at the point now known as Morgan Mines, on the line of the Mount Pleasant and Broad Ford Railroad, and built one mile of railway from Broad Ford to said mines, at which place the first coke was manufactured along what is now the Mount Pleasant and Broad Ford Railroad. Morgan & Co. at this time held almost entire control of the coke business of the Connellsville region.

In 1870, A. O. Tinstman with others organized a company, of which he was elected president, and built the Mount Pleasant and Broad Ford Railroad, he holding the office of president until the sale of said road to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company in 1876.

About 1871, Mr. Tinstman purchased a portion of Mr. Rist's interest in the six hundred acres of coal land previously mentioned. Mr. Tinstman was at this time very desirous of starting in business. Mr. H. C. Frick was at this time keeping books for A. Overholt & Co., and aspired for something more than book-keeping, he having shown through his indomitable energy, skill, and judgment that he was not only capable of keeping an accurate and beautiful set of books, but that he was able to conduct business, manage employes, etc. So Mr. Tinstman and Rist associated Mr. Frick with them, under the firm-name of Frick & Co., and Mr. Frick was made manager of the association, both financially and otherwise, and for his services was allowed a salary by the company out of the profits arising from the manufacture and sale of coke in addition to his proportion of the dividends as partner in the company.

This company built at Broad Ford two hundred coke-ovens. The first one hundred were built along or facing the Mount Pleasant and Broad Ford Railroad, and were known as the Frick Works, or "Novelty Works." The other hundred were built in blocks along the Pittsburgh Division of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and facing the road and Yougghoeheny River, and were known as the Henry Clay Works.

In 1872, Col. Morgan and Mr. Tinstman (as Morgan & Co.) bought about four hundred acres of coking coal at Latrobe, Westmoreland Co., Pa., and there built fifty ovens. About this period and on continuously to 1876 (during the panic period) Mr. Tinstman bought large tracts of coal lands on the line of the Mount Pleasant and Broad Ford Railroad, comprising nearly all the best coal lands in that region; but the pressure of the panic proved excessive for him, the coke business, like everything else, becoming depressed, and he failed, losing everything. But having great confidence that the coke business would revive, and foreseeing that it would be one of the earliest as well as surest of manufacturing interests to recuperate, he bought in 1878 and 1880 on option a large extent of coal land in the Connells ville region, and then sold in 1889 about 3500 acres to E. K. Hyndman, who about that period organized the Connells ville Coal and Iron Company, at a good advance over cost price.

This sale enabled him again to take a new start in the world as a business man. He then, in 1880, established the firm of A. O. Tinstman & Co., and opened an office on the corner of Seventh Avenue and Smithfield Street, Pittsburgh, Pa., and soon after bought a half-interest in the Rising Sun Coke-Works, on the June Bug Branch of the Southwest Pennsylvania Railroad. In 1881 he bought the Mount Braddock Coke-Works, located on the Fayette County Branch of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad and Southwest Pennsylvania Railroad; and in the same year he bought the Pennsville Coke-Works, on the Southwest Pennsylvania Railroad, embracing in all about three hundred ovens, all of which he still owns and operates.

Thus we see again verified in Mr. Tinstman's life that great truth, that those who "try again" earnestly and energetically will succeed. He is to be congratulated in his again being established in business, and being so pleasantly situated and surrounded by home and family relations, as it is well known that while in the county he labored diligently for its welfare; and though he has not received the deserved abundant recompense in a pecuniary manner, yet the people of the county appreciate his labors, especially those who have been benefited directly by the development of the coal interests of the county, and of whom there are not a few.

On July 1, 1875, Mr. Tinstman married Miss Harriet Cornelia Markle, youngest daughter of Gen. Cyrus P. Markle and Sarah Ann Markle (whose maiden name was Sarah Ann Lippincott), of Mill Grove, Westmoreland Co., Pa. He has one son, named Cyrus Painter Markle Tinstman.

HENRY CLAY FRICK.

Mr. Frick, of the celebrated firm of H. C. Frick & Co., manufacturers and dealers in coke, and a third owner of the business of said company, which is constituted of himself and Messrs. Edmund and Walton Ferguson, of Pittsburgh, was born in West Overton, Westmoreland Co., Pa., Dec. 19, 1849.

Mr. Frick first engaged in active business life on any considerable scale in 1871, when he entered upon the coke business at Broad Ford, in Fayette Co., Pa., and has continued to prosecute the same there and in that neighborhood to this time.

The business at Broad Ford was started with fifty ovens, and has gradually increased till it comprises in that district over one thousand ovens.
The firm also owns coke interests in other parts of Fayette County and in Westmoreland County.

EDMUND MOREWOOD FERGUSON.

Edmund M. Ferguson, a gentleman who, though now a resident of Shady Side, Pittsburgh, Pa., is identified with the leading business interest of Fayette County, was born in New York City in 1838, and located in Fayette County in 1871, wherein, at Ferguson Station, on the Fayette County Railroad, near Dunbar, he was engaged for three years in the manufacture of coke. In the fall of 1874 he left the county as a place of residence, but continued his business therein, and settled in Pittsburgh.

In March, 1878, Mr. Ferguson entered into partnership with Henry Clay Frick, under the style of H. C. Frick & Co., for the manufacture and sale of Connellsville coke, their works being almost wholly situated in Fayette County. In this firm he continues in active business.

In 1872 he married Miss Josephine E., daughter of W. S. Mackintosh, of Pittsburgh, by whom he has three children,—John M., William S., and Martha R.

WALTON FERGUSON, Esq.

-Walton Ferguson, of Shady Side, Pittsburgh, now and for several years past largely interested in connection with his brother, Edmund M., and Mr. H. C. Frick in the coke business of Fayette County, was born at Stamford, Conn., in 1842, and there resided till the fall of 1879, when he moved to Pittsburgh and entered as a partner the firm of H. C. Frick & Co.

In the year 1865 he became a member of the firm of J. & S. Ferguson, of New York, in which he is still interested.

CAPT. JOHN F. DRAGO.

Capt. John F. Dravo, the present custom-house surveyor of the port of Pittsburgh, is largely identified with the business of Fayette County, particularly in the coal and coke interests thereof, and began his operations in the coke trade at Connellsville in 1868.

Mr. Dravo is of French extraction. His grandfather, Anthony Dravo, a native of France, settled in Pittsburgh at an early day in the history of that city, and resided there the remainder of his life. Mr. Dravo was born in West Newton, Westmoreland Co., Pa., Oct. 29, 1819, but spent most of his youthful days about six miles from Elizabeth, Allegheny Co.

He was educated in the common schools, and at Allegheny College, Meadville, where he remained three years, and withdrew from the college on account of ill health. From 1840 to 1849 he was engaged continuously in the coal business, though meanwhile connected with the coke trade, to which he now devotes his time almost exclusively. Mr. Dravo took up his residence in Pittsburgh about 1836, and in 1840 removed to McKeesport, Allegheny Co., and there entered into the coal business, and subsequently built up Dravosport, opposite that place. In 1868 he sold out his coal business, and, as noted above, went into the coke trade in Connellsville. Mr. Dravo has held many positions of trust in business and official circles, having been director of the Allegheny House eight years; director and vice-president of the Pennsylvania Reform School four years; first vice-president for several years of the Chamber of Commerce, of which he was one of the first members; director of the Tradesmen's National Bank and People's Insurance Company; vice-president of the Beaver Female College; and general manager of the Pittsburgh and Connellsville Gas-Coal and Coke Company. He was appointed to his present position as surveyor of the port of Pittsburgh May 28, 1881. His long identification with coal interests in and about Pittsburgh has made him a general favorite among the river-men, while in the business community no one stands higher than he in reputation for integrity or for urbanity of manner.

Mr. Dravo is in politics an ardent Republican, of anti-slavery or "abolition" antecedents, and has taken active part in the campaigns of his party, having been much upon the "stump." He is a voluble and forcible public speaker, and one of the most effective political debaters in the State. He was a delegate to the Chicago Convention which nominated Abraham Lincoln for President. Among party factions he is a "peacemaker," a character which in Pennsylvania politics is occasionally very urgent demand.

DAVID BARNES.

Every town or borough has its distinctive "characters," among whom are men who seem to have been born to be publicly useful, and who could not well have gone into strictly private life if they had tried. Aside from their regular business they fill numerous offices, are known by everybody, consulted more or less by everybody about everything, are alert, smart, found apt at any business upon which they may be called to enter, wise awake,—in short, universally useful, ever willing and competent. Of this class of men is David Barnes, of Connellsville. His family has been identified with Fayette County for over eighty years. Mr. Barnes is the grandson of Zephaniah Ellis Barnes, who came to America from England and settled in Woodstown, N. J., several generations ago. There, in 1765, was born David Barnes (Sr.), father of our David, and who came to Connellsville in 1801 and built there (the first of its kind ever seen west of the mountains), what was then known as a "go-back saw-mill." He took great interest in the organization of the borough, and was a member of its first Council. He built the market-house which now stands on the corner of Spring and Church Streets, and, under Governor Simon Snyder, was appointed flour inspector for the county of Fayette. During the war of 1812 be, in company with Joseph McClurg, of Pittsburgh, ran Mount Pleasant Furnace, where were made cannon, cannon-balls, and grape-shot for the government. After the war he was engaged in the iron business in company with Isaac Mason and James Paul. He was a man of excellent ability to plan and execute. He died in 1832, and was buried in the Quaker graveyard in Connellsville. His wife was Sarah Proctor, a native of Old Town, Me., and born in 1785. She was a relative of the Ogles, Camerons, and Clintons of that State, and came with her parents to Perryopolis, Fayette Co., in 1812. In 1818 she and David Barnes were married. At his death she was left with six children, one having previously died. Her whole time and energy were devoted to rearing and educating her children, particularly in morals and religion. She never, when in health, let an evening pass without assembling her young family and reading to them a chapter from the Scriptures. Of course she was particular to avoid such chapters as are not considered delicate and proper to be read by youthful and unformed minds. Her selections were always judicious. After the reading she always uttered a prayer for the protection of her children, mingled with earnest hopes for their future usefulness. Her family consisted of David, William, Hamilton, Joseph, Z. Ellis, Emily, and Mary Bell. William was educated at Lewisburg University, and was ordained as a Baptist minister at the First Baptist Church of Pittsburgh. He visited the Holy Land with the view of thereby the better enabling himself to fulfill the responsible duties of his calling. He wished to see the places where Christ preached, feeling that he might gather inspiration therefrom. At the breaking out of the late war he was commissioned as chaplain of the Fifth New York Volunteer Artillery, and served until the close of the war. Hamilton has served a term in the State Senate from Somerset County. He is a fluent and impressive speaker, and a leader in the Republican party. Joseph became a carpenter, and, as a foreman of his department, helped build the Union Pacific Railroad. Ellis, being a great lover of horses, has dealt extensively in them, and during the late war was quartermaster under Gen. Samuel B. Holabird. He resides at Connellsville, and carries on the livery and sale business. Emily died quite young. Mary Bell married Thomas Evans, and is the mother of a large family, all industrious and good citizens.

David Barnes was born in Perryopolis, Feb. 5, 1819, and attended the common schools, but regards his mother as his only real teacher and only friend in youth. At sixteen years of age he commenced teaching school, and followed the business until (he having meanwhile inured the responsibilities of marriage) his wages would not support him, when he turned his attention to politics. In 1838 he was appointed a clerk in the State Department at Harrisburg, where he remained some sixteen years. About 1869 he resigned his office at the capital and accepted the position of paymaster of the Pittsburgh and Connellsville Railroad, and thereafter resigned that to accept position as book-keeper of the National Locomotive-Works at New Haven; and on the completion of the Southwest Pennsylvania Railroad, from Greensburg to Connellsville, was appointed station agent at the latter place, which position he still holds.

Mr. Barnes is a stanch Republican, and exerted considerable influence during the late war. He was the true friend of the soldiers, helping and aiding them wherever he could, visiting them in hospitals and administ-ering to their wants. Great numbers of them made him their banker, and he judiciously invested their funds for them, often profitably, refusing all fees for his services; and he still helps them in their celebrations, especially to “fight their battles o’er,” he being a fluent and stirring speaker. Mr. Barnes is charitable to a fault, but of great determination of character, and not lacking in fiery spirit makes enemies; but feeling that he is right he cares not for foes, declaring that he would “rather have one influential friend than the whole rabble of the town” at his back.

Mr. Barnes was a popular officer at the State capital, was respected by all with whom he did business, and in war times was the confidential and trusted friend of Governor Curtin, rendering him special services, at one time carrying messages from him to all the Governors of the New England States. Mr. Barnes has been somewhat of a traveler, having climbed to the top of Mount Washington, in the White Mountains, and visited the battle-fields around Richmond, Va., and seen “considerable of the country besides.”

In 1848, Mr. Barnes married Mary Jane Sherman, a daughter of Samuel Sherman, of Connellsville, a native of Connecticut, and related to the family of Roger Sherman. Mr. and Mrs. Barnes have had nine children,—four sons and five daughters. Two of the daughters are dead. His eldest son, Andrew Stewart Barnes, served during the late war as a soldier in the Fifth Pennsylvania Heavy Artillery. After the war he learned the machinist trade in the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad shops. Thereafter he was appointed postmaster at Connellsville, and afterwards route agent between Washington City and Pittsburgh, which position he still holds. Mr. Barnes thinks that boys should learn trades, and his son Samuel is a machinist, and William a carpenter. Irwin, another son, quite young, is devoted to music. Mary Elizabeth is married, and lives in Cuba, N. Y. Jennie and Hally, his other children, are very intelligent, and likely to grow up to be excellent citizens.

Mr. Barnes lost the use of one of his legs when he was but ten years old, and says that his misfortune was “a godsend,” as with his vitality and energy and two good legs he “might have become a brigand.” What is worse, he might have, and likely would have, gone into the late war, and would probably have been killed on the field. With the aid of his crutch he moves about as lively as most men on two good legs, and at the age of sixty-three is as active as ever, and looks younger than most men at fifty. His “nerve” will probably carry him on into extreme old age, and keep him useful all the while.

JOHN D. FRISBEE.

John D. Frisbee, Esq., president of the First National Bank of Connellsville, and the leading merchant of that borough, is of New England stock on his paternal side; in his maternal line Scotch-Irish. His father, Samuel Frisbee, was born in Connecticut, and became a ship-builder, and in 1813 moved to Pittsburgh, Pa., on the solicitation of Robert Fulton, of steambat fame, and was for a time in his employ. He afterwards built a large number of boats, mostly steam-packets, which ran on the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers. About 1816 he married Miss Jane Davis, then of Allegheny County, but a native of the north of Ireland, and who came to America when about thirteen years of age. They had nine children, of whom Mr. Frisbee was the seventh, born Oct. 14, 1829.

Samuel Frisbee moved from Pittsburgh about 1838 to that part of the then Beaver County which is now included in Lawrence County, near the town of New Castle, and settled upon a farm, and remained there, leading the life of a farmer, though diverting himself meanwhile with more or less boat-building, until 1852, when he removed to Davisville (a village named in honor of the maternal grandfather of Mr. J. D. Frisbee) in Allegheny County, and then in his old age rested from his labors, and died in 1854, at about eighty-four years of age, his wife surviving him. She remained at Davisville till about 1866, and moved to Mahoningtown, Lawrence Co., where she resided until her death in December, 1881, reaching upwards of ninety years of age.

Mr. John D. Frisbee attended in youth the common schools of Beaver and Lawrence Counties, and lived at home assisting his father on the farm till about 1853, when, having caught the "California fever," he left home for the new Opah, and sailing from New York by the Nicaragua route duly arrived in San Francisco, at a time when it was only a small though intensely bustling city. Mr. Frisbee soon took up his residence in Placer County, where he embarked in merchandising, and uninterruptedly continued the business with satisfactory results until 1856, and then, leaving his business in the hands of others, returned to Davisville, Pa., his old home; remained there till the spring of 1857, and went back to California, and there prosecuted his business till 1860. He then gave up his residence in California and came back to Pennsylvania, and in 1861 took up his abode in Connellsville, where he has since resided, and where he at once entered into partnership with Wm. Cooper & Co., then late of Pittsburgh, upon general merchandising, under the firm-name of John D. Frisbee & Co., in the store which he still occupies. This partnership continued until the same firm-name till 1855, when Joseph Johnston became a member of the firm, and the name was changed to Frisbee, Johnston & Co., and so continued until 1870, Mr. Johnston then retiring, and the firm-name becoming Frisbee, Cooper & Co. This firm carried on the business until 1880, when Messrs. Cooper and the other members withdrew, leaving Mr. Frisbee in exclusive ownership. The business of the house under the several firm-names above noted has been for several years larger than that of any other store in Fayette County. Mr. Frisbee's business is constantly increasing in importance. He aims to keep in stock everything in the mercantile line that is demanded by the county.

Mr. Frisbee took active part in the organization of the First National Bank of Connellsville, which was opened for business April 17, 1876, and was elected its first president, and has since been re-elected as such at each of the successive annual meetings of the bank's directors. The capital stock of the bank is $50,000.

Aside from his special business, Mr. Frisbee has interested himself more or less in farming, and particularly in the breeding of imported Jersey cattle, which he raises upon his Cedar Grove farm, a mile east of Connellsville, which farm was in part formerly the property of the late Mr. Hiram Herbert, the grandfather of Mrs. Frisbee, and upon which he erected a house, in which he resided for a long period.

In politics Mr. Frisbee is an old-time Democrat. He enjoys a high reputation for business integrity, and contributes liberally to the support of all such public measures and such works of charity, etc., as he regards with favor.

Dec. 22, 1883, Mr. Frisbee married Miss Catherine L. Herbert, daughter of George W. Herbert, of Connellsville, by whom he has five children,—Emma H., Jennie D., Herbert, Katie, and an infant son, at this writing unnamed.

GEORGE W. NEWCOMER, M.D.

The medical profession, like every other profession or vocation in life, comprises men of various mental calibres, various degrees of natural adaptability and acquired equipment for its pursuit. While every practicing physician may justly, perhaps, be accorded some special merit, however slight, some valuable peculiarity which determined him in the choice of his profession, the history of medical practitioners as a craft goes to show that only now and then one is possessed of that enthusiastic love of medical science and that certain intellectual capacity to wisely apply in practice what he has learned by study which win for him the popular confidence, and not only achieve for him an extended practice, but enable him to keep it and to add to it year by year. Two things especially seem to conspire to such success, to be necessary to it in fact, namely, keen insight into the nature or cause of disease, or what medical men term scientific "diagnosis," and the profound forecasting of the course and event of a disease by particular symptoms (enabling the true physician to effectively apply and vary remedies from time to time as the need of them is indicated), and which they call "prognosis." The skillful diagnostician and the like excellent prognoser, or "prognostician," must unite in the one physician if he be really able, and his success for a given period of years is the best possible assurance that the two do unite in his pro-essional character and determine his career, whenever he may be. Such a physician is Dr. George W. Newcomer, of Connellsville, who, though comparatively a young man, enjoys a very extensive practice, and stands correspondingly high in the confidence of the community, as is made evident by the fact that his "office hours" are crowded with patients, and his town visitations and country ride out of office hours constant and laborious. Success like his is practical testimony of worth which cannot be gainsaid,—the visible crown of merit.

Dr. George W. Newcomer is on his paternal side of German descent; on his maternal of Scotch-Irish stock. His great-grandfather, John Newcomer, was born in Germany, and emigrating to America, settled in Maryland, where the doctor's grandfather, John Newcomer (Jr.), was born. The latter came to Fayette County about 1790, and settled in Tyrone township, on a farm on which the doctor's father, Jacob Newcomer, was born in 1809, and which he finally purchased, living upon it all his life, and on which the doctor himself was born.

Jacob Newcomer, who died March 8, 1871, was the second of a family of eight children, and the oldest son. On the 21st of September, 1839, he married Elizabeth Hershey, of Allegheny County, who was born April 22, 1812. Of this marriage were ten children, of whom George W. is the seventh, and was born May 27, 1845. He was brought up on the farm till about thirteen years of age, working in summers after he became old enough to work, and attending school in the winter seasons, and devoting at home what books he could get to read. When arrived at the age above mentioned he was placed as a clerk in the store of his uncles, John and Joseph Newcomer, in Connellsville, where he remained till seventeen years of age, attending school winters. He then entered Pleasant Valley Academy, Washington County, where he passed two years, taking a partial course of classical studies.

At nineteen years of age he commenced the study of medicine with Dr. John R. Nickel, of Connellsville, one of the most eminent physicians of the region, and at one time Professor of Anatomy and Surgery in the Physio-Medical College (now Institute) of Cincinnati. He continued with Dr. Nickel during the usual period of medical office study, and in due time took the regular course of medical lectures at the Physio-Medical Institute of Cincinnati, from which institution he received his diploma, graduating Feb. 7, 1867. He then returned to Connellsville and opened an office for the practice of medicine, which he there pursued for about five years, and then, upon the call of friends, he removed to Mount Vernon, Ohio, to take the practice of Dr. James Loom, who was about to remove farther West. Dr. Newcomer remained in practice at Mount Vernon till the spring of 1874, when, at the urgent request of his old preceptor, Dr. Nickel (who in a few weeks thereafter died), he returned to Connellsville, where he has ever since remained.

Aside from the practice of medicine, the doctor has engaged more or less in real estate speculations with excellent results.

Dr. Newcomer is in politics an ardent Republican, and though he does not claim to have done his country great service during the war of the Rebellion, it may be mentioned here that he studied Republicanism in the field for about three months in war times, being then a member of Company B of the Fifty-fourth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, a three months' regiment, organized about the time of the battle of Gettysburg, but in which battle it did not participate, the company at that time being mustered in at Pittsburgh and awaiting equipments. But shortly afterwards it was sent with other companies to attempt the capture of the "Morgan raiders" in Ohio, and succeeded in cutting off Morgan at Salinesville, in that State,—a good lesson in politics, the doctor thinks.

SMITH BUTTERMORE, M.D.

Dr. Smith Buttermore, of Connellsville, an excellent gentleman, courteous, intelligent, and companionable, and a leading physician in his part of the county, is on his father's side of German stock. His grandfather, Jacob Buttermore, came to America when a boy, and settled in the eastern part of Pennsylvania. In the war of the Revolution he served as a soldier in Gen. Wayne's division, and after the war resided in Westmoreland County, near Ligonier, and eventually moved to Connellsville, where George Buttermore, the father of Dr. Buttermore, was born in 1798 and died in 1868. George B. married, about 1822, Barbara Smith, daughter of Henry Smith, of Connellsville.

Dr. Buttermore was born in February, 1839, and received his education other than professional in the common schools and at Jefferson Academy. When eighteen years of age he entered the office of Dr. Latellius Lindley, of Connellsville, and read medicine during the required period, and attended regular courses of lectures at Cleveland (Ohio) Medical College, from which institution he graduated in 1854. Immediately after graduation he went to the State of California, wherein he practiced medicine for five years, and then returned home to Connellsville. Spending a summer there, he removed to Harrison County, Va., and entered into the practice of his profession there. When the war broke out all business, on the border especially, was thrown into confusion, and he, being unable therefore to prosecute his profession in the old way, accepted a commission in the Confederate Army of Northern Virginia under Gens. Lee and Jackson, where he became noted as a surgeon, and held his commission through the war.

After the war he resumed practice in Harrison

CONNELLsville BOROUGH AND TOWNSHIP.

County, and continued it till the death of his father, in 1868, when he returned to Connellsville to settle the estate. He has since resided in that borough, and enjoys a fine practice, having in fact all the practice which he is able to attend to.

In politics Dr. Buttenmore is a Democrat, and represented Fayette County in the State Legislature in the session of 1881.

In 1857 he married Miss Mary Lamb, a native of Washington County, Pa., by whom he has two children,—Nevada, born in Virginia, and Virginia, born in Connellsville.

MAJ. DAVID CUMMINGS.

Maj. David Cummings, who became a citizen of Connellsville about 1829, and lived there for several years, where four of his children now reside, was born in Cecil County, Md., April 23, 1777, and was the son of James Cummings, by birth a Scotchman of distinguished family, who coming to America became an officer in the war of the Revolution. David Cummings was a gentleman of classical education, and in early life taught select schools. He was an officer in the army during the war of 1812, and was wounded and taken prisoner at the battle of Beaver Dam, in Canada, and with other captive American officers carried to England, where he was held for six months, until exchanged, suffering great hardships. After the war he became a mail contractor under the government, and as such first found his way into Western Pennsylvania, and eventually settled at Connellsville, where he soon became a man of note. He represented Fayette County in the Legislature at the sessions of 1823 and 1824, and was the first man in the legislative body who made an effort to establish a general system of education by common schools. That system being a matter of contest, he was at the next election defeated.

Some years thereafter, leaving Connellsville, he removed to Mifflin County, where he was at first engaged in the building of the Pennsylvania Canal, from Huntingdon to Lewistown, he afterwards becoming superintendent of the canal, as also collector of the port of Harrisburg. He died at Lewistown, Feb. 5, 1848, and his remains were brought to Connellsville and interred in the family burying-ground beside those of his wife, who had died some years before him.

Maj. Cummings was married June 30, 1801, to Elizabeth Cathers, of Cecil County, Md., by whom he had six sons and six daughters, of whom five daughters and two sons are living,—Hannah M., who married the late Thomas R. McKee; Margaret Eliza, widow of Thomas McLaughlin; Sophia, widow of Josiah Simmons, who died about 1863; Mary Ann, who first married Dr. Breese, of New York, now dead, and as her second husband, Andrew Patterson, of Juniata County; Ellen, wife of Robert T. Galloway, of Fayette County; and Jonathan W., once a government surveyor, now of Uvalde County, Texas; and John A., who resides in Connellsville with his oldest sister, Mrs. McKee. Of the sons deceased was the late Dr. James C. Cummings, who died in Connellsville, July 28, 1872. He was born in Maryland in 1802, and moved with his parents to Fayette County about 1820, and was educated at Jefferson College, and studied medicine under Dr. Robert D. Moore, then a distinguished physician of Connellsville, where he himself afterwards became equally distinguished in his profession. He was coroner of Fayette County for several terms, and a member of the Legislature during the sessions of 1843 and 1844. He was never married.

JAMES K. ROGERS, M.D.

Dr. James K. Rogers was the son of Dr. Joseph Rogers, deceased, and Elizabeth Johnstone Rogers, still living, and of Connellsville. He was born Feb. 5, 1832, and was educated at the common schools and at the academy of Dr. McCluskey, at West Alexander, Washington Co., Pa. At about seventeen years of age he commenced the study of medicine with Dr. James Cummings, of Connellsville, eventually matriculating at Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia, from which institution he graduated in March, 1852, a month after arriving at the age of twenty years. Immediately after graduation he commenced practice in Connellsville, and there followed his profession with signal success until the breaking out of the war of the Rebellion, soon after which he took his departure from home without apprising his friends of his intention and offered his services to the government. Being accepted he received appointment as surgeon and at once entered upon duty, and not long after wrote an affectionate letter to his parents, informing them of his new field of duty. During the war he held regular correspondence with his mother. His official positions in the service were those of assistant surgeon and surgeon under appointment by President Lincoln and confirmation by the Senate; and lieutenant-colonel by brevet under commission of Andrew Johnson, countersigned by Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War, ranking him as such from the 1st day of November, 1865. During a portion of his career he was corps surgeon under Gen. Heintzelman. He at one time had charge of the hospitals at Chambersburg and Hagers-town, and was the chief commissioned officer present upon the capture and burning of the former town by McCausland's cavalry, July, 1864. He also held the post of assistant medical director of the Department of Missouri. Dr. Rogers visited various parts of the theatre of war, inspecting hospitals, etc. During his life in the army and elsewhere he performed over a thousand amputations of limbs, besides a large number of other surgical operations. He prepared some time before his death a manuscript work on surgery intended for publication, but which was unfortunately lost.

After the surrender and the war was practically over Dr. Rogers was stationed in the government hospital at St. Louis, Mo., for about a year; but suffering under malarial fever contracted while on duty in South Carolina and Florida, he returned to Connellsville, and entered upon practice there, at once securing his old clientele. But he was ever a great sufferer, and on March 18, 1870, died from the effects of the fever which he had so long undergone. Dr. Rogers was not only a man of excellent intellect, but of great generosity and kindness of heart. He habitually gave away with free hand the money he earned in his practice. There was no avarice in his composition. His devotion to his profession as a whole was remarkable, but his chief love was surgery, in which his natural ability, disciplined by his experience in the army, made him eminently accomplished.

P. S. NEWMYER.

One of the most enterprising gentlemen of Connellsville, or whom she has numbered among her inhabitants for many years past, the common declaration of her citizens names Porter S. Newmyer, Esq., lawyer and business man, and still young. His ancestors were German, he being the great-grandson of Peter Newmyer, who came to America from Germany about the middle of the eighteenth century, and eventually settled near Pennsville, Fayette Co. His grandfather's name was Jacob. Mr. Newmyer is the son of Joseph (born about 1829) and Elizabeth Strickler Newmyer, now residing at Dawson, and was born in Tyrone township, Oct. 8, 1847.

He was educated at home and at the Southwest Normal College, in California, Washington Co., Pa., and at Alliance College, Stark County, Ohio, which latter college he left in the spring of 1868, and entered upon the study of the law under the direction of Hon. W. H. Playford, of Uniontown, with whom he remained until admitted to the bar at the March term of court, Fayette County, 1871. May 5th of the same year he located in Connellsville and commenced the practice of his profession, at which place he has continued to this time, enjoying an extensive and lucrative business. In politics Mr. Newmyer is a Democrat, and has several times been elected representative delegate for Fayette County, and once senatorial delegate from Fayette and Greene Counties to State Conventions.

While prosecuting his professional business he has also been largely and profitably engaged in the real estate business and other important affairs. He organized the gas company of his borough, and originated the First National Bank of Connellsville; was its vice-president from 1876 to January, 1882, and one of its heaviest stockholders until the last-mentioned date, when he sold out his stock. Mr. Newmyer was one of the projectors of the Keystone Courier, one of the best county papers of Western Pennsylvania, and was one of the organizers of the Dawson Bridge Company across the Youghiheney River. He recently erected the extensive and theretofore much-needed structure known as "Newmyer's Opera-House Block," on Pittsburgh Street, and is connected with Hood Brothers & Co. in the dry-goods business, and lends his assistance to various measures for the advancement of the interests of Connellsville. He is one of the trustees of Bethany College, West Virginia, elected in May, 1880.

On the 10th of April, 1873, Mr. Newmyer married Miss Mary A. Davidson, daughter of Thomas R. and Isabella Davidson, of Connellsville, by whom he has a son, Thomas D., and a daughter, Isabella D.

JOSEPH SOISSON.

Of those of our fellow-citizens of foreign birth whose energy and ambition demand a less cramped field of action than Europe generally affords her most enterprising children, is Mr. Joseph Soisson, of Connellsville. Mr. Soisson was born in 1827 in Alsace, then a province of France, but since 1872 under the dominion of Germany, where he was educated in both the German and French tongue, and when about eighteen years of age came to America, at that time unable to speak English. Finding employment in New York he in a few months acquired a competent knowledge of our language and moved to Philadelphia, where he remained about eighteen months, and thence went to Hollidaysburg, Blair Co., Pa., in the employ of Charles Hughes, a brick-maker, continuing with him about a year and a half, whereafter he visited New Orleans, La., tarrying there a few months, and returning to Mr. Hughes, who finally went into business with Dr. Rodrick, of which firm Mr. Soisson soon took contracts for making brick. This business he prosecuted for about two years, and then went into partnership with Hughes, Rodrick retiring, on the Allegheny Mountain, Plane No. 8, the firm-name being Hughes & Soisson. The business continued at No. 8 till about 1869, when Hughes & Soisson instituted another brick-making partnership at Mittenberger, Fayette Co., which lasted about nine years, the firm dissolving about 1869. Mr. Soisson then carried on the business alone for about six years, and next entered into partnership with Spriggs & Wilhelm, brick-makers at White Rock, Connellsville, under the style of Soisson, Spriggs & Co., which after sundry changes in copartners became Soisson & Co., Mr. Soisson buying out some of his partners, and his young son, John F., purchasing the interests of others in 1876 (with capital which he had the business energy and courage to borrow), the firm continuing under the name of Soisson & Co. till December, 1879, when Soisson & Son came into full possession of the business, which they have since conducted with great success. The company manufactures all kinds of brick on order, but coke-oven brick are their specialty, of which their works produce about 1,300,000 per year. They also make a fine article of pavement tile.

In 1872, Mr. Soisson, John Kilpatrick, and John Wilhelm, as Kilpatrick, Soisson & Co., established a fire-brick works at Moyer’s, near Connellsville, which is now owned by Soisson & Kilpatrick (son of John Kilpatrick), Wilhelm having withdrawn, and at which about eight thousand coke-oven and other bricks are made per day.

Mr. Soisson has ever maintained an excellent reputation for moral character as well as business enterprise.

In March, 1853, he married, at Hollidaysburg, Miss Caroline Filcer, daughter of Michael Filcer, of Centre County, who was born and married in Germany, some of his children being born there, Caroline, however, being a native of Centre County. Of this union are four daughters and seven sons. Three of the daughters are married.

BROWNSVILLE BOROUGH AND TOWNSHIP.

The borough of Brownsville is situated on the right bank of the Monongahela River, at and extending below the mouth of Dunlap’s Creek. Within its boundaries was the residence of the old Indian chief, Nemacolin, and the site of the pre-historic earthwork, known for a century and a quarter as “Redstone Old Fort,” as also the site of “Fort Burd,” which was the earliest defensive work reared by English-speaking people in the Ohio River valley, except that which was partially constructed by Englishmen (but completed by the French) where Pittsburgh now stands. The building of Fort Burd and the opening of a road to it from the East by Col. Burd, in 1759, gave to this place a great comparative importance, which it sustained in succeeding years, through the periods of Western emigration, of flat-boat and keel-boat building, of successful steamboat navigation of the Monongahela and Ohio Rivers, and of travel and traffic over the old National road, embracing a total of more than three-fourths of a century, until, by the completion of the Pennsylvania and Baltimore and Ohio Railroads, in 1852, and the consequent diversion of trade and travel, the old town was shorn of much of its former importance, and from that time, for almost thirty years, it has remained in a comparatively obscure and isolated situation until the spring of 1884, when, by the opening of the Pittsburgh, Virginia and Charleston Railroad Line, from Pittsburgh to West Brownsville, the boroughs on the Monongahela at the mouth of Dunlap’s Creek were for the first time placed in possession of railroad connection with Pittsburgh and the marts and markets of the Atlantic and the lakes.

The borough is almost encircled by the township of Brownsville, which extends around it from the Monongahela River and Redstone Creek, on the north and northeast, to Dunlap’s Creek on the south, its longest boundary line, on the southeast, being against the township of Redstone, of which it originally formed a part. The township, by the census of 1880, contained a population of 246; that of the borough of Brownsville being returned in the same census at 149.

With the possible exception of a few transient squatters who clustered around Fort Burd for a few years just after its erection, there is little doubt that Michael Cresap was the earliest white settler within the territory now embraced in the limits of the borough of Brownsville. He has been mentioned as such in all published accounts of the settlement, and it admits of no doubt that he was the first who came here with the intention of making the place his permanent home, though permanent settlers preceded him on the opposite side of Dunlap’s Creek, and also at several points not far to the eastward and southeastward of the present borough. One of these was Thomas Brown (afterwards founder of the town), whose settlement in this section antedated that of Cresap a few years.

Michael Cresap was the son of Col. Thomas Cresap, of Oldtown, Md., who had been connected with the operations of the Ohio Company as its agent, and who had been one of the earliest travelers to the Monongahela country over the old Nemacolin path, as also one of those who accompanied Col. Burd to Fort Redstone in 1759. Whether the knowledge which he thus gained of this place had any influence in caus-

1 Such were probably John and Samuel McCulloch, traders, who made claim to a large tract of land, including all that is now the borough of Brownsville. It is not certainly known whether they ever lived here or not, but it is probable they were located here for a time temporarily in their trading operations. They claimed under an alleged military permit, granted by Col. Bouquet. Whether valid or not, their claim was afterwards purchased by Thomas Brown to make his title complete.
ing his son to settle here is not known. He (Michael) first came as a trader about the year 1769 (though the exact date of his first visit is not known) to the mouth of Dunlap's Creek. "This post, known in border history as Redstone Old Fort, became the rallying-point of the pioneers, and was familiar to many an early settler as his place of embarkation for the 'dark and bloody ground.' In the legends of the West, Michael Cresap is connected with this Indian stronghold. In those narratives Cresap is spoken of as remarkable for his brave, adventurous disposition, and awarded credit for often rescuing the whites by a timely notice of the savages' approach, a knowledge of which he obtained by uneasing vigilance over their movements. This fort was frequently Cresap's rendezvous as a trader, and thither he resorted with his people, either to interchange views and adopt plans for future action, or for repose in quieter times when the red men were lulled into inaction and the tomahawk was temporarily buried. These were periods of great conviviality. The days were spent in athletic exercises, and in the evening the sturdy foresters bivouacked around a fire of huge logs, recounted their hairbreadth adventures, or if, perchance, a violin or jews-harp was possessed by the foresters, it was certainly introduced, and the monotony of the camp was broken by a boisterous 'stag dance.'"

"Michael Cresap discovered at that early day that this location would become exceedingly valuable as emigrants flowed in and the country was gradually opened. Accordingly he took measures to secure a Virginia title to several hundred acres, embracing the fortification, by what at that time was called 'a tomahawk improvement.' Not content, however, with girdling a few trees and blazing others, he determined to insure his purpose, and in order that his act and intention might not be misconstrued, he built a house of hewed logs with a gable roof nailing on, which is believed to have been the first edifice of this kind in that part of our great domain west of the mountains. We are not possessed of data to fix the precise year of this erection, but it is supposed to have occurred about 1770."

For about five years after that time Capt. Cresap made the mouth of Dunlap's Creek the base of his trading operations, but still having his family and home in Maryland. "Early in the year 1774 he engaged six or seven active young men, at the rate of £2 10s. per month, and repairing to the wilderness of the Ohio, commenced the business of building houses and clearing lands, and being among the first adventurers into this exposed and dangerous region, he was enabled to select some of the best and richest of the Ohio levels." It appears that he had considerable means at his command, for in addition to the business of his store which he kept in operation at Redstone Old Fort, he purchased various tracts of land in the surrounding country, as well as at several points on the Ohio River, and he was also, apparently, a loaner of money to some extent on landed security.

After the close of "Dummore's war," in the commencement of which Capt. Cresap took part as a subordinate officer (for which his name and character were afterwards severely but unjustly assailed), he "returned to Maryland, and spent the latter part of the autumn of 1774 and the succeeding winter in the repose of a domestic circle from which he had been so long estranged, but in the early spring of 1775 he hired another band of young men and repaired again to the Ohio to finish the work he commenced the year before. He did not stop at his old haunts, but descended to Kentucky, where he made some improvements. Being ill, however, he soon left his workmen and departed for his home over the mountains, in order to rest and recover his health. 4 The following facts in reference to some of Cresap's land transactions in the vicinity of Dunlap's Creek are gathered from the old Augusta County, Va., court records, which are still in existence in Washington, D.C.

On the 24th of September, 1773, Robert Dunbow deeded to Michael Cresap, for the consideration of fifteen pounds, Pennsylvania money, a tract of land in Westmoreland County, adjoining lands of David Rodgers and Joseph Branton [Branton?], on Monongehala, being part of a larger tract of land [Dunbow] purchased of James Branton, and containing by estimation two hundred and fifty acres. "The deed of conveyance was executed in presence of George Brant, Joseph Donely, and Henry Branton, and 'at a court held and held for Augusta County [Virginia] at Pittsburg, September the 24th, 1775, this deed of Bargain and Sale was proved by two of the subscribing witnesses, and ordered to be recorded.'

On the 1st of September, 1775, "John Corey, of Dunlap's Creek Settlement, for the consideration of fifty pounds, Pennsylvania money, to him in hand paid by Michael Cresap, Sen." mortgaged to the said Cresap "all the parcel of land contained in the within [not found] Bill of Sale from John J. Lillie to me [Corey], dated March 15, 1774." This mortgage was given to secure the payment of a certain sum of money named in a bond given by Corey to Cresap, dated Dec. 10, 1772. The mortgage was witnessed by John Jeremiah Jacob, and "by his oath proved at a court, continued and held for Augusta County, Va., at Pittsburg, Sept. 21, 1775, and ordered to be Recorded.'

On the 5th of September, 1775, "James Brinton, of Augusta County, Virginia, Monongehala Settlement, in consideration of fifty pounds, Pennsylvania currency, in hand paid by Michael Cresap, Sen.," conveyed to him by deed "a certain tract or parcel of land lying about one mile distant from the Monongehala River, and bounded by the following persons: John Adams on the North East, Edward Dowey on the East, Thomas Brown, west, and Edward Wyde on the North; with all and singular the Appurtenances thereunto Belonging in any ways appertaining; containing by Estimation about two hundred and fifty Acres, be the same more or less," the grantor guaranteeing the same against the lawful claims and demands of "all manner of Person or Persons, the Lord of the Sale excepted only." The deed was witnessed by Robert Dunbow [his mark] and John Jeremiah Jacob, and "At a Court Continued and held for Augusta County at Pittsburg, September 21st, 1775, this Deed of Bargain and Sale was proved by the oath of John Jeremiah Jacob, one of the witnesses thereto, and ordered to be Recorded.'

The instrument was indexed, Examined and delivered, John Jeremiah Jacob, October 14th, 1775."

8 There was a younger Michael Cresap, the son of Daniel Cresap, brother of Michael Cresap, Sr.
across the Allegheny Mountains he was met by a faithful friend with a message stating that he had been appointed by the Committee of Safety at Frederick a captain to command one of the rifle companies required from Maryland by a resolution of Congress. Experienced officers and the very best men that could be procured were demanded."

This occurred in June, 1775, and on the 18th of the following month Capt. Cresap, at the head of his company (of whom twenty-two men were volunteers from west of the mountains, doubtless mostly from the Monongahela settlements), set out from Frederick, Md., and after a march of twenty-two days joined Washington's army investing Boston. But his military career in the Revolutionary army was short. "Admonished by continued illness, and feeling, perhaps, some foreboding of his fate, he endeavored once more, after about three months' service, to reach his home among the mountains, but finding himself too sick to proceed he stopped in New York, where he died of fever on the 18th of October, 1775, at the early age of thirty-three. On the following day his remains, attended by a vast concourse of people, were buried with military honors in Trinity churchyard." In that burial-ground they still rest, and the headstone of his grave may be found much dilapidated, but with the yet legible inscription,

"IN MEMORY OF
MICHAEL CRESAP, FIRST CAPT.
OF THE RIFLE BATTALIONS, AND SON TO COL. THOMAS
CRESAP, WHO DEPARTED THIS LIFE OCTOBER THE 18, 1775."

Michael Cresap left a widow and four children. His widow, in 1781, married her first husband's friend and employer, John Jeremiah Jacob, who, at the age of about fifteen years, had commenced as a clerk for Cresap in his store at Redstone Old Fort, and who, on his employer's departure for the army in 1775, was left in charge of the business, and so remained for several months after Cresap's death, closing up the affairs. In July, 1776, he entered the army as ensign, and served nearly five years, rising to the grade of captain. Later in life he became a clergyman of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and died highly esteemed in Hampshire County, Va. He was the author of the "Life of Capt. Michael Cresap," and by the facts which he gathered and gave to the public in that work successfully vindicated the character and cleared the memory of his dead friend from the terrible charges which were made, and for years generally believed, against him in reference to the murder of the relatives of the Indian chief Logan in the war of 1774.

Thomas Brown, who laid out the town which then took, and still bears, his name, was one of the earliest settlers who came to the vicinity of Redstone and Dunlap's Creeks, his name being found in the list of "The names of the Inhabitants near Redstone" reported by the Rev. John Steele as living in this region in the spring of 1768. He was not then a resident in what is now the borough of Brownsville, but came here a few years later, and having purchased the right which Michael Cresap had acquired to the land afterwards the site of the town, and having also bought out whatever interest the McCulloughs had in the same, he settled here and commenced improvement in 1776. The correctness of this date is made certain by the certificate which was given him for the tract by the Virginia commissioners at Redstone Old Fort, Dec. 16, 1779. In that certificate there is added to the description of the tract granted to Thomas Brown the words, "to include his settlement made in the year 1776." The tract was surveyed to him March 21, 1785. It is described in the survey as being "situate on the dividing ridge between Redstone and Dunlap's Creeks;" the name by which the tract was designated was "Whisky Path."

Basil Brown, Sr., brother of Thomas Brown, did not become a resident of Brownsville, but lived on a tract "near Redstone Old Fort," in the present township of Luzerne. On this tract he settled in 1770, and remained there during the remainder of his life. His son, Basil Brown, Jr., however, removed to Brownsville, where he lived at or near the corner of Morgan and Market Streets. His sister, Sally Brown, who was a cripple, lived with him, both remaining unmarried. He died in Brownsville many years ago, at seventy-five years of age. Sally, who survived him a number of years, is still remembered by many of the older citizens of the town.

From the time of the opening of Burd's road, in 1759, the point of its western terminus on the Monongahela became a place of considerable importance, and this was more especially the case after the time when westward bound emigrants began to pass through this region, making this the end of their land travel and the point of their embarkation in flatboats for their passage down the river. A very heavy and constantly increasing emigration was setting towards the Southwest, particularly Kentucky, and to all emigrants traveling to that region the smooth-flowing currents of the Monongahela and Ohio Rivers offered the easiest, cheapest, and in every sense the most eligible highway, a route by which, with very little labor to themselves, the rude craft on which they embarked at the mouth of Dunlap's Creek would land them without change almost on the spot of their destination.

These were the considerations which induced multitudes of western bound travelers to lay their route over the road which brought them to the Monongahela at Redstone Old Fort. Such as could conveniently make the arrangement usually chose the latter part of the winter for their exodus, because at that season the friendly snow still lingered upon the roads, and mitigated in some degree the horrors of the passage from the mountains to the river. If they had rightly timed their journey, and the melting time came soon after their arrival at the place of embarkation, then all was well with them, but if the spring thaws delayed their coming, and the shivering, homesick wayfarers were compelled to remain for weeks (as was sometimes the case) in their comfortless shelters, awaiting an opportunity to proceed on their way, then their condition was pitiable indeed. "John Moore, a very early settler, used to relate" (says Judge Yeech) "that in the long, cold winter of 1789, a prototype of those of 1856–57, the snow being three or four feet deep and crusty, he said the road from Sandy Hollow (Brubaker's) to the verge of Brownsville, where William Hogg lived, was lined on both sides with wagons and families, camped out, waiting for the loosing of the icy bonds from the waters and the preparation of boats to embark for the West, the men dragging in old logs and stumps for fuel to save their wives and children from freezing."

The great amount of emigration and other western travel centring at the mouth of Dunlap's Creek as a point of embarkation rendered necessary the building of a large number of flat-boats and other primitive river-craft; and the construction of these, as well as the furnishing of supplies to the voyagers for their long trips down the river (for by the time of their arrival here many of them had exhausted the supplies with which they had set out on the journey), produced business activity, and gave to the place the promise of future prosperity and importance.

These facts and considerations caused Thomas Brown to conceive the project of establishing a town upon that part of his "Whisky Path" tract lying adjacent to the Monongahela and Dunlap's Creek. Accordingly, in 1785 he platted and laid out the town of Brownsville with streets and alleys nearly the same as they now exist in that part of the present borough which was embraced in the original plat. A "public square" (which still remains as such) was laid out on the southwest side of Front Street, and adjoining it was the early burial-place of the town, in which the Browns, the Washingtons, and many others were interred as elsewhere mentioned. It has been said that this spot was donated and set apart by Thomas Brown as a public burial-ground, but of this there is no proof. An addition to the town was afterwards made by Chads Chalfant, and another by Samuel Jackson, who purchased from Thomas Brown certain lands adjoining the original plat and laid them out with streets and alleys; Church and Spring Streets were included in this addition to the town.

The proprietor of Brownsville offered his lots for sale, subject to conditions nearly identical with those imposed by Henry Beeson in sales of his lots at Union-town. All dwellings erected on them were required to be equal to twenty by twenty-five feet in dimensions, substantially built, and in all cases to have a chimney or chimneys of brick or stone. Quit-resents were required in nearly all cases, but these were sometimes waived, for reasons which are not made apparent.

Thomas Brown occupied (so says that dubious authority, tradition) the shingle-roofed house built by Michael Cresap from the time of his purchase from the latter until his death, which occurred in 1797, at the age of fifty-nine years. He left two sons—Thomas Brown, Jr., and Levi Brown—and three daughters,—Mrs. Elizabeth Cox, Mrs. William Crawford, and Mrs. Ewing. There are no descendants of his now living in Brownsville or vicinity.

The following-named persons were purchasers of town lots in Brownsville from the original proprietor.

Many others purchased from his estate after his death.

Basil Brown, who was the purchaser of a large number of lots from his brother, Thomas Brown, made sales of them from time to time to the following named persons, viz.:
BROWNSVILLE BOROUGH AND TOWNSHIP.

This property he purchased of Thomas Brown soon after his settlement in Brownsville. Until the time of his emigration from Hagerstown to Brownsville Mr. Bowman was a member of the Lutheran Church, but not long afterwards he united with the Protestant Episcopal Church, and remained one of its most influential, liberal, and respected members until his death, which occurred March 2, 1847, at the age of eighty-four years. His wife died two years earlier, March 11, 1845.

The children of Jacob Bowman were the following named: Mary, born in 1788; married Henry Sterling, a planter of St. Francisville, La., and died in 1852. Annie E. Bowman, born May 8, 1790, and married March 12, 1818, to Henry Sweitzer, of Hagerstown, Md. Harriet E. Bowman, born June 16, 1792; married John Thompson McKennan; died March 8, 1832. James L. Bowman, born June 23, 1794; graduated at Washington College in 1813; studied law with John Kennedy; admitted to the bar in 1817; president of the Monongahela Bank from 1843 until his death in 1857. Matilda L. Bowman, born Aug. 13, 1796; married Thomas M. T. McKennan (member of Congress and Secretary of the Interior under President Fillmore); she died March 3, 1858. Louisa Bowman, born in 1798; married Samuel Bell, of Reading, Pa., in 1830; she died in January, 1880. William Robert Bowman, born 1801; graduated at Washington College, Pa., in 1822; graduated at theological seminary, Princeton, N. J., 1825; made deacon in Episcopal Church May 11, 1826; removed in 1827 to St. Francisville, West Feliciana Parish, La., where he organized Grace Church, Feb. 7, 1829; remained at St. Francisville till his death in 1855. Goodloe Harper Bowman, born April 3, 1803; entered trade with his father under the firm-name of Jacob Bowman & Sons; was subsequently in partnership with his brother, N. B. Bowman; was cashier of the Monongahela Bank from 1829 to 1841; elected president of that institution in 1857, and held the position till his death in February, 1874. Nelson Blair Bowman, born July 8, 1807; entered mercantile pursuits with his father and brother; retired from active trade in 1858, but is still a director in the Monongahela National Bank and in the Monongahela Bridge Company. He is living in retirement and elegance at "Nemacolin," an eminence which commands a fine view of the Monongahela River and surrounding country,—the same property which his father, Jacob Bowman, bought of Thomas Brown in 1788.1

William Hogg was contemporary with Jacob Bowman as an early merchant in Brownsville. He was an Englishman who had been impressed as a sailor on

1 The earliest date under which Jacob Bowman's name is found in the Fayette County records is June 23, 1788, at which time he purchased four and a half acres and four and a half perches of land in Brownsville from Thomas Brown for the consideration of $23. This was undisputedly the homestead property "Nemacolin," now occupied by Nelson B. Bowman, though the description does not absolutely prove it to be the same.

Robert Elliott, the earliest purchaser whose name appears in the above list, came from Washington County, Md., to Brownsville, and purchased (April 28, 1786) a town lot for the consideration of $10. The lot was No. 17, adjoining lot of Robert Taylor. Col. Elliott was engaged here in the purchase of supplies for the United States government, in which business he was associated with Col. Eli Williams and Jacob Bowman.

Jacob Bowman, whose father emigrated from Germany to America about the time of the "Old French war," was born at Hagerstown, Md., June 17, 1763, and when twenty-four years of age came to Brownsville, and commenced the business of merchandising, he and William Hogg being the first two permanently-located merchants in the town. He was also engaged in partnership with Col. Elliott and Eli Williams, as before mentioned, in purchasing supplies for the Western army under Gen. Anthony Wayne, and he was made commissary to the government troops which were sent across the mountains to suppress the Whiskey Insurrection in 1794.

At the time when Mr. Bowman started business in Brownsville all goods were brought over the mountain roads from Cumberland to the Monongahela on pack-horses, of which large numbers, loaded with his goods, were frequently seen standing together in the public square opposite his residence, waiting their turn to be relieved of their burdens. The first load of merchandise brought over the mountains by wagon came here in 1789 to Jacob Bowman. The wagoner who drove the team was John Hayden, afterwards a well-known iron-master in Fayette County. The load, which was about two thousand pounds in weight, was drawn by four horses, and the freight charged on it was three dollars per one hundred pounds. Hayden was about a month in making the trip from Hagers--town, Md., to Brownsville and back.

In consideration of his services to the government, Jacob Bowman was appointed under the administration of President Washington (in 1795) postmaster of Brownsville, and held the office until the incoming of Gen. Jackson's administration, a period of thirty-four years. He was prominent in the organization of the old Monongahela Bank, and was its president from its organization under the charter in 1814 till Sept. 26, 1843, when he retired, and was succeeded by his son, James L. Bowman.

The residence of Jacob Bowman was where his son, N. B. Bowman, now lives, on the property called "Nemacolin," for the old Indian chief whose wigwam or cabin (tradition says) was once located on it.

board one of His Majesty's ships, and deserted at Charleston, S. C., whence he traveled to Philadelphia. There he made the acquaintance of an English gentleman named Stokes, who furnished him with a small stock of light hardware, with which he started out as a traveling peddler. He continued in this business for two or three trips, and finally, about 1787, came to Brownsville, where he opened a store in the upper story of a building on Water Street, where the rolling-mill now stands. He bought his goods in Baltimore, making his earliest trips to and from that city on foot, generally starting from Brownsville on Sunday morning, and closing his store during his absence. The first mention found of him in the records is his purchase of three lots in Brownsville, Jan. 28, 1786, after he had been here in business for nearly ten years. The lots which he purchased at that time were Nos. 3, 4, and 5 of the original plat, for the consideration of £15. Mr. Hogg was a bachelor, and by his industry and perseverance during a long period of merchandising in Brownsville accumulated a large fortune.

George Hogg, a nephew of William, was an iron-worker in Northumberland, England. About the year 1800 his uncle brought him to Brownsville and formed a business partnership with him, which continued till his death. George Hogg married a daughter of Nathaniel Breading, and they became the parents of four sons and two daughters, viz.: George E. Hogg, now living in Brownsville; Nathaniel B. Hogg, now a resident of Allegheny City, Pa.; John T. Hogg, living in Connellsville; James Hogg, lost at sea on board the steamer "Arctic;" a daughter, now Mrs. Felix R. Brunot, living in Pittsburgh; the other daughter, who became the wife of William Bissell, died many years ago.

In a deed executed in 1787 by Thomas Brown, conveying a town lot to Matthew Campbell, the property is described as "situate in Brownsville, on the water, by the southeast corner of the town, which was made apparent that an attempt was made about that time to have the latter name adopted for the town in place of Brownsville. No allusion to the name (as applied to this town) has been found in any other place. The lot above referred to as having been sold to Campbell was No. 1, on Front Street, bounded on the northwest by Trader's Lane. The price paid was £5. The purchaser of this lot was doubtless the same Matthew Campbell who, in December, 1783, was licensed by the court of Fayette County to keep a tavern in Uniontown, and who in 1784 purchased a lot (where the Fulton House now stands) in that town, from Henry Beeson. In 1785 he was licensed to keep a public-house in Men-Allen township. Little beyond this is known of him.

Andrew Boggs was the purchaser from Thomas Brown (in June, 1788) of a lot on Second Street, extending through to Market Street, adjoining a lot owned by Nathan Chalfant. The consideration named in the deed to Boggs is £7 10s.

Nathan Chalfant purchased the lot (referred to in the deed to Boggs) on the 23d of June, 1788. It was sixty by one hundred and eighty feet in size, extending from Second to Market Street. He sold it on the 19th of March, 1798, to Andrew Lynn, who, in June, 1815, conveyed it to the trustees of the Presbyterian congregation, and it is the same on which the church edifice of that congregation now stands.

At the same time that Chalfant purchased the lot above named he also bought lot No. 4, on Water Street, adjoining Thomas McKibben and Holborn Hill. On this lot he lived for many years, and carried on an extensive business in boat-building.

Chads Chalfant lived on a farm about one mile out of town, but was the owner of several town lots. In 1894 he donated to the Methodist Episcopal Church the lot on which the present house of worship stands. He also sold the lot which is now occupied by the Masonic Hall.

Robert Clarke came here from Greene County as early as 1787, at which time he was the purchaser of a lot in this town. He built the house which is now owned by the heirs of George Shuman and occupied as a telegraph-office. Its original site was where the Snowdon House now is, but it was removed about 1823 to its present location by Clarke, who then built the Snowdon House on the spot thus vacated, and lived in it until his death, about 1840. He was concerned with Neal Gillespie in the grist-mill and saw-mill on the river, as hereafter mentioned. A daughter of Robert Clarke married John L. Dawson, and another daughter became the wife of Gen. Henry W. Beeson, of Uniontown.

Neal Gillespie was not a settler in Brownsville, yet it seems proper to mention him in this connection, as he was closely identified with the business interests of the place. He was an Irishman who came to the west bank of the Monongahela, and settled upon the "Indian Hills" tract, which had previously been the property of "Indian Peter," opposite Brownsville. He became the owner of the ferry across the river at this point, and operated it for many years. He purchased land in Brownsville, on the "Neck," where his landing-place was located, as also the grist-mill and saw-mill (elsewhere mentioned) which he built in partnership with Robert Clarke. A part of his land on the "Neck" was sold March 19, 1829, to Samuel J. Krepps.

Gillespie's daughter, Nellie, married a man named Boyle. They lived in Brownsville in a log house that stood on Second Street in the rear of the Central Hotel. In that house was born their daughter, Maria, who became the wife of the Hon. Thomas Ewing, of Ohio, and mother of the wife of Gen. W. T. Sherman, of the United States army.

George Kinneer, a Scotchman, came to Brownsville before 1788, and purchased several lots located on the east, south, and west of the Public Ground. This property passed to Polly Kinnear, and later to William Cock, who sold to J. W. Jeffries. Kinnear was associated in business with James Lang (the auctioneer), who came here in 1790.

Thomas McKibben was in Brownsville as early as 1788, in which year there was recorded a deed to him from Thomas Brown, conveying certain property in the town. He was a merchant on Market Street, and a justice of the peace, also prothonotary of Fayette County in 1821. No descendants of his are now in Brownsville.

Samuel Workman came here as early as 1790, and started a tannery where now stands the residence of Samuel Steele. James Workman, a son, afterwards built the present Steele tannery. He also kept the tavern, now the Girard House, at the head of Market Street.

The Brownsville post-office was established Jan. 1, 1795, with Jacob Bowman as postmaster. Basil Brashier was here in the same year, and soon after built the stone house now occupied by Mrs. Wesley Frost, opening it as a tavern. This was for years the leading public-house of Brownsville.

Adam Jacobs came in about 1795. He was a merchant, and kept a store on Water Street, next below where the rolling-mill stands. A daughter of his married her father's clerk, a Mr. Beggs, with whom she removed to New Lisbon, Ohio. Adam Jacobs, Jr., became a merchant in the town, and father of the third Adam, now known as Capt. Adam Jacobs, who was born in Brownsville, Jan. 7, 1817. He learned the trade of coppersmith and tinner, but commenced steamboating early in life, taking command of the steamer "Exchange" in 1840, when he was only twenty-three years of age. Afterwards he commanded several boats, the last of which was the "Niagara." In 1847. Since that time he has been engaged in the building of steamboats, of which about one hundred and twenty have been built for him. He has always been an active business man, and by his industry and remarkable business tact has accumulated a handsome fortune. There are few, if any, who have done more than he to advance the business interests of Brownsville, and to-day he is accounted one of the most enterprising as well as substantial men of the Monongahela Valley. He has a residence in Brownsville, and another upon his fine estate of "East Riverside," on the Monongahela, in the township of Luzerne.

In 1796, Elijah Clark was engaged in boat-building in Brownsville. His yard was on Water Street, north of the site of the United States Hotel. At the same time Capt. T. Shane advertised boat-sheds and boat-yards for sale or to let.

A coppersmith and tin-working shop was carried on here in 1797 by Anthony & Bowman.

William Crawford was a merchant in Brownsville in (and probably before) the year 1800. His store was on Market Street, where Jacob Sawyer now lives. His wife was a daughter of Thomas Brown.

Valentine Giesey, the son of a Lutheran clergyman who emigrated to America in 1776, and settled at Berlin, Somerset Co., Pa., where this son was born, came to Brownsville about the year 1800, and went into trade here. On the breaking out of the war of 1812 he entered the service as a sergeant in Capt. Joseph Wadsworth's company, of which he afterwards became captain. After his return from the war he reopened the mercantile business, and also became very popular as a military man and a politician. He died in 1835, and was buried in the Episcopal churchyard.

James Blaine was a man who traveled quite extensively in Europe and South America, and afterwards, in 1804, settled in Brownsville, where he opened a store, and where he was also for many years a justice of the peace. He was a man of dignified bearing, and held in high esteem by his fellow-townsmen. In 1818 he removed to Washington County, where he lived during the remainder of his life.

George Graff, a carpenter and cabinet-maker, came from Allentown, Pa., to Brownsville in 1806. He lived on Front Street, where his son Joseph now lives.

George Johnston, a native of Monaghan County, Ireland, landed in Philadelphia with his wife in August, 1805, and thence moved to Hickory, Washington Co., Pa., where his uncle resided. There he remained until the following spring, his son John having been born in the mean time. Mr. Johnston then removed to Brownsville, where he commenced business as a weaver in a house that stood where Dr. J. R. Patton now lives. He had a family of eight children, of whom John was the eldest. He (John) learned the trade of carpenter with George Graff. He has since been prominent in the affairs of Brownsville, and has often been elected to offices in the borough. He is still living here, on the corner of Morgan and Front Streets. Two other sons (William and James) and a daughter of George Johnston are also living in Brownsville.

In 1807, Alexander Simpson was established in Brownsville as a manufacturer of surveyors' instruments and other fine work of similar character.

Abraham Underwood, a Quaker, left Baltimore in 1808, with his wife and three children, bound for Cincinnati, over the then usual route by way of Brownsville. Arriving at this point, and finding something of a Quaker settlement here and in the vicinity, they abandoned their original intention and remained in Brownsville. Mr. Underwood was by trade a tailor, and he soon opened a shop on Front Street, west of Jacob's Alley. The family remained in Brownsville from 1808 until 1834, when he removed to Monongahela City, Pa.

Philip Worley came from Virginia to Brownsville about 1808, and took up the business of boat-building. His mother kept a cake-shop in the "Neck," where the vacant lot is, just below the hardware-store of James Slocum. Worley died a few years later, and his widow married Thomas Brown, son of Basil Brown, Sr. Daniel Worley, a son of Philip, was a clerk in Robert Clarke's store. He married a daughter of James Tomlinson, and in 1815 was employed as master of one of the river-boats owned by his father-in-law. In 1825 he and Tomlinson, with their families, moved to Cleveland, Ohio, where they settled, and where their descendants are still living.

Eli Abrams settled here about 1812. His grandfather, Henry Abrams, was a settler at Turkey Foot as early as 1768, being mentioned as such in the report of the Rev. John Steele, made in that year. Eli, on his arrival at Brownsville, was employed in the nail-factory of Jacob Bowman, on Front Street. Afterwards he married a daughter of Martin Tiernan, and kept a store on the "Neck." He became a justice of the peace, and filled that office with honor for many years. Two of his sons (Dr. James Abrams, dentist, and Decatur Abrams) are now living in Brownsville. Another son, Lewis Abrams, lives about a mile outside the borough.

George Dawson was a son of Nicholas, and grandson of George and Eleanor Dawson, who were settlers in the township of Union (now North Union). Their son Nicholas removed to Kentucky, where his son George was reared to manhood. About 1813 he (George) returned to Fayette County, Pa., and settled in Brownsville with his wife and two children (John L. Dawson, who afterwards became a prominent public man, and a daughter, who married George Ashman), occupying a house on Front Street, now owned by Mrs. Sweitzer. He was the Brownsville agent for a salt company, and became interested in the construction of the National road, being the contractor for the building of the heavy stone-work on the river-side of that road in its approach to the Monongahela. He was also the owner of large tracts of land in Ohio. His children, besides the two before mentioned, were as follows: Louisa, who married Gen. George W. Cass; Ellen, who after her sister's death became the second wife of Gen. Cass; Samuel Kenney Dawson, who became an officer in the United States army, and is now on the retired list, living at Eastport, Me.; Mary, who died at the age of about twenty years; Elizabeth, married Alfred Howell, of Uniontown; Catharine, married Alphens E. Willson, of Uniontown, president of Fayette County court; and George, the youngest, who married a daughter of Alfred Patterson, of Pittsburgh, and is now residing in Louisiana. George Dawson, the father of this numerous family, died in Brownsville a few years ago. None of his descendants are now living in the borough.

John Snowdon, a young Englishman, came to Brownsville about 1820, with a wife and two children. He was a blacksmith by trade, and commenced work here with John Weaver, who, however, was a man of very little account, and the work of the shop was chiefly done by Snowdon. His industry soon attracted the attention of George Hogg (himself also an Englishman), who asked young Snowdon if he could make an English oven. His reply was that he could if he had the necessary iron, which was thereupon procured for him by Mr. Hogg, and the oven was produced as desired. At that time stoves were nearly or wholly unknown in this section, and Mr. Snowdon was called on to make several of them, which he did. After a time Mr. Hogg asked him why he did not start a shop of his own, and received the very natural reply that it was because he had not the capital. Mr. Hogg then furnished him with an anvil, bellows, and all other needed articles which he could not make, and he opened a blacksmith-shop where John R. Dutton's store and residence now is. The new shop received an unexpectedly large patronage, and many articles in the machinery line were required, whereupon, after a short time, a machine-shop was added. At first the necessary castings were procured from William Cock, at Bridgeport, but it was not long before Snowdon added a foundry and pattern-shop to his other works. In 1827 he built at these works the engines for the steamer "Monongahela." In 1831 he built larger shops where the rolling-mill now stands. These shops were burned and rebuilt below the site of the rolling-mills. In them the engines of the ironclad "Manayunk" were built. The building of the rolling-mill and its subsequent history will be found in another place in the history of the borough.

Mr. Snowdon, who was for a period of more than fifty years a resident of Brownsville, and in the active part of his life one of the most enterprising men of the borough, was born at Martin, near Scarborough, in Yorkshire, England, March 2, 1796, and died in Brownsville on the 25th of January, 1875. His son, J. N. Snowdon, is the present postmaster of Brownsville.

Henry J. Rigden, a "watchmaker," came from Georgetown, D. C., in September, 1817, and opened a shop on Front Street, Brownsville. He was afterwards elected justice of the peace, and filled the office for fifteen years. For several years he was in the State service as clerk for the superintendent of canals at Erie, Pa., but had his home at Brownsville during that term. He also held the office of postmaster at Brownsville during the administration of President Polk. He still resides in Brownsville, which has been his home for sixty-four years.

Henry Sweitzer, long a prominent citizen of Brownsville, was a native of Doylestown, Pa., and at the age of sixteen years removed to Washington County, Md., where he remained for many years, during which time he was elected sheriff of that county and member of the Legislature. In 1818 he married Ann E. Bowman, daughter of Jacob Bowman, and removed to Brownville, entering at once into mercantile business and real estate transactions. He built the stone house on Water Street (now the United States Hotel), which was his residence for many years, and in which all his children were born. One of his sons, Gen. J. B. Sweitzer, of Pittsburgh, is now prothonotary of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, Western District. In the war of the Rebellion he entered the service in July, 1861, and became colonel of the Thirty-sixth Pennsylvania Regiment, succeeding Col. Samuel W. Black. As senior colonel he commanded the Second Brigade, First Division, Fifth Army Corps, Army of Potomac, and served through the campaigns of McClellan, Burnside, Hooker, Meade, and Grant to the close of the conflict. Nelson B. Sweitzer, also a son of Henry, graduated at West Point in 1853, and entered the regular army. He served in McClellan's campaigns as personal aide on the staff of that general, and was afterwards placed in command of cavalry by Gen. P. H. Sheridan. He is now (June, 1881) in command of Fort Clarke, on the Rio Grande, in Texas. William, another son of Henry Sweitzer, and a native of Brownsville, is living in Washington, Pa.

INCORPORATION OF THE BOROUGH, AND ERECTION OF THE TOWNSHIP, OF BROWNSVILLE.

Brownsville was erected a borough by an act of Assembly passed Dec. 14, 1814, and approved Jan. 9, 1815, by which act it was provided and declared—"That the town of Brownsville, in the county of Fayette, shall be, and the same is hereby, erected into a borough, which shall be called 'the Borough of Brownsville,' bounded and limited as follows: Beginning at the east abutment of Jonah Cadwallader's mill-dam, . . . and running thence by various courses and distances to low-water mark on the Monongahela River at the lower end of the town; thence up the river to the mouth of Dunlap's Creek; and up the Creek to Cadwallader's mill-dam, the place of beginning."

The act provided that the electors of the borough should meet at the house of Jacob Copland, and there elect one chief burgess, one assistant burgess, seven reputable citizens to form a Town Council, and one high constable. Accordingly, "at an election held at the house of Jacob Coplan, in the Borough of Brownsville, on the first Tuesday of April, A. D. 1815, agreeably to an act of the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, passed the 14th day of December, 1814, for incorporating said Borough," the following-named persons were elected: Chief Burgess, Thomas McKibben; Assistant Burgess, Philip Shaffner; Councilmen, William Hogg, Basil Brashear, John S. Duncan, John McCadden, George Hogg, Jr., Israel Miller, George Dawson; High Constable, John Jacques. These were the first officers of the borough of Brownsville.

"April 8, 1815.—The Burgess and Town Council met at the office of Michael Sowers, Esq., and took the oaths of office, and proceeded to the Council Room in Basil Brashear's tavern, where William Hogg was elected president of the Council, and John McC. Hazlip, clerk."

At the April term of the Court of Quarter Sessions of Fayette County in 1817 a petition of a number of inhabitants was presented, praying for the erection of a township to be called Brownsville from a part of Redstone township, to include the borough of Brownsville and a small territory beyond the limits of the borough and east of it, and to extend from Dunlap's Creek to Redstone Creek. Upon this petition the court appointed Jacob Bowman, Esq., John Fulton, and Griffith Roberts viewers to examine into the matter and report. In August of the same year this committee reported to the court that they had performed the duty assigned them, and agreed on the boundaries of the proposed township of Brownsville, to be erected from the territory of Redstone, viz.: "Beginning at the mouth of Dunlap's Creek; thence up the same with the meanders thereof to the west end of Miller's mill-dam;" thence by a great number of recited courses and distances from Dunlap's Creek to Redstone Creek; "thence down said Creek to the Monongahela River, and up the said River with the meanders thereof to the place of beginning." This report was accepted and confirmed, and at the November sessions of the same year the court ordered the erection of the township, with bounds as reported, "to be called Brownsville Township."

PUBLIC GROUND, MARKET-HOUSE, AND OTHER MATTERS FROM THE BOROUGH RECORDS.

The plat known as the Public Ground in Brownsville appears to have been a matter of dispute in early years. In the year 1807, Jonathan Miller, John Sheldon, and Henry Wise gave notice that they had been "authorized to erect a Market-House on a certain piece of ground in the town of Brownsville known as the Public Ground," whereupon they were notified and warned not to erect any building on that ground until an investigation should be had, and a decision rendered by the proper tribunal. The protest came from Basil and Wilkes Brown, executors of Thomas Brown, deceased. A public notice by these executors to the effect that "they hold an entrust on that piece of ground" is found in the Genius of Liberty of May 4th in that year.

Nothing is found in reference to any official action being taken in consequence of the protest of Thomas Brown's executors, but it is certain that a market-house was built on the ground in question, and that it was used as the public market-house of the town until 1815, when a new one was erected, but the old one was soon after repaired, and continued in use for about twelve years longer.

The first action taken concerning the erection of the second market-house in 1815 has not been found.
but that the erection had been decided on, and a site fixed for it, is shown by a resolution of the Council on the 15th of April in that year, "That the centre of the Market-House be in the centre of Market Street, opposite the division line between Jacob Bowman's two lots, which lie on the southwest side of said street," and also by the tenor of a petition to the Council signed by thirty-eight freeholders, dated May 5, 1815, praying for a change of the site of the proposed market-house "as formerly fixed by the Council." A vote of the Council on the question of removal of site resulted in the decision that it should remain as previously fixed upon.

On the 2d of June following, "It was agreed that a Market-House be built on the site last agreed on, of the following dimensions, viz.: fifty feet long and eighteen feet wide from out to out of the pillars. The roof to be supported by ten pillars, five at each side. The roof to project four feet on each side outside of the pillars; the bottoms or bases of the pillars to be built with stone and lime-mortar, sunk two feet in the ground, and to rise one foot above the surface, twenty-two inches square, and to be raised six feet six inches above the stone, with brick and lime-mortar, twenty-two inches square." It was also "Agreed that an advertisement be put in the American Telegraph for mechanics to hand in proposals for doing the work to the Council at Basil Brushears [tavern], on the 16th inst., betwixt the hours of 2 and 4 o'clock p.m."

On the 4th of August, 1815, "A Contract was made with John M. Hazlrip for Completing the Market-House, for which he is to receive Three hundred and fifty dollars, the work to be done, in a substantial, workmanlike manner, against the first of October next."

Dec. 26, 1815, "The Market-House being Completed, the Council appointed George Graff, John Laybourn, Griffith Roberts, and Ephraim Butcher Referees to view the work and report to the Council." Part of this committee reported, Jan. 5, 1816, "that the work throughout the whole is done in a substantial and workmanlike manner." This report was signed by John Laybourn, George Graff, and Griffith Roberts. But the other member of the viewing committee, Ephraim Butcher, certified only that "I, as one of the referees chosen to examine the work of the new Market-House, have done so, and do certify that in my opinion the mason-work is sufficiently substantial," thereby inviting the inference that, in his opinion, the other parts of the work were not done according to the requirements of the contract. It was accepted, however, and on that day (January 5th) a committee was appointed "to level the market-house floor, fix chains across the ends," and attend to certain other small matters.

Feb. 23, 1816, the Council passed an ordinance "That from and after the 15th of March Market shall be held in the Market House on Market Street of said borough on Wednesday and Saturday of each week; the Market hours shall be from daylight until nine o'clock A.M. on each of said days in the months of March, October, November, December, January, and February, and from daylight until eight o'clock A.M. on each of the aforesaid days in the months of April, May, June, July, August, and September." The commodities to be deemed articles of marketing were meats, salted or fresh, eggs, butter, poultry, cheese, lard, tallow, candles, fruit, and all kinds of vegetables, but not grain. A fine of one dollar was imposed on each and every person buying or selling marketable articles at any other place than the market-house during market hours. The stalls on the southwest side of the building were to be occupied by the butchers and fishmongers at a reasonable rate, fixed at 85 each per annum.

James Workman and Nathan Smith were empowered "to enclose the Market House with a pale fence and a gate at each end, and to have the sides so secured as to prevent sheep, hogs, and geese from entering the same."

In August, 1817, the superintendent of the work on the National road (then in process of construction) requested the removal of the market-house in Market Street, it being in the location of the road, and so situated as to impede the progress of the workmen. On the 9th of that month the Council "Resolved that the materials of the Market House be offered at public sale on Wednesday next," the Council reserving the Stone, Brick, and Gates for the use of the Market House in Front Street, meaning the old building erected for that purpose on the Public Ground in 1807. This old market-house was then repaired, and used by the people of the borough until the erection of the present market-house. Quit-rents were paid on it to Sally Brown as late as the year 1844, when a bill of six years' rent was presented to the Council and ordered paid. The present brick market-house was built in 1829. An addition to it was projected in 1833, and the Council passed a resolution to that effect, but it was not done, and the building as it stands to-day (at the corner of Market Street and Bank Alley) is the same as when erected fifty-two years ago.

The grading of the National road, in 1817-18, rendered Front Street almost impassable, by reason of the filling at the upper end and the excavation at the lower. The borough board ordered that street graded to the National road, to make it passable. At a Council meeting held June 17, 1818, it was resolved, on motion of George Dawson and Valentine Geisey, that the sum of $4000 be obtained as a loan from bank, and that the same be equally expended on Front, Market, and Water Streets,—Front Street to be graded forty-five feet wide. On the 21st of September in the same year the Council considered an offer from John Bogle to contract "To pave Front Street for $25 per perch, running measure."
Sept. 23, 1819, James L. Bowman and D. B. Bayliss were authorized to employ Freeman Lewis "to make a survey and draft of the borough." The work was accordingly done by Mr. Lewis, and on the 20th of October the Council "Ordered that survey monuments be erected in the centre of Market Street and elsewhere, under the direction of Freeman Lewis," which was also done.

Many of the locations occupied by the business men mentioned in the above lists have passed from the memory of those who were living in Brownsville at that time, but some of them have been ascertained and are given below.

The store of Jacob Bowman & Son was on the lot where J. N. Snowdon and John Anderson now reside.

Hogg & Bowman (George Hogg and Simeon Bowman) did business on Water Street, two lots south of the site of the United States Hotel. Where the hotel stands was the store of Henry Sweitzer.

James L. Bowman kept a store in the "Neck," where now is Armstrong's drug-store, but whether he was located there at the time referred to (1818-19) has not been definitely ascertained.

The store of D. B. Bayliss & Co. was on Front Street, where S. P. Knox now lives. James E. Breading's store was in the Central Hotel building on Market Street. Thomas McKibben's store was on Front Street, adjoining or near that of Bayliss & Co.

Peter Humrickhouse kept his store on Front Street, now the residence of George E. Hogg. Humrickhouse came from Hagerstown, Md., to Brownsville about 1814, and removed to Coshocton, Ohio, about 1830.

John and Samuel Rogers (twin brothers) were located in trade on Front Street. They had been in business there at least four years before 1818.

Elisha Hunt and Caleb Hunt kept a store in the Neck, where now is Kiesser's-jewelry-store. The Hunts were members of the Society of Friends.

Matthew Hutchinson (an Irishman) did a small mercantile business on Front Street, on a lot adjoining the Black Horse tavern.

The store of Adam Jacobs, Jr. (father of the present Capt. Adam Jacobs), was in Market Street, where Charles Johnson's grocery-store now is. His father, Adam Jacobs, Sr., had commenced business as early as 1800 in a store located on Water Street, next below the site of the rolling-mill.

Israel Miller's store was on Front Street, opposite the old Monongahela Bank building (now Dr. Richard's residence). Miller afterwards moved his business to a store where Joseph Sanforths's cabinet-shop now is on Market Street. Later still he removed to where Samuel Graham resides.

The store of Valentine Giese was opposite the Black Horse tavern on Front Street.

Philip Shaffner's location was on Water Street. Besides the business of his store he also carried on a coppersmith and tin-working shop.

Robert Clarke's store was in a building that stood on the site of the Snowdon House, and upon the erection of the latter the store was kept in it.

Henry J. Rigden's watchmaker-shop was on Front Street, though he afterwards had other locations in different parts of the town. An earlier watch-maker than he in Brownsville was Isaac Goodlander. Mr. Rigden first started business here in 1817.

Dr. Lewis Sweitzer's office was in the three-story stone house now owned by Ayres Lynch, on Front Street.

The boat-yards of Nathaniel Chalfant and James and Thomas Carter were on the river-bank, below and near the site of the United States Hotel. Chalfant was one of the earliest boat-builders in Brownsville.

Jacob Bowman's mill-factory (built before 1800, but not in operation at the time to which the preceding business list has reference) was located on the sloping ground on Front Street, below the present residence of N. B. Bowman. Eli Abrams, George Michael, and Henry Irwin were workmen in this establishment, which (as tradition has it) produced the first nails made west of the mountains.

The old grist-mill and saw-mill owned by Robert Clarke and Neal Gillespie is not mentioned in the business list referred to, but was built at about that time. In the Navigator, published at Pittsburgh in 1821, is found the following mention of this old mill:

"There has been built lately on the town side a valuable grist- and saw-mill, turned by the water of the river, in which are wool and cotton carding machines. The mills are owned by Messrs. Gillespie & Clark, who got an act of Assembly passed to throw a dam across the river by engaging to make a safe way for the passing and repassing of boats up and down the river. This was at first done by a chute in the dam, and since by a lock canal." The old mill building, a long, low, gambrel-roofed structure, is still standing on the bank of the river north of Britton's distillery. It is used as a store and warehouse by S. S. Graham.

In the publication above referred to (the Navigator) the following account is given of the condition of Brownsville in 1821:

"Brownsville (or Redstone) lies immediately below Dunlap's Creek, on the east side of the river, finely situated on a first and high second bank. It contains (1816) about one hundred and twenty houses, principally of wood, some handsomely built with stone and brick, a market-house, an Episcopal Church, eighteen mercantile stores, two tan-yards, a rope-walk, two boat-yards, two tin and copper manufactory, two factories of nails, one printing-office, which issues a weekly paper, a post-office, a warehouse, one scythe- and sickle-maker, blacksmiths, silversmiths (one of whom makes surveyors' compasses), tailors, shoemakers, saddlers, etc. Within a few miles of the town are four Friends' meeting-houses, twenty six grists, saw, oil, and fulling-mills, and within four miles, up Redstone Creek, a valuable paper-mill.

2 Meaning by the census of 1810.

"Burd's fort formerly stood here. In addition to the above, a manufactory of steel, established by Morris Truman & Co., was in full operation in 1811. Mr. John Gregg, near Brownsville, has contrived a machine for planking hats, either by horse or water. It is calculated to save much labor in the hatters business. Cotton and wool cards are also made. A large cotton manufactory is erecting, in which the steam-power will be used; and a foundry on an extensive scale has been erected, as also a manufactory for making nail-mills. A steam-boat began in 1813, and has now made several trips; the engines constructed by Mr. French. The Monongahela Bank was established here in 1813, with a capital of $300,000. [Here follows the mention of Gillespie & Clark's old mill, as before quoted.]

"The inhabitants of Brownsville are remarkably industrious, and the settlement around the town is the oldest and richest in the western country, and is principally settled by Quakers. This being a place of considerable embarkation, individuals make it their business to supply travelers with boats and all other necessaries for descending the river."

LA FAYETTE'S VISIT TO BROWNSVILLE.

The visit of the Marquis de La Fayette to Brownsville in May, 1825, was a memorable event in the annals of the borough. Having started in 1824 from the Eastern cities on an extended tour of the United States, he was at the time mentioned moving eastward from the Ohio on his return. On the evening of the 25th of May he arrived at Washington, Pa., where he was to pass the night, and in the morning proceed to Brownsville and Uniontown. The reception committee of the last-named place were at Washington to meet him, and it appears that he considered himself as in their charge from the time of his leaving Washington. The message sent forward from that place in the evening of the 25th was, "He will leave here tomorrow morning early, will breakfast at Hillsborough, dine at Brownsville, and sup and lodge at Uniontown."

In accordance with this arrangement, Gen. La Fayette, accompanied by his son, George Washington La Fayette, and his private secretary, set out from Washington at a very early hour in the morning of the 26th, and took the road to the Monongahela River, escorted by the reception committee and others from Fayette County. The scenes attending the arrival of the party at Brownsville were described in an account written a few years later by one who witnessed them, as follows:

"The citizens of Brownsville had also made preparations to give the general a very warm reception. At that time there was no bridge over the Monongahela at that place, and communication was kept up between the two counties of Fayette and Washington by means of a flat-boat ferry. This ferry-boat was magnificently fitted up by the citizens of Brownsville for this grand occasion, being nicely carpeted and decorated with beautiful arches. A company of volunteers, commanded by Capt. Valentine Giese, was present, each member of the company having the following appropriate motto printed and attached to his cap, 'Welcome General La Fayette!' About the time of La Fayette's arrival on the opposite side of the river, the Volunteers, accompanied by twenty-four ladies dressed in white, representing the then twenty-four States in the Union, entered the ferry-boat, and were soon landed on the opposite side of the river, where the first general reception given to La Fayette by the citizens of Fayette County took place, on the ferry-boat on the west side of the Monongahela River.

"After a general welcome was extended to General La Fayette by the large concourse of people assembled on the shore, the ferry-boat returned to the Brownsville side of the river, and the distinguished patriot was escorted, amidst the most unbounded enthusiasm, to what was then called the Brashear's Hotel, kept by Colonel Brashear, where a most sumptuous dinner had been prepared for the occasion. La Fayette's reception at Brownsville, in the language of one of the survivors of that memorable occasion, was affectionate and touching. So urgent were the citizens of that place for the General to remain that the committee from Uniontown, of whom George Crafts, then sheriff of Fayette County, was one, were compelled to remind him that a very large concourse of the citizens of the county was awaiting his arrival at Uniontown. Upon being thus reminded, the General very pleasantly remarked to the citizens by whom he was surrounded 'That he was now in the custody of the sheriff, and they must excuse him.'"

The reception at Brownsville was much briefer and less elaborate than that which was given to the hero at Uniontown, but it was an occasion which will never fade from the memories of those who witnessed it.

FERRIES.

The first ferry across the Monongahela River at Brownsville was established by Capt. Michael Cresap in 1775, under authority granted by "a Court held for Augusta County [Va.] at Fort Dunmore" on the 23rd of February in that year, which action is recorded1 as follows: "On the motion of Michael Cresap, license is granted him to keep a ferry on Monongahela River at Redstone Fort to the land of Indian Peter, and that he provide a Boat."

Capt. Cresap died in the fall of the same year, and it is not known by whom the ferry was continued, but in about 1781 it passed into the hands of Neal Gillespie, who had purchased the land of Indian Peter on the west side of the river. In the minutes of the December session of Fayette County court for

1 In the original record of that court, which (as also the minutes of the York-town, Va. County court) is still in existence in Washington, Pa., the "Indian Peter" mentioned is the same old friendly savage who first settled near Phillip Slate's place, in what is now North Union township. It appears that Slate was a quare-lome man, and made it so uncomfortable for the peaceable Peter that the latter was compelled to abandon his land (which had been granted to him by the Penns), and having represented the case to the proprietaries and asked for another piece of land one was given him located on the Monongahela opposite Brownsville.

1788 is found the report of certain persons appointed to view "the road from Friends' Meeting-House to the ferry at the Fort," meaning Gillespie's ferry at Redstone Old Fort, or Brownsville.

The landing-place of Gillespie's ferry in Brownsville was opposite the old residence of Henry Sweitzer, now the United States Hotel. Gillespie continued the ferry, making his landing at this point, until 1820, when the National road was opened to the Monongahela, and the ferry landing was moved up to the point where the great highway struck the river in Bridgeport.

BRIDGES OVER DUNLAP'S CREEK.

Concerning the first bridge across Dunlap's Creek, between Brownsville and Bridgeport, very little is now known. No record is found showing the names of its projectors, of the artisans who executed the work, or of the time of its erection, beyond the fact that it was in existence prior to June, 1794, at which time a petition was presented to the Court of Quarter Sessions of Fayette County for the laying out of "a road from Krepps' Ferry to the bridge at the mouth of Dunlap's Creek." That it had been long enough in use before the commencement of the present century to be at that time considerably dilapidated and out of repair is made evident by an entry in the records of the county commissioners, to the effect that a meeting of that board, held on the 22d of October, 1801, was adjourned "to meet at Bridgeport, Monday, October 27th, to view the bridge over the mouth of Dunlap's Creek, and contract with or appoint some persons to repair the same." At the meeting held according to adjournment at Bridgeport, the commissioners decided upon the necessary work to be done on the bridge, and "appointed and by writing authorized John Rogers, Septimus Cadwallader, and Andrew Porter to repair said bridge, at an expense not exceeding three hundred dollars." No further information has been obtained concerning this old bridge, except what is contained in the following extract from the old diary of Mr. Robert Rogers, one of the early residents of Brownsville and Bridgeport, viz.:

"Early in the spring of 1808 there was a heavy freshet in the Monongahela and Dunlap's Creek, which floated off the wooden bridge that connected Brownsville to Bridgeport, and they were without until the chain-bridge was built in 1809 by James Finley."

After the destruction of the bridge, as told by Mr. Rogers, nearly a year elapsed before any action was taken towards the erection of another in its place. On the 13th and 14th of February, 1809, the commissioners were in session at the mouth of Dunlap's Creek for the purpose of viewing the bridge location and deciding what was to be done. Plans, specifications, and estimated expense were ordered made out, and a copy sent to the President of the United States, with the request for an appropriation in aid of building the bridge. On the 20th of April following proposals were advertised for, and on the 26th of May, in the same year, a contract was made with Isaac Rogers for building the abutments, "and also one thousand perchs of stone wall along the creek by the bridge." On the 28th of June the commissioners met at the bridge site "on account of an unusual flood of water washing away the banks of Dunlap's Creek in such a manner that it was thought necessary to alter the plan for building the bridge."

No further definite information can be gleaned from the commissioners' minutes with regard to the building of this bridge, except that it was completed (apparently after considerable delay), and the last payment for its construction was made Nov. 9, 1811. It was a bridge suspended from chains, as patented by Judge James Finley, and similar in construction to the one built across Jacob's Creek, on the north line of the county.

The floor of this bridge was about thirty feet above low water, and it was very long, not only spanning the creek, but a considerable width of the banks on either side. In March, 1820, it gave way and fell with a crash under the combined weight of a deep snow which lay upon it and that of a team and heavy-loaded wagon which was crossing at the time. The occurrence is found mentioned in the Brownsville Register of March 13, 1820, as follows:

"ACCIDENT.—On Thursday last the chain bridge over Dunlap's Creek, between Brownsville and Bridgeport, broke down with a wagon and six horses upon it. The wagon fell on the bank, this side of the stream, the horses in the water. The driver, who was on the saddle-horse, was pitched between the two middle horses, where he was held entangled in the gears until relieved by the citizens. He received no material injury, but two of the horses were killed. The team, we understand, was the property of a person named Hackett, near Winchester (Va.). The distance from the floor of the bridge to the surface of the water must have been at least thirty feet."

In June next following Joseph Torrence, Isaac Meason, Jesse Evans, James W. Nicholson, John Oliphant, and William Swearingen were appointed to view the site of the bridge and report what was expedient to be done. They reported "that a bridge at the proposed place is wanting, and they recommend that one be there erected, and that the county defray $900 of the expenses, the iron and other materials of the old chain-bridge belonging to the county to be taken by the contractor at $400 in part of said $900." Brownsville was to pay $325, and Bridgeport the same amount, to make up the cost of the bridge (sixteen hundred and sixty dollars).

On the 28th of December, 1820, the Council of Bridgeport appointed Solomon G. Krepps to present a plan for a bridge to the commissioners of Uniontown, and to urge its adoption. On the 4th of January, 1821, he reported that the commissioners had adopted the plan, and subscriptions were then commenced among the citizens to aid in building the bridge.

Jan. 29, 1821, the commissioners, in session at the house of James Reynolds, in Bridgeport, "received proposals for building a bridge over the mouth of Dunlap's Creek, and after having considered the various proposals laid before them, entered into an agreement with Samuel Story, of Bridgeport, in the county of Fayette. It was ordered that Isaac Core proceed early next week to said place to take bond and security of said Story." The contractor to take the pier then standing, and to build "two other piers with large stones well laid in lime-mortar, which said piers shall be founded on a rock," the timbers of the bridge to be solid oak, and the hand-railing to be painted with three coats of white lead.

March 21, 1821, Isaac Core reported that the bridge contractor had made considerable progress in the work. On the 9th of May, the commissioners "having been informed that Samuel Story was to lay the foundation of one of the piers of the bridge over the mouth of Dunlap's Creek on that day, met at that place, and saw the pier founded on a rock agreeably to contract." And Isaac Core was appointed by the commissioners to see the foundation of the second pier laid in the same manner.

Aug. 18, 1821, "Samuel Story having notified Isaac Core that the bridge he contracted to build was finished and ready for examination, said Core, with a view to that object, forwarded the letter to Messrs. Vance and Andrew Moore, to meet at their office." The viewers, Messrs. Adam Wilson, William Ewing, James Beck, and Joseph Thornton, met Aug. 27, 1821, examined the bridge, and reported that, having viewed the bridge agreeably to the order, "we are of opinion that it ought to be received off the contractor's hands." The bridge was thereupon accepted from the contractor, who received his final payment upon it Sept. 5, 1821. The total amount paid him was $2950, a supplemental article having been added to the original contract giving him an additional sum for extra work done on it.

In 1835, when the present iron bridge over Dunlap's Creek was projected as a permanent crossing for the National road, Capt. Richard Delafield, then government engineer on the work, decided, and so reported to the Treasury Department, that the best crossing place for the bridge was at a point below where the road struck the creek. In consequence of this report the Borough Council forwarded a memorial to the department, protesting against the change of location, setting forth that in case the proposed site was adopted the bridge must be longer and would cost twenty-five per cent. more than if erected on the old site; also that the change would work great injury to property on the line of the then existing road, which would necessarily be discontinued and rendered useless for a considerable distance where it approached the bridge. The result was that the views of Capt. Delafield were modified, and he then proposed to build on the upper (present) site, provided the Council would throw open a triangle on the line of the road opposite the borough market. This was acceded to, the bridge site was adopted in conformity to the wishes of the Council and people of the borough, and a slight temporary bridge was thrown across the creek to accommodate travel during the construction of the permanent structure.

It was decided that the material of the bridge should be cast iron. The contract for casting the pieces was awarded John Snowdon, the metal being furnished by the government. Mr. Snowdon rented the old Cock foundry for the purpose, and duly furnished the castings according to contract. The construction of the bridge proceeded successfully, and was in due time completed under the superintendency of George W. Cass, who had come to this section years before as one of the engineers of the National road.

This bridge across Dunlap's Creek was the first cast-iron structure built across any stream west of the Alleghenies. It still stands, solid, and in excellent condition, the only highway between the boroughs of Brownsville and Bridgeport.

EARLY TAVERNS AND LATER HOTELS.

The name of the first public-house in Brownsville is not known, but it appears likely that it was kept by Thomas Brown, as there is found in the records of the West Augusta (Va.) court, held at Fort Dunmore in April, 1778, an entry dated the 16th of that month, as follows: "License to keep an Ordinary is granted to Thomas Brown, at his house at Redstone Fort. Bazel Brown, on his behalf, entered into bond according to law." Nothing further is found of the "ordinary" of Thomas Brown.

The earliest inn of Brownsville of which anything definite is known as to its location and landlords was the "Black Horse Tavern," a stone building, a part of which is still standing in the more-recently erected stone building located between the residences of N. B. Bowman and James Slocomb. The date of the opening of the old tavern cannot be accurately fixed, but it is known that the public meeting at Redstone Old Fort July 27, 1791, usually referred to as the first public act in the Whiskey Insurrection, was held at the Black Horse tavern. The last meeting of the insurgents was also held at the same place, Aug. 28 and 29, 1794. In the Western Telegraph (published at Washington, Pa.) of March 29, 1796, is found the following advertisement, viz.:

"Amos Wilson begs leave to inform his friends and the public that he has purchased the house formerly occupied by Mr. Patrick Tierman, the sign of the Black Horse, on Front Street, Brownsville, well known by the name of Redstone Old Fort, where has opened a Tavern," etc.

The tavern property, together with four other lots in Brownsville, "belonging to Charles Armstrong, Elijah Clark, boat-builder, and Capt. T. Shane," were sold at public auction on the 31st of December, 1796, by James Long, auctioneer; but it seems probable that, notwithstanding the sale, Wilson still continued as landlord of the Black Horse tavern, and was keeping it in 1799, from an account of the celebration of St. John's day (June 24th) in that year by Brownsville Lodge, No. 60, of Free Masons, viz. : "In the evening repaired to Brother Wilson's, at the Black Horse Tavern, and spent the evening in festivity." Later it was kept successively by John Sheldon, Josiah Tannehill, Joseph Noble, Mrs. Dr. Lewis Sweeney, and others. It was discontinued as a public-house many years ago.

Basil Brashear was in Brownsville as early as 1795, and soon afterwards built the stone house now occupied by Mrs. Wesley Frost and Mrs. Confidren. At that place he kept tavern for many years. The first meeting of the Borough Council was held at "the Council room in Basil Brashear's tavern." This was one of the most famed of the early public-houses of Brownsville. It was kept by Brashear, and was the principal hotel of the town when Lafayette made his visit here in 1825.

John McClure Hezlop was in Brownsville in 1797, and three years later he built the stone house at the head of Market Street. It was afterwards kept as a tavern by John Beckley. The house was continued by his widow, Nancy Beckley, for some time after his death. In 1843, Jacob Workman was its landlord. It is now the Girard House.

James Auld, "Inn-keeper and Shoemaker," kept a tavern at the head of Front Street in 1819. Afterwards James C. Beckley kept at the same place. In 1820 public-houses were kept in Brownsville by John Conolly, William McMullen, and James Reynolds. The building on Market Street, in which the Central Hotel was afterwards kept, was built in 1816.

The Snowden House building was erected about 1825 by Robert Clarke, who lived in it until his death, about 1840. It was first kept as a hotel by Andrew Byers, who was also a landlord at Union-town, Connellsville, and several other places. The house is still a hotel.

The Monongahela House, located in the "Neck," was built as a private residence by Samuel J. Krepps in 1832. About twelve years later it was purchased by —— McCurdy, who opened it as a hotel, and kept it for a time, but failed to make the payments on the property, and was obliged to give it up. It was then leased to —— Ganz, —— Vance, and others successively, and was finally (in 1870) taken by John B. Krepps (son of Samuel), who kept it until his death, in January, 1881, and it is still kept as a public-house by his widow. The other hotels of Brownsville at the present time are the United States, on Water Street, by George W. Poundsonte; the Snowden House, on MARKET STREET, by Harvey Sawyer; and the Girard House, at the head of Market Street, by Jacob Marks.

NEWSPAPERS.

The earliest Brownsville newspaper of which any information has been found is The Brownsville Gazette. The only copy of it known to be now in existence bears date Jan. 14, 1809, from which it is learned that the paper was "published every Tuesday by John Berry, Printer, on Market Street, opposite Col. Bra- shen's Inn." When it was first issued or how long it continued is not known.

The Western Repository was published at Brownsville in 1810. One-half of a copy of this paper, bearing date Wednesday, June 13th of that year, is now in possession of Mrs. Samuel B. Page, of Brownsville. It contains the advertisements of Dr. Edward Scull and Dr. James Roberts (then physicians of Brownsville), and also an obituary notice of Isaac Rogers, who died Saturday, June 9, 1810, aged forty-two years. The Repository was a four-column paper, published at $2 per annum. No other facts can be given concerning it.

The Western Palladium of Brownsville was in existence in 1812, but probably not later, as is indicated by an advertisement found in The Reporter of Washington, Pa., dated May 4th in that year, being as follows:

"PRINTING OFFICE FOR SALE.

"The establishment of the Western Palladium, at Brownsville, Pa., is offered for sale with the press."

The American Telegraph was established at Brownsville in 1814, by John Bouvier, who continued its publication here for about four years, and then moved it to Uniontown, where it was united with the Genius of Liberty.

The Western Register was commenced in the summer of 1817, by Robert Fee, who continued to publish it in Brownsville until 1823, but nothing of a later date has been found in reference to it. A copy of the paper (Vol. VI. No. 49), dated March 29th in that year, is in possession of J. A. Scott, of Bridgeport. It is a folio, four columns, about one-fourth the size of the Clipper, and bears the motto "Virtuous Liberty."

The American Observer was started in Brownsville, in September, 1823, by Jackman & Coplan, the office of publication being on Market Street. A copy of the paper (Vol. II. No. 17), dated Jan. 13, 1826, is in possession of Mrs. Samuel B. Page, of Brownsville. It contains an address delivered by Thomas Rodgers on the anniversary of the battle of New Orleans. The Observer was afterward removed to Uniontown and merged with the Genius of Liberty.

The Western Spy of Brownsville is found mentioned in a Pittsburgh paper of Jan. 5, 1824. The fact that such a paper existed at that time is all that is known of it.

The Brownsville Galaxy, edited and published by William J. Copeland, was in existence in 1829, but the dates of its birth and death have not been ascertained. In an old number of the Casket, published by Atkinson in Philadelphia, is found the following notice, copied in that paper as a curiosity from the Brownsville Galaxy of Aug. 7, 1829, viz.:

"Whereas, Fanny Morton, alias Kerr, has without cause left my habitation, and is floating on the ocean of tyrannical extravagance, prone to prodigality, taking a wild goose chase and kindling her pipe with the coal of curiosity, to abscond and abolish such insidious, clandestine, noxious, pernicious, diabolical, and notorious deportment, I therefore caution all persons from harboring or trusting her on my account, as I will pay no debts of her contracting from this date unless compelled by law."

"JAMES KERR."

The Brownsville Intelligencer was a paper of which no information has been obtained, except the fact of its existence in July, 1830, which is shown by a reference to it in a Pittsburgh journal of that time.

The Brownsville Free Press was established in Sep- tember, 1843, by A. H. Shaw. It was a five-column folio, and devoted to the interests of the old Whig party.

The Brownsville Times was first issued in the fall of 1837. It was a seven-column paper, eighteen by thirty-six inches, Democratic in politics. Its publication office was on the Neck, near the east end of the bridge. In February, 1861, it was edited and published by R. B. Brown. The date of its suspension has not been found.

The Brownsville Clipper was established by the late Hon. Seth T. Hard, at Brownsville, on the 1st day of June, 1833, Wednesday being the publication day. The Clipper was started in the interests of the old Whig party, and continued to advocate its cause until the organization of the Republican party, when it espoused those principles, and has so continued to the present day. On the 20th of September, 1875, the Hon. Seth T. Hard, after about twenty-two years of continuous editorial management, sold the Clipper and the printing establishment to Mr. A. R. Hast- ings. On the 22d of November, 1878, Mr. Hastings sold the paper to Mr. W. F. Applegate, the present proprietor, who was then connected with The Mon- mouth (N. J.) Inquirer. Thus it will be seen the Clipper has had but three proprietors in its existence of twenty-seven years. The Clipper was in reality the outcome of the Free Press and other old newspapers previously published in Brownsville during the past seventy years, consequently it is the oldest paper now published in Brownsville. When it was started in 1833 by Mr. Hard it was the same size as now, thirty-two columns, twenty-six by forty. The paper is all printed at home, and devotes most of its space to the local news of the community.

The Labor Advocate,1 as its name imports, is the professed champion of the labor and producing classes of the county. It is the offspring of the Greenback Banner, which was first issued on the 23rd of August, 1877, with Dr. U. L. Clemmer as publisher and business manager, and Dr. N. W. Truxal as editor. The Banner was the second Greenback newspaper published in Pennsylvania, and it acquired quite a celebrity as a wide-awake political journal, but at the expiration of six months Dr. Truxal withdrew from the editorial management, and Dr. Clemmer sold the office to two gentlemen, who continued the publication of the paper until shortly before the election in the fall of 1878, when they abandoned it and surrendered the material to the doctor. Then, in the early spring of 1879, a stranger, whose name is not material, tried an experiment in the shape of a newspaper called The Better Times, which existed three weeks and then expired. After that occurrence the prospect of establishing a newspaper in the interest of the Greenback-Labor party seemed to be gloomy enough, but Dr. Clemmer was determined to try it once more, and, without a single subscriber, he commenced the issue of the Labor Advocate about the middle of February, in the year 1880. The paper has now been permanently established, and on the 18th of April, 1881, it passed into the hands of Prof. Phillips and Mr. J. T. Wells, both of whom are scholarly gentlemen, and both excellent writers.

THE MEDICAL PROFESSION IN BROWNSVILLE.

The earliest data to which the writer has been able to obtain access show that Dr. Mitchell and Dr. Chesteret were both practicing medicine in Brownsville in the year 1806.

In the Western Repository newspaper (of Brownsville), dated June 13, 1810, are found the advertisements of Dr. Edward Scull and Dr. James Roberts as physicians in the town at that time. The last named is still remembered by Mr. Nelson B. Bowman. Dr. Edward Scull was the son of John Scull, the founder of the Pittsburgh Gazette. Nothing has been learned of these two early physicians except the fact above shown that they were practicing in Brownsville at the time mentioned.

Dr. Thomas Blodgett was in practice in Brownsville from 1812 to 1815, when he removed to Dayton, Ohio. Dr. Pifer practiced here about 1831 to 1833.

Dr. John J. Steele was born in Lancaster, Pa., about 1795, removed from there to Canonsburg, Washington Co., Pa., and was married to Mrs. Mary Clemmens. He afterwards lived in Masontown, in this county, and came to Brownsville about 1836. He died in indigent circumstances near Uniontown about 1839. The doctor left five children, one of whom, Clemmens Steele, was engaged in business pursuits in South America for several years, but returning to the United States shortly before the attempt to establish the Confederate government, served with credit as colonel of the Sixty-sixth Ohio Volunteers during the civil war.

Dr. Lewis Sweitzer was born in Doylestown, Bucks Co., Pa., in 1774. He attended a medical college in Philadelphia, and afterwards pursued his medical studies in Paris, France. He practiced medicine a short time at Springtown, Bucks Co., was married to Eliza F. Bell, Dec. 10, 1807, and moved to Brownsville in 1808, entering immediately upon the practice of his profession, in which he maintained an honorable position up to the time of his death, in 1837. Dr. Sweitzer was interested in the organization of the Union Medical Society of Fayette County in 1810. He was a brother of Henry Sweitzer, who came to Brownsville a few years later.

Dr. Samuel Shuman and Henry W. Stoy were in Brownsville in 1818, as shown by the assessment roll of that year.

Dr. Robert W. Playford was born in London, England, on the 12th day of March, 1799, and educated at Eton College, the celebrated English public school, founded by King Henry VI. in 1440. In this school he was what is known as a "king's scholar." His position in his classes on leaving the college entitled him to a scholarship at Oxford, but he preferred to enter at once upon the study of medicine in the office of his father, a reputable London physician. With his father he came to this country, locating in Brownsville in 1829. Dr. Playford, Sr., remained here about two years, in that short time establishing, in connection with his son, a large and lucrative business. He returned to London, where he died in 1826. Dr. R. W. Playford remained in Brownsville, continuing in active practice until 1861, when he was stricken with hemiplegia, which untied him for further active practice. He enjoyed the reputation of having the largest business of any physician in the county. In all his practice he was singularly successful, his acute perception, clear judgment, and rapid decision fitting him peculiarly for emergencies, and seemed to render his knowledge of his duties almost intuitive. During the whole period of his business life he was once away from town five days at one time, being the only instance of absence from his professional cares for more than one day during the forty-one years of his life that were devoted to active professional pursuits. He frequently wrote for the local press on sanitary affairs and matters of home interest. He died at his home in Brownsville, March 24, 1867. His surviving children are Mrs. Sophia Parkinson, of Monongahela City, Pa.; Miss Harriet Playford, of Brownsville; Dr. Robert Playford, of Petroleum Centre, Pa.; Hon. Wm. H. Playford, of Uniontown; and Mrs. Amanda Kennedy, of Philadelphia, Pa.

William L. Lafferty, M.D., was born in Kent County, Del., on the 18th day of May, 1807, and removed to Allegheny County, Pa., when five years of age. He received his literary education in Washington College.

1 By W. S. Duncan, M.D.
at Washington, Pa., and served some time as a civil engineer on the Pennsylvania Canal, afterwards studying medicine in the office of F. J. Le Moyne, M.D., of Washington, Pa., completing his medical studies in the Medical Department of the University of Pennsylvania, from which institution he received the degree of M.D. in March, 1836. He began the practice of his profession in Brownsville one month after graduating, and remained continuously in business for thirty years, returning to his native county in Delaware in 1866. The doctor soon acquired an extensive practice, and retained it during the whole time of his residence in Brownsville, in addition to being the owner of the largest drug-store in the place nearly the whole of that time. He was industrious and enterprising in business, took an active part in educational affairs, being an early and sturdy supporter of the public school system; was one of the originators and principal stockholders of the Brownsville Gas Company, and interested in all that pertained to the sanitary and general welfare of the community. In politics he was an Old-Line Whig, afterwards a Republican, and at one time a candidate for Congress in the latter party. He was a prominent Freemason, and a zealous member of the Protestant Episcopal Church. He still resides in Delaware, where he has been engaged in fruit-growing since 1866, though still from force of long habit giving part of his time to the practice of the profession to which the best part of his life has been devoted. In a recent letter he says, "I am now an old man, but still visit the sick when requested so to do, having never learned to refuse assistance to a suffering fellow-being."

Isaac Jackson, M.D., was born in Menallen township, Fayette Co., on the 13th day of March, 1821. He was educated at Madison College, Uniontown; studied medicine under the direction of Dr. Smith Fuller, of Uniontown, attended lectures in Jefferson Medical College, at Philadelphia, receiving the degree of M.D. from that institution in March, 1847, and located in Brownsville the same year, continuing in active practice up to the present time. He has also been engaged for several years in the drug business, having been at different times a member of the drug firms of W. F. Simpson & Co., Jackson & Armstrong, and J. Jackson. He held for several years the office of examining surgeon for pensions under the United States government. In politics he has always been a Democrat, taking an active part in the affairs of that party, and was once a candidate for the State Legislature. He is a member of the order of Freemasons, also a member of the Presbyterian Church and of the Fayette County Medical Society. He has been twice married. One of his sons, Duncan C. Jackson, Esq., is a member of the Allegheny County bar; another son, Dr. John Jackson, is practicing medicine in West Virginia.

Benjamin Shoemaker, M.D., was born Aug. 9, 1827, in the city of Philadelphia, and educated at Shade Gap Academy, Huntingdon Co., Pa. Having qualified himself to practice dentistry, he came to Brownsville and opened an office for that business in 1856; afterwards studying medicine, he received the degree of M.D. from the University of Pennsylvania in 1869, since which he has been engaged jointly in the two professions. He has been a United States examining surgeon for pensions for twelve years last past, has been a school director and member of the Town Council for the last six years, is a Freemason, a member of the Presbyterian Church, and a Republican in politics; he is a member of the Fayette County Medical Society, and of the American Medical Association.

Samuel B. P. Knox, A.M., M.D., son of the late David S. Knox, Esq., for many years cashier of the Monongahela Bank of Brownsville, was born in Brownsville, Feb. 11, 1839, and educated at Allegheny College, at Meadville, Pa., from which institution he graduated in June, 1860. He attended first course of medical lectures in the Medical Department of the University of Pennsylvania during the winter of 1861-62, and while attending second course, in 1862-63, was, in January of the latter year, commissioned and mustered into the United States service as assistant surgeon of Forty-ninth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers. In January, 1865, he was promoted to surgeon of the same regiment, in which capacity he served until the end of the war, after which he returned to the University of Pennsylvania, receiving the degree of M.D. in March, 1866. He began the practice of his profession in Brownsville a few months after graduating, remaining in business here until 1875, when he removed to Santa Barbara, Cal., where he now resides. In 1869 he took an effective part in the reorganization of the Fayette County Medical Society, and was an active member of the society during the remainder of the time he resided here. Before leaving this State he became a member of the State Medical Society and of the American Medical Association. He is a member of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

Dr. N. W. Truxall was born in Greensburg, Westmoreland Co., Pa., in 1822. He received an academic education at the Westmoreland Academy, learned the printing business in the office of the Westmoreland Republican, and during his apprenticeship studied the classics under the tuition of the professors in the academy. He commenced the study of law, but abandoned it and began the study of medicine in 1845. He commenced practice in Pittsburgh in 1848, and since that time has practiced his profession in Masontown, Milbridge, and California, Pa., and since 1870 in Brownsville. He went into the army in 1861, and served three years as an officer of the line. He has acquired some reputation as a literary writer, and is now preparing an extensive work, entitled "An Epic on the Battles of America."

C. C. Reichard, M.D., was born Nov. 6, 1844, in Maryland. He studied medicine and received the degree of M.D. from Chicago Medical College in the spring of 1870. He practiced medicine in Mitchellville, Iowa, and Monongahela City, Pa., and came to Brownsville in 1875, where he has since been engaged in the practice of his profession. He is a Freemason and a Republican.

Dr. Oliver P. Brashear was born in Redstone township, Fayette Co., educated at Dunlap's Creek Academy, attended medical lectures in the University of Pennsylvania, and began practice at East Liberty, Pa., in 1864. He served one year, part of 1874-75, as physician to Pittsburgh City Almshouse, and came to Brownsville in 1876, where he has since been engaged in practice.

U. L. Clenmer, M.D., was born in Allegheny County, Md., Nov. 16, 1816. He commenced the study of medicine with Dr. John J. Steele, at New Geneva, Fayette Co., in 1832, and graduated at the Reformed Medical College, at New York, in 1846, having practiced medicine in Monongalia County, W. Va., for four years previously. He removed to Smithfield, Fayette Co., where he remained eighteen years, and then removed to Brownsville in 1859, where he has since remained. During the late war he was employed as assistant surgeon in the hospital at Parkersburg, W. Va.

The establishment of a medical school at Brownsville in 1831 was announced in the Washington Examiner and other newspapers in August of that year by the following advertisement:

"REFORMED MEDICAL COLLEGE.

"Established in Brownsville, Fayette Co., Pa., and will go into full operation on the 1st of November next. This Medical Society is to be under the care of the Reformed Society of the United States, and to be conducted by the Vice-President and Secretary of that body. The plan of Medical instruction will be the same as adopted in the Botanical Schools of New York and Worthington, embracing all the branches taught in the Medical Schools, as well as the Reformed or Botanical System. Nine students have already entered and commenced their studies, and several others are daily expected. A Dispensary, Infirmary, Botanical Garden, Library, and Medical Museum will be attached to the College during the ensuing summer. Terms, $150, in advance, and $10 as a graduation fee.

"J. J. STEELE,

"President of Worthington College, Ohio."

Nothing beyond this concerning the operations of the "Reformed Medical College of Brownsville" has been ascertained.

BROWNSVILLE SCHOOLS.

On the spot which is now occupied by the rectory of Christ Church there stood, three-fourths of a century ago, a small frame building, erected by subscription as early as 1805 (and perhaps a year or two earlier), which was the first house built especially for school purposes in Brownsville, though schools of a few pupils had previously been taught in private dwellings. The earliest teacher now recollected by the oldest citizens of Brownsville was Mr. De Wolf, whose successor was the Rev. Mr. Wheeler, a Baptist minister. A Mr. Scott was also an early teacher.

In 1808-9, Robert Ayres taught a private school in a house that stood where Joseph Sanforth now lives, at the upper end of Church Street. As late as 1819 Ayres' name appears on the assessment roll as a teacher.

A flourishing school was taught by James Johnston for some years prior to 1819. Pupils from a distance came to attend his school, and boarded in his family. His school-room was in a house where Hayden W. Robinson's drug-store now is. He was succeeded in 1819 by a Mr. McConnell, who continued the school but a short time.

From about 1817 to 1820, Edward Byrne, an Irishman, taught a subscription school of a few scholars at the upper end of Market Street, in the house now occupied by Henry J. Rigden. Many small private schools and subscription schools were taught in the borough from that time until the passage of the public school act of 1834. Under the operation of that law the court, at the January term of 1835, appointed James L. Bowman and Israel Miller school directors of Brownsville. They made report to the county treasurer August 18th in the same year. The apportionment of State money to the borough for that year was $830.7; amount from county tax, $166.14; total, $996.81 for 1835.

The first school-house erected for the use of the public schools established under the law of 1834 was built in 1836. Its location was on Church Street, near the present Union school building. Another was built in 1833, on the Public Ground on Front Street, opposite the residence of N. B. Bowman. These were the only public school-houses of the borough (though other rooms were rented from time to time to accommodate the overflow of scholars) until the erection of the present Union school building.

Among the teachers who had charge of the schools in these old houses were Dr. Samuel Chaffant, Joshua Gibbons, William Y. Roberts, and many others who are yet well remembered.

On the 9th of May, 1842 (as appears in the borough records), the school directors made application to the Council for the use of the Town Hall for a school-room, which was granted at two dollars per month. Dec. 28, 1843, Miss Crawford applied for the use of the hall for the same purpose, and it was granted on the same terms for the time of the vacation of the public school.

April 26, 1850, the Council rented the Town Hall to the school directors for the use of the High School at four dollars per month. In the records covering the succeeding ten years various entries are found, showing that the hall was rented from time to time for the use of the schools until the building of the present school-house rendered it unnecessary.

The question of the erection of a new school-house of sufficient capacity to accommodate all the schools having been for some time informally discussed, the following official action in the matter was taken by the school directors at a meeting held on the 7th of May, 1859, viz.:

"Whereas, We believe the time has now come in the history of the common schools of Brownsville that an effort should be made by the directors to build a Union school-house, therefore Resolved, That we, the said directors, proceed as soon as time for proper deliberation and consultation will admit of to adopt a proper plan of said house, and make a contract for making the brick, and make such other arrangement for the erection of said school-house as may be necessary, so as at least to have the stone-work completed, ready to commence laying the brick, early in the spring of 1859, so as to have the same completed in time to hold the session of 1859-60 in the said house. On motion, it was resolved that Mr. Joseph C. Graff be requested to make an estimate of the cost of erecting said house, say sixty by seventy feet, three stories, four rooms on a floor, a ten-feet entry to run through the centre, so as to make the school-room square."

In July, 1871, the board of directors took action to the effect that "Whereas the colored school has for some years past been held in the Town Hall, but that the board has been notified that it would not again be granted for that purpose, and whereas the Town Council have voted to lease the School Board a site on what is called the 'Old Common' for a School-House for the colored school, it was therefore unanimously Resolved, that the School Board proceed forthwith to erect a suitable school-house for the colored school on said ground, and that the Board meet to-morrow morning at eight o'clock to lay off the building." The site selected was that on which the old school-house stood on the Public Ground, and on that site a brick house was erected which is yet standing, and has been used for the colored school until 1880.

The number of pupils reported enrolled in Brownsville in July, 1860, was three hundred and ninety-one. In July, 1870, the number reported enrolled was four hundred and forty-seven. By the report for the school year of 1889-90 the schools of Brownsville were under charge of eight teachers, and attended by two hundred and eighty-two scholars. Total receipts, $5540.66; total expenditures, $2632.57; valuation of school buildings, $15,000. RELIGIOUS HISTORY.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH OF BROWNSVILLE.

No person at the present day knows the date of the formation of the first Methodist class at Brownsville. A small society was in existence there (being within the Redstone Circuit) at about the commencement of the present century, and a meeting-house for its use was built in 1804, on land of Chads Chalfant, a local exhorter and citizen of Brownsville. Afterwards (March 24, 1806) he conveyed the land (one-half acre, comprising lots Nos. 7 and 8, on the north side of Church Street) to Alexander McCracken, Abraham Miley, Stephen Randolph, Richard Randolp, and Pratt Collins, “in trust for the use of the Methodist Episcopal Church,” the consideration named being one hundred dollars.

The church erected on this land in 1804 was a stone edifice, thirty-six by thirty feet in dimensions. In 1821 the building was enlarged to double its original size, making it thirty-six by sixty feet. This remained as the society’s house of worship for nearly forty years, but finally, having become much dilapidated, and wholly inadequate to the wants of the congregation, the erection of a new church building was decided on, and the demolition of the old one was commenced on Thursday, April 26, 1859. The present brick church, which was then erected at a cost of about seven thousand dollars, is forty-five by eighty feet in size, has an audience-room twenty-two feet high, with a basement containing a Sabbath-school room and two class-rooms. It was dedicated June 16, 1861.

Among the preachers who have served this church since 1826 have been the following: James G. Sanson, Thomas Jamison, Robert Boyd, John Waterman, Edward B. Bascom, Andrew B. Coleman, Samuel Babcock, John J. Swazey, J. N. Mochabee, Hamilton Creigh, Thomas Baker, Christopher Hodgson, Josiah Adams, A. J. Enley, Moses P. Jamison, Joseph Homer, Sheridan Baker, Hiram Miller, Ezra B. Hingsley, J. Minor, L. R. Beanon, James Deens, S. Lank, William Stewart, Josiah Mansell, R. B. Mansell, and S. T. Mitchell, the present pastor.

The present membership of the church is one hundred and fifty. In connection with it is a Sabbath-school of one hundred and fifty scholars, under James R. Swearer, superintendent.

1 While Mr. Coleman was in charge (in 1873) Brownsville became a station.
PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF BROWNSVILLE.

In the minutes of the Redstone Presbytery, under date Oct. 15, 1811, is the earliest mention which has been found of Presbyterian worship at Brownsville. At that time the Rev. Boyd Mercer, of the Presbytery of Ohio, applied for permission to preach to the people at Uniontown and Brownsville. On the next day, October 16th, the Presbytery declined to sanction the existing engagements between the Rev. Boyd Mercer and the people of Uniontown and Brownsville, because not made agreeably to the regulations of the Presbytery.

On the 20th of April, 1813, the Rev. William Johnston, a licentiate under the care of the Presbytery of Ohio, applied to the Redstone Presbytery for admission. He was admitted on the 21st, and on the same day received a call from the congregation of Brownsville and Dunlap's Creek. On the 20th of October in the same year he was installed as pastor over the united congregations. In reference to his assumption of the charge, the Rev. Samuel Wilson says, "The next pastor was the Rev. William Johnston, whose charge embraced also (besides Dunlap's Creek Church) the Presbytery Church of Brownsville. He was of portly presence, an able preacher and defender of the faith; as a friend and companion, highly esteemed for intelligence and urbanity. His pastorate continued (at Dunlap's Creek) till Dec. 3, 1829; and at Brownsville and Little Redstone till his death, Dec. 31, 1841." His successor was the Rev. Thomas Mather, whose pastorate continued till 1848. He was succeeded by the Rev. Robert M. Wallace, who remained until 1869, and was followed in 1864 by the Rev. Joseph H. Stevenson as pastor of the churches at Brownsville and Little Redstone. On the 24th of April, 1866, Mr. Stevenson presented to the Presbytery a request from those two churches to be recognized as separate and distinct organizations. The Presbytery acceded to the request, and constituted the elders residing in the bounds of Brownsville, together with the pastor, as the session of the Brownsville Church.

The Rev. J. H. Stevenson resigned in April, 1868, after a four years' pastorate. The Brownsville Church was then served for two or three years by the Rev. E. P. Lewis as a stated supply. In April, 1874, the Rev. W. W. McLane was called to this charge, and was installed on the 15th of May following. He continued as pastor until June, 1878, when he resigned. He was succeeded by the Rev. A. S. Milholland, who came to the pastorate Sept. 18, 1878. He remained till the spring of 1880, since which time the church has been without a regular pastor. The Rev. A. B. Fields is now (1881) acting as stated supply for one year, commencing March 9, 1881.

Until after 1815 the Presbyterians of Brownsville had no regular house of worship. On the 14th of June in that year Joseph Thornton, John Steel, and John Johnston, trustees of the Presbyterian congregation of Brownsville, purchased for two hundred dollars, and five shillings' annual ground- rent, lot No. 3, on Second Street, being sixty feet front on that street, and one hundred and eighty feet deep to Market Street. It was conveyed to them in trust for the use of the Presbyterian congregation of Brownsville, for the purpose of erecting a meeting-house thereon, for the benefit of the congregation aforesaid." Soon afterwards there was built on the Second Street front a brick edifice, which was used as a house of worship until the present church was completed on the same lot but fronting on Market Street.

On the 4th of May, 1822, William Steele, William Forsyth, and Jesse H. Duncan, trustees of the Presbyterian congregation, purchased a lot northeast of and adjoining the Episcopal Church lot for burial purposes.

Of the elders, William Parkhill was the only living within the bounds of Brownsville Church at the time of its separation from Little Redstone Church, in April, 1866. A. J. Isler and Josiah Reed were the next elders elected, Aug. 27, 1873. On the 13th of September, 1876, J. R. Patterson was elected elder.

The church now (July, 1881) numbers one hundred and twenty-one members. A Sabbath-school connected with the church has an attendance of about one hundred, including teachers, and is under the superintendency of William Parkhill.

CHRIST CHURCH (PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL).

The district and country about Brownsville was settled originally by emigrants principally from Maryland and Virginia, many of whom had been reared in the principles and forms of the Episcopal Church, and hence brought with them their predilections for the same. This is evident from the fact that several log churches were built by the early settlers in this section for the purpose of retaining the services of the church among them, and transmitting the same to their descendants. As these buildings, however, were never occupied except by itinerating clergymen, and rarely at that, the interests of the people gradually declined, the buildings decayed, and the families whose preference had once been given to the Protestant Episcopal Church sought elsewhere for the word of life.

One of these early churches was situated about five miles east of Brownsville, on the land formerly of a man by the name of Clark. The grounds around this building contained about an acre, and they still belong to the church. The building is, however, in a dilapidated condition, and the families who once worshiped there either removed or are scattered, so that scarcely a vestige of the congregation remains. A second log church was erected twelve miles west of Brownsville, on the main road leading to Washington. The lot, containing about an acre, was given originally by a Col. Crooks, and belonged to the church as late as 1848. The building, like the former, has nearly gone to decay, and the families who once worshiped in it have either removed or lost their attachment to the church.

Another church was built at Carmichaeltown, twelve miles south of Brownsville. The grounds, however, have been taken possession of and held for many years by the county (probably with the consent of the owners) and an academy built thereon. The building was erected mainly by Col. Ricard and Charles Swan. These individuals have long since died, and their families have become diverted to other forms of worship. A fourth church building of the same material as the others was erected about half-way between Uniontown and Brownsville, on the farm of Robert Jackson. The old building was removed, however, a few years since, and a small though comfortable brick church erected in its place. This church, known by the name of Grace Church, in Menallen township, has long been recognized by the convention as a missionary station, and services have been held in it with considerable regularity by clergymen officiating at Brownsville and Uniontown.

About eight miles north of Brownsville, on the road to Pittsburgh, there was erected still another log building, known by the name of "St. Peter's Church, Pike Run." At the first settlement of this neighborhood there were here many Episcopalians from Ireland, and among them several families by the name of West, Gregg, and Hopkins. Their descendants have manifested, however, in later years but feeble interest in the church of their fathers. Considerable exertions were made by the Rev. L. X. Freeman, formerly rector of Christ Church, Brownsville, in behalf of the station. The building was repaired and religious services frequently held, but without much permanent utility, as there seemed to be a lack of cooperation on the part of the people. The Rt. Rev. Bishop Onderdonk made the first visit to this station in 1838, confirming the following persons: Mrs. Murdy, Mrs. Nixon, and Miss Mary West. The failure in the establishment of the church at these several stations is mainly to be attributed to the want of missionary services among them. Years would pass during which no Episcopal services were held and no minister appeared to call the people together. Could the ground have been occupied by some regular itinerating missionary no doubt influential parishes might have been formed.

With regard to the church in Brownsville the case appears to have been rather more favorable. Services were held from time to time with more frequency, and the temporal interests of the church especially sustained with more ability and zeal, though many untoward circumstances have in time past retarded materially the progress of the church. Among these the resemblances of her forms and ceremonies to those of the Church of England excited great prejudice against her in Revolutionary times, a prejudice which the lapse of years could not wholly eradicate.

The first episcopally ordained clergyman we have any notice of as officiating in what is now Brownsville was a certain Mr. Allison, who, in 1798, came as chaplain to the soldiers under the command of Capt. James Burd, who came to erect the fort of that name. Brownsville was at that period but a frontier post, and known by the name of "Redstone Old Fort." Of the itinerating ministers who officiated in Brownsville and parts adjacent prior to any important movement in the parish were the Rev. Mr. Mitchell, the Rev. Robert Davis, the Rev. Robert Ayres, and the Rev. Jackson Kemper, afterwards Bishop of Indiana. The first of these officiated in Brownsville in the year 1785. Little else is known respecting him. The second officiated in this place immediately preceding and after the commencement of the present century, viz., from 1795 to 1815. He was an Irishman by birth, and originally a Methodist minister by profession. His ministry, however, was far from being useful or profitable to the people. So inconsistent was his life and conduct with the words which fell from his lips that religion was thrown into reproach and the principles of the church into abandonment.

The next was as unworthy of the sacred ministry as his predecessor. Whimsical in character and vacillating in principle, he proved himself untrue to the church, as the subsequent and final preference which he gave for the delusions of Swedenborg will abundantly testify. This gentleman was ordained by Bishop White for Brownsville, and officiated about the same time with Mr. Davis; but so feeble was his character, and so blameworthy were his principles, that the people would not attend on his ministry. Jackson Kemper officiated in the parish of Brownsville in the fall of 1811. He was the first missionary of the Advancement Society to this part of the country, having voluntarily assumed the responsibility of the office. His stay in Brownsville was short, as there were several other places to be visited in his itinerary; but although short, it was no doubt fruitful of good. He made a subsequent visit in the year 1814, baptizing sundry individuals, as follows: William Hogg, Ann Bowman, Harriet E. Bowman, Louisa Bowman, Matilda Bowman, William Bowman, Goodloe H. Bowman, and Nelson B. Bowman.

The above-named gentlemen, acting as itinerant missionaries, preceded any attempt towards the organization of the parish or the erection of a church edifice. A successful effort, however, had been made as early as 1796 towards the securing of a church lot in Brownsville. Many of the original settlers of Brownsville, as we have intimated, were Episcopalians. But in the laying out of the town they neglected to set apart a suitable spot for a church edifice and grounds. This negligence was, however, abundantly compensated by the judgment and foresight of three gentlemen, who volunteered to purchase a lot of ground at their own expense for the benefit of the church. The lot, being the eligible and beautiful site upon which the present edifice now stands, was bought from Samuel Jackson for the sum of twenty pounds. A copy of the receipt for the purchase-money is herewith given:

"Brownsville, the 27th August, 1796.

Then received of Charles Wheeler the sum of twenty pounds, seven shillings, and sixpence, being in full of the consideration money for a certain lot of ground sold for the use of the Protestant Episcopal Church by me.

"Samuel Jackson."

This receipt for the purchase-money was considered by the purchasers as a sufficient bill of sale. The three purchasers of the ground were Dr. Charles Wheeler, William Hogg, and Jacob Bowman. Dr. Wheeler was an Englishman and a surgeon by profession, who, after serving in Dunmore's war, settled on a farm about four miles west of Brownsville. He was warmly attached to the church, and when disposing of his worldly effects bequeathed to the same one hundred pounds, to be paid at the death of his wife. Mrs. Wheeler lived many years after her husband's death, having reached the advanced age of ninety-four years, a fact which seems to have been much to the advantage of the church, inasmuch as his landed estate had greatly increased in value during her life, so that the church at the time of her death received as a residuary legatee about six hundred dollars.

William Hogg was also an Englishman by birth, and warmly attached to the church of his fathers. During his residence in Brownsville he acquired a large property, but as he contributed largely to the church during his lifetime, and especially towards the erection of the edifice and the subsequent improvement of it, and also towards the preached gospel, he left no final bequest to the parish. His nephew, however, George Hogg, formerly a communicant of Christ Church, subsequently gave out of his uncle's estate five hundred dollars towards the erection of the parsonage, additional to five hundred dollars of his own. William Hogg died in 1840, and was buried in the churchyard.

Jacob Bowman was born in the State of Maryland, and was raised a member of the Lutheran Church. Upon his settlement in Brownsville, however, he gave his preferences to the Episcopal Church, and connected himself therewith. For thirty years he was the senior warden, and in this, his official capacity, his conduct was ever marked by an undeviating attachment to the church, and also uniform and consistent piety. He accumulated a large estate during his life, out of which he was very liberal in the bestowal of his charities. Both the church edifice and the parsonage received a very liberal subscription at his hands. Moreover, at his death he bequeathed two thousand dollars to the parish, appropriating the same towards the support of public worship. Long will the church have occasion to remember with gratitude this its munificent patron. He died in 1847, and lies buried in the churchyard.

Such and so praiseworthy were these three gentlemen, who originally purchased the church property, and who, from their individual ability no less than from their attachment to the church, were mainly instrumental, under the wise providence of God, in its preservation in early years, mainly instrumental in the transmission of the same, a precious heritage to posterity.

In the year 1814 the Rev. Mr. Clay succeeded Mr. Kemper as missionary of the Advancement Society in Western Pennsylvania. He arrived in Brownsville the 29th of July, and shortly after urged the people to build a church upon the lot of ground which already they had in possession. They received the suggestion most favorably, and on the 27th met to arrange measures to accomplish the object. At this meeting seven trustees were appointed, viz.: Jacob Bowman, Charles Wheeler, William Hogg, Michael Sowers, Robert Clarke, John Nin, and George Hogg. The sum of $8500 was subscribed upon the spot, and a committee of two appointed for the purpose of procuring the names of others. Before Mr. Clay left Brownsville the sum of twelve hundred dollars had been subscribed, and the promise given on the part of some to add fifty per cent. to their subscriptions should it be necessary.

Among the most active were the three trustees first named, still it is to the Rev. Dr. Clay, of Gloria Dei Church, Philadelphia, that we are to accord the principal merit. It was through his missionary zeal and pious exertions that dormant energies were aroused into action among the people, and a right spirit awakened in behalf of the church. Of course there was material in the parish on which to act, but years had already passed and no progress had been made, and time was fast obliterating the sympathies of former years. It was through his missionary exertions, therefore, that the right spirit was awakened among the people, as the subsequent movements of the parish abundantly testify.

On the 26th of August, 1814, the first vestry was duly organized, the following gentlemen consenting to act as its constituent members: Jacob Bowman, William Hogg, Robert Clarke, Charles Wheeler, John Nin, Basil Brashear, Basil Brown, Charles Ford, George Hogg, Henry Stump, Thomas Brown, and Henry B. Goe. At a subsequent meeting of the vestry, held upon the 15th of April, 1815, William Hogg and Robert Clarke were appointed a committee to make an estimate as to the expense of a church building, and to give out proposals for the erection of the same. They did so, both publishing their advertisement in the Fayette and Greene Spectator, then published at Uniontown, and also posting it up in the public places of the neighborhood. Proposals being handed in, there was a meeting of the vestry upon the 6th of June following, whereon a contract was duly made with Isaac Linn for the erection of the church. This contract was in substance as follows: The church was to be built of stone, fifty-five feet long by thirty-eight feet wide. It was to have a substantial roof, but no joiner-work in the interior. The cost of the same to be $1700.

The work on the part of the builder was duly performed, and paid for by the vestry. But after the walls were raised the condition of things appears to have been at a stand for many years. No further efforts appear to have been made towards the completion of the building, and no important movement was undertaken by the church and people. Undoubtedly this period of lethargy originated in the fact that the parish was destitute of the ministrations of a settled clergyman. Few episcopally ordained clergymen came at that time west of the mountains, unless it was to some important parishes, or for the purpose of itinerating for a while on missionary ground. And with respect to those who might be termed "sons of the soil," they were so few in number and so far between as to be altogether inadequate to meet the missionary demand. It is a matter of notice, indeed, that between the erection of the church and the settlement of the first minister occasional visits were made by certain clergymen, as is evident from the entries of baptisms made upon the records of private families and transferred to the church records. But beyond these occasional visits on the part of the above clergymen, no opportunities were afforded the parish either of enjoying the services of the church or being instructed in her principles.

During this period it appears that Samuel Jackson, the original grantor of the land, died, and hence it became necessary for the vestry to petition the court at Uniontown, held on the first Monday in March, 1819, to authorize the executors of Samuel Jackson to make a deed in conformity with the contract made in his lifetime. The evidence of the existing contract being considered sufficient by the court, the executors were accordingly authorized to comply with the petition of the vestry, and on the 22d day of May, 1820, a deed in proper form was executed and delivered to the vestry. On the 29th of March, 1821, an arrangement was made between the vestry and Henry Barkman for the completion of the church edifice. Accordingly the building was finished, and was used for public services immediately upon its completion.

Upon the 24th of September, 1822, the vestry invited the Rev. Mr. Phiffer, of Baltimore, to become their minister. The terms of the invitation were, however, somewhat conditional, the parish proposing to occupy his services for one-half of the time, in the expectation that the neighboring stations at Connellsville and Union would employ the remainder. But it appears the Rev. Mr. Phiffer declined the invitation, recommending, however, the Rev. John Bausman, his brother-in-law, to supply his place. The vestry accordingly invited the Rev. Mr. Bausman upon the same terms as the other. He accepted the invitation, and commenced his labors in the parish upon the 22d of March, 1823. As the church edifice was not completed at this time, divine services were held at the Presbyterian meeting-house of the place. By the 30th of November of the same year the building was completed and ready to be opened. It was occupied from that day forth by the Rev. Mr. Bausman for the public worship of the congregation. But although it was thus used for the first time, it was not duly consecrated until the 22d of June, 1825. It was then that the Right Rev. Bishop White, the first bishop of the diocese, made his first visit to the West, and several persons were confirmed according to the rites and institutions of the church, and the church building consecrated to the worship and service of Almighty God.

The Rev. Mr. Bausman continued his labors in the parish for the space of about four years, then handing in his resignation, which was accepted upon the 8th of March, 1827. The church was greatly strengthened by his faithful and efficient ministry. Upon the 8th of March, 1827, the same day of Mr. Bausman's resignation, the Rev. Mr. Phiffer was elected in his stead. His resignation was accepted by the vestry on the 1st of August, 1829. The parish continued without a rector until the following spring, when, upon the 4th of April, 1830, the Rev. L. N. Freeman was duly elected rector. He commenced his labors in July of the same year, and labored with diligence in his vocation and ministry. During the rectorship of Mr. Freeman (April 19, 1841) it was resolved by the vestry to take measures for the erection of a suitable parsonage. Contract was made with John Johnson and Thomas Butcher for the sum of $2200. At the same time a part of the land belonging to the church was exchanged for a certain piece of land belonging to George Hogg, in order that the lot might have a rectangular shape. Upon it the parsonage now stands.

On the 29th of September, 1841, the Rev. L. N. Freeman tendered his resignation to the vestry, which was accepted. Upon the 11th of December of the same year the Rev. Enos Woodward was invited to become the rector of the church. The invitation was accepted, and he shortly after entered upon his duties. During his rectorship, as appears from the minutes of the vestry, the church was, for the first time, regularly incorporated by the name and style of "The Rector, Church Wardens, and Vestrymen of Christ Church, of Brownsville." The Rev. Mr. Woodward remained in the parish for about three years. He tendered his resignation March 24, 1845, which was accepted by the vestry. Upon the 6th of June following, the Rev. Samuel Cowell took charge of the parish.

The church was thoroughly repaired during the months of June and July, 1845, through the exertions chiefly of the ladies of the parish. About the same time a vestry-room was also erected on the rear of the church. At this time the congregation numbered forty-eight families. Adults, 125; children, 58; total, 183.

The Rev. Samuel Cowell, who was called to the rectorship of the parish in June, 1845, and took charge in the following July, resigned on the 6th of October, 1852, his resignation taking effect the 1st of November of the same year. During the years 1851 and 1852 an effort was made to build a house for the sexton, which effort was successful, the Messrs. J. L. Bowman and William Dean being the committee to raise funds, and the Messrs. G. H. and N. B. Bowman being the building committee. The house cost about twelve hundred dollars, which amounted was in part raised by the ladies of the parish, and the balance by subscription.

In November, 1853, the Rev. J. A. Jerome was called to the rectorship of the Parish, which call, after some delay, was declined. In February, 1853, the Rev. James Lee Maxwell was called, which call was also declined.

In April, 1853, the Rev. Richard Temple was invited to be rector of the parish. The call was accepted, Mr. Temple taking charge April 29, 1853. On July 12, 1854, Mr. Temple offered his resignation on account of ill health. The resignation was accepted by the vestry, and the parish was again declared vacant. On the 9th of December of the same year a unanimous call was extended to the Rev. James J. Page of Virginia. After some deliberation Mr. Page accepted the call, and took charge the 19th of January, 1855.

The winter of 1855 and 1856 was a very cold one, and the church building then occupied being very open, many of the people suffered severely from the cold. It seemed impossible to get the church warm enough for comfort. Much complaint was made, and the parish was greatly disturbed by the matter. One evening during the winter two ladies of the congregation, Mrs. Adam Jacobs and Mrs. Mary M. Gum- mert, were visiting the family of Mr. James L. Bowman. The subject of a new church was introduced, Mrs. Jacobs asked Mr. Bowman how much he would give towards it? He replied immediately three thousand dollars for myself and one thousand dollars for Mrs. Bowman. The two ladies above mentioned procured a subscription paper at once and secured five thousand dollars in a few hours, and in a few days had upon their paper about eight thousand dollars.

At a meeting of the vestry held on April 11, 1856, the Messrs. N. B. Bowman, G. H. Bowman, and John Johnston were appointed a building committee to act as an executive body for the vestry in the matter of the new church, and Mr. J. L. Bowman was appointed treasurer. The contract for the new building was awarded to Messrs. William H. Johnston and Jonathan Wilson. The church as it now stands costs about twenty thousand dollars. It was consecrated by the Rt. Rev. Alonzo Potter, D.D., LL.D.

The Rev. Mr. Page resigned the charge of the parish in the winter of 1861 and 1862, after a rectorship of six years.

On May 19, 1862, a unanimous call was by the vestry extended to the Rev. J. F. Ohl, of New Castle, Pa., who accepted the call and took charge of the parish Jan. 1, 1863. On Feb. 5, 1866, Mr. Ohl tendered his resignation, to take effect the second Sunday in April of same year. The resignation was accepted, and at the specified time the parish was again vacant after a rectorship of over three years.

On the 3d day of May, 1866, a call was extended by the vestry to the Rev. S. E. Arnold, who declined the invitation. Then the Rev. O. Pernichof was called, and also declined.

In June of the same year the Rev. H. H. Loring, of Olean, N. Y., was called to the rectorship of the parish, which call was accepted, the rector taking charge shortly after.

On the 29th day of January, 1872, Mr. Loring tendered his resignation to the vestry, to take effect at Easter of same year, viz., March 31st. The vestry accepted the resignation, to take effect at the time specified, and on the 1st day of April of the same year the parish was again declared vacant after a rectorship of nearly six years.

On the 14th of May of the same year the vestry tendered to the Rev. J. F. Ohl an invitation to again become their rector. The call was declined. In June of the same year a call was extended to the Rev. S. D. Day, of Rockford, Ill. The call was declined at this time. It was renewed in September of the same year, and then accepted, the rector taking charge Jan. 16, 1873, and is now in charge. At the present time there is a chapel in the course of erection. It is to be built of stone with open timbered roof. The walls are completed, and the contract for the woodwork has been awarded to Messrs. Gibbons, Wood & Cromlow. The cost of building when completed will be about three thousand dollars.

The statistics of the parish, according to the rector's report, are as follows for the year ending June 1, 1881: Families, 60; present number of confirmed members, 105; contributions for parish purposes, $2738.06; for diocesan work, $261.50; for missions and other charitable work outside the diocese, $400; total, $3444.56. The present members of the vestry are Messrs. Nelson Blair Bowman, John Wallace, John Johnson, James Witherington Jeffries, John

Mr. Maguire, himself in the present registry. The names of Rev. Messrs. Reynolds, Kearney, Kenny, and McGowen appear on the registry. In 1851, Rev. Wm. Lambert was again appointed to the charge of the eastern portion of the district, viz.: Fayette County, eastern part of Greene and Washington; the remainder of Greene and Washington being formed into a separate mission. Rev. John Larkin succeeded Mr. Lambert until Aug. 14, A.D. 1855, when Rev. Peter Malachy Garvey entered upon the duties of this charge.

In January, 1856, Father Garvey drew up the following, which shows the state of the Catholics scattered over the mission:

"There are at present in the Brownsville district 190 souls which can be called a permanent population, and about 80 of a floating population. In the Uniontown or mountain district the permanent population is eighty, with a floating or unsettled population of twenty-five.

"Number of families in the Brownsville district 38; Uniontown district, 16; total, 54.

"Number of Easter communions in Brownsville 108; in Uniontown, 42; total, 150."

The Right Rev. Dr. O'Connor, bishop of the diocese, made his visitation of this mission as follows at Brownsville, Sept. 4, A.D. 1856, when twenty-seven received the sacrament of confirmation, as will appear by the registry, and at Uniontown on the 8th when fifteen were confirmed. Total communions in 1856: permanent, 343; floating, 60; total, 405.

The following is found in the church records: "I find at present date, 1859, in the county of Fayette and that part of Washington and Greene attached to the Brownsville mission, viz.: from Monongahela City to Rice's Landing, a population of 430, of which 280 I believe, are permanent or will remain at least a few years, and 150 who are not likely to remain over a few months. The latter may be found scattered along to Youghiogheny from New Newton to Connellsvl. and at Belle Vernon and other places along the Monongahela."

The following pastors have been in charge from 1859 to the present time: Revs. F. Morgan, 1859; Henry Haney, 1860; Henry McCue, 1870; P. Herman, 1874; Martin Ryan, 1877; Arthur Devlin, in the same year; H. Connery, 1879; C. A. McDermott, May, 1880; H. Connery, June, 1881.

Uniontown and its adjacent stations were formed into a separate and independent district the 1st of June, 1881. The present number of communicants in the Brownsville mission is sixty.

BAPTIST CHURCH OF BROWNSVILLE.

A small Baptist society existed in Brownsville for many years prior to 1842, but the precise date of its formation cannot be given. At that time the Rev. Mr. Wood was their pastor, and their meetings for worship were held in the basement of the Masonic Hall building. On the 15th of April, in the year named, George Hogg sold to Evan Evans, Morgan Mason, and Tilson Fuller, trustees of the Baptist Church, a lot of land on Church Street below the Methodist Church lot, and on this land they shortly afterwards built a brick building, 40 by 60 feet in size, which became the society's house of worship.

The successors of the Rev. Mr. Wood in the pastoral office have been the Revs. William Barnes, Richard Austin, Hughes, and William Barnes (second pastorate), who ceased his connection with this church in 1880. The congregation is now without a pastor and feeble in numbers. The present membership is chiefly outside the borough of Brownsville.

BURIAL-GROUNDS.

On the hill adjoining the "public square" on Front Street is Brownsville's oldest burial-place, but now, and for some years past, inclosed with the grounds of J. W. Jeffries. Within the inclosure may be seen the head-stone which once marked the grave of Thomas Brown, the founder of the town. Upon it is the following inscription, still legible: "Here lies the body of Thomas Brown, who once was owner of this town. Departed this life March, 1797, aged 59 years." There is also a stone sacred to the memory of Basil King, who died in 1805, and three others, which were respectively erected over the graves of John H. and Archibald Washington and Edward R. Machen, all of whom died in 1818. These three men (of whom the latter was a native of South Carolina, and the other two of Southampton, Va.) were members of a party who came through from Baltimore, Md., having with them a gang of negro slaves, manacled and chained together, and bound for Kentucky, which they expected to reach by flat-boat from Brownsville, down the Monongahela and Ohio. Arriving at Brownsville they were compelled to wait there for some time for the means of transportation down the river, and during the period of this delay the "jail fever" broke out among the negroes, several of whom died and were buried in the south part of the public ground. The disease was communicated to the white men; the two Washingtons took it, and both died on the 10th of April in the year named. Machen was also a victim, and died three days later, April 13th. All three were interred in the old burial-ground, and stones erected over their graves, as before mentioned. These stones, as well as all others in this old ground, have been removed from their places at the graves which they once marked, and none are now left standing, though these and a number of others still remain within the inclosure. Many years have passed since any interments were made here, and, save the loose stones which still remain, there is nothing seen upon the spot to indicate that it was ever used as a burial-place.

Connected with the churchyards of the Episcopal and Methodist Churches are grounds set apart many years ago for burial purposes, and containing a great number of graves. These were in general use as places of interment until the opening of the cemetery outside the borough limits, about twenty years ago. The Catholics have a cemetery connected with the grounds of their church.

The "Redstone Cemetery," situated on the high land on the south side of the National road, about three-fourths of a mile southeastwardly from Brownsville, was laid out and established as a burial-ground by an association formed in 1809, and composed of William L. Lafferty, Rev. R. Wallace, William H. Clarke, James Sloemm, William M. Ledwith, William Parkhill, Thomas C. Tiernan, John R. Dutton, David Knox, and Capt. Adam Jacobs. They purchased the cemetery tract (about nine acres) of Daniel Bruhaker for $1600. The soil is underlaid, at a depth of about two feet, with a bed of soft sandstone, and this, in the case of each interment, is cut through to the required size of the grave, thus forming a sort of vault, which in making the burial is covered by a flag-stone, of which a large supply is constantly kept on hand by the association.

The cemetery is located on a spot which was made attractive by nature, and its beauty has been greatly enhanced by the laying out, which was done in the modern style of cemeteries, with winding paths and graded carriage-ways, and all embellished by the planting of ornamental trees, with an abundance of evergreens. There have been many handsome and expensive monuments and memorial stones erected in this ground, and in regard to these and other particulars, few cemeteries can be found more beautiful than this.

The cemetery association, formed in 1809, was not chartered until Feb. 24, 1877. The first president was Dr. William L. Lafferty; secretary and treasurer, William M. Ledwith. In 1865, Dr. Lafferty was succeeded by John R. Dutton, the present president.

EXTINGUISHMENT OF FIRES.

Brownsville has never had a fire department, nor has there ever been in the borough any efficient organization furnished with adequate apparatus and appliances for the extinguishment of fires, though at least three of the old style hand fire-engines have been purchased. The date of the purchase of the first of these has not been ascertained, for the reason that no borough records can be found covering the period from March, 1821, to August, 1840, as before mentioned. That the borough was in possession of an engine-house, and therefore, presumably, an engine, prior to the latter date, is shown by the fact that at that time a bill was presented and allowed by the board "for painting the Engine-House."

On the 12th of October, 1842, the petition of about fifty citizens was presented "praying the Council to provide suitably to guard against the accident of fire, and to take a loan for the purpose of defraying the necessary expenses thereof." At the same time a committee was appointed to examine the three springs at the head of the town with a view to the construction and supply of a reservoir, and to report on the same. On the 17th of the same month the committee reported that to "construct a reservoir at the spring above Workman's, thirty feet square and twelve feet deep, and to cover the same, and to bring the water through iron pipes to Brashear's Alley, will cost about one thousand dollars; and for each additional foot of pipe, and laying the same, one dollar thirty-seven and a half cents." Also that fire-plugs should be put in at each square, costing, by estimation, forty dollars. George Dawson was instructed by the Council to confer with the heirs of Neal Gillespie to ascertain what they would charge for land for the reservoir. On the 24th of October, Mr. Dawson reported that permission to build the reservoir could not be obtained.

Oct. 17, 1842, the Council resolved "that Robert Rogers and Edward Hughes be and they are hereby appointed a committee to contract for a Fire Engine."

Oct. 26, 1840, an ordinance was passed requiring the clock of the market to ring the town bell for the space of five minutes every night at ten o'clock.

March 5, 1841, the bill on the town hall was purchased of the vestry of the Episcopal Church for $85 62c.

March 14, 1841, an ordinance was passed regulating wharfage and establishing charges, viz.: 23 cents for each steamboat making the landing, and 12½ cents for each twenty-four hours lying at the dock or wharf. For each flat-boat or keel-boat, 12½ cents wharfage.

In 1842 considerable difficulty was experienced in finding any suitable person who would accept the office of collector. Sebastian Brant, James C. Giff, G. H. Bowman, Adam Jacobs, Daniel Barnhart, Jacob Workman, and Paul Jones were successively appointed and refused to serve. At last Edward March-axe was appointed, and having accepted the office and qualified, was authorized and directed by the Council to collect, by suit or otherwise, the fine of 200 imposed upon each of those who had refused to serve as collector.

July 31, 1845, "a reservoir or water trough" was ordered to be constructed above Workman's Hotel, to be supplied from a never-failing spring above Workman's.

In 1852 a "lock-up" was built of brick near the market-house, and is still in use as a place of detention.

In February, 1850, and again in February, 1869, a project was agitated for changing the name of the borough of Brownsville to Redstone Old Fort. A petition to that effect, drawn up by James Veitch, Esq., and intended for presentation to the Legislature, was read at the latter time before the Council, but did not find much favor with that body, and the project failed,—a result which was doubtless pleasing to most of the people of Brownsville.

In August, 1818, by a resolution of the Council, all springs and wells in the streets of Brownsville were declared to be public property.

October 29th, Robert Rogers was appointed to contract for four ladders—two of twenty feet and two of sixteen feet in length—and for six fire-hooks.

Jan. 12, 1843, "the President, Mr. Robert Rogers, was appointed to contract with some one to build an Engine-House at the west end of the Market-House." On the 17th of the same month, "Robert Rogers, President, reported that he had articled with Faull & Herbertson for a Fire-Engine for three hundred and fifty dollars," and two days later he reported that he "had contracted with John Johnston to build the Engine-House."

The Mechanics' Fire Company, of Brownsville, petitioned the Council, Nov. 7, 1843, to furnish them with one hundred feet of rope and two axes, which was done.

June 27, 1851, "the large fire-engine" was placed under control and in charge of a company who had recently organized and petitioned the Council for that purpose.

Subsequently, at different times, when, by the occurrence of fires, the attention of the citizens had been called to the necessity of taking measures to prevent wide-spread disaster from that cause, new fire companies have often been formed and organized, but as often have become disorganized and disbanded after a brief period of activity and enthusiasm. The old fire-engines are still in existence and in possession of the borough; but at the present time the people of Brownsville have no adequate means of preventing an accidental fire from becoming a general conflagration if it should occur at a time when all the conditions are favorable to cause such a catastrophe.

FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS.

THE MONONGAHELA NATIONAL BANK OF BROWNSVILLE.

This institution was identical with the old Monongahela Bank of Brownsville, which went into operation (though then unchartered) in 1812 under the following:

"Articles of Association of the Monongahela Bank of Brownsville."

"To all persons to whom these presents may come or in any way concern: Be it known that we, the subscribers, believing that the establishment of an association in the town of Brownsville for the purpose of raising a fund in order to assist the Farmer, Manufacturer, Mechanic, Trader, and Exporter in the purchase of such articles as they respectively raise, manufacturer, deal in, or export will more effectually tend to bring into active operation the resources of the western country, will materially assist the spirit of enterprise and improvements in commerce, manufactures, and the mechanic arts by affording to all facility in the prosecution of their business, have associated and do hereby associate and form ourselves into a company to be called the Monongahela Bank of Brownsville."

"The following persons are hereby constituted and appointed Directors of the said Bank, and shall continue to hold their respective offices until the first Monday of April, 1813;"
these articles were adopted May 12, 1812, and signed by one hundred and fifty-six stockholders, including the directors above named. The capital stock was $500,000, in 10,000 shares of $50 each, of which 4000 shares were immediately offered, and the remaining 6000 shares were reserved for future disposition, whereof 2500 shares were apportioned for the use of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

Under these articles a limited business was done until 1814, when a charter was obtained. The following notice appeared in the Genius of Liberty of September 14th of that year:

"MONONGAHELA BANK OF BROWNSVILLE.

The subscribers, being authorized by Letters Patent from the Government of this Commonwealth incorporating said Bank, do hereby give notice to all persons who have subscribed for stock therein to attend at the Banking-House in Brownsville on Thursday, the sixth day of October next, at ten o'clock A.M., for the purpose of electing thirteen directors and fixing upon the Site of said Bank.

"NATHANIEL BREARLY, WILLIAM LYNN, "MICHAEL SOWERS, ISRAEL MILLER, "WILLIAM TROTH, GEORGE DAWSON, "LEWIS SWETZER."

The first election under the charter was held on the 6th of October, 1814. Jacob Bowman was elected president, William Troth cashier, and William Blair clerk. On the 8th of December, in the same year, the directors of the old association voted to discontinue operations and transfer its effects and business to the chartered institution.

On the next day (December 9th) the bank commenced business under the charter. The office was on Front Street, in the building now occupied by Dr. C. C. Richard. In that building the business of the bank was transacted for nearly sixty years, until the removal to the present banking-house in 1873.

Jacob Bowman continued as president of the bank from its incorporation until Sept. 26, 1843, when, on account of his advanced age and infirmities, he resigned, and was succeeded by his son, James L. Bowman, who held the position until his death, March 21, 1857. Goodloe H. Bowman was then elected president, and remained in that office until February, 1874, when he died. He was succeeded (February 24th) by George E. Hogg, who is the present president.

William Troth, the first cashier, died in July, 1816, and on the 23d of that month John T. McKennan was elected. He held the position until his death, Sept. 18, 1830, and on the 28th of the same month Goodloe H. Bowman was elected cashier. He resigned March 29, 1842, and David S. Knox (who had for some years acted as teller) was elected cashier. Upon his death, in November, 1872, William Parkhill was elected cashier, and filled the position till February, 1889, when he resigned, and on the 2d of March following William M. Ledwith (who had been teller since 1854) was elected cashier, and still holds the position.

In January, 1864, the institution, having conformed to the requirements of the National Banking law, was reorganized as the Monongahela National Bank of Brownsville, with an authorized capital of $500,000, and a paid in capital of $290,000. The bank, from the time of its chartering in 1814 until the present (with the exception of about three months in the year 1837) has redeemed its notes in coin.

The present bank building, located on the corner of Market Street and Bowman's Alley, was built and occupied in the fall of 1873. It is an exceedingly fine brick structure, about forty-four by sixty feet in size, and two stories high. The banking-room is twenty feet in height, finely decorated and furnished. The cost of the building was $35,000, including the lot.

THE FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF BROWNSVILLE.

This bank was organized Aug. 18, 1863, under the National Banking law, which was passed for the purpose of establishing a uniform currency throughout the whole country, and to aid the government in its great struggle against the Rebellion. It was among the earliest of the banks which went into operation under that law, as is shown by its charter-number, 135. The gentleman to whom the bank owes its existence more than to any other is its present president, Mr. J. T. Rogers.

The Monongahela Bank, from a very early period in the history of banking in Western Pennsylvania down to the present time, enjoyed the patronage of all this end of Fayette County and that part of Washington County adjoining Brownsville on the west and north, so that when Mr. Rogers projected his plan of forming a new bank under the national law it encountered obstacles and opposition. But Mr. Rogers, who is a gentleman of resolute purpose, was un­sturbed by obstacles, and the First National Bank became a fixed fact. After getting enlisted in his project all the men of means he could, all the stock he could raise after a thorough canvass of the moneyed men of the place was about forty thousand dollars, ten thousand less than was necessary to organize under the law. But Mr. Rogers was not to be foiled in his undertaking, and he, with two others, Robert Rogers and William H. Clarke, promptly subscribed what was lacking, and the bank was organized as above stated.

The first board of directors was composed of Robert Rogers, better known as Squire Rogers, J. T. Rogers, William H. Clarke, Capt. I. C. Woodward, Samuel Thompson, Elijah Craft, Capt. Adam Jacobs, Albert G. Mason, and William Elliott. The board was organized by electing Robert Rogers president, and J. T. Rogers vice-president. William Parkhill was elected cashier, and discharged the duties of that office down to 1872, when he resigned to accept the position of cashier in the Monongahela National Bank. At the election for directors in January, 1864, the old board was re-elected with the exception of Elijah Craft, who was not elected, probably because living so far in the country it was not convenient for him to attend regularly the meetings of the board. Thomas Duncan, the present vice-president, was chosen in his place. The board was organized the same as before. At this time, to facilitate the business of the bank and to accommodate the public, an exchange committee was appointed. The duty of this committee was to pass on paper when the board was not in session (it only meeting weekly); and at the next meeting of the board the business done by this committee is passed upon.

This important business was intrusted to J. T. Rogers, W. H. Clarke, and Thomas Duncan.

During the year 1865, Robert Rogers, president, died, and J. T. Rogers was chosen president, a position in which he has done honor both to himself and the bank. Thomas Duncan was elected vice-president, to fill the place made vacant by the promotion of Mr. Rogers to the presidency. On the resignation of William Parkhill as cashier, Mr. Eli Crumrine was chosen to fill his place.

The present officers of the bank are J. T. Rogers, president; Thomas Duncan, vice-president; E. Crumrine, cashier. The directors are J. T. Rogers, Thomas Duncan, J. W. Jeffries, James Scouen, John Springer, L. H. Abrams, and S. S. Graham.

The bank first commenced doing business in a small room at the lower end of Front Street, but the business increased so rapidly that more commodious quarters became necessary. Accordingly a lot was purchased and a new building was put up for its especial accommodation. The bank building is on Market Street near the Neck. It is a two-story brick building, containing a banking-room, directors' room, and a dwelling for the cashier. The erection of the building was superintended by Mr. J. T. Rogers.

The success of the bank has been remarkable. It has averaged a semi-annual dividend to the stockholders of five per cent., besides laying by a surplus fund of $48,000. When it is taken into consideration that at first its capital was only $50,000, and afterwards $75,000, this result shows the great popularity of the bank and the sound principles on which its affairs have been conducted.

MANUFACTURING ESTABLISHMENTS.

THE BROWNSVILLE GLASS-FACTORY.

This was built by George Hogg & Co., in the year 1828, was run one year successfully, then changed to John Taylor & Co., and became a decided success. The firm of Taylor & Co., consisted of John Taylor and Edward Campbell. After two years, Taylor selling his interest to William R. Campbell, the style of the firm became and remained for several years E. Campbell & Co. Their reputation was very high as glassmakers. E. Campbell selling his interest to Robert Forsyth, the firm again changed to Campbell & Forsyth, who continued some two years, then sold to Edward Campbell, who ran part of the year and sold to Gue & Gabler, who ran several years without success. The property was sold by the sheriff, and fell into the hands of the original owners, George Hogg & Co. It was then started again by a co-operative firm styled Burk, Sedgwick & Co., and run for several years, but finally failed. Carter, Hogg & Co. started it again, but were not successful, and the works lay idle for some time. Benedict Kimmer then started it and made some money the first year. He purchased a steamboat and took command of her, leaving the glass business in the hands of other parties to manage for him. He took the cholera and died on the Illinois River. This brought the factory to a standstill. The property was then purchased by a co-operative company, under the style of Haught, Swearer & Co., who erected a new factory with eight pots and failed the second or third year, and the property fell into the hands of Robert Rogers. He leased it to P. & I. Swearer, who ran it successfully for a few years and finally failed. They made a second start and were successful, doing a good business, when George W. Wells purchased the property in the year 1864, took possession and started with an eight-pot furnace and did a successful business, increasing his furnace to ten pots, still doing well. The expensive improvements with perhaps the panic of 1873 caused him to lose money. The property was then purchased by Schmertz & Quinby, who are now running it with success.

BROWNSVILLE ROLLING-MILL.

The rolling-mill now operated in Brownsville by Magee & Anderson, was built by John Snowdon about 1853, and operated by him for several years. Later his sons became interested in the business, and it was then carried on under the firm-name of John Snowdon & Sons. In March, 1872, Capt. Adam Jacobs purchased the property and ran the mill for two or three years, during which time it was improved and brought to its present capacity.
In January, 1881, the works were leased from Capt. Jacobs by Magee & Anderson, who repaired the mill, placed it again at work, and are now operating it successfully.

STEELE & SON'S TANNERY.

Samuel Steele commenced learning the trade of tanner with his brother-in-law, Jesse Cunningham, at the old tannery on Hogg's Alley, in 1833. He worked with Mr. Cunningham till his death, which occurred in 1843, when he bought a half-interest, Mrs. Cunningham retaining the other half. This firm was known as Samuel Steele & Co. till 1869, when they dissolved, and Samuel Steele then built the tannery at the present site. He carried it on in the old style way of tanning, grinding bark by horse-power and pumping by hand till 1867, when he purchased a boiler and engine of forty horse-power to grind bark, pump, syphon, etc., enabling him to tan in less time and thus increasing his facilities. In April, 1879, he admitted his son, William C. Steele, under the present firm-name of Samuel Steele & Son. They are now tanning about one thousand hides per year, employing five experienced workmen, and using one hundred and twenty-five to one hundred and fifty cords of rock oak bark, making two thousand sides of harness leather, which is sold to saddlers and dealers in Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Nebraska, and Colorado. The hides are furnished by butchers in neighboring towns and the surrounding country, the supply from this source being more than can be used in the tannery, three hundred having been sold in the past year to other parties.

COAL-MINES AND COKE-WORKS.

The Ethel Coke-Works, located in Brownsville township, outside the borough, are furnished with coal from a mine opened in 1872 by George E. Hogg, who then built four ovens, and in 1875 constructed sixteen more. These coke-works are now (1881) operated by Snowdon & McCormick, by whom the slack of the mine only is used for coke. The capacity of the works is one thousand bushels per day.

The Umpire Mine, also outside the borough limits in Brownsville township, was opened by George E. Hogg in 1872. The main entry extends about two thousand yards through the hill, and four side entries extend from the main one from two hundred to five hundred yards. The mine is now operated by J. S. Cunningham & Co., who ship the coal to Southern and Western markets. The slack is manufactured into coke by Snowdon & McCormick.

BROWNSVILLE GAS COMPANY.

By the provisions of an act of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, approved March 31, 1857,1 William Lafferty, John L. Dawson, Westley Frost, James L. Bowman, D. S. Knox, Adam Jacobs, G. H. Bowman, J. C. Woodward, W. H. Clark, John R. Dutton, and J. W. Jeffries, of the borough of Brownsville, and Samuel B. Page, Elisha Bennett, and J. T. Rogers, of the borough of Bridgeport, were appointed commissioners to effect the organization of a gas company, with a capital of thirty thousand dollars, to be located in Brownsville, and to supply gas to the boroughs of Brownsville and Bridgeport. The organization was effected with Dr. William L. Lafferty as president, and in 1860 the company purchased a lot of ground on Water Street, below Market Street, of John N. Snowdon, and contracted with John Snowdon to erect on it for sixteen thousand dollars the necessary buildings and works for the manufacture of gas. The works were accordingly erected and put in operation, and have so continued successfully to the present time.

The present officers of the company are John R. Dutton, president; William Parkhill, secretary and treasurer; Capt. Adam Jacobs, George E. Hogg, J. G. Rogers, J. W. Jeffries, J. L. Bowman, and John R. Dutton, directors.

John Christmas, Michael Sowers, Ready McSherry were appointed a committee to inquire and to report to the lodge the next evening.

Jan. 23, 1794, the lodge commenced work under a dispensation of the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania, dated Dec. 9, 1793, Chads Chalfant, W. M.; John Chambers, S. W.; Michael Sowers, J. W.

Twenty-seven members were added to the lodge in 1794. St. John's day in that year was celebrated by a procession to the church, where a sermon was preached by the Rev. John H. Reynolds. Similar exercises were observed on St. John's day, 1797, when the sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Davis. On St. John's day (June 24), 1799, after the ceremonies of the day, the members of the lodge and visitors "in the evening repaired to Bro. Wilson's, at the Black Horse Tavern, and spent the evening in festivity."

BIORAPHRICAL SKETCHES.

GOODloe HARPer BOWMAN.

The late Mr. Goodloe H. Bowman, of Brownsville, who died Jan. 30, 1876, was of German and Scotch-Irish extraction. His father, Jacob Bowman, was born in Washington County, then Frederick County, Md., near Hagerstown, June, 1763. In 1877 he married Isabella Lowry, who was of Scotch descent, and was born in County Donegal, Ireland, and came to America when seventeen years of age. Goodloe Harper Bowman was the seventh child and third son of this union, and was born April 20, 1803. He was reared and educated in Brownsville, and entered upon active business life as a merchant at about the age of twenty years, and continued merchandising, in partnership with his brothers, until 1855, when he relinquished the business, and gave his attention principally to the affairs of the Monongahela Bank of Brownsville, of which bank he was elected president in 1857, and continued such to the time of his death, immediately succeeding his elder brother, James L. Bowman, in the presidency thereof, as the latter had succeeded his father, Jacob Bowman, who was the first president of the bank.

Jan. 9, 1846, Mr. Bowman married Miss Jane Corry Smith, of Reading, Berks Co., Pa., by whom he had five children,—Isabella Lowry, James Lowry, John Howard, Ann Sweitzer, and William Robert.

Mr. Bowman, like his father, was an active member and supporter of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and for many years senior warden of Christ Church, Brownsville. He was in politics a Whig in early life, and became an ardent Republican, and contributed liberally to the support of the Union cause during the late Rebellion.
ADAM JACOBS.

Capt. Adam Jacobs, of Brownsville, is of German extraction. His grandfather, Adam Jacobs, emigrated from Lancaster County, Pa., at an early day into Allegheny County, and there carried on farming on Turtle Creek, near "Braddock's Field," eleven miles east of Pittsburgh, for several years, and then moved to Brownsville, where he entered into merchandising, which he conducted until his death, which occurred in 1818.

He had but one son who lived to maturity, named after himself, Adam Jacobs, and who was born in Brownsville, Dec. 3, 1794, and was educated at the subscription schools and at Washington College, and became a merchant, and on the 16th of January, 1816, married Eliza Reiley, daughter of Martin Reiley, of Bedford, Bedford Co., Pa. He died June 20, 1822, leaving two children, Adam and Ann Elizabeth, long since deceased.

Adam, the last referred to, is the subject of our sketch, and was born Jan. 7, 1817. He received his early education in the pay schools, and at about sixteen years of age was apprenticed to G. W. Bowman to learn coppersmithing, and remained with him four years. He then went into the business for himself, and in a year or two afterwards took to steamboating on the Western rivers, and continued steamboating until 1847. He was at this time, and had been for years before, engaged also in building steamboats, and from 1847 forward prosecuted steamboat-building vigorously, at times having as many as eight boats in a year under contract. He built over a hundred and twenty steamboats before practically retiring from the business about 1872, since which time he has, however, built about five boats for the Pittsburg, Brownsville and Geneva Packet Company, and other contracts. Capt. Jacobs was also engaged in merchandising, with all the rest of his active business, from 1843 to 1865, and may be said to be still merchandising, for he has a store at East Riverside.

Since about 1872 he has spent his time mostly in Brownsville in the winters and at his country residence, "East Riverside," Luzerne township, on the Monongahela River, during the summer seasons.

On the 22d of February, 1838, Mr. Jacobs married Miss Ann Snowdon (born in England in 1816), a daughter of John and Mary Smith Snowdon, who came from England and settled in Brownsville in 1818, where Mr. Snowdon soon after started the business of engine-building, and carried it on till disabled by old age. Mr. and Mrs. Snowdon both died in advanced years, and were buried in the Brownsville Cemetery, where a fine monument marks the place of their repose.

Mr. and Mrs. Jacobs have had ten children, eight of whom are living,—Mary, wife of William Parkhill; Adam, Jr., married to Laura Myers, of Canton, Ohio; Catharine, wife of S. S. Graham; John N., married to Sarah Colvin; Caroline S., wife of John H. Bowman; Anna, wife of Joseph L. McBirney, of Chicago, Ill.; Martin Reiley, now residing in Colorado; and George D.

GEORGE HOGG.

George Hogg, only son of John and Mary Crisp Hogg, was born in Cramlington, in the county of Northumberland, England, on the 22d day of June, 1784. When about twenty years of age he came to Brownsville, in 1804, where he established his home, and as a merchant created a very large and lucrative business.

On March 7, 1811, he married Mary A., oldest daughter of Judge Nathaniel Breading, of Tower Hill Farm, Luzerne township, Fayette Co. Of the marriage were born the following-named children: George E., Nathaniel B., John T., Mary A. (who married Felix R. Bruno); Elizabeth E. (who married William S. Bissell); and James B., lost on the ocean.

By the integrity of his character and strict attention to business, George Hogg was eminently successful, and secured the esteem of the communities in which he lived. Though a great lover of his adopted country, he did not cease to be an Englishman, and always looked back with pleasure to the good old laws and institutions of his native land.

In May, 1843, he removed to Allegheny City, and died there Dec. 5, 1849, in the sixty-sixth year of his age, in the house which he bought in an unfinished state on removing to that place, and which he completed, and wherein he spent the remainder of his years.

During his business career he, with his uncle, William Hogg, established large business houses in Pittsburgh, Pa., and about fifteen different establishments of merchandise and commission-houses in Ohio, together with a forwarding-house at Sandusky City, in that State, and to which were attached a number of vessels running on Lake Erie, and a line of boats on the Ohio Canal.

Mr. Hogg, with the co-operation of others, built the bridge at Brownsville over the Monongahela River, and was also one of the original stockholders of the Monongahela Navigation Improvement Company, through whose enterprise the great body of the coal which is mined along the Monongahela River, and exported, finds its way to New Orleans. He also erected, in 1828, the Brownsville Glass-Works, and supervised their operations till 1847, when he disposed of them.

Mr. Hogg was confirmed in his youth according to the usages of the Established Church of England, and through life was a consistent, devoted, and liberal member of that communion.

A monument to his memory, executed jointly by the sculptor, Henry K. Brown, of New York, and the sculptor Piatti,—a lofty plinth surmounted by a life-size figure of the Angel of the Resurrection,—was erected in Allegheny Cemetery, near Pittsburgh, Pa., in 1851, and located near an elegant cenotaph, by Piatti, memorial of James B. Hogg, above referred to, the son of Mr. George Hogg, and who went down with the ocean steamer "Arctic," which founded at sea near Cape Race, Sept. 27, 1854.

WILLIAM HOGG.

William Hogg was born June 17, 1755, in the county of Northumberland, England. While quite young he entered the marine service, from which he soon retired, and was soon thereafter drafted into the British military service, but deserted at Charleston, S. C. Working his way to Philadelphia, he found employment for about a year, when he concluded to seek his fortune in the great unknown West. In 1786 he first visited Brownsville, at that time the point where the military road reached the first navigable stream of the West, whereby the emigrants of the East and the traders could by boats reach the far-distant West. Here they encamped until they could build their boats and procure supplies of ironware and provisions sufficient to start them in their Western homes. Mr. Hogg was pleased with the prospects of Brownsville as a place of business. He returned to Philadelphia to lay in a small stock of merchandise, which was the beginning of his eminently successful career as a merchant. During the following year he again visited Brownsville, intending to go to Kentucky, whither the tide of emigration was moving. He concluded, however, to make this place his home, and here, during the eleven years he was in business, he acquired what was then thought to be a very large fortune. He retired from active business in 1798, and thereafter in partnership with George Hogg, who came from England in 1804, planted many branches of business throughout Ohio, and purchased large bodies of government lands.

While thus fortunate in business he established for himself a high character for integrity over a large region of country. He was singularly modest and unobtrusive in all his ways, so much so that he attracted attention rather than escaped it by the simplicity of his life and manners.

Mr. Hogg, in connection with others, organized the Monongahela Bank of Brownsville, as early as 1812, under articles of association, which in 1814 were exchanged for a charter under the Commonwealth. Under the State charter and the National Banking laws this bank still has a vigorous existence, and is probably the oldest institution west of the Allegheny Mountains, and was for very many years the only institution of the kind over a very large region of country.

Mr. Hogg, Mr. Jacob Bowman, Dr. Wheeler, and George Hogg were equally efficient at a very early day in organizing at Brownsville an Episcopal Church and erecting a large and substantial building for its use.

William Hogg took great interest in the cause of education at all times, but an incident exemplifying this fact, and of historical interest as well, may here be cited. Somewhere about 1828 or 1839, when Ken-) yon College, now at Gambier, Knox Co., Ohio, had been projected, but yet lacked a site, Hon. Henry Clay, of Kentucky, and Bishop Chase, of Ohio, visited Brownsville and negotiated with Mr. Hogg for eight thousand acres of land belonging to him, and which he, in consideration that an institution of learning was to be erected thereon, deeded to them as trustees for $2.25 per acre, though it was held in the market at a much higher price, and then presented them besides, for use of the college, with $6000 of the purchase-money.

At the age of about forty he married Mary Stevens, a native of Bucks County, Pa. They both died in the eighty-sixth year of their age, she on Nov. 11, 1840, he on the 27th of January, 1841, and their remains were interred in the cemetery of the Episcopal Church. Over their remains their nephew, George Hogg, erected a monument of native sandstone, a noble structure for the times.

JUDGE THOMAS DUNCAN.

Among the venerable men of Bridgeport, highly esteemed by all who know him, and identified with the interests of that borough and its twin-sister, Brownsville, by over half a century's residence and active business life within their limits, and participating in the best measures, well performing the duties and dignifiedly hearing the responsibilities of good citizenship therein, watchful ever for the weal and social good order of the place where has so long been his home, is Judge Thomas Duncan. He is of Scotch-Irish extraction. His father, Arthur Duncan, emigrated from County Donegal, Ireland, about 1793, to America, and found his way into Fayette County as a soldier in the service of the United States among the troops sent hither by the government to suppress the Whiskey Insurrection. After the troops were disbanded he settled in Franklin township, near Upper Middletown (then known as "Plumsook"), Menallen township, and married Sophia Wharton, daughter of Arthur Wharton, of Franklin township, but a native of England, who held a large tract of land in that township, and was a man of strong individuality. Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Duncan passed the greater portion of their lives in Upper Middletown, but Mrs. Duncan died about 1845, in Pittsburgh, to which place the family had removed, and Mr. Duncan, about 1850, in Moundsville, Va., at the residence of one of his daughters, Mrs. Nancy Rosell.

Mr. and Mrs. Duncan were the parents of ten children, the second in number of whom is Judge Thomas Duncan, who was born in Franklin township, Aug. 22, 1807. He received his early education in the Thorn Bottom school-house, in those days often pompously or ironically dubbed "The Thorn Bottom Seminary," on Buck Run, in his native township. During his boyhood he wrought more or less in the Plumsack Rolling-Mill, and at eighteen years of age was apprenticed to a cabinet-maker, Thomas Hatfield, an expert mechanic, with whom he remained three years as an apprentice and three more as a partner. He then removed to Bridgeport, where he has ever since resided, carrying on as his principal business that in which he first engaged.

Judge Duncan has always taken an active part in public affairs. He was a member of the first board of school directors in Bridgeport chosen under the present law organizing the common schools, and earnestly advocated the enactment of the law long before it was made. He has frequently been a member of the Common Council, and several times burgess of Bridgeport. He has also taken a prominent part as a Democrat in the politics of the county, was county commissioner from 1841 to 1843, both inclusive, and was elected in 1851 associate judge of Fayette County for a period of five years, and re-elected in the fall of 1856 for a like term, and fulfilled the duties of his office throughout both terms.

In 1837, Judge Duncan joined the Masonic order, uniting with Brownsville Lodge, No. 69, and has filled all the offices of the lodge, and is a member of Brownsville Chapter. He is also a member of St. Omer's Commandery, No. 7, of Brownsville, and has been a member of Brownsville Lodge, No. 51, of the Order of Odd-Fellows, since 1834. Judge Duncan has also been a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church since the last-named year.

In May, 1829, he married Priscilla Stevens, daughter of Dr. Benjamin Stevens of Uniontown, whose father, Benjamin Stevens, who came to Fayette County from Maryland, was also a physician. Mrs. Duncan died in February, 1873, at the age of sixty-six years.

Judge and Mrs. Duncan became the parents of five children, three of whom are living,—Mrs. Elizabeth Worrell, Dr. W. S. Duncan, both of Bridgeport, and Thomas J. Duncan, a lawyer practicing his profession in Washington, Pa.

WILLIAM STEVENS DUNCAN, M.D.

Dr. W. S. Duncan, of Bridgeport, is the son of Judge Thomas Duncan, of the same borough, a biographical sketch of whom immediately precedes this sketch. Dr. Duncan was born May 24, 1834; and here the writer may quite as properly as anywhere else note the fact that the date of his birth is the only fact or item of the following biographical sketch which the doctor has independently furnished, he being decidedly averse, as he expresses it, to countenancing any "representation of himself in such manner as shall seem to have been suggested in whole or in part by myself" (himself), or "through favorable facts which, it will be obvious, were furnished by myself." So the interviewer was advised to refer to others, and if there are found any errors of opinion or statement in this sketch they must be attributed to the writer's sources of information.

Dr. Duncan merits more emphatic notice in a work of this kind than is usually accorded to the living of any profession or vocation, for he occupies a place not only in the front rank of the physicians of Fayette County. He is a very careful and comprehensive investigator, and a progressive man, keeping pace with the advance in medicine and its allied sciences by the only means feasible and practicable, especially to a country physician at a distance from the colleges, lecture-rooms, and hospitals, namely, books. The caller-in at Dr. Duncan's office, though he come from the city, where the best private medical libraries exist, is surprised at the extent of the doctor's library, which contains the most valuable standard medical works of the past, and is richly supplied with the most approved works newly issued in this country and Europe. Probably not a score of physicians in such cities as New York or Philadelphia individually possess libraries comparable in value to that of Dr. Duncan, and it is probable that out of all the other medical libraries in Fayette County not one-half as many separate works, or works by different authors, could be gleaned as are contained in his. Medical books are just as much a positive necessity for the integral understanding and scientific practice of medicine as are good sound "horse sense," an excellent fundamental education in medical science, prudence, etc., which are too apt to be supposed all that a physician needs. He must keep up with the advancement of medical science if he would be truly successful and great, and he should be unwilling to be less. Books are practically his only source of information. No one physician's "experience," though it cover a half-century of practice, and countless cases of experiment and speculation, can afford any considerable information or "scientific facts" in comparison with what books supply, made up as they are out of the experiences and studies of armies of doctors and professors of medical science. The sick everywhere should consider these things, and the physician of large practice, it may be, but who is too indolent to read, or too penurious to provide himself with books, or he who is too poor, it may be, to be well equipped with books, should be shunned; the former as a dangerous, speculative empiric who indolently "sets himself up" above the ripost books and the best philosophers, and so deliberately defrauds his patients by failing to furnish what they have a right to expect; the latter as a subject of pity, of too weak parts to know his duty to himself and the public, and so willing to trifle with human life and subject it to risks rather than undertake to borrow what he cannot do without, and be what he pretends to be, a "doctor," or learned man in medicine. It is no more than honorably due to Dr. Duncan to say that he has done loyal and royal honor to the profession by honoring himself in an unstinted manner with the proper appointments and equipments for practice, and the universal credit which is accorded him as a strong man in his profession implies the fact; for such a man as he is ever ready to acknowledge that much of whatever he is he owes to his silent, richly-endowed, able books. For what follows we are indebted to two books in which professional notice of Dr. Duncan is made, one of which is entitled "Physicians and Surgeons of the United States," edited by William B. Atkinson, M.D., 1878; the other a record of the "Transactions of the Rocky Mountain Medical Association," with biographies of the members, by J. M. Toner, M.D., a leading physician of Washington, D. C. (1877).

Dr. Duncan was liberally educated at Mount Union College, Stark Co., Ohio. His medical studies were commenced in 1855 with Dr. M. O. Jones, then of Bridgeport. Matriculating in the University of Pennsylvania, he took full courses of lectures, and received his degree of M.D. therefrom in March, 1858. During the last year of his medical course he was a member of the private class of Dr. J. J. Woodward (one of the medical attendants of President Garfield in his last illness), in the special study of pathology, anatomy, and microscopy. In June, 1858, he formed a partnership with his preceptor in Bridgeport and commenced practice. The partnership continued for about two and a half years, when the doctor entered upon business alone, and he has since remained by himself. He still occupies the office in which he wrote his first prescription. Dr. Duncan served as a volunteer surgeon at Gettysburg, was captured by the Confederate troops, but succeeded in escaping. Latterly his labors have been occasionally interrupted by excursions, the winter months being spent in Florida or other parts of the South, and part of the summers in New England and Canada. Like most country practitioners, he engages in general practice, including surgery, and has performed a number of important operations,—for hernia nine times, and tracheotomy seven times, and has successfully performed the operation of excision of the head of the humerus, and of the lower part of the radius. Dr. Duncan is a member of the Fayette County Medical Society, and has held in turn all its offices; also a member of the Pennsylvania State Medical Society, and is at present one of its censors. He is a member of the American Medical Association, and of the Rocky Mountain Medical Association, and is an honorary member of the California State Medical Society. Dr. Duncan is a close student, and has contributed quite extensively to medical literature. Among his numerous and able papers those entitled as follows merit special mention: "Malformation of the Genito-Urinary Organs" (American Journal of Medical Science, 1859); "Belladonna as an Antidote for Opium-Poisoning" (Ibid., 1862); "Medical Delusions" (a pamphlet published at Pittsburgh, 1869); "Reports of Cases to Pennsylvania Medical Society" (1870-72); "Iliac Aneurism Cured by Electrolysis" (Transactions of the same society, 1875); a paper on "The Physiology of Death" (1876).

Dr. Duncan was married March 21, 1861, to Miss Amanda Leonard, daughter of Benjamin and Mary Berry Leonard, of Brownsville. They have one child, a daughter.

SAMUEL STEELE.

Mr. Samuel Steele, of Brownsville, is of Scotch-Irish extraction. His great-grandparents came to America from the north of Ireland about 1749, and settled, it is believed, in Eastern Pennsylvania. On the passage over the Atlantic Mrs. Steele presented her husband with a son, who was given the name William, and who was the grandfather of Mr. Samuel Steele. William grew up to manhood and found his way into Maryland, where he married and resided for a period of time, the precise record of which is lost; but there several children were born to him, one of whom, and the oldest son, was John, the father of Samuel Steele. About 1783 or 1784, William Steele removed from Maryland with his family to Fayette County, to a point on the "Old Packhorse road" about six miles east of Brownsville, where he purchased a tract of land, which is now divided into several excellent farms, occupied by Thomas Murphy, who resides upon the old Steele homestead, site, and others. William Steele eventually removed to Rostrevor township, Westmoreland Co., where he died in 1806.

Some years prior to his death Mr. William Steele purchased for his sons John and William a tract of land in what is now Jefferson township, and embraced the farms now owned and occupied by John Steele and Joseph S. Elliott. John Steele (the father of Mr. Samuel S.) eventually married Miss Agnes (often called "Nancy") Happer, by whom he had eight children, of whom Samuel was the fourth in number, and was born June 15, 1814. Mr. John Steele died June 6, 1856, at about the age of eighty-three.

Mr. Samuel Steele was brought up on the farm, and in his childhood attended the subscription schools. In his eighteenth year he left home and entered as an apprentice to the tanning and currying trade the establishment of Jesse Cunningham, his brother-in-law, a noted tanner of Brownsville, where he served three years in learning the business. After the expiration of his apprenticeship he entered upon the pursuit of various businesses, among which was flat-boating agricultural products, apples, etc., cider, and provisions of various kinds down the Monongahela to the Ohio, and on to Cincinnati and Louisville, where he usually sold his merchandise, but sometimes made trips to New Orleans. He followed the business in spring-time for some seven years, ending about February, 1843, when occurred the death of Mr. Jesse Cunningham. Mr. Steele then entered into partnership with his sister, Mrs. Cunningham, under the firm-name Samuel Steele & Co., and carried on the business at the old place till 1869, when the partnership was amicably dissolved, and Mr. Steele sank a new yard, a few blocks higher up the hill, wherein he has since that time conducted business. In 1880 he took into partnership with himself his son William, under the firm-name of "Samuel Steele & Son."
Feb. 11, 1852, Mr. Steele married Miss Elizabeth A.
Conwell, of Brownsville, by whom he has had four sons and four daughters, all of whom are living.
In politics he was formerly an old-line Whig, and is now an ardent Republican. In religion he preserves the faith of his fathers, being a Presbyterian.
His wife and daughters are members of the Episcopal Church.

JOHN HERBERTSON.

John Herbertson, of Bridgeport, who has been for over fifty years one of the most active business men and substantial citizens of the borough in which he resides, was born in Glasgow, Scotland, Sept. 16, 1805.
In his childhood he attended the common schools, and had the good fortune to listen to many of the scientific lectures of the renowned Ure. At seventeen years of age he left home for America. Having spent some time in learning the joiners’ and cabinet-makers’ trades, and the law at that time forbidding mechanics to leave the realm, young Herbertson got his tools smuggled on board the “Commerce,” the ship on which he took passage, and which, after a voyage of five weeks and two days, landed him in New York, in July, 1823. He soon proceeded to Marietta, Ohio, to enter upon farming under the misrepresentations of one Nahum Ward, a great scamp, who by misrepresentations induced many people of Glasgow and elsewhere to leave their homes and settle upon his lands. At Marietta, Mr. Herbertson “acquired” little else than fever and rage, and moved, after a few months, to Pittsburgh, Pa., where he arrived in April, 1824. He lived in Pittsburgh about five years, meanwhile learning the trade of steam-engine building. In 1829 he engaged with John Snowdon, of Brownsville, as foreman in his engine-shop. He remained with Mr. Snowdon about seven years. During this time Mr. Snowdon took the contract for putting up the iron bridge over Dunlap’s Creek, believed to be the first iron bridge ever built in America, as it is the first of its kind ever built in any country. For this bridge Mr. Herbertson did all the head-work, and, in fact, all the mechanical work.
He designed the bridge, making the first drawing, which was sent on to West Point, and there accepted by the government construction engineers. He made the patterns, supervised the moulding, and also the erction of the bridge.

After the expiration of his engagement with Mr.
Snowdon he went into the business of engine-building with Thomas Faull, the firm-name being Faull & Herbertson. This was in 1837 or 1838. He continued business with Mr. Faull till 1842, when the latter withdrew, and Mr. Herbertson has ever since then carried on the business on the same site. He has built a large number of steamboat- and mill-engines.
His work has been ordered from distant parts of the United States and from Mexico. As a skilled mechanic and designer of mechanical work, but few men, if any, in his line have excelled him. At the age of seventy-six he takes active interest in his business, and with the aid of his sons, all thoroughly instructed in the business and competent to take their father’s place and let him wholly retire, if he would, he still carries on an extensive work, which, however, has, since September, 1880, been conducted by him in partnership with his sons, George S. and William H. Herbertson, and his son-in-law, William H. Ammon, and Mr. A. C. Cock, under the firm-name of John Herbertson & Co.

In politics Mr. Herbertson is a Republican, but has never taken active part as a politician; in fact, he has had no time to waste as such. No man’s reputation for integrity and the other virtues which go to make a noble and honorable man stands higher in his commonalty than that of Mr. Herbertson.

In 1839, Mr. Herbertson married Miss Eliza Nimon, daurther of Peter and Sarah Potts Nimon, of Pittsburgh, Pa. Mrs. Herbertson is living, and at the age of seventy is active and thoroughly superintends her domestic affairs.

They have been the parents of twelve children, five of whom are living.—Sarah, first married to J. W.
Kidney (deceased), and now the wife of A. J. Davis, of Pittsburgh; John P., who married Frances Marcus, of Bridgeport; Mary, the wife of William H.
Amon; George S., married to Sarah Bar, of Bridgeport; and William H. Herbertson.

WILLIAM CHATLAND.

Mr. William Chatland, of Brownsville, was born at Stratford-on-Avon, Warwickshire, England, June 9, 1811. He is the son of William Chatland, of Meriden, a borough six miles north of the city of Coventry, in the same shire, and of Priscilla Green Chatland, of Brier Hill, Staffordshire.

Mr. William Chatland, Sr., died in London about 1819, at the age of forty years, and some five years
subsequent to the death of his wife, which occurred in 1814. Mr. Chatland, who was but three years of age at the death of his mother, was placed in the charge of his grandmother, Mrs. Ann Chatland, by whom he was reared until about his tenth year, when his grandmother died. He was then taken by his uncle, Joseph Chatland, a prosperous baker of Coventry, with whom he resided until about his thirteenth year, and was then apprenticed to Daniel Claridge, a famous baker of Coventry at that time, to learn the art of baking in all its branches. He remained with Mr. Claridge for seven years. After the expiration of his apprenticeship he went to London, and there, during a period of three years and a half, occupied positions in two first-class houses of that city. After finishing his stay in London he returned to Coventry, established himself in the baker’s business, and married Miss Elizabeth Manton, the daughter of William Manton, a farmer of Berkswell, Warwickshire. He conducted business in Coventry for some six years, after which, and selling out, he migrated with his family—wife and three daughters—to the United States, arriving in New York April 29, 1844. In a few days thereafter he took the old “Binghame Line” for Pittsburgh, Pa. Tarrying there awhile prospecting, he eventually moved to the county-seat of Washington County, where he resided, carrying on both the baking and confectionery business, for about eight years, and in 1852 organized a company of fifteen persons to go with him by the overland route to California, where, at Sacramento, he bought out a baking business, which he conducted with great success until he was seized by fever and ague, and was compelled to leave the country. He returned to his family, who had remained meanwhile at Washington. Failing to find a suitable location for business in that town, he betook himself to Brownsville in 1854, where he has since resided, carrying on business by himself for about eighteen years, when he took into partnership his son-in-law, George W. Lenhart, the husband of his daughter Sarah. Under the firm-name of Chatland & Lenhart they do an extensive business, and enjoy the reputation of making the best water-cracker now in use. They manufacture products of every department of their trade.

Mrs. Elizabeth Chatland died at Brownsville, Jan. 28, 1874, in the sixty-first year of her age, leaving three daughters, all now living. Elizabeth, the eldest daughter, married Theodore A. Bosler, a son of Dr. Bosler, of Mechanicsburg, Pa., and now residing in Dayton, Ohio. Miss Mary Ann, the second daughter, resides with her father. Sarah Ann Kate, the youngest daughter, is the wife of Geo. W. Lenhart, before mentioned.

Mr. Chatland and his family are members of the Protestant Episcopal Church, he being now and for a long time having been a vestryman therein. Since 1848, Mr. Chatland has been a prominent member of the Masonic fraternity. He was District Deputy Grand Master for Pennsylvania for the space of fifteen years, District Deputy High Priest for sixteen years; also Eminent Commander of St. Omer’s Commandery, No. 7, held at Brownsville, for the period of about eighteen years. Mr. Chatland is justly proud of his record as a Mason.

WILLIAM H. MILLER.

William H. Miller, of Bridgeport, is of English Quaker descent on his paternal side. His great-great-grandfather, Solomon Miller, who was a miller by trade, was born in England, married there, and emigrated with his family to America prior to 1750, and settled in York County, Pa. Of his children was Robert Miller, who was born in York County, Pa., and in early manhood removed to Frederick County, near Frederick City, Md., and purchased a farm, and soon after married Miss Cassandra Wood, a Virginia lady, who lived near Winchester, Va. They resided upon the farm near Frederick City till 1796, when they removed to Berkeley County, Va., where they remained about three years, and then, in 1799, came into Fayette County and settled in Luzerne township, on a farm purchased of one Joseph Briggs, and now owned by Capt. Isaac Woodward. Residing there for several years, his wife meanwhile dying, Robert Miller eventually moved into Brownsville, and took up his residence on Front Street, upon property now belonging to the heirs of Thomas Morehouse, and there died about 1832. He was the father of four sons and four daughters, all of whom grew to maturity. Of these was William Miller, who was born Sept. 9, 1782, in Frederick County, Md. At the age of sixteen he became a clerk in a dry-goods store belonging to his uncle, William Wood, in New Market, Va., and in 1799 came with his father into Fayette County. He soon after took up the avocation of school-teaching, and pursued it near Berryopolis, in the old Friends’ Church, known as “Redstone Church,” in Bridgeport, on what was formerly called “Peace Hill,” and elsewhere. He followed teaching until 1810, when he married Miss Rebecca Johnson, daughter of Squire Daniel Johnson, of Menallen, and at once settled on a farm in that township, near New Salem, and lived there till March, 1837. He then removed to Brownsville and purchased a woolen-factory (no longer standing) and a flouring-mill; then standing on the site whereon is located the present flouring-mill of his son, W. H. Miller. He pursued milling till 1855, when he retired from business and led a private life until his death, which occurred June 7, 1866. Mrs. Rebecca Miller died Nov. 14, 1833, and in 1834 Mr. Miller married Ann Johnson, his first wife’s half-sister, who, childless herself, made a good mother for her sister’s children. She is still living, nearly eighty years of age, cheerful and buoyant in spirits.
Mr. William and Mrs. Rebecca Johnson Miller were the parents of nine children, all of whom grew to maturity, eight still living.—Warwick, born Dec. 11, 1811; Hiram, born Dec. 31, 1813; Sarah, born Sept. 7, 1816; Mary, born Feb. 5, 1819; Cassandra (deceased), born March 3, 1821; Lydia, born Jan. 14, 1823; Jane, born June 30, 1825; William H., born March 6, 1829; and Oliver, born Dec. 13, 1831.

William H. Miller, the eighth in the above list, was educated in the common, and the Friends' school, and learned the milling business, upon which he entered in partnership with his brother Oliver in 1855 in the mill before named, and which he and his brother inherited from their father. The partnership continued for five years, when Mr. Miller put the interest of his brother, who removed to a farm in Luzerne township. In January, 1866, a fire destroyed both the flouring-mill and the old woolen-factory before referred to. The buildings being uninsured the loss was total. Mr. Miller immediately put up a new and better building on the old site, and to this time conducts business therein. As is noted above, Mr. Miller's great-grandfather, Solomon, was a miller by trade, and from his day down to the present the trade has been practically and continuously represented by his descendants.

Mr. Miller has held several town and borough offices, and was for eight years director in the Deposit and Discount Bank of Brownsville, which two years ago gave up its charter, a portion of its stockholders uniting in the organization of the National Deposit Bank of Brownsville, of which bank Mr. William H. Miller is the president, the National Bank doing business in the same house formerly occupied by the bank of the place of which it took.

May 16, 1855, Mr. Miller married Miss Margaret J. Gibson, daughter of Alexander and Mary Hibbs Gibson, of Luzerne township. They have two children, —A. Gibson Miller, born Feb. 7, 1861, and Sarah Helen Miller.

Mr. Miller was brought up an Orthodox Friend, observing the faith of his fathers, but is now a member, as is also his wife, of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. In politics he is a Republican.

HON. JOHN L. DAWSON.

John L. Dawson was born in Uniontown on the 7th of February, 1813. When quite young he removed with his father's family to Brownsville, where he grew up and spent the greater part of his life. He was educated at Washington College, read law in Uniontown under the direction of his uncle, the Hon. John Dawson, and in due course was admitted to the bar and commenced the practice of his profession. Entering into politics at an early age, he soon took a leading part on the Democratic side in all current questions and controversies. In 1838 he was appointed by Governor Porter deputy attorney-general for Fayette County, and discharged the duties of the office with fidelity and ability. In 1843, President Polk appointed him United States district attorney for the Western District of Pennsylvania, which office he held during the whole of Polk's administration, and discharged its duties with signal ability. He was a delegate to the Democratic National Conventions of 1844, 1848, 1856, and 1860. During the Kansas troubles President Pierce tendered him the Governorship of that Territory, but he declined to accept it.

In 1848, Mr. Dawson was the candidate of the Democratic party for member of Congress in the district then composed of Fayette, Greene, and Somerset Counties, but was defeated by his competitor, the Hon. A. J. Ogle, of Somerset. He was renominated in 1856, and triumphantly elected, the first and only time that district was carried by the Democrats. In 1852 he was again nominated for member of Congress, and was elected, the district then being composed of Fayette, Washington, and Greene Counties. At the end of this term he declined to re-enter the congressional arena, and remained in private life until 1862, when he was again elected to Congress, and re-elected in 1864, both these elections being for the district composed of the counties of Fayette, Westmoreland, and Indiana. Soon after his entrance into Congress he introduced the Homestead bill, which had previously been defeated, and with the addition of a number of important provisions, originated by himself, he advocated the measure with great earnestness, eloquence, and ability, and continued to advocate it until he had the gratification of seeing it become a law. In the Thirty-eighth Congress he was a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. At the close of his term in the Thirty-ninth Congress, Mr. Dawson's public career ended. He had previously purchased the property formerly owned and occupied by the Hon. Albert Gallatin, in Springhill township, Fayette Co., and there he resided with his family during the remainder of his life. He died at his residence, "Friendship Hill," on the 18th of September, 1870, in the fifty-eighth year of his age. At his death the Cincinnati Enquirer gave the following deserved tribute to his memory:

"He belonged to a school of great, good, and useful men, but a few of whom linger now to adorn and serve a country whose name their genius contributed so much to make glorious, and whose prosperity and happiness their wisdom and integrity ever sought to promote. Among political philosophers and practical statesmen, he was one of our profoundest thinkers. As an orator, whether on the mission of persuasion or conviction, he had but few rivals; and as a private citizen, his exalted character was without a blemish. His career in Congress was in every respect brilliant. The private friendships he there contracted, even in the face of the bitterest prejudices, the lapse of years served only to strengthen and brighten, and the public record that he made is a proud heritage for his family, and a shining example for future statesmen, and must grow brighter and brighter as time reveals—as reveal more and more each revolving year it surely will—the soundness of his judgment, the breadth of his comprehension, the clearness of his foresight, and the truth of his predictions. Always dignified, debonair, and dispassionate in debate, no eruptions of temper ever ruffled the calm surface of his vigorous intellect. Endowed with an impressive and imposing presence, and those rare and peculiar gifts so prominently adapted to ad eptetudum discussion, he was not more honored by his own party as a leader than he was dreaded by the opposition as an adversary. The loss of such a man as John L. Dawson amounts to a national calamity."

BRIDGEPORT BOROUGH AND TOWNSHIP.

BRIDGEPORT—borough and township, both covering the same area and lying within the same limits—is situated on the right bank of the Monongahela, extending up the river from the mouth of Dunlap's Creek. The latter stream forms its eastern and the river its northwestern boundary. On its other sides it is bounded by the township of Luzerne, from Dunlap's Creek to the river.

For a period of more than half a century prior to the time when travel and traffic became diverted by the opening of the railway lines in Western Pennsylvania this town was a point of great comparative importance as a place of manufacturing industries, of flat-boat, keel-boat, and steamboat building, and as (practically) the head of steamboat navigation on the river. By reason of the lack of railway facilities, for many years Bridgeport lost much of its relative importance, but it is still one of the principal business-points on the Monongahela, and the recent opening (in the spring of 1881) of the Pittsburgh, Virginia and Charleston Railroad line from Pittsburgh to West Brownsville cannot fail to add materially to its prosperity. Its population by the United States census of 1880 was 1134.

EARLY SETTLEMENTS AND INDUSTRIES.

Within the territory now embraced in the limits of the borough and township of Bridgeport the earliest landholder of whom any account is found was Capt. Lemuel Barrett, a native of Maryland, who, in 1763, obtained "a military permit from the commandant at Fort Pitt, for the purpose of cultivating lands within the custom limits of the garrison then called Fort Burt," the military work which had been built four years earlier on the other side of Dunlap's Creek. The land embraced in this "military permit" was the site of the town of Bridgeport, but no patent covering it was ever issued to Barrett, nor did he ever hold any title to it under Pennsylvania warrant or Virginia certificate, his being merely a "claim" which the later owner of the land thought it expedient to purchase in order to secure an unquestioned title. In fact, there were other claims, resulting from the same class of military permits, which adjoined and to some extent overlapped and conflicted with that of Barrett. These were chiefly above and south of the present territory of Bridgeport borough, yet there was one, Angus McDonald, 2

2 "The land just above Bridgeport, on the river, embracing some three or four hundred acres, was in early times," says Judge Veitch, "the subject of long and angry controversies—from 1760 to 1785—between adverse claimants under military permits. It was well named in the official survey which one of the parties procured it under a Pennsylvania location 'Bear of Contention.' One Angus McDonald claimed it, or part of it, under a military permit from Col. Bouquet, dated April 26, 1763, and a settlement on it. In March, 1770, he sold his claim to Capt. Luke Collins, describing the land as 'a place called Fort Burt,' to include the field cleared by me where the survey-pit (doubtless a survey-pit constructed by Col. Barrett's men when building the fort) was, above the mouth of Dunlap's [Dunlap's] Creek. Collins conveyed it to Capt. Michael Creap, on the 15th of April, 1772, at half-past nine in the morning, describing it as situata between Point Lookout and John Martin's land, recently owned by us, by the late Mrs. John S. Creap's executors in June, 1774, conveyed to one William Schaefer, an old Brownsville merchant, who conveyed to Rees Cautalider. The adverse claimants were Henry Shyrock [of Frederick County, Md.] and William Shearer, assignee of George Andrew. Their claim reached farther southward to the creek, and farther up the river, covering the John Martin land. They sold out to Robert Amos and Thomas Shain. Although they had the oldest permit (in 1760) their title seems to have been overcome by the settlement and official location and survey of their adversary.

"One Robert Thorn seems also to have been a claimant of part of the land, but Collins bought him out. This protracted controversy involved many curious questions, and called up many ancient recollections. Doubt the visit to this locality of Mr. Deputy sheriff Woods, of Bedford, in 1771, was partial of this controversy. Many of these early claims were lost or forfeited by neglect to settle the land according to law, and thus were supplanted by others. They were valued by their owners at a very low mark, and often sold for trifling sums.

"These settlements by virtue of military permits began about this period—from 1760 to 1765—to be somewhat numerous in the vicinity of Fort Pitt and Burt, and along the army roads leading thereto. They were subsequently recognized as valid by the Penns even before they had bought out the Indian title. This was a departure from their general policy, required to maintain those forts and keep up access to them. They were indeed regarded as mere appendages to the forts, and as accessories to the trade and intercourse with the Indians, and not as per-who asserted his ownership, under such claim, of lands embracing a considerable part of the land now embraced in Bridgeport.

In 1783, Rees Cadwalader acquired by purchase the claims of both Angus McDonald (which in the mean time had passed through several intermediate hands) and of Capt. Lennell Barrett to the lands now embraced in the borough of Bridgeport. He had already taken steps to obtain a title under the State of Pennsylvania, and received a warrant of survey which secured it, but the patent did not issue to him until Oct. 1, 1787. The name of the tract, as mentioned in the warrant and patent, was "Peace," a very appropriate designation to give it in token of the final settlement of the conflict of claims to it and contiguous territory.

Rees Cadwalader was then the first permanent settler in what is now the borough of Bridgeport. His residence was on the bank of Dunlap's Creek, and farther up that stream he built a mill, where the "Prospect Mills" of William H. Miller now stand. The race started from the creek, at a log dam located where the present dam is, and ran round the foot of the hill to the mill. Another mill was built soon afterwards by Jonah Cadwalader at the point where Harvey Leonard's saw-mill now stands, on the creek at the borough line.

Isaac Rogers came from Chester County, Pa., to Bridgeport about 1795, and erected a dwelling where John Springer's warehouse now stands. He was a merchant, and opened a store in a frame building that stood on the lot now occupied by Joseph Rogers. About 1804 he went into business with Rees Cadwalader, in a store that stood on a lot now vacant, opposite Dr. Hubbs' drug-store. He was also a justice of the peace for years. He had five children. His only son, Thomas, studied law in Unions town with John Lyon, was admitted to the bar in 1822, and practiced in that town for several years. He was captain of the "Jackson Artillirists," and was accidentally killed while on the way to take part in an encampment of troops at Pittsburgh. His sister, Affinity Rogers (second daughter of Isaac), became the wife of Samuel B. Page (a son of Jonathan Page, of Connellsville), who came to Bridgeport in 1826. Some years after the death of his wife he married Mary, another daughter of Isaac Rogers. He (Page) was by trade a shoemaker, and started a shoemaker's shop in Bridgeport in 1837. For a few years after his coming to Bridgeport he worked at his trade and also kept a shoe-store. In 1832 he went as a clerk on one of the river steamboats. He afterwards became a builder and owner of steamboats, which ran on the Monongahela and Ohio, and by his activity and enterprise accumulated considerable property. In 1843 he purchased David Binns' place on the hill, and lived there until 1881, when he sold to Levi Colvin. In 1856 he was elected member of Assembly. He died in July, 1878. His widow now resides in Brownsville.

The town of Bridgeport was laid out by Rees Cadwalader in 1794. The first sales of lots in the town were made by him, late in the year 1795, and after that they were sold with considerable rapidity. On the 3d of November, in the year mentioned, he conveyed "to the Citizens of Bridgeport a plat of land for a public ground, commencing at the North West extremity of Bank Street, and running along said street one hundred and sixty-five feet to Water Street, and up Water Street to —— Street, along said street one hundred and forty-eight feet to the Monongahela River."

In June, 1796, Rees Cadwalader, Jonas Cattle (Cattell?), and Obed Garwood, of Fayette County, and Amos Hough, of Washington County, sold to Samuel Jackson, John Dixon, and William Dixon, of Fayette County, and Ebenezer Walker, of Westmoreland County, "Trustees in behalf of the People called Quakers," eight acres of land, which had been patented to Andrew Gudgel, June 10, 1788, and by him sold on the 18th of October following to Rees Cadwalader and the other grantors above named.

Feb. 29, 1799, Rees Cadwalader sold to the Friends' society three acres of land in Bridgeport, comprising the Quaker grounds on the hill, on a part of which the present union school-house stands. On this plat was set apart the earliest burial-ground of Bridgeport.

Rees Cadwalader died a few years after the commencement of the present century, and a large number of town lots then remaining unsold passed to the possession of his heirs. His sons emigrated to Zanesville, Ohio, some years afterwards, and none of his descendants are now living in Bridgeport or vicinity.

Robert Rogers, who was for a period of almost sixty years a well-known and enterprising citizen of Bridgeport and Brownsville, was a nephew of Isaac Rogers, whose settlement in Bridgeport about 1795 is noticed above. Robert was born in Queen Anne County, Md., Jan. 15, 1794, and after the death of his father, in 1806, lived with an uncle until the fall of 1807. At that time another uncle (Lambert Boyer), who had settled in Washington County, Pa., visited Maryland, and it was decided that Robert Rogers should return with him to the West. They accordingly set out on their long journey across the mountains, having only one horse for the two travelers. This "ride-and-tie" method of journeying (in which doubtless the boy Robert performed most of the pedestrian part) was a slow process, but they finally reached that important point in the western bound travel of that day,—the mouth of Dunlap's Creek. This for Robert was the end of the journey, for here he found his uncle, Isaac Rogers, with whom it was decided he should moment settlements for home and subsistence. The Monongahela River below Fort Bard, being in fact an army highway, came in for a share of these favors. Their aggregate was few, and they were often far between."

remain,—his uncle Boyer proceeding on to his home west of the Monongahela.

On his arrival at Bridgeport young Robert Rogers was placed in the store of his uncle Isaac, and also attended school during the small portion of the time in which schools were then taught at this place. In the fall of 1809 he was apprenticed in Bridgeport to Cephas Gregg 1 (who had himself just completed his apprenticeship with Jacob Webb) to learn the trade of potter. “I continued work” [says Mr. Rogers] “at my trade as apprentice till the middle of January, 1815, when I was twenty-one. Then I left Bridgeport on a flat-boat, and went to Pittsburgh for work.” The night before he started on this trip from Bridgeport there was a deep fall of snow. The river was so low that on arriving, in the middle of the night, at Baldwin’s mill-dam, near Cookstown (Fayette City), and attempting to run the chute, the boat struck on the rocks, “and, being iron-loaded, sunk immediately and we had to climb on the roof, which was still out of water.” Some of Baldwin’s people came with a boat and took them off, and they stayed at the house until morning, but nearly perished of cold. This was on the Fayette County side of the river. In the morning Rogers and others started down the river on foot, and after a most fatiguing day’s travel reached Elizabethtown in the evening. The next day he walked to Pittsburgh, and there “obtained employment in a queensware factory at the head of ‘Hog Pond’ [between Grant and Smithfield Streets], lately established by a Scotchman from Edinboro’ named Trotter [a man ‘who was seven feet tall in his boots, and being rather slim looked even taller’]. Queensware was scarce, and ours sold readily and high, common yellow cups and saucers at one dollar per set, and heavy, clumsy ones they were.” The diary continues: “This spring [1815], while working in Pittsburgh, news came of the treaty of Ghent and the battle of New Orleans, in consequence the town was illuminated. Soon after peace foreign ware began to come in, and we could not compete. . . . I returned to Bridgeport and Trotter to Scotland. . . . On my arrival at Bridgeport I went to work with John Riley (who was carrying on another shop from the one I learned my trade in), and continued with him till late in the fall of 1815. . . .” Then he was employed on a steamboat on the river; visited New Orleans in the spring of 1816; in the following fall returned to Bridgeport, where he was married in October of that year, and “undertook to carry on the shop for Cephas Gregg on shares.” In the spring of 1818 he again went on the river, but soon returned to Bridgeport, and during the almost half-century of his subsequent life was prominent in matters of business enterprise, both in Bridgeport and Brownsville, to which last-named place he removed his residence in April, 1834. He died of paralysis on the 27th of January, 1866, aged seventy-two years.

The journal of Robert Rogers, from which extracts have been given above, contains the following remarks, having reference to the business of Bridgeport from the time of his arrival there in 1807, viz.: “It was some time after this that the National road was built from Cumberland west, and there was great emigration from the Eastern States and from Europe. They crossed the mountains and came to Redstone Old Fort, and the road was so long and rough that the emigrants would be so tired when they got here that they seldom went beyond this by land, but mostly in flat-boats called arks, floating only with the current. These were mostly twenty to fifty feet long, and twelve to sixteen feet wide, put together with wooden pins (no spikes in use), generally poplar gunwales, roof of thin boards, doubled and bent, and fastened with wooden pins. . . . It was big business here to supply emigrants with these boats, provisions, farming implements, and housekeeping articles to take with them. When the National road was completed to the Monongahela River, the arrivals of emigrants [meaning those who stopped here to construct or purchase boats] was very great for several years; but after the road was extended then emigration was divided, some taking that route. In the early days there were considerable quantities of flour and apples shipped hence to New Orleans in large flats. It took a long time to make this trip, as the river was not then well known, and they could not run at night. Country produce was then very low here, and merchants and mechanics had a good time, as living was very cheap.

“About 1811, Daniel French arrived here from Philadelphia with big schemes of manufacturing, steamboat building, and navigating Western waters. He told people great advantages would accrue, and induced many prominent citizens to subscribe to stock for a cotton manufactory and two steamboats, all new to people here; but they were wise enough to secure charters for each company, viz., one for the factory and one for steamboats, and, as they felt a deep interest and believed French, the people subscribed liberally to both. Work commenced, but the enterprise was new to all, and it was a long time before it was completed. And when they were ready there was no one experienced in running factories or steamboats, and neither enterprise made money, but run in debt, and the factory was sold by the sheriff, and the boats were sold by the company after they had run them as long as there seemed any hope of profit.” The building and operation of the old factory and the company’s two steamboats will be more fully mentioned in another place in this history.

1 Cephas Gregg’s pottery-works were located where the new brick house of Seaborn Crawford now stands. They were afterwards carried on by Robert Rogers, with his other business, for about thirty years.

2 In a diary of his which is still in existence, and from which these extracts in reference to him are made,
INCORPORATION OF THE BOROUGH AND ERECTION OF THE TOWNSHIP OF BRIDGEPORT.

The incorporation of Bridgeport as a borough was effected by an act of Assembly approved March 9, 1814, by which it was provided and declared "That the town of Bridgeport, in the county of Fayette, shall be and the same is hereby erected into a borough, which shall be called the borough of Bridgeport, which borough shall be comprised within the following boundaries, to wit: Beginning at the mouth of Dunlap's Creek; thence up the Monongahela River with the several meanders thereof one hundred and forty-eight perches; thence leaving the river . . . [and proceeding by a number of described courses and distances] . . . to the north abutment of Jonah Cadwallader's mill-dam; thence down the meanders of Dunlap's Creek to the place of beginning."

The second Tuesday in May next following was designated in the act as the day for holding the first borough election. The meeting was held accordingly, and resulted in the election of the following-named persons as the first officers of the borough of Bridgeport: Burgess, Samuel Jones; Councilmen, John Cock, Joseph Truman, Enos Grave, Morris Truman, John Bentley, William Cock. The reason why the full number of (nine) councilmen was not elected does not appear.

At the April sessions of the Fayette County court in 1815 a petition of citizens of Bridgeport borough was presented, praying that the said borough be erected into a township. Upon this petition the court appointed Charles Porter, Israel Gregg, and William Ewing commissioners to inquire into and report on the propriety of granting the prayer of the petitioners. At the August sessions next following the committee submitted a favorable report, which was approved, and at the November term in the same year the court confirmed the proceedings and issued an order erecting the "township of the borough of Bridgeport" its boundaries being the same as those of Bridgeport borough.

LIST OF TOWNSHIP AND BOROUGH OFFICERS.

Following is a list of the officers of the borough and township of Bridgeport from their organization to the present time. The following description of Bridgeport in 1821 is found in “The Navigator,” a book published in Pittsburgh in that year, containing directions to pilots on the Monongahela and other rivers, with references to the towns and settlements located on their banks:

“Dunlap’s Creek.

“Here has been a fish-dam; the chute is near the middle of the river. Immediately above the month of this creek stands Bridgeport, a small village, connected with Brownsville by a chain-bridge over the creek. In it are several mercantile stores, an earthen pottery, a tan-yard, a wire-waver, card-maker, hatters, a boat-yard, and a market-house. It contains fifty-six dwellings. A glass-works, commenced in October, 1811, for the making of green glass."

MARKET-HOUSE.

A public market-house was built in Bridgeport a number of years before the town became a borough. Soon after the incorporation, on the 8th of July, 1814, the Council directed that necessary repairs be made on the market-house. On the 22d of the same month an ordinance was passed declaring "that from and after the first day of the ninth month next a market shall be established and held in the Market-House of this Borough, on the fourth and seventh days of each week, and from daylight until nine o'clock A.M. on each of said days in the first, second, third, tenth, eleventh, and twelfth months, and from daylight until eight o'clock A.M. on each of said days in the fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, and ninth months." The stalls on the north side of the building were ordered rented to butchers, at a yearly rent of five dollars. On the 20th of September, 1814, the Council ordered the erection of an addition to the market-house eight feet in width, and extending the whole length of the building. "Twenty feet of Rack, for the convenience of Market people to hitch their horses," was also ordered to be built.

The old market-house was sold to D. H. Chalfant, July 4, 1829, for ten dollars, twelve and a half cents. On the 20th of October, 1831, there was presented to the Council a petition signed by seventy citizens, praying for the erection of a new market-house. On this petition a committee was appointed (October 22d) to examine and report on a suitable site, also on the proper size and estimated expense of such market-house. This committee reported the public ground as the proper place, and recommended a building sixty-two feet six inches by thirty feet in dimensions. The report was adopted and a building committee appointed, who reported Nov. 24, 1831, that the stonework was contracted for, and March 15, 1832, reported contract for lumber and lath let to Bracken & Rogers. The building was completed and occupied in the fall of 1832. This market-house is still (November, 1881) standing, the main part of the building being used as a town hall and council-room.

PUBLIC WAREHOUSE AND WHARF.

On the 26th of April, 1815, the Borough Council granted to Israel Gregg for the term of ten years a part of the public ground, on which to erect a frame building for a warehouse fifty by twenty-five feet on the ground, and one and a half stories high, to contain a fireplace, a chimney of brick, and a small counting room, the building to become the property of the borough at the end of ten years. It did so revert at the end of that time.

In 1826 a committee was appointed by the Council to repair the building and rent it. This was done, and on the 30th of December in that year it was rented to Benedict Kimber at $20 per annum from April 1, 1827. On the 1st of April, 1829, it was rented for one year to Charles McCollister. In May, 1831, it was rented to Joshua Armstrong for one year at $20, but before the expiration of the time (in February, 1832) it was rented to Randolph Dearth for one year at $90. Jan. 16, 1837, Thomas Acklin rented the warehouse for two years at $40 per annum.

In 1844 the warehouse was sold, to be removed to give room for the building of a wharf. The contract for building the wharf was given to Henry Marshall, and it was erected in 1845, at a cost of $863.54.

In August of that year the Council fixed the first rates of wharfage for steamboats, viz.: one dollar per trip, and fifty cents per day when laying over in a navigable stage of the river, and five dollars per month in winter. Keel-boats, twenty-five cents per landing or per day.

The wharf is still public property, under control of the borough.

FERRIES AND BRIDGE OVER THE MONONGAHELA.

The first ferry across the Monongahela River within the boundaries of Bridgeport was established by John Krepps before 1794, as the court records of Fayette County show that in that year a petition was presented for "a road from Krepps' Ferry to the bridge at the mouth of Dunlap's Creek." The ferry landing on the Bridgeport side of the river was at or very near the foot of Spring Street (or Alley), northeast of the residence of Solomon G. Krepps. This ferry remained in operation until some time after the completion of the Monongahela bridge, and towards the last of its existence a ferry-boat propelled by steam was used upon it.

The original owner of this ferry, John Krepps, always lived on the west side of the Monongahela; but his sons, Samuel J. and Solomon G. Krepps, settled on the east side of the river, the latter being a resident of Bridgeport as early as 1813, when he built the brick house which is now the residence of his nephew (his brother Samuel's son), Solomon G. Krepps. He (Solomon G. the elder) was a merchant in Bridgeport in 1816, as is shown by the assessment-roll of that year. He lived in Bridgeport until his death, and was for many years one of the prominent citizens of the place. In 1832 he, with Zephaniah Carter, built the "Friendship Paper-Mill" in Bridgeport, but died soon after, and before the mill was in full and successful operation. He served one term in the State Legislature, and was several times elected Burgess of Bridgeport; also served as a member of the Borough Council. His brother, Samuel J. Krepps, settled in Bridgeport about 1823, where Eli Leonard now lives, and carried on the saw-mill at the Jonah Cadwallader dam on Dunlap's Creek, also operating the coal-banks on that property. In 1832 he built a residence in Brownsville (the same which is now kept as the "Monongahela House") by the widow of his son, John B. Krepps, and removed to it. In 1834 he built the "Valley Mills" on Dunlap's Creek, in Bridgeport. He, like his brother, Solomon G. Krepps, was a prominent and public-spirited citizen, and identified with the business interests of both boroughs for many years. About 1846 he removed to the old Krepps homestead, west of the Monongahela, and soon afterwards to the Neal Gillespie farm, where he died March 6, 1866. In 1854 he was elected to the Legislature from Washington County.

The other children of the old ferry-owner, John Krepps, were John, who lived and died in West Brownsville; Christian, who went West, and whose subsequent history is unknown; and Helen, who became the wife of Judge Eli Miller, of Mount Vernon, Ohio.

The Gillespie ferry, which was first established to cross the river from Brownsville, was moved up from there in or about 1820, and located near the foot of Bridge Street in Bridgeport. This was kept in operation till after the opening of the Monongahela bridge. On the 22d of February, 1825, application was made to the Council of Bridgeport for the privilege of a ferry landing between the east side of Bank Street and the west side of the public lot for the term of five years, and on the 8d of March the ground was rented for that period at five dollars per year to Moses Durkel, concerning whose occupancy no further information has been obtained.

There was no communication by bridge across the Monongahela River at Bridgeport until the year 1833, all traffic and travel across the stream at this point being accommodated by the ferries up to that time. More than twenty years earlier, however, the project of bridging the river at some point near the mouth of Dunlap's Creek was agitated by some of the most prominent men of the vicinity on both sides of the river. In 1810 an act was passed (approved March 20th in that year) "to authorize the Governor to incorporate a company for erecting a bridge over the Monongahela River at or near where the road leading from Brownsville to the town of Washington crosses the same," thus authorizing the location of the bridge at Brownsville or Bridgeport as might be decided on. The act designated and appointed "Neal Gillespie, jr., Parker Campbell and Thomas Acheson, of the county of Washington, Jacob Bowman, Thomas Mason, Charles Shaffer, Samuel Jackson, David Swing, and Michael Sowers, of the county of Fayette," commissioners to receive subscriptions to the stock of the company to be formed. It was provided and required by the act that the bridge should be so constructed as not to obstruct navigation (except so far as might be done by the erection of the two abutments and three piers in the river), "or in any manner to obstruct the passage over the usual ford-place, which shall at all times be open as heretofore to persons desirous of passing through the same." The company was of course authorized to collect tolls. The bridge to be commenced in three years, and finished in seven years from the passage of the act, under penalty of forfeiture of rights and franchises. References to the probable early commencement and completion of the bridge are found in the newspapers of that time, but no work was ever actually done on it, nor does it appear that the bridge site was definitely determined on, or the necessary amount of stock subscribed.

On the 16th of March, 1830, the Monongahela Bridge Company was incorporated, with a capital of $44,000. The corporators were George Hogg, James L. Bowman, Valentine Giesey, and Robert Clarke, of Fayette County, Daniel Moore, Jesse Kenworthy, Ephraim L. Blaine, John Kingland, and Thomas McKennan, of Washington County. By the terms of the incorporation William Davidson, George Craft, Isaac Meason, and Andrew Oliphant, of Fayette County, and John Park, Jr., William Berry, and John Watson, of Washington County, were appointed commissioners to locate the site of the bridge. These men, taking into consideration the great amount of travel and traffic then coming to the river over the National road, fixed the location at the point where that road strikes the river in Bridgeport, and where the bridge now spans the stream.

Books were opened for subscriptions to the stock in July, 1830, and the requisite amount was soon obtained. The contract for building was awarded to Messrs. Le Baron & De Mond, at $82,000, with $5000 additional for the approaches. They commenced work in the fall of 1831, and on the 23d of November received the first payment of $8500 on the contract. Apparently the work was not pushed very vigorously, for the bridge was not completed until 1832, the first tolls being received on the 14th of October in that year.

The bridge is a covered structure of wood, six hundred and thirty feet in length, in three spans, standing on two piers in the river between the abutments. For almost half a century it has stood firm against the ice and the numerous great floods in the Monongahela, the most remarkable of which was, perhaps, that which reached its most dangerous point on the 6th of April, 1852. The bridge has always been a very profitable investment to the stockholders, but more particularly so in the palm days of the National road, before the railways had diverted its travel and traffic into other channels.

This fact, with many others noted in these pages, was obtained from the diary of that veteran citizen of Bridgeport and Brownsville, Robert Rogers.
The first officers of the company were George Hogg, president; Thomas McKennan, secretary; James L. Bowman, treasurer. Mr. Hogg was succeeded in the presidency by James L. Bowman, whose successor is George E. Hogg. The following-named gentlemen are the present (1881) officers: Managers, George E. Hogg (president), J. W. Jeffries, Capt. Adam Jacobs, Eli J. Bailey, N. B. Bowman, Joseph T. Rogers, George W. Lenhart; Secretary and Treasurer, William Ledwith.

The several bridges built across Dunlap's Creek, connecting Bridgeport and Brownsville, have been noticed in the history of the last-named borough.

STEAMBOAT AND KEEL-BOAT BUILDING.

In the extracts given in preceding pages from the journal of Robert Rogers it is narrated that about the year 1811 Daniel French came from Philadelphia to Bridgeport, "with big schemes of manufacturing, steamboat building, and navigating Western waters," and that some of the most influential and well-to-do citizens of Bridgeport, Brownsville, and the vicinity became so impressed with the apparent feasibility of his projects that they subscribed liberally to the stock of two companies which were formed, one for manufacturing, and the other for the building and running of steamboats.

The latter company commenced operations without much delay, building two steamboats, the "Enterprise" and the "Dispatch." The former was built under the superintendence of Israel Gregg, Henry M. Shreve, and Daniel French, on the bank of the river, above Dunlap's Creek, the ground on which Gregg built in the next year the warehouse which afterwards came into possession of the borough. The "Dispatch" was built on the spot where the "Monument Mills" of Mason, Rogers & Co. now stand. The engines of both the "Enterprise" and "Dispatch" were built by Daniel French. The career of the former boat is thus mentioned in the journal of Mr. Rogers:

"In 1814 the largest of the two boats (the 'Enterprise') was sent to New Orleans, with Henry M. Shreve as captain. She arrived there when Gen. Jackson's army was there, and was pressed into government service to carry troops and stores, and continued to do so till the close of the war. Then Shreve started with her for Pittsburgh with considerable money, but on the way up the boat was robbed (as he said) of all her money. She finally arrived at Pittsburgh, and the company got possession of her again. Then they employed Israel Gregg as captain. He ran her for a time, but made no money, though freight and passage was high. The company then chartered her to James Tomlinson, who put his son-

1 A son of Col. Israel Shreve, who commanded a regiment of New Jersey troops in the Continental Line in the war of the Revolution, and who, after the close of the war, emigrated from that State to Fayette County, Pa., landing in what is now the township of Perry, on lands purchased by him from Gen. Washington.
Livingston, United States marshal of that district, who notified the engineer in charge that he (Livingston) and Robert Fulton had the exclusive right to navigate the waters of Louisiana with steamboats, and they would not permit that right to be infringed. But the master of the "Dispatch" pleaded ignorance of that fact, and promised to leave Louisiana and not return, upon which he was permitted to depart with the boat without prosecution.

But it would appear that they did not live up to the agreement, for the journal says they "then took in freight and passengers, and started for Alexandria, at the rapids of the Red River," whence after discharging they started on the return trip to Pittsburgh. The boat was small and weak, and so made slow progress against the current of the Mississippi, though some advantage was gained by her light draft of water, on which account she "could run close in shore and around the willow banks." Arriving at the Falls of the Ohio the water was found to be low, so that the boat was hauled by a slow and laborious process up the rapids close into the Kentucky shore.

"It was late in the summer," says the journal, "when we arrived at Pittsburgh, and our trip being so long in making that we did not save any money. I acted as clerk and first engineer on the trip from Louisville to New Orleans and back to Pittsburgh. On the whole route from New Orleans to Pittsburgh we were not passed by a steamboat, nor did we meet a boat on the Ohio. There were then in existence the following boats, 'New Orleans,' 'Etna,' 'Vesuvius,' and 'Buffalo,' on the Mississippi River. I do not remember seeing any on the Ohio." And in writing of a trip which he made two years later (1818) down the Monongahela and Ohio on a flat-boat, Mr. Rogers says, "I saw no steamboat from the time I left Brownsville till I reached Louisville."

In 1825, Robert Rogers, Cephas Gregg, Abram Kimber, and others built the steamboat "Reindeer." She was built in John Cock's boat-yard, a short distance above where Mason Rogers & Co.'s flouring-mill now stands, and was launched on Christmasday in the year mentioned. Upon her completion she was placed under command of Capt. Abram Kimber, and ran for some years on the Ohio, between Pittsburgh and Louisville, Ky.

About 1826, Abel Coffin and Michael Miller commenced the building of keel-boats in Bridgeport on an extended scale, and an almost incredible number of them were turned out by these builders. John Cock also built large numbers of them, and he as well as Coffin and Miller built some steamboats. In 1827, Mr. Cock built for James May, of Pittsburgh, the two Ohio River steamers, "Erie" and "Shamrock." Coffin and Miller built the "Reindeer" (second of that name), the "Mountaineer," the "Champion" (Capt. Thomas Sloan), and many others.

John S. Pringle (now living in West Brownsville at the age of about seventy-five years, and who has been the builder of more boats than any other person on the Monongahela River) came to this place from the eastern part of the State in 1826. The first boat on which he worked here was the "Highlander," built by Robert Rogers, on a spot opposite the saw-mill on Water Street. John Herbertson also worked on the same vessel. In the early part of 1828, John S. Pringle built for Robert Rogers and Samuel Clarke a flat-bottomed boat called the "Visitor," which ran the following summer from Pittsburgh to Louisville, and made a remarkable success, earning two thousand dollars more than her entire cost during that one season, and was then sold at two thousand dollars advance on her cost. The success of this boat caused the building of others of similar construction by Mr. Pringle. He established a boat-yard where Mrs. William Cook now lives. There he built a great number of steamers and other river craft, continuing in the business at that place till 1843, when he purchased from Ephraim Blaine the site of his present yard in West Brownsville. It is stated that Mr. Pringle has built at his yards on both sides of the river more than five hundred steamboats, besides a great number of barges and other small craft. He has not unfrequently had three or four steamer hulls on the stocks at one and the same time. The largest boat ever built by him was the "Illinois," three hundred and eight feet long and seventy-two feet beam, which was floated down the river on high water to Pittsburgh to receive her engines. Mr. Pringle built the first tow-boat on the river, the "Coal Hill," and afterwards built twenty-five more of the same model and construction.

MANUFACTURING ESTABLISHMENTS.
THE OLD "BRIDGEPORT STEEL-WORKS."

In or about the year 1810 Morris Truman with his three sons,—Morris, Jr., Joseph, and James,—all Quakers, came from Philadelphia to Bridgeport, where they erected and put in operation works for the manufacture of steel, where James Aubrey now lives. They afterwards built also a machine and engine-shop where is now the brick house of Mr. Dougherty. The precise date of the starting of the steel-works is not known, but that they were in operation in the early part of 1811 is shown by a communication found in the "Pittsburgh Magazine Almanac" of that year, and of which the following is a copy:

"CROSS CREEK, July 1, 1811.

MESSRS. PRINTERS:

"I have been accustomed to making various kinds of edge tools for forty years, and have no hesitation in pronouncing the steel made by Morris Truman & Co. equal to any imported or made elsewhere.

"J. MARSHALL."

In the same Almanac for the year 1813 it is mentioned that "the steel manufactory of Morris Truman, which was started about eighteen months since, is doing well, and is capable of furnishing seventy tons of good steel annually." The steel-works were abandoned about the year 1825. From their machine-shop the Messrs. Truman turned out the engines of the "Reindeer," the "Mountaineer," and other steamers, and did an extensive business in that line. They were men of education and of great mechanical ability. Morris (Jr.) and Joseph Truman were bachelors, James was a justice of the peace for some years, and all of the three brothers were at times members of the Borough Council. They died in Bridgeport, where many years of their lives were spent.

THE BRIDGEPORT GLASS-WORKS.

The old glass-works in Bridgeport were built and put in operation in 1811 by a joint-stock company, composed of John Troth, Henry Mimbart, Isaac Van Hook, and their associates. The works embraced a main building about fifty-five feet square, and several smaller buildings near it, all located on the lots afterwards occupied by the distillery of John Hopkins, and still later owned by Edward Toynbee.

The company and their successors continued the manufacture of glass with varying success till about 1840. The works were rented for some years by Benedict Kimber, who was very successful, accumulating a small fortune, which, however, he afterwards lost in the building of boats. After his failure he again ran the glass-works, but was not as successful as before, and finally the works ceased to be used for their original purpose. On the 4th of May, 1847, Samuel B. Page transferred to the borough "the four lots formerly held by the Bridgeport Glass-Works," for which he was released from all borough taxes for the period of ten years.

THE BRIDGEPORT MANUFACTURING COMPANY'S COTTON-FACTORY.

The formation of this company and the erection of its cotton-factory in Bridgeport nearly seventy years ago was promoted by the representations of Daniel French, who came here from Philadelphia about the year 1811, and advocated his industrial schemes with so much enthusiasm that the people were induced to subscribe liberally to enterprises for manufacturing and steamboating, as has been narrated on preceding pages in an extract from the journal of Robert Rogers.

The date of the commencement of work in the erection of the cotton-factory has not been ascertained, but that it was before 1814 is shown by the following extract from the "Pittsburgh Magazine Almanac" for that year, referring to Bridgeport, viz.: "...There is also a large cotton-manufacturing building, in which they intend to use steam-power;" and also from an advertisement by the company's manager, dated "Bridgeport, August 15, 1814," and found in a newspaper of that time. It announces to the public that "the factory is nearly ready to go into operation, which will be done by steam, where we intend keeping a constant supply of cotton yarn of various descriptions, which we will sell at the most reduced prices. And, in addition to the above, we have two new wool-carding machines with first-rate cards, and having engaged an experienced carder, we hope, from our determined intentions to do our work with neatness and dispatch, and at the usual prices, to merit a share of the public patronage. (Signed) Enos Grove, Manager of the Company."

The factory building was of stone, about fifty by one hundred feet in ground dimensions, and four stories high. It was completed at about the time above indicated, but for some reason which does not appear the company was not incorporated until 1816.

An act of the Legislature, approved February 8th in that year, incorporates "The Bridgeport Manufacturing Company, ... for the purpose of manufacturing cotton and woolen goods, and who have erected an establishment for that purpose in the Borough of Bridgeport, in Fayette County;" the capital stock not to exceed $200,000, in shares of $500 each. The corporators were John Krepps, James Tomlinson, Elisha D. Hunt, William Griffith, John McCullre Hezlip, Morris Truman, and Enos Grave.

The factory had been started with great expectations some time prior to the incorporation of the company. "And when they were ready," says Mr. Rogers' diary, "no one being experienced in running factory or steamboats, neither enterprise made any money, but ran in debt, and the factory was sold by the sheriff." After being operated for a time by Mr. Grave for the company, it was run successively by James Meek, of Greene County, James Hutchison, Robert Burke, and others. After years of unprofitable attempts to run it for the purpose for which it was built it was abandoned as a cotton-factory, and then, after some years of disuse, it was occupied as a carriage-factory. Finally it was destroyed by fire, and so ended the cotton-factory enterprise of Bridgeport.

FRIENDSHIP PAPER-MILL.

A paper-mill, named as above by its proprietors, Zephaniah Carter and Solomon G. Krepps, was built by them on Water Street, Bridgeport, and put in operation in 1832. Before the business had become firmly established Krepps died, and his interest in the mill was sold to Robert Clarke, whose advertisement, announcing the purchase, and the continuance of the business under the new proprietorship, also expressing his regret that an enterprise which gave such good promise of success should have been checked so soon after its commencement by the death of Mr.
Krepps, is found in the Washington Examiner, dated November, 1833. The paper-mill continued in operation for a number of years, but finally the business was abandoned, and the building sold, in 1857, to Mason Rogers & Co., who converted it into a flouring-mill, which is still operated by them.

FOUNDRIES AND MACHINE-SHOPS.

The first machine-shop of Bridgeport was that of Daniel French, who (as has been already mentioned in an extract given from the journal of Robert Rogers) came from Philadelphia to the mouth of Dunlap's Creek about the year 1811. He was a man full of mechanical ideas, and a practical machinist. Mr. James L. Bowman, in an article written for and published in the American Pioneer in 1843, said, "The facility of obtaining iron and the abundance of bituminous coal for working it caused the establishment of various manufactories in this section. Among them we may name that of a steam-engine shop, under the direction of Daniel French, in Bridgeport, from which emanated an engine which was put on board the hull of the steamer 'Enterprise' in 1814." The engine of the "Dispatch," twin-boat with the "Enterprise," was built in the same shop. Mr. French was the inventor of the oscillating cylinder for engines. He left Bridgeport about 1829, and went to Jeffersonville, Ind., where his sons became extensive boat-builders, and where he was still living in 1872.

Between 1825 and 1830, John Krepps, and others associated with him, started a foundry where now is the residence of Thomas Cock. While run by them the foundry was under charge of William Cock as foreman. Afterwards he ran it on his own account; then it was rented by him to Culbertson & Rowe, who carried it on for two or three years, and in 1835 it was rented by John Snowdon, who had taken the contract to furnish the castings for the iron bridge then about to be built across Dunlap's Creek. The metal was furnished by the government, and the castings were made in the old foundry by the contractor, Snowdon. This was the last casting done at these works.

The present foundry and machine-shop business of Herbertson & Co., was started in 1838 by John Herbertson and Thomas Faull, the former having been the superintendent of Snowdon's foundry when the castings were made for the Dunlap's Creek bridge. The mason-work of the Faull & Herbertson foundry was done by Thomas Butcher. In 1842 the partnership between Herbertson and Faull was dissolved, the former continuing the business. The establishment was at first but a small one, but extensions and improvements have been made from time to time, and the manufacture of machinery has been added to the original foundry business, until the works have been brought to their present capacity. A specialty is now made in the manufacture of marine and stationary engines. The present firm of Herbertson & Co. is composed of John Herbertson, G. S. Herbertson, W. H. Herbertson (the latter two sons of John Herbertson), W. H. Ammon, and A. C. Cock.

Faull's foundry, located between Water Street and the river, and above the Monument Mills, was started by Thomas Faull soon after he retired from the partnership with John Herbertson. His son now carries on the business.

THE MONUMENT MILLS.

These mills are situated on Water Street, Bridgeport, on the eastern bank of the Monongahela River. The building was erected in the year 1832 by Zephaniah Carter and Solomon G. Krepps, and by them and others operated as a paper-mill for a number of years. In 1857 it was purchased by Mason Rogers & Co., and converted into a merchant flouring- and grist-mill, and it is still running on that work. The motive-power of the mill is a forty horse-power steam-engine, which drives three run of stones. The mill has a capacity of about forty barrels of flour per day.

PROSPECT MILLS.

These flouring-mills, owned and operated by W. H. Miller, are located on Dunlap's Creek, about three-fourths of a mile above and outside of the borough limits, yet they properly belong with the manufacturing industries of Bridgeport. The Prospect Mills are on or very near the site of the ancient grist-mill built by Rees Cadwallader before the commencement of the present century. After Cadwallader, the property passed to other hands, and was at one time owned by Rogers & Truman, by whom it was sold to William Miller. The old dam, originally built by Cadwallader, was used for the later mills until within a few years, when a new one was built by Mr. Miller, father of the present proprietor of the mills.

VALLEY MILLS.

The flouring- and grist-mills known by the above name are located on Dunlap's Creek, a short distance below and within the borough line, and were built in 1834 by Samuel G. Krepps, who operated them for many years. Subsequently the property passed through several hands, and in 1867 was purchased by Eli Leonard, who ran the mills for about ten years. They are now owned and operated by Snyder & Crispin.

SAW-MILLS.

The saw-mill of Harvey Leonard is on Dunlap's Creek, at the point where the borough line strikes that stream, a short distance above the Valley Mills, and at or very near the spot where Jonah Cadwallader's saw-mill stood in 1814 (the descriptions of the lines of the boroughs of Bridgeport and Brownsville, erected in that year, making "Jonah Cadwallader's mill-dam" a point of departure from Dunlap's Creek). The water which is used to propel both Leonard's saw-mill and Valley Mills, below it, is still taken from the creek at the place where Cadwallader erected his mill-dam seventy years ago.

The saw-mill and planing-mill of Gibbons, Wood & Crumlow, situated on Water Street and Cherry Alley, is one (and by no means the least important) of the industrial establishments of Bridgeport.

THE MEDICAL PROFESSION IN BRIDGEPORT.

Dr. Jesse Pennel was born of Quaker parents in Philadelphia, Sept. 5, 1772. He received a liberal education, afterwards studying medicine and attending lectures in the Medical Department of the University of Pennsylvania. A certificate, of which the following is a correct copy, is still possessed by his daughter, Miss Susan Pennel, of Pittsburgh:

"This is to certify that Jesse Pennel hath attended a course of my lectures on the Institutes of Medicine, and on Clinical Cases, with diligence and punctuality.

"Benj. Rush, M. D.,

"Professor of the above branches of Medicine in the University of Pennsylvania.

"Philadelphia, 24th February, 1792."

Dr. Pennel was married to Miss Hannah Grubb, of Winchester, Va., at which place the two resided for one year, when they moved to Bridgeport in 1793, where he practiced his profession the remainder of his life. On the 5th of February, 1819, Dr. Pennel died of typhus fever, which at the time was epidemic in the county. He was a consistent member of the Society of Friends up to the time of his death, as was also his wife. Miss Susan Pennel, his daughter, and Mrs. John A. Murphy, a granddaughter, both residents of Pittsburgh, Pa., are his only surviving descendants.

Dr. Henry William Stoy was born in Lebanon, Pa., Sept. 7, 1784. He was the son of Dr. Henry Wilhelm Stoy, a native of Germany, who emigrated thence to Lebanon County, Pa., some years previous to the birth of his son. There he practiced medicine and officiated as minister of the gospel for a considerable time. Dr. Stoy was educated in Lancaster, Pa., and studied medicine with Prof. Baker, of Lancaster. He came to Bridgeport in 1817, where he engaged in the practice of his profession, remaining until 1822, at which time he went to Greensburg, Westmoreland Co., but in 1852 returned to Bridgeport, where he continued to follow his profession until 1852, when he removed to Shinston, Harrison Co., Va., and died there Feb. 2, 1858. He continued in active practice up to within three months of his death. Dr. Stoy was twice married,—in 1814 to Katharine E. Cook, who died in 1824, leaving five children; in 1826 he was married to Eleanor M. Watt, who died in 1852, leaving also five children. While in Bridgeport he enjoyed the esteem and confidence of the community, and maintained an extensive practice. In politics he was an ardent and enthusiastic Democrat; he was also an active member of the order of Freemasons for fifty years preceding his death. His surviving descendants are Capt. William H. Stoy, the well-known professor of music; Mrs. Dorothy A. Kimber, of Oil City, Pa., and Mrs. Charlotte Reese, of Pittsburgh, Pa.

Dr. Thomas G. Lamb was born in Connellsville, Fayette Co., Pa., in 1796; studied medicine with Dr. Moore, of Connellsville, and in the Medical Department of the University of Pennsylvania, at Philadelphia. He came to Bridgeport and engaged in the practice of his profession in 1820, continuing in active business until 1836, in which year his death occurred. He was married Jan. 27, 1822, to Sarah W., daughter of Dr. Jesse Pennel. He was a man of active habits and dignified presence. In religion he was a Quaker, having a birthright in the Society of Friends.

Dr. Caleb Bracken was born in 1804 in Washington County, Pa., about three miles up the Monongahela River from Bridgeport. In 1826 he came to Bridgeport and engaged in the practice of medicine, remaining until 1836, when he removed to Belmont County, Ohio, where he engaged in agricultural pursuits and died in 1877. Dr. Bracken was a consistent member of the Society of Friends, being a preacher in that religious denomination. While practicing medicine in Bridgeport he was also the proprietor of a drug-store, and at the same time followed the business of brewing beer on the premises now owned by James Miller, Esq. The doctor was evidently a gentleman of considerable versatility of character.

Dr. Abraham Stanley was born in the neighborhood called Cedar Creek, Hanover Co., Va., Aug. 30, 1804. In early life he taught school in Ohio, then the far Northwest. He studied medicine in the office of Dr. Pettit, of Columbiana County, Ohio, and spent one winter at the Cincinnati Medical College. He came to Bridgeport in 1836, purchased the drug-store of Dr. Bracken, and at the same time began the practice of his profession. The drug business proving unremunerative was soon abandoned, and the remainder of his business life was devoted steadily to his professional duties. Soon after his arrival in Bridgeport he was married to Lydia, daughter of Eli Haines. He was a prominent member of the Society of Friends, occupying an important position in the councils of that body; he was also, like most of the Quakers of the North, a strong Abolitionist, taking an active and heartfelt interest in all that pertained to the abolition of negro slavery in the United States. He was a number of times importuned by his friends and influential persons in the community to permit his name to be used as a candidate for Congress on the Anti-Slavery ticket, but always peremptorily declined. He was appointed by the State authorities a manager of the House of Refuge for Western Pennsylvania, which position he held with credit for several years. In private life he was kind and urbane.
charitable to the extent of his means, and universally respected wherever known. While returning from Harrisburg, where he had been on business connected with the House of Refuge, he met with a railroad accident, from the effects of which he died in the summer of 1856, leaving no children. He was a member of the Fayette County Medical Society.

Mathew Oliver Jones, M.D., was born of Quaker parents in Southampton County, Va., on the 1st day of May, 1822. In early childhood he emigrated with his parents to the State of Ohio, and studied medicine in the office of Dr. Flanner, in Mount Pleasant, Jefferson Co., Ohio, attending one term of medical lectures in the Medical Department of the University of Pennsylvania during the winter of 1841–42. In December, 1843, he came to Bridgeport, forming a partnership with Dr. A. Stanley in the practice of medicine. In the autumn of 1849 he returned to the University of Pennsylvania, where the degree of M.D. was conferred upon him in March, 1850. He remained in Bridgeport, devoting his entire attention to the study and practice of his profession, until the spring of 1861, when he removed to the city of Pittsburgh, where he now resides, enjoying a large practice and an honorable position in his profession. On the 29th of April, 1851, he was married to Margaret C., daughter of Capt. Elisha Bennett, of Bridgeport, by whom he had two children, a son and a daughter. The son, Dr. W. W. Jones, is now engaged in the practice of medicine in Allegheny City, Pa. The daughter remains with her father. In 1844, Dr. Jones assisted in organizing the first medical society in Fayette County, which, however, was short-lived. He is the author of a paper on the causes and treatment of vomiting during pregnancy, which not only attracted much attention among the profession in this country, but was extensively published in the medical journals of England and other European countries. He is a member of the Allegheny County Medical Society, also of the Medical Society of the State of Pennsylvania, and of the American Medical Association. In politics he was an old-time Abolitionist, and is now a Republican. His religion is that of the Society of Friends.

Dr. James B. Grooms was born July 22, 1827, at Carmichael’s, Greene Co., Pa. He was educated at Greene Academy, in Carmichael’s; studied medicine in the office of Dr. John Whitsett, at Washington, Pa., attending the lectures in Cleveland Medical College in the winter of 1852–53. He began the practice of medicine in his native town in 1853, continuing there until the latter part of 1862, when he entered the army as a member of the Ringgold Battalion, which was afterward a part of the Twenty-second Pennsylvania Cavalry. He served in the army three years, part of the time as assistant surgeon, and located in Bridgeport in 1866, where he has since remained, engaged in the practice of his profession. Dr. Grooms is the inventor of the first repeating rifle that was ever successfully operated in the United States, and for which he obtained a patent in 1855. The rifle was tested satisfactorily, in the presence of officers of the army and navy, the same year, in Washington City. Owing to unexpected business arrangements the invention was for some time neglected, the manufacture of the rifle being postponed until others, profiting by the doctor’s invention, brought the improvements they had made thereon before the public and the government, after which no further attention was given to the original invention. In 1858 he also took out letters patent for a rotary steam-engine. The principle involved in this invention has since come into extensive use in the manufacture of steam fire-engines and steam-pumps. The doctor, although the first to apply successfully the valuable principles involved, has, like many other inventors, failed to reap any pecuniary benefit from his labors. He is a member of the Fayette County Medical Society; also of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

William Stevens Duncan, M.D., son of Thomas Duncan, and grandson of Dr. Benjamin Stevens, one of the earliest medical practitioners of the county, was born in Bridgeport, May 24, 1834, and educated at Mount Union College, Stark Co., Ohio. He began his medical studies in 1855, in the office of Dr. M. O. Jones, then of Bridgeport; matriculated in the University of Pennsylvania, and received the degree of M.D. from that institution in March, 1858. The same year he formed with his preceptor a partnership in the practice of medicine, which was terminated in about two years and a half by the removal of Dr. Jones to the city of Pittsburgh. He has been actively engaged in professional pursuits up to the present time, still occupying the same office in which his first prescription was written. He served as a volunteer surgeon at Gettysburg, and was captured by the Confederates, but managed to escape. In 1869 he was instrumental in securing the reorganization of the County Medical Society, which had not held a meeting for twenty-five years, being elected its president. In 1871 he went to San Francisco, Cal., to attend a meeting of the American Medical Association. Besides various articles on miscellaneous subjects, published in newspapers and magazines, he is the author of the following scientific papers, viz.: “Malformations of the Genito-Urinary Organs,” “Belladonna as an Antidote for Opium-Poisoning,” “Medical Delusions,” “Reports of Cases to State Medical Society,” 1870–72, “Iliac Aneurism Cured by Electrolysis,” 1875, “The Physiology of Death,” and various reports published in the “Transactions of the State Medical Society.” He is a member of the Fayette County Medical Society, the Medical Society of the State of Pennsylvania, the American Medical Association, the Rocky Mountain Medical Association, and an honorary member of the California State Medical Society.
James R. Nelan, M.D., was born in Luzerne township, Fayette Co., on the 10th of September, 1851; educated at Wayneburg College, Greene Co., Pa.; studied medicine under the tutorage of Dr. Duncan, of Bridgeport, and received the degree of M.D. in the Medical Department of the University of Pennsylvania in the spring of 1877, the subject of his graduating thesis being "Nervous Influence." In the same year he began the practice of his profession in Bridgeport. He is a member of the Fayette County Medical Society and the Medical Society of the State of Pennsylvania; has served several years faithfully as a director of the public schools, and is an active Democratic politician.

Dr. Charles Hubbs was born in New Jersey in 1767, pursued his medical studies under the direction of Dr. Benjamin Rush, of Philadelphia, and practiced his profession in Germantown, Pa., and Baltimore, Md., until 1816, when he removed to Mount Pleasant, Westmoreland Co., Pa.; came to Bridgeport in 1820, remained one year, returned to Mount Pleasant, and died there in 1847.

Dr. William G. Hubbs (of the so-called Physio-Medical School), son of Dr. Charles Hubbs, was born in Baltimore, Md., Feb. 21, 1811; studied medicine under the direction of his father and brother, Dr. N. G. Hubbs. He began the practice of medicine in Cookstown (now Fayette City), Pa., in 1830, remaining there until 1861, when he removed to Greenfield, Pa., and from there in June, 1867, to Bridgeport, where he continued to practice his profession until within a few weeks of his death from typhoid fever, April 6, 1881.

John Allen Hubbs, M.D., son of Dr. W. G. Hubbs, was born in Fayette City, Pa., Feb. 13, 1849. He studied medicine under his father and Dr. J. R. Nickel; attended lectures in the Physio-Medical College at Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1855-56, and the winter of 1856-57; practiced in partnership with his father at Fayette City until he attended another course of lectures in the Physio-Medical Institute at Cincinnati, Ohio, from which institution he received the degree of M.D. in February, 1860, when only twenty years of age. He practiced his profession in Fairview, Greene Co., Pa., until 1867, when he came to Bridgeport, where he has since been engaged in practice, also in the drug business. He takes an active interest in the affairs of the town, and has served several years as a member of the Borough Council.

PUBLIC HOUSES.

The earliest tavern stand in Bridgeport was the old red house that stood on the corner of Water and Bridge Streets. In that house Isaac Kimber opened a tavern in the year 1814. After Kimber, its landlords were Robert Patterson and others. Another early tavern was opened by John Nelan about 1818, at the place where now is the residence of Burnet Mason. Little beyond these facts has been learned in regard to these old taverns. Bridgeport has never had many public-houses, the greater part of the business of the vicinity in that line in the palmy days of the National road and of Western emigration being done on the other side of the creek in Brownsville. The principal hotel of Bridgeport at the present time is the "Bar House," kept by Matthew Story on the site where Kimber opened the first tavern of the place in 1814.

FIRE APPARATUS.

On the 29th of November, 1842, the Council of Bridgeport, in accordance "with the will of the people, expressed at a town-meeting called for the purpose," subscribed one hundred dollars for the purchase of a fire-engine for the use of the borough. Afterwards the sum of two hundred and fifty dollars was subscribed by citizens, when, as one hundred dollars more was necessary, that additional amount was subscribed by the Council. An engine was then built for the borough by Faull & Herbertson, and a company was raised and organized to take charge of and work it. The subsequent history of Bridgeport with regard to the extinguishment of fires has been the same as that of Brownsville. Fire companies have been raised from time to time, and have as often gone down and disbanded, and at the present time Bridgeport, like Brownsville, is without a fire department or any effective means of preventing serious disaster to the borough from the ravages of fire.

NATIONAL DEPOSIT BANK OF BROWNsville.

This institution (located in Bridgeport notwithstanding its name and style) was organized in 1872 as a State bank, named the Deposit and Discount Bank of Brownsville, with Dr. W. Cotton as president, and O. K. Taylor, cashier. The bank commenced business in the building at present occupied by it on the 1st of April in the year named. In 1875 it sustained severe losses, from which it recovered only after several years of successful business. In April, 1880, it was reorganized under the national banking system, with its present name and a capital of $50,000. It is now in a prosperous condition and has the confidence of the community. The present (1881) officers of the institution are: Directors, Dr. W. Cotton (president), Joseph S. Elliott (vice-president), William H. Miller, Samuel Thompson, Joseph Farquar, O. K. Taylor (cashier), E. H. Bar, Dr. S. S. Rogers, Jeremiah Baird.

SCHOOLS.

For some years after small schools had begun to be taught at irregular intervals in Brownsville, Bridgeport had none, and consequently during that period such of the scholars of the last-named place as attended school at all were compelled to cross Dunlap's Creek to do so. The first schools of Bridgeport were opened under the auspices of the Friends who lived there, and the earliest teacher of whom any knowledge can be gained at the present day was Joseph Oxley, a Quaker, and a man of no little fame as a mathematician, who taught in a building that stood near the site of the grist-mill of Mason Rogers & Co. Another very early teacher was Eli Haynes.

Joshua Gibbons, now living in Bridgeport, but retired from active life, has been a resident of the county for seventy years, of which fully sixty years have been spent by him in educational employment, teaching every year except when serving as county superintendent of schools, which office he filled for four terms of three years each, commencing as the first superintendent of the county, under the school law of 1830. Two of his sons, James W. and Henry, are also successful teachers. Another son, Rev. H. O. Gibbons, is pastor of a Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia, and a daughter married the Rev. Robert Fulton, of Baltimore, Md. This digression is thought to be excusable in making honorable mention of a man who has labored as long and faithfully in the cause of education as has the veteran teacher and school officer, Joshua Gibbons, of Bridgeport.

Not only were the Quakers of Bridgeport the first to open a school in the town, but the fact is also to be recorded that the first building erected here especially as a school-house was built by members of the Society of Friends, on their grounds on Prospect Street. One of the teachers in this old stone house was Eli Haynes, above mentioned.

The earliest reference to a school-house found in the borough records of Bridgeport is under date of Jan. 1, 1815, being a mention of the amount to be paid "to Israel Gregg for the expense of purchasing a lot and building a school-house on Second Street, and to procure a Deed and have it executed on behalf of the Corporation." The school-house here referred to was on the 29th of May, 1823, rented by the Council to John Stump for the term of three months, to be used for teaching a "subscription school," and on the 8th of September in the same year the borough school-house (without doubt the same building referred to above) was rented to Charles Van Hook for the term of six months.

March 25, 1824, the school-room was rented to James Reynolds for three months; but on the 21st of April following he declined using it, and resigned the privilege which had been granted to him. Three days later, Joel Oxley "requested the privilege of the use of the School-House as a school-room for two years from the first day of May next," and on this application the Burgess was directed to lease the same to Joel Oxley for the above term, reserving the customary privileges of the Council, and to the Methodists as a Meeting-House."

Oct. 8, 1828, "Major King and James Reynolds applied for the use of School-House," and the privilege was granted to Reynolds.

Under the public school law of 1834, the courts of the several counties in the State appointed school directors for each township district. At the January term of Fayette County Court, in 1835, Caleb Bracken and Joshua Wood were appointed as such officers for Bridgeport. On the 13th of June following the Borough Council took action, ordering a tax of twenty-five cents on the $100, to be levied for the use of common schools, in addition to the tax levied by the county commissioners for that purpose. Aug. 13, 1835, the township of Bridgeport complied with the requirements of the law, and so notified the county treasurer. The amount of money received from the State in that year for school purposes in Bridgeport was $39.78; received from the county of Fayette, $79.56.

On the 6th of May, 1837, the Council took into consideration the question "of erecting a building on the west end of the Market-House, to answer the double purpose of a Town Hall and School-House for the Borough," and a committee was appointed to act with the school directors in the matter, the Council agreeing to pay $200 towards the erection of the building. The committee contracted (June 6, 1837) with Joel Armstrong to build the hall and school-house, and on the 23d of April, 1838, the Council transferred the school-house and lot to the school directors.

In this old building the schools of the borough were taught until they were transferred to the present Union school-house, which was built in 1852-53, on a lot which was purchased for $400, located on Prospect Street, and being part of the grounds occupied by the old Friends' meeting-house. The cost of the Union school-house was $2948.90, and of the furniture and fixtures, $1550.85; making, with the cost of the lot, a total of $4499.75. From November, 1854, the old stone school-house was used for the schooling of colored pupils until 1875, when it was demolished and a new brick school-house erected on its site.

The schools of the borough are now under charge of Thomas S. Wood, principal, who is assisted by seven teachers. The whole number of scholars is two hundred and seventy-six. Total receipts for the year for school purposes, $2965.67; expenditures, $2631.77. Valuation of school property, $10,000.

The present (1881) board of school directors is composed as follows: W. S. Duncan, president; William H. Miller, William Cock, Daniel Delaney, James Reynolds, and Jesse H. Bulger.

Following is a list of persons whose names appear on the records as having been elected to the office of school director in Bridgeport since the commencement of the operation of the school law of 1824, viz.: 1835, Caleb Bracken, Joshua Wood, "reported Aug. 13, 1835;" 1836, Tilson Fuller, Thomas Duncan; 1856, R. W. Jones, S. B. Page; 1857, Benjamin Leonard, John W. Porter, Dr. M. O. Jones, Thomas Dun- can; 1867, O. C. Cromwell, Thomas Duncan; 1870, Edward L. Moorehouse, Daniel Delaney; 1874, William H. Miller, C. W. Wanee; 1875, Daniel Delaney,
HISTORY OF FAYETTE COUNTY, PENNSYLVANIA.

RELIGIOUS HISTORY.

FRIENDS' MEETING.

In the early period, before 1820, the members of the Society of Friends in Bridgeport outnumbered those of all other denominations, and their meetings for divine worship were held here many years before any other churches were organized in the place, beginning as early as about the year 1790. For a few years they met in private dwellings. On the 28th of February, 1790, a lot of three acres of land was purchased from Rees Cadwallader, and soon afterwards a meeting-house was built upon it. It was a stone building, low, but nearly or quite one hundred feet in length. Some years afterwards, when the Hicksites seceded from the regular congregation, this old meeting-house was partitioned across in the middle so as to accommodate both meetings. This was continued for some years, but gradually, by reason of removals and the death of members, the congregation became reduced in numbers, and finally religious worship after the manner of the Quakers ceased to be held in Bridgeport.

Besides the old stone meeting-house built by the Friends on the lot purchased from Rees Cadwallader, they also built on it a stone school-house (the first school-house in Bridgeport), and set apart a portion of the ground for a burial-place. Upon the lot purchased by the Friends from Cadwallader there now stand the residences of William Miller, Eli Cock, and Richard Swan, and the Union school-house of the borough.

SECOND METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH OF BROWNSVILLE.

This church, although located in Bridgeport, received and has retained its designation as "of Brownsville" from the fact that it was an offshoot from the church of Brownsville, its original members being from the membership of that church. The date of the Bridgeport organization has not been ascertained, but it is certain that it was as early as or prior to the year 1833. Before that time, for many years, the Bridgeport members of the Brownsville Church had been accustomed to hold meetings for religious worship in the stone school-house on the hill in Bridgeport. In 1833 they purchased from Ruth Jones lot No. 54 of the Bridgeport plat, situated on Second Street, for $230, and that lot was accordingly conveyed by the grantor to Joseph Reynolds, Adolph Merchant, Charles McFall, Thomas Gregg, and Edmund Draper, trustees for the Second Methodist Episcopal Church of Brownsville. On this lot in 1834 a church edifice was built, thirty-five by fifty-five feet in dimensions, and costing about $2000. Its location was opposite the site of the present church.

In that first church building the congregation worshiped for thirty years. Before the end of that time it was thought necessary to build a new edifice, and arrangements were made to erect one, but a consideration of the high prices prevailing during the war of the Rebellion caused it to be delayed. The new house was, however, completed in 1866, at a cost of about $12,000, and was dedicated by the Rev. William Pershing of Pittsburgh. The Rev. Charles W. Smith was at that time pastor of the church.

Among the preachers who have ministered to this church during the past twenty-two years have been the Revs. Artemus Ward (1839), J. W. McIntyre, Charles W. Smith, J. J. Hayes, J. R. Mills, S. W. Horner, C. W. Scott, Homer Smith, John C. Castle, T. N. Eaton, and Charles Cartwright, the present (1881) pastor. The church now numbers two hundred and seventy-five members. In connection with it is a Sabbath-school, having an attendance of about three hundred, under the superintendency of J. Well Porter.

METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH.

This church was organized in Bridgeport in 1839 by the Rev. William Collins, who was its first preacher. In the following year a stone building was erected as a house of worship on lot No. 46, which was at that time bargained to the trustees of this church, but was not transferred by deed until Oct. 16, 1849. The location was on the side of the hill, where the residence of James Kilnrew now stands. This old church edifice was used by the society until 1866, when the building of the Wesleyan Methodists was purchased. The old meeting-house was then sold, and the Wesleyan building has since that time been used as the Methodist Protestant house of worship.

The Rev. William Collins, above mentioned as the organizer of this church, was succeeded by the Rev. John Lucas, since whose time there have been a great number of preachers serving the congregation, among whom are recollected John Wilson, George Hughes, William B. Dunlevy, and Zachariah Ragan in the old church, and the Revs. Stillwagon, Caruthers, Mark Taylor, J. Simpson, and Henry Lucas since the occupation of the house purchased from the Wesleyans. The Rev. Henry Lucas is the present preacher in charge. The church now numbers fifty members.

WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH.

The date of the organization of this church has not been definitely ascertained, but it is known that it was in existence some years prior to 1848, at which time it had a membership of about seventy-five, and in which year also its meeting-house (the same which is now the Methodist Protestant house of worship) was erected. During its existence the church was served by the Revs. — Smith, John P. Bedker, Lyell, Laughead, Tolgen, Planet, McBride, and A. D. Carter, who was the last of its preachers. At about the close of the war of the Rebellion the society disintegrated, and their church edifice was sold to the Protestant Methodists as before mentioned.

Concerning the African Methodist Episcopal and the African Zion Wesleyan Methodist Churches of Bridgeport little information has been obtained beyond the fact that the trustees of the former organization purchased, on the 13th of June, 1840, from Robert Patterson, for the consideration of forty dollars, lot No. 136, on Cadwallader Street, for church purposes, and that the trustees of the Wesleyan Church (which is not now in existence) purchased lot No. 130 from Lucinda Tucker on the 4th of March, 1840. More extended sketches of these churches were requested from, and promised by, the Rev. Benjamin Wheeler, but they have not been received.

CUMBERLAND PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH

In February or March, 1832, two ministers of a new denomination, known as the Cumberland Presbyterian, came to the town of Brownsville. The names of these preachers were Alfred M. Bryan and Milton Bird. Both came from what was then the far Southwest. The church they represented had been organized in Tennessee about twenty years before, and had already in the West grown into a denomination of strength and influence. About the beginning of the century a great religious revival had been kindled in many of the Presbyterian Churches in Kentucky and Tennessee, in the region then known as the Cumberland country. This revival continued for ten years, and the whole aspect of society in that region was affected by it. New life was imparted to the church, and Christian truth acquired new power over the hearts and lives of many. Growing out of this revival certain questions sprung up which brought disagreement, and out of these questions grew the hopeless breach which caused the formation of a new and independent Presbyterian Church in February, 1810, and finally of the Cumberland Presbyterian denomination.

In the spring of 1831 this new church held its General Assembly at Princeton, Ky. A communication was laid before this body from certain ruling elders of a Presbyterian Church in Washington County, Pa., asking information about Cumberland Presbyterians, and requesting that ministers of the new church should be sent to Western Pennsylvania. In answer to this request several preachers had come to Washington County in the fall of 1831. Their preaching everywhere was attended with surprising results. Scores of anxious inquirers knelt at every service. The revival influence spread rapidly. Several congregations of the new denomination were organized in Washington and Greene Counties.

The two preachers named above—Bryan and Bird—had crossed the Monongahela, and were holding a meeting at an old Methodist meeting-house four miles from Brownsville, known as Hopewell. The usual result had followed, and a great revival was in progress. At the solicitation of friends of the new movement, these two ministers came to Brownsville to spend two days. Mr. Bird preached in the forenoon of the first day at the Methodist Episcopal Church. Mr. Bryan preached in the evening. Crowds of people left their work to attend the services. A large number of "seekers of religion" crowded the altar. Next day and evening the services were held in the Episcopal Church, and even greater results followed than on the day before. Many of the leading people in the town professed faith in Christ. Some who are yet living and who still occupy prominent places in society here were among the converts. The meeting ended with these two days, and, strange to say, no effort was made to organize a church, and the fruits of the two days' revival was gathered by the other churches of the town.

The Rev. John Morgan, who about this time became pastor of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church at Uniontown, did not visit Brownsville till a good while later, but he and others still preached here occasionally. Among these early preachers the names of Le Roy Woods, S. M. Sparks, J. N. Cary, John Cary, S. E. Hudson, and W. E. Post are mentioned. As early as the year 1840 the last-mentioned minister began to hold meetings once or twice a month in an old stone building on Front Street, Brownsville (formerly the Black Horse tavern), standing on or near the lot now known as the Swetzer property.

Some time afterward the Baptists, who then had a flourishing congregation here, finished their church, which still stands on Church Street, and moved out of Masonic Hall, where they had worshipped hitherto. The Cumberland Presbyterians now rented this hall, and held services in it regularly every two weeks.

We are told that considerable success attended these efforts, but we have no record of the work until the spring of 1844. In April of that year a petition signed by a number of the citizens of Brownsville and vicinity was presented to Union Presbyterian, asking that body to organize a church here. The record informs us that after Presbyterian duly considered the propriety of the petition it was granted, and the Rev. S. E. Hudson was appointed to assist Rev. W. E. Post in said organization. For some reason this action was not carried out until five months later, Sept. 19, 1844. The Rev. J. T. A. Henderson was present and assisted at the organization. There are thirty names on the original roll. Josiah Waggoner and William Robbins were elected and ordained ruling elders.

Mr. Post continued his labors with the congregation thus organized until October, 1846. The growth of the church was not rapid, the roll showing less than forty names at that date. The services were still held in Masonic Hall. From October, 1846, to April, 1847, "the congregation was furnished with preaching by supplies." Rev. J. T. A. Henderson, Rev. A. G. Osborn, Rev. A. M. Blackford, and Rev. Isaac Hague visited and preached for the congregation in this interval.

In April, 1847, Rev. Isaac Hague, now of Galesburg, III., took charge of the work, continuing his services till the fall of 1848. In the mean time the place of meeting had been changed from the Masonic Hall, Brownsville, to the Methodist Episcopal Church, Bridgeport.

Mr. Hague's efforts were quite successful, and in one revival meeting there were thirteen additions to the church. Removals and deaths, however, left not more than sixty in communion when he closed his labors. Mr. Hague lived in the country, and as his visits were only semi-monthly, he could not look constantly after the work as he might have done with a home in the midst of the people.

On June 23, 1847, William H. Bennett and James M. Abrams were elected ruling elders.

The Rev. A. B. Brice succeeded Rev. Isaac Hague in the fall of 1848. He preached here one-half his time till the fall of 1849. In January, 1850, he took charge of the congregation, giving his entire time to the work. Mr. Brice remained in charge of the work for six years, and during his stay "there were frequent outpourings of the divine spirit and many were brought into the church."

About the year 1850, Oliver C. Cromlow was elected ruling elder. Dr. Brice was editor of the Cumberland Presbyterian, the organ of the denomination in Pennsylvania and Ohio. This paper was for several years published at Brownsville, having been moved here from Uniontown.

About the close of Mr. Hague's labors it became necessary to change the place of holding the meetings, and the congregation moved to the old town hall in West Brownsville. The necessity of building a church began to be recognized, and subscriptions for the purpose were started. In the spring of 1848 a lot was secured in the upper part of Bridgeport, and a neat brick structure, one story high, forty by sixty feet, was erected. The plastering was finished in December, 1848, and the church was dedicated in February, 1849. Rev. Ira H. Hunter, then pastor at Uniontown, preaching the dedicatory sermon.

The Rev. A. B. Brice, D.D., continued in charge of the church until April, 1855. His successor was the Rev. William Campbell, D.D., who also succeeded Dr. Brice as editor of the Cumberland Presbyterian. He continued to labor as pastor and editor till April, 1857, when he resigned the charge of the church and took the paper to Pittsburg.

The Rev. A. J. Swain became pastor in April, 1857, continuing to labor in that capacity four years, till April, 1861. The record shows about forty accessions in the six years following 1855. Rev. N. D. Porter succeeded Rev. A. J. Swain. This was the memorable year which marked the beginning of the great Rebellion. The work of the church was greatly retarded at the time by the prevailing excitement, but in January and February, 1862, there was an extensive revival, with one hundred and fourteen professions and nearly seventy accessions to the church. Mr. Porter was assisted in this meeting by the Rev. Henry S. Bennett, of Brownsville, and Rev. G. F. Wright, of White Hall, N. Y. The congregation afterwards continued to enjoy a good degree of prosperity, though there was no other extensive revival under Mr. Porter's ministry.

Freeman Wise had been made ruling elder in March, 1859, and that office was conferred on J. D. Armstrong in March, 1862.

Mr. Porter ceased to labor with this church in January, 1864. The congregation was without a minister until the July following, when Rev. G. W. McWherter was called as a supply, and continued in that capacity until April, 1865. The congregation was again without a pastor until July, 1865, when "Rev. J. T. A. Henderson was called for six months," and in April, 1866, "he was called to supply the church for an indefinite period." Mr. Henderson divided his time between Brownsville and Hopewell. There had been very few additions to the church since the revival of 1862 until February, 1866, at which time, under Mr. Henderson's ministry, about thirty were added to the church.

At some time during the spring or summer of 1868 (the record does not show the exact date) Rev. J. T. A. Henderson resigned, and the congregation was again for a time without a minister. Rev. L. Axtell was next called as a supply, and continued for some months in that capacity.

About the 1st of November, 1870, Rev. J. H. Coulter took charge of the work. During the time of these frequent changes the church made little progress. In October, 1871, Mr. Coulter, assisted by Rev. A. J. Baird, D.D., of Nashville, Tenn., held a series of meetings of the most successful character. About forty were added to the church, and the work for a time received a new impetus. About the middle of June, 1872, Rev. J. H. Coulter resigned, and the congregation was without a minister until December of the same year, when Rev. J. M. Howard, the present pastor, was called. At this time there were many things to dishearten and few to encourage the friends of the struggling congregation. During the first two years of Mr. Howard's ministry here not more than a dozen joined the church, and this gain was balanced by losses by removals, dismissions, and deaths.

On the morning of the 8th of October, 1874, the church was entirely destroyed by fire, and there being no insurance on the property the loss seemed fatal to the congregation. Efforts were, however, immediately set on foot to raise funds to rebuild, and in the spring of 1875 work was begun on the present building. The congregation secured the use of what is known as "Templars' Hall," in that part of the town called "The Neck," and the regular services were continued there. The basement of the new building was ready to occupy Feb. 20, 1876. At that time an "opening service" was held, Rev. A. B. Miller, D.D., president of Waynesburg College, preaching an appropriate sermon. Rev. Henry Melville, then pastor of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church in Uniontown, assisted in the services and preached in the evening. The new building and lot have so far cost about $7000. The congregation still worship in the basement, but the audience-room is to be finished this year (1881). The building committee having the work in charge consists of J. D. Armstrong, Seaborn Crawford, and George L. Moore.

In February and March of 1876 an extensive revival of religion prevailed in this church. Mr. Howard, the pastor, was assisted by Rev. A. J. Swain. There were, growing out of this revival, about fifty accessions to the church. The Sunday-school had grown from about forty in 1872 to more than two hundred, being at this time the banner school in the county.

In October, 1877, there was another extensive revival. At this time the pastor was assisted by Rev. W. S. Danley, of Carmichael's, Greene Co. More than sixty members were added to the church. In the spring of 1877 the "Murphy temperance work" had begun in this church, and a large number who had been reclaimed from intemperance joined the church during the revival in October.

In February, 1881, the church enjoyed another revival, which resulted in about one hundred professions and about fifty accessions to the church. The Rev. Samuel McBride, pastor of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church of McKeesport, and Rev. A. W. White, pastor of Hopewell Church, assisted the pastor.

In September, 1874, John S. Pringle, John Springer, and Geo. L. Moore were chosen ruling elders; these, with J. D. Armstrong, constitute the present board of elders.

The number now on the church roll is about two hundred. The Sunday-school has about two hundred, with an average attendance of one hundred and thirty. The present pastor has been here nearly nine years.

BULLSKIN TOWNSHIP.

This township is on the northern border of the county, the second from the east. Its general length from north to south is about nine miles, or about double its width. The eastern boundary is formed by the Chestnut Ridge, which separates it from the townships of Saltlick and Springfield; on the south is Connellsville; on the west are Tyrone, and Westmoreland County, Jacob's Creek separating the latter from Bullskin; and on the north is Westmoreland County. The area embraced within these bounds is about 24,320 acres of land, varying from rolling to mountainous, the western half, in general, being tillable. The township is drained south and west by Mounts' Creek and its affluents, White's, Butler's, Spruce, and Yellow Springs Runs, Jacob's Creek, and Green Lick Run. Most of these are constant streams, and afford good mill-seats. Their valleys vary from a quarter to half a mile in width, and are fertile, while their hillsides are usually quite productive. The celebrated Connellsville coal-beds underlie the western part of Bullskin, while in the eastern part iron ore of excellent quality and almost unlimited quantity abounds. Fire-clay also is found in many localities. Much of the mineral wealth of the township has been developed with rich returns to the owners of the lands, whose agricultural value, too, compares not unfavorably with other lands in the county.

The attractive appearance of many parts of Bullskin caused many claims to be made at an early day, before the question to the proprietorship of the lands was determined. Hence there was in the township a patent issued by Thomas and Richard Penn, in the belief that they had a right to the soil. It was granted to William Robertson, Jan. 12, 1771, and covered the valuable lands lying on both sides of Jacob's Creek, between Lobengier's and Snyder's mills. Ralph Cherry successfully disputed the validity of this patent, and the litigation which arose therefrom covers many pages of the records of the courts. Although Robertson failed to dispossess Cherry, it appears that the latter did not perfect his claim until many years after his settlement. The survey was not made until 1787, several years after the warrant was issued. Ten surveys in the township were made earlier.

In the list of original surveys in what was formerly Bullskin township appear the following-named persons as the owners of the number of acres of land set opposite their names.

Of the foregoing surveys those of George Batchelor and Peter Bucher, both in Salt Lick, were made in 1785. William Boyd's, called "Spring Hill," situated on Mounts Creek, was made in June, 1786, and was bounded by the lands of Edward Doyle, Robert Beall, Lewis Fleming, William Connell, and the Vance heirs. Doyle's survey was made in January of the same year, and extended to the lands of Isaac Meason, Ann Stephens, John Stephenson, and the Vance heirs. Thomas Fleming had his survey made in December, 1785.

The survey for John Cumpton was made first in 1769, by Col. Crawford, for Col. Thompson. The re-survey was made in 1788. The survey made for Alexander Cummins, April 29, 1788, was called "Little Hopes," and the land was described as being one mile north of the Turkey Foot road, where it crosses Indian Creek. Both of the last-named surveys are in.
Springfield. Abraham Dumbauld had a survey made for four hundred and twenty-five acres, Nov. 21, 1785, on the "Great Salt Creek," and gave the name of "Plum Bottoms" to the lands, which are, in part, now the property of Judge D. W. C. Dumbauld, of Salt Lick. John Martin's survey, in the same township, made October, 1785, was called "Additional Stones." William Norton's survey was made March 12, 1782, and was described as being "on the road to the salt-works, between the Cranberry Glade and the falls in Bullskin, north of the land of James Neigh."

John Stephenson's survey, for four hundred and twelve acres, called "Strict Measure," was situated on the south side of Jacob's Creek, and surveyed Dec. 16, 1785, "in consequence of a certificate issued by the commissioners for adjusting the claims to unpatented lands in the Commonwealth of Virginia, in support of the following voucher: No. 106, Virginia Survey, Youghania County."

The survey for George Hogg was made March 3, 1837, locating a warrant of April 4, 1794, to Isaac Meason. The tract was located on the waters of Mounts' Creek, "and had on it a furnace, gone to decay, old houses, sixty acres cleared, a few families residing thereon, and appear to have been settled about forty years ago." — J.

John McLean's survey, called "Fertility," was made Jan. 8, 1787, for three hundred and thirty-four acres, on Salt Lick Creek. Christian Perkey had a survey made on the same stream, on the middle road from Cherry's to Jones' mill, and situated partly in Westmoreland County. Surveyed dated 1789.

Many of these land-owners were actual settlers at the time the surveys were made, and not a few of them had lived in the original township of Bullskin some score of years before the metes and bounds of their lands were officially determined. In 1788 the following were the owners of property:

Of these the Cherry, Robertson, Doyle, Smith, Davis, McKe, Stewart, and White families were in the township as early as 1772. Many of the first settlers removed to a very early day leaving no descendants, and consequently but little can be said of them. Ralph Cherry lived on Jacob's Creek, and owned mills which are yet known as Lobengier's, one of the owners after Cherry. At the mouth of White's Run, and partly in the present township of Connellsburg, was the tract of land owned by Providence Mounts, and adjoining him on the west was Wm. McKe. The McCormick place was below, in the present township of Connellsburg. Providence Mounts was probably the earliest of these settlers, and the principal stream of the township took its name from him. Just below the Bullskin line Mounts had a mill at a very early day, and wool-carding was carried on at the same place. Upon the removal of the Mounts family (who emigrated to Kentucky) the farm became the property of Stewart H. Whitehill, a son-in-law of Wm. Boyd, but in 1826, Alexander Johnstone, a Scotch-Irishman, became the owner, and later his son, John R. Johnstone, owned both mills and the farm. It is said that the burrs in the original mill were brought from Virginia by a man named Newcomer. The present mill was built by Mr. Johnstone in 1856. It is supplied with two runs of stones, and both it and the saw-mill are kept in successful operation, being now the property of the heirs of J. R. Johnstone, who died in December, 1877. East of the Mounts tract, and in the present township of Bullskin, were the lands belonging to the White family. The principal part of the White farm has been owned since 1848 by Wm. C. Johnstone, a brother of the foregoing. The stream of water south of the place took its name from Henry White, who had mills on its waters. This family also removed to Kentucky about the beginning of the present century.

William Robertson was by birth a Scotchman, and possessed to an unusual degree the tenaciousness of purpose of that race. He removed to Bullskin from the eastern part of the State about 1770, settling on Jacob’s Creek, below Cherry’s, and with that family had a wearisome litigation respecting certain land titles, which were ended only by the death of Robertson many years ago. His family then removed to the West. Andrew Robertson, a brother of William, settled first in Westmoreland County, but some time about 1800 located at the foot of Chestnut Ridge. He was married to Betsey Smart and reared a family of four children,—John, who died in Scotland; Nancy, one of the pioneer teachers, who died a maiden; Andrew, who settled on the county line, where his family yet resides; and Elizabeth, who yet lives near Bridgeport, as the wife of Asher Walker.

South of William Robertson much of the lands were claimed by John and Isaac Meason. The latter first lived near the chain bridge, in Tyrone township, removing to Mount Braddock at an early day. He was the father of Isaac and George Meason, and a daughter, who married Daniel Rogers. John Meason lived on Green Lick Run, on the farm at present owned by Jacob Shank. Upon his death his family removed from the township.

Graft Ghost, or Gost, was a German, who served as a soldier in the French and Indian war in 1755, and later was with the garrison at Fort Ligonier. Having obtained a knowledge of this country from his experience in the army, he came to Westmoreland as a settler, working at his trade,—bell-making. At the instance of Col. Meason he opened a shop near the latter’s residence, where he made bells and sharp-edged tools until he had accumulated $2200 in Continental money, which proved worthless just about the time he was ready to invest it in land. This misfortune obliged him to begin life anew, but in time he secured from Meason 126 acres of land in Bullskin, and lived near where is now the home of George Adams. There he died in 1808. His only child became the wife of John Highlands, who died on the Gost homestead in 1826, leaving five daughters.

These married,—Christiana, Jesse Atkinson; Mary, Robert Fleming, and yet resides near the old home; Catharine is the wife of Christian Shank; Lavina, of Washington Kelley; and Sarah married George Brown, moving to Ohio.

William Boyd came from Virginia some time about the close of the Revolution, making the journey to his new home on the west border of Bullskin on pack-horses. He brought with him several slaves, and six negro children were registered as being born to these from 1795 to 1809, namely, Andrew, Millie, Ben, Prissie, Samuel, and Alexander, but of their subsequent history nothing can be here said. Wm. Boyd was a man of considerable education, and served for a number of years as a justice of the peace. He died in 1812, and was interred on his homestead. His family consisted of eight children,—Thomas, John, Robert, James, William, Jeremiah, and daughter, who married Joseph Barnett, of Connellsville, and Stewart H. Whitehill, who resided on the Mounts place many years. After 1812, Thomas Boyd lived on the homestead, where he carried on the distillation of liquor at an early day. He was a popular man among his fellow-citizens. Two of his sons, William and Richard Boyd, are yet residents of Bullskin. Other sons—John, Randolph, Thomas, and Rice—have died or removed. Thomas Boyd, Sr., died in 1855; John Boyd, the second son, died in 1857, at Connellsville; Robert moved to Menallen township; James died in Tyrone; William moved to Ohio; Jeremiah became a physician, and, after living in Louisiana a number of years, moved to Washington.

Christian Reist, a native of Lancaster County, settled in the Boyd neighborhood about 1800, and died in 1827. He had three daughters, two of whom married Thomas Boyd and Simon Roughcorn, and the third remained single, all of them long since deceased.

Presley Carr Lane was also a Virginian, who settled on the Henry D. Overholt place. He was a man of culture and great gentleness of manner, and, for those times, quite wealthy. He served in the Legislature with creditable distinction. The family removed to Kentucky before 1830, and the original homestead has been much divided.

Henry Freed, a native of Bucks County, Pa., after living a short time in Virginia, settled on Mounts Creek about 1785. He died about 1863, aged eighty-four years, having reared four sons and three daughters. Jacob, the eldest, married Susan Garver, a daughter of Martin Garver, a pioneer of Bullskin, and settled on that part of the homestead now owned by his son Joseph, where he died in August, 1875. Other sons were Henry, Samuel, and Jonathan, the former two living on Green Lick Run. Peter, the second son of Henry Freed, lived and died in Tyrone; John, the third, moved to McLean County, Ill.; Henry, the youngest, lived on the homestead west of the creek until his death, caused by an accident, about ten years ago. The land is now the property of the Cleveland Rolling-Mills. One of the daughters married Joseph Beidler, who lived on a farm adjoining the homestead; another married Jacob Overholts; and the third, Joseph Johnston, of Union township.

At Pennsville, and north of the village, a large tract of land was settled early by Peter Newmeyer. He died in 1836, aged seventy-five years, and was interred in the cemetery at the Baptist Church. His sons who attained manhood were named Jacob, David, Samuel, and Jonathan; and his daughters married,—Betsey, Henry Strickler, of Tyrone; Mary, Christian Newcomer, of Tyrone; Ann, David Shallenbarger, who lived on the Sherrick place; Rachel, Abraham Shallenbarger, who lived on the adjoining farm; Susan, Henry Arnold, of Connellsville; Hattie married Edward Riggs; Jacob Newmeyer married Ann Shallenbarger, and died in Tyrone; David moved to Ohio; Samuel married Elizabeth Staufler, and removed to the West; Jonathan married Mary Strickler, and lived on the home-place until his death, May 15, 1879, at the age of eighty years. None of the family remain in the township.

Abraham and David Shallenbarger lived on the fine farms west of Pennsville until their death. The former had sons named Jacob, John, Abraham, and David, all deceased. The sons of David Shallenbarger were John, Henry, Abraham, and David. The Shallenbarger farm is now well known as the home of A. H. Sherrick, whose family were pioneers in Westmoreland County.

John Shank, a German, after his emigration to America settled at Hagerstown, removing thence to Bullskin. He located on Mounts' Creek, building mills, about the beginning of the century, which occupied the site of Dettweiler's mills. He was a Menonite, and at his death was buried in the Menonite graveyard, on the township line between Tyrone. He had sons named John and Jacob; and the daughters married John Staufler, Martin Myers, who lived near the Shank place, and Christian Seigfried, of Westmoreland. Jacob Shank married Nancy Staufler, and settled a mile north from Pennsville, where he died in 1845. He was the father of John Shank, of Ohio; Henry, of the same State; and Christian and Jacob Shank, yet living in the township. The latter was for many years a journeyman hatter, having learned that trade of Herman Gehart, of Connellsville. The second son, John Shank, remained single, and died in the eastern part of the township. The Shanks have always been sober, steady citizens.

John Staufler removed to Bullskin from Hagerstown, Md., settling on a farm in the neighborhood of the Baptist Church, on which he died. His only son, John, lived at Mount Pleasant. A grandson, John C. Staufler, resides at Pennsville. Other families in the township bearing this name had a different origin and made a settlement at a later date.

Farther northeast two brothers, John and Joseph Rice, made pioneer settlements. John Rice lived east of the Mount Pleasant road, and was buried on his homestead. He was the father of Joseph, John, Abraham, Samuel, Jacob, and David Rice, the latter two yet living in the locality. His daughters married into the Kendig family. Joseph Rice lived in the same locality, and after his death the family removed.

Henry Lane, a native of New Jersey, moved from that State to Bullskin about 1796, but removed to Tyrone, where he died in 1821. His sons, James, Silas, and John, removed to the West, while William continues a resident of Bullskin. Near the same time, Asher Walker, also from New Jersey, settled on Mounts' Creek, but emigrated to Ohio, where he died. One of his sons, John, is a resident of Tyrone; and Asher lives on Jacob's Creek, in Bullskin.

Alexander Kelley was born in Ireland in 1769, but eighty years ago settled in Westmoreland County. Later he made his home north of Pennsville, where he died in 1850. He had sons named Samuel, George, John, James, Paul, Washington, and Campbell, the latter two yet living in the township.

John Troxel, a local preacher of the United Brethren Church, moved from Lebanon County, Pa., and settled in Westmoreland County about a mile from Bridgeport. He was the father of Michael and John B. Troxel, and of daughters, who married Abraham Pershing, Isaac Persburg, Moses Worman, and Martin Krider. The latter also came from Lebanon County, and settled on part of the Troxel lands in Bullskin, building the stone house and barn on Green Lick Run. After his death the family removed and the farm became the property of John B. Troxel, whose family yet reside there.

Northeast, Daniel Krider improved a farm, and lived there until his death; thence it became the property of Michael Farmer, and is now owned by his son, Robert C. They were pioneers in Tyrone township.

On the north of Green Lick were the improvements made by Abraham Pershing. He was born at Derry, Westmoreland Co., where his parents were among the first settlers. Part of the Pershing lands are now included in Bridgeport, and were first claimed by Thomas Meason. Abraham Pershing was one of the leading men of the township, serving many years as justice of the peace. He died in July, 1880, aged eighty-four years. He had sons named John, yet living on the home place; Daniel H., living on a farm next east; Isaac, living in California; and his only daughter, Anna, married Jacob Myers, of Ligonier.

George Brothers, a native of Maryland, and by trade a cooper, settled on Jacob's Creek in 1865, purchasing a part of the Wm. Robertson tract. Of his family, John died on the homestead; George was killed at the Belle Vernon Furnace; Austin died in the Rebellion; Washington, Andrew, and Lafayette yet live in the township, the latter on the homestead.
John Shupe, of Bucks County, Pa., settled on Jacob's Creek, on the Westmoreland side, in 1790 or earlier. He died in 1832. His son Jacob moved to the Lake Erie country in Ohio; John settled in Bulls-kin, on the farm now owned by his son, Daniel F., where he built mills. He died in 1862, aged eighty-two years. Two other sons died at Mount Pleasant, and William Shupe yet resides at Derry, aged ninety-two years. Their sisters married the Rev. Daniel Worman and John Shepard.

Coming a little later than some of the foregoing was Jacob Eshelman, a native of the eastern part of the State. He built oil-mills and other important industries. Of his family, a son, David, yet lives north of Shupe's. Eastward, on the Connellsville road, John Hoke made some substantial improvements on the farm now owned by his son James; and still farther east, near the Andrew Robertson place, Samuel Latta was a pioneer. On Green Lick, where now resides Henry Freed, Christian Gardner was an early and respected settler. He died there, and his family removed from the township. Peter Stauffer settled first near Mount Pleasant, about 1808. One of his sons, Jacob J., located on the Green Lick, where he died in 1877. Of his family, Peter is a physician at Connellsville, Jonathan resides on a part of the Keller place in Bullskin, Henry S. is a minister of the Evangelical Association, and William B. resides on the homestead. The daughters married Daniel Worman, J. W. Kinear, Simon Mertz, and Samuel Eshelman.

John Washabaugh came from Somerset County to Bullskin about 1815, settling at the base of Chestnut Ridge. He had sons named Joseph, Henry, Thomas, David, William, and Washington, the latter yet being a resident of the Green Lick Valley.

In the southern part of the township Thomas Atkinson was among the first settlers. He had sons named Jesse (who died on the Martin Detweiler place in 1849); James, Thomas, Richard, Charles, John, Robert, and Alexander, all of whom had removed from the township before their death. The only son of Jesse, George Atkinson, lived east of Pensville.

Henry Detweiler, a miller, came from Bucks County, settling in Fayette in 1820. In 1826 he became the owner of the Shunk mills on Mounts' Creek, where he died in 1847. His widow then improved the farm above the Gault school-house, and there died in 1856. Their children were Samuel; John S.; Martin, living in the township; Joseph, who died in 1845; Jacob, living in Ohio; Mrs. Henry Fritts; and Mrs. George Atkinson.

Northeast from Detweiler's Jacob Gault was a pioneer, but removed to Ohio many years ago. Farther down Mounts' Creek among the early settlers were John Smutz, Martin Garver, and westward John Stockman, the latter being a Dunkard preacher and a very estimable man. This place is now occupied by Jacob J. Stonacker. Near the old State road Thomas Herbert, a native of New Jersey, settled some time after 1800, but died at Connellsville. He had sons named Richard and James. The latter moved to Ohio, but Richard settled in the southern part of Bullskin, being a workman at the Finley Furnace. He died about 1850. One of his sons, Richard, resides in the Breakneck district, on a farm which was cleared up by Walter Duncan. In this locality the Huey and Long families were among the pioneers.

Soon after the settlement of the township John Miner located east of Mounts' Creek, and after a number of years of residence in that place was found dead on the hills near his farm, where he had gone for chestnuts. When discovered he was sitting upright against a tree. His only child was John Miner, born Nov. 30, 1798, and who lived on the farm until his death, May 14, 1877. He was one of the old-time justices of the peace, and a connecting link between the past and the present. Farther south the Kell farm was improved by Henry Zimmerman, from whom it passed to Gustavus Kell. Still farther south on the township line a family by the name of Buttermore made some of the early improvements, some of which are in Connellsville township, but none of that name remain in that locality. Numerous changes in the ownership of lands have taken place, and many of those who bore the brunt of opening homes in the wilds of the semi-mountainous country sought new homes in the great West, where they had to repeat the experiences of their pioneer lives. In 1823, after the final division of the township (Connellsville having been set off the year before), there were living in Bullskin the following property-owners, with occupations as indicated opposite their names:

In 1890 the population was 1231; fifty years later, in 1880, the population had increased to 2731.

CIVIL ORGANIZATION.

As originally organized by the Court of Quarter Sessions at the March term, 1784, Bullskin embraced within its limits the present townsip of Salt Lick, Connellsville, Springfield, and a part of Stewart. The order defining its bounds was as follows:

"A township beginning at the Broad Ford on the Youghiheney River; thence by the line of Tyrone township to the crossing of Jacob's Creek; thence up Jacob's Creek to Cherry's mill; thence by the road to Jones' mill to the line of Bedford County; thence by the same to the Youghiheney River; thence down the same to the place of beginning. To be known by the name of Bullskin township."

Until this time the territory was, for civil purposes, a part of Donegal township, now wholly in Westmoreland County. It does not appear that a good reason exists why the name Bullskin was bestowed upon the new township, but there is a tradition that some of the early settlers from Virginia selected it to commemorate the place of their nativity in that State. Another account says that one of the pioneers north of the Youghiheney killed an animal of the bovine species of such extraordinary size that its skin, he claimed, in a spirit of bragadocio, would have covered the entire country. From this circumstance the name was applied to that neighborhood, and later to the new township. Attempts have been made to change the appellation, but without noteworthy success, and the term, though not greatly in favor with the people, will probably ever be retained to designate this division of the county.

In the month of December, 1797, all that part of Bullskin lying east of the crest of Chestnut Ridge was formed into the township of Salt Lick; and in October, 1822, the southern part of the remaining township was carved off to constitute the township of Connellsville. A motion for such a purpose was made as early as August, 1816, when the Court of Quarter Sessions was petitioned to form such a township, and Joseph Torrance, William Hamilton, and James Pauli were appointed to inquire into the propriety of allowing the request. Had it been granted the newly-made township would have been styled the "Borough of Connells ville." With the idea of division in mind the court was again petitioned in March, 1822, when an order was issued to Isaac Meason, Moses Vance, and Thomas Boyd to act as commissioners to view the proposed township. On the 4th of June, 1822, their report was made and approved by the court, although not fully confirmed until Oct. 31, 1822, when Connells ville township was erected.

The boundary line between Tyrone and Bullskin being in dispute, the court was petitioned, January, 1831, to appoint commissioners to define the same, and their report, made March 9, 1831, was approved and confirmed in October of the same year. This report sets forth that "William Davidson, John Fuller, and Andrew Dempsey, the persons appointed by an order of this court at the January sessions to view the town line between Bullskin and Tyrone townships, report the following as the line between the points aforesaid, viz.: Beginning at the Mennonite meeting-house, and running thence by the several courses and distances of a public road, located from said meeting-house to the Connells ville and Pitts burg road, until it intersects the Connells ville town ship line, and thence along said line to the Broad Ford Run aforesaid, which report being read in the manner and at the time prescribed by law, the court approves and confirms the same."

At later periods slight modifications in the boundary lines of the township were made, yet in essential features Bullskin remains the same as when the township of Connells ville was taken off, containing only a farm or two less than at that time.

It is impossible to give a complete list of the officers of the original township of Bullskin, the records of that period being very meagrely kept, and in some instances wholly missing, but from various sources it has been ascertained that William Boyd, John Mea son, and George Lamb were among the first justices of the peace. In 1803 the township was embraced within the limits of Justice District No. 10, "Beginning at the mouth of Jacob's Creek, thence up said creek to Cherry's mill, by the Westmoreland County line to the top of Chestnut Ridge, thence by the top of said ridge to Younghoeheny River, thence down said river to the mouth of Jacob's Creek, the place of beginning, containing four hundred and fifty-two taxable persons." At this time the justices were "William Boyd, living near the centre of the township; John Meason, near one side; Matthew Gault, near one side; and George Mathews, near one side." In 1814, Andrew Robertson was a justice, and later the township, in connection with Tyrone and Connells ville, constituted District No. 11, and the justices were Abraham Pershing, Henry Gebhart, Henry W. Lewis, and Matthew Wray. After 1839 the names of the justices appear in the list below. Among other early officers of Bullskin were:

1786.—William McKee, constable; Henry White and William Boyd, road supervisors.

In 1847 the people of Bullskin were asked to vote on the liquor question, and ninety-nine voters declared themselves in favor of permitting its sale in the township, but thirteen voters being opposed. But in 1875 a contrary sentiment was shown, only thirty-two voting in favor of license, while one hundred and thirty expressed themselves opposed to the sale of liquor in any form.

The celebrated Braddock road runs along the southwestern bounds of the township, and in early times was the highway to the Youghiogheny and the older settlements to the Northwest. Soon other roads were located, and in 1784 the court was petitioned for a road from Cherry's mill to Unnton Town. Joseph Torrance, John Mintor, Providence Mounts, Adam Hatfield, Samuel McLean, and James Rankin were appointed viewers. The following year the road from Col. Cook's landing to Cherry's mill was ordered. The road from James Rankin's to Casper Etling's was reported on June, 1797, the width to be thirty-three feet. The road from Alexander Long's plantation to White's Mill was reported on the same court, the width to be eighteen feet.

In March, 1786, Zachariah Connell petitioned for a road "from Unnton to Jones' road, on the Laurel Hill, between Cherry's and Jones's mills, and Uriah Springer, Providence Mounts, Henry Schlater, Samuel Work, Samuel McLean, and William McKea appointed viewers." The June sessions decreed that it be cut, cleared, and bridged, thirty feet wide.

The road from the Bedford County line to the Westmoreland line was ordered in September, 1789, to be opened, thirty-three feet wide. William Robertson, William Kern, Benjamin Whaley, Jacob Stricker, and Isaac White were the viewers.

In April, 1869, the road from Casper Etling by John Fluck's mill, to the Mount Vernon Furnace was ordered, with Casper Etling, James Francis, James Rogers, Jonathan Mayberry, William Boyd, and Daniel Rogers as viewers.

The road from Jacob Thorpe's to the road from Lobengier's Mill to Connellsville was ordered in December, 1894, with Peter Newmeyer, John Rice, John Latta, William Robertson, Joseph Kithcart, and John Miner as viewers.

Many other roads were located about this period, but no further account of them can here be given. In general the highways of the township have been well ordered, and the roads are usually quite passable, the streams being well bridged. Since 1871 the township has had railway communication. That year the Southwest Pennsylvania Railroad was built through its territory, opening up its fine coal-fields and giving speedy access to Pittsburgh and the Eastern cities. The main line in Bullskin is about five miles, and sidings and flag-stations have been provided at Pennsville and Moyer's. Running up the Greenlick Valley is a narrow-gauge railway two and a half miles long, running from Scottsdale to the ore hills along Chestnut Ridge, which has been in operation several years.

GENERAL INDUSTRIES.

The streams of Bullskin yielding constant power have long been the motors for numerous mills, factories, and shops. Beginning with the lower power on Jacob's Creek, David Hough built a mill which is now Bridgeport as early as 1804, erecting the foundation on which now stands Snyder's Mill. Previously a saw-mill had been operated several hundred yards below by a man named Jarvis, a long raceway leading from a small dam to the mill. Robert McColl was the second owner of the power, and from him it passed in order to Jacob Tinsman and Jacob Welhouse. Isaac Shupe being a partner of the latter a short time. In 1836 the grist-mill was repaired by D. P. Patterson for the latter firm, but fourteen years later the property passed into the hands of the present owner, William Snyder, who put the mill now in operation in 1854. It is a frame, thirty-six by forty-eight feet, three and a half stories high, and is supplied with a hydraulic water-engine invented by William Snyder, which greatly economizes the water supply, which can be relied upon eight months per year. The remainder of the time the steam is the motor. On the Westmoreland side below the same dam is a saw-mill, operated by William Snyder, and formerly distilleries were here carried on by David Hough, and on the Bullskin side by Jacob Welhouse. The latter building is yet standing near the mill.

Near the residence of Daniel F. Shupe, John and Jacob Shupe had a small saw-mill and a trip-hammer for doing small forge-work about 1810. The power was abandoned, and in 1831 the present power was improved by John Shupe, the grist-mill also being erected that year. It had originally three run of stones, but at present has but two. From John Shupe the property passed into the hands of his son George, thence to the latter's son, Albert, who sold to the present owner, David G. Anderson. Here is also a circular-saw mill of good capacity, and both mills can be operated by steam in case of the failure of water.

Several miles above is the oldest water-power on Jacob's Creek within Bullskin. It was improved by Ralph Cherry in the time of the Revolution, and had a wide reputation, although but a rude mill. The Cherry interests became the property of John Lobengier, about the beginning of the present century, and the stone mill now standing in Westmoreland County was built by him about eighty years ago, Thomas Hoke performing the mason-work. Subsequently the mill was owned by Jacob Lobengier and his son Jacob, but is at present the property of Peter Keim's heirs. Below this mill, Jacob Lobengier has a saw-mill in Bullskin, and a tannery on the Westmoreland County side. The latter's residence was formerly in Bullskin, but a resurvey has placed it out of the county.

Near the mouth of Greenlick Run, John B. Troxel had a saw-mill sixty years ago, and the frame-work of an old mill yet stands there. Farther up on the same stream, on the present Samuel Freed place, Jacob Eshelman had a small grist-mill, and before 1823 an oil-mill and carding machinery. Subsequently George Yoder made linseed oil at this place. Upon the removal of the machinery a fulling-mill was established by Levi Haigh. He also made cloths, spinning and dyeing his wool as well as weaving it. The building last contained machinery for fulling clover. The power has long since been abandoned, but a part of the old race remains to indicate the spot where so much activity was displayed years ago. After Haigh left this building he established himself on the upper waters of Greenlick, where he carried on a woolen-factory, but that interest declining, he supplied machinery for making matched shingles. Between these two points Nathan Wright had a fulling-mill before 1823, but the place has long since been given over to other uses. Still farther down the stream Jacob Stauffer built a saw-mill, which has been owned and operated by Henry S. Stauffer, and is at present the property of Jonathan Stauffer. Yet lower down the stream a saw-mill has been operated the past fifty years by the Freed family, but is at this time (April, 1881) the property of W. Merritt. In the same neighborhood is a tannery, which was established more than a score of years ago by H. L. Sparks, and which, after having many owners, is now operated by John Gance. The product is limited, and consists of unfinished leather, formerly a currier was employed, and splendid leather produced.

On Spruce Run the Flack family had mills very early, soon after 1800, and afterwards a carding-machine and fulling-mill was operated by the power. The property passed into the hands of Jacob Sweetzer, but its use for manufacturing purposes had long since been discontinued, although the building yet remains.

Near the head-waters of Mounts' Creek, D. H. Pershing has in successful operation a good saw-mill, which has cut up a large quantity of the mountain timber in that locality. Down the same stream, Joseph Kithcart built saw- and grist-mills about 1790, the latter being a log structure. The present mills were built by Joseph Andrews about 1853. It is a frame of good proportions, and the mills have both water and steam as motors. Andrews was succeeded by Emanuel Mason; thence by Isaiah Coughenour; thence by C. A. Ebersole, and since October, 1880, the mills have been owned and operated by James Alexander Long. There are two runs of stones, and the saw-mill has a fair capacity. At these mills Solomon E. Swink opened a general store in January, 1881. John Stonecker had a pottery here about 1829, which was carried on about a dozen years.

More than a mile farther down the stream Adam Hatfield made a claim in 1780, receiving a patent for the land in 1785. That year he sold it to John Shank, who built mills there, which were operated by him until 1816, when Adam Stonecker became the owner; thence, in 1824, Samuel Trevor; thence, in 1826, Henry Detweiler; and since 1847 Samuel Detweiler has operated the mills. The second mill on the site was put up by Henry Detweiler in 1834, and stood until it was consumed by fire, Sept. 26, 1864. The present mill was gotten in operation in November, 1865, by Samuel Detweiler. It is a frame, 49 by 50 feet, four stories high, and the motor is both water and steam, the combined power being equal to thirty horses. Steam was supplied in 1851. The mill has three runs of stones and modern machinery, being equal in its appointments to any mill in the county. The present saw-mill was built in 1855.

On the John Miner place was formerly a distillery, carried on by that family, and lately a steam saw-mill, which has been removed.

Where is now Boyd's saw-mill Christian Reist had a saw-mill in the early settlement of the country, and later another mill was operated there by Thomas Boyd. The present mill is owned by Wm. Boyd, who also had a shingle-mill before 1857. The race-way is 80 rods long, and there is a tradition that it was dug for fifty cents per rod, much of the excavation being solid rocks. On Butler Run, George Hatfield and others had a small saw-mill, which have been discontinued.

On White's Run, Henry White had saw- and grist-mills soon after the settlement of the township, small and rude at first, but giving place to better mills in time, which had many owners. In the order of possession were Boyd & Davidson, Thomas and Joseph Boyd, Thomas R. Davidson, Dr. James C. Cummings, and, later, the heirs of T. R. Davidson. For the past four years the property has belonged to Nathan Gilmore. The present mill was built about thirty years ago. It is a fine building and has good machinery, but the location is unfavorable for a successful milling business. The saw-mill is more successfully operated.

A number of small tanneries have been carried on in Bullskin, and several of greater proportions. In 1838, Levi Bradford built a good tannery at the Yellow Stone Springs, which had a capacity for working up three thousand hides per year. After a few years steam was supplied, and although the tannery has been discontinued a score of years, the boiler was not removed until recently. Fayette Tannery was operated nineteen years by Levi Bradford, and several years more by John Taylor.

At Pennsville, Benjamin Shallenbarger had a tannery about 1812, the yard being just above the barn of Jacob J. Stonecker. Samuel Newmeyer carried on the business next. Tanning was also carried on by the Shallenbargers on the A. H. Sherrick farm; but some time about 1852 they put up a good tannery in the western part of Pennsville, having a yard under roof which contained thirty vats. Steam-power was used, and a large amount of business was done by the several firms,—the Shallenbarger Brothers, Levi Bradford, Boyd & Overholt, and Boyd, Myers & Co. The latter firm owned the tannery when it ceased to operate, about 1873, Eli McClellan being the manager.

The abundance of fire-clay has made the manufacture of brick a profitable industry in the township, and several works have lately been established. The "Southwest Fire-Brick Works" were built at Moyer Station in 1871, by Sysson, Kilpatrick & Co., and are yet operated by that firm. Employment is given to seventeen hands, under the management of Anthony Sourd. The works are well appointed, including four ovens, having a capacity of eight thousand fire-brick (for lining coke-ovens) per day, which find a ready market in the county.

On the Narrow-Gauge Railroad at Green Lick, John W. Kinneer began the manufacture of fire-brick in the summer of 1881, and after a successful season the works were destroyed by fire, March 29, 1881. The moulding-room was thirty-five by eighty feet, with large engine-house attached. Four thousand brick per day were made. It is the purpose of the proprietor to rebuild the works.

The manufacture of iron constituted an important industry in Bullskin half a century ago. Along the base of Chestnut Ridge an excellent quality of ore is found, which is easily fluxed, producing a metal which is highly esteemed. Near one of these mineral deposits, on Mounts' Creek, north of the centre of the township, "the Mount Vernon Furnace" was built about 1807 or 1808, by Isaac Meason, for his son Isaac, who operated it a number of years. It had but a small stack, yet was so well managed that in all about sixty men were employed. Before the furnace went out of blast, in 1830, the second growth of timber was cut over for the purpose of making the charcoal necessary to carry it on. Considerable metal was cast into kettles and other moulded work at the furnace, the products being carried to Connellsville for shipment. Among the managers were Jonathan Mayberry and a young man named Taylor. The furnace was last operated by David B. Long, and by him blown out of blast. Nothing but the stack, a solid piece of masonry, remains to show the location, on land which is now the property of George Hogg. Several years after the furnace was abandoned, John Anderson worked over a part of the cinders, having a small stamping-machine for this purpose, his enterprise being attended with considerable profit. In the neighborhood of the old furnace ore is now mined by the Charlotte Furnace Company of Scottsdale, the products of the mines being carried away by their narrow-gauge railway, which has its eastern terminus in these hills. Formerly the furnace-owners had mills to cut their own lumber and to grind the feed for their animals, but the powers in use have long since been abandoned. In the southern part of the township, on White’s Run, the “Findley Furnace” was erected in 1818. It was more widely known by the name of Breakneck, a term which was applied to it while being built on account of an accident which one of the workmen sustained, falling from the stack at the risk of bodily injury, which caused him to say “that it was a regular breakneck affair.” The enterprise was begun by Col. William L. Miller, but before the furnace was completed Messrs. Rogers and Paull became interested parties, although Col. Miller was the nominal owner and manager. Later the furnace was carried on by John Boyd and William Davidson as lessees, and last by David B. Long, who blew it out of blast in the fall of 1837. The furnace had a capacity of one hundred tons per month, but the product usually did not exceed seventy tons. The water supply failing, steam was supplied several years before the furnace was discontinued. In the foundry department from four to six moulders were employed. Among the workmen at both of the foregoing furnaces was George Adams, now one of the most aged citizens of Bullskin.

The mining of coal and manufacture of coke at present constitutes the chief interest in the development of the minerals in Bullskin. For some years the “Pennsville Mines” property has been the most productive. It was owned by A. H. Sherrick, and embraces all the privileges of one hundred and sixty-five acres of land. Here coal was mined in a small way fifty years ago by the Shallenbargers and others, but it was not until 1872 that the product of the mines was converted into coke. In that year Mr. Sherrick began the construction of his coke-works, grading a yard about a quarter of a mile from the line of the Southwest Pennsylvania Railroad. Seventy ovens were built, and most of them lighted in the summer of 1873. Nearly all of these have been kept in fire since that time, the daily product being from seven to nine cars of forty-eight-hour coke. The shaft in the mine has been sunk to the depth of one-third of a mile, and the coal is taken from a nine-foot vein, which is underlaid by a fine stratum of limestone. In connection with the mines are several shops and seven dwellings. The hands employed number fifty, and are under the personal superintendence of A. H.

Sherrick. L. M. Smith is the yard boss, and Alexander Taylor the pit boss. These works now embrace seventy ovens, and are owned and operated by A. O. Tinstman & Co.

The Eldorado Coke-Works at Moyer’s antedate those at Pennsville by about one year. In 1871, John Moyer, of Mount Pleasant, secured the coal privilege of a tract of land belonging to the Beidler farm, and engaged to erect forty ovens adjoining the railroad-track, having a sub-lease from Brunot & Detweiler. After the coke-works were operated several years they became the property of Brunot & Detweiler, who leased them to W. F. Zuck and Joseph B. Henry, who were the operators till August, 1880, when the property passed into possession of the Cleveland Rolling Mill Company. To the original forty ovens forty more had been added by Zuck & Henry, and one hundred and forty-five more have since been added by W. J. Rainey & Co., the present owners. The company controls the coal of three hundred and four acres, owning the entire privileges of one hundred and fifty acres thereof, and having a large capital at command, will prosecute the work till the enterprise at this point will be one of the most important in the county. In April, 1881, one hundred and twenty-five men were employed under the superintendence of Frank R. Bradford. The yard boss was J. W. Brooks, and the mines were carried on under the direction of J. B. Henry. The coal is superior for coking, and lies in a vein nine feet in thickness. On the 1st of March, 1881, a new shaft was sunk, from which will be drawn the future supplies of the works. In addition to the attendant buildings at the cokery, the company carries on a store and owns seventy-five neat, residences which are occupied by the workmen. At Moyer’s is a flag-station of the Southwest Pennsylvania Railroad, and a post-office, which was established Dec. 20, 1880, with John H. McAfee postmaster. It is kept in the store of David Lontz, and two mails per day are provided. The mercantile business at that point was established in the spring of 1880 by Zuck & Henry, passing from them to Lontz in the fall of the same year.

PENNsville.

This hamlet, the oldest in Bullskin township, is on the Mount Pleasant road, four miles from Connells-ville, and about a mile east from the Tyrone line. It is a flag-station on the Southwest Pennsylvania Railroad, contains a very fine school edifice, a church, several stores, and about two dozen houses. The lots were sold off from the Cochrane and Strickler farms by George Newmeyer and W. P. Kelley, among the first purchasers being Henry Shallenbarger and Bushrod Washington, both putting up houses about 1848 in the vicinity of the Disciples’ meeting-house. The Pennsville post-office was established soon after, and was first kept by David Shallenbarger. Thence came, as other postmasters, John J. Hurst, J. M. Kurtz, Loyd Shallenbarger, Rice Boyd, L. F. Miller, for one and a half years, and since Jan. 1, 1880, Dr. Wm. Chalfant. The office has two mails per day. The first store at Pennsville was kept by John S. Strickler in the long building opposite the present Miller stand. This was occupied by many firms, among others by Christopher Stonecker, David Shallenbarger, John J. Hurst, Franks & Overholt, Loyd Shallenbarger, John McAdams, Joseph Newcomer, Rice Boyd, Boyd & Overholt, Livingood & Miller, and L. F. Miller. In 1872 the latter occupied his present business house, where, in April, 1881, he associated with A. H. Sherrick, under the firm-name of Miller & Sherrick. Other merchants in the place have been Christian Pool, Hosack & Bougher, Austin and John Campbell, and George Newmeyer, the latter in the small brick building on the present Stoner farm.

In former days Pennsville had several large mechanic shops, and since 1852 Wm. C. Lyon has carried on wagon-making at this place. From 1830 to 1853 fanning-mills were here made by David Shallenbarger and George Newmeyer & Co. From four to eight men were employed in the shops, and three or four men were kept engaged pelling the mills throughout the country.

Alexander Frazer had the first public-house, keeping it in the house now occupied by his widow, and serving as landlord eight years, from 1850 till 1858. At that time a line of stages ran through the place, and the office was at the Frazer tavern. Near the same time Stephen McIntyre had an inn where is now the residence of Eli McClellan, and when he retired the house was kept by Samuel and John Eicher, the last to keep a tavern at Pennsville, which has not had a public-house for a score of years. At the last-named place a stage-office was also kept. In the period of the great Western immigration, from 1785 to 1812, many taverns were kept in Bullskin, but as these were more of the nature of traveler's inns, and the doors of nearly every house on the principal thoroughfares were open to accommodate the home-seekers, no account of them is taken here.

Country stores have been kept at various points in Bullskin. At Detweiler's and Long's Mills, north of Pennsville, a store was opened in 1865 by John T. Stauffer for the sale of dry-goods. It was sold to William Lane, who changed it to a grocery-store, and as such it has been continued the past fourteen years by Nancy Stillwagon. The village of Bridgeport, on Jacob's Creek, is partly in Bullskin, but all the business interests are in Westmoreland County.

Dr. Apollos Lohr was probably the first regular physician to locate in Bullskin. He opened an office at Pennsville in 1839, and had as a contemporary a short time his brother, Dr. James Lohr. Both removed to Ohio. Before they left Dr. John Lutz came as a practitioner, and continued until his death, about twenty years ago. Next came Dr. W. D. Riggs, who was succeeded, in April, 1867, by the present physician, Dr. W. B. Chalfant, who came to Pennsville from Brownsville. He graduated at the Cleveland Medical College in 1859. He enjoys the reputation of being a successful practitioner.

EDUCATIONAL AND RELIGIOUS.

One of the first schools in the township was taught in a building near the Baptist Church. It was simply a log cabin, but the school was well attended, and for those times was considered very good. Pupils were in attendance from the Stonecker, Shank, Newmeyer, Stockman, Latta, Shallenbarger, Highlands, Myers, Smutz, Garver, and other families. In the northern part of the township the settlers first sent their children to Westmoreland County. One of the first schools in what is known as Mud District was taught by Samuel Shupe, and later by George A. Hollingsworth. The Lattas, Freed's, Shafers, Robertsons, and others were among the first attendants.

In what is known as the Gault District was one of the pioneer school buildings, where David Lindsay taught a number of years. He was a teacher the greater part of his life, his death occurring some time about 1849. Mrs. Lindsay yet lives, at the home of her daughter, Mrs. C. Kelley, at the age of eighty years. Her recollections of early school-days would not encourage many to engage as teachers. The salary was small, and much of the pay consisted of farm produce, or such things as the settlers could conveniently spare, at the rate of $1.50 per scholar for a quarter's instruction.

Under the common-school system Bullskin was divided in 1836 into districts, and the families residing therein enumerated. District No. 1, answering in general to the present Breakneck District, had forty-seven families; District No. 2, or the southwest part of the township, contained forty families; District No. 3, now about the Gault District, had forty-one families; District No. 4, the northwest part of the township, had thirty-nine families. The First Half-District—the Pennsville settlement—had twenty-one families; the Second Half-District—those living at what is now Bridgeport—had nineteen families; and in the Mountain District lived John Stauffer, Jacob Anderson, Washington Washabaugh, Amos Butler, Christopher Butler, David Washabaugh, John Hoffmans, Samuel Bauders, Samuel White, Abraham Cox, and Samuel Coffman.

The board of directors was composed of Wm. Andrews, president; D. B. Long, secretary; Henry Detweiler, treasurer; Thomas Boyd, George Brothers, Richard Gault, and Henry Freed. These voted, Aug. 13, 1856, to open schools at the Findley Furnace, at Richard Gault's, and at Abraham Pershing's. James Pemberton was the teacher at Findley; David Lindsay at Gault's, and the following year taught at Pershing's. In 1857 the school-house in the Kell District was erected by Wm. Boyd for $288. The same year the Mountain District was allowed to build a school-house at the expense of the citizens of the township. In May of the same year it was voted to sign a contract for an octagon school-house in the First Half-District. This house was on the Tyrone line, west of Pennsville, and was a prominent landmark in its day. The teachers in 1837 and the few years following were G. Buttermore, George W. Newmeyer, Robert Huey, Ann Parker, Anna C. Pershing, John Strickler, Sarah Ulrey, James W. Snow, James A. Black, Randolph Boyd, George Frick, Josiah Stillwagon, Joseph D. Long, Wm. Hixon, Joseph Sechrist, David Lindsey, Jonathan Garver, John Edgar, Henry Snively, Elijah Yunkin, Henry Ulrey, Martha McKown, John Harrold, John L. Means, James Pemberton, Sarah Kell, Wm. P. Baker, Nancy Robertson, John M. Peoples, Otho Williams, Francis Andrews, James Hunter, Austin Lane, Davis A. The township has been supplied with a good class of buildings, those in several districts being commodious beyond what is generally found in the country. The school building at Pennsville is a two-story brick, which has been furnished throughout with modern furniture and apparatus. The builder was P. C. Grim, receiving therefor $215, and the house was turned over to the board of directors Nov. 23, 1876, as conforming in every particular with the terms of the contract. This house took the place of a small brick house which stood on its site, and which was the successor of the octagon house. The Pennsville school was attended in 1850 by 44 male and 38 female pupils, who were under the instruction of J. M. Moore. The average daily attendance was just one-half the number enrolled. Other teachers of the school were, in 1871, Lucy Enfield; 1872, H. R. Franus; 1873, D. McClellan; 1874, N. B. Tannehill; 1875, J. S. Spiegel and Jacob Aulby; 1876, James S. Best; 1877, John H. Wodeh; 1878, Lizzie Leonard; 1879, Clark Frazer and George Sherrick.

In 1880 the gross amount of tax levied for school purposes was $3250.06, of which amount $8190 was devoted to teachers' salaries. The number of schools was thirteen, each having a male teacher. Five months of school were maintained at an average salary of $20.38 per month. The number of male pupils enrolled was 351; of females, 286. The average per cent. of attendance was 77. The estimated value of the school property was $20,000. A small portion of Bollskin is embraced within the Bridgeport Independent District, whose territory is mainly in Westmoreland County. The district has three school buildings, one being in Bollskin. It is a brick house of fine size, and was built in 1875. The schools of this district have a fine reputation for scholarship and attendance.

THE PENNSVILLE REGULAR BAPTIST CHURCH.

Soon after 1800 the settlers living in the western part of Bollskin and in the eastern part of Tyrone united to build a meeting-house, which should be consecrated to the worship of God by any and all, irrespective of denomination. It stood on land leased perpetually from the John Shank farm, a portion of the lot being set apart for cemetery purposes. The house was of logs, with seats made of slabs, having legs of saplings inserted in auger-holes. The pulpit was simply a board nailed on two upright pieces of lumber. In the course of years the house was weatherboarded, provided with a ceiling, better seats, and a pulpit which was a very elaborate affair. It was made of wild cherry, the different parts being held together by wooden pins. It was elevated about six feet above the floor, and had a huge sounding-board. On either side were places for the reading-and singing-clerks. The building was commonly designated as the "White Meeting-House," and was the regular place of service of the Baptists living along Jacob's Creek. These first had their membership with the church at Connelsville, and after 1828 with the Mount Pleasant Church. Among the members of that period were Allen and John Pippett and their wives, Sarah Walker, Christiana Highlands, Mary Gault, Catharine Highlands, Ann, Rachel, David, Jacob, and Jonathan Newmeyer, and Abraham Shallenbarger, who was a deacon. One of the first ministers was the Rev. James Estep, who may properly be termed the father of the church at Pennsville. Other ministers of the Mount Pleasant Church were as follows: Rev. William Shadrach, from 1828 to 1836; Rev. John Rockefellar, 1836-38; Rev. Isaac Wima, 1839; Rev. Simeon Seigfried, 1840-42; Rev. Milton Sutton, 1843; Rev. John Parker, 1844-46; Rev. Milton Sutton, 1847-52; Rev. W. A. Caldwell, 1854-55; Rev. William Shadrach, 1856. The increase of members at Mount Pleasant induced the church to demand the entire ministerial services of their pastor, the Rev. B. F. Woodburn, and in 1868 the Jacob's Creek Church became a separate organization. It was duly constituted August 10th, when William C. Lyon was elected clerk, and Conrad Bowers treasurer. Jonathan Newmeyer and Conrad Bowers, deacons of the Mount Pleasant Church, were continued, and Jacob Overholt and Daniel Reese were newly-elected deacons. The Rev. W. W. Hickman became the first pastor, and on the 19th of August, 1868, the deacons were ordained to their office by the Council convened at that time. The church was received into the Monongahela Association Sept. 1, 1868, having at that time 90 members on its rolls. The aggregate number of those who have belonged was 139, and the present membership is 56. The present deacons are William C. Lyon and Jacob H. Echard. The former is also the church clerk.

In March, 1871, the Rev. David Williams was called to the pastorate, and in the fall of 1872 a parsonage was built on a lot adjoining the church. Four years later it was sold, and is now a private residence. In November, 1873, Jacob H. Echard and D. P. Patterson were elected deacons. July 7, 1875, Deacon Bowers, one of the chief members of the church, died. The Rev. D. Williams served as pastor until Jan. 29, 1876, when he was succeeded by the Rev. W. T. Hughes, who remained one year. Then the pulpit was supplied a short time by Rev. W. S. Wood, but in September, 1877, the Rev. Joseph M. Collins became the pastor, and has since maintained that relation, preaching one-half of his time at Scottdale.

The present meeting-house occupies a site adjoining the lot where the old house stood, and was built in 1852, the building committee being Jonathan Newmeyer and Conrad Bowers. It is a brick edifice, forty-three by fifty-five feet, and is plainly furnished. The trustees in 1881 were Jacob H. Echard, George Atkinson, and Jacob Overholt. In this house is maintained a good Sabbath-school, which has about eighty members. For many years William C. Lyon has been its superintendent.

In the old White meeting-house, services were occasionally held by the adherents of Alexander Campbell, that minister himself preaching there several times. Those who espoused his belief were, among others, Christian Shank, David Shallenbarger, and their wives, Andrew Rees and wife, Mrs. Arnold, Jacob Lobengier, Bushrod Washington, Hamilton Cunningham, Jonas Ellenbarger, Elizabeth Ellenbarger, Jacob K. Shank, Michael Myers, Joseph, Jonathan, Susan, Lydia, Catherine, and Henry Shallenbarger. These and others constituted the Pennsville Disciples' Church.

In 1858 a lot of ground was purchased in the hamlet of Pennsville, and a meeting-house erected thereon by a board of trustees, composed of Christian Shank, Jonathan Shallenbarger, and Jacob Lobengier, which thereafter constituted the place of worship. For a time the church flourished under the ministry of the Revs. Dorsie, Streator, Piatt, Parker, and Lobengier; but the removal of many members caused the interest to decline, and finally services were altogether suspended, the remaing interest being absorbed by the Bethel Church of Tyrone township. A proposition to sell the meeting-house caused some members living in Bullskin to exert themselves to raise funds to repair the building and again make it an inviting place of worship. Active in this movement were Richard Boyd and wife, and by some effort the purpose was accomplished. Thence, in connection with the church at Bethel, semi-monthly meetings were established, the chief speaker being L. C. McLain, and at present about thirty persons in the township claim fellowship with the Disciples' Church at Pennsville, which is yet auxiliary to the Bethel Church.

The Fairview United Brethren Church.

This house of worship is in the Pershing neighborhood, standing on a lot of ground which was donated for this purpose and for a burial-place by Abraham Pershing. It is a plain frame, and was built in the summer of 1847. Previously the meetings of the denomination were held in the Pershing school-house, in the same neighborhood, the principal members belonging to the Troxel and Pershing families. The services were held at long intervals, the preacher coming from a distance, and this being one of a number of appointments. When the house was built Rev. John R. Sitman was the preacher in charge. Since that time among the ministers have been the following: Revs. Beichtel, Holmes, Harunden, Ritter,
The church has about sixty members, and William W. Troxel as steward; the trustees are John Pershing, Daniel H. Pershing, and Daniel Troxel.

On the 12th of May, 1850, a Sunday-school was organized in this house, with Abraham Pershing, superintendent; J. B. Sherrick, D. Tinstman, and John Pershing, managers; William S. Walker, secretary; Jacob Zundie, Simon Bitts, Eli Wilkins, Isaac Pershing, Mary A. Heckathorn, Nancy Rice, Caroline Welhouse, and Catherine Sprankle, teachers. It was the first Sabbath-school in Bullskin, and has been kept up ever since. The present superintendent is Henry Huebenthal.

In the minutes of the Sunday-school for Aug. 4, 1850, appears an account of a very remarkable solar phenomenon: "To-day an extraordinary phenomenon appeared about the sun, and was seen by the whole school. It consisted of two large circles around the sun, which seemed to join or run into each other at the eastern and western sides; and another very large circle west of the sun, with the eastern side of the ring in or over the sun. There also appeared in the eastern horizon an arc, resembling a rainbow in colors, which was only an eighth of a circle large." This remarkable exhibition occurred between the hours of ten and eleven in the forenoon, while the sky was beautifully clear and the air pleasant and warm. It created a profound impression at the time, and as there soon after occurred a virulent epidemic, which caused the death of a member in nearly every family, making fearful inroads upon the membership of the school, it was looked upon as a sign of warning and an omen of evil, which brought a salutary influence in the minds of the afflicted people. In addition to the superintendents already named there have served in that capacity J. B. Sherrick, J. B. Troxel, D. H. Pershing, and R. C. Farmer.

The Mount Olive United Brethren Church.

This is a place of worship of a class of that denomination residing east of the central part of the township. The house is a neat frame on the highway, a quarter of a mile south from Detweiler's Mills. It was built in 1871 on an acre of ground secured from the John Miner farm, a part of which is devoted to cemetery purposes, and is a frame thirty-three by forty feet. It cost two thousand two hundred dollars, and the building committee was composed of Samuel Detweiler, Richard Herbert, and J. S. Longanecker, who were also the first trustees. The church was appropriately consecrated in November, 1871, by the Rev. D. Speck. Prior to the building of the church the society worshiped in the Gault school-house. Among the early members were the Gault, Stauffer, Frrets, and Detweiler families. At present there are about seventy members, having J. S. Longanecker as steward. The church belongs to a circuit which embraces besides the churches at Connellsville and Fairview, and has had, in the main, the same ministerial supply as the last-named church.

In 1872 a Sunday-school was established in the church, which had for its superintendent J. S. Longanecker. The attendants number about one hundred in the summer season, the school seldom being continued the entire year.

The Paradise Church of the Evangelical Association.

This small but inviting place of worship in the Stauffer neighborhood, in the Green Lick Valley, was built in the fall of 1876 on a lot of land given for that purpose by Jacob J. Stauffer. The trustees in charge were Henry S. Stauffer, David Glassburner, and Peter Rhodes, who yet constitute the board. The membership of the church is small, numbering but fifteen, and the appointment is a part of the Mount Pleasant Circuit, the Rev. Woodhull being the preacher in charge.

In the northeastern part of the township, a small class of members of the Evangelical Association was formed about 1872, which has flourished, so that it now has its own house of worship and about thirty members. The present class-leader is David L. Miller, and John Mull is the church steward.

The Mount Pisgah Church is the spiritual home of the above class. It is a plain frame house, twenty-eight by thirty-eight feet, and was consecrated to divine worship in December, 1877, by the Rev. W. M. Stanford, of Pittsburgh. The trustees in 1881 were David L. Miller, John Mull, and David Coffinman. The members of the Mount Pisgah Church belong to the Indian Creek Circuit, and have had the same ministers as the Evangelical Churches of Salt Lick.

DUNBAR TOWNSHIP.

Dunbar,² lying on the Youghiogheny River, had in June, 1880, a population of 6327, including Dunbar village, East Liberty, and New Haven borough. It has the Youghiogheny on the north, separating it from Tyrone township, the townships of Wharton and Stewart on the south, the Youghiogheny on the east, separating it from the townships of Connellsville and Springfiled, and the townships of Franklin and North Union on the west.

Dunbar is a township rich in not only agricultural but mineral resources, and it has become a proverb that it is the banner township in Fayette County. The total assessed value of Dunbar township subject to a county tax, as returned upon the assessment-roll for 1881, was $1,735,749.

The surface of the country is generally uneven, and on the southeast it is wild and mountainous. In that section iron ore is found in abundance. Numerous streams traverse the township, of which Dunbar creek, a rapid water-course, is the most important. Two lines of railway, the Fayette County and the Southwest Pennsylvania, connecting Uniontown and Connellsville, run in parallel courses in Dunbar, sometimes scarcely fifty feet apart. The first is under lease to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. The second, completed in 1876, is operated by the Pennsylvania Railroad. Both lines enjoy a very profitable traffic in the transportation of vast quantities of coke, iron, and coal. The coke-burning, coal-mining, and iron-making interests in Dunbar are extensive and lucrative, and give at this present time employment to fully two thousand five hundred people in the township. Business enterprises now under way and in progress will soon materially increase that number. Coal abounds everywhere in almost exhaustless quantities, and must for years to come prove a source of great revenue, as well as a promoter of busy industry in every quarter. Dunbar village, the centre of an important coke-making region and iron-making, district, is a thriving town, whose growth has been steady, sure, and still increasing as rich business interests develop about it.

EARLY SETTLEMENT OF THE TOWNSHIP.

The first settlements in the region now called Dunbar township were made upon and near the locality designated as Mount Braddock. Christopher Gist was the first to lead the way hither in 1752. Before Gist came the only settlers even vaguely supposed to have been in the county are said to have been the Browns.² Gist must have had his family in and occupied his cabin in the early fall of 1753, for Washington recorded in the narrative of his embassy to the French posts that in November of that year he "passed Mr. Gist's new settlement." Gist's cabin was on that part of the Mount Braddock lands later known as the Jacob Murphy place. The farm on which he located belongs now to William Beeson. Gist lived in North Carolina and Virginia previous to 1753, and in 1750 was employed by the old Ohio Company as land agent. In pursuance of his duties he frequently visited the Ohio Indians. In 1751 he made a tour among the Indian tribes on the Muskingum, Scioto, and Miami. Upon his return from his explorations in the Ohio valley, he declared of that country that nothing but cultivation was needed to make it a delightful region. His missions were all on behalf of the Ohio Company, to conciliate the Indians and keep a lookout for good lands. In the latter part of 1753 he accompanied Washington as his guide from Wills' Creek (Cumberland) to the French posts on the Allegheny. He was again with him in his military expedition of 1754, and with Braddock in 1755. His expeditions in 1754 included also a journey with Capt. Trent for the purpose of assisting in what proved the fruitless effort of the Ohio Company to build a fort at the Forks of the Ohio. It has been asserted by authorities that "Gist induced eleven families to settle around him on lands presumed to be within the limits of the Ohio Company's grant." Although nothing but this vague tradition appears to have been preserved touching these families, there seems no reason for disputing the truth of the statement that families were settled about Gist as early as 1754 at least. In testimony to this it may be cited that the report of Monsieur de Villiers, the French commander of the expedition against Washington at Fort Necessity in 1754, set forth that upon his return he not only ordered the house at the intrenchment at Gist's to be burned down, but "detached an officer to burn the houses round about."³

Gist, by the very nature of his business as land agent and land explorer, was likely to note the most desirable localities for settlements, and being himself evidently bent upon making a new home for himself and family wherever he could find in the Monongahela country a place that suited him, he was naturally on the lookout for a more than usually inviting spot. This spot he found at Mount Braddock, as is evidenced by the fact of making his new home there. The Virginia commissioners' certificate for that land, issued to Thomas Gist in 1789, recited that Christopher Gist settled upon it in 1753.

Christopher Gist's agency for the Ohio Company appears to have ended in 1755. In the fall of that year he raised a company of scouts on the Maryland and Virginia frontiers, and thereafter was known as Capt. Gist. In 1756 he was sent Southwest to enlist a body of Cherokee Indians into the English service. In 1757 he was appointed Deputy Indian agent in the South. Washington indorsed the appointment in the remarks, "I know of no person so well qualified for the task. He has had extensive dealings with the Indians, is in great esteem among them, well acquainted with their manners and customs, indefatigable and patient, and as to his honesty, capacity, and zeal I dare venture to engage."

With the defeat of Braddock in 1755 ended for a time at least the efforts of English settlers to find permanent homes west of the mountains, and Gist, like others who had hoped to stop where they had gathered their families, hastened to change his habitation to more peaceful regions. From 1755 to 1758, while the French held possession of the country along the Monongahela and Youghiogheny, no attempts at settlements were made. The savages and wild beasts were the only inhabitants of the territory now called Fayette County. After the expulsion of the French, in 1758, many of the old settlers returned, and among them came Gist. Although he himself came in 1759 and resumed actual possession of his lands on Mount Braddock, he did not effect a permanent settlement with his family until 1765, for it was not until that year that Indian troubles in this section were even temporarily disposed of. For some reason, however, he decided to end his days in his old Southern home, and so after a while, transferring his Mount Braddock lands to his son Thomas, he returned to either Virginia or North Carolina and there died. Left behind in Fayette was Thomas Gist and William Cromwell, the latter a son-in-law of Christopher Gist. This Wil- liam Cromwell subsequently set up a claim under the Ohio Company to a part of the Gist lands "in the forks of the roads to Fort Pitt and Redstone," including Isaac Wood's farm, asserting a gift of it to his wife from her father, and a settlement thereof in 1753. Cromwell sold his land claim to Samuel Lyon, between whom and Thomas Gist a long controversy was waged for possession, which fell ultimately to Gist.

Christopher Gist had three sons—Nathaniel, Thomas, and Richard—and two daughters. Of the latter, Anne never married; Violet married William Campbell. All the sons received lands on Mount Braddock from their father, but their rights were eventually united in Thomas. He died in 1786, and was buried on his Mount Braddock farm. Soon after his death the Gists left the township for Kentucky, after disposing of their land holdings to Col. Isaac Meason. Thomas Gist was a man of some note, and is said to have once entertained Washington at his house.

George Paull, a Virginian, became a resident of the Gist neighborhood in 1768. The place of his location was known as Deer Park. His son James, known as Col. Paull, became a man of considerable note, and owned large land interests in various portions of the county. At the age of eighteen he entered upon a military career as a member of a company guarding Continental stores at Fort Bard (Brownsville). This was in August, 1778. In May, 1781, he was commissioned first lieutenant by Thomas Jefferson, Governor of Virginia, and set out to take part in a proposed campaign against Detroit. In April, 1782, he was drafted for a month's frontier duty near Pittsburgh, and in May, 1782, he joined Crawford's expedition to Sandusky as a private. After a harrowing experience he escaped from the troubles of that campaign only to resume his warlike experience in 1784. In 1790 he served with distinction as a major of the Pennsylvania militia in Harmar's campaign against the Indians. Later in life he became a colonel of militia. After 1790 he devoted himself to the peaceful pursuits of home life, and for a time was engaged as an ironmanufacturer at Laurel Furnace, in Dunbar township. From 1793 to 1796 he was sheriff of the county, and during that time was not only busy with operations against the "Whisky Boys," but was called upon to hang John McFall, who was sentenced to death for the murder of John Chadwick, Nov. 10, 1794. Col. Paull's sons numbered seven—James, George (a colonel in the war of 1812), John, Archibald, Thomas, William, and Joseph. His daughter Martha married William Walker.

Col. Isaac Meason was an important figure in the early history of Fayette County. He was a Virginian by birth, and as early as the year 1770 came to Southwest Pennsylvania. He bought land on Jacob's Creek, and built upon it the Mount Vernon Furnace. Not long afterwards he bought the Gist property on Mount Braddock, in Dunbar township, and soon acquiring additional lands took rank as one of the largest landholders in that neighborhood. In 1799 he owned upwards of six thousand acres. In 1790 he built the Union Furnace on Dunbar Creek, and set up two forges and a furnace on Dunbar Creek from Union Furnace down to the mouth of the creek. At Union Furnace he built a stone grist-mill, and for years conducted extensive business enterprises that made him widely known. He owned, also, the lands originally possessed by Col. William Crawford, and in 1790 laid out the village of New Haven, on the Youghiogheny opposite Connellsville. He died in 1819, and was buried on the Mount Braddock estate. His sons were Isaac, George, and Thomas. George lived with his uncle, Daniel Rogers, of Connellsville. Thomas became a resident of Unicon town. Isaac, the best known of the sons, and known as Col. Meason, after his father's death succeeded to his father's business, and lived for many years at New Haven. His children were nine in number, of whom the sons were William, Isaac, Jr., and Richard. The only ones of the nine children now living are three daughters. Two reside in Unicon town, and one in Kansas. Col. Isaac Meason, the younger, was educated for the bar, and practiced in Pittsburgh before making his home at New Haven. His mother died in Unicon town in 1877, aged ninety-four.

Thomas Rogers and his five brothers are said to have come from Maryland to Mount Braddock, accompanied by their widowed mother. They took up lands under what was commonly styled "tomahawk claims," but becoming dissatisfied soon disposed of their interests to Samuel Work. The Rogers families moved to Washington County, and in the Indian aggressions that befell that region three of the brothers lost their lives. The others removed then to the mouth of the Beaver, but shortly returned to Dunbar township, and located in what is now known as the Cross Keys School District. One of the brothers opened a blacksmith-shop on the Unicon town road, and soon built a tavern near by. It is said that he set a pair of cross keys over his shop as a token that he was a locksmith as well as blacksmith, and when he opened his house he conceived the notion of calling it the Cross Keys Tavern, by which name it was long known. There is a vague tradition that the Rogers brothers founded a Masonic lodge in that neighborhood, and that for a while the mysterious meetings of the brotherhood in the Cross Keys schoolhouse periodically excited the awe and wondering curiosity of the people of that vicinity, who were accustomed to gather regularly on lodge nights and exert themselves to a painful extent in their fruitless efforts to penetrate into the awful secrets and amazing performances which they were convinced were hidden within the school-house.

Daniel Rogers, whose daughter is Mrs. Banning, of New Haven, was born in the Cross Keys District, married a daughter of Col. Isaac Meason, and for many years was a prominent citizen of Connellsville and New Haven. In Connellsville he kept a store as early as 1798. During the later years of his life he resided at New Haven, where he died in 1873, at the age of ninety-five.

Joseph Torrance, who came to Fayette County with George Paull, married one of Paull's daughters, and settled upon a place in Dunbar known as "Peace." The tract is now occupied by the works of the Connellsville Coke and Iron Company.

John Christy left Ireland about the year 1800 for America, and drifted in a short time to Fayette County, and worked for Col. Meason. He entered the United States service in the war of 1812, and died in the army. At the time of his enlistment he was living in a sugar-bush that occupied the present site of the Henderson Coke-Works. Among others who are remembered to have lived near Union Furnace before the year 1800, were Daniel Cole, John Weaston, Samuel Downey, and Timothy Grover. The latter is said to have been one hundred and two years old when he died. Nearly all of his children and grandchildren died of consumption.

John Hamilton, who married Susanna Allen, of Franklin township, in 1792, bought of a Mr. Ray that year about four hundred acres of land in Dunbar township. A portion of the land is now occupied by his grandson, J. H. Byers. Ray had got up a log cabin and cleared a few acres when he sold out to Hamilton. The cabin Mr. Hamilton replaced in 1808 with the house Mr. Byers now lives in. About Mr. Hamilton's settlement there were the Rogers, Work, Paull, Lytle, Barkelow, Ross, Strickler, Curry, Parkhill, and Graham families. One of the Currys is said to have lived to be over a hundred years old. There was a distillery near the Graham place about 1790, where excellent apple whisky was made. At least such was the testimony of D. A. C. Sherrard, who has frequently been heard to say that he was raised on apple toddy made at that still, and that the beverage was not only wholesome but delightful to the taste.

The first school-house in the Hamilton or Cross Keys District was probably a log affair, built in 1806 upon the ground occupied by the present house, the third one upon that site. Before 1806 the children of that neighborhood attended school in a slab shanty that stood near the present site of Dunbar village.

There were but few people in Dunbar when Joshua Dickinson became a settler here. Just when he came hither cannot be determined with certainty, but tradition places the time at not far from 1770. Certain it is that when he traveled westward over the mountains, alone and on foot, looking for a land location, the country was a wilderness and swarming with wild beasts. Upon the high bluff that overlooks the Youghiogheny just above East Liberty he made his camp under an oak-tree, and when he came to examine at leisure the region about him he was not slow to determine that he had found the location he had been looking for. As far as he could judge, there was no white settler anywhere near him, and if he had taken the trouble or time to reflect upon the circumstance, it would have doubtless occurred to him that he was in not only a lonesome but a rather dangerous locality. He had, however, no inclination to dwell on such matters at first, for he was fired with an ambition to get a start as a settler, and so he, working early and late to get up a habitation and make a small clearing, found no time to do anything else. He had not been long on the ground, so the story goes, when he realized very forcibly the dangers of his situation at all events. Looking from the river bluff one day he saw the spectacle of a company of ugly-looking savages wading across the stream, as if they had detected the smoke of the white man's camp-fire and were bent upon mischief. That seems at least to have been the view taken of the case by Dickinson, for, understanding that the redskins might murder him, he lost no time in packing up a few trifling effects and striking off for the far East. He made his way to his old home, and concluded to stay there until there should be promise of a peaceful life in Southwestern Pennsylvania. Within about a year he thought from what he heard that the danger of Indians was past, and once more he set out for the Western wilds, this time taking with him his wife and infant son, Thomas, for, to use his own language, "he proposed to stay." They came to the spot he first occupied, and there he built a cabin. One authority declares that another man with his family accompanied the Dickinsons westward and located near them. Who they were is not ascertainable, but it is altogether likely, since Dickinson returned eastward for supplies in a short time, and that he was scarcely likely to have done had he been compelled to leave his wife and child unprotected. When he had made a clearing he began to till the soil, and just then he began to get glimpses of savages and to fear much for his safety. He was not molested, but he never went out into his field without taking his wife with him, who while he worked would stand watch with gun in hand, and after a time would take the hoe while he did sentinel duty. Naturally enough they could not avoid believing that the Indians were likely to butcher them at any time. Eternal vigilance was for them the constant watchword. Despite their fears they never came to any harm through the Indians. Mr. Dickinson was eminently a pioneer, and for years battled almost single-handed among the wilds of Fayette County, apart from other settlers, and met at every turn such privations, trials, and toils as would have checked his progress and sent him back to the haunts of civilization had he not possessed a heart of oak and a courageous, stout-souled helpermate, who bore like a heroine her full share of the burden.

In the fall Dickinson made a trip to the East for salt and other supplies, and packed them westward on his horses. Salt was one of the greatest and scarest of luxuries, as well as a necessity, and that it was carefully husbanded when got may be well believed. Bullets were articles of value. So careful was Dickinson of his small hoard that when he shot small game he made sure to shoot in range with some tree, so that if he missed he could secure the bullets for further use. Just before he left for his first trip to the East in quest of provisions he found himself the possessor of just two bullets. With one of them he killed a bear, whose carcass supplied his family with meat while he was absent; and with the other he killed game for his own sustenance during the journey over the mountains. Mr. Dickinson lived to see the country blossom and teem with civilized life. He became a large landholder in Dunbar upon the river, and died upon the homestead farm near East Liberty, Oct. 10, 1827, in his eighty-eighth year. He built a grist-mill upon the site of the mill now owned by Oglevee Brothers about the year 1780. He had six sons, named Thomas, William, John, Joshua, Levi, and Eli, all of whom removed at an early day to Ohio. Mr. Dickinson was a staunch Methodist, and for some years maintained preaching at his house, where a class was organized in 1820. In 1823 he gave material assistance in the erection of a Methodist Episcopal house of worship, and there until 1861 the organization flourished. At that time the question of politics entered in some shape into the church, and proved a rock upon which the organization soon became a wreck. The building then used as a church is now the residence of Mr. Dunham. The lot for the church and churchyard was donated by Mr. Dickinson, and within the latter still lie the mortal remains of himself and his wife.

Tradition says that upon the bluff overlooking the Fort Hill Coke-Works there was once an Indian fort and an Indian graveyard, both upon the A. J. Hill farm. Mr. Hill relates that bones and various implements of Indian manufacture have frequently been plowed up there, and that one of his men unearthed some time ago a curious-look ing iron instrument, consisting of an iron ring about the size of a man's neck. From that ring projected short chains, at the end of each of which was fastened a small ring. It was regarded as a curious relic, and by some it was determined to have served either in confining criminals or fastening victims to the stake. These theories had, however, but a vague foundation to rest upon, while the generally accepted theory that Indians in those days used no iron instruments appears to render it doubtful whether the relic was of Indian origin or use. Whatever it had been or was, it certainly awakened much curious interest among antiquarians, and eventually found its way to the cabinet of a collector of curiosities. Since that time it has not been seen or heard of in these parts. The hill upon which the Indian fort was located bears to this day the name of Fort Hill.
Thomas Jones was one of the very early settlers in Joshua Dickinson's neighborhood. His home was the farm now owned by William and James Collins, whose father, James, came to Dunbar from Maryland in 1822 and bought out Thomas Jones, who thereupon moved to Ohio, and died there at the age of ninety-eight. James Collins the elder died in 1855, aged seventy-seven.

Jacob Leet was an early settler near Dickinson, upon the place now owned by Alexander Work, on which his grave may now be seen. His son Christopher, now an old man of ninety-four, lives in Illinois. Mr. Leet was regarded as an old-fashioned but rigidly honest man, and a most excellent neighbor. When Christian Stover returned to Dunbar after a brief absence, and found Leet's grave instead of the living Leet, he is said to have remarked with a show of deep feeling, "There lies the body of an honest Dutchman." Christian Stover himself came from Westmoreland County to Dunbar in 1815, but returned in 1819 to the former place. In 1819, Christian Steiner, his son-in-law, bought Stover's Dunbar farm, and occupied it as a permanent settler. The Morelands, Galley, Spratts, and Wilkies were residents thereabout at an early day. James Wilkie was a famous school-teacher, and taught in those parts more than twenty years. One Clare was also an early school-teacher in that vicinity. William McBurney says that in 1814 he took his first day's schooling under pedagogue Clare. Some maliciously disposed lads reported young McBurney to the teacher for swearing, and upon the complaint the boy was compelled to get down upon his knee before the school and sue for pardon. The following day he was similarly reported, and that time most unmercifully whipped by Clare. As soon as he could, the bruised victim made for the school-room door and ran home. There he told his mother that he was afraid to go to school again, for he knew old Clare would eventually murder him. And he did not venture into that or any other school again for three years.

An old woolen-factory, now standing on the river's bank at the Broad Ford, was started in 1824 by White & Sons, and carried on with varying fortunes for some years. It served also later as a grist-mill, but for years had lain idle.

In the fall of 1782, David Parkhill (who had come from Ireland to America during the Revolution) settled in Dunbar, upon lands that joined Joshua Dickinson's and Joseph Oglesby's. Although a strong Covenanter, his blood arose in resentment at the thought of the troubles worked by Indian depredations, and at the head of a company of his neighbors sailed out one Sunday morning to hunt and punish the savages. The enemy had taken the alarm, and luckily for themselves fled beyond the reach of the determined pioneers. Mr. Parkhill's wife lived until she had rounded out a century of existence. She died in 1842. Stephen Fairchild, who died in Dunbar in 1837, came to Pennsylvania in 1810, and located in Salt Lick township. He was born in New York State, and at the age of fifteen enlisted with his six brothers for service in the war of the Revolution. One of the seven was wounded at the battle of Bunker Hill. Stephen Fairchild's widow died in 1863, aged eighty-four, and was at her death one of the oldest persons then in receipt of a pension.

In the spring of 1889 one of the "characters" of Dunbar died in a cave near Cow Rock, where for a period of sixty years or more he had led the life of a recluse. This singular personage, never known by any other designation than "Captain Cook," is said to have come to Fayette County from England simply to show his reverence for the memory of Gen. Braddock. While in his English home he read in a book the story of Braddock's fate, and straightway felt a very strong desire to visit the region wherein that unfortunate general met his death. He came to America, and to Fayette County. In Dunbar township, east of Union Furnace, and near the river, he found a cave that suited him for a home. Of it he took squatter possession, and in it he passed the remainder of his life, which was, by the way, a life conspicuously devoid of an object, except, perhaps, in respect to his satisfaction in being near the scenes that surrounded Braddock when he died. It is said that for as long as six months at a time he would keep himself utterly secluded from the gaze of man. Near his hut was a bank of fire-clay, and once in a while he would make a few fire-bricks, and descend into the Furnace settlement for the purpose of exchanging the bricks for provisions. His mission concluded, he would return to his mountain den, and emerge no more for months. Samuel Work, alluded to as having purchased the Rogers farm, was grandfather to Samuel Work, now of Dunbar township. John Work, son of Samuel the elder, was born in 1787. He married Nancy Rogers.

Jacob Lowry was a man of considerable note in Dunbar before and after 1800. In 1788 he moved from Northumberland County to Jacob's Creek, and entered the employment of his brother-in-law, John Gerhart, a miller. In 1794 he went over to Col. Isaac Mason's Union Furnace, and for five years was Col. Mason's miller at the Furnace grist-mill. In 1799 he built a framed grist-mill on Dunbar Creek below the Furnace, and carrying it on until 1815, built in that year upon the same site, in conjunction with John Strickler, the stone grist-mill now owned by William Speers. He leased the grist-mill to Strickler, who after a five years' experience therein failed and retired to a farm near New Haven. Lowry had meanwhile been living on a farm and running a saw-mill on Tucker's Run, but upon Strickler's failure resumed his control of the grist-mill property. Of the old framed grist-mill he had made a fulling-mill, and about 1828 built the woolen-factory now owned by Daniel Harper. After his death, in September, 1830, his son Lewis came into possession of the grist-mill, and his son William of the woolen-factory. In 1841, John Speers purchased the grist-mill.

John Sherrard was a settler in Dunbar in 1773. He remained in his new settlement but a year, and then moved to Kentucky. In 1778 he resumed his habitation in Dunbar, and retained it until 1805, when he concluded to push farther westward to Ohio, where he died in 1809. He was in the Continental service during the Revolutionary war, and was with Col. William Crawford in the expedition to Sandusky in 1782. Although but a private, he bore a somewhat conspicuous part in that affair. David Alexander Cathcart Sherrard, born in Dunbar, Sept. 2, 1786, died June 2, 1880 (upon the farm that had been his home from his birth), in the ninety-four year of his age. In early life he was connected with the Laurel Hill Presbyterian Church, and for over sixty years was a ruling elder of that church. In 1825 he was appointed a justice of the peace, and held the office fifteen years. It is said that during that time he tried eight hundred and eighty civil cases, of which but four were appealed, and of these but one reversed.

"John Travis and his brother-in-law, George Thompson, emigrated from Ireland shortly after the Revolution was over; and immediately after landing off shipboard they crossed the mountains, and each purchased a farm of one hundred and fifty acres of good land of my father [John Sherrard], which they improved, and each raised up a large family.

"Mr. Travis became an elder in the Laurel Hill congregation. In the spring of 1798 he bought a farm one mile and a half east of the cross-roads, on some of the branches of Raccoon Creek, on which he settled with his family. Some time after he settled in the bounds of Laurel Hill congregation, from some cause, he became completely crazy, so much so that he had to be confined and handcuffed and guarded by two men of the neighborhood to keep him from doing damage to himself or others. A neighbor by the name of Thomas Graham was one of the two. Many years afterwards he informed me that on one occasion it was necessary to change his linen, and to make that change Graham had to take off the handcuffs, after which, while he was in the act of turning round and reaching for a shirt that was airing by the fire, Travis took advantage of the attitude Graham was in by lifting the bolt that fastened the handcuff, and threw it with great force at Graham's head, just grazing it. After which assault Graham was careful at such times to leave nothing in the crazy man's way by which means he could do any one of his keepers or himself any damage.

"At length the physician recommended that they should seek out a waterfall in some of the mountain regions, where a small cold stream of water fell over rocks several feet with some weight and force. The rill having been sought out, the neighbors built a small house close to the waterfall, and divided it off with a partition of logs, keeping Mr. Travis confined in one end, while the other served as a place of lodging and shelter for those who waited on him. And it was made the duty of the two men each morning to place Mr. Travis under the waterfall, in such a position as that the descending stream fell on his head, and thus once a day he was treated to a cold bath, with its influence direct upon the head, and the process was continued daily until unmistakable signs of returning sanity had made their appearance, and was continued daily once a day until it had the desired effect. Mr. Travis was thereby restored to reason, and remained a man of sound mind to the day of his death."

Samuel Martin came to Col. Meason's Union Furnace about 1793, and worked there as a teamster. His son John was a founder, while his sons Alexander, James, and Samuel, Jr., were also employed about the furnace in various capacities. Alexander Martin, of Dunbar, is a son of John the founder above mentioned. William J. and Samuel Martin, other sons of John, live in Dunbar township. Mrs. Nancy Hanen, living near Dunbar, is one of his daughters. Cambridge, a son of James Martin (who worked at Union Furnace in 1794), lives now at Dunbar Furnace.

Alexander Martin, of Dunbar, says there used to be an old graveyard at Dunbar Furnace, and that the place was doubtless used for the burial of those who died in Col. Meason's service. Rude headstones marked many graves up to a few years ago, but no stone bore an inscription or date-mark. Mr. Martin says he recollects hearing of the burial in that yard of an old lady named Flood, who hung herself at her home at the Furnace with a skein of yarn.

William Hardy came to Fayette County in 1794 with the Maryland troops to assist in quelling the Whiskey Insurrection. At the Meason Furnace they found a liberty pole, and across it a board labeled "Liberty and no Excise." After that bloodless campaign was ended he returned to Union Furnace, and worked for Col. Meason as a wood-chopper. When he was twenty-six years old he bought a farm on the mountain-side, and lived about Dunbar until his death, in 1879, at the age of one hundred and three. One of his sons lives in Michigan, and another in Nebraska.

About 1790, John Artis and his brother Isaac came from Delaware to Fayette County. John located at Mount Braddock, and Isaac on the place now the farm of John Hanen. John Artis was killed in 1811 while wood-chopping on Isaac Meason's land. He left nine children, of whom none are now living. At the time of his death his home was where Stoneroad Bodkin now lives, back of Dunbar village. Isaac Artis, his brother, died in Connellsburg. In 1790, Isaac Young had an old log grist-mill on Young's mill-run. How long before that he had been operating the mill is not known. Tradition says that for some time Young's mill was the only one for a long distance around. Isaac Meason built a stone grist-mill at Union Furnace probably before the year 1800. Among the customers at that mill the most famous one was Betty Knox, who lived on the other side of the mountain, and made regular trips to Meason's mill mounted on an ox. The mountain path by which she came and went was known for years as Betty Knox's road.

The assessment of Dunbar in 1808 returned the total assessed valuation of the township as $228,046. The quota of county tax was $843. The acres assessed numbered 22,500. There were eleven mills, five forges and furnaces, three tan-yards, six distilleries, nine slaves, four hundred and forty-seven horses, and four hundred and forty-eight cattle.

EARLY ROADS.

At the September session of court in 1781 a report was made by Matthew Wiley, James Rankin, William Huston, Elisha Pierce, Samuel Finley, and Dennis Springer upon a petition presented at the December session in 1784 for a road from Uniontown to Joshua Dickinson's mill. The report was confirmed and the road fixed to lead from Uniontown to Dickinson's mill, thence to the mouth of said mill run, thence to a road already laid out from Hannastown to the Broad Ford, intersecting said road in the county of Fayette. At the September sessions of 1792, James Paull, Matthew Gilchrist, Samuel Work, Jacob Strickler, Robert McLaughlin, and Jacob Murchey reported the laying of a road from near the house of John Rogers to the Broad Ford, and thence to the nearest public road leading to Woodrongs, etc. March, 1794, report of a road from Conwell's Ferry by Union Furnace to the Uniontown road at Gist's old place was made by Matthew Neely, Samuel Work, Adam Dunlap, Jacob Strickler, William Black, and William McCormick. The road crossed Dunbar's Run, and intersected the Uniontown road at the intersection of a road from Col. Cook's.

June, 1793, Andrew Arnold, Francis Lewis, Samuel Finley, James Byers, James Rankin, and Adam Dunlap reported that they had viewed a road from Matthew Wiley's barn to Dunn's cabin, beginning at the end of Matthew Wiley's lane on the road from Uniontown to Joshua Dickinson's mill, and intersecting the road leading from Gist's to Col. Cook's (now Fayette City). In June, 1794, a road was laid out from Union Furnace to Joshua Dickinson's mill. The viewers were James Blackston, James Torrence, William Esq., Valentine Secrist, John Forsythe, and Samuel Glasgow.

EARLY IRON-WORKERS—THE UNION FURNACE.

Col. Isaac Meason, Dunbar's great land-owner in early times, and the town's most conspicuous citizen, projected and completed in 1791 the then important work of making iron in a blast-furnace. He built a small stack on Dunbar Creek, about three hundred yards above the present location of the stacks of the Dunbar Furnace Company. Tradition says that the Union Furnace (by which name Meason's works were known) was put in blast in March, 1791. It was doubtless a small affair, but what its capacity was is not known. In 1793, Col. Meason and Moses Dillon joined in rebuilding it and enlarging Union Furnace. Their manufactures included stove-castings, pots, dog-irons, and salt-kettles. At a later date Col. Meason established, in connection with his furnace, a forge on what is now known as the Thomas Watt place, and a second one at the mouth of Dunbar Creek. In 1816 he built at Plumsock, on the Redstone, the first rolling-mill west of the Alleghenies, and about that time built a small rolling-mill on Dunbar Creek, near where Reid & Co.'s coke-works are. Touching the manufacture of iron in Dunbar about 1800 it has been written: "The difficulties under which the ironmaster labored in those days were curious ones. Not only was he compelled to work with crude machinery and imperfect knowledge, but his efforts to realize on his labors were herculean. The iron was run into numerous castings suitable for frontier life, or manufactured at small forges into the merchant iron of those days. These products were hauled in teams from fifteen to thirty miles across the country to Brownsville, on the Monongahela River, and there loaded into flat-boats. These floated down the Ohio and Mississippi. The iron was exchanged for corn, pork, whisky, etc., which were carried on to New Orleans and traded for sugar and molasses. These latter commodities were sent around by sea to Baltimore, and in turn exchanged for groceries, dry goods, etc., which, loaded on Conestoga wagons, were hauled three hundred miles over the mountains to the furnaces whence the iron had started many months before." "An old furnaceman told me," says the writer, "that he once conducted business continuously for three years, and saw during that time only ten dollars in money." Another curious phase of that early life was the insertion of a clause in all contracts for labor that a certain quantity of whisky was to be allowed each day in addition to wages. A stoppage of whisky rations was about the only cause in those days that would precipitate a labor strike.

After Col. Meason's death, in 1819, his son Isaac carried on the business. Upon his retirement the furnace lay idle some time, but was revived by Arthur Palmer and Israel Miller in 1832. The only person then living on the furnace property was Widow Mattie Glenn. Jones & Miller succeeded them, and in 1844 the last-named firm gave place to J. D. Creigh, who changed the name of the furnace from "Union" to "Dunbar." In 1846, A. J. Bryson entered Mr. Creigh's employ, and since that time Mr. Bryson has been continuously at work at the furnace under nine different administrations. Creigh made from a ton and a half to two tons of iron per day, and employed eight men. In 1848 he failed, and a Mr. Shrayer succeeded him. Shrayer died in 1852, when the works passed to the possession of Watt & Larnar, who put in the first steam-engine and the first hot-blast stove the furnace had had. Previous to their advent Dunbar Creek furnished the motive-power. In 1854, Baldwin & Cheney became the proprietors, and during their possession of five years introduced the use of coke at the furnace instead of charcoal. They produced about ten tons of iron daily. Their stack was thirty-two feet high and six feet "bosh." In 1858, Wm. Baldwin bought the furnace and suffered it to lie idle three years. In 1860 he sold it to the Young-hiogeny Coal and Iron Company, of which Charles Hathaway was the president. The company changed the location of the furnace in 1865 to the present site, and built a stone stack fifty feet high with a capacity of from fifteen to eighteen tons daily. In 1866 the Dunbar Iron Company (E. C. Pechin being the president) became the proprietors, rebuilt the stack, and made additions of blowing-engines and hot blasts. The company suspended in August, 1873, obtained an extension, and in July, 1874, were sold out. The concern was bought by the first mortgage bondholders, represented by Samuel Dickson. They leased the works for fourteen months to Wm. Beeson, and in March, 1876, the Dunbar Furnace Company purchased the creditors' interests. The furnace company's operations will be found detailed under the head of "Manufacturing Industries."

Laurel Furnace, commonly called "Old Laurel," was built in 1794 by Joshua Gibson and Samuel Paxom, on Laurel Run, near the eastern base of Chestnut Ridge. In 1800, Reuben Mochabee and Samuel Wurtz bought the property. They built also on Indian Creek, in Springfield township, a forge which they called Hampden Forge. Old Laurel Furnace was abandoned in 1812. New Laurel Furnace was built by Jas. Paull & Sons upon Laurel Run, about one mile below Old Laurel, and kept in blast by them until 1834. Then the property passed into the hands of Daniel Kaine, who carried it on until 1838. Since then nothing has been done there. In 1815, Col. Isaac Meason and his sons Isaac and Thomas erected Dunbar Furnace on Dunbar Creek, near the line between Dunbar and Wharton. It was afterwards known as Centre Furnace. The furnace was in blast until 1830, and under the control of Col. Meason's sons at the last. In 1830 it was given up. One may yet see the ruins of the old building there.

The old forge tract at Reed's, where Col. Meason had an iron-works called Union Forge, was occupied at a later date, about 1849, by Bowen, Wheatley & Witter, who carried on an edge-tool factory there. They gave up the business in 1856. Touching Hampden Forge, already mentioned, it is pertinent to note that in May, 1809, John Ferrell, manager at the forge, advertised for sale "estashings light and tough at one hundred dollars a ton, also bar iron." He expected soon to have "some rolled iron nail-rods and cut nails, the latter at eight cents a pound."

TOWNSHIP ORGANIZATION AND CIVIL LIST.

Dunbar township was erected by the Court of Quarter Sessions in December, 1788. The record referring to the matter reads as follows:

"On the petition of a number of the inhabitants of Franklin township, praying for a division of the said township by the following boundaries, to wit: Beginning at Bird's old road at the crossing of the road leading from Uniontown to Dickinson's mill; thence by the said road and the road that leads to Matthew Wilkey's, leaving his house to the east side; thence by a straight line to Young-Hiogeni River, a little east of William Hamilton's house; it is considered by the court that the prayer of the said petition be granted, and that the upper or east division be called 'Dunbar township.'"

The civil list of the township from 1798 to 1881 has been gathered as best it could be from imperfectly kept records, and is given as follows:

VILLAGE OF EAST LIBERTY.

The village of East Liberty, located upon a high bluff overlooking the Youghiogheny River, opposite the village of Dawson, and about four miles below Connellsville, bears the impress of age in numerous abandoned and decaying log buildings, whose presence bestows upon the place a shadow of neglect, though there is considerable animation at the town's business centre, and much that betokens a brisk and lively spirit. The village history reckons backward to at least 1792, in which year Joshua Dickinson caused a town survey to be made. In the fall of that year Andrew Bryson built the first house. One of the old log houses still there bears upon its chimney the date 1796. It is now occupied by Mrs. Whittaker. Another house bearing upon its chimney the date 1797 is the present residence of Ann Strickler. Since 1810, it is said, no log houses have been built in East Liberty. William McBurney, who was born in East Liberty in 1808, and has lived in the village ever since, says that his father, Robert McBurney, came from Maryland in 1798 to visit Robert Boyd, his brother-in-law, then living in Dunbar township, about one mile from East Liberty. McBurney was a blacksmith, and being at that time in search of a business location, was advised by Boyd to set up a shop at East Liberty. He acted upon the suggestion, and occupied without delay an abandoned blacksmith's shop, previously occupied by some person now not remembered. There was at that time a small collection of houses there, including that of Andrew Byers, the tavern-keeper, and Samuel Brown, a hatter, who was then living in the house now occupied by William McBurney. That house Mr. McBurney has always understood to have been the first building erected in East Liberty. The village was laid out, as said, by Joshua Dickinson, who directly sold the entire plat to Allen, Craig, and Byers.

The reasons for laying out a village here were probably because of the commanding and healthful site, and because the main traveled highway between Uniontown and Greensburg passed the place. Andrew Byers, one of the town proprietors, lived in the village and kept tavern, and as Josiah Allen was a storekeeper in Dunbar township in 1799, it is more than likely that his store was at East Liberty. After Byers the tavern was kept by one Arthur Hurry (previously a tailor in East Liberty), who was especially famous for having a scolding wife, whose sole delight appeared to exist in making Hurry's life one of misery. Before the village was laid out Joshua Dickinson built the grist-mill now occupied as the mill of Oglevee Brothers. In 1814, Matthew Cannon kept a store as well as tavern in the village, and following him as a village trader came William McMullen. A more pretentious store than had before been opened was that of Robert McBurney, who, in 1828, turned his smithy over to one of his sons and became a merchant. It may be remarked that since 1798 a McBurney has always been a blacksmith at East Liberty, William McBurney, the present representative of the name, having been in the business there since 1835 on his own account, and a blacksmith there since 1828.

The first resident physician was probably a Dr. Johnson, who is said to have practiced there from 1800 to 1807. After Dr. Johnson's departure no doctor located there until 1834, when Dr. Wilson came. He remained until 1846, and then left the field to Dr. Samuel Stahl, whose stay covered a period of about twelve years. Dr. Charles Chalfant came about 1854, and remained until his death, a few years later. Dr. McCoy spent but a short time in the village, and removed then to Springfield township. Dr. Barnet entered the army from East Liberty for service during the war of the Rebellion, and died in the service. Dr. O. P. Brashear, who succeeded Dr. Barnet in village practice, left in 1874, and lives now in Brownsville. After him Dr. Sidman Stahl located, but departed after a brief sojourn. Since his time East Liberty has been without a physician.

East Liberty's first postmaster was John McBurney, who served from 1823 to his death in 1848, one year after the death of his father, Robert.

William Beatty followed him, and was himself succeeded by Samuel F. Randolph, Robert McBurney (the younger), Joseph Oglevee, Susan Ransom, William McBurney, John Stoner, and Daniel Reynolds. Upon the close of Reynolds' service, in 1874, a strong effort was made by the rival village of Alexandria to secure the post-office for that place, and a sharp contest setting in between the two villages upon the question, much bitter feeling was engendered. Alexandria won the day, and East Liberty post-office was accordingly given over to that town, where it still remains.

East Liberty has received a check to its progress in the presence of the village of Alexandria less than a mile away, but still maintains a fair share of the trade of the surrounding country. The Oglevee Brothers have a fine store there, and do a satisfactory business. Joseph Oglevee, the head of the firm, has been a merchant at East Liberty since 1856. There is also at the village a capacious foundry and machine-shop, where plows and other agricultural implements are manufactured. H. B. Snyder, the present proprietor, succeeded George Balsey therein in 1867, and in that year materially enlarged the works.

East Liberty has long been a temperance town, and consequently a well-behaved one. There was a time, however, when that could not have been truthfully said, for whisky once flowed like water there. No less than three taverns thrived in the village simultaneously, and turmoil were so frequent that, for lack of a more expressive designation, peacefully inclined citizens gave to East Liberty the name of Flint Mill. Matters got to such a bad state that the better-disposed members of the community arose in their might and declared the traffic in strong drink must cease. So when Robert Huey opened a tavern, a company of men demolished his doors and windows and warned him to leave. Without waiting for further notice he did leave, and with his departure ended whisky-selling in the village.

Evidence of East Liberty enterprise was seen in the erection in the summer of 1881 of a concert hall, mainly for the use of the East Liberty Band. The corner-stone is a relic of the past. It was the corner-stone of a building erected in East Liberty in 1795, and bears this inscription: “A.D. 1795, rebuilt A.D. 1881.”

THE VILLAGE OF DUNBAR.

Dunbar village, a station on the Southwestern Pennsylvania as well as on the Fayette County Railroad, lies about six miles south of New Haven. The village proper contains a population of about one thousand, while an outlying district, reaching to the Dunbar Furnace and neighboring coke-burning districts, contains more than the same number. The chief interests are those of iron-making, coal-mining, and coke-burning, in which industries nearly a thousand persons are employed. Railway traffic at this point is especially active. About fifty trains pass the station daily. Of these twenty-one are passenger-trains, and the residue freight and coke trains. Dunbar Creek, a rapid mill-stream, passes through the village, and drives a grist-mill and woolen-mill, which with a planing-mill are the only manufacturing industries at the village aside from iron and coke manufacture.

To about the latter part of 1859 there was no settlement worthy of notice at the place now called Dunbar village, though there had been a settlement at the Furnace for seventy years. In 1859 the only house on the village site was the residence of Alexander Martin, a carpenter, now carrying on a planing-mill at the village. Mr. Martin’s house of 1859 is now the residence of Mrs. Cameron. Mr. Martin sold his house to Hugh Cameron in 1853, at which time Cameron opened a shoemaking shop in it. John Speers had been carrying on since 1841 the stone grist-mill now the property of his son William, and built by Jacob Lowry and John Strickler in 1815. Farther up the stream James Hankins operated the woolen-mill now owned by Daniel Harper. Where John Bunker now lives he and his father had a wagon-shop. There was a store at the Furnace, but at the village there was none until after the completion through Dunbar of the Fayette County Railroad, in the winter of 1859-60. The first village store was built by John Hardy, and stood opposite where the Southwestern passenger depot stands. The building is still there.

Although the opening of the railway was thought likely to create a new town there in a short time, the anticipation was slow of fulfillment. To 1866 Dunbar was but a flag-station, with a shanty depot at Speers’ saw-mill. A post-office was established in 1860, and the postmastership given to Daniel Hardy. Previous to that there was a post-office in Woodvale School District, called Woodvale Post-Office. Of that office William Walker was postmaster. In 1865 Daniel Harper resigned the Dunbar postmastership, which was then given to Sophia Devan, the present incumbent. In 1866, when the Dunbar Iron Company took hold of the furnace, there was a considerable brightening at the village, and matters looked up with a promise of vigorous growth. At that time two stores were kept there,—one by Mrs. Mary A. Bird, and one by Slocum & Walters. In 1868 John Speers opened a store at his grist-mill. The first general store, and the first one with claims to importance, was that of Watt, Reid & Co (opened in 1871), now owned by J. M. Reid.

The first public-house at the village was built by John Hardy, and opened by James Patterson in 1868. The house is now closed. Patrick McFarlane, its last landlord, vacated it in February, 1881. The first drug-store was opened near the mill by George W. Speers, and the first undertaker’s shop by J. R. Beers. As already observed, the first carpenter was Alexander Martin, and the first wagon-maker Jesse Bunker. The village progressed steadily in strength, and when the coke-making interests developed the village grew rapidly. The first survey of village lots was made in 1867, by John Speers, and the second in 1870, by David Turner, both surveys being made upon Thomas W. Watt’s property, now the village site. In 1876 the Southwestern Pennsylvania Railroad was completed, and by that time Dunbar had taken on a healthy growth, which since that period has continued to keep pace with the profitable progress of adjacent coal, coke, and iron interests.

Up to 1871 there was no resident physician at Dunbar, although from about 1842, Dr. J. G. Rogers, living at Joseph Paull’s, near the village, practiced here, and was to all intents a village physician. Dr. Rogers practiced in that neighborhood nearly all the time from 1842 to 1876, when he removed to Florida and there died. The physician who first made his home in Dunbar was Dr. J. T. Shepler, who came in November, 1871, remained until 1873, was absent until 1876, and then returning has been in practice at the village to the present time in association with Dr. R. W. Clark, who came to Dunbar in August, 1873. In the spring of that year Dr. W. J. Hamilton opened an office, and still remains one of the village physicians. Dr. Thomas P. Walker has been one of Dunbar’s physicians since 1879, and Dr. A. C. Conley since Jan. 1, 1880.

The Fayette County Railroad station, alluded to as having been first located at Speers’ mill, was changed to its present location in 1869. William H. Speers was the first agent, and served until 1865, when Thomas W. Watt was appointed. His successor was Martin B. Pope, and then followed John Herron, Cyrus S.
Yard, who succeeded Mr. Herron, is still the agent of the Southwest Railroad. W. N. Rodkey has been the Dunbar agent since 1876.

When there began to be signs of a village in 1858, Albert Cheney and John Speers told old Jesse Bunker that the new town should be called Dunbar City, but to this Mr. Bunker made objection, saying that if there was to be a new village it must be called Frogtown, after the little settlement that once clustered about Bunker’s house. Cheney and Speers insisted, however, for Dunbar City, and despite the old man’s warm feeling upon the subject and his disgust at the eventual change in name, Dunbar City was recognized as the designation of the village for about two years, when the “City” was dropped as rather far-fetched. The place called Frogtown was originally known as Unionville as early as the year 1810. At that time there was a store there (kept by John McClelland), and beyond it a tavern, opened by William Hoope in 1805, and of which the landlord in 1810 was Isaac Bryson. Near by were Jacob Lowry’s mill, Isaac Bryson’s still-house, and Phineas Porter’s tan-yard. Both store and tavern were abandoned by 1813. The log cabin now occupied by Mr. Wilson as a residence was then Porter’s tavern. In 1818, Jesse Bunker, who in 1808 was apprenticed to Joseph Bell, a wagonmaker at East Liberty, and in 1813 worked as wagonmaker for Col. Isaac Meason at Union Furnace, opened a wheelwright-shop at Unionville, where he had bought of Isaac Meason a small patch of land. His house, which stood next to McClelland’s store, is now the residence of his son, John Bunker, who owns also the building used by McClelland as a store-house. Unionville lay on the road from Union Furnace to the Plumsock rolling-mill, and was at one time thought to promise something of consequence in the matter of growth. Frogtown was a name bestowed upon it in derision by some person, and as it happened that people generally about there thought Frogtown was more appropriate than Unionville the former prevailed. Frogtown did not, however, fulfill the destiny predicted for it by its enthusiastic citizens, but faded out within a few years of its birth. Jesse Bunker stuck to it despite its ill fortune, and stuck to his wagon-shop until his death in 1872, at the age of eighty-four years.

THE VILLAGE OF ALEXANDRIA.

In 1871 there was a strong promise of a railway line across Dunbar, to touch a point just above East Liberty, and Alexander J. Hill concluded that as the proposed line would cross his farm he would lay out a town there. He therefore surveyed a field into village lots, named the site Alexandria, and readily sold the lots, for the prospect of a railroad seemed wellnigh certain. Although the railway project miscarried at that time, much to the grievous disappointment of all concerned with the progress of Alexandria, the outlook at this present time is exceedingly favorable for a speedy fulfillment of the long-deferred scheme. The first two houses built in Alexandria were put up by William Clark and a Mrs. Hazen. A store was soon erected by William Parkhill, and thereupon improvements progressed steadily if not rapidly. The store, having passed through the hands of several proprietors, is now kept by Ewing Oglevee, who is also the postmaster. In 1874, Alexandria succeeded in obtaining the East Liberty post-office, which it still retains.

Dr. J. D. Haslett became the village physician at Alexandria in 1874, and still remains. The only other physician known to local history was Dr. O. D. Porter, who after a few months’ trial abandoned the field. The village contains two church buildings, Presbyterian and Disciple, a school, a store or more of dwellings, and various minor industries.

CHURCHES.

LAUREL HILL (PRESBYTERIAN) CHURCH.

This, one of the oldest Presbyterian Churches in Fayette County, was organized by Rev. James Power, probably in 1776, although the loss of the early records of the church prevents a positive declaration of the precise date. It is known that Mr. Power was licensed to preach in the spring of 1778, and in that year preached for the congregations of Laurel Hill and Dunlap’s Creek. Mr. Power, whose home had been in Chester County, remained a while in the missionary field, and then concluding to make his permanent home in the Dunlap’s Creek valley, returned to Chester County, and brought out his family in 1776. Directly upon his return he is supposed to have organized Laurel Hill Church. Unfortunately, the names of the organizing members have not been preserved. Mr. Power enjoyed the distinction of being the first ordained minister who settled with his family in Western Pennsylvania. It may also be observed that his daughter Rebecca, who was first the wife of Rev. D. Smith and afterwards of Rev. T. Hunt, was the first child born in the family of a Presbyterian minister west of the Allegheny Mountains. She was born December 12, 1776, within the bounds of the Dunlap’s Creek congregation. From the time of his arrival, in the fall of 1776, until 1779, Mr. Power devoted his time to the work of supplying destitute churches generally, although he lived at Dunlap’s Creek, and regarded that as the principal point of his labors. In the spring of 1779 he became the regular pastor of the Mount Pleasant and Sewickley congregations. To that time his labors were given among the congregations of Mount Pleasant, Sewickley, Dunlap’s Creek, Laurel Hill, Tyrone, and Unity. Early in 1782 the Laurel Hill Church engaged Rev. James Dunlap as its first pastor, and Oct. 15, 1782, he was installed in charge of the churches at Laurel Hill and Dunlap’s Creek. He dissolved his relation with Dunlap’s Creek in 1789, but remained with Laurel Hill until 1803, when he joined the Presbytery of Ohio, and in that year was chosen president of Jefferson College, at Canonsburg. At the time of Mr. Dunlap’s settlement at Laurel Hill the ruling elders were John Travis and Samuel Finley. The first persons ordained ruling elders after his settlement were James McClean, Samuel McLean, Daniel McClean, John Allen, James Wilkie, and John Maxwell. The next ordained elders during the same pastorate were James Parker and James Morrison.

During Mr. Dunlap’s pastorate there arose a division in the congregation because of the introduction into the church of the gospel psalmody. As a consequence about one-third of the members withdrew and organized the Laurel Hill United Presbyterian (or Seceders) Church. April 18, 1804, Rev. James Guthrie was called to be the pastor of Laurel Hill, and April 17, 1805, was installed. The ruling elders at that time were Samuel Finley, Samuel McClean, James Halliday, James McCormick, and Joseph Morison. The first ruling elders ordained after Mr. Guthrie’s coming were Joseph Torrence, James Allen, and Enoch French. The second addition of elders included Patrick Watson, Andrew Wiley, and John Clark. In 1826, D. A. C. Sherrard and John Larimer were chosen elders, and in 1833 Thomas Greer, John Morison, S. A. Rus sel, A. E. Byers, Robert Davis, and Mathew Byers. Mr. Sherrard served as ruling elder from 1826 to his death in 1880, a period of fifty-four years. Mr. Guthrie labored with the church uninterrupted for the space of forty-five years or until his death, which took place Aug. 24, 1859. A marble shaft in Laurel Hill Cemetery marks his last resting-place, and testifies to the love in which his people held him. About six months before his death Mr. Guthrie suggested that as the infirmities of age were telling sorely upon him, it would be well to secure some minister to be co-pastor with him. In accordance with that suggestion Rev. Joel Stoneroad was called and installed June 6, 1850. Within less than three months thereafter, Mr. Guthrie’s death left Laurel Hill to the charge of Mr. Stoneroad. The latter preached at Laurel and Tyrone until 1861, when he gave his entire time to Laurel Hill. In 1851 the membership of the latter was one hundred and thirty-six, and soon rose to one hundred and fifty. The first elders chosen under Mr. Stoneroad’s pastorate (in 1851) were James Stewart, John Clark, W. H. Haslett, and James Allen. The next additions (in 1856) were William Bryson, R. H. Smith, James Curry, James Henshaw, Thomas G. Sherrard, and Samuel Watson. The last two declined to serve. After a pastorate of twenty-eight years, Mr. Stoneroad was compelled in 1878 to resign his charge by reason of ill health and bodily infirmities. He lives now in quiet seclusion not far from the church. After depending upon supplies about a year the church called Rev. R. R. Gailer, now in charge, to be the pastor, and Sept. 12, 1879, he was installed. In March, 1881, the membership of Laurel Hill was one hundred and sixty. Besides the house of worship at Laurel Hill, there is also Bethel Chapel in North Union township, built in 1877. The elders in March, 1881, were James Curry, John Wright, R. H. Smith, Hervey Smith, George Yeagley, and William Bryson. The trustees were Thomas Phillips, Ashbel Junk, and Caleb Woodward. The Sunday-school, which is in charge of the pastor, has an average attendance of eighty teachers and pupils.

The following account of the church edifices of old Laurel Hill Church is given by Robert A. Sherrard, whose father was one of the earliest settlers in Dunbar, and a prominent member of this congregation:

“The first meeting-house built for the use of old Laurel Hill congregation was put up in the fall of the year 1778. It was of hewed logs and shingled roof. I had the information from William Carson, whose brother, Alexander Carson, hewed the logs, and after the house was raised he shingled it. This meeting-house did not stand many years, as it was a mile from the centre of the congregation, and as the great majority of the congregation were farther north and west by three or four miles. In the course of a few years (1782) a new site was selected, a vote taken, and by a very large majority of the congregation it was agreed to build upon the new site. Accordingly a new house of hewed logs was built, and occupied as a meeting-house for said Laurel Hill congregation until the year 1850, at which time they erected an elegant, large, and spacious brick meeting-house.”

William Carson also related the following incident to Mr. Sherrard:

“It was a dense forest of beautiful white-oak timber for the distance of a mile from home to the site of the meeting-house, and as a guide his brother blasted trees all the way from home to the site; this was done to mark a pathway for his own and afterwards for the use of the family to travel along on Sabbath days when the public service was held at the meeting-house.”

Mr. Sherrard says, “A graveyard had been formed for some three or four years before the first meeting-house was built. And there old Col. Paul’s father, George Paul, was buried in the fall of 1778. And there my grandfather was buried in 1780. And there his daughter, my mother, was buried in 1833.”

As already mentioned, the first churchyard was laid out in 1772, at the old church, upon the present Joseph Work farm. When the church location was changed to where it now is a burial-place was set apart there. Among the oldest headstone inscriptions to be found there are the following: Given Scott, 1793; Andre Scott, 1799; John Gilchrist, 1780; Mary Allen, 1795; Daniel McLean, 1797; James Junk, 1799; Jane Scott, 1797; Mary Work, 1800; Joseph Work, 1800; Johannah Beatty, 1801; Thomas Preston, 1801; John Allen, 1802; Elizabeth Gilchrist, 1804; Agnes Work, 1810; Martha Guthrie, 1807; James Paul, Sr., 1811 (aged eighty-one); John A. Scott, 1790; Thomas Scott, 1811; Sarah Luckey, 1811; Agnes McDowell, East Liberty Cumberland Presbyterian Church.

The first member of the Cumberland Presbyterian denomination residing in Dunbar township was Henry Leighty, who came from Harmony, Westmoreland Co., and settled at East Liberty. Not only was he the first, but he was also the only member of that denomination in the vicinity of his place of settlement for some years; but notwithstanding this fact, it was at his invitation and solicitation that, in the year 1832, the Rev. Isaac Hague, a Cumberland Presbyterian preacher, came to this neighborhood and began holding religious services. His preaching was so effective that in a short time he had gathered a congregation of earnest members. When compelled to transfer his labors to some other portion of the country he arranged to have the Rev. A. M. Blackford assigned to the care of the East Liberty congregation. The result of Mr. Blackford's ministrations led to his organization of the East Liberty Cumberland Presbyterian Church, July 2, 1838. The organizing members were Henry Leighty, Catharine Ash, Susanna Daugan, Amy Work, Susan Leighty, Jane Cooley, Nancy Leighty, Eliza Leighty, Mary Little, Charlotte Leighty. Henry Leighty was chosen ruling elder in the spring of 1839. Rev. Mr. Blackford retired from the charge and Elder Leighty removed from the bounds of the congregation. At this juncture several of the members concluded to make their homes in other parts, and thus a material check was set upon the church's progress. During the summer of 1839 and 1840, Rev. A. Shearer supplied occasional preaching, and as the few remaining members of the church exercised themselves with most earnest diligence to sustain the organization, it remained intact, although it required a sharp struggle to keep it so. From April, 1841, to April, 1842, there was scarcely any preaching, but in the spring of 1842, Elder Leighty returning, he reawakened the slumbering interest, and in response to his request to the Union Presbytery for the services at East Liberty of some minister, Jesse Adams, a licentiate, was assigned to preach there a portion of his time. His labors were attended with gratifying success, and during the year brought fourteen members into the church. These were Joseph Evans, Joseph Martin, Mary Martin, David Leighty, John A., Ann Oglevee, George Boyer, Catharine Boyer, Francis Leighty, Ann Secrist, Mary Work, Francis Varns, Conrad Strickler, and Elizabeth Strickler. During 1843 a house of worship was erected, and there was a substantial promise of much permanent prosperity. June 17, 1843, Jesse Oglevee was ordained ruling elder by Rev. S. E. Hudson. Dec. 20, 1847, John Leighty, Abraham Galley, and Joseph Harper were chosen trustees. The succession of ministers, beginning with Rev. Jesse Adams' time, is given as follows: Jesse Adams, April, 1842, to October, 1842; A. B. Brice, October, 1842, to April, 1843; William Campbell, April, 1843, to April, 1846; A. G. Osborn, April, 1846, to April, 1848; Messrs. Osborn and Swain, April, 1848, to April, 1849; A. G. Osborn, April, 1849, to April, 1856; J. S. Gibson, April, 1856, to May, 1858; J. P. Beard, 1858 to fall of 1859; Anderson, from that time to 1861; J. N. Edmiston, 1861 to 1864; A. J. Swain, 1864 to 1871; H. S. Danley, 1871 to 1874; E. P. Pharr, 1874 to 1877. The pastor now in charge is Rev. K. C. Hayes. To June 1, 1866, the number of persons received into membership aggregated three hundred and ten. To 1881 the members received numbered six hundred and twenty-seven.

The membership in March, 1881, was about three hundred. The greater portion thereof worship at the East Liberty (or Alexandria) Church, and the residue at Summit Chapel, south of East Liberty, a meeting-house provided for the convenience of such members of the congregation as live in that vicinity. Rev. K. C. Hayes, called in 1879 to be the pastor, preaches at both places. In 1867 the present substantial brick edifice replaced the building (likewise brick) set up in 1845. Known as the East Liberty Church, it is actually located at Alexandria. The elders in March, 1881, were Joseph Cropp, David Snyder, E. B. Porter, Farrington Oglevee, Joseph Oglevee. The trustees were J. L. Monmyer, L. L. Collins, Watson Dunn, M. L. Stoner, Philip Oglevee.

Bethel Chapel.

There is at Alexandria a chapel, in which members of the Bethel Disciples' Church of Tyrone meet for worship once a fortnight. The chapel was built in 1875, and is commodious and neat but tasteful in design. The attendance averages fully fifty persons.

Methodist Protestant Church of Dunbar.

About the year 1835 a Methodist Protestant Church was organized in Woodvale School District, and a stone church building erected upon land donated by Joseph Paul. At the same time Mr. Paul made a donation of land for a burying-ground. About 1866 the Woodvale Church was abandoned, and in 1871 was demolished. From 1866 to 1875 the congregation worshiped in the village school-house at Dunbar. In 1875 the present house of worship was erected. The present enrollment of members is about a hundred and fifty, but the membership includes about a hundred. The pastor is Rev. John Hodginson, the preacher on the Dunbar charge, which includes three appointments. Services are held at Dunbar once in two weeks. The class-leader at Dunbar is Daniel Cameron. The Sunday-school superintendent is Lewis McDowell.
ST. ALOYSIUS' CHURCH (ROMAN CATHOLIC).

Previous to 1873 the Catholics residing at Dunbar village attended church at Connellsville. In that year Rev. P. Brady, of Myersdale, in Somerset County, visited Dunbar, and held services in Maurice Healy's house, on which occasion the congregation numbered about a hundred persons. In 1873 and 1874 he preached at Mr. Healy's house once a month. In 1875 a fine house of worship was completed at Dunbar and dedicated that year. It was built of brick, and cost eleven thousand dollars. In 1875 Mr. Brady became the resident priest at Dunbar, and still continues in charge. The congregation includes now (March, 1881) from three hundred to three hundred and fifty families. Services are held every Sunday.

DUNBAR PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

The Presbyterian Church of Dunbar was organized April 29, 1874, by the Presbytery of Redstone. The constituent members numbered eighty-five, of whom the greater portion had been members of the Connellsville Presbyterian Church. Joseph Paull, John Taylor, T. W. Watt, and James L. Paull were chosen ruling elders. In 1874 a church was built at a cost of five thousand five hundred dollars. Nov. 9, 1874, it was dedicated. Services were at first held in the Harper school-house by Rev. J. M. Barnett, of Connellsville, who supplied until December, 1874, when Rev. R. T. Price, of Allegheny City, was engaged, and Mr. Price is still the pastor. Since organization two hundred and eleven members have been received. Of them one hundred and fifty remained March 1, 1881. The Sunday-school, in charge of J. L. Paull as superintendent, and James Thompson and George T. Griffin as assistants, has an average attendance of one hundred and fifteen. The church elders are T. W. Watt, J. L. Paull, Thomas Reiner, and W. H. Barnes. The deacons are A. B. Hosack, James Thompson, W. H. Wilson, and J. W. Guthrie.

DUNBAR METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

Dunbar Methodist Episcopal class, attached to Redstone Circuit, has met at Dunbar village regularly every fortnight in the Young Men's Christian Association Building since the beginning of 1879. The members number now about fifteen. The preacher in charge is Rev. Mr. Husted. The class-leader is William Rodkey. A house of worship was to be built during the summer of 1881.

ST. JOHN IN THE WILDERNESS' CHURCH (PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL).

A Protestant Episcopal chapel bearing this name occupies a site near the Dunbar Furnace. It was consecrated March 8, 1881. The structure cost three thousand dollars, and was projected and completed mainly through the efforts of Mrs. A. B. Du Saulles. The rector at New Haven, Rev. Mr. Stonax, is also rector of this church.

ST. PAUL'S CHURCH (EPISCOPAL).

About the year 1832, St. Paul's Episcopal Church was organized, and a house of worship erected in Woodvale School District, on land owned by Mrs. Mary Meason. Among the families prominent in the organization were the Murphys, Puseys, Measons, and Walkers. The congregation was small at the outset, and thus remained until it disbanded about ten years later. Pulpit supplies were obtained from Connellsville and Uniontown, but at no time were church affairs sufficiently prosperous to warrant the engagement of a resident rector. In a little while the removal from the township of leading members of the church began to weaken the organization, and in 1882 meetings were abandoned.

SCHOOLS.

Incidental reference to some of the early private or "subscription" schools taught in Dunbar township will be found in the history of the township's early settlement. The remote period at which the settlement of Dunbar began makes the task of reciting early school history a vague and unsatisfactory one at best. Every small settlement had its school as soon as the most important matter of settlement was thoroughly adjusted, and these humble school-houses were scattered over the country, and multiplied rapidly as the country was peopled and developed. One of the most important schools of the early era in Dunbar appears to have been opened by the Rev. James Dunlap, pastor of the Laurel Hill Presbyterian Church, and William Littell, Esq. An old newspaper advertisement shows that the school was opened in 1794, and that the preceptors were ready to receive pupils, to whom would be taught "elevation and the English language grammatically, together with the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages, geometry and trigonometry, with their application to mensuration, surveying, gauging, etc.; likewise geography and civil history, natural and moral philosophy, logic, and rhetoric." They set forth, moreover, that "boarding, washing, etc., may be had at reputable houses in the neighborhood, at the low rate of ten pounds per annum." The school building is believed to have been located on the old Tanner farm, formerly owned by Col. William Swearingen, and later by Charles McLaughlin. It was probably continued by Mr. Dunlap until 1803, when he was called to the presidency of Jefferson College, at Canonsburg, Pa. Littell was subsequently well known as a Kentucky lawyer and author.

The public school system was inaugurated in 1835, and May 22d of that year the school appropriation apportioned to Dunbar was $113.33 from the State and $226.66 ½ from the county. Dunbar's first report under the law was made Oct. 16, 1835.

The annual report for the school year ending June 7, 1880, gives details touching Dunbar's public schools as follows:

MANUFACTURING INDUSTRIES.

THE DUNBAR FURNACE COMPANY.

The Dunbar Furnace Company was organized June 1, 1876, with a capital of $500,000, of which $200,000 was in preferred stock. April 29, 1889, the preferred was increased to $300,000. Charles Parrish was chosen president; A. B. De Saulles, vice-president; Theodore P. Farrell, treasurer and secretary. The directors were Charles Parrish, A. B. De Saulles, Samuel Dickson, Fisher Hazard, James Cox, and Henry Brock. The company became possessed of the Dunbar Iron Company’s works, together with coal and iron lands covering about eight thousand acres in Dunbar township. Edmund C. Pechin, superintendent for the Dunbar Iron Company, was installed in the same position under the new organization, with A. B. De Saulles as assistant superintendent. In 1877, Mr. De Saulles was appointed to succeed Mr. Pechin as superintendent, and at that time Mr. William Beeson was chosen general manager. Since that time there has been no change in either the directors or other officers of the company. The furnace company found one stone stack fifty-seven feet high and fifteen feet “bosh,” with a daily capacity of forty tons. The stack was at once rebuilt to a height of seventy-six feet with twenty feet twenty “bosh,” capable of making seventy tons of iron daily. The number of employees at the furnace and mines was increased from two hundred and fifty to five hundred. Three Whitell hot-blast stoves were put in (eighteen by forty each), a new blowing-engine and four new boilers were added, and ninety-eight coke-ovens erected.

In December, 1879, a second stack similar to the first was built, and additions made of two hot-blast stoves, two new blowing-engines, and four new boilers. In February, 1880, the company purchased the Ferguson Coke-Works, and leased three hundred acres of adjacent coal lands. This, with the Hill Farm Coke-Works, bought in 1876, gave the company one hundred and fifty-nine coke-ovens, and control of six hundred acres of coal lands. The large tract of land owned and controlled by the company, lying chiefly in the mountainous region of Dunbar, east and southeast from Dunbar village, includes, besides coal, large deposits of iron ore and limestone. Thus almost at the very doors of the furnace, they find all the materials necessary to the manufacture of iron. Immediately under the coal-beds south of the Hill farm, to the depth of from eighteen to twenty-four inches below the coal, are found iron ore deposits.

This is likewise true of other localities in the township. The annual mining products of the company include 9000 tons of coal, 15,000 tons of mountain ore, 29,000 tons of coal ore, and 35,000 tons of limestone. The annual field of manufactured iron reaches 44,000 tons. The employees engaged at the furnace and mines number between six hundred and seven hundred, of whom one hundred and seventy labor at the furnace foundry and repair-shop. From $16,000 to $18,000 per month is paid out in wages. The principal manufacture is "open gray forge" or mill iron. A large majority of the company's furnace employees live in the vicinity in tenement-houses owned or controlled by the company, and make at the furnace a village of six or seven hundred people.

The company owns twenty miles of single track, four locomotives, and upwards of one hundred cars. At the furnace settlement J. M. Hustead has a finely-appointed store, at which the furnace employes obtain their supplies. The yearly business done by Mr. Hustead is something very remarkable in amount for a country store.

COKE MANUFACTURE.

The first coke-burning in Dunbar in ovens is said by Mr. A. J. Hill to have been by William Turner and Richard Bookens, who, between 1849 and 1845, bought coal of Thomas Gregg, who had a piece of fourteen acres of coal land on the Youghiogheny River, near the present Fort Hill Coke-Works. Turner & Bookens burned the coke on the ground at first, but afterwards put up a few ovens, about which time also Col. A. M. Hill built four coke-ovens near them. These four Mr. Hill soon increased to twelve. The first coke made by Turner & Bookens was boiled down the rivers to Cincinnati, and there it sold at a high price. He had got about discouraged when a foundryman agreed to experiment with it, provided Turner would cart it to the foundry. The experiment proved so satisfactory that the foundryman bought the entire cargo, and thus the trade opened up, Turner found no future difficulty in marketing all he could make. More important coke operations in Dunbar were commenced in 1854 by Watt & Larner, of the Dunbar Furnace, who bought ten acres of coal lands on the present site of the Mahoning Company's works, and burned coke on the ground there for their furnace. The first large nest of coke-ovens built in Dunbar were sixty of those now used by Reid Brothers. They were put up by Watt, Taylor & Co. in 1869. The second lot were built by the Connellsville Gas and Coke Company, the third by Ferguson & Scandred in 1871, the fourth by Paul, Brown & Co. in 1872. There are at present in operation in Dunbar township upwards of fifteen hundred coke-ovens (including one hundred and fifty-nine owned by the Dunbar Furnace Company). There are in process of construction and in contemplation upwards of fourteen hundred more. Reference to the firms engaged in the business, together with details of their operations, will be found following:

ANCHOR COKE-WORKS.

These works, located near Dunbar village (and known until very recently as the Henderson Coke-Works), are now conducted by Morgan, Layng & Co. In June, 1875, H. C. Frick & Co. came into control of one hundred ovens, built here in 1870 by R. Henderson & Co., and two hundred acres of adjacent coal lands. Frick & Co. employed in their Dunbar coke business about one hundred men, mined six thousand bushels of coal daily, and for a similar period produced one hundred and fifty tons of coke.

The main slope in this coal-mine extends fifteen hundred feet. The investment in ovens and lands represents over $200,000. Thomas Lynch has been in charge of the works since June, 1875.

MAHONING COKE COMPANY (LIMITED).

In 1872, Messrs. Paul, Brown & Co. bought the coal right to one hundred acres of coal lands, and built one hundred ovens just south of Dunbar village. Their total investment aggregated $83,000. In 1875 they were succeeded in the proprietorship by the Mahoning Coke Company (Limited). The capital was $40,000. They employ an average of sixty men, mine two hundred tons of coal, and produce one hundred and thirty-seven tons of coke daily. The main slope is 1700 feet in length, and is at an angle of about twenty-three degrees. The officers of the company are Charles L. Rhodes, chairman; F. H. Mathers, secretary and treasurer; N. F. Sanford, manager and agent. Mr. Sanford has been in charge of the works since 1876.

COLVIN & CO.'S WORKS.

In April, 1880, Messrs. S. Colvin & Co., of Pittsburgh, acquired control of eighty-four acres of coal lands (formerly a portion of the R. Henderson & Co. tract), and erected eighty ovens. They have out one oven, which is a slope twelve hundred feet in length. They employ sixty men, take out 4500 bushels of coal, and manufacture 120 tons of coke daily. Their investment is about $15,000. W. A. Blythe is the superintendent.

The Dunbar Furnace Coke-Works are noticed elsewhere in the history of this township, in connection with the account of the operations of the Dunbar Furnace Company.

UNIONDALE COKE-WORKS.

In 1869 Messrs. Watt, Taylor & Co. bought the coal right to one hundred and five acres of coal lands near Dunbar village, and built upon it forty coke-ovens. Soon afterwards they added twenty ovens, and were succeeded by Watt, Byers & Co., who were followed by T. W. Watt & Co. In 1875 Reid Brothers bought the interests of Watt & Co., and built sixteen additional ovens, making the present complement seventy-six. Their main slope reaches twelve hundred feet from the opening. They employ usually seventy-five men, nine fifty thousand bushels of coal daily, and produce each day one hundred and twenty tons of coke. They have invested in the business about $100,000.

CAMBRIA IRON COMPANY'S WORKS.

In 1880 the Cambria Iron Company, of Johnstown, Pa., leased of the Connellsville Gas-Coal Company a large tract of coal lands near New Haven, together with one hundred coke-ovens and appurtenances, previously used by the last-named company. The Cambria Company added four hundred ovens and other appointments for meeting their immense requirements, at a total cost of $228,000. Their lease on the property runs twenty years. They have two mine openings, take out from nine hundred to one thousand tons of coal, and ship about seven hundred tons of coke daily. Their employees number about five hundred. These live near the works, where the company has provided a well-stocked store and one hundred and fifty-six tenement-houses for their accommodation. The office of the company is at No. 218 South Fourth Street, Philadelphia. E. Y. Townsend is the president; Charles S. Wurts, vice-president; and John T. Kille, treasurer. The superintendent of the coke-works is John McFadden. The two works of the Cambria Company in Dunbar are known as the "Morrell" and "Wheeler" Coke-Works.

CONNELSVILLE COKE AND IRON COMPANY.

This company, now pushing rapidly forward the greatest single coal-mining and coke-manufacturing interest in Dunbar, was chartered in March, 1886, with a capital of $1,000,000. Hon. John Leisenring, of Manor Chink, is president; W. B. Whitney, of Philadelphia, secretary and treasurer; and E. K. Hyndman, of Connellsville, general manager. The company owns eight thousand acres of coal lands, lying in the townships of Dunbar, Franklin, and North Union, the greatest portion being in Dunbar. At the new town of Leisenring, three miles and a half southwest from Connellsville, the company have two hundred coke-ovens in operation, and to that number they are now adding two hundred more, which are nearly ready to be put in operation. In addition to these, the building of three hundred more is contemplated, making seven hundred in all.

At this place a shaft has been sunk three hundred and seventy-five feet deep. The Pennsylvania Railroad Company has constructed a branch road, known as the "Opossum Run Branch," from New Haven to Leisenring, and as the coal company develop their lands, will lengthen it. The purpose of the coal company is to sink shafts and build coke-ovens at the most available points, and to use the utmost energy in utilizing the enormous supply of coal contained within their possessions. They now mine about seven hundred tons of coal daily, and employ upwards of four hundred people. They began to make coke for the first time in April, 1881. It is expected that the company will erect extensive furnaces on their lands in the near future.

THE TROFTER COKE WORKS.

These coke-works, located within the township of Dunbar, are owned and operated by the Connellsville Gas-Coal Company, which was organized Aug. 9, 1864, under act of April 21, 1854. Letters patent were issued Oct. 14, 1864. The capital stock of the company is $500,000. Their property consists of about three thousand one hundred acres of coal right and about four hundred and fifty acres in fee, situated in the vicinity of Connellsville. There are three mining villages on the property, viz., Wheeler, Morrell, and Trotter, named after Charles Wheeler, vice-president of the Central National Bank of Philadelphia; Hon. Daniel J. Morrell, general manager of the Cambria Iron Company, Johnstown; and Charles W. Trotter, Esq., of Philadelphia, respectively. The first two villages consist of about one hundred and sixty tenement-houses, a large store building, and suitable buildings for coal-hoisting machinery, etc., all under the management of the Cambria Iron Company, which has leased for a period of twenty years the five hundred coke-ovens connected with the same, and which are now in full blast.

The village of Trotter, recently laid out and built under the management and direction of the company's superintendent, Henry Wickham, has been described as follows: "A little more than a mile out the Opossum Run Branch from New Haven junction is the coke village of Trotter, where are located the extensive works of the Connellsville Gas-Coal Company. The town consists of about one hundred houses, of which the company own eighty-four, and is laid out with mathematical accuracy. The houses are neat and clean, and to each is attached sufficient ground for gardening purposes; the streets are wide and well drained; water-plugs are stationed along the streets at convenient distances, and through these the village is supplied with pure Youghiogheny River water, furnished by a pipe line to that stream, over two miles distant.1 A school-house of modern design adorns one of the thoroughfares; a large store supplies the employees with food and clothing; and, upon the whole, Trotter will compare favorably with any mining village in the region. The town is to be enlarged to the extent of forty more tenement-houses. A portion of the lumber for them is already on the ground, and the contract for their erection has been made. In addition to the modern improvements mentioned above, a telephone line has been constructed connecting the works with those of the Connellsville Coke and Iron Company at Leisuruing, and with the residence of Manager Wickham in Connellsville.

"The works at present consist of two hundred completed ovens, which are in active operation, turning out eight thousand tons of first-class coke per month. The entire plant contemplates four hundred ovens, and already seventy more are under contract. The remaining one hundred and thirty will be built in the near future. One hundred and seventy-five men find employment here, and from the bowels of the shaft, three hundred and fifty feet from the surface of the ground, are hoisted eleven thousand tons of raw coal per month. The ovens are of the size now regarded as the standard of the region, and known as the twelve-foot oven. The coke turned out at these works is of a superior quality, the coal of this company lying near the centre of the basin, where it is best for coking purposes." The coal vein found in the Trotter shaft averages nine feet workable, and an analysis recently made by Prof. Charles P. Williams, of Philadelphia, shows it to be about three per cent. higher in fixed carbon and coke yield, and about two per cent. lower in sulphur and ash than any coal yet found in the Connellsville region, thus proving the generally accepted theory that the Connellsville coking coal is purest where it has most cover.

The works of the company embody the latest improvements. The cages are hoisted and lowered by a one hundred and twenty-horse-power engine, manufactured by Hayden, of Luzerne County. This engine also runs a fan, which supplies the mine with a constant current of fresh air. The main heading is five hundred and seventy yards in length and nine feet in width. The works are supplied with a blacksmith- and carpenter-shop in addition to the other buildings. The whole is under the management of Henry Wickham, well known as a coke man in this region. His corps of assistants comprises the following: John I. Munson, assistant superintendent; Elijah Parker, pit boss; George Kelley, yard boss; George Whetzel, engineer; Samuel Dinsmore, machinist in charge of repair-shops. The store is in charge of James C. Munson, senior member of the firm by whom it is owned, Munson & Co. The mining engineer at present in charge of the Trotter shaft is Mr. George C. Hewitt, recently connected with the Westmoreland Coal Company at Irwin Station.

The entire plant of this company, exclusive of the coal, cost, in round numbers, $225,000. Their coal lands embrace two thousand one hundred acres, exclusive of a thousand acres leased to the Cambria Iron Company, together with their old works on the Fayette County Branch. The latter, both works and coal, revert to the Connellsville Gas-Coal Company in twenty years.

FORT HILL COKE-WORKS.

In the summer of 1880, W. J. Rainey, prominently identified with the Cleveland Rolling-Mill Company of Cleveland, Ohio, purchased of A. J. Hill the coal right in a farm of three hundred and thirty-six acres, located upon the Youghiogheny River just below New Haven, and has built upon it eighty-eight ovens, which number is to be increased to three hundred. The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company has spanned the river with a fine bridge one mile below Connellsville, and constructed a branch road to the Fort Hill Coke-Works. It is the intention of the railway company to ultimately push their extension to Wheeling. Mr. Rainey will have a force of fully five hundred employes, for whom he will erect tenements on the opposite side of the river, with which he will establish communication by means of a substantial bridge. When his enterprise gets fairly in operation he will have at the Fort Hill works and surroundings an investment of about $200,000. Daily shipments of coke are expected to average about five hundred tons. Mr. A. J. Hill has been in charge of the works from the outset. Back of the river, in Dunbar, Langhlin & Schuhengerber and Graff, Bennett & Co., two Pittsburgh firms, have about fifteen hundred acres of coal lands that are likely to be developed within the near future. The probabilities as well as the possibilities of the coke interests in Dunbar point to vast business interests and a steady increase over the present production of coke.

BLISS & MARSHALL'S FIRE-BRICK WORKS.

About a half-mile south of Dunbar village, Messrs. Bliss & Marshall have, since 1872, been engaged in the manufacture of fire-brick for coke-ovens. This was the first and is the only enterprise of a similar character known to Dunbar township. About five acres of land are occupied, and from twenty-five to sixty men employed at the works. There are four kilns, that produce about 4,500,000 bricks annually. Messrs. Bliss & Marshall have about $20,000 invested in the enterprise.

HARPER'S WOOLEN-MILL.

Daniel Harper has on Dunbar Creek, near Dunbar, a woollen-factory, wherein he manufactures blankets, flannels, yarns, etc. It was built about 1821, by Jacob Lowry, who before that had a carding-machine and fulling-mill attachment in his stone grist-mill. His son William succeeded him in business and improved the woollen-mill. In 1840, James Hankins and Thomas Rankin became its owners. In 1850, Hankins was sole owner, and in 1862 Daniel Harper came into possession of the property. Since then he has carried on the mill.

NEW HAVEN BOROUGH.

The borough of New Haven lies in a bend of the Youghiogheny River, directly opposite the borough of Connellsville. Its population in July, 1880, was four hundred and forty-two. Up to 1873 the town was a manufacturing point of considerable consequence, but since then it has been devoid of special interest in that direction, and a diminution in its prosperity has ensued. The near proximity to Connellsville checks New Haven's progress. As an evidence of this it may be noted that although New Haven was laid out as a village in 1795, no post-office was established there until 1878, the people of the place being obliged to go to Connellsville for their mails. The Southwest Pennsylvania Railroad traverses the village, and crosses the river at that point. Communication with Connellsville is likewise maintained by means of a substantial wire suspension bridge, built and opened in 1862 by the Youghiogheny Bridge Company. Its entire cost was about twenty thousand dollars. Previous to 1862 the river at New Haven had been spanned by three bridges. The first one fell in 1816, the second was washed away in 1831, and the third in 1869.

Upon or just below the site now occupied by New Haven a settlement was commenced by Capt. William Crawford in 1765, on the bank of the river, at the point where Gen. Braddock forded the stream on his way to the fatal battle-field of the Monongahela in 1755. That point is called "Braddock's Ford" to this day. Stewart's Crossing, sometimes confounded with Braddock's Ford, is farther up the river, and near the suspension bridge. It was so called because, in 1753, one William Stewart lived there on the south bank of the river. The Indian troubles of that period drove him away.

Evidence that Capt. William Crawford commenced his settlement improvements at Braddock's Ford in 1765 is found in his own affidavit, taken at the house of John Ormsby, in Pittsburgh, before the Virginia commissioners, in the year 1780, which is given on page 61 of this volume. In that affidavit he says he began his improvements on the Youghiogheny in the fall of 1765, and moved his family to his new home in 1766. The patent for his land was not issued until 1769. For some reason best known to himself he did not take it out in his own name, but caused it to be issued to his son John. The original survey was made in 1769, and included 376¼ acres. This tract embraced all of what is now New Haven borough. The description of the lands was as follows:

"Situated on the south side of the Youghiogheny River, and includes what is generally called Stewart's Crossing, in Cumberland County. The new purchase, surveyed the twenty-second day of September, 1769, by order of survey No. 2390, date the third of April, 1769. By N. Lane, Deputy Surveyor."

Not only for the reason that Capt. William Crawford was the original purchaser of the land now the site of the borough of New Haven, but because he was in his time one of the most prominent and influential men in the country west of the Alleghenies, and still more because his fearful death by Indian torture has made his name historic, a somewhat extended sketch of his life is here given:

William Crawford was a native of Virginia, born of Scotch-Irish parentage in the year 1732, in that part of the county of Orange which afterwards became Frederick, and is now Berkeley County. His father, who was a farmer of respectability, died in 1733, leaving two sons, William and Valentine, of whom the first named was the elder. Their mother, Honora Crawford, was a woman of great energy of character and of unusual physical vigor, kind and affectionate in disposition, and devoted to the welfare of her children. Remaining but a short time in widowhood, she married for her second husband Richard Stephenson, who died about ten years afterwards, leaving six children of their marriage, viz.: John, Hugh, Richard, James, Marcus, and Elizabeth Stephenson,—five half-brothers and a half-sister of William and Valentine Crawford. The seven sons of Mrs. Stephenson were all remarkable for their size and unusual physical strength, and they were all living with their mother when, in the year 1749, the young surveyor, George Washington, then seventeen years of age, came to the neighborhood and took lodgings at Mrs. Stephenson's house while engaged in running lines in the vicinity for Lord Fairfax. Here he remained for a considerable time, and during his stay became much attached to the sons of his hostess, particularly to the eldest, William Crawford, who was of the same age as himself, and to whom he always remained a steadfast friend until death severed the tie, after an acquaintance of thirty-two years.

During the stay of Washington young William Crawford became his assistant, and learned the business of surveying, which he afterwards practiced in connection with his duties as manager of the farm until the year 1755, when he entered the military service, receiving from the Governor of Virginia a commission as ensign, which had been procured for him by the intercession of his young surveyor friend of six years before, who was now called Colonel Washington. It has been stated in some biographical account of William Crawford that he marched with the army of Gen. Braddock on the ill-fated expedition for the reduction of Fort Du Quene, taking part in the disastrous battle and defeat of the 9th of July, 1755; but that such was not the case is shown conclusively by his own affidavit, to which reference has already been made, and in which he distinctly states that he never saw the country west of the mountains until the year 1758. Prior to that time, for about three years, he had been engaged in frontier duty along the line of the Potomac and at Fort Cumberland, and during that time had been advanced to a lieutenantcy. In the year mentioned, when the army under Gen. Forbes was preparing to march westward for a second attempt against Fort Du Quene, he received promotion to a captaincy on the recommendation of his friend, Col. Washington, who was then in command of all the Virginia troops destined for the expedition. On receiving his commission Capt. Crawford recruited a full company of frontiersmen, and at their head marched with Washington’s regiments to join the forces of Gen. Forbes.

In this campaign, which resulted in the occupation of the French fortress (Nov. 25, 1758), Crawford acquitted himself with gallantry and great credit. Three years later he continued in the military service, and at the end of that time quitted it to resume his vocations of farmer and surveyor in the Shenandoah Valley. There he married Hannah Vance, a sister of John Vance, who settled in Tyrone township, Fayette Co., and remained in the quiet of domestic life on the old Virginia farm until the summer of 1765, when he mounted his horse and turned his face westward to cross the Alleghenies and select a location for the future home of his family beyond the mountains, in the new country which he had seen and admired while on his march with the army of Forbes.

1 The rendezvousing of Crawford’s company, preparatory to marching his men to join the force under Washington, disclosed the fact that there was a want of transportation. Here was a dilemma. Fortunately, however, there happened to be at the place where the company was encamped a teamster to whom Crawford had applied, and who, when informed of his wants, sprang at once to the service of his party. In such an emergency Crawford felt too anxious in pressing the waggons into his service, and accordingly announced to the stranger his determination. The owner of the team was in no hurry to submit to what he considered an oppressive act. But how could it be avoided? He was alone in the midst of a company of men who were ready and strong enough at a word to enforce their captain’s orders. Remaining a short time silent, looking sullenly at the armed men, as if measuring their strength with his own weakness, he finally observed to Crawford that it was hard for him to force the service against his will; that every man ought to have a fair chance, and that he was taken at a great disadvantage, insomuch as the odds against him were so great as to deprive him of the power of self-protection.

2 He thought the captain was taking advantage of circumstances, and he now would make a proposition, which the commander was certainly bound in honor to accept. ‘I will fight you,’ said he, ‘or any man in your company. If I am whipped I will go with you cheerfully. If I comply you must let me go.’ From what has been said of Capt. Crawford’s personal activity and strength it will not be a matter of wonder to learn that the challenge of the doughty teamster was at once accepted. Both began to strip; the men prepared to form a ring, determined to show fair play and to see the man. At this moment a tall young man, who had lately joined the company, but a stranger to most of them, and who had been leasing carelessly against a tree, eying the scene with apparent unconcern, now stepped forward and drew Crawford inside. ‘Captain,’ said the stranger, ‘you must let me fight that fellow; he will whip you, and it will never do to have the company whipped.’ A few additional words of like import, overheard by the men, with the result, collected, and confident manner of the speaker, induced them to suggest to Crawford that perhaps it would be prudent to let the stranger try his hand. The captain, having done all that policy required in accepting the challenge, suffered himself to be persuaded by his men, and it was agreed that the youth should be sub-titulated in his place.

3 By this time the waggons were stripped to the buff and ready for the fight. He was big, muscular, well filled out, hardened by exposure, and an adept in Logistic pursuits. His air was cool and professional, his mien defiant and confident. When the youthful-looking stranger, therefore, stepped into the ring, clad in his house hunting-shirt, and haggard shiner and a little pole, the men had not the utmost confidence in his success. However, there was fire in his eye, and as he threw aside his garments a stalwart frame was disclosed of enormous bones and muscle. The spirits of the company immediately revived.

4 Preparations being finished, the word was given. The youth sprang upon his antagonist with the agility and ferocity of a tiger. The blood flowed at every blow of his tremendous fists. The contest was short and decisive. The teamster was completely vanquished. The hero of this his first fight for his country was afterwards Maj.-Gen. Daniel Morgan, of Revolutionary fame.—Dunbar’s ‘Expedition against Stonewall.’

The spot which he selected was that which has already been described on the left bank of the Yonhiogheny, near the place where the army of Gen. Braddock crossed the river, on its way to Fort du Quesne, ten years before. Here he built a log cabin, and began clearing land. He was joined in the same summer by his half-brother, Hugh Stephenson, who worked here with William Crawford for two years, during which time he made a clearing and built a cabin for himself, and in the year 1769 brought his family, which up to this time had remained at the Virginia home. The family of William Crawford, when he came to the Yonhio-gheny, consisted of his wife and four children,—Sarah, John, Effie, and Ann, the first named of whom became the wife of William Harrison; Effie, the wife of William McCormick; and Ann, the wife of Zachariah Connell.

In the year 1770, Col. George Washington visited Crawford’s home on the Yonhio-gheny, and the latter accompanied him in an extended tour down the Ohio to the Kanawha for the selection of large bodies of land, in which Washington desired to make investment. In the same year Crawford was appointed one of the justices of peace for the county of Cumberland (which then embraced the present county of Fayette), and on the 11th of March, 1771, Governor Penn appointed him, with Arthur St. Clair, Dorsey Pentecest, Robert Hanna, and others, justices of the peace of the then newly-erected county of Bedford. Upon the erection of Westmoreland County, in 1773, his commission was renewed for that county, and he was made presiding justice in its courts.

On the breaking out of “Dunmore’s war,” in 1774, being anxious to take part in the conflict, Crawford was indiscreet enough to accept a captain’s commission from the Governor of Virginia. Up to this time, through the dispute which had existed between Pennsylvania and Virginia (in which both States claimed jurisdiction over the region west of Laurel Hill), he had remained true to the State under which he held commission as justice of the peace, but now that his military ardor had been reawakened he allowed it to outweigh his loyalty to Pennsylvania, and to induce him to recognize the claims of her adversary by taking service under the Virginia Governor, Dunmore. He raised a company of men, and in June of the year named marched them to “Fort Dunmore,” as the Virginians had now named the fortification at the present site of Pittsburgh. He was made major by Dunmore, and took quite a part in the “war” of that year, being sent in command of a detachment to destroy one of the Mingo towns, and performed that duty thoroughly, taking some prisoners, whom he sent to Fort Dunmore. He also did some service with his command at Wheeling. At the close of the Indian hostilities in November he returned from that station to his home on the Yonhio-gheny.

While he was absent on the campaign Arthur St. Clair (afterwards major-general in the war of the Revolution), one of his associate justices of Westmoreland County, feeling aggrieved at the course which Crawford had pursued in accepting a military office under Virginia and engaging in a war against the Indians, which the Pennsylvania government disapproved of, wrote to Governor Penn on the 22d of July, saying, "Capt. Crawford, the president of our court, seems to be the most active Virginia officer in their service. He is now down the river at the head of a number of men, which is his second expedition. . . How is it possible for a man to serve two colonies in direct antagonism to each other at the same time?" He proceeded to argue that as Crawford had "joined with the government of Virginia in opposing the jurisdiction of Pennsylvania," he should be removed from the offices which he held by appointment in the county of Westmoreland. The argument, was held to be sound, and the reasons sufficient. He was accordingly so removed on the 25th of January, 1775, and never again held office under the State of Pennsylvania.

He now became fully identified with the Virginia partisans as opposed to the jurisdiction of Pennsylvania. Upon the erection of the Virginia county of Yohogania, Capt. Crawford was appointed deputy surveyor and one of the justices for that county, and occasionally sat on the bench as one of the justices of its courts in 1777 and 1778. He continued to hold these offices during the existence of the court,—that is, until Virginia surrendered her claim to jurisdiction in the territory between Laurel Hill and the present western boundary of Pennsylvania.

During the first part of his career as deputy surveyor under Virginia, when his surveys caused many persons to be temporarily dispossessed and some imprisoned, Crawford became exceedingly unpopular among the people of his section, in whose favor and estimation he had previously stood high. But he soon after regained his popularity by the patriotic course which he took in the Revolution, sinking all his partisanship in an ardent zeal for the cause of liberty. At the convention which met at Pittsburgh on the 16th of May, 1775, to express their views as to the aggressions of the mother-country, and to concert measures for the general good, William Crawford took a prominent part in the proceedings, and was made a member of the "Committee of Defense." It has been said that about this time he offered his services in a military capacity to the Council of Safety, then sitting in Philadelphia, but that, "in view of his conduct in setting at defiance the laws of Pennsylvania, and the bitter feeling engendered on account of the transactions of other Virginians with whom he had associated, his patriotic offer was rejected;" but there is doubt of the authenticity of this statement.

In the fall of 1775 he offered his services to Virginia to raise a regiment for the general defense, and the offer was accepted. He then at once commenced recruiting, and it was not long before a full regiment was raised almost entirely by his own exertions. He, however, did not then obtain the colonelcy, which he expected and which he had so well earned, for the reason that Congress had determined to receive only six Virginia regiments into the Continental army, and as the number of regiments raised in Virginia exceeded this quota all the expectant officers could not be provided for. On the 12th of January, 1776, however, Crawford was commissioned lieutenant-colonel of the Fifth Virginia Regiment, and on the 11th of October received from Congress the appointment of colonel of the Seventh Virginia Regiment in the Continental service, his commission dating the 14th of August preceding.

During the year 1776, Col. Crawford served with his command in the campaign and battle of Long Island, and in the later operations north of the city of New York. He was with the dispirited army of Washington in the dreary retreat through New Jersey and across the Delaware River, and was one of the heroes who, recrossing that stream in the night of the 25th of December, fought the battle and won the victory at Trenton on the morning of the 26th. On the 3d of January, 1777, he was present at the battle of Princeton, and marched from that field by way of Pluckamin to the winter-quarters at Morris-town. In the fall of the same year he took part in the campaigns of the Brandywine and Germantown.

Col. Crawford having represented to the commander-in-chief that there was serious danger of Indian attacks in the country bordering the Monongahela, Allegheny, and Ohio Rivers, his views were taken into consideration, and it was ordered that two regiments of men be raised—one in Virginia and one in Pennsylvania—for the protection of their frontiers; and it was by Congress "Resolved, That General Washington be requested to send Colonel William Crawford to Pittsburgh to take the command, under Brigadier-General Hand, of the Continental troops and militia in the Western Department." In pursuance of this resolution the order was issued, and Col. Crawford having received his instructions from Congress at York, Pa., proceeded to Fort Pitt to assume his new command.¹ The regiment which Virginia

"We beg leave to take this method of expressing our sense of the warmest attachment to you, and at the same time our sorrow in the loss of a commander who has always been influenced by motives that deservedly gain the unfeigned esteem and respect of all those who have the honor of serving under him. Both officers and soldiers retain the strongest remembrance of the regard and affection you have ever discovered toward them; but as we are well assured that you have the best interests of your country in view, we should not regret, however sensibly we may feel the loss of you, that you have chosen another field for the display of your military talents. Permit us, therefore, to express our most cordial wish that you may find a regiment no less attached to you than the Seventh, and that your services may ever be productive of benefit to your country and honor to yourself."

had been required to furnish had been raised by that State to the maximum; that of Pennsylvania was considerably deficient in numbers. Both reported at Fort Pitt in the spring of 1778.

One of the first duties assigned to Col. Crawford in his new command was the erection of a fort at a fordning-place on the Allegheny, sixteen miles above Pittsburgh, as a check to marauding Indians who were in the habit of crossing the river at that place. This work was performed successfully and to the entire satisfaction of Gen. McIntosh,¹ who named it "Fort Crawford," in compliment to the colonel who superintended its construction, and who was the commandant of its garrison a considerable part of the time during 1778 and the following year.

In the fall of 1778, Col. Crawford (who was then in command of a brigade formed of the militia of Yohogania, Monongalia, and Ohio Counties, Va.) took part in the expedition under Gen. McIntosh for the capture of the British post of Detroit. Nothing came of it, however, except the erection of Forts Laurens and McIntosh. At the close of the expedition he returned with his command to Fort Pitt. In 1779 he commanded several minor expeditions against the Indians, and was generally successful. In 1780 he appeared before Congress to urge a more energetic defense of the frontier against Indian depredations, and his representations caused that body to grant aid in money and munitions of war, which latter were forwarded to Fort Pitt and other Western posts. In 1781 he gave powerful aid to the unfortunate Col. Lochry in raising men in Westmoreland County for the expedition under Gen. Clarke, in which Lochry and his men all lost their lives. It was the intention of Crawford to accompany this expedition, but he was prevented by the necessity of his presence at Fort Pitt and on the Allegheny outposts.

In the autumn of 1781 he was retired from active military duty, but without resigning his commission. The war was evidently drawing towards a close, and he resolved to pass the remainder of his life in peace at his home on the Youghiogheny. For a time it seemed as if this earnest wish might be gratified, but it was not to be so. The surrender of Cornwallis was clearly the end of the conflict, so far as the movements of armies were concerned, but the Indian depredations on the Western frontier were not only continued, but were becoming more frequent and daring. Finally, in the spring of 1782, the Sandusky expedition was proposed, to inflict a decisive blow on the savages by the destruction of their town. The proposition met with favor, the campaign was decided on, and preparations for it were pushed rapidly forward. Col. Crawford approved of but did not purpose joining it. "His advice was frequently and freely given, and although resolved to draw the sword no more, yet his martial spirit was fully aroused as reports came in from the frontiers of the early appearance of the Indians, and their audacity and horrible barbarity. He could hardly restrain himself from hurrying away with his neighbors in pursuit of the merciless foe. . . . Many eyes were turned upon Crawford as the proper person to lead the expedition, but he refused. His patriotism, however, pleaded powerfully against his settled determination, as he saw the probability of a volunteer force, respectable in numbers, being raised for the enterprise. To add to the plea his son John and his son-in-law, William Harrison, determined to volunteer for the campaign. Pentecost ² was urgent that he should once more take command. Irvine himself thought it would be expedient for him to accept.

"Crawford could no longer refuse. He still held his commission as colonel in the regular army, and the commanding officer of the Western Department desired him to lead the expedition; 'hence,' he reasoned, 'it is now my duty to go. I will volunteer with the rest, and if elected to command, shall do all in my power for the success of the expedition.' It is the testimony of a grandson of Crawford (Uriah Springer) that he had often heard his grandmother say it was against the will of his grandfather to go out on the Sandusky expedition; but as he held a commission under the government, he yielded to the wishes of the volunteers."³

Having arrived at this decision, he at once set about making arrangements for his departure. On the 16th of May he made his will, ⁴ and in the morning of the 18th he took leave of his children, relatives, and friends, and departed. His wife accompanied him across the Youghiogheny to its right bank, where, bathed in tears and weighed down with the darkest forebodings, she bade him a sorrowful and, as it proved, a final farewell. The colonel mounted his horse ⁵ and rode to Fort Pitt, where he held an extended conference with Gen. Irvine in regard to the expedition. On the 29th he left the fort and proceeded down the river to the rendezvous at Mingo Bottom, and was elected to the command of the forces. The events which occurred in the few remaining days of his life, and of his dreadful death at the stake in the afternoon of the 11th of June, 1782, have already been narrated in the account of the disastrous Sandusky expedition.

Crawford's farm and primitive residence at the crossing of the Youghiogheny was called by him "Spring Garden," but it was widely known by nearly all

Some travelers to and from the Monongahela country as "Crawford's Place," and it was made a halting-point by great numbers of those (particularly Virginians) who came to or through this region on land-seeking tours or other business. Crawford was a man of remarkably open and generous nature, free-hearted, and hospitable to a degree that was ruinous to his own interest. The result was that his house at the Youghiogheny crossing became a noted resort for pioneers, and there was seldom a day or night when his roof did not shelter others besides the members of his own family. Under these circumstances he found that to escape being reduced to poverty he must do one of two things,—leave the country or open a tavern at his house. He chose the latter, and announced his determination to Col. George Washington, in a letter dated "Spring Garden, Jan. 15, 1774," in which he said to his illustrious friend, "I intend public housekeeping, and I am prepared for it now, as I can live no longer without that or ruining myself, such numbers constantly travel the road, and nobody keeping anything for horses but myself. Some days, now, if I had rum, I could make three pounds. I have sent for some by Valentine Crawford, and can supply you with what you want as cheap as you can bring it here if you carry it yourself." This last part of the extract has reference to Washington's supposed need of rum for the use of the men he had employed about that time in improvements on his lands in what is now the township of Perry. The Valentine Crawford mentioned in the letter was William Crawford's brother, who came to this region and settled on Jacob's Creek not long after William settled on the Youghiogheny. Both the brothers were to some extent engaged in trade with the Indians after their settlement here, and both at different times acted as Washington's agent for the care and supervision of his large tracts of land in Fayette County and west of the Monongahela.

The widow of Col. Crawford was left in embarrassment as to property. Crawford's private affairs had come to be in a very unsettled condition on account of his military and other duties having called him so frequently from home, his absence sometimes being greatly prolonged. The expectations and vicissitudes of the latter years of his life had called his attention from them necessarily. The result was that his estate was swept away, most of it, by a flood of claims, some of them having, doubtless, no just foundation. For losses sustained upon the Sandusky expedition the State afterwards reimbursed his estate. Hannah Crawford afterwards drew a pension from the State on account of the military services of her husband, In November, 1804, a petition to Congress for her relief was presented to Congress. It recited that her husband, William Crawford, was at the time of his death on the Continental establishment as colonel of the Virginia line; that in the spring of 1782, in the hour of imminent danger and the defenseless situation of the Western frontier, by the directions and under the instructions of Gen. William Irvine, who then had the command of the militia and Continental troops in the Western country, he took the command as colonel of and marched with a detachment of Western militia volunteers and some Continental officers against the savage enemy, the Indians; and that in the month of June of that year he was defeated by the savages and fell in the defense of his country. The prayer of the petition was, in view of the fact that the petitioner was aged, infirm, and indigent, that "your honorable body will grant such relief and support as in your wisdom, justice, and discretion for the services and loss of her said husband your petitioner may be justly entitled to." Congress, however, refused to grant the relief sought for. For thirty-five years after her husband's tragic death Mrs. Crawford lived upon the old place at Braddock's Ford, and in the old log house that Col. Crawford built in 1765. After the departure of her son John for his new home in Kentucky, she was left to the care of an old slave named Daniel, and a man named Ladd, who had long been one of the Crawford servants. These two, as well as all of the old Crawford servants, she outlived, dying in New Haven in 1817, at the age of ninety-three years and eleven months.

Mrs. Crawford was described as a remarkably active woman in her old age. Provance McCormick, Esq., of Connellsville, remembers that one day, about 1807, Mrs. Crawford, then upwards of eighty years old, came on horseback to visit the McCormicks in Connellsville. She rode a good-sized mare, and when ready to return home after her visit was ended went to mount her favorite "Jenny." "Wait, wait," called one of the boys, "wait until I bring your horse to the block." "I don't want a horse-block, my boy, to mount upon Jenny's back," blithely replied the old lady; "I'm better than fifty horse-blocks," and so saying she moved briskly towards Jenny, placed one hand upon the horn of the saddle, the other upon Jenny's back, and at a single bound was firmly seated in her place. "There," cried she, "what do you suppose I want of horse-blocks?" Whereat everybody applauded and commended her performance, saying but few women could equal it.

Of course the death of Col. Crawford was a terrible blow to the widow. For years her grief was overwhelming. Uriah Springer1 says, "When I was a little boy (long after Col. Crawford's death) my grandmother Crawford took me up behind her on horseback and rode across the Youghiogheny, past the John Reist farm, and into the woods at the left. When we alighted we stood by an old moss-covered white-oak log. "Here," said my grandmother, as she sat down upon the log and cried as if her heart would break, "here I parted with your grandfather."

1 Son of Col. Crawford's daughter Sarah, whose first husband, William Harper, was killed in the Crawford expedition, and who afterwards married Capt. Uriah Springer.
The old Crawford house contained but one room, and stood upon a round knoll, about fifty yards from the Crawford Spring, now on Mrs. Banning's property, near the house of Washington Johnson. In the stone house built over the spring is said to be a stick of timber from the Crawford house, while other timbers therefrom are said to have been used in the construction of the buildings known as the Locomotive-Works. When the house was demolished a few speculative persons made walking-canes of some of the timber, and sold them at high prices to relic-seekers.

Early in 1770 an occurrence took place at the home of William Crawford which created considerable excitement in Western Pennsylvania. John Ingham, a young man in his employ, who had been indentured to him to learn the art of surveying, brutally murdered (while intoxicated) an Indian, a warm friend of the Crawford family. After committing the deed the young apprentice fled to Virginia, pursued, however, by Crawford and a few neighbors, who succeeded in capturing him. He was then turned over to the State authorities for punishment. Lord Botetourt, the Governor of Virginia, after a conference with Crawford, sent Ingham, under guard, to Governor Penn, of Pennsylvania, at the same time explaining to the latter, by a letter written at Williamsburg on the 20th of March, 1770, that he had sent "the body of John Ingham, he having confessed himself as concerned in the murder of Indian Stephen," which, from the best information the Governor could obtain, was committed on a spot of ground claimed by Pennsylvania. "You will find by the paper I have enclosed," adds Botetourt, "that there never was an act of villany more unprovoked or more deliberately undertaken." Crawford took every pains to bring forward the proper evidence against the prisoner, but the latter escaped from custody and was never heard of afterwards.

Contemporaneous with William Crawford as settlers at and in the vicinity of the town of New Haven were Lawrence Harrison and his sons, one of whom was William Harrison, who became the husband of Crawford's daughter Sarah, who was said to have been the most beautiful girl west of the Alleghenies. The Harrisons were settlers here in the spring of 1768, when the Rev. John Steele and his associates came to inspect the settlements in the Youghiogheny and Monongahela Valleys. The Harrison lands (adjoining those of Crawford) were entered at the Land Office in that year. Those lands afterwards passed to Daniel Rogers, James Blackstone, and others. Lawrence Harrison's daughter Catharine married Col. Isaac Meason. There are no Harrisons, descendants of this family, now remaining at or in the vicinity of New Haven. John Harrison, the last of his name at New Haven, died there about 1850.

Benjamin Wells, who lived near the William Crawford place in 1790, or before, was an excise officer during the Whiskey Insurrection of 1794, and for that reason was especially obnoxious to the Whiskey Boys. One night they gathered in force and boldly marching to Wells' house set fire to it to show their hatred of his office. Wells and his family were not only left unharmed, but had received timely warning, so that they moved out before the torch was applied. Considering that his presence was not welcome on that side of the river, he moved across to Connellsville. His house at New Haven stood very near to the site of the house now occupied by Washington Johnson.

John Crawford, son of Col. William Crawford, came upon his father's death into actual possession of the property now including the site of New Haven, and Nov. 27, 1780, sold the homestead to Edward Cook. A portion of it included Stewart's Crossing. Cook sold to Col. Isaac Meason. John Crawford removed in 1786 to Kentucky, where he died. There is still extant a story that tells of Col. Meason's acquiring a portion of the Crawford tract on account of a claim he held against Col. Crawford for the horse upon which Col. Crawford rode away from his home when he set out upon his expedition in 1782. The horse was a purchase (so runs the story) from Col. Meason, and was to be paid for at some future day. Crawford did not return, and Meason brought an action against the estate to recover the value of the animal. The result was a protracted litigation on a sale of some of the Crawford lands to satisfy Meason's and other claims. Under that sale Meason bought in a considerable tract. He acquired a large landed estate in Fayette County at about the same time, and became a famous iron manufacturer. His son, Col. Isaac Meason, who was associated with him in business, built a store in what is now New Haven borough, near Stewart's Crossing. In 1796 he laid out New Haven village. It is likely that the employés of the iron-works had their homes there, and that he opened the store for the purpose of supplying them with necessary, for from all accounts there was not much else at New Haven then save the Meason interests. At best, however, not much is known of the history of the village at that date, beyond what has been related above.

John Rogers kept a tavern there in 1797 and 1798, and in 1800 Caleb Squibb was landlord of the house—the same afterwards carried on by Campbell. In 1815 New Haven had come into the dignity of a village, though with but two streets containing dwellings and perhaps a hundred inhabitants. The year named saw the arrival at Connellsville of John A. McIlvaine, a tailor, formerly a resident of Washington County. He lived a few months in Connellsville in the house occupied by Zachariah Connell.

In 1815 he moved to New Haven, and opened a tailor-shop in a house now the residence of Leander Dawson. He had five children when he located in the town, and had three born to him afterwards. The only one of the eight now living in New Haven is Robert A. McIlvaine, who has kindly furnished most of the following facts and incidents relating to the early history of New Haven. His residence in the village has covered a period of sixty-five years, during which he has for upwards of twenty-five years followed the business of druggist. Of those living in New Haven when he came to the village in 1815 not one has a home there now. At that time Col. Isaac Meason was keeping store in a log house, and lived in a stone house now known as the Giles House. In 1816, Samuel G. Wurts was also a store-keeper in New Haven. James H. White and Samuel Syl had small shops in which they made nails and tacks by hand.

Levi Atkins, the shoemaker, lived just below, where Mathiott's drug-store is; Charles King was the village blacksmith, and Henry Beason the wheelwright. James McCoy and his sons had a cooper's shop, and a man named John Campbell was landlord of a tavern that stood on the ground now occupied by Mathiott's drug-store. Maj. James Rogers, an uncle of Daniel Rogers, kept a hotel in the frame part of what is now known as the Giles House. Little is known of him save that he left a large family. In the frame building nearly opposite to the mill now owned by Kaine & Long, Adam Victor was landlord in 1814. He was the son-in-law of the Rev. John Fell, a Methodist minister. Fell was married to Betsey Meason, a daughter of Col. Isaac Meason, Sr. Victor's successor for some years was William Salters. His wife was Miss Fanny Meason, daughter of John Meason, a brother of Col. Isaac. Salters appears to have been a jovial and joke-loving man. This story is told of him: While traveling in the West, as Ohio was then called, he halted for the night at a small village inn. Hearing that some strange preacher was to do missionary service in the town school-house, to while away the time he concluded to go and hear the preaching. On entering the house, great was his surprise to see in the preacher "Pete" Stillwagon, a noted character of Connellsville. Though equally surprised to see Salters, "Pete" maintained his position undauntedly, and spoke quite energetically. At the close he announced that "Brother Salters" would now take his hat around for their offerings. "Brother Salters" did as he was desired, and took up the collection. On leaving the house "Pete" begged Salters not to betray him, which, of course, after his part in the matter, Salters did not.

"It was at Salters' house," says R. A. McIlvaine, "at an early period, that I first witnessed the still popular performance of 'Punch and Judy.' Old John Green and his wife were the managers. At that time the puppets were brought out on the floor in front of a curtain and worked by wires. One of the operators possessed some power of ventriloquism, and delighted the audience immensely."

Salters (who was sheriff of Fayette County one term) left here and went to the iron regions of Ohio, where he became wealthy, and lived till within a few years. James McKee, his successor, died in the house. Of the building occupying the lot on the corner of Front and Ferry Streets, south of Ferry, it is said that at an early day of the village, Adam Dickey, James Myers, and Richard Weaver were its landlords. The first man of whom there are any personal recollections was John Campbell, an Irishman. He was spoken of as a very passionate man. He had an old negro servant, called Pompey, who often felt the effects of his rage in kicks and cuffs. At last Pompey suddenly disappeared, and some believed that he was the victim of his master's violent temper. Some years subsequently the bones of a man were washed out from the sandy shore below the town that were supposed to be his. Campbell was here as early as 1817; he must have left about 1821.

For a proper understanding of his residence here and also that of Andrew Byers it must be stated that both occupied not only this house, but the house on the opposite corner, where the post-office is now kept.

Andrew Byers, the next occupant of this house as landlord, was widely known. His son Andrew married Miss Phillips, of Uniontown. She was the sister of John W. and Howell Phillips, who married the two daughters (Margaret and Eliza) of Zachariah Connell, of Connellsville. His daughter Martha was married to Joseph Miller, a brother of Col. Wm. L. Miller, at one time a prominent business man. The next occupant of the house was David Barnes, who after several years' residence died in the house. He was the father of a large family, most of whom are still living.—Hamilton (a son of his) represented Somerset County in the State Senate; William is a minister in the Baptist Church; David is employed in the office of the Southwest Pennsylvania Railroad, Connellsville; Ellis is in business in Connellsville. The last in this line in this public-house was John Douglas. He was married to a daughter of Thomas Gregg, one of the earliest business men of the county. Douglas occupied the house in 1837. On the opposite corner of Front and Ferry Streets, north of Ferry, Caleb Squibb was an early landlord. He was also engaged in manufacturing salt on Sewickley Creek, where he owned property. He died about 1820. He had a large family of children. His daughter Ann married Thomas Walker; Jane and Emily married two men of Westmoreland County named Greenawalt; Martha married S. McCune, of Allegheny County. One was married to a Whaley, another to John Rogers, nephew of Daniel Rogers. His sons William and Caleb went West, Eliza never married. Andrew Byers and John Campbell, already spoken of, were his early successors in the house. The next and last in this house as a landlord was John Rogers, son-in-law of Caleb Squibb. He was in the business not more than a year. His daughter Mary married her cousin, Thomas Rogers, and now lives in Morgantown, W. Va.

In 1830, Joseph Keepes was in the place that Maj. James Rogers once occupied. He had not been here more than one year when he died. The house then became a private dwelling for a few years. After this John Douglas, already spoken of, occupied the stone part as landlord. His occupancy here was about 1837. For a few years after this, the building was used as a private dwelling by Thomas Foster, proprietor of the woolen-mill. The next landlord was Wm. R. Turner, a saddler by trade. His father was a soldier of the Revolutionary war, and in his later years taught school in Connellsville. He was a man of some culture and a surveyor. He kept his compass and chain, and made plats of land in the neighborhood. Wm. R. Turner lived here about 1846. It is not easy to fix the time or date of occupancy of several persons who come in as his successors,—Joseph Cramer for about two years; David L. Walker, subsequently elected sheriff of Fayette County; George Foist, for many years in the same line in Connellsville; Silas White, a descendant of one of the early settlers and artisans of the town; James H. White, brother of Silas, and largely connected with the bridge enterprises of the place. D. L. Walker came in for a second term, then Joseph Loon, a son of Michael Loon, who lived in Connellsville. For the last twenty years Thomas Giles has owned and occupied the house for the same purpose. He was a stone-mason by trade. Being a man of energy and determination, and having a large family to support, he was never at a loss when one enterprise failed to pay to turn to some other. He has at different periods carried on shoemaking, harness-making, chair-making, and painting. In the present residence of G. A. Torrance, D. L. Walker kept a hotel here at the time he was elected sheriff. His brother, Noah Walker, took charge of the house for some time after him.

In 1816 there was an abandoned rolling-mill on the river-bank, in which Thomas Gregg had been concerned. Gregg lived in New Haven, and first and last was a man of some note and many enterprises, although at no time especially fortunate in their prosecution. Gregg's prevailing weakness was an ambition to invent, and it is said he did invent a good many useful and valuable things, but somehow others than himself ultimately reaped the benefits of his inventions. Among other things it is claimed that he was the first to fashion a model upon which Ericsson conceived the monitors used in the United States navy during the war of 1861-65, and that he actually patented his invention. If so, however, he made no attempt to enforce the claim thus obtained. It is said also that he invented the hot-blast stove now in common use by iron furnaces, but this, like his monitor invention, never accrued to his benefit.
In 1823, Col. William Miller built the present dam and operated a grist-mill on the river. Shortly after that date Thomas Foster put up a woolen factory near Miller's mill, and employed as many as thirty people in the manufacture of cassinettes, jeans, and cloths. In 1835 the woolen-factory and grist-mill were burned. Just below Foster's woolen-mill, Col. Miller built a paper-mill. He made writing-paper by the exceedingly slow process of moulding one sheet at a time. He had sometimes as many as twenty-five persons in his employ making paper. Fire destroyed the paper-mill as also the grist-mill. The ruins of the former may yet be seen. A steam grist-mill was built by Joseph Strickler in 1849, but that is now abandoned. There is now at the village a grist-mill driven by water-power; Kaine & Long are the owners.

In 1836, Thomas Foster replaced his burned woolen-factory with a much larger one, equipped it with valuable machinery, gathered a force of nearly one hundred work-people, and started what was then considered an exceedingly important business enterprise. He made blankets, woolen cloths, etc., and for a time did a large and apparently successful business. The success, however, was but temporary, and the end was disaster for Foster. A. Mr. Blucher, who succeeded him, likewise failed, as did a Mr. Hill, who continued the enterprise after Blucher's failure. During the war of 1861-65, Orth Brothers controlled the property, and with a force of fully one hundred and fifty hands they pushed their business briskly night and day in the manufacture of army cloths. They enlarged the factory; and while their business lasted made of New Haven a bright and bustling village. Like their predecessors, however, they were doomed to disaster. The close of the war found them with an enormous stock of manufactured cloths on hand, and under the depression in prices they went down. The property lay idle until April, 1871, when J. Y. Smith & Co. fitted it with machinery for the manufacture of light locomotives, and called it the National Locomotive-Works. For a time they were full of business and worked upwards of a hundred men. They sold to Bailey & Dawson, and they to William H. Bailey. The latter failed to make the venture pay, and gave it up in 1878. It was a most disastrous ending of his enterprise. For some time previous to his failure he appeared to be thriving to a most extraordinary degree. Two hundred employés were constantly at work night and day, and the prosperity visited upon the business interests of the village by this activity was such as seemed to gratify and encourage every one. Confidence was almost unlimited. When the crash came, and disclosed a failure to the amount of about $400,000, the village was staggered, and for a little while well-nigh paralyzed, for thousands of dollars were due to employés, store-keepers, mechanics, and others. In short, the village had leaned upon Bailey, and when he fell it brought a general calamity. Since then the works have been idle. They are quite extensive, having a frontage of fifty feet, and a depth of two hundred and forty. The property is now owned by the National Bank of Commerce of Pittsburgh.

New Haven as it appeared sixty years ago is thus described by Mr. McIlvaine, its oldest inhabitant. He says, Commencing at the north side of Bridge and east of Front Street, all was an open common on the river-bank except the lot north side and adjoining Trader's Alley, which was inclosed by a high tight fence, and was occupied by the residence of Adam Wilson. Mr. Wilson was very fond of shrubbery, fruit, and flowers, and paid great attention to the cultivation of his garden. To the minds of the young of that time a peep through the fence into his inclosure was like getting a glimpse of the Garden of Eden, but very few ever entered its gate. South of the bridge and east of Front Street, on the river-bank, came first the residence of Isaac Meason. The frame part of this building was used as a store-room, I will here relate a little circumstance showing the kindness of the Meason family. A cart-load of ripe peaches was hauled down from Mount Braddock and emptied out on a spare floor, and the villagers invited to come and take what they wanted, which they gladly did. The next building south of this was a frame building, being the residence of Jacob Weaver, who was married to a sister of Daniel Rogers. The corner room north was used by Mr. Weaver for merchandising. This house was subsequently torn down, and the present building erected by G. J. Ashmun in its place. Above this and near the bank of the river was an air furnace, which was in operation when my father came to town, and possibly a few years later. The ruins of the rolling-mill and the shore part of the grist-mill dam built by Thomas Gregg were a short distance above and near the place where the present mill stands. The mill stood until about 1815-16. The large iron rollers, wheels, and frame of the rolling-mill were there till removed by Col. Miller when about to rebuild in 1823 or 1824. Mr. Gregg was a man of considerable enterprise as well as of mechanical ingenuity, being doubtless the original concever of the idea of clothing war vessels with iron; a model of this kind was placed in the Patent Office at an early day. He also had the idea of the hot blast for furnaces, and experimented on its efficiency in a small way. He had a stack erected west of town to test its power, as also a copper-plate engraving of the plan and course of draft. He was one of the parties engaged in the Connellsville Bank enterprise.

On the east side of Front Street, above this, was a row of frame buildings; in the first were manufactured by hand small headed tacks by the White family, who also lived in this row; also Samuel Sly, a saddler, and Thomas Gregg. The last house was occupied by Col. W. L. Miller, who was married to a daughter of Col. Torrance, who lived about three miles west of town. Col. Miller was a man of great business enterprise. He built the present dam about the year 1824, also a grist-mill, saw-mill, and a small establishment for carding and preparing wool for country looms. These were all burned down in the year 1836. Mr. Miller was also variously engaged in the iron business.

He was elected from Fayette County as one of the delegates to amend the Constitution in 1837-38. In connection with this, the story is told that he went to the negro voters and asked for their support, and stating that it would be the last time he would solicit their patronage; being elected, he favored the amendment that deprived them of a vote. This was vouched for by Enos Mitchel, who afterwards complained of the joke. This same Mitchel was probably the last slave who obtained his freedom in New Haven; he belonged to Isaac Mason, and was freed in 1824 on attaining the twenty-eighth year of his age; he died in 1866; he was the father of Baily Mitchel, the well-known and enterprising knight of the razor.

Crossing to the west side of Front Street, and nearly opposite to the present mill of Kaine & Long, was the first dwelling-house on the southern limits of the town, on the west side of Front Street; this was known as the Salter House. The next house north was the residence of Andrew Denny, a long one-story structure; the upper end was used as a store-room, and had a projecting window of a circular form. He at several different periods engaged in general merchandising; at one time he occupied in this way the south corner (the frame part) of Mr. Mason’s building; his house was at the point where Second Street runs into Front by a sharp angle, and facing Second Street on its western side, near the late residence of George Nickel. From that house there was no building on the west side until the corner of Ferry and Second Streets. On this corner was a two-story log house, by whom occupied at that time I do not know. It was subsequently used as a blacksmith-and cooper-shop, and was at last burnt down. Continuing north and across Ferry Street, on Ferry near the eastern corner of Second Street, west side, was a story and a half house, lived in by Henry Beason, a waggon-maker, and Matthew McCoy, a cooper, severally about this time. Below this, on the eastern corner, west of Second Street and Trader’s Alley, on the south side, was the residence of Stephen Fairchild, already spoken of; across from this, on the eastern side of Second Street, and corner of Trader’s Alley, north, was a two-story frame house, lived in severally by James Collins, the father of Col. John Collins, a well-known and respected citizen of Uniontown. It was also lived in about this time by Capt. David Cummings, a soldier of the war of 1812, and who also represented Fayette County in the Legislature at Harrisburg; and, strange as it may appear at this period of time, and the popular estimation of our common school law, he was defeated at a second election on account of his advocacy of a public school system. It was related of him that, up to the time of his death in 1846 he carried a bullet in his shoulder received in the service of his country. He was the father of a large family. His son, Dr. James Cummings, was a successful practitioner in Connellsville for years up to the time of his death; his son David was one of the victims of the Mexican massacre at the Alamo; his two sons, Jonathan and John Andrew, served in the Texan war of independence. John Andrew also served in the war between the United States and Mexico. Gen. Galoway, of Connellsburg, married one of his daughters.

Below this house, on Second Street, there was but one more house. It faced Second Street east, and was occupied by John Wining, a boat-builder and miller, and also, near this period, by Daniel Butler. The trestle-work of the Southwest Pennsylvania Railroad now crosses where the house stood, which was removed to give room for it. All below this, to the river and Third Street, was an open common. I should have mentioned in the proper place that west of Second Street, on Trader’s Alley, north side, there was a frame house, lived in by Patrick Fox. The house is now owned by Mrs. Eva Johnston.

Returning to Front Street, on a line running east with the last house was the home of my father, a frame house. From this to Trader’s Alley was open ground, save a small building between Front and Second Streets, on the north side of the alley, where Oliver Sprowd taught school a few years later. On the northwest corner of Front Street and Trader’s Alley, facing east, lived Henry Nash. On the adjoining lot south lived Dr. R. D. Moore, and the next lot was the property of Caleb Squibb, the corner building being used as a hotel by Andrew Byers. Crossing Ferry Street, on the corner of Ferry and Front Streets, was also a hotel and silversmith-shop. The shop was occupied by Matthew Kilpatrick, and the hotel by John Campbell. Above this was the store-room of Phineas Rogers. Another small house on the triangle completed the town. Below, and now outside the borough limits, was a tannery, but not in operation. The tannery was operated by John Fell, a local Methodist preacher. His wife was the sister of Isaac and George Mason. This open common north of the town served in a large measure to pasture the town cows, and was frequently made the place for the annual training of the organized military companies of the county, as well as the militia of one-half of the county. These annual trainings were great gala days at that time, the country people for miles all around attending, men, women, and children, who were not slow to feast on the gingerbread and small beer that was amply supplied at the various stalls.

I will conclude by some observations on the general business relations of the town. At this period the building of flat-boats, as they were called, was an important item in the business of the place. The men most generally engaged in this enterprise were Col. William L. Miller, Joseph Miller, his brother, John Wining, who was married to Sallie Morrison, a step-sister of the Millers, Uriah Springer, Jr., and his brother, Crawford, Christopher Taylor, and some other casual assistants. The mode of preparing the “gunnels” was rather primitive as well as laborious. After the fallen tree was squared by hewing with a broad-axe, it was hauled to the bank of the river and placed, near one end, over a pit dug some eight or nine feet deep, then with a whip-saw, one man standing above on the gunnel, and another below in this pit, this gunnel was sawed the entire length in equal halves, moving the log as the sawing progressed. After framing and putting on the bottom two long skids or logs of wood extended from the bank to the water’s edge, and on these the boat was launched into the river, where it was sided up. I should have previously stated that the boat was turned by means of upright timbers, with holes and iron pins to secure the raising advantage by means of levers.

These boats were used for freighting down the river large piles of pig-metal that was accumulated on the bank during the low stage of the river; whisky, flour, and hollow iron-ware were sometimes sent off in this way. Sometimes a keel-boat was pushed, by means of pike-poles, from Pittsburgh up, laden with merchandise.

Among the early merchants may be mentioned Phineas Rogers, Isaac Meason, Andrew Dempsey, Jacob Weaver, and Samuel G. Wurts. At a period succeeding these we find Robert Wilkinson, Robert Alexander, and John Bolton. Succeeding these were Thomas Rogers, George J. Ashmun, Thomas Foster, Anthony Hill & Co., Blucher & Co., R. McQuesten, Overholt & Co., McCullum & Co., G. A. & T. R. Torrance, C. Smutz, G. A. Torrance, Mrs. Whitely. All these dealt more or less in general merchandise. More especially in grains we have had John Wrigley, Noah Walker, John Somers, Silas White, and S. G. Smutz. In the drug line no effort of much consequence was made until 1833, when I entered the business, and continued for nearly twenty-five years; at one time I associated groceries with the drugs. I sold out to Daniel Chisholm, who was succeeded by G. H. Mathiott, the present proprietor at the post-office corner.

The paper-mill, built about the year 1829, at one time did a considerable business in the old slow process of moulding a single sheet of paper by hand at a time. The building was subsequently used as a carpenter-shop, and was in use as a cooper-shop at the time it was burnt down, in 1874. The present grist-mill was built in 1848, the steam-mill on Second Street about ten years previously, and which was abandoned on completing the river mill. The mill, woolen-factory, etc., built by Col. Miller was burnt down in May, 1836. The woolen-mill, subsequently converted into the locomotive-works, was built by Thomas Foster in 1836.

NEW HAVEN’S PHYSICIANS.\(^1\)

In 1815, Dr. Robert Wright was living in the town, but it does not appear that he engaged in regular practice, and he was found mentioned as a school-master before 1829. He was married to Elizabeth Byers, a daughter of Andrew Byers, one of the early landlords. Dr. Wright was here as late as 1833, when he left. Contemporaneous with him from 1815 to about 1828 was Stephen Fairchild, who claimed to be an Indian doctor. He made the cure of cancers a specialty. He was sometimes absent for several days, being called away for the treatment of cancer. He carried on the business of shoemaking at the same time. He lived in the house now remodelled and occupied by Hugh Cameron on Second Street.

About 1818, Dr. Robert D. Moore lived on Front Street, across from the machine-shop. He remained probably not more than one year, when he moved to Connellsville, on Water Street, and lived in a house on the lot now occupied by the Byerly family. He was considered a good physician, and was social in his habits. His wife belonged to the Gibson family. She was an enthusiastic Methodist in religion, and sometimes gave vent to her feelings in shouts of Divine praise. Dr. Moore died in 1829.

The next resident physician in New Haven was Dr. Joseph Rogers, in the year 1825. He was the son of James Rogers, a brother of Daniel Rogers, well known to many. He continued here for about three years, when he married Miss Betsey Johnson, a daughter of Alexander Johnson, of Connellsville, and engaged in the iron business for some time. He finally settled on a farm in Springfield township, where he engaged in other enterprises and practiced at his profession until near his death. He was very easy and mild in his address, and much esteemed as a physician. His office in New Haven was a small building at the north end of the larger buildings on what was known as the Russell property, now owned by D. Kaine, Esq.

Dr. Joseph Trevor started in practice in 1829. He belonged to an English family who were old residents of Connellsville. He lived in the stone part of what is now the Giles House. About this time he also engaged in the manufacture of woolen goods in partnership with Thomas Foster. He married a Miss Breading, of Brownsville. As a practitioner he was respectable in his profession. He moved to Pittsburgh, where he resided for some years, and then migrated to New York City.

In 1835, Dr. Rufus Davenport came to New Haven and commenced practice. He continued here some two years, bought the lot of ground now lived on by Baily Mitchel, dug a cellar on Front Street, walled it up, and then suspended further work. He was considered a good and reliable physician. Dr. Joshua Gibson Rogers commenced practice about 1839. He was the son of Joseph Rogers, a brother of Daniel and James, already referred to. He continued here at intervals up to 1864. He was considered a well-read, intelligent, and successful physician. He went from here to Dunbar, and lived in the family of Joseph Paull, who was married to his sister. A few years after this he went to Florida to engage in the raising of oranges, where he soon died. He was social in his habits and lived a bachelor.

In 1847, Dr. Henry Gouche located here. He lived in a frame building on Ferry Street. He had a small room, in which he sold a few articles in the drug line. He did not stay more than one or two years. After him, in 1850, Dr. William Stephenson commenced practice. He was a brother of the Rev. Ross Stephenson, who for several years supplied the Presbyterian pulpit of Connells ville. The doctor while here was married to Mrs. Rachel Wilson, the daughter of John Wilson, long known here as one among the oldest and most upright citizens of New Haven. The doctor was a native of Ireland. Dr. Stephenson went from here to West Virginia, where he died.

In 1855, Dr. James K. Rogers came to New Haven, and soon after became associated with J. G. Rogers in the practice of medicine. In 1856 he practiced alone. In 1861 he obtained a government appointment in the medical department of the army, and served in different places South and West, chiefly as inspector of hospitals. At the close of the Rebellion he returned to New Haven. He was the son of Dr. Joseph Rogers, who practiced in 1825. As a physician he was considered skillful and intelligent. He was a bachelor, and died in 1870.

In 1861, Dr. Benjamin F. Connell commenced practice, and was here for several years at intervals. He belonged to the school of homeopathy. This was the first break in the line of allopathic physicians that preceded him. His system did not attain the popularity here that attended it in other places. In 1862 John R. Nickel commenced practice. He also made a new departure from the old line. He was of the school that professedly reject all mineral remedies in practice, claiming that the vegetable kingdom contains all proper remedies. He was the son of George Nickel, an old resident of the place. With some he was very popular here, and acquired considerable practice. He removed to Connells ville, where he died.

In 1867, Dr. Ellis Phillips came to New Haven and entered into a partnership with Dr. J. K. Rogers, which ended in 1869. He subsequently lived and practiced in New Haven and Connells ville till January, 1874, when he moved into his new residence, where he has lived ever since. He married Ada, daughter of R. A. McLlvaine, in 1872, and made a tour through Europe, spending several weeks in the medical hospitals of Ireland and England. His practice is large, extended, and remunerative. He is of Quaker parentage, and was born in Fayette County.

Dr. R. T. Graham came to New Haven in 1873. He is an English Canadian and a successful practitioner; he spent over a year in the town, and then removed to Connells ville, where he now lives. The last on the list of New Haven physicians is Daniel Rogers Torrance, the son of George A. Torrance. He has been in practice since 1879. He is a young man of promise in his profession.

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE.

The following sketches of New Haven's justices of the peace from the year 1813 is contributed by R. A. McLlvaine, Esq.: So far as I can learn, Adam Wilson, the same ingenious Scotchman who cut stone, planned bridges, and made furniture (a piece of which, in the form of a round stand-table, made in 1821, is still in the possession of my family), found time in the official capacity of "squire" to sit in judgment in the civil, as well as in the more violent, cases of litigation that were settled before him. While yet but a small boy, I, with others had a whole-some fear and awe of his authority. After his death, in 1825, William S. Cannon and Andrew Dempsey were the next law dignitaries. The former subsequently engaged in merchandising in Connells ville; the latter, both previously and subsequently, was engaged in the same way. Neither was in office later than 1839. After them the line was continued in John Bolton, a millwright, and Robert Norris, a cooper. Mr. Bolton was engaged in the erection of the steam-mill on Third Street. Their period of office ended about 1849. The next to fill the office was Adam Byerly, of no particular avocation, afterwards "bridge-keeper," or collector of tolls. After him for a short time was George Meason, "gent.," brother of Isaac Meason. Of him it may be said that he deserves more than a passing notice. He held a lieutenant's commission in the regular army of 1812. A difficulty arose with a fellow-officer, and in settling the affair an appeal was made to the code of honor. Lient. Meason was seriously wounded by the shot of his antagonist and permanently lame. He was a gentleman remarkably courteous in his intercourse with others, though sometimes overcome by the too frequent weakness of convivial enjoyment. Yet he never forgot the obligations of a gentleman, or the natural urbanity of his manners. I remember being called up at a late hour of the night to get some drugs for a gentleman. The moon was shining brightly. On our way to the store we saw Mr. Meason standing by a fence. He bade us good-evening very pleasantly, and remarked, "I thought the old bachelors had all the trouble, but I see that married men have theirs too." I heard him relate an anecdote illustrating the code of army morals at the time of his military life. The chaplain (a very liberal-minded man in his way), after the soldiers were formed into a hollow square, would address them and say, "The government does not expect the soldiers to pray much, and has kindly and wisely provided a chaplain to pray for them. All that is expected of you when called upon to go into battle is to humbly bow your heads and say, "God be merciful to me a sinner!"

The Meason family were kind and generous to the poor, yet at the same time governed by a high sense of honor in their intercourse with equals. This is shown by the additional fact that Isaac Meason, the brother of George, also appeared to the code, once so fashionable among the chivalrous men of the country. The story runs that the fight was about a lady. A silver dollar in his vest-pocket saved his life in the duel.

George J. Ashman was the next justice. He was a good magistrate, and his decisions were generally acquiesced in. Formerly he was a merchant. Becoming disabled from rheumatism and unable to walk, he was elected to this office, and served up to the time of his death in 1872. During this period he was elected justice, but for private reasons declined to serve. The next in order are the present incumbents, J. M. Lyle and Thomas R. Torrance. The former a carpenter by occupation and son-in-law of Thomas Gregg, the searcher after inventions and mechanical discoveries; the latter was at one time in mercantile pursuits, and a lieutenant of cavalry in the war of the Rebellion.

In the successive distribution of the village ermine the hand of Fate might be charged with nepotism, as a large proportion of those who filled the office were either closely associated with or related to the Meason family. Adam Wilson was the intimate and trusted friend of Isaac Meason. Being a bachelor he was received and treated as a member of his family, and closed his life under his roof, ministered to by tender sympathy and kind attentions. Andrew Dempsey was a distant connection by marriage. George Meason was a brother of Isaac, George J. Ashman was a nephew by his mother's side, and Thomas R. Torrance is a grandnephew of Mr. Meason's by his sister, Mrs. Daniel Rogers. In giving this account of the different persons who have acted as magistrates, I think I have overlooked no one, and if so, certainly not intentionally, nor must any one suppose the succession was continuous, as there were long intervals of time when no one filled this office. I will again say that all these relations of persons are chiefly interesting as local matters, and will ever be so to their descendants for generations to come.

Having now gone through the history of this office, and having a little spare time, I will relate a perilous adventure and narrow escape of T. R. Torrance, one of the persons named. While in the service of his country during the war of the Rebellion, he was sent out on a scouting expedition with a small body of men in the vicinity of Hagerstown, Md. When near to the town he suddenly found himself surrounded on all sides by rebels. The only alternative appeared to be submission and capture or a bold and hazardous attempt to ride through the enemy's lines. He chose the latter. Single-handed, he made a furious dash into the streets of Hagerstown, and was soon confronted by a line of the enemy. Not to be deterred from his purpose, he spurred his horse onward, and seeing an officer, whom he supposed to be Gen. McCaulsland, he fired at him. His audacity brought a return fire. His horse fell, and he was shot through near his left shoulder, and slightly wounded in several other places. Instantly extricating himself from his horse, without knowing the extent of his injuries, and seeing a gate that led past a house into a garden, he dashed himself against the gate, forced it open, and ran past the house. Seeing some ladies on a back-porch, who fortunately proved to be Unionists, he entered the house and found concealment. The pursuers were not long in following. The ladies did their best to mislead them in the search, and directed them through the lot. In that direction they saw a lad, who, on being questioned about the fugitive, replied, boy-like, so as to magnify his knowledge and importance at the expense of truth, "I saw a Yankee running as if the very devil was after him." The search was given up, Gen. McCaulsland remarking that "he was too good a soldier to be killed." After night the family smuggled a loyal doctor into the house and had his wounds properly dressed, and the enemy soon leaving the town, he was sent home on furlough for recovery.

BOROUGH INCORPORATION AND LIST OF OFFICERS.

Upon the petition the grand jury reported favorably, and June 7, 1839, the report was confirmed by the court. There was, however, considerable opposition at New Haven to the adoption of the charter, and this opposition, taking the form of legal action, deferred the charter's operation until 1842. In that year the first borough election was held in the village school-house. Of the officials chosen, no names are found recorded, and none are now recollected except William M. McFarland as the burgess, and R. A. McIlvaine as weighmaster. Councilmen were elected, but their names are not now known. Directly upon the election, and before the Council could meet for organization, an anonymous letter found its way into the hands of the newly-elected officials, threatening that in case any attempt was made to organize under the charter the town would be burned. Who wrote the letter was not positively known, but it evidently came from some person or persons who proposed to resent the probable increase of taxes likely to be brought about under the borough organization. At all events its result was to so thoroughly frighten the newly-elected officers that they made no effort whatever to effect an organization, and so by common consent the borough organization was allowed to go by default, and the people remained as before citizens of the township. R. A. McLivain, the weigh master, did make an attempt to exercise the functions of his office, but he was alone in his official endeavors, and soon abandoned the task in disgust. After a lapse of twenty-eight years the subject of borough organization was revived, and in response to a petition the court issued a decree, March 14, 1867, authorizing the organization of the borough under the charter of 1839, and appointed W. H. Brown judge, and J. V. Rhodes and S. G. Smutz inspectors, to hold an election for borough officers on Friday, March 29, 1867.

At the March session of court in 1867 the following order was made:

And now to wit, March 14, 1867: Petition of the citizens of the Borough of New Haven for the appointment of officers to hold an election, etc., as follows, setting forth that the said Borough was duly incorporated by the Court of Quarter Sessions on the 10th day of June, 1839. The charter, plat, and proceedings thereon having been duly recorded, as provided by law, in the Recorder’s office of Fayette County, that no sufficient organization on was ever made under said charter, nor has there been any organization or election for officers for many years. The undersigned therefore pray the court to fix a time and place for holding an election, to designate some person to give notice of said election, and to appoint a judge and inspectors to hold said election, in order that said borough may be organized according to law, etc.

And now to wit, March 14, 1867, the Court appoint the 29th day of March next, for holding the election at the school-house, between the hours of one o’clock and six o’clock p.m., and the Court appoint William Brown Judge, B. Rhodes and Samuel Smutz as Inspectors of said election, and also appoint Hugh Cameron to give notice of said election according to law.

Same day order and decree of court, with certificate, issued to J. M. Lytle.

And now to wit, December 9, 1867, petition of citizens of said Borough setting forth that the great distance from the place of election and the inconvenience of attending the same on the part of petitioners would suggest the propriety of some action of the court for their relief, and therefore praying the Court to make such order in the premises as will erect and constitute a separate election district. And now to wit, Dec. 9, 1867, the Court designated the school-house as the place for holding the elections for all purposes, and appoint Josiah V. Rhodes as Judge, and George Nickel and John M. Lytle as Inspectors of Election.

From 1837 to 1881 the principal borough officials chosen by elections and appointments will be found named in the following list:

SCHOOLS IN NEW HAVEN.

It is a strange fact that during all the time the borough limits were connected with the township public school district the school directors never built a school-house in the town. It is true that about the year 1814 they erected a frame school-house just outside the town in a very unfavorable location, on ground under a lease for twenty years, and which was sold by them just before the expiration of the lease. For some reason the directors refused to purchase a piece of ground in a central and altogether eligible position for a school-house for the consideration of one hundred dollars, but built on a ground-rent of six dollars per year, with the result before stated. The only building called a school-house was erected by private contribution some time in the early part of the decade between 1830 and 1840, and enlarged by an addition for school purposes in the same way by the efforts of the Rev. K. J. Stewart in 1847. Since Mr. Stewart left, the addition has been used as a private dwelling.

The oldest authenticated record of a school relates to that kept by Mrs. Sarah McIlvaine in the spring of 1815. There being no school-house, private apartments had to serve instead. Accordingly she taught in part of her residence, which was the last house at that date on Front Street north, on lot No. 113. The next school was taught by "Old Mr. Ellis," as he was known and designated. Little is known of him at this time, save that he lived in the country and walked to town during his term. He taught in 1817 on the second floor of a house on Second Street, on lot No. 95, and immediately back of Mr. McIlvaine's house. The house he taught in was the last on Second Street north. The next school was taught by Stephen Smith in 1818. He also lived in the country, and was usually engaged by James Robinson about his mill and distillery on Opossum Run, about one-half mile west of town. He taught in part of the Squibb house, where the drug-store now stands, on lot No. 118.

The next teacher was Dr. Robert Wright, in 1819. He also taught in the Squibb house just referred to. In 1820, as well as in 1822, there was no school taught in New Haven. In 1821, Jarvis F. Hanks taught in a house near the river mill. In 1823, Oliver Sproul taught in a small building on Trader's Alley, between Front and Second Streets. He was an Irishman, and a strict disciplinarian.

In 1829, Stewart H. Whitehill taught up-stairs in the dwelling-house of Stephen Fairchild, on the corner of Second Street and Trader's Alley, being lot No. 92. He was connected (by marriage to a Miss Boyd) with an old and respectable family still residents of the neighborhood. The same year (1829) a gentleman by the name of Pease taught in a building that was formerly used by Adam Wilson as a ware-room. It stood on the bank of the river, on the only lot then inclosed north of the bridge on the river tier, being lot No. 15. This brings the schools down to 1830. After this period the school privileges were not so limited. About the year 1833, Flavius Josephus Worrell taught. He came from and returned to New Jersey. His high-sounding name gave him some notoriety. In 1839-40, Marlin D. Dimick taught. At the time of his teaching he was reading medicine. In 1845, Mrs. Robert Dougan taught. In 1846, Daniel Folly was teaching. He joined a company for the Mexican war, was elected lieutenant, and died at the city of Vera Cruz. In 1847 the Rev. Kenzie John Stewart, an Episcopal minister from Virginia, built an addition to the school-house on Third Street, and made the first attempt to raise the standard of schools by introducing advanced studies, and by inducing scholars from a distance to come here. In both respects, to some extent, he was successful. He employed Mr. Nathan Merrill and Miss Hoadly, a gentleman and lady from Connecticut, for assistant teachers. Scholars were in attendance from Brownsville, Greensburg, and Bedford. About the year 1849 a Mr. Patrick gave more character to the school by advanced studies and practice with chain and compass. For several terms, including 1851, David Barns, now ticket agent in Connellsville for the Southwest Pennsylvania Railroad, was the teacher. In 1852 and after Miss Mary Buckingham was teacher. In 1853, Miss Annie Hill taught a small select school. She was the daughter of Mr. Anthony Hill, who had been at the head of the New Haven woonen-mill enterprise. In 1854, Mr. John Bolton was teacher. He was in ability above the average of teachers of that time. He went from here to Ohio, where he has been advanced to important positions in different schools, and is still successfully engaged there.

In 1857 the Rev. James Black, a Presbyterian minister, in charge of the church in Connellsville, fitted up the hall above the brick drug-store, and made another attempt to elevate the school standard. He was assisted by Mr. C. C. Baugh and Miss Maggie Bell as teachers. He worked with energy and ability, and was to a considerable extent successful. At present Mr. Black is professor in an institution of learning in Ohio. In 1858 he was succeeded in New Haven by Christopher Columbus Baugh. His male assistant, Mr. Bang, belonged to the advanced line of teachers and was liberally patronized. About 1860, Miss Margaret Bell, also an assistant of Mr. Black, taught in the same hall. She was assisted by a Miss Mills. She was a thorough and successful teacher. Following her, in 1861, Mr. Pollard Morgan opened a school in the hall. He was a young man of scholarly attainments, having been educated and trained for the Presbyterian ministry, and, strange as it may appear, under the friendship and influence, as was supposed, of a much-loved Roman Catholic friend and companion the disciple of Calvin became a Papist. Soon after leaving here he went to the city of Rome and entered the Roman
DUNBAR TOWNSHIP.

In 1868, Miss Herring, from Dunbar, taught in the hall. The Rev. Timothy O'Connell, of the Episcopal Church, an Irishman, and relative of the great Irish agitator of the same name, opened a school in the hall in 1875. His assistant was a Miss Jones, from New York, whom he afterwards married.

The names of teachers and the date of their teaching from 1868 to 1881 are as follows: 1868, A. S. Murphey; 1869-70, A. S. Murphey and C. B. Scott; 1870-71, C. B. Allen; 1871-72, Miss Lizzie Miller and Miss Mollie Ritenour; 1873-74, H. E. Faust; 1874-78, A. S. Cameron; 1879-80, Rev. William H. Cooper and Miss Mary Cooper; 1880-81, N. V. Kill and Miss Susie T. Griffeth.

The New Haven school district was organized June 1, 1868, the year following the reorganization of the borough. The directors chosen in 1868 were S. S. Myers, Hugh Cameron, Geo. Nickel, I. V. Rhodes, S. G. Snutz, and J. M. Lytle. S. G. Snutz was chosen president, I. V. Rhodes secretary, and S. S. Myers treasurer. For the year 1868 the appropriation for teachers' wages was $230. The annual report, dated June, 1880, was as follows:

- Number of schools: 2
- Average number of months taught: 2
- Average salary per month: $30.00
- Number of male scholars: 70
- Female: 48
- Average daily attendance: 97
- Amount levied for school purposes: $888.27
- Amount received from the State: 108.85
- " tax collections: 492.48
- Expenditures: 1,788.78

POST-OFFICE.

New Haven tried many times and for years to obtain a post-office, but until late in 1878 fruitlessly. The inconvenience of having to depend upon the Connellsville post-office for mail was not only an aggravating but a costly one, for every time a citizen of New Haven desired to post a letter or get his mail, he not only had to make a considerable journey, but pay toll to cross the river. Many efforts were made to remedy the evil, but as often as New Haven tried for a post-office, Connellsville influence was successfully brought to bear to frustrate the project. The purpose in such opposition lay, it is said, in the conclusion that as long as New Haven lacked a post-office Connellsville would reap the benefit of additional trade by forcing people from the other side of the river to come to "town" for their letters. The New Haven effort of 1878, based upon former futile experiences, was, however, so quietly conducted that before Connellsville was aware of what was going on the New Haven post-office was established, and George A. Mathiott commissioned postmaster Jan. 1, 1879.

RELIGIOUS.

TRINITY CHURCH (PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL).

It would appear from a fragmentary church record that as early as 1780 Protestant Episcopal Church services were held in Dunbar township and the neighborhood by the Rev. Mr. Mitchell, and, further, that he preached in the vicinity from 1789 to 1790 as an Episcopalian missionary. Who Mr. Mitchell was, where he came from, or just where he preached are matters upon which the record is silent. At some time previous to the Revolutionary war, Rev. Daniel McKennon, an Englishman and an Episcopalian, preached in the neighborhood of Connellsville. Upon the outbreak of hostilities he sailed for England, and was subsequently reported to have been lost at sea. One of his daughters married Thomas Rogers, one of Dunbar's early settlers. In 1789 the Episcopalians living near what is now New Haven were Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Rogers, Col. Isaac Meason and his wife, Benjamin Wells and wife, Mrs. William Crawford and her daughter Ophelia (or Ellie).

In 1817 Trinity Church was organized, but beyond the bare statement not much can be added touching the event, since there is now no record of the incident attendant, or showing who became members of the organization at the outset. Among the members, however, it seems pretty certain were Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Gibbs, their daughter Anna, Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin Moore, Abraham Baldwin and wife, Mrs. Ann Norton (sister to Mr. Baldwin), and Elizabeth Fell.

The first meetings were held in a log building that stood upon the site now occupied by the Connellsville public school. Services were held on that side of the river until 1852, when a house of worship was built in New Haven. That house is still used. Mrs. Daniel Rogers donated the ground, and, beyond that, liberal aid toward the building enterprise was given by Daniel Rogers. A handsome memorial window in the church commemorates the grateful spirit with which the kindly deeds of Mrs. Rogers are cherished. To the gifts mentioned James McElvaine added later those of a church-bell and a parsonage. The first rector of Trinity was Rev. Jehu Clay, and the second Rev. Samuel Johnson. Succeeding them followed Revs. Jackson Kemper, Dean Richmond, John P. Bausman, Henry Piffer, Lyman N. Freeman, and Silas Freeman. During Rev. Silas Freeman's term of service, from 1833 to 1835, Trinity Sunday-school was established.

After the Rev. Silas Freeman came Rev. J. J. Kerr and J. J. McElhinney (now Professor of Theology in the Seminary of Virginia). The latter left in 1840, but returned in 1842. The interval was filled by the Rev. William Arnott. Those who succeeded Mr. McElhinney were Revs. Kinsey J. Stewart, Edward Walker, William J. Hilton, N. M. Jones, Samuel Cowell, J. G. Furey, H. T. Wilcoxon, George Hall, C. N. Quick, Faber Eylesles, Richard S. Smith (now of Brownsville Deannery), G. C. Rafter, J. H. McCandless, S. S. Chevers, G. W. Easter, Timothy O'Connell, and W. G. Stone. Rev. Mr. Stone, the present rector, began his labors in 1877. Rev. J. J. McElhinney was the first rector of Trinity to wear a surplice. This was in 1846.

Trinity is now a prosperous parish, and owns not only a house of worship but two parsonages. The church membership is fifty-five, and that of the Sunday-school about sixty. The wardens are Robert A. McElvaine and George A. Torrance. The vestrymen are E. K. Hyndman, E. V. Goodchild, Thomas R. Torrance, Thomas Turner, Charles P. Ford, Henry Wickham, and E. A. Jones. The Sunday-school superintendent is Charles P. Ford.

Besides Trinity Church there is but one other religious organization in New Haven, the Zion Methodist Episcopal African Church, whose house of worship was built in the summer of 1880.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

COL. JAMES PAULL.

James Paull, who lived in Fayette County from childhood to old age, and was one of its prominent and most honored citizens, was born in Frederick (now Berkeley) County, Va., Sept. 17, 1768, and in 1768 removed to the West with the family of his father, George Paull, who then settled in that part of Westmoreland County which afterwards became Fayette; his location being the Gist neighborhood, in the present township of Dunbar, which was the home of James Paull during the remainder of his long life. Judge Veech says of him that "early in life he evinced qualities of heart and soul calculated to render him conspicuous, added to which was a physical constitution of the hardest kind. Throughout his long life his bravery and patriotism, like his generosity, knew no limits. He loved enterprise and adventure as he loved his friends, and shunned no service or danger to which they called him. He came to manhood just when such men were needed."

In the early part of his life James Paull was much engaged in military service, and in it his record was that of a brave, honorable, and efficient soldier and officer. His military experience began in 1778, when, as a boy of eighteen years, he was drafted for a tour of duty in the guarding of Continental stores at Fort Bard, on the Monongahela, under Capt. Robert McGloughlin. Three years later—in 1871—he was made a first lieutenant by Thomas Jefferson, Governor of Virginia, and in that grade served with a company raised largely by his efforts, and which formed a part of the expedition which went down the Ohio under Gen. George Rogers Clarke on a projected campaign against Detroit, as is mentioned in the Revolutionary chapters of this history. Upon the failure of that expedition he returned on foot through the wilderness from the Falls of the Ohio (Louisville, Ky.) to Morgantown, Va., and thence home, being accompanied by the men of his own command and also the officers and men of Maj. Isaac Craig's artillery, of Pittsburgh. In 1782 he served a short tour of duty as a private soldier at Turtle Creek, above Pittsburgh, and at its close joined (still as a private) the expedition of Col. William Crawford against Sandusky. The story of the hardships and perils which he met in that disastrous campaign, and the manner of his almost miraculous escape from the savages, has been told in preceding pages. Again in 1783 and 1784 he was engaged in frontier service against Indian incursions along the southwest border of the State. In 1790 he served in the grade of major and lieutenant-colonel under Gen. Harmar in the unsuccessful campaign of that officer against the Indians in the Mammee country, and in this, as in all his military service, he acquitted himself most honorably. This was the end of his military experience. Having married, he settled down to the comforts of domestic life and the pursuits of agriculture, in which he was eminently successful. He reared a large and most respectable family, seven sons—James, George, John, Archibald, Thomas, William, and Joseph—and one daughter,—Martha, who became the wife of William Walker. He had some concern in iron manufacture, and was occasionally in middle life a down-river trader. But he was a lover of home, with its quiet cares and enjoyments. He was never ambitious for office, and the only one he ever held was that of sheriff of Fayette County from 1795 to 1796. Col. Paull was a man of perfect and unquestioned integrity and truth, and of the most generous and heroic impulses. He died in Dunbar township, July 9, 1841, aged nearly eighty-one years.

ROBERT ANDREW McELVAINE.

The Scotch-Irish McElvaines of America point to Ayrshire, Scotland, as the home of their ancestors, and revert to a period as far back as 1315, when Edward, brother of Robert Bruce, led a large force into Ireland with the purpose of expelling the English troops from the soil of Erin, great numbers of his soldiers and retainers remaining in Ireland and founding what is known as the Scotch-Irish race, many of whom migrated to America in colonial times, and among whom were the ancestors of Robert A. McElvine, of New Haven, Fayette Co., whose father, John McElvaine, was a native of Delaware.
where in 1796 he married Sarah White, by whom he had ten children, six born in Delaware. In 1813 he with his family left his native State, in the latter part of June, for Washington County, Pa., arriving there after a tedious journey—a great undertaking in those days—in the early part of August, and locating on Pike Run. In the same county two of his uncles, George and Grier Mcllvaine, were then living, and also two of his brothers-in-law, Fisher and James White.

On the 25th of August, 1814, his son, Robert Andrew, was born, and in October of the same year John Mcllvaine moved to Connelsville, where he lived until March, 1815, when he moved across the river into New Haven, a town at that time comprising about twenty dwellings and a few shops. Here, in 1815, Mrs. Mcllvaine taught a small school, and counted among her pupils Margaret and Eliza Connell, daughters of Zachariah Connell, the founder of Connelsville. This school was one of the pioneer educational enterprises of the village. While living here three children were born to Mr. Mcllvaine,—Sarah, Isaac, and Eliza. The parents instructed their children in the precepts and practices of Christianity, and endeavored to impress them with a sense of the importance of habits of industry and frugality.

John Mcllvaine died in 1850, in his seventy-ninth year, Sarah, his wife, having gone before him in 1835, in her fifty-second year. Of their ten children only four survive,—Mary Tarr, the oldest survivor, a resident of Bethany, Westmoreland Co., Pa., in her seventy-sixth year; James, aged seventy-three, now of Washington County, a gentleman distinguished for his benevolence as well as great business ability; Isaac, the youngest survivor, residing near Pittsburgh; and Robert A., the subject of this sketch, who is sixty-seven years of age, and lives in New Haven, where he has spent the greater part of his life, actively identified with the business and growth of the place.

In the early part of 1853, Mr. Mcllvaine, after having been engaged, with the ordinary share of success, in various avocations of life, entered upon the business of a druggist, earning an exceptional reputation therein for scientific accuracy in the compounding of medicines, and securing the confidence of a large circle of customers thereby, as well as augmenting his own financial resources. From this business he withdrew in 1876, and though keeping a watchful eye over his affairs, now lives in comparative retirement, unpretentious in his habits, and greatly preferring to fields of public duty the quiet enjoyments of home.

In May, 1841, Mr. Mcllvaine married Miss Susan King, an estimable young lady and former resident of Westmoreland County, Pa. Of this union four children were born, the first not surviving its birth. The others—Josephine, Gertrude, and Ada—grew up to maturity, and were in proper time given the best educational advantages at command. Josephine graduated at Beaver Female Seminary and Institute, Gertrude at the Washington Female Seminary, and Ada was educated in the Moravian Seminary at Bethlehem, Pa.

In 1868 Gertrude was married to Thomas R. Torrence, of New Haven. In 1871 Mr. Mcllvaine lost his daughter Josephine, who died only four months before her mother, Mrs. Susan K. Mcllvaine, who expired in the fifty-second year of her age. In 1872 Ada married Dr. Ellis Phillips, of New Haven. Mr. Mcllvaine and all his children are members of the Episcopal Church, the office of senior warden having been filled by him since 1854. He has five living grandchildren,—Josephine, Catharine, and Robert Mcllvaine Torrence, and Ada and James Mcllvaine Phillips,—two having died in infancy,—Thomas Torrence and Gertrude Ellis Phillips.

REV. JOEL STONEROAD.

Venerable not only for his ripe old age, but for his well-spent life, as also by reason of his almost classic, chastened face and fine presence and port as a gentleman, and for those acute instincts and sensitivities which belong only to the scholarly man of thought, is the Rev. Joel Stoneroad, who has been identified for over half a century with Fayette County, doing excellent work in moulding its moral character and disciplining its intellectual forces.

This gentleman is of German descent, the name Stoneroad being the English translation of the German "Steinway," and was born near Lewistown, Millin Co., Jan. 2, 1806, the son of Lewis and Sarah Gardner Stoneroad, both natives of Lancaster County, the name of the former's father (Mr. Stoneroad's grandfather) having also been Lewis. Mr. Stoneroad was educated at a common country school and at Lewistown Academy, under Rev. Dr. James S. Woods, a son-in-law of the famous Rev. Dr. Witherspoon, then president of Princeton College, N. J., at which academy he remained for a year and a half, there applying himself to study with such remarkable assiduity and cleverness in acquirement as in that brief period of time to fit himself to enter the junior class of Jefferson College, Washington, Pa., as he did in the fall of 1825, graduating from that institution in 1827; whereafter he entered the Theological Department or Seminary of Princeton College (New Jersey), where he remained three years, taking (what was then not the custom to do) the full course, and receiving a diploma. Leaving the seminary he was licensed to preach, and returned home to Millin County, whence, with saddle, bridle, and horse, provided him by his father, he set out upon missionary work, under the commission of the Board of Home Missions, and took himself at first to Hancock County, Md., where he preached his first sermon, and from thence to Morgantown, and Kingwood, Preston Co., W. Va., at which place he continued in his missionary labors for about a year, when he accepted the call of the Presbyterian Church of Uniontown, Fayette Co., in 1831, of which church he was pastor for about eleven years.

An important incident in his history while residing at Uniontown was the active part he took in 1836 in the trial of the celebrated Rev. Albert Barnes for doctrinal heresy by the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, of which he was a member, and then in session in Pittsburgh. The controversy was at its height when Mr. Stoneroad made a most telling speech, which was extensively published through the Pittsburgh and Philadelphia papers, and has frequently been quoted from since.

Leaving Uniontown he received a call from the church of Florence, Washington Co., where he remained eight years. His next call was the joint or united one of Laurel Hill, Franklin township, and Tyrone, Fayette Co. After holding this double charge for about twelve years, he relinquished that of Tyrone and devoted himself to Laurel Hill, with Bethel added, for about sixteen years, when, after having been in the active ministry nearly fifty years, he resigned this charge, his health having failed him, through too great devotion to his pastoral duties and consequent exposure to the severities of an inclement climate, which broke down in good part a constitution which was apparently, and otherwise might have continued to be one of the most robust. Since that time Mr. Stoneroad has taken no active part as a clergyman. He now resides with his family, in their quiet, romantically-located farm-house in Woodvale. He is an old-time Calvinist in doctrine, but not of that very bigoted school whose cruel austerities are sometimes pictured by ill-tempered or despairing mothers, and so made use of to frighten refractory children, for he is both genial and benevolent.

Mr. Stoneroad has twice married, the first time in Greene County, Sept. 11, 1832, Miss Rebecca Vecch, daughter of David Vecch, Esq. (and sister of the late Hon. James Vecch, the celebrated historian of Western Pennsylvania), by whom he had two daughters, the elder being the wife of Rev. T. P. Speer, of Wooster, Ohio, the younger, Miss Sarah Louisa Stoneroad, who resides with her sister. Mr. Stoneroad's second marriage, on June 27, 1854, was with Miss Hannah Paul, daughter of Col. James and Mary Cannon Paul, of Fayette County, and who is still living. Of this union are four children,—James Paul, now residing in New Mexico; Thomas L, a graduate of Lafayette College, Easton, Pa., in business near Philadelphia; Mary Belle, who having taken full course of studies at Hollidaysburg Female Seminary, is spending her time at the present making advanced studies at home; and Joel T. M., now attending Wooster University, Ohio.

They who have won notable success in life are not all old men. By the vigor and skill of men ranging in years from twenty-five to forty-five most of the world's wealth has been wrought out. In the battles of business, as in military life, they who win the rank of leaders do so in early age or then give earnest of some time so doing. Notable in the history of Fayette County, as much so perhaps as that of any one in the county, is the career of the young man whose name is the caption of this sketch, James M. Reid, of Dunbar. Toward his prosperity "good luck" has perhaps played the part of an important factor; the envious would say so. But "luck" is a term which admits of several definitions, and though "there is a tide in the affairs of men which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune," the number of those who by lack of sagacity fail to discern just when to take it and move not, or, launching their crafts unwisely, go backward with the reflux and are submerged, is, comparatively, as ninety-nine, to the one who rises triumphant and crowns his ambition at last "high on the hither shore" of security and success.

Together with his abundant abilities, force of character, etc., the chief characteristics as a business man which mark Mr. Reid would seem to be those which are as likely to serve him and achieve for him continued victories in the future as they have served him in the past, namely, a mercurial temperament and a peculiarly well-balanced, controlling brain, enabling him to form opinions or judgments rapidly and with accuracy. While other men ponder and "calculate" by slow processes, he decides at once, and either secures new accessions to his worldly goods, or escapes what might have proven a misfortune. But this may be "luck" after all, but it is a kind of luck which is somehow closely allied to genius. Mr. Reid has a good deal of the same character—and, indeed, personal appearance—as had the late Alexander T. Stewart, of New York, and comes of much the same stock.

He is on both sides of Scotch-Irish descent, and both his paternal and maternal ancestries or lineages have frequently adorned the pages of history by deeds of military prowess, and by sagacity, honor, and learning in the peaceful walks of life. In short, the name of Reid, as well as that of Henry, and also that of McAuley (both on Mr. Reid's mother's side), have played a grand part in the old world, and rank high in various parts of America. Mr. Reid not only need feel no diffidence in pointing to his ancestry for fear of being charged with unworthy vanity, but may be justly proud of his lineage, since it has been as much distinguished for high honor as for brave deeds, and "blood always tells" in some or other avocation or position in life.

Of Mr. Reid's blood relations who have made their mark in this country, we may name among others Capt. Samuel C. Reid, the distinguished naval officer, "who, in 1814, when in command of the privateer
DUNBAR TOWNSHIP.

'Gen. Armstrong,' fought with a British fleet the most brilliant naval engagement to be found on record.' (We quote from a biographical notice of Capt. Reid in the Washington Union of April 30, 1858.) It was Capt. Reid who, in 1818, at the complimentary request of a committee of Congress, designed our present national flag. The first brigadier-general of the war of the Revolution was a Reid of the same stock. On his mother's side Mr. Reid belongs to the Henry family, who, with Patrick Henry, the illustrious orator of Virginia, and the late Prof. Henry of the Smithsonian Institution, and others, have added luster to the American name, and were sprung from the same common source with Mrs. Reid; and that ardent patriot, John McAuley, an officer on Gen. Washington's staff, was a relative of Mrs. Reid on her mother's side, a great-uncle. But we need not enlarge on this head, for nature sets her own visible seals upon those whom she honors with strength and skill to do great deeds either of war, commerce, art, or literature; and, after all, success is the mirror which reflects them.

A gentleman well understanding the courtesies of social life, and which he dispenses in a generous, unstinted manner; and enjoying among his neighbors and all with whom he has business dealings an unblemished reputation for integrity, and withal, and quite as commendable, for free-handed, liberal dealing,—for he is neither heartlessly avaricious, nor made exacting and dominating through his great success,—Mr. Reid is popular in the best sense, and widely respected by all classes. Of his parental, boyhood, and remarkable business career, it only remains for us to tell the story in swift detail.

Mr. Reid is the son of James Dunlap Reid, who came from the city of Belfast, Ireland, about 1840, and settled in Pennsylvania. He married Miss Mary Henry (whose mother was a McCauley), daughter of Mr. Edward Henry. James M., born April 10, 1849, is the third child of this union, and was raised in Allegheny County. He was educated in the common schools only, till about fourteen years of age, when he entered the Allegheny Institute, and continued there about two years, and then became a clerk in a general store, where he was occupied for about a year; whereafter he removed to Broad Ford, Fayette Co., and was engaged as a clerk with his brother, E. H. Reid, for about four years, and from that place went into the business of merchandising in partnership with others at Dunbar, where he now resides. He continued partnership merchandising, with various changes in copartners, for about six years. Meanwhile Mr. Reid conducted, alone or with others, more or less other business, particularly the mining of coal and manufacture of coke on lands and in works belonging to himself and his copartners, but all of which he now owns, the capacity of his coke-works being at present ten car-loads a day.

Aside from these coke-works and coal lands, Mr. Reid is largely interested in coal-fields, covering in the aggregate over six thousand acres, the major portion of or controlling interest in which he and his brother, E. H. Reid, own; and in February last (1882) he organized the Connells ville and Ursina Coal and Coke Company, with a capital of $400,000, of which company he is president. The chief purpose of this company is to develop the iron ore, coal, and limestone-beds which the lands above referred to contain. He also holds a large interest in the business of Boys, Porter & Co., extensive brass and iron founders and machinists at Connells ville.

Mr. Reid is a Republican who takes active interest in politics, and was appointed a delegate for the representative district of Fayette County to the State Convention of 1881. He is also a member of the Republican State Central Committee, and has won the gratulations of his party throughout the State for the efficient and judicious work done in his district since his occupancy of a seat in the committee's councils.

JOSEPH OGLEVEE.

Joseph Ogilvée, Esq., a remarkably successful merchant and business man of East Liberty, is the grandson of Joseph Ogilvée, who migrated from Cecil County, Md., in the spring of 1789, and settled in Fayette County, on the farm on which he lived till his death, which occurred Sept. 14, 1855, in the seventy-first year of his age, Ann Barricklow, his wife, surviving him. She died Oct. 16, 1845, in her seventy-eighth year. Their son, Jesse Ogilvée, father of the present Joseph, died Jan. 26, 1876, in the seventy-third year of his age. He was well known throughout the county as one of its most upright citizens, and was for many years a ruling elder in the Cumberland Presbyterian Church of East Liberty, and of which he was one of the main supporters. Mr. Ogilvée's mother (married May 14, 1826) was Elizabeth Galley (born Oct. 3, 1807, died Aug. 14, 1858), a daughter of Philip Galley, widely and favorably known in the county. Mr. Ogilvée was born June 2, 1827, on the same spot where his father was born and lived all his lifetime, the family residence standing on both sides of the line (which divides the house about equally) between Dunbar and Franklin townships, and brought up by his parents under strictly moral and religious rules, and at the age of fourteen years united with the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, of which he has ever since been a faithful working member, doing at least as much as any other one of the congregation towards defraying expenses, paying the minister's salary, etc.

Mr. Ogilvée's early education was gotten by the hardest, he being till he had nearly reached manhood, the only son of his parents, and his father being a lame man, the work of the farm devolved upon him, and he was obliged to obtain his education by studying at night. By that means, and one session at Greene Academy, he succeeded in providing himself with a fair English education.

Mr. Oglesby is a man of great energy and determination, which together with large native intellectual power, disciplined by acute general observation and considerable reading, have doubtless been the main factors of his success. His chief ambition or desire in active life seems to be to accomplish whatever he undertakes, whether it relates to matters of the church or worldly affairs. As evidence of the persistent traits of his character and his untiring energy, as well as a matter of local history, it may be added here that he went into the mercantile business at East Liberty about 1854, having nothing as capital but his hard-earned, slender means to begin with, and with no one to "bail" or help him, and practically unconversant with the business, having then "never stood in a store a day in his life," and in face of the fact that several persons who had started in like enterprises at the same place just previous to his undertaking it had successively and utterly failed. Undaunted by all obstacles he gradually wrought out complete success, and has been obliged, in order to accommodate his business, to enlarge the capacity of his store building from time to time, and it is still too small for the extensive business he carries on. The profits of his mercantile and other business Mr. Oglesby applies in good part to the erection of houses and the improvement of the town.

Another instance of his great energy and enterprise, and which, too, may be cited as an interesting matter of local history, was his laying hold of the old mill property of Jacob Leighty, Sr., on Dickerson River, Dunbar township, when it had become so completely wrecked that no one else could be induced to attempt to revive it or even consider it, and not only repairing it but making it better than ever before. He put into it a new engine, new boilers, new machinery, and a new first-class miller, and it was not long before custom poured in so fast that he had to enlarge the mill, which he did by an addition thereto as large as the old mill itself, and he is now doing there an extensive business, grinding more wheat in a single month than had been ground for many years before.

Oct. 25, 1850, Mr. Oglesby married Rebecca Stoner, of Dunbar township. They have had seven children.

A short biography of Maurice Healy, the bold and shocking murder of whom, on the evening of June 26, 1881, was a tragic episode in the usually peaceful life of Fayette County, merits a place here, not only because he was the victim of murderous hate, but because he ably filled posts of duty in his sphere of life. The brief tale of his murder, with the alleged animus thereof, is that, on the evening above noted, he was first suddenly struck down by a "billy" in the hands of one of a band of conspirators, and then by some one fatally shot, the murder taking place near the west end of the side-cut of the Furnace Branch of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, at Dunbar. The motive of the murder is supposed to be found in the fact that Healy had with great earnestness opposed the granting by the authorities of a license to sell intoxicating liquors, asked for by Patrick McFarlane, of Dunbar. Charged with the crime, Patrick Dolan, James McFarlane, John Kaine, John Collins, James Rogan, Michael Dolan, and Bernard Flood were arrested in September, 1881, and indicted as Healy's murderers. Patrick Dolan was subsequently put on trial, and by the jury found guilty of murder in the second degree. McFarlane was tried before another jury, and under evidence almost identical with that by which Dolan was convicted was acquitted. Of the remainder, John Kaine is in jail, and the rest are released under $4,000 bonds each (now, February, 1882), their trial being set down for the April term of court.1

Mr. Healy was born in Ireland, and came to America when quite young. Before first coming to Dunbar he worked at Jones & Langhlin's furnace, Pittsburgh, for some time, after which he was engaged as furnace-keeper by the Dunbar Furnace Company, in 1868, when he was about twenty-seven years of age, it is thought. After a short time he left the company, and returned in 1871, and was engaged as furnace-manager, or foundry-man, having charge of the furnace, in which capacity he continued till some time in 1875, when he left Dunbar and went to Riverside Iron-Works, West Virginia, being occupied there about a year as furnace-man. Leaving West Virginia he was next engaged in like capacity at Lemont Furnace, remaining there till Feb. 22, 1877, when he was again engaged by the Dunbar Furnace Company, and continued with it till the time of his murder.

In 1879 he, with others, purchased a sand-mill near Dunbar Furnace, he taking charge of the same. The same parties also bought, about the same time, what is now called "The Percy Mine," at Percy Station. Both purchases proved good investments. Just prior to his death, Mr. Healy took considerable stock in the Fayette Furnace Company, at Oliphant's Station. By industry and economy he had accumulated a competence. He left a wife, who is in comfortable circumstances, but had no children.

Healy is described by those who knew him well as, though making no claim to education in books, very intelligent, genial, and straightforward, a warm and faithful friend, a man of great force of character, true to the important business trusts which were confided to his care, and a good citizen.

COL. ALEXANDER M. AND COL. ALEXANDER J. HILL.

Alexander J. Hill, of Dunbar, a portrait of whom appears in these pages, would have preferred that a picture representing his late father, Col. Alexander M. Hill, be presented in its stead. But, as in the case of not a few people of character and note, no good likeness of the latter could be procured; but with appreciative filial affection, Mr. A. J. Hill desires biographical space herein to be accorded to the memory of his father rather than comment upon himself. We therefore currently remark only that Alexander J. Hill is a robust, active man, who was reared a farmer; that he is at present principally occupied with the superintendency of the works of the Rainy Bank Coal and Coke Company, at Fort Hill, East Liberty, Fayette Co.; and is popularly known as "Col." A. J. Hill, but says that the title is not his by right of any military commission. But he has been so long "baptized" under the sobriquet or title of "colonel" by the popular will that to overlook the title would be little else than overlooking him.

Col. Alexander McClelland Hill was the son of Rev. George Hill, who was pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Ligonier Valley, Westmoreland Co. He was of Scotch-Irish descent. In the appendix of Elliott's "Life of Macculloch" it is stated that George Hill was born in York County, Pa., March 13, 1764. When about nineteen years of age he removed with his father and family to Fayette County, and settled within the bounds of the congregation of Georges Creek. Rev. George Hill's wife was Elizabeth McClelland, a daughter of Alexander McClellan, of Fayette County, after whom Col. A. M. was named.

Col. A. M. Hill, who died in 1863, at the age of about sixty years, was a very remarkable man, regarding whom it is to be regretted that but few details of his life and deeds can at this time be readily gathered. He was in early life a planter, and became an extensive farmer. His father left him a small farm near Laurel Hill Church, but by his energy and tact Col. Hill acquired a very considerable domain, and at the time of his death was possessed of a farm lying in Dunbar township of about three hundred and fifty acres, of which probably six-sevenths part is underlaid with coxing coal; and of another farm of a hundred and eighty-nine acres, all coal land; and of another (now owned by the Dunbar Furnace Company) of a hundred and thirty acres.

Col. A. M. Hill is represented as having been a man of high integrity, of great generosity, an obliging and liberal friend, a man who clung to his friends, and would always do for them what he said he would. Of course he had warm friends, and, as is not surprising in the case of a positive, earnest man who fought his friends' battles, he had, it is said, bitter enemies. He was a man of strong common sense, great energy, extreme tact, cautious in business, but free-handed in the use of money when necessary. He was one of the earliest advocates of the extension of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad through Fayette County, and labored hard to effect it,—a recognized leader of the railroad party. He was among the pioneers of coke manufacture in the county, making it in pits in the ground and shipping it to Pittsburgh before coke-ovens were erected in Fayette County. He was a man of fine personal appearance, of good address, and popular manners. As a politician he was a force. He was twice a member of the State Legislature, representing the district of Fayette and Westmoreland Counties (1851-52); and in 1854 was the regular Democratic candidate for the State Senate from his district, but was beaten under a conspiracy of circumstances not affecting his popularity by William E. Frazer (Native American). In 1860 he was again a candidate for the Senate, but ran against Dr. Smith Fuller, and was again defeated. As a legislator, Col. Hill is said to have been excellent.

ELLIS PHILLIPS.

Dr. Ellis Phillips, of New Haven, is of Welsh Quaker ancestry. His grandfather, Solomon Phillips, was born in the State of Delaware, where he married Martha Nichols, of Wilmington. About the year 1780 he removed to Washington County, Pa., locating on a farm on the banks of the Monongahela River, opposite the mouth of Redstone Creek. Here Ellis Phillips, the father of Dr. E. Phillips, was born Nov. 12, 1798. In 1824 he married Phoebe, daughter of Thomas Lilley, of Washington County, and removed to a farm in North Union township, Fayette Co., where Dr. Phillips was born Aug. 31, 1843, being the youngest son of his parents, who had eight children, five sons and three daughters.

Dr. Phillips remained on the farm, occasionally attending the public schools, till about sixteen years of age, when he commenced a course of preparatory studies at the academy at Uniontown, where he continued for two years, and then entered Washington (now Washington and Jefferson) College, Pennsylvania, from which institution he graduated in 1865. He then entered the office of Dr. Smith Fuller, of Uniontown, as a student of medicine. Having attended the regular courses of lectures at Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia, he received his degree in 1867. The same year he located in New Haven in partnership with Dr. James K. Rogers, a surgeon of more than ordinary ability. They remained partners for about three years until Dr. Rogers' death. Prior to the death of Dr. Rogers, Dr. Phillips returned to Philadelphia, where he remained several months, taking special private courses of study in his profession. He then returned to his old location and to the firm's business, where he has ever since enjoyed an extensive and lucrative practice. On May 16, 1872, he married Ada A. McIlvaine, daughter of Robert A. McIlvaine, of New Haven. They immediately sailed for Europe, visiting England, Ireland, Scotland, and parts of the continent. While abroad he took advantage of his opportunity to improve himself professionally by visiting the hospitals of London and Dublin, taking a special course in several of them as a student. Dr. Phillips has two children living, a daughter and a son.

MAJ. ARTHUR B. DE SAULLES.

Maj. Arthur B. De Saulles, of Dunbar, the vice-president of the Dunbar Iron Company, and superintendent of its works, is the son of an English gentleman, Louis De Saulles, who is of French descent, and Armide Longer De Saulles, a Louisianian by birth, and, like her husband, of French lineage. Maj. De Saulles was born in New Orleans, Jan. 8, 1840, and was instructed at home by a private tutor until ten years of age, when he was placed in a German school at West Newton, Mass., and carefully trained in the German language, as well as other studies, for two years. This period of educational discipline was followed immediately by two years at Bolmar's French-English Institute at West Chester, Pa., and the latter period by a course of study at Cambridge, Mass., in preparation for an advanced course of scientific studies, which he made at the Rensselaer Polytechnic School at Troy, N. Y., from which institution he graduated in June, 1859. During his connection with the Polytechnic School he was engaged for five months as assistant in the geological survey of Arkansas.

After his graduation Maj. De Saulles' father sent him on a tour of inspection through the State of Pennsylvania to examine mining and metallurgical operations therein, and make report thereof to him, after which experience and report he sent him to Europe in December, 1859, and in January, 1860, De Saulles entered the École des Mines, Paris, where he remained till September, 1861, when he returned to New Orleans, and three days after his arrival there entered the Confederate service, and was placed on the staff of Maj. Lovell in the engineer corps, and was put in charge of the construction of fortifications on Lake Pontchartrain and on Plaine Chalmette, south of New Orleans. With the Confederate forces he remained on active duty (with the exception of a short time when furloughed on account of a wound received in a skirmish) until the surrender of the Army of the Tennessee in North Carolina, at which time he was its chief engineer. During this period of service he was mainly employed in the construction of fortifications at various points, and in the building of pontoon trains for the Army of the Tennessee, to which he was most of the time attached, and wherein he acted as major from the fall of 1864 till the time of its surrender.

Soon after the war he went to Europe, where he remained till April, 1866, when he returned to America and took the position of engineer of the New York and Schuykill Coal Company's works, after a year being placed in charge, and remaining with the company till it sold out to the Philadelphia and Reading Coal and Iron Company, in October, 1871, whereupon he moved to New York City, and engaged in professional pursuits till March, 1876, when he became connected with the Dunbar Furnace Works. Aside from his connection with these works he is manager of the Percy Mining Company, and one of the executive committee of the Fayette Coke and Furnace Company at Oliphant, which works in all employ about a thousand hands.

He was one of the seven organizers (1868) of the American Institute of Mining, which now embraces about one thousand members and associates, and also one of the original members of the American Society of Mechanical Engineers, and is a member of the American Meteorological Society.

In politics he is "a good old-fashioned Democrat," and in religion not a "communicant," but takes interest in the little Episcopal Church which his wife built and presented to the parish at Dunbar Furnace in 1880.

Aug. 19, 1869, he married Miss Catharine Heck- scher, daughter of Charles A. Heckscher, of New York City, by whom he had three sons and two daughters.

JOSEPH TAYLOR SHEPLER, M.D.

In Fayette County, as in most other old divisions of States throughout the Union, there are enterprising and talented young men, who have already taken the first steps to distinction and are fast "making history," and destined to add important pages to that already made by the honored dead and the remarkable aged living. Of these is notably Dr. Joseph T. Shepler, of Dunbar, who is on his paternal side German, and on his maternal of Scotch descent. His ancestors were among the earliest settlers of Rostraver township, Westmoreland Co., coming there some time before Braddock's defeat. His great-grandfather's Christi in name was Mathias, that of his grandfather, Isaac, Dr. Shepler's father's maternal grandfather, Joseph Hill, was a colonial soldier in the French and Indian war, and also a soldier in the Revolutionary war; and his son, Joseph Hill, Jr., served as a soldier in the war of 1812. Dr. Shepler's great-grandfather's brother, Joseph Shepler, was a soldier in the Revolutionary war.

Dr. Shepler is the fourth child of Samuel and Eve-
A. R. Banning
James Blackstone. The venerable Mr. James Blackstone, of Dunbar township, near the line of New Haven, is of English descent. His grandfather, James Blackstone, came hither from the Eastern Shore of Maryland shortly after Col. William Crawford and his comrades found their way into Yohogania County, Va., as the region of which Fayette County is a part was then called. Mr. Blackstone was married before he left Maryland, and brought his family and some negroes with him, and settled in what is now Tyrone township, on the farm recently owned by Ebenezer Moore. He had four daughters and one son, James, Jr. (the father of the present James), who was born June 4, 1780. On the 13th of October, 1803, James (Jr.) married Miss Sarah Rogers, of Dunbar township, and going to Connellsville there engaged in merchandising, and built the house now occupied as a hotel by E. Dean, on Water Street, into which he moved. He died July 16, 1809, leaving three children, the youngest of whom (born July 19, 1808) is the chief subject of these notes.

Mr. Blackstone grew up under the care of his mother, a most estimable woman, and spent his youth in the village, except two years thereof passed at college in New Athens, Ohio. After returning from college, he spent some time as clerk in the store of Davidson & Blackstone (the latter of whom was his brother, Henry), at Connellsville, and some time as clerk at Breakneck Furnace, then owned by Mr. William Davidson; but farming was always more to his taste than merchandising.

On the 10th of June, 1834, he married Nancy C. Johnston, of Connellsville, and lived there till 1836, in the spring of which year he bought of Col. William L. Miller R. F. common Farm, moved to it June 23d, and has there lived ever since. Mr. and Mrs. Blackstone have nine children—four sons and five daughters—living.

Mr. Blackstone was an old-line Whig, and is now a Republican, but never was an active politician, never holding a public office and never desiring one. He has ever led a quiet life, and enjoyed an enviable reputation for integrity.

Col. Anthony Rogers Banning.

Col. A. R. Banning, of New Haven, is the grandson of Rev. Anthony Mansfield Banning, one of the so-called "pioneer preachers" of the Methodist Church west of the Allegheny Mountains, and who was born on the Eastern Shore of Maryland in 1768, and ran away from home at the age of sixteen years, just after having experienced religion at a Methodist camp-meeting, and at once commenced a career of evangelical exhortation. He betook himself to Fayette County about 1785-86, and before he reached the age of twenty married Sarah Murphy, a daughter of Jacob Murphy, a native of Maryland. Mr. Banning settled on lands which are now a part of the Mount Bradford farm, and became the father of eight children, among whom was James S. Banning, born Jan. 11, 1809, and who in March, 1825, married Miss Eliza A. Blackstone, only daughter of James Blackstone, of Connellsville, a lady of rare accomplishments, and with her removed at once to Mount Vernon, Ohio, they making the journey through the wilderness on the backs of two ponies. The trip occupied eight days. There Mr. Banning, being a tanner by trade, established a tan-yard and conducted the business of tanning, together with merchandising, for several years, but eventually removed to Banning's...
Mills, a locality upon a large farm which he owned, and where most of his children were born, and all of them mainly reared. He had nine children,—Sarah D., who died in 1881, at about fifty-three years of age; Capt. James B. Banning, one of the bravest soldiers whom the war of the Rebellion developed. He was attached to the One Hundred and Thirty-second Ohio Volunteer Infantry. Anthony R. Banning, born in August, 1831; Priscilla, wife of Hon. John D. Thompson, of Mount Vernon, Ohio; Lieut. William Davidson Banning, like his brothers, a brave soldier of the late war; Maj.-Gen. Henry Blackstone Banning, born in 1836; Eliza, wife of Gen. William B. Brown, of Mount Vernon, Ohio; Thomas D. Banning, adjutant of the One Hundred and Twenty-fifth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry during the late war; Mary, wife of Mr. Frank Watkins, of Mount Vernon.

Of this family of children, all worthy, filling their places well in the world, and sprang, as it were, from the loins of Fayette County, since their parents were both natives of the county, perhaps the one whose life and deeds have reflected more honor than any of others upon the old "home of his fathers" was Gen. H. B. Banning, whose biography is a part of the history of the country, and is so widely known and so written down for immortality in various extended histories of the late war as to need no considerable mention here. Educated at Kenyon College, he studied law and had become a successful practitioner at the time of the breaking out of the war. He at once enlisted (in April, 1861), and was made a captain of Company B of the Fourth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, which regiment took part in the battles of Rich Mountain, Romney, Blue Gap, etc. But we have not space to rehearse here in detail the history of Gen. Banning's distinguished military career. Suffice it that he rose through various grades to the rank of major-general, being brevetted as such after the battle of Nashville for eminent and daring service therein. During a portion of the war he was colonel of the One Hundred and Twenty-first Ohio Volunteer Infantry, belonging to Gen. Steedman's division of the Army of the Cumberland, which regiment, under his command, at the famous battle of Chickamauga, engaged the Twenty-second Alabama, drove them and captured their colors, the only rebel colors taken in that fearful fight. After the war he resumed the practice of the law at Mount Vernon, and was several times elected from his district a member of the Ohio Legislature. He removed to Cincinnati in 1868. In 1872 the Liberal Republicans nominated him for Congress against Rutherford B. Hayes, whom he defeated by an overwhelming majority in a strongly Republican district. In 1874 he was re-elected to Congress. In 1876 he was again a candidate, and on that occasion ran against Judge Stanley Matthews, whom he defeated. He died on the 9th of December, 1881, at the age of forty-five years. The Cincinnati Enquirer of Dec. 11, 1881, in a lengthy obituary notice of Gen. Banning, said of him, "As a political organizer and manipulator, Gen. Banning never had his equal in this State."

Col. A. R. Banning was educated in the common schools near Banning's Mills, Ohio, and under private tutors. He learned farming, milling, and merchandising, and at about the age of twenty-five years left Ohio and came to Fayette County, settling at New Haven as a farmer, and has since followed farming as his principal vocation, but has been much engaged in the railroad business and in various other pursuits. In the buying, combining, and sale of Connellsville coking coal lands, Col. Banning has been one of the largest operators. In all his pursuits he has been signal success. Comprehensive in understanding, cautious and careful, his course has been a steady and sure one. Col. Banning is noted for his probity and business honesty, and has frequently been intrusted with large sums of money for investment, no security being asked. In fact, during his whole extensive operations for others he has never even once been asked to give other security than that embraced in his "word," as good as any man's bond.

His possessions are chiefly in coal lands and town property. Among several farms owned by him is one upon which Banning Station, on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, named after him, is built. This is perhaps the best site for the upbuilding of a manufacturing village between Pittsburgh and Connellsville.

Dec. 2, 1856, Col. Banning married Catharine M., only daughter of the late Daniel and Mary Rogers, of New Haven.

ALBERT J. CROSSLAND.

It is not often in these days of jealous and zealous competition in all departments of life, while moneyed capital holds almost supreme sway, that a man making his way by his own unaided energy and native intellectuality achieves notable business success and erects a monument to his own memory in the affections of his fellow-citizens, and goes down to death, widely mourned, before reaching forty years of age. But a marked exception to the general rule existed in the case of the late Albert J. Crossland, of New Haven, Fayette Co., who was born Oct. 24, 1841, and died Aug. 1, 1881.

Mr. Crossland was remotely of Quaker stock, and was the son of Mr. Samuel Crossland, who lived at Connellsville at the time of his son's birth. Mr. Crossland in boyhood attended the common school of his native village, and when about fifteen years of age went with his father to a then recently purchased farm in Broad Ford, where he learned of his father, then a carriage-maker as well as farmer, the trade of carriage-making. Possessing a strong desire for learning, Albert pursued private studies, and at length entered Allegheny College, where he passed a year, and thereafter taught school for a while at the old Eagle schoolhouse. Remaining mainly on the farm working with his father till about 1868, he then went into the employ of Morgan & Co., of Pittsburgh, in charge of a coke siding at McKeesport, where, on July 11, 1868, he married Miss Lottie Long, after which time he was transferred to the company's office in Pittsburgh for a while, and was then put in charge of the company's Union Works at Broad Ford, where he operated for a year or so, and became a member of the firm of Morgan & Co., continuing with them, superintending the Morgan Mines, constructing coke-ovens at the slope in West Latrobe, etc.; in short, being the trusted superintendent and business man, doing the heavy work of construction, etc., wherever needed, and exercising practical guidance in a vast business until near his death. His moneyed interest in the firm of Morgan & Co. was one-sixteenth.
Mr Crossland was a man of heroic mould, being over six feet in height and well proportioned. To his energy there were no bounds. He was noted for strong common sense, for fine humor and wit, for general geniality and affability in the social and domestic circle. His family never heard a cross or irritable word from his lips. He seems to have possessed all the virtues which go to make up a really noble character. He was especially generous to the poor in a very quiet way, and celebrated his Thanksgivings not by luxurious dinners at home, but by privately sending provisions of food and fuel to worthy poor of his acquaintance.
He was an earnest Freemason, a member of King Solomon Lodge, No. 346, of Connellsville, and other lodges at Greensburg and elsewhere, and had passed the degree in Gourgas Grand Lodge of Perfection, it being the thirty-second degree in Freemasonry. He was also a member of General Worth Lodge, No. 386, J. O. of O. F. Distinguished members of both fra-ternties from different parts of the State united with the great concourse of his neighbors and fellow-citizens of Fayette County in doing honor to his memory at his funeral obsequies. Mr. Crossland was the father of two children (sons), both of whom, with their mother, survive him.

SAMUEL WORK.

An excellent representative of the best class of Fayette County agriculturists, combining the instincts and culture of the gentleman with the steady industry and the muscle of the prosperous farmer, is
Mr. Samuel Work, of Dunbar, who was born Dec. 5, 1817. Mr. Work's paternal ancestors came to America from the north of Ireland. His grandfather, Samuel, whose name he bears, and who was born July 17, 1749, and died in 1833, moved from Lancaster County into Fayette County, and settled in Dunbar township about 1786, where John, the father of
Mr. Work, was born in 1787, and married, in 1814, Nancy Rogers, daughter of John Rogers, of Fayette County.

Mr. Work, the second issue of this union, attended in childhood the so-called subscription school at the old "Cross Keys" school-house in Dunbar until about seventeen years of age, and after that the academy at Uniontown, conducted by Rev. Dr. Wilson, till well advanced in his twentieth year, and then commenced the life of a farmer on the old homestead farm, and subsequently inherited an adjoining farm, which he cultivated with skill and profit, raising cattle, among other things, together with carrying on the business of a dealer in cattle, which he often sent in droves to the Eastern markets until 1876, when he retired from business, having previously sold the Connellsville coking coal which underlies a large portion of the farm he occupied, the surface of which he has since disposed of, he now residing in Dunbar village.

Mr. Work is a gentleman of genial, active temperament, and in early life greatly enjoyed all kinds of athletic, manly sports, particularly that of fox-hunting with horse and hounds, and was noted as a finished horseman and bold rider; but being ever temperate and attentive to business, he never allowed his love of the chase to infringe upon important affairs. He belonged to the Fayette County Cavalry, at one time a famous organization, and took great pride in military matters. In politics he is a Republican, and was formerly an old-line Whig. He took great interest in the late war on the side of the Union, and contributed liberally, particularly in aid of the work of the Sanitary Commission. He is a member of the Presbyterian Church, of which his wife is also a member, and to which he has belonged for about fifteen years, and enjoys an unassailed reputation for general integrity and honest dealing wherever he is known.

On the 23d of September, 1858, he was united in marriage to Miss Jane W. Watts (born in 1837), a native of County Down, Ireland, and daughter of George and Jane Wilson Watts, both of Scotch de-scant. When about fifteen years of age, Mrs. Work, then well instructed for her years, came to America, and here continued her studies until the time of her marriage. They have no children.

DAVIS WOODWARD.

Davis Woodward, of Dunbar township, was born in Menallen township, Fayette Co., June 11, 1806, and was of English descent. He received his education in the common schools, and was married Nov. 2, 1828, to Mary Boyd, of Menallen township. They had thirteen children. Twelve grew to manhood and womanhood, and were all married. There are seven sons and four daughters living. The sons are all farmers, and the daughters all married farmers. Eight of the children reside in Fayette County; the other three in the West. Mr. Woodward had sixty-five grandchildren and thirteen great-grandchildren. He was engaged in farming and stock-dealing all his life. Mr. Woodward never held any office. He said he always had enough to do to attend to his own business. He and his wife were members of the Laurel Hill Presbyterian Church. He was a successful business man, a cautious, skillful dealer.

His father, Caleb Woodward, came to Fayette County from Chester County, Pa., early in the present century. His wife was Phebe McCarty. They had six children, five of them girls, Davis is the only son. Caleb, the father, was a blacksmith by trade. He bought a farm soon after coming to Menallen township, and continued blacksmithing and farming to the end of his life. He died Oct. 18, 1856, aged seventy-seven years eight months and nineteen days. His wife Phebe died Dec. 4, 1856, aged seventy-six years nine months and twenty-four days.

Mr. Woodward died April 6, 1882. He was an excellent citizen, enjoying the esteem of his acquaintances, and had abundance of this world's goods. He was able to say, as he did say, that he made his money by telling the truth.

JAMES WILKEY.

James Wilkey, of Dunbar township, born Jan. 17, 1803, is of Irish extraction in both lines. His paternal grandfather, John Wilkey, and maternal one, James Wilkey, both came to America from the north of Ireland about the same time, and settled in the same neighborhood, near Laurel Hill Church, Dunbar township, both bringing families with them. John had two daughters, it is thought, and one son, James Wilkey, born in Ireland about 1771, the father of our James, and who was an educated gentleman, and taught subscription schools in his neighborhood until he became an old man, dying about 1835. Mr. Wilkey's mother's maiden name was Elizabeth Wilkey (daughter of James, above named). She died in old age, outliving her husband by a score of years. They had six children, of whom James was the only son. The daughters are all dead.

James attended in childhood the schools kept by his father, often going five miles each way daily to and from school, summers and winters. At four years of age he was taught to read the Scriptures. At thirteen he went to learn saddle-making of James Francis, at Connelsville, but remained with him only six months, when Francis moved to Rising Sun, Ind. He then hired out to an ironmaster, S. G. Wurts, to do general work, at ten dollars a month, and "stayed with him three years, eleven months, and twenty-six days," as he distinctly recollects. Mr. Wilkey kept no written memoranda of accounts, Wurts did, and there was a host of itemizations in that long time; but Wilkey thought, when about to leave, that Wurts owed him about forty dollars, and Wurts' accounts showed that he was in debt to Wilkey about forty-one dollars,—a decided "head for accounts." Mr. Wilkey's memory is remarkable. He recalls with minuteness many incidents which occurred when he was only two years of age. Leaving Wurts he went to learn the tanner's trade of Reason Beeson, at Plumsock, as an apprentice, and remained with him till twenty-one years of age. He had to have, according to contract, a common cloth coat when his time should be out, but did not get it; but two years afterwards got its value in store goods. When through with Beeson he had a dollar and a half of money only. But his sister kindly gave him a "levy" (eleven pence), worth twelve and a half cents, saying, "James, take that; it may help you." With his one dollar and sixty-two and a half cents in pocket he started out in search of work, and traveled one hundred and fifty miles before he found it, at a point eleven miles below Zanesville, Ohio, and yet had a part of the money left! The young men of these days may not comprehend such economy, but the secret lay in Mr. Wilkey's industry. Leaving home on April 1st, he went on board a flat-boat at Connelsville, and worked his passage down the river into the Ohio and on. Wherever the boat stopped he went on shore and hunted for work, at last finding it. Through the influence of an uncle living near the place before mentioned he got a job of boiling water at a salt-works, and stayed at the work till fall, when he became sick with fever and ague and resolved to return home. He and a fellow-laborer agreed to divide the results of their toil, and Wilkey's share was a quantity of salt, which he sold to a stranger living a few miles from the works for twenty-two dollars and fifty cents, which he got two years afterwards. Men were honest in that time, and he had no fear to trust any stranger,—felt safe, was safe. Mr. Wilkey prays for the return of these honest days. After being gone about a year he returned to Connelsville. An old acquaintance seeing him on the street went, without Wilkey's knowledge, to John Fuller, tanner (father of Dr. Smith Fuller), and advised him to hire Wilkey. Fuller sent for him and gave him a trial of two weeks, at the rate of six dollars per month; and when the two weeks were passed offered to employ him for nine months at five dollars per month. Wilkey stood out, and demanded more wages, to wit, two pairs of coarse shoes into the bargain.

Fuller yielded, with the cautious condition that he should get the shoes only in the last month of the period. Wilkey consented to this, and, in brief, earned the money and shoes, and Fuller's perfect confidence besides. Near the time the nine months were up, Wilkey chanced to call at the house of Dr. Bela Smith, Fuller's father-in-law. Wilkey being about to leave, Mrs. Smith, who knew his reputation as a workman, said, "James, I wish I had a bill of sale of you." "What for?" asked Wilkey. "Why, then I'd have a tan-yard sunk at Bola's (her son's), and put you in it.” This led to Wilkey's going with Bela B. Smith (Jr.) as a partner into the tanning business near Perryopolis. He continued in the business there for about four years, near the end of which his grandfather, an old man of ninety-six years, died, and left a farm of two hundred and twenty-two acres in Dunbar, and all Wilkey's relations said, "James, you ought to buy the farm.” It was much encumbered, but he bought it and moved upon it, soon selling a part of it to Henry Lighty. He occupied the farm for seven years, and selling out, had $1700, a horse, and nine cows left. He next bought a tan-yard of John Fuller, in Connellsburg, for $2500, $1000 down, the rest in $250 notes, running a course of years without interest, Fuller agreeing to take half-pay for the notes in leather. Wilkey conducted the business for about ten years, when he sold it and bought the farm whereon he has ever since resided, leading the life of a farmer. He added to the farm till it contained two hundred and seven acres, a part of which (coal lands), he has disposed of. He has always been a hard worker, but has enjoyed the best of health, and has been very prosperous.

Mr. Wilkey has been a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church for over forty years, most of the time a class-leader, steward, etc. Since he first joined the church he has always liberally contributed to its support, and has also done much work in collecting money from others. Lately the church in Connellsville has taken steps (March 1, 1882) toward pulling down its old edifice and the erection of a two-story church on its site. Mr. Wilkey refuses to contribute towards the new edifice, on the ground that its audience-room will be "up-stairs," so high that lame old people like himself and his wife and many others cannot get into it, and will thus be practically prevented attendance upon preaching. He would give, he says, as much as any other man towards a new "one-story church." It seems there is a difference of opinion among the members of the church, some desiring to have the proposed edifice a "one-story," and others wishing what Mr. Banning calls a "two-story" church. The latter he says shall have no aid from him.

March 24, 1831, Mr. Wilkey married Catharine Rodocker, daughter of Philip Rodocker, of Washington township, by whom he has had six children, three of whom are now living.

FRANKLIN TOWNSHIP.

FRANKLIN, one of the original townships of Fayette, is purely agricultural in its interests, and the census of June, 1880, credited it with a population of 1873. It is bounded on the north by the Youghiogheny River, which separates it from Tyrone; on the south by Menallen and North Union; on the east by Dunbar, and west by Menallen, Redstone, and Jefferson. The township valuation subject to county tax was in 1881 fixed at $639,870, or a gain over 1880 of $3537.

The township is well watered by numerous small streams, while upon the Redstone Creek (which separates it from Menallen and Redstone townships) and the Youghiogheny River there is abundant mill-power. Franklin contains rich and extensive deposits of coal, that to the present time have remained undeveloped because of the lack of railway transportation near at hand. Although there are yet no railroad facilities, assurances are made that before 1883 two railway lines will be constructed in the township,—one between Brownsville and Uniontown, and the line between New Haven and Brownsville. The former will follow the course of the Redstone, and the latter that of Bute's Run, in the town hip. The road-beds are already graded, and by the autumn of 1882 both railroads are likely to be in readiness for traffic. The first named will doubtless be opened early in the present summer (1882). Franklin has no village, but possesses two post-offices,—Flatwood, established in 1842, and Laurel Hill, in 1879.

Among the earliest settlers in Franklin may be reckoned William Rittenhouse, a Jerseyman, who came in as early certainly as 1777, with his wife and child, and located upon a tract of land lying upon the western side of the township. As to the record of his experience for a few years after he came, not much can be learned. It may be stated, however, that in 1795 he was living on the place now owned by Matthew Arison, and in the house now Mr. Arison’s residence. He kept tavern in that house, which was in its day a favorite halting-place for travelers, to whom landlord Rittenhouse would, when in the mood, relate his brief but adventurous experience during the Revolution, in which he served as a fifer for the space of a year from 1776 to 1777. Upon the site of his farm there was, at an earlier date, an Indian village and graveyard, and, tradition adds, in the village resided a chief of some
Mr. Smith set up a blacksmith's shop on the Lazy Hollow road in front of his dwelling, and for years supplied his trade in the service of the people who came from near and far. He died in 1837, at the age of eighty. Of his ten children only one is left, Robert Smith, aged eighty-two, and living still on the Smith homestead, where he was born. Long before Robert Smith the elder came to Franklin, the farm he bought there had been occupied by David Allen, of whose sons, Josiah and George M., Smith purchased it.

The farm now occupied by Jesse Pierol was owned at a very early date by Hugh Shotwell, who settled thereon about the year 1780. His four sons—John, Joseph, William, and Arison—settled in Franklin, but the last three ultimately moved to Ohio. John died in Franklin in 1869, aged eighty-five. One of his daughters is now the wife of Robert Smith, above mentioned.

The fine farm in Franklin township known as the Modissett place was occupied in 1790 by Samuel Stevens. But little is known about him, as he died a few years after his settlement. His widow died in Uniontown, aged ninety-three. His only child, Priscilla, is now Mrs. Austin, of Uniontown, and is in her eighty-ninth year.

Joseph Oglevee, a young Marylander, found a sparsely-settled neighborhood when he came to Franklin in 1788. He warranted three hundred and thirty-three acres (now owned in part by his son Farrington), put up a cabin, and began to clear his land. Conrad Barricklow, an old soldier, who had served honorably through the Revolutionary war, moved to Franklin in 1790. Conrad found himself at the end of his campaigns the possessor of a great lot of Continental money, and with it he proposed to buy a farm somewhere. Unfortunately, he found his Continental money worth so little that buying a farm was out of the question. So with his family he lived a while in a cabin on Joseph Oglevee's place, and eventually he bought a small farm of his own. In 1790 Oglevee married one of Barricklow's daughters. His sons were three,—Jesse, John, and Farrington. Of these only Farrington is now living, and he remains on the old homestead. Jesse, who settled on the Dunbar and Franklin line so literally that his family ate in Dunbar and slept in Franklin, had eight children. Three of his sons, Joseph, John, and Philip, are now residents of Dunbar township. Conrad Barricklow died in 1802, and Joseph Oglevee in 1835. In their day one of the scarest articles of use was salt, and to get it there was no way save by a trip eastward over the mountains. The salt wells of the West were then undiscovered treasures, and as salt must be had at all hazards, the pioneers at intervals made long and tiresome journeys for supplies of the needed article. The fall of the year was customarily the season when these salt trips were made, and according to previous understanding, a half-dozen or more settlers would set out together on horseback, and thus sociably and safely get to market, bringing back upon their horses not only salt but other necessities required in the line of provisions. Joseph Ogleeve built a saw-mill on Dickinson’s Run in 1792, and sold it to Alexander Moreland, who set up a nail-making shop. Moreland was bought out by Joseph McCoy, who, upon the same site, established a sickle-factory.

James and Samuel Rankin were among the first settlers in Franklin. James wished to buy land of Col. Isaac Meason, and at an appointed time met Col. Meason at Mount Braddock for the purpose of visiting Franklin on a tour of inspection. While en route Rankin remarked to Col. Meason upon his overcoat, which was an inordinately shabby one, “Colonel, I am amazed to find that a man owning as much land as you do will content himself with such a desperately ragged overcoat.” “The coat is well enough,” returned Col. Meason, “for, although ragged, it keeps out the rain pretty well, while for its looks I care nothing.” When they were about closing the sale of the land, and while the deed was awaiting Col. Meason’s signature, he suddenly halted, and turning to Rankin, said, “I don’t know about signing this deed after all. I believe I have sold you the land too cheap, and upon reflection conclude that I will sign the deed only upon condition that you give me your overcoat, which I see is a new and excellent one, in exchange for mine, which, as you rightly observed yesterday, is old and ragged.” Rankin saw he was caught, but he was eager to own the land, and, what was more, Meason knew too. He hated to yield in the matter, his inclination prompting him to break off the trade then and there, but he fancied the property vastly, and so, with rather bad grace, accepted the alternative, remarking as he did so, “The next time I buy land of a man in a ragged coat I’ll keep my mouth shut until I’ve concluded the bargain.” Meason was much pleased at what he declared an excellent joke, and by way of emphasizing his appreciation remarked to Rankin at parting, “My dear friend, I wonder that a man with as much money as you have will wear such a ragged coat.” The Rankins lived in a community of practical jokers, and were themselves keenly alive to the spirit of harmless fun. So general was this mania for practical joking that no opportunity was lost by any of the jokers for offering up a victim to ridicule.

Among them all, the Rankins, and especially “Sammy” Rankin, were considered the most invertebrate jokers of the period. Many a good story is still told of Sammy and the manner in which he used to sacrifice his neighbors, who as often sought to get even with him by returning the compliment, although Sammy was termed “smart enough to hold his own and more too.” For that reason it was exceedingly gratifying to his many friends if they could get the laugh on him. As a case in point it is told that Sammy, while proceeding to town one cold morning, met Andrew Wiley trudging along on foot, carrying in his hand a jug that looked very much as if it held whisky. Whisky in jugs was then as common in the land as the most devoted tippler could desire, and it was most natural and reasonable on Sammy’s part to suppose that Wiley’s jug contained whisky. It was equally natural and reasonable for him to conclude that a drink of whisky on a cold morning as the one in question would be proper and consoling. So after greeting Wiley cheerfully, and receiving the same in return, Sammy exclaimed, “Well, Wiley, this is a pretty sharp morning, and as you’ve got a jug of whisky I will be glad to take a drink with you.” Wiley owed Sammy one on the last time he had been made a victim, and to that moment had pined for an opportunity to repay the joker. As will be seen, his chance had come. Lifting the jug to Sammy’s hand, remarking that it was a cold morning, that a drink was a good thing at such a time, and that the jug held as good whisky as was ever made, he bade Sam drink heartily. Thus invited and encouraged by Wiley’s hospitality, his own desire as well, Sammy applied his mouth to that of the jug and drank. The drink was, however, a short one, and was followed by the violent dashing of the jug upon the ground, and the excited exclamation from Sammy of “Great heavens, Wiley, it’s soft soup!” Spluttering and coughing to free his mouth of the nauseous mess, he was inclined to be angry with the author of the mishap, but better judgment prevailed, until, like a philosopher, he laughingly declared to Wiley, “Well, old fellow, you got me that time, but it’s a long lane that has no turn: I’ll pay you off yet.” Wiley laughed and bade good-by to Sammy by inviting him to meet him again some day for another drink, and advising him to look sharp if he desired to pay off the score. Whether Sammy did or did not pay off the score does not appear among the chronicles of the time, but the popular conclusion is that if he attempted it he succeeded.

Thomas Dunn is said to have located in Franklin some time during the progress of the Revolutionary war. He took up a farm containing four hundred and thirty-two acres, of which original tract his grandson Thomas owns three hundred and thirty acres. Mr. Dunn and his wife were hearty pioneers in every sense of the word, and without waiting to build a dwelling-house, they made their home in a stable for a year after their arrival. Time was precious, they were ambitious to get a portion of their land cleared and a crop in, and so when the stable was up they said, “We will defer the building of our cabin, since we have a more pressing necessity to clear and cultivate our land, and until we can spare the time to erect a better one we will make our home under the same roof that shelters our cattle.” When Dunn put up his cabin the following year he built also a wagon-shop, as he was by trade a wheelwright, continuing the business until his death, which occurred in 1800. Four years before his death he replaced the log cabin with the stone house now occupied by his grandson, Thomas Dunn. Of his twelve children seven were sons, and of these all but two removed early in life to Ohio, pioneers of that State. John and Samuel, the two who remained upon the old farm, worked it together for several years, when Samuel got the Western fever, and selling his interest in the homestead to John, he too emigrated to Ohio. John ended his days in Franklin. He had but two sons, Robert and Thomas, in a family of eight children. Robert moved to Kansas and there died, while Thomas still lives upon the farm that his grandfather cleared more than a hundred years ago. He says he was left upon the place to keep the name of Dunn alive, and adds, "I rather guess I have made a good start in that direction, for I have had eleven children born to me." One of his daughters, Harriet, was accidentally killed in 1879. Driving to church with her brother one Sunday morning a halt was made at a neighbor's, and the brother alighted for a moment from the carriage. As he did so the horse, a high-spirited colt, dashed madly away, the young lady being thrown out and almost instantly killed.

The McLeans (two brothers) were great land-owners in Franklin, and were well known by all the people. Land was cheap in those days, and to own a farm of three or four hundred acres did not call for an especially liberal outlay of funds. Stories are told of farms being frequently bartered for dogs, guns, or horses, one gun sometimes proving enough of the purchase price to secure a large tract of land. Robert McLean had plenty of land, and that he did not value it very highly is shown by the following story: He met a man traveling through Franklin, and noticing the fellow's dejected appearance, inquired if he was in trouble. The man replied that he had been unfortunate, was poor, and did not know how he could better his condition. Prompted by a sudden and charitable motive, McLean said to him, "See here, my man, I'll give you a farm and put you in shape to earn a living if you will mount that stump and cry as hard as you can." The man thought of course that McLean was joking, but upon being assured that he was truly in earnest, and that the farm would be his if he complied, he mounted the stump and cried like a good fellow. In return, as the story is told, he was given the farm, and became prosperous and successful in life.

One of the early mills in Franklin was Cullen's grist-mill on the Redstone, near where Bute's Run flows into the former stream. Cullen was an accomplished miller, as the following will show.

Old Mr. Gilchrist set out one morning for Cullen's mill, and as he passed the house of a Mr. Ramsey was hailed by the latter with "Hold on, Gilchrist, I'm going to mill with a grist, and will bear you company." Both journeyed along upon their horses until they had arrived to within a mile or so of the mill, when Ramsey suddenly clasped his hands together in despair and cried out, "God bless me, Gilchrist, if I haven't forgotten my grist. I stayed up last night to shell two bushels of corn for the mill-trip, and now I've come away and left it behind." With that he fell to berating himself for having been so absent-minded. Gilchrist consoled him with the suggestion that perhaps he could borrow at the mill what corn-meal he wanted, and take the corn down some other time. To this proposition Ramsey would listen only upon the condition that Gilchrist should say nothing about the matter to Jimmy Rankin, "for," added he, "if Jimmy gets hold of the story there'll be no end of the fun he'll have at my expense." The promise was given, the corn-meal was obtained as suggested, and the matter adjusted satisfactorily to all parties. The following Sunday, at church services, Ramsey and Jimmy Rankin met during the noon hour, and Jimmy, broaching the subject of dry weather, remarked that such weather was very bad for the mills. "Oh, yes," continued he, as Ramsey began to grow uneasy, "where do you get your milling done now?" Ramsey, feeling sure that Jimmy had heard about the corn, determined not to give up the secret himself, and pretended not to have heard the inquiry, but at once began talking of the probable bad effect of the dry weather upon crops. "Yes, yes," put in Jimmy, loud enough for all to hear, "they tell me Cullen's mill is a fine mill, and that Cullen himself is a fine man. They say you can get your bag filled there whether you bring any grist or not." With "Damn ye! old Gilchrist has been blowing on me," Ramsey fled, and for some time after heard the story at every turn, from Jimmy Rankin's persevering purpose to "get a good rig on Ramsey."

Another early mill was the one built by Jonathan Hill, about 1790, on Redstone Creek, on the site now occupied by Samuel Snook. Mr. Hill sold the mill to Jonathan Sharpless in 1810 and moved to Virginia, where he died. Mr. Sharpless was conspicuous in the history of Fayette County for having, with Samuel Jackson, built on the Redstone the first paper-mill known west of the mountains. He located in Franklin not long after the year 1800, and in 1810 was driving a grist-mill, saw-mill, sickle-factory, and fulling-mill, which amount of business was, for those days, very extensive. There he lived until his death, about 1850, at the age of more than ninety years. Joseph Jordan was his nearest neighbor, and lived upon an adjoining tract, where Samuel Jobs now resides. Samuel Jobs (whose father, John, was an early settler in Redstone township) came to Franklin in 1849. John Lewis, a Methodist preacher and a Tanner, moved from Baltimore to Connellsville in 1789, and at the latter place established a tan-yard. Having had luck in his business affairs he moved to a farm in Dunbar town ship, afterwards to Franklin, and later to Plumsock, in Menallen township. He died at the McKnight and Colson, were surprised while encamped, by Delaware Indians and put to death. Of his sons, Aaron located in Franklin township in 1823, in the vicinity of what is now known as Flatwoods post-office. He was a carpenter and joiner, and followed his trade at Flatwoods for many years. He died at the age of eighty. Aaron Townsend's son John opened a store at Flatwoods in 1846, and continued in the business until 1861, when he sold out to Daniel Binns. In 1864, Binns disposed of his interests to P. P. Murphy and John Townsend, who have been the traders at Flatwoods since that time. Flatwoods post-office was established in 1842. John Townsend was postmaster until 1861, Daniel Binns from 1861 to 1864, and P. P. Murphy from 1864 to 1881. Mail is received three times a week from East Liberty.

William Craig settled in Franklin at an early day, near the Dunbar line, and in what is now called the Craig neighborhood. His sons were John, William, Samuel, James, Allen, and Thomas. Those now living are William, who lives in Illinois, and John, whose home is in Dunbar. John Craig was for many years a blacksmith at Laurel Hill, having bought of Thomas White a shop that White had set up years before on the town line road. Solomon Curry settled near the Craig's, upon land he purchased of John Wiley. Mr. Curry died in 1857, at the advanced age of one hundred and one. His three children were named Mary Ann, James, and John. John was accidentally killed in a saw-mill in 1877. James and Mary Ann are still living. John Graham, one of the early comers to the county, arranged a lottery drawing in Franklin township in 1814, but what the lottery was for, or why it was instituted, are points upon which there appears to be no light. A newspaper advertisement in 1814 contains the following information touching the subject: "The subscriber informs the public that the drawing of his lottery is unavoidably postponed to Tuesday, the 27th inst., on which day it will positively be drawn at the house of William Craig, in Franklin township, near Laurel Hill Meeting-house, under the direction of gentlemen of unquestioned character." Signed by John Graham, and dated "Union, September 7, 1814."

As long ago as the year 1800 there was in Franklin township, on the Youghiogheny, at the mouth of Furnace Run, a small village called Little Falls, the village being made up of a furnace, forge, a grist-mill, saw-mill, store, and workmen's dwellings. The forge known as the Franklin Iron-Works was built by George Lamb, and by him sold to Nathaniel Gibson, who was a man of considerable business capacity and liberal enterprise. He built a furnace at Little Falls, intending to make iron for his forge from the ore in that neighborhood, but a few experiments convinced him that the ore would not make such iron as he wanted, and he was forced to abandon the project. Mr. Gibson built for his residence a fine stone dwelling, which was long known as the Mansion House. He obtained his pig-metal from the Connellsville Furnace, and shipped his bar iron down the river in keel-boats. About 1825, Mr. Gibson disposed of the works, including the mills, Mansion House, etc., to T. H. Oliphant. Oliphant’s successors were Miltenberger & Brown, who carried on the business until 1839, when they closed it and ended the history of the village of Little Falls, for the villagers, being simply laborers at the works, moved away, the store was sold, and such portions of the works as could not be utilized allowed to fall into decay. The stone house built by Nathaniel Gibson is now occupied by James Lynch.

EARLY ROADS.

At the March sessions in 1795 report was made by John McClelland, Robert Adams, Jeremiah Pears, Samuel Stevens, Joseph Torrance, and James Paull, on a road laid from Meason's furnace by Pears' forge to the Redstone road. The road was described as commencing at Isaac Meason's furnace, leading to the forge built by Jeremiah and James Pears, and thence "ill it intersects the road leading from Uniontown to Brownsville." September, 1794, a road was viewed from Meason's iron-works to the mouth of the Big Redstone by Robert McLaughlin, Daniel Cannon, Matthew Neely, Jeremiah Pears, David Morland, and Matthew Gilchrist. Also, in December, 1794, a road was viewed from Meason's furnace by Pears' forge to the road from Uniontown to Redstone, the viewers being Jeremiah Pears, Robert Adams, James Paull, Col. Joseph Torrance, Samuel Stevens, and John McClelland.

A report was made to the court at the June sessions in 1795 of a road from Thomas Dunn's plantation by way of Samuel Grier's mills to Samuel Grable's. The viewers were John Dunlap, Benjamin Stevens, Joseph Work, Elisha Pears, William Brown, and William McFarland.

TOWNSHIP ORGANIZATION AND CIVIL LIST.

At the December session of the Court of General Quarter Sessions in 1783 the county was divided into townships. One of these townships was Franklin, whose creation is thus recorded: "A township to begin at the mouth of Crab-Apple Run; thence up the same to the mouth of Harvester's Branch; thence up the same to the head thereof; thence by a line to be drawn to the head of the South Fork of Washington Mill-Run; thence down the same to the river Youghiogheni; thence up the Youghiogheni to the foot of the Laurel Hill; thence along the foot of Laurel Hill to Bard's old road, leading from Gist's to the Old Fort; thence along the said road to Redstone Creek; thence down the said creek to the place of beginning, to be hereafter known by the name of Franklin township." At the December term of court, 1793, it was ordered that "that part of Wharton township which lies northward of a line lately run by Alexander McClean and his assistants as a line of experiment from Berlin to the west side of the Chestnut Ridge or Laurel Hill, crossing the Youghiogheni River about one hundred perches above the mouth of Rocky Run, and thence due west to Braddock's road, be annexed to the township of Franklin." At the December session of court in 1798 a portion of Franklin was set off and called Dunbar township. At the March session in 1839 the township of Perry was created from portions of Franklin, Tyrone, and Washington. At the September session, 1840, a petition was presented for a change of line between the townships of Perry and Franklin, commencing at or near James H. Patterson's steam saw-mill, and terminating on the Red Lion road, south of the written property belonging to David Rittenhouse, so as to include James Patterson, Jr., now of Perry, within the limits of Franklin township.

Win. Coln, John Dunn, and Ephraim Lynch were appointed commissioners. Order was issued, report made and approved Dec. 19, 1840, and confirmed March 8, 1841. An addition from Franklin to Perry was made in March, 1852. A slight change of line between Franklin and Perry was made in 1867, and in March, 1872, petition was made by Hugh H. Patterson, Joseph Clark, Alfred and Freeman Cooper to "attach" to Franklin township as more convenient for election and school purposes.

The records of elections in the township are incomplete, and the list of township officials following will be found to extend only from 1784 to 1808 and from 1840 to 1881.

SCHOOLS.

One of the earliest school-houses in Franklin township was a log building that stood in 1800 upon the Uniontown and Pittsburgh road, about forty rods south of John Shotwell's stone mansion. It was the only school-house in Franklin west of Flatwoods, and one of the very first in that section of the country. It was built before the year 1800, but just when cannot be told. Among its earliest patrons and supporters were Hugh Shotwell, Robert Smith, John Allen, Jonathan Sharpless, Anthony Swayne, James McCafferty, William Rittenhouse, Joseph Girist, John Paxson, Jacob Bingham, William Burton, Jacob Wolf, William Condon, John and Robert Patterson, Amos Emmens, Catharine Shanklin, and John Shotwell. The first teacher was Samuel Blaney, a retired sea-captain, and a fine scholar for that day. Blaney was perhaps the most famous school-teacher Franklin ever had. He taught in and about Franklin for upwards of thirty years, and died at Flatwoods at a ripe old age. His successor in the old log school-house was William Symms, a Yankee, who taught there some time. Among the children who were numbered as the earliest pupils in that school-house were Catharine, Susanna, Rosetta, and Emily Shotwell, Harriet Wolf, Pruda Rittenhouse, Jonathan Ramage, Eliza and Charlotte Wolf, William Mevey, John Blaney, Huston and Thomas Todd, Hugh Devarmon, George, Rath, and Sarah Wolf, Catharine, Rachel, Melinda, and Samuel Condon, Abraham, George, Thomas, and Mary Hazen, Wilson Hill, James and Nancy McCafferty, John, James, and Sarah Shanks, Matthew Patterson, Arthur, William, and Thomas Rittenhouse.

The old Franklin school-house was built in 1821 upon the site of the present house. It was constructed of hewn logs, eighteen by twenty-four feet in size, was covered with a shingle roof, and was furnished with slab benches. Those most active in building the house were Joseph Girist, David Hazen, Samuel Blaney, Jonathan Hill, William Condon, Robert and John Patterson, David Rittenhouse, Ashfordy Wintermute, Robert Smith, John Allen, Jacob Wolf, and John Shotwell. William Symms was the first teacher, and he was succeeded by John Breckinridge, Samuel Blaney, Samuel Peden, Sarah Griffith, William Frazer, William McVey. Among Mr. Symms' pupils were James Patterson, D. P. Patterson, Flora, Sarah, John, and Clarissa Patterson, R. S. Patterson, William, Isabella, and John Barton, William and Perry Condon, Hannah, Catharine, Mary, and Jacob Wolf, Thomas and Sarah Todd, Emily and Caroline Shotwell, Clarissa and Sarah Hazen, Benjamin and Lida Wintermute, Hiram, Hannah, and James Girist, Polly and Betty Beal, George and William West, David and Wilson Rittenhouse, Sarah and Matilda Ramage, Hiram Smith, Sarah and Neri Hill, Hugh Devarmon, Samuel Blair, Samuel, Levi, and Sarah Morris, William and Polly Shanks. Franklin school-house was in liberal demand by various religious denominations who worshiped there nearly every Sunday. A Union Sunday-school was established there in 1822, and much encouraged by the efforts of John Shotwell, Gen. James H. Patterson, David Rittenhouse, Samuel Condon, and Jonathan Hill. The land upon which the old log school-house stood was conveyed by Hugh Shotwell and wife to Edward Jordan, William Oliphant, and Timothy Smith, Jr., trustees of the school-house, the consideration being one dollar. The deed describes the tract as "containing forty-nine square perches, situated on the west side of the road leading from Uniontown to Pittsburgh, being part of a tract of land called Hope, for which a patent was granted to John Patterson, Feb. 6, 1788, and by him conveyed to Hugh Shotwell, May 8, 1789."

Following are presented details touching the public schools of Franklin, as taken from the annual school report ending June 7, 1880:

fession of Faith, as follows: "We do promise to keep the secrets of the church, and not divulge them to any, for in this respect we are a garden inclosed, a foundain sealed." Feb. 19, 1801, measures were taken to "fence the graveyard." Mr. Frazer appears to have been the church's pastor until 1802, when, in September of that year, Rev. Benjamin Stone was called. The entry upon the minutes recites thus:

"Called Brother Benjamin Stone to take the pastoral care of this church so long as it suits him and us.

And he agrees to supply us one a month until next April; after that twice a month." Preaching was doubtless held at odd places, and perhaps chiefly in a log school-house, until 1800, for it does not appear that a house of worship was erected before that date, although the statement may be a mistaken one, as the early records of the church scarcely refer to the subject of a meeting-house.

A stray memorandum, bearing date 1800, contains a bill of items in connection with the business of building, and testifies that it is "a bill for work done at the meeting-house," as follows:

This church was a log building, and was in all probability erected by volunteer labor save as to the carpenter's work, for which the bill was presented as above narrated. How long Rev. Benjamin Stone remained the pastor is not of record. He was succeeded by Rev. James Fry, who occupied the pulpit steadily for about thirty years, and died in the pastorate. He was followed by Revs. Courland Skinner, Thomas Ruse, and Adam Winnet. Mr. Winnet's pastorate covered a period of more than thirty years. He was suddenly attacked with palsy while preaching at Maple Creek, in January, 1881, and in three hours was a corpse.

The present pastor is Rev. A. Canfield. Although the church prospered greatly for many years, and had at one time a membership of upwards of one hundred, deaths, organization of other churches, and removals from the neighborhood have cut the members down to seventeen. The present house of worship was erected in 1845. Preaching is supplied once a month.

The deacons are Samuel Jobes and Robinson Murphy.

Complaints were not infrequently urged before the church by one member against another, and the recitals thereof were sometimes framed in what would strike the average reader of to-day as an amusing form. One, the following, is transcribed recitation et literation:

"Job Rossel complains that on Wednesday last he and his son had taken up a certain Thomas Brown then they sent for Jonathan Addis to assist them in taking him before the authority he accordingly came when he came he asked Brown where he had got that marble he denied, J. Addis took hold of him and said git up you dog, he then gave him a slap with his hand and damned him, Rossel then thought that Addis would be of service to go and see the fences that he had left down they went to see and saw the tracks of the mare and colt, Addis said you dog you ought to be at the work house long ago he gave him a push and Kick him—they then came to the house a little after John Addis came and desired his father not to go, and that he would be damned if he should go and gave Roussel a considerable of ill language at the same time Roussel said he would bare his father Harmless He said you are not able for he was as able as he was and that he (meaning Roussel) had not given his daughter anything etc. Roussel answered him to be gone a little dirty whelp, then they proceed before the authority and Roussel sent a subpena for Jonathan Addis and had him brought forward as a witness then Roussel asked his son-in-law what he came for he said for fun. Roussel said I have fetched your father too he answered Roussel you shall pay him for that then Jonathan Addis stood up and said his son had acknowledged enough and that he would kick him or any son he had, the magistrate commanded the peace Roussel then went out at the door and Addis followed him out and said I will kick you old dirty Raskel, Roussel said why did you call me dirty have you a clean shirt when you go home. Then James Roussel and Addis started away James R began to moderate him, Addis answered him and said he did not care for any man then Roussel sent his wife to see Addis she told him to come and see him and make it up in love for it would be much the best, he seemed to Rave much she told him if he did he would complain to the church he said he disregarded the Church, she said this was a dreadful thing and she cryd he told her to begone with her tears, he said Roussel had used his son ill and that he was a dirty old Raskel and he would not see his son imposed upon and that he would kick Roussel and that he could slap any one of the Rousels, she told he had aggravated Roussel a great deal and that she blamed Roussel for anything wrong he done the next day he came into the field James Roussel asked him what he thought of yesterdays work he said he had not felt well since and that he thought he ought to be kicct James said he heard a man say he intended to return him for swearing he asked him who he was he said I am the man he went off slapping his fists together and swore he would have Revenge before Saturday night.

Attached to the complaint was an affidavit, of which the following is a copy:

FAYETTE COUNTY, 1805.

"Before me the subscribing witness, as justice of the peace in and for said county, personally came James Rosel and made oath that on the 17th of July, 1805, he heard Jonathan Addis swear one profane oath and the day following one profane oath, and he further depoeth and sayth that on the 17th of July at the dwelling house of Job Roussel he heard John Addis give his father-in-law provoking sassy language as he thought without provocation.

FRANKLIN TOWNSHIP.

in a flourishing condition, and under his ministrations prospered greatly. His labors closed Oct. 25, 1853. During his pastorate James R. Patterson and Alexander H. Patterson were ordained ruling elders. Supplies were again in order until the spring of 1856, when Laurel Hill and Mount Pleasant called Rev. James H. Fife, who labored in the pastorate until his death, July 26, 1861. There was after that no regular pastor until June 20, 1865, when Rev. T. F. Boyd was called to Laurel Hill to devote all his time to that church. His stay extended to Sept. 3, 1867. When he took charge the membership was ninety, and when he retired it was but seventy-five. After this the pastorate was vacant two years and seven months, until Jan. 10, 1870. On that date Rev. T. P. Patterson was called, and installed June 21, 1870. He was released Sept. 4, 1877. J. H. Patterson was chosen ruling elder Oct. 14, 1879, and Oct. 5, 1871, additions to the session were made in William S. Gilchrist, Joseph Humbert, and D. P. Patterson Aug. 13, 1878, Rev. S. B. McBride, the present pastor, was installed. He was ordained in September, 1870.

During the existence of the church but two houses of worship were erected. Soon after its organization six acres of land, lying on the township line between Franklin and Dunbar, were deeded to Jeremiah Pears, William McFarland, and John McClelland, "trustees of the Associated Reformed Congregation of Laurel Hill." Upon the land (in Dunbar) a graveyard was laid out and a stone church built, measuring forty-four by fifty-five feet, and sixteen feet high. During Rev. Mr. Pollock's pastorate the church was repaired and remodeled, and the pulpit "taken downstairs from up-stairs." From 1792 to 1874 the same house was used. In the latter year the present edifice, standing in Franklin, was erected. During the summer of 1871 a parsonage costing $2000 was built. In March, 1881, the membership was ninety-six, and the ruling elders at that time were Andrew Bryson, Sr., J. H. Patterson, Joseph H. Humbert, and D. P. Patterson. The trustees were James Junk, John Dunn, and David P. Long. In the Sunday-school, of which J. H. Humbert is superintendent, there was an average attendance of sixty-five. In the churchyard the older headstones are defaced, broken, or destroyed, so that the earliest burials cannot be noted here. The oldest inscriptions traceable include the following: Catharine Jackson, 1803; Thomas Dunn, 1802; William Rankin, 1807; Robert Jackson, 1808; Flora Patterson, 1811; Samuel Bryson, 1808; John Richley, 1814; Elizabeth Rankin, 1818 (aged ninety-one); John Reed, 1815 (aged one hundred); and Samuel Rankin, 1820 (aged eighty-three). Upon the headstone of Alexander Work—died 1818—it is recorded:

"The man of business rests in dust, Survivors feel the loss, Widow and orphans, citizens, Alas! must bear the cross."

FLATWOODS BAPTIST CHURCH.

About 1833 Andrew Arnold engaged Rev. William Wood to hold Baptist services in the Arnold schoolhouse, one and one-fourth miles east of the present church building. Mr. Wood held services there and in private houses, from time to time, and on the fifth Sunday in June, 1834, in a grove near the school, Mr. Wood, assisted by Revs. John Patton and Benoni Allen, organized the Flatwoods Baptist Church. Andrew Arnold and John Detwiler were chosen deacons, Andrew Arnold the singing clerk, and twenty-two persons were received as constituent members. A list of members received into the church up to 1842, gives the names of Andrew Arnold, Hiram Norris, John Detwiler, David Rittenhouse, James Rittenhouse, William Bell, Henry Stevenson, Obadiah Bowen, Tilton Fuller, John Goucher,—Whitset, Levi Morris, Lewis Zimmerman, Job Rossel, Amos Payne, James Blayer, Caleb Rossel, J. H. Patterson, James Shanks, James Fry, David Loofberry, Charles Rossel, William Abrahams, William Johnston, Henry Retneyer, Jonathan Hoge, Ephraim Lynch, William Beal, William Wadsworth, Samuel Rossel, Joseph Tilton, Benjamin Whaley, Reuben Sutton. In November, 1842, a fourteen-days' protracted meeting was held by Revs. Milton Sutton and William Wood, and as a result sixteen members were added to the church,—Jacob and Jane Hazlet, William Martin, John Townsend, Thomas Truman, James Arnold, Benjamin Higbee, Ansel Blayer, Andrew Oldham, Jesse Arnold, Jr., Joseph Kerr, Joseph Bute, John Beik, Joci Cooper, Jonathan Shaffer, and Elizabeth Shaffer. An extract from the records touching this protracted meeting reads thus: "Nov. 12, 1842, a protracted meeting commenced with this church and continued fourteen days, attended by ministering brethren Wood and Sutton, when we had the presence of the Lord, as we trust, in granting us a special season of grace, and as the meeting progressed, while some were halting and others weeping and praying over the condition of our Zion, the spirit of Almighty God was evidently working in our midst, and he attended the word preached with the power of the Holy Spirit. Sinners were alarmed, and many were made to weep under a sense of their sin and guilt to cry for mercy."

Rev. William Wood was installed as pastor of the church upon the day following its organization, Rev. Mr. Estep preaching the installation sermon. May 28, 1855, the church was received as a member of the Monongahela Association, then in session at Peter's Creek. In 1835, William Dunlap donated land for a church and churchyard, and that year a framed house, forty by thirty-six feet in size, was erected upon the site of the present building. To the graveyard lot additional donations of land were made by John Bowman, Andrew Bowman, and John Townsend, Sept. 15, 1836, Abner Rittenhouse, Andrew Arnold, and Hiram Norris were chosen church trustees. In 1838 a Baptist minister living east of the mountains, happening to be at Flatwoods during a meeting of the Monongahela Association there, wrote upon his return home a newspaper sketch of his experiences in the West. Touching Flatwoods he said, "We met at a place called Flatwoods, but I called it anything but flat. Some people came twenty and twenty-five miles. I was surprised to see so many ladies on horseback, and they told me too they could ride just as fast as the horses could go."

The church has since 1834 an almost uninterrupted pastorate history. Rev. William Wood, the first pastor, preached until January, 1842; E. T. Brown then supplied for one year, and Milton Sutton, being installed in January, 1843, served three years longer. April 1, 1846, William Wood returned for a second term and remained two years. Rev. J. W. B. Tisdale was the pastor from April, 1848, to April, 1852; Milton Sutton (second term), from April, 1852, to April, 1853; W. W. Hickman, from 1853 to 1860; John Scott, from 1860 to 1864; W. B. Skinner, from 1864 to 1865; W. W. Hickman (second term), from 1865 to 1868; C. W. Hodsock, from 1868 to 1869; N. B. Crutchfield, 1869 to 1870; J. R. Brown, 1870 to 1872; Daniel Kelsey, 1872 to 1874; W. R. Patton, 1874 to 1880; and J. A. J. Lightburn, from April 1, 1880, to the present time. Following is given a list of deacons elected since 1834: Andrew Arnold and John Dettmer, May, 1834; Job Rossel and James Fry, May 12, 1834; H. W. Norris, June 14, 1846; James Pierse, James Arnold, and Ephraim Lynch, Jan. 11, 1851; J. A. Pierse, E. H. Abrahams, Jarret Jordan, Mathew Arison, July 14, 1860; Joseph Bute, April 20, 1862; Aaron Townsend, Joseph Easington, John Blair, and T. P. Murphy, Nov. 19, 1865. Messrs. Arison, Bute, Townsend, Easington, and Murphy are still elders. The first church clerk was Abner Rittenhouse. James Fry, the second, was chosen Jan. 8, 1843; Jesse Arnold, Feb. 7, 1852; E. H. Abrahams, March 19, 1859; and Joseph Bute, the present clerk, June 15, 1861. In 1861, Joseph Bute, Joel Cooper, and John Townsend were appointed a committee to provide a new meeting-house, which resulted in the present brick edifice, that was dedicated April 29, 1862. It measures fifty-five by forty-five, with a seventeen-feet story, and cost $17,257. Upwards of five hundred members have been received since 1834, about one hundred and ninety of these remaining at this time. The church trustees are P. P. Murphy, Freeman Cooper, and James Blair, and the Sunday-school superintendent is P. P. Murphy.

John Burton.

John Burton, of Franklin township, is a native of England, and was born in Yorkshire, June 17, 1817. He is the son of Thomas Burton and Jane Mason Burton, of Yorkshire, England, who were married March 7, 1810, and emigrated to America in 1818, when John was only a year old. They first located near Winchester, Va., but in 1823 moved into Fayette County, Pa., and settled upon a farm which is now a part of the one owned by their son John. There they lived in fact the rest of their lives, Thomas Burton dying July 16, 1844, at the age of fifty-eight; Mrs. Jane M. Burton, who survived her husband thirty-one years, residing during this period wholly with her son John, died Nov. 28, 1875, at the age of ninety-five years. She was noted for her piety, and was a devoted member of the Methodist Protestant Church for over half a century. They had four children,—William, married to Catharine Wolf, March 12, 1855; Isabel, married to David Dayaron Dec. 4, 1832; Thomas, deceased; and John.

John Burton was married to Tacy Hogue, daughter of Jonathan and Anne Hogue, of Redstone township, Fayette Co., Sept. 27, 1838. By this marriage there are two children,—Thomas J. and Jonathan H. The former married Louisa S. Johnson, and has one child living, Annie Florence; Thomas J. is a merchant, and resides in West Brownsville, Washington Co., Pa. Jonathan H. married Mary E. Strong, and has one child,—Ernest Colwell Burton. Jonathan is a farmer, and resides upon his father's farm.

John Burton has filled important township offices, and has always discharged these duties, as all others devolving upon him, with fidelity. He and his wife have long been members of the Methodist Protestant Church. Mr. Burton has held all the offices imposed upon laymen in his church. He is recognized by all

Redstone Disciples' Church.

In 1834, Rev. Mr. Wheeler preached occasionally in William Shank's barn to such of the members of the Disciples' faith as lived within convenient distance. He secured the attendance of a good many people, who proposed to effect an organization. Mr. Wheeler suggested that it would be as well to join Flatwoods Church, but being opposed in this measure he withdrew, as did a few others of his opinion. Those remaining sent for Rev. David Newmeyer, of Ohio, who came and organized the Redstone Disciples' Church in a school-house that stood upon Robert Smith's farm. The constituent members numbered about thirty. Levi Morris and John Shotwell were chosen deacons; Henry Gee and John Higbee, elders. John Shotwell and others lost no time in pushing their efforts towards the building of a house of worship, and in 1838 the church now in use was erected. The first regular pastor was Rev. Alexander Campbell, who preached for the church uninterruptedly until his death in 1864. The present pastor is Rev. John Satterfield, who holds services once a month. The membership is now (1881) about thirty-five. Emanuel Shearer is the deacon; William Harper and Owen Blair, elders.
JACOB SHEARER,
who know him as a Christian gentleman. He has been engaged in farming all his life upon the farm which he now owns and occupies. His possessions are chiefly lands, coal, etc. Mr. Burton has the esteem of everybody for his honesty, social, neighborly kindness, and upright, straightforward life.

ROBERT SMITH.

Robert Smith was born Nov. 19, 1799, in Franklin township, upon the farm on which he died, Nov. 21, 1881. He was of Scotch stock. His education was received in the common schools. Mr. Smith was married Jan. 4, 1827, to Rosetta, daughter of John and Sarah Shotwell, of Franklin township. They had twelve children. Ten of them grew to manhood and womanhood. Nine are now living.

Mr. Smith held the office of justice of the peace for a number of years. He was one of the first justices after the office was made elective in this State. He also held other important township offices.

As a man, he was modest and unassuming. True to his convictions as a citizen, he was upright, honest, and enterprising; as a husband, he was faithful, devoted, affectionate; as a father, kind and indulgent; as a Christian, he was consistent and exemplary.

He was a member of Laurel Hill Presbyterian Church more than forty years.

His father, Robert Smith, emigrated to America from Scotland in early life, and settled on the farm where his son Robert lived and died. He married Mary Starret. Robert Smith, Sr., died in 1837, aged seventy-nine years ten months and eighteen days. His wife Mary died in her seventy-second year.

JACOB SHEARER.

Mr. Jacob Shearer, of Franklin township, is the son of Frederick Shearer, who was born March 24, 1770, in Eastern Pennsylvania. He was married March 23, 1798, to Rebecca Markle, of Berks County. They had eleven children, of whom Jacob is the eighth. He was born in Franklin County, Pa., Jan. 30, 1809, and removed with his father in 1815 to Jefferson township, Fayette Co. Mr. Shearer is of German stock. He received his early education in the common schools, and was married March 27, 1838, to Emily Shotwell, daughter of John Shotwell, long a prominent man of Franklin township. They had seven children, two of whom, Emanuel and Sarah Catharine, are still living. Emanuel married Elizabeth Cook, and has five children,—Esther E., Fred Orville, Harry J., Jessie, and an infant boy yet unnamed. Sarah Catharine married Rufus Flemming, of Franklin, and has three children,—John Frederick, Guy Shearer, and Esther Emma.

Mr. Jacob Shearer has never held office, never aspiring to public place, and has led a modest and industrious life, and bears an excellent reputation for integrity. He and his family are all members of the Christian Church. The church which they habitually attend stands near the spot where, in the open air, Alexander Campbell, the founder of the sect called Disciples, first promulgated his distinctive doctrines after the severance of his relations with the Baptist Church.

Mr. Shearer has resided in his present home since 1843, and is the possessor of valuable properties, consisting of coal lands, etc. For the last few years he has been a considerable sufferer under physical ills, which he has patiently borne.

THOMAS DUNN.

Thomas Dunn, of Franklin township, was born April 7, 1824, of Scotch-Irish stock, and was educated in the common schools. He was married Feb. 4, 1844, to Eleanor Scott, of German township. They have ten living children, and have lost one. Thomas Dunn was born in the house in which he lives, and which was built by his grandfather in 1796. His entire life has been spent upon the farm on which he now resides. He, his wife, and nearly all of his children are members of the United Presbyterian Church.

The children are John A., married to Mary Junk; Agnes R., married to John Junk; Thomas S., married to Jennie Murphy; Mary C., married to Bryson Gilchrist; Samuel W., married first to Ellen Stoner, and again to Clarissa Hanshaw; Annie E., married to Jacob Cooper; William C., married to Mary E. McClure; Harriet, deceased, unmarried; Robert C.; Major E.; Harry G.

Thomas Dunn's father, John Dunn, first married Mary Smith in 1815. She died June 5, 1835. His second wife was Mary Oldham. She died in 1848. In 1844 he married Catharine Scott, who still survives him, an active woman of eighty-two years. He was a farmer, and lived upon the farm now occupied by Thomas. He was also a soldier in the war of 1812. They had eight children; Thomas was the fourth. John Dunn died Oct. 21, 1861.

Thomas Dunn, grandfather of the subject of this biography, was an Irishman. He married a Scotchwoman, Mary Caldwell. They came to Fayette County about 1772. Thomas patented the farm upon which his grandson Thomas now lives. He was a Revolutionary soldier, and had twelve children, all of whom raised families. They are scattered all over the United States. Thomas, Sr., died in 1799, aged fifty-five. Mary (Caldwell) Dunn was born Jan. 20, 1746, and died 1824.

Mr. Thomas Dunn is held in high esteem by his neighbors,—an honest, genial man; and it may properly be added that the Dunn family are noted for their frankness and general good nature or affability. Mr. Dunn raised his large family in a commendable manner, and, like himself, they are good citizens.
GEORGES TOWNSHIP.

In 1783, when Fayette County was formed from a part of Westmoreland, this was one of the original townships, and was bounded and described as follows:

"Beginning at John Main's, on Jacob's Creek; thence to Jesse Bayle's; thence in same direction to the line of Wharton township; thence by the same until opposite Charles Brownfield's; thence by Charles Brownfield, Thomas Gaddis, the Widow McClelland, and the residue of the line of Union township to the head of Jennings' Run; thence by the lines of German township to the beginning, to include the three first above-mentioned persons, to be hereafter known by the name of George township."

This township seems to have possessed many natural attractions, and was settled at a very early date. The fertile valleys, the abundant supply of excellent water, the superior timber, and many other attractive features of this township led to its rapid settlement, and soon made it one of the most populous and important townships of the county. Before Westmoreland County had been erected this region had quite a number of settlers, and when Fayette was struck off from Westmoreland, after the burning of Hannastown by the Indians, this was quite a densely-peopled section of the new county. In December, 1845, a part of Georges township was taken to form Nicholson.

This township in its varied and picturesque beauty is excelled by few in the United States. Here we have the "White Rocks," famed not only for their great natural attractiveness, but aside from this they are noted as the place where the "Polly Williams murder" occurred in August, 1810. The chasm is some fifty feet in depth, and the huge gray stones stand in mute grandeur with all their romantic history clustered around them. In ages to come, when they have gathered all the enchantment which time can lend, and the additional charm of ancient remembrance shall have caused the facts to be thought of as traditionary, then will the traveler come for hundreds of miles to look upon the place where the base inhumanity of man was displayed, and examine the great gray stones where the crimson heart-blood of Polly Williams was shed by the hand of her seducer.

For a hundred years past the Delaney Cave has been sought as a place worthy of the sight-seer. Located as it is near the summit of the Laurel Hill range, and commanding thus a magnificent view of the beautiful lands towards the setting sun, it affords attractions not possessed by the Mammoth Cave of Kentucky. It would be difficult for the most accurate observer to form any definite conception of the vastness of space here presented to the eye. Miles toward the north and south, the fair valley at the base of the mountain is visible, while stretching far toward the west the beautiful landscape is shut out from view only when the horizon limits it, far away over the Monongahela in Greene County. A description of the cave, from the pen of John A. Paxton, of Philadelphia, who visited it in 1816, is given in the general history of the county. The manner in which this cave derived its name is readily traceable to the fact that a Mr. Thomas Delaney was owner of the lands beneath which the cave is located. About the year 1800 two men, Crain and Simmons, from Smithfield, went to the cave to explore it; they were lost in it, and remained there two days and two nights before the people succeeded in finding them. When found they were locked in each other's arms, and were almost dead for want of water and food.

This township is very rich in mineral resources, and on this account the early settlers, seeming to understand thoroughly where to locate in order that they might have rich possessions in mineral lands, came and settled near the base of the mountain, and soon thereafter the ores they had discovered were worked into iron, and the coal was dug and used as a fuel, although not to any great extent, for the wood was everywhere abundant at that time. As early as 1790 coal was dug by George Hertzog in this county, on the Springhill Furnace property, not far from Haydentown. It was the Upper Freeport vein, and people came many miles to get some of the wonderful fuel dug from the earth. In addition to the bountiful supply of coal and iron ore, the hand of Nature has provided the very best fire-clay in the country. On the property of Abraham Low there is a silver-mine, which, perhaps, might be worked in paying quantities if capital was brought into requisition. It is said that Mr. Low was at one time offered five thousand dollars for his mine by an experienced mineralogist. The silver-bearing rock is of a dark color, and when broken the metallic lustre can be seen on every face of the fracture. It is stated that the Indians had a lead-mine in this township, and used the lead in moulding bullets. Evidently it must have been very pure ore, or it would not have been either possible or expedient to have used it as we use merchantable lead. Upon several occasions the Browns and other very early settlers attempted to find out the locality of this mine, for lead was in demand on the frontier; but, owing to the fact that they risked their lives if found watching the Indians, they never succeeded in finding the treasure for which they sought.

The earliest settlement of which any positive information can be gathered is that which was made upon the land now owned by Mr. Joel Leatherman. This settlement was made probably as early as 1750, which is demonstrated from the following facts: The grandfather of Basil Brownfield settled in this county soon after Braddock's defeat, say 1760; he lived to be a very old man, and Mr. Basil Brownfield said that when he was a little boy he often heard his grandfather and father mention the French village which had once stood upon the Leatherman farm. At some time, early in the eighteenth century, a party of Frenchmen settled there and built a village; they were on good terms with the Indians, and to some extent intermarried with them. They were a progressive and intelligent community, and immediately began to improve their new home. After having resided there a number of years, they from some cause vacated the premises, and when the next white settlers came upon the scene, some thirty years later, the village had gone to wreck, and a dense thicket had taken its place.

Towards the close of the century Mr. Joel Leatherman's father purchased the tract of land from Richard Reed, and soon thereafter they proceeded to grub the thicket of hazel-bushes, and after due preparation it was sowed in grass. Upon plowing it they found the remains of the houses, one of which had a solid stone foundation and a floor of stone. Some articles of crockery-ware were also found, and iron of peculiar device; the remnant of what had been a well; also a macadamized road running through the farm; and upon opening the coal-bank near by it was found that it had been mined before and considerable of coal used. To make all of these improvements would require a good many years of labor for such a small colony, and the land, too, was densely overgrown with hazel-bushes when the first permanent settlers came into Fayette County. In order to have erected this village and added all the improvements it would, as we have stated, have required no brief time; then after it had been abandoned it must have taken a series of years to have reduced such durable buildings to ruins so that a thicket might spring up and occupy the place where the buildings had been erected. All of which would tend to impress us with the fact that there were settlers of our own color in this county long before the coming of the permanent settlers, such as the Browns, Gists, and others. What the name of this French village was we never may know, neither can we expect to learn of the particulars as to the length of its duration or the causes which led to its abandonment; yet it is a satisfaction to know that there were white people who had a home in these beautiful valleys a century and a half ago. In addition to this fact, Georges township has the credit of one of the earliest permanent settlers. As early as 1752 or 1758, Wendall Brown and his three sons, Manus, Thomas, and Adam, settled in Providence's Bottom, on the Monongahela River, but changed very soon to Georges and Union townships, where some of their descendants yet live. The change from the place of their original settlement was brought about by the Indians, who assured them that their new home, in what is now Georges township, would be better, the land being, as they said, much richer. When Washington surrendered Fort Necessity in 1754 the Browns accompanied him and his troops back to their old Virginia home, but a few years thereafter returned to their former frontier home, after Gen. Forbes had reinstated the English dominion.

The quota of tax for Georges township in 1796 was $223.257. In 1808 it had increased to $337, and had nine mills, five forges and furnaces, three tanyards, seven distilleries and breweries, four hundred and ninety-two horses, five hundred and eight cattle; the total amount of the assessment being $223,660. The number of acres of land taken up in 1796 was more than twenty-three thousand. In 1810 the population was two thousand and eighty-six. In 1829, when the census was taken, it was found that there was a decrease of fifty-five in the population. At the next census of 1830 the population was two thousand four hundred and sixteen.

OLD ROADS.

Georges township has the honor of the first road after Fayette County was organized. An old trail, known as the "Cherokee" or "Catawba Trail," ran through Georges township, entering Fayette County at Grassy Run, in Springhill township, and passing through the land of Charles Griffin by Long's Mill, Ashcraft's Fort, Philip Rogers' (now Alfred Stewart's), William James; thence through the remaining portion of Georges township almost on a line with the present Morgantown road. It was on this trail that the Grassy Run road was laid out. It was confirmed and ordered opened up, thirty-three feet wide, at March sessions, 1784, which was the second sessions of the court. At the previous sessions the view had been prayed for, and Empson Brownfield, Henry Becson, James Neal, John Swearingen, and Aaron Moore appointed viewers. The "Sandy Creek" road was in existence long before Fayette County came into being. It came from the Ten-Mile settlement in Greene County, crossing the Monongahela River at Hyde's Ferry, and thence passing through Haydertown to David John's mill; thence up Laurel Hill, through the Sandy Creek settlement, to Daniel McPeck's and on to Virginia. It was by this road that Rev. Joseph Dodridge traveled in 1774 when he made his tour west of the Allegheny Mountains, at which time he preached at the Mount Moriah Presbyterian Church, in Springhill township, near New Geneva. After the organization of the county this was the second road viewed and ordered opened by the court. This was opened as so ordered Dec. 28, 1785. The viewers were Zadoc Springer, Philip Jenkins, John Hill, Owen Davis, and William Hill.

ASHCRAFT'S FORT.

On the property now owned by Mrs. Evans Willson, in this township, and on the line of the Cherokee trail, stood the Ashcraft fort. To this place of refuge the settlers were accustomed to flee when Indian difficulties were feared. It was named after Ichabod Ashcraft, who took up this property (199 acres, called "Buffle Pasture"), receiving his warrant for it, dated May 29, 1770. Here they built their fort near a bubbling spring. Long since the fort has disappeared, but the spring gushes forth to the sunlight just as it did a century and a quarter ago. The fort was built on the same plan as other early forts,—the second story projected out about one foot over the lower, so that in case the Indians should attempt to fire the fort they could be readily shot from the loop-holes above. There was a stockade of an acre with a ditch and picket-line for the purpose of protecting the stock from the depredations of the savages. It is related that one morning Mrs. Rachel Ashcraft was awakened by the call of a turkey gobbler. She told her husband that she believed she would go out and kill it. Her husband said she had better not, it might be an Indian. The call was repeated, and Mrs. Ashcraft cautiously opened one of the port-holes and looked out. Presently the call of the turkey gobbler was repeated, and then out came the head of an Indian to see if any one was stirring in the fort. She quietly took down her trusty rifle, and the next time he gave the call and protruded his head from behind the tree she sent a bullet through his head, striking him square between the eyes. Ashcraft's fort was built at the crossing of two Indian trails. At this cross-roads suicides were buried, in conformity with an old English custom. It is said that the Indian shot by Mrs. Ashcraft was interred at this place. It is also related (but how truly is not known) that he was skinned, and his skin tanned and made into razor-strops, which were distributed among the settlers as trophies.

In the valley, near Fort Gaddis, Daniel Boone and his companions encamped when on their way to the Western wilds. This was previous to the year 1770. Mr. Basil Brownfield said that an old man who died a great many years ago—in fact, soon after the commencement of this century—informed him that he saw Daniel Boone when he was camped near Gaddis' Fort.

There was an Indian village near where Abraham Brown now lives, four miles west from Unisontown, and there was an Indian burying-ground near the village. In this graveyard some bones of immense size have been found, indicating an unusual height for the person when alive.

HAYDENTOWN.

This town is located upon a tract of land known as Haydenberg, which was patented by John Hayden in 1787. Haydentown was laid out soon after 1790, and at first bore the name of Georgetown. By deed for one-fourth of an acre of ground, lying in Georgetown, from Robert and Mary Peoples, dated Nov. 29, 1793, we learn that there was a forge there then, and one of the boundaries in the description is Forge Street. Robert Peoples evidently owned much of the land, and may have laid out the town. The forge spoken of is evidently the same one which was sold to Hayden and Nicholson in the previous spring.

John Hayden was the son of William Hayden, who came from the East to Georges township in 1781. His mother was a daughter of a wealthy merchant of Philadelphia by the name of Nicholson. We believe that it was Mr. Nicholson's son who was State comptroller, and embarked with John Hayden in the iron manufacturing business. In the town named in honor of John Hayden there was more iron made in 1810 than in the city of Pittsburgh, the iron being worked into hoes, axes, sicles, scythes, log-chains, trace-chains, etc. The subject of this brief notice was a good soldier in the war of 1776, and an estimable and energetic citizen thereafter, doing much to promote early industries. He raised a family of twenty-two children.

The first store ever kept in Haydentown was probably that of Jesse Evans, who had one there about the year 1800. Since then Joseph Kyle and James D. Low have had stores.

In 1818, John Shadrack was making scythes and edge-tools in Haydentown. Samuel Anderson learned the trade under him, and followed it successfully at Haydentown and at his stand on the Morgantown road. Mr. Shadrack also carried on the wagon-making business.

James Miller had a powder-mill here in 1810. He pulverized the charcoal by hand in a mortar, and made both rifle and blasting powder. He also made grindstones, and he was the man who took a stone such as he used for grindstones and cut the inscription upon it and put it up at his own expense to mark the last resting-place of the murdered Polly Williams.

The Haydentown flouring-mill was built about 1775. It was afterwards owned by Philip Jenkins, who received it from his father, John Jenkins. In February, 1790, it was sold to Jonathan Reese, March 7, 1792, Reese disposed of it to Robert Peoples, who remained in possession of it for a number of years. Afterwards it was owned by William Nixon, Abraham Stewart, John Oliphant, John Shadrack, Andrew McClelland, Joseph Davison, Philip Victor (who remodeled it), and the present owner, William Swaney. This was one of the very earliest flouring-mills west of the mountains. Previous to its erection it was the custom to go to Cumberland for flour.

Public-houses were kept by William Spears, James Miller, George Nixon, Matthew Doran, — Davis, Joseph Victor, Otho Rheades, Jacob Kyle, and Joseph Kyle. The first school ever taught in Haydentown was taught by Andrew Stewart, before 1810.

For a number of years, commencing about 1825, Rev. Peter T. Laishly held religious service in the house of Philip Victor, and organized what was called the "Bible Christian," or "New Light Church." Some years afterwards he left the New Lights, and connected himself with the Methodist Protestant Church, and preached for that denomination for a number of years. About fifteen years ago the adherents to this church succeeded in building a house of worship in Haydentown.

In the vicinity of Haydentown was the old Fairview Furnace, previously known as the "Mary Ann" Furnace, with considerable settlement clustered about it. At this place Melchior Baker manufactured guns about the year 1800. Abraham Stewart made knives, forks, spades, shovels, stirrups, bridle-bits, trace-chains, etc. He was what was called a whitesmith. Col. John Morgan and the Hon. Andrew Stewart (son of Abraham) both learned the trade of whitesmith in Stewart's factory. Here at the Mary Ann Furnace, which ran about a ton and a half of metal daily, the pig-metal was converted into salt-kettles, tea-kettles, etc. These were usually taken to New Geneva, and shipped by the river down to New Orleans. They were also sent to Canada. At that time there were eight or ten moulding-shops there in full operation. The place is now but a ruin of what was once a prosperous and thrifty village.

Not far from Haydentown is the Woods tannery, which was built by George Patterson about 1825.
He was succeeded by Charles Brownfield, Zadoc Brownfield, Henry Stimple, George Woods, and Smith Fuller, and William H. Baily. Dr. Smith Fuller is now the proprietor. The new tannery was built about 1857.

Before 1800 Joseph Page had a carding-machine above where Smith Brownfield now has one. The new one of Brownfield's was built in 1806. There was one other before that, located farther up the Pine Grove Run; it was built by Alexander Brownfield.

IRON INDUSTRIES.

This township was one of the first west of the Allegheny Mountains to introduce the manufacture of iron. Here, about the year 1790, Thomas Lewis built the old Pine Grove Forge, which was located on the Pine Grove Run, on the property now owned by Mr. Thomas Farr. The first mention of the old Pine Grove Forge is in the minutes of the Mount Moriah Baptist Church, in Smithfield, showing that Richard Reed had loaned Thomas Lewis one hundred pounds of Pennsylvania money, and was to receive in payment four tons of iron from his forge. Previous to this he had been making iron, and Mr. Basil Brownfield said that he had always understood from old people that Pine Grove was the very first forge west of the Alleghenies, and Mr. Brownfield was raised at Smithfield, but a few miles from the location of this forge, and could remember back as far as 1809. Jacob Searing, when a very old man, informed Joseph Hickel that he dug ore for Thomas Lewis for a number of years before he failed, and the failure occurred in 1799. The earliest mention of this forge which we find upon the county records is in a mortgage made by Thomas Lewis to Philip Jenkins, of Georges township, in 1795, which embraced "all that certain tract of land, located in Georges township adjoining lands of Joseph Stillwell, John Shacklet, the heirs of Augustus Smith, and William Davis, with his forge, houses, and all manner of buildings." All of this tract of land was held by warrant and improvement.

At this forge, by the use of charcoal, they worked the raw ore into bar iron of unusual toughness. The ore used was specially adapted to their crude process, and was excellent when made into bar iron; it was what is known as the "Red Short;" the thickness of the vein is about two and one-half feet. The forge property was finally sold at sheriff's sale to Isaac Sutton, for one hundred and forty-five dollars. After this sale by the sheriff in 1800 we find that Thomas Lewis mortgaged one-half of a four-hundred-acre tract, upon which was erected a forge, dwelling-house, etc. This tract was located on Georges Creek.

About the year 1789, John Hayden dug out what he supposed was limestone, but found it would not work; taking some of it he went to an old blacksmith-shop which stood at the corner of an orchard on the property of Richard Reed, bought by the Leathermans in 1799, and at present in the possession of Mr. Joel Leatherman. Here he soon discovered that the supposed limestone was iron ore of the best quality. After making his discovery, Mr. Hayden hurried off to Philadelphia to see if he could there interest some wealthy person or persons in the manufacture of iron. We find he was successful in his efforts, for in 1792, March 31st, he entered into partnership with John Richardson, State comptroller, under articles of agreement, by which a forge and a furnace were to be built and put in operation on land which had been purchased by Hayden, and on other lands in Georges township to be purchased of Joseph Huston, then sheriff of Fayette County. The result of this agreement, the completion of Hayden's forge, but failure to finish the contemplated furnace, will be found more fully mentioned in another part of this work, in the account of iron and iron-works in the county, as will also be found separate mention of the old "Fairfield," the "Mary Ann," the "Fairchance," and Olyphant's Iron-Works, which were erected at different periods in Georges township.

COKE MANUFACTURE.

This business has recently taken rapid, progressive strides in this township, and it is only a question of a few years until there will be a continuous line of ovens through Georges township, along the line of the Southwest Railway. Already the Fairchance Iron Company have ovens manufacturing coke, which they consume in the furnace. The "Fayette Coke and Furnace Company" erected extensive coke-works in 1881 at Olyphant's, and have now one hundred and thirty ovens in successful operation.

The "Marie Coke-Works," owned and operated by Bliss & Marshall, of Uniontown, are located on Georges Creek, about half a mile from Fairchance, on the land known as the Jacob Kyle farm, which is one of the finest mineral farms in Fayette County. Fifty or sixty acres lie on water-level. The ores are of superior quality,—Blue Lump, Big Bottom, and Red Flag,—all of them the finest of blue carbonates. The coal is worked from crop. The land on which this plant is located is admirably adapted in every respect for furnaces and for the manufacture of coke, being abundantly supplied with pure water from copious springs and from Georges Creek, which runs through the farm. The present number of ovens at these works is sixty, which will be increased to one hundred, giving employment to about forty men.

MILLS.

One of the earliest industries of the township was the erection of mills. One of the first mills west of the mountains was that at Georgetown, now Hayden-town. Before the erection of this mill, and Beson's, at Uniontown, the people went to Fort Cumberland for their flour. This mill was built, it is said, by Robert Peoples and Jonathan Reese, two of the most energetic business men of the frontier country. It was in existence at the opening of the Revolutionary war, and was owned by Philip Jenkins as early as 1787. Other proprietors have been William Nixon, Andrew Stewart, John Oliphant, Jehu Shadrack, who was succeeded by Andrew McClelland. Philip Victor, when he came into possession of it, remodeled it and sold it to Jehu Shadrack, after which it passed into the hands of William Swaney, who operated it a number of years, but long since it was allowed to pass into disuse, and is now but a remembrance of what it was in past years.

Near Smithfield, Jonathan Reese built a saw-mill before 1790, and it was at this mill that the timber was sawed for the Mount Moriah Baptist Church in 1785. At first horse-power was used; afterwards they substituted water-power for its propulsion.

Nixon's mill, now Abel's mill, was built before the year 1800. It was originally constructed by Moses Nixon, who disposed of it to Jefferson Nixon, after which it passed into the hands of Pierce Vernon and John Vernon, then J. Mackeldowney, who sold it to Byron Abel, and it still remains in the possession of this family. This was an excellent flouring-mill in its time.

The Ruble mill was originally the property of Messrs. Davis and Jesse Evans, and was a log structure. After Davis and Evans sold it, Lyons and Thomas Batt came into possession, and they sold to Nathaniel G. Hurst. In 1844, Mr. Hurst had the new mill built upon the site of the old one, the millwright being William S. Barnes. The contractors upon the framework were Robert Britt and Robert Britt, Jr. The mill was remodeled by Mr. Mickey. Mr. Hurst traded it to George T. Paul for a farm in Dunbar township about the year 1858. Mr. Paul disposed of it to William Mock, of Westmoreland County, from whom the present owner, Mr. Jacob Ruble, purchased it. He has remodeled it recently. It has been a good mill, and the water supply is sufficient to run it all the year.

Weaver's mill was built about 1806 by Charles Brownfield, who eventually disposed of it to James Downard. Other owners have been William and Henry Brownfield, William and John Ritenour, John Weaver, and the present proprietor, Jacob Weaver, who has constructed in recent years one of the best grist-mills in this section of the county.

About 1825, George Patterson erected what was afterwards known as Whistler's mill; it occupied a site near where Wood's tannery is at present located.

Taverns.

For the accommodation of the public taverns were established at a very early date. Soon after 1800 these houses of entertainment had increased until they numbered fifteen or twenty in Georges township alone. A considerable number of these were located on the Morgantown road. One feature of the hotels of that day was their peculiar signs; for example, Patrick Gallagher kept the tavern where he had as a sign the "Jolly Irishman;" Daniel Dimond, the "Black Bear;" John Emery, "The Green Tree;" John Chadwick, "The White Horse;" Moses Nixon, "The Fox and Dogs;" William Spear, in Haydentown, the "Cross Keys;" James Miller, in Haydentown, "The Black Bull." In 1791, Hugh Marshall was keeping tavern, licensed by the court of Fayette County; in 1792, Conrad Maller was added to the list; Caleb Hayes in 1793; John Chadwick in 1794; Joshua Jamison, 1795; Thomas Jackson, 1796; John Minton, 1796; Patrick Gallagher, 1796; John Stark in 1796; Barnet Evertson in 1797; William Spear, 1798; and in the same year Paul W. Houston, Isaac Groover, Richard Whealen, Robert Brownfield; and from 1800 down to the present time the following persons have kept tavern, some for a brief time, others for a series of years: Samuel D. Bowman, Thomas Pugh, Joel Kendall, Jacob Hager, David Curry, William Moore, Lott W. Clawson, Nathaniel G. Smith, Joseph Lewis, Samuel Wiley, Aaron Jolliff, George Truax, David Trystler, Nathan Style, Joseph Victor, Moses Nixon, John Thompson, Joshua Brown, James Miller, Daniel Dimond, David Victor, Joseph Taylor, John Emery, Otho Rhoades, David Hare, Thomas Stiff, James Bryant, Andrew Collins, George Nixon, David Parks, James Doran, Zachariah Wheat, Jacob Johnston, Mathew Doran, Nathan Morgan, David Fisher, Jacob Kyle, Elias Bailey, Joseph Kyle, Thomas Gaddis, John Richards, Peter Golf, William Campbell, Andrew McClelland, Aaron Stone, Thomas Stentz, John Hall, Henry Kyle.

Distilleries.

Both previous and subsequent to the Whiskey Insurrection whiskey was the staple commodity of the country west of the Allegheny Mountains. The facilities for shipping grain were poor indeed, and the settlers of the Redstone country soon found that they could distil the grain into whiskey, and thus ship it in a form not so bulky and more valuable. Soon distilleries sprang up on almost every farm of pretensions, and a goodly portion of these establishments were in Georges township. Among the number may be mentioned John Vernon's, near Fairchance; Thomas Downard's, near Walnut Hill, in the Brown settlement. Moses Nixon had one at Fairchance at the time of the Whiskey Insurrection. Richard Reed had one at the same time, located upon the farm then owned by him, now in possession of Joel Leatherman, Col. Zadoc Springer had one at the same time, Squire Ayres had one at an early date. There was also one in Smithfield, one on the Smith property near the Leatherman place, and Charles Brownfield had one as early as 1790.

MILITARY MEMOIRS.

Some of the inhabitants of this township took part in the Revolution. Prominent among these was Thomas Gaddis, who lived just on the border line between South Union and Georges. He was an officer in the Revolutionary army, and towards the close of his life he drew a pension from the government. Col. John McClelland was also in the Revolutionary war as an officer. His home was in the Brown settlement. Zadoc Springer was also in the Revolution, and held a commission. Others were Dennis McCarty, Joseph Stillwell, Robert Allison, William Corwin, John Person, Robert Hustead, John Bowen, Hugh McClelland, Alexander McClelland, John Hayden, and last, but not least, Tom Possett, who was a soldier for many years. He served under Washington in the Virginia Rangers, and was with Washington at his first battle at Great Meadows. We next find him accompanying Braddock in his ill-fated expedition against Fort du Quesne, and finally in the ranks of the Continental army in the Revolution. Nearly all of these men served through the Indian wars. Col. Thomas Gaddis was with the ill-starred expedition of Col. Crawford in 1782, and returned in safety. In this same campaign Capt. John McClelland met with death at the hands of the Indians. Thomas Headdy was also killed in Crawford's campaign.

There were two companies raised in this community for the war of 1812; one was commanded by Capt. James McClelland, of this township, the other by Capt. H. Yenger, who belonged to that part of Georges township now forming the southeastern portion of Nicholson. The following are the names of the soldiers of 1812, as nearly as we can gather them: Basil Bowel, Stephen Pollock, Aaron Ross, Jeremiah Archer, Rezin Reed, Jacob Price, James Price, Cato Hardin, Joseph Eaton, Morris Morgan, Jacob Greenlee, Thomas Bowel, Joseph Thompson, John Getzendiner, Abraham Croxen, John Thompson, George Herod, Thomas Porter, John Trimble, John Gaddis, James Mallaby, James Abraham, Jacob Akles, Edward Coombs, John Coombs, James Hamilton, Thomas Devan, Caleb Brown, Melchoir Hartman, Thomas Reed, Hugh Tygart, Thomas Thompson, Jeremiah Kendall, William Parnell, Jonathan Parnell.

The soldiers in the Mexican war who were from this township were as follows: Jacob Farr, Daniel Koontz, William Pixler, Thomas Brawley, Davis Victor, Henry Bryan, John Sutton, Oliver Jones, and John Stillwell.

Capt. James M. Hustead, of the Fourteenth Pennsylvania Cavairy, was brought up in this township. In 1862 he enlisted in Capt. Duncan's company, and was elected to the first lieutenantcy. After Capt. Duncan's death he was promoted to captain. At the close of the Rebellion he entered commercial life, and has been very successful. He is at present the proprietor of the Dunbar store, and he and Mr. Isaac Semans have a store at Oliphant's.

The McFall Murder.—One of the most prominent features of the history of this township is her criminal annals. Here occurred the McFall murder, for which he was tried, convicted, and executed, being the first one who suffered the death penalty in the county. The statement of facts here given is from "Addison's Reports," p. 255:
GEORGES TOWNSHIP.

Fayette County,
December Term, 1794.

Pennsylvania vs. John McFall.

This was an indictment for the murder of John Chadwick, on 10th November, 1794. In the morning of this day McFall was drunk, came to the house of Chadwick, who kept a tavern, and got some liquor there. One Myers, a constable, came there. McFall had expressed resentment against Myers for having taken him on a warrant, and had threatened to kill or cripple him the first time he met him. When McFall saw Myers he jumped up and said he would have his life. Chadwick reproved McFall for this. McFall rubbed his fists at Chadwick, and said he was not so drunk but he knew what he was doing. McFall went away. McFall went out after him, and again said he would have his life. Myers rode off. McFall returned into the house again. Chadwick bade him go home, for he had abused several people that day, and had got liquor enough. McFall shook hands with Chadwick and went away. Chadwick shut the door. About two minutes after he returned. Chadwick rose to keep the door shut: McFall jerked it off the hinges, dragged Chadwick out, and struck him several times with a club on the head. His skull was fractured by the blows, and he died the second day after..."

McFall then fled to Virginia, where he was that night arrested by Robert Brownfield and one Jenkins. He would not admit them to the house at first, but upon their stating that they were neighbors and there was sickness he admitted them, whereupon they arrested him and brought him to Uniontown and committed him to jail.

At the Court of Oyer and Terminer, December term, 1794, an indictment was presented against John McFall for the murder of John Chadwick. The jury empaneled in the case were Wm. Taylor, Adam Dunlap, Jacob Lyon, Basil Brashear, James McCune, Robert McGlaughlin, Elisha Kerr, Thomas Rogers, John Work, Matthew Neely, Moses Wells, and Zadoc Springer. James Ross, of Pittsburgh, appeared for the defendant, and — Galbraith for the State. The verdict of the jury is as follows: The jury "do say that the prisoner is guilty of murder wherewith he is charged in the first degree." After conviction he escaped from the jail, and was apprehended at Hagerstown. He was executed in May, 1795, between two trees that stood close together on Douglas Thicket, or Douglas Bottom, on the banks of Redstone Creek, about three-quarters of a mile from Uniontown, immediately north of the Fairgrounds. Col. James Paull was sheriff, and employed one Edward Bell as executioner. He was disguised, and not till years after was it known who performed the execution.

The Murdered Peddler.—Soon after 1800 a peddler stopped at a tavern stand in Smithfield, intending to stay overnight. John Updyke and Ned Cassidy were there, and they made themselves very agreeable to the peddler upon learning that he carried a considerable sum of money with him. They drank at this tavern and at the White Horse tavern until the convivial spirit rose to its highest degree. Proving hall-fellows well met, they persuaded the peddler to go to Hayden-town with them. At a late hour the trio were seen starting for Updyke’s, but were never seen together again, and the peddler was never heard of again. There was a field of Updyke’s near his house which had a dense thicket in it. A man passing by there the next day heard cattle lowing, and saw them tearing up the ground and much disturbed; he went in to find out the cause, if it could be ascertained, and to his surprise he saw traces of blood and other indications pointing to foul play, and most likely a murder committed there. The place where a horse had been tied and evidences of its having been frightened were apparent. The gentleman secured the aid of a few others, and they tracked the horse to a pair of bars which led out of the field, and there they found the print of a man’s bloody hand upon the bars, where he had taken hold of them to let them down. Updyke and Cassidy were never arrested. Soon after Updyke was taken down with a loose parts disease, which was said to have been superinduced by poison given him by Cassidy, who was afraid that Updyke would divulge the crime or turn State’s evidence. He soon died a most horrible death. Ned Cassidy went West as soon as Updyke had died. He there committed another murder, for which he was tried, convicted, and before being executed he made a confession, in which he stated that he and Updyke had murdered the peddler, and after securing a handsome sum of money they sunk his body in Brownfield’s mill-dam. William Sturgis has the confession.

The Daily Williams Murder.—This tragedy occurred at the White Rocks, in this township, May 12, 1810. Philip Rogers, the perpetrator of this crime, lived near New Salem, in the valley east of the town. His victim lived or near New Salem. Rogers had been paying attentions to her for some time. Mr. Williams, Mary’s father, was going to Steubenville, Ohio, to live, and desired his daughter to accompany him, but Rogers persuaded her to remain where she was, and, she being engaged to him, was influenced to do as he wished. The father of Mary Williams had suspicions of Philip Rogers on more than one occasion. At one time Rogers tried to persuade her to accompany him to the river after he had seduced her, intending doubtless to drown her, but she would not go. One day he told her they would go to Woodbridgetown and get married. Accordingly they started afoot for Woodbridgetown as she supposed. Instead of going to that place they went to the White Rocks, a secluded place on the summit of the mountain. Here the terrible tragedy occurred which has since marked that place, and will for years to come distinguish it as the spot where innocent blood was shed. From those who were there when her lifeless body was found we learn the following facts: It seems that some persons were gathering huckleberries near by, and upon hearing her screams they ran from the mountain thinking it the screams of a panther. In a few days after there were some other persons near the White Rocks gathering huckleberries, and they were attracted by the barking of a dog they had with them. Upon going to the place where the dog was, they found the murdered girl. Mr. Basil Brownfield1 was present, and says that there were signs of the fearful struggle on the verge of the rocks, as though she had escaped from him and had run some distance into the laurel-bushes, where she had been overtaken by Rogers, and the place where the struggle took place was torn up for several yards around. She was a strong girl, and he could not drag her back to the cliffs of rocks. It appears as if the struggle must have lasted several minutes, and that, fighting for her life as she was, she could not be overcome until the villain grasped a large stone in his hand and struck her on the head with it until she was insensible, then dragged her back to the precipice, but here she must have shown signs of recovering, for it seemed as if he was afraid to approach the summit of the rock and throw her over for fear that she might in the death-struggle drag him over with her. There is a passage-way to the base of the rocks, and through this there were indications of her having been dragged. He then went to the summit of the cliffs of rocks and cast bowlders down upon her. One of these stones Mr. B. Brownfield has in his possession; when he picked it up it had both blood and hair upon it. In the laurel thicket where the chief struggle occurred was found the bloody stone with which he struck her.

The news of the tragedy flew as though on electric wings, and soon hundreds gathered at the base of the mountain, where the poor murdered girl had been taken, and viewed the crushed and mangled remains. She was buried and afterwards disinterred, and the gentleman from New Salem with whom she had lived having arrived, he recognized her as Mary Williams. Soon after, Phil. Rogers was arrested, and the following mention of it is taken from the court record: “Commonwealth against Philip Rogers. Murder, a true bill. In custody, Jacob Moss” [the man with whom she lived], “for himself and wife, of German township, tent in $200; Dennis McCarker, of German township, tent in $100; Moses Nixon, of Georges township, tent in $100. Conditioned that they shall appear at the next Court of Oyer and Terminer to testify. August 22, 1810. Indictment for murder found at August sessions, 1810. November 22, 1810, defendant being arraigned, pleads not guilty. Issue and rule for trial. Same day tried and verdict not guilty. Same day prisoner discharged.” Thus terminated a farce of trial by jury, and on a technicality of the law, together with the eloquence of Jennings, of Steubenville, Ohio (formerly from the vicinity of New Salem), the lawyer for Rogers, he was acquitted. Rogers afterwards went to Greene County, where he married, reared a family of boys, and when his miserable life was ended his remains were refused interment in any graveyard.

SCHOOLS.

One of the first school-houses in the territory west of the Allegheny Mountains was the old log school-house located between Smithfield and Haydentrout. This building was erected before 1780, and one of the pupils in it at that early date was Robert Brownfield, father of Basil Brownfield, from whom much interesting data for this history was gathered. A Mr. J. Jameson was the first teacher. Robert Ritchey, for twenty years justice of the peace for Georges township, succeeded Mr. J. Jameson as teacher in this ancient school.

About 1803, when the Presbyterian Church built their log church building, they also took into consideration the feasibility of erecting a school-house, so that their children might secure a rudimentary knowledge of the English language, and here along-side the church they built a rude log school-house, and in 1812, April 27th, they advertised in the Genius of Liberty for a teacher. The following is the advertisement as it appears in the Genius of that date: “A Teacher Wanted.—A young man who can come well recommended as a teacher of an English school will meet with good encouragement by applying to the subscribers, who live adjoining the meeting-house.” Signed by Rev. James Adams, John Knight, and Moses Dunham, trustees.

Soon after 1800 the citizens living in the vicinity of where Leatherman’s school-house now stands concluded to erect a building for school purposes. In accordance with this desire a sufficient sum was soon collected and a log building was erected, which served as a school-house for many years. It was known as Miller’s school-house, and was located on the property of the gentleman for whom it was named.

At Woodbridgetown there was a log school-house. John Tedrick was the schoolmaster, and was succeeded by Phineas G. Sturgis.

Pauil’s school received its name from George T. Pauil, who aided the enterprise by donating the lot of ground upon which the building was erected. After the passage of the common-school law at the session of Assembly in 1834 the educational interests took an advance step. At January sessions of court, 1835, Squire Ayers and James Robinson were appointed school directors for Georges township, and held their position until an election had taken place. Under this common-school law many schools have sprung up through the township, and one of these is Pauil’s. There have been two houses devoted to common-school education at Pauil’s. The first was a brick structure, and remained but a few years in use, until it was succeeded by the present school-house, which was erected about 1855. The teachers who have taught here have been William Johnson, Samuel Rothavel, James Showalter, Milton Sutton, James Hol-

1 When this account was written (June, 1881) Mr. Brownfield was living and in full possession of his powers of recollection. He died not long afterwards.
The Pleasant Hill school came into existence about 1840, the first building, like the present one, having been a brick structure. In this school Frederick Martin, Nancy Martin, Rev. William R. Patton (before entering the ministry), Samuel Rothamel, Clayton Richards, and Altha Moser taught. In 1871 the new building was completed, and since then the teachers have been Dr. James F. Holbert, William A. Richards, James Provance, Oliver P. Moser, Aaron C. Holbert, Maggie Field, and I. Sturgis Stenzt.

The Upper Haydentown school building is of stone. The teachers have been Henry Mitchell, Sallie Ruble, John Tamkin, I. S. Stenzt, and Hannah Ruble.

The Lower Haydentown school was built about 1870. It is a brick building. The teachers have been Clayton Richards, Martha Robinson, Snyder Hague, John C. Miller, Sallie Ruble, and Leah Carothers.

The Three-Mile school, three miles above Haydentown, was erected one year ago. It is a log school-house. The teacher during the last term was James Showalter.

The Leatherman school-house was built about 1840. The first house, like the present one, was of brick. The teachers in the old building were Lucien Leech, John G. Hertig, Clark Vance (who afterwards became a Baptist preacher), Rev. John S. Gibson (at present a Cumberland Presbyterian minister), Rev. James Power Baird (also a Cumberland Presbyterian clergyman), Samuel J. Acklin, Hugh Smith, James Henry Dougherty, James W. French (afterwards a Baptist minister), James W. Showalter, Albert H. Smith.

In 1870 the old structure was torn away, and a commodious new brick was built to take its place. The other teachers have been James F. Holbert (at present practicing medicine), J. C. Miller, Isaac Coldren, Annie Oglevee, James Miller, Michael Franks, and Lizzie Black.

The Custer school was opened about 1849. The structure was of brick. In the old building the following persons taught: James M. Hustead, James French, William Patton, John Anderson, Amadecy Trader, Sarah Conn, Albert Smith, and Lucien Leech.

In 1873 the new school-house was built, and since then the teachers have been Isaac Coldren, James Presley Smith, William Fouch, and Oliver P. Moser.

The Deyarmon was one of the first common schools in the township after the law went into effect. Some of the instructors have been John G. Hertig, Robert Allen, James W. Showalter, Milton Sutton, William Nixon Canan, Joseph C. Stacy, Hervey Smith, Carrie Herbert, Abraham Humbert, Albert Hutchinson, Frances Mackey. This building has been twice remodeled. The latter alteration was done by the Uniontown Planing Mill Company, during the summer of 1880.

The White Rock school was organized in 1879. The teachers have been Hannah Ruble and Mollie Griffith.

The first building erected for the common schools was at Smithfield as early as 1836. The frame building is yet standing, but is no longer used for school purposes. During the past few years the directors have rented the academy for the use of the common school. The teachers have been Gideon G. Clemmer, Nathaniel Walker, Eliza Showalter, Joseph C. Stacey, George G. Hertzag (at present a professor in the California Normal College, Washington County), George D. Parinton, James W. Showalter, James Provance, A. C. Gilbert, Aaron C. Holbert, William Richards, John C. Miller, Lizzie Abraham, Michael Franks, Lizzie A. Black.

The Fairchance school was commenced in 1838 in a frame house. The new building, a brick one, was constructed in 1875. Revs. J. Gibson and J. P. Baird both taught in the old house, and since the new one was built the following teachers have acted as instructors: Leah A. Carothers, James W. Showalter, Jennie R. Griffith, John C. Miller, Martha Robinson, James P. Smith, Maggie Field, Lizzie Wilson.

The Walnut Hill school was originally known as Brown's school. The present house is the second within the past forty years; the first was built of logs, the present of brick. Some of the teachers have been J. P. Blair, Elins Green,— Frazer, Carman Cover, Noble McCormick, W. Osborn (now a practicing physician in Kansas), Albert H. Smith, Abraham Humbert, Mollie Griffith, Sallie Dawson, J. Newton Lewis.

GEORGES CREEK ACADEMY.

The Baptist Church in Smithfield saw, as early as 1854, the necessity of an academy of learning in the town. The subject was brought up at the monthly meeting. The Methodists and other denominations were willing to aid the enterprise, and thus the project took definite shape, and in 1856 the court at March sessions granted a charter to the Georges Creek Academy, and constituted the following persons a body politic to carry into effect the object for which it was founded, viz., "A seminary of learning." The original trustees were Enos Sturgis, Rev. Isreal D. King, Hon. John Brownfield, Dr. H. B. Mathiot, Benjamin F. Brown, William Conn, Isaac Franks, John Summers, Gideon G. Clemmer, A. J. Patton, Luther W. Burchinal, William P. Griffin, James Hess, John Downey, Rev. Caleb Russel, John E. Taylor, Aaron W. Ross. In 1856 the contract was awarded to Luther W. Burchinal & Co. to build the necessary school-house. In the spring of 1857 the academy was ready for occupancy. Since then the Georges Creek Academy has been one of the sources of knowledge for that whole community. Sometimes during its most prosperous sessions there have been more than one hundred students attending. The professors who have had charge of this academy are as follows, viz.: C. A. Gilbert, Mrs. C. A. Gilbert, Aaron Ross, Joseph Smith, H. H. Bliss, J. B. Solomon, A. L. Purinton, Fannie Gerard, Miss Bryce, Carrie Mathiot.

Gen. Alexander McClellan had built an academy upon his farm long previous to the erection of the Georges Creek Academy. He used it for school purposes and also for preaching, but we will not refer to it here at length, as it belongs to the portion of Georges township which was given to Nicholson when it was formed in 1843.

After the passage of the act of 1834 establishing public schools, the January term of court of Fayette County in 1835 appointed Squire Ayers and James Robinson school directors. The amount of State appropriation for this township for 1835 was $124.401, and county appropriation $248.93. The township reported to the county treasurer Jan. 5, 1836, in compliance with the requirements of the law.

CHURCHES.

One of the earliest churches of the county was on the Philip Rogers farm, in the township, the property now being owned by the Fairchance Iron Company. The log church was built upon the summit of a hill, near the Morgantown road and the old Cherokee trail. The site commanded a view of the country eastward to the mountain, and westward over the valley then owned by the Carrs, now in the possession of the Colliers. This church was built before the Revolution. It was a German Baptist Church. Nothing is left to mark the location but a very ancient graveyard. When the Corby family was murdered by the Indians in Greene County a messenger came to this church and informed them of that terrible slaughter. When the news was brought they were at worship.

Among the ministers who cared for this frontier church we may mention John Corby, the father of the ill-fated family, Thomas Stone, Mayberry, David Loveberry. It was the custom to gather in the morning and remain nearly all day at the church; the people invariably carried their trusty old flint-lock rifles with them, and were ever on the alert for their red foes. This building was eventually destroyed by fire, which originated in the forest. A few logs were left to mark the site of the ancient temple of worship. In 1820 these logs were visible, but within the space inclosed within the logs were walnut-trees of thirty years' growth apparently. One feature of the pioneers of this section evidently was their religious zeal, and it was handed down to their descendants, thus founding the Christian religion, and leading to this community all the prosperity attendant upon the worshipers of God.

Mount Moriah Baptist Church was originally a branch of Great Bethel Baptist Church of Union-town. On the 30th of October, 1784, it was constituted an independent church, with twenty-seven members, viz.: William Weis, Rebecca Wells, Joseph Thomas, Jane Jenkins, Owen Davis, Hannah Davis, Joseph Brown, Abigail Brown, David Morgan, Robert Hanna, Ann Griffin, Jeremiah Becks, Dinah Becks, Thomas Bowell, Ann Bowell, Richard Reed, Sarah Reed, Ann Coombs, Eliza Carr, Eliza Ashcraft, Sarah Hardin, Jonathan Pane, Balthazar Drago, Margaret Wood, Philip Jenkins, Jesse Coombs, Abraham Hardin.

After the church had been organized the first pastor to preside over the congregation and minister to their spiritual needs was James Sutton, a brother of Isaac Sutton, then preaching for the Great Bethel Church. The messengers to the Association, Sept. 10, 1785, were Philip Pearce, Thomas Bowell, and Rev. James Sutton. At a business meeting held on Sept. 9, 1786, the following-named persons were appointed to meet at the house of William Archer, each one being requested to bring a horse, in order to draw logs to the saw-mill to make seats for the meeting-house: David Morgan, William Wells, Richard Reed, Jeremiah Becks, Charles Griffin, Philip Jenkins, Joseph Brown, and John Taylor.

Rev. James Sutton acted as pastor until May 12, 1787, at which time he was dismissed at his own request, to accept a call to the Mount Pleasant Church, Monongalia County, Va. Rev. Samuel Woodbridge was the second preacher for this congregation, accepting a call as early as March 1, 1786. At that time it seems to have been quite common for the churches to have two or more preachers at the same time. One would preach twice in each month, and the other minister would alternate with him. On the 3d of November, 1788, Rev. George Guthrie was chosen pastor. At this meeting it was decided to meet during the winter at the house of John Griffith; this was necessary on account of the church needing some repairs. Dec. 13, 1788, Philip Jenkins was appointed to assist William Wells in settling the account for repairing the church. Rev. John Corby was the next minister, having received his call Dec. 13, 1788. On the 13th of June, 1789, David Love-borrow was called and accepted, becoming their fifth preacher. At the monthly meeting Oct. 10, 1789, it was decided to complete the carpenter-work on the meeting-house, and to meet the next Friday to plaster the house. Dec. 10, 1791, Owen Davis was appointed to lay out the grounds where the meeting-house and graveyard were, so that the graveyard could be fenced. At the monthly meeting, Sept. 8, 1792, Robert Hannah and David Morgan were appointed "to select men to put in joice at the meeting-house." At this same meeting a call was extended to Rev. Benjamin Stone, of Hampshire County, Va., who became their next minister. Rev. John Patton assumed the pastorate in 1811, and continued for many years in charge of this church.

It was decided Feb. 10, 1816, that "the congregation must have a new church." The old church had served its purpose well, and now the movement was to replace it with a more commodious brick church. Accordingly Richard Patton and Robert Hannah, Jr., were appointed to procure a lot for the same. Subsequently Michael Franks and Robert Britt were appointed to receive from Charles Brownfield a deed for the burying-ground and lot for the new church. The new church building was erected by Gideon Way as contractor and builder, and was completed in 1825. About this time Rev. James Frey was called to the charge, and remained pastor until 1831, at which time Rev. George J. Miles, of Milesburg, Centre Co., Pa., was called to preach for this people. On the 13th of February, 1832, Rev. Benoni Allen succeeded G. J. Miles, at a salary of $150 per year. Jan. 12, 1832, Rev. John Thomas was chosen to preach once a month. In 1833, Eliel Freeman was granted permission to hold a singing school in the church.

Oct. 10, 1833, Rev. David Thomas was called to preach once a month, at a salary of $50 per year. In March, 1836, a Mr. Gould was permitted to talk upon the subject, "The Abolition of Slavery," in the church. He proceeded to lecture, and considerable controversy springing up, it was thought best that he should not speak again in the church. When he could no longer secure the church for his lecture against slavery he procured a room in the house at present occupied by William Campbell as a hotel, and would have spoken there but for the timely knowledge received from a friend that a plan had been perfected whereby he was to be kidnapped and handed over into the hands of the Virginians, who were anxious to lay hands upon him.

In 1837 it was decided that the members of the church should hand in their valuation of property, and support the preacher according to their means. May 12, 1838, Joseph Grover, alias William F. Mis-sildine, of Medina County, Ohio, was called, and accepted the call at $150 per year. After acting as pastor for a time he became popular and married into one of the most highly respectable families in the church. Soon there came a report injurious to his character; upon inquiry it was found to be true. Upon finding that his true character was known he left the country and never returned. The succeeding preacher was Rev. J. W. B. Tisdale, who came Dec. 8, 1838, at a salary of $200 per year. At the meeting of Feb. 9, 1839, an Auxiliary Mission Society was organized in conjunction with the "Monongahela Home Missionary Society." In this society Squire Ayers was made president; Enos Sturgis, vice-president; N. R. Walker, secretary; and D. Patton, treasurer. In 1843, Rev. A. J. Penny was called as pastor, at a salary of $200 a year. The next minister was Rev. Caleb Rosell, who was called March 7, 1846. He was followed by Rev. J. M. Purinton, March 8, 1851. At the monthly meeting Feb. 7, 1852, it was resolved to open a Sabbath-school in the church April 1, 1852.

On the 13th of May, 1854, Rev. Israel King was chosen pastor. In 1855, John Sutton was appointed to take charge of the singing. April 12, 1856, Rev. D. B. Purinton was called to minister to the church, and he served until Sept. 12, 1857, at which time he was succeeded by Rev. A. J. Collins. In 1858, John E. Patton took charge of the choir. In 1859 the church purchased a house from William Hannah for four hundred and fifty dollars, which they converted into a parsonage.

For a number of years the church building, which had been completed in 1823, had been considered unsafe; accordingly the church concluded to erect a new house of worship. The following building committee was appointed: Phineas G. Sturgis, Jeremiah Burchinal, Luther W. Burchinal, Samuel Anderson, and William Conn. In 1862-63 the present large brick church was built at a cost of about four thousand dollars, one hundred thousand brick being required in its construction. The lot upon which it was built was bought of William Parshall, Esq. The new church was dedicated in January, 1864. During the two years required for the erection of their new house of worship the Methodists kindly gave them permission to hold service in their church.

John Rockafellow, Aug. 24, 1832; Abraham Bowman, June 8, 1833; Garret Patton, Jan. 13, 1839; S. Kendall, April 9, 1842; W. W. Hickman, Nov. 11, 1843; Lewis Sammons, Feb. 8, 1851; Benjamin F. Brown, Aug. 13, 1854; Phineas G. Sturgis, Oct. 7, 1854; George W. Hertzog, Jan. 13, 1855. Some of the secretaries have been Phillip Jenkins, Jeremiah Sutton, Richard Patton, Moses Jeffries, Robert Hannah, Reuben Sutton, David Evans, W. Miller, Eugene Sturgis, D. P. Smith, Phineas G. Sturgis, T. J. Conn. Some of the treasurers have been A. J. Sutton, T. Burchinal, and Gideon G. Clemmer. The following were among the early deacons: Owen Davis, Feb. 12, 1785; Robert Hannah, Sept. 8, 1792; Jeremiah Kendall, Jan. 13, 1798; Michael Franks, Feb. 9, 1822.

TEXT PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

This church was organized a number of years before the present century. As early as Nov. 14, 1792, David Smith was licensed by the Redstone Presbytery to preach, and at once settled at the Tent and at Georges Creek. These two appointments he continued to fill until shortly before his death, which occurred Aug. 24, 1803. He was the father of the Rev. Joseph Smith, who has in his "Old Redstone" done so much to embellish the history of the Presbyterian Church. At the time when Rev. Smith was pastor over this congregation it is most likely that they worshiped in an old log house; but previous to 1792 this church had derived its name from the fact, it is said, that they worshiped in a tent. In 1805 the Union Presbyterian Church of Georges township bought from Daniel Dimond a lot of ground upon which to build a house of worship. They immediately proceeded to erect their church building, which was a large log structure. In this church they worshiped for a considerable length of time. About this time Eleazer Jennings was their pastor. Rev. Jennings was raised on Dunlap's Creek, near New Salem, this county, and was a brother of the noted attorney from Steubenville, Ohio, who defended Philip Regents, and was successful in clearing him in the Polly Williams murder trial.

John Adams was preaching for the Tent Church during the war of 1812. Then came William Wiley, who was pastor about 1820. Rev. Ashbel Fairchild took charge of the church in 1827, and remained its pastor for a great many years, during which time there was great prosperity. The church had decided to build a new church. In tearing down the log structure a melancholy accident occurred, which resulted in the death of Thomas Helby and Henry Dimond. The weather-boarding on the western gable had not been taken off, and the rafters having been stripped of all the boards a puff of wind struck the gable and blew the rafters against one another, there being nothing to stay them, and before they had warning sufficient to save themselves they were caught between the rafters and were crushed to death, and it was with considerable difficulty that their bodies were extricated. Mr. Dimond's residence was near by, almost opposite the present residence of William James. The pulpit taken from the old log church is at present used by a Presbyterian Church near Elliot's Mill, in Wharton township.

The brick building, the walls of which are yet standing, took the place of the former rude building, and met with no accident until April 14, 1878, when, as the sexton was kindling a fire for the morning service, the building was fired from a defective flue and was soon destroyed. The members of the church immediately set about rebuilding, and the contract was soon thereafter let to Fuller, Laughhead & Co., of Uniontown, who soon had the new church ready for the dedicatory ceremonies, which occurred Aug. 4, 1878, Rev. S. S. Gilson, of Uniontown Presbyterian Church, preaching the sermon, and Rev. S. L. Bergen being installed pastor. In addition to the names of the ministers already mentioned the following have preached for this church: Revs. Rogers, J. C. Hench, and J. B. Dickey.

The Rev. Ashbel Green Fairchild, D.D., was born at Hanover, N. J., May 1, 1795, and graduated at Princeton College in the class of 1813. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of New Jersey in April, 1816, and was ordained an evangelist by the Redstone Presbytery, July 1, 1818. He commenced preaching at Georges Creek in 1822. In 1827 he resigned from that charge, which was connected with Greensboro' and Morgantown, and was installed pastor of the Tent Church. He was the author of the "Great Supper," "Baptism," "Unpopular Doctrines," and "What Presbyterians Believe." He died June 30, 1864, after a long and useful life, and left a lasting influence for God and the right.

The Rev. David Smith, the first pastor of the Tent Presbyterian Church of whom we have any knowledge, was born in 1772, and after graduating at Hampden Sydney College he came West, and was licensed by the Redstone Presbytery to preach, Nov. 14, 1792, and settled at Georges Creek and the Tent Churches. He was the father of Rev. Joseph Smith, the historian of "Old Redstone." He died Aug. 24, 1803.

SMITHEFIELD METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

This society was organized about 1819, by Dennis Batty and a Mr. Stevenson. The place of their meeting was at Dr. Sackett's residence, one mile south of Smithfield. James Smith applied to the preacher on the Redstone Circuit to organize a church, and a sufficient number of members having been secured the society was organized. At that time Redstone Circuit included all of Fayette County. The original members of this church were as follows: James Smith, Candacy Smith, Rachel Smith, Martha Smith, Freeman Smith, Stephen Smith, Mary Smith, Hannah Smith, Benoni Freeman, Mary Freeman, Lydia Dunham, Eve Sackett, Rebecca Cooley, Nancy Griffin, Gen. Alexander McClellan, and, soon after, Dr. Sackett.

The preaching was continued at the house of Dr. Sackett for two or three years, after which it was changed to the house of James McCormick, who had in the mean time connected himself with the church. At sundry times they had service at Benoni Freeman's and James Smith's. The church had the service of a minister every two years. Henry B. Bascom, — Poole, John Watterman, Simon Lauck, and Thornton Fleming were some of the eminent ministers who preached for this church in its infancy. Occasionally the presiding elder would come to Smithfield. The most prominent of these elders was the Rev. Thomas M. Hudson. He was considered the most eloquent divine that ever preached in this part of the county. When it was announced that Rev. Hudson would preach the church would not hold the congregation, and hundreds would stand on the outside and listen to his eloquence. He not only possessed remarkable power and magnetism as a speaker, but was one of the best singers west of the Alleghenies.

In 1833 a camp-meeting was held in the grove on Gen. Alexander McClellan's place, on the hill above where Georges Creek Academy now stands. Gen. McClellan advertised that he would keep all of the preachers who came to the camp-meeting. This proved to be a great meeting, and thoroughly built up and established Methodism in the vicinity of Smithfield. Among the ministers who were present and preached were Revs. Drummond, George Holmes, W. Stevens. On Sabbath there were about three thousand people present.

Jan. 27, 1834, the trustees of the Methodist Episcopal Church bought from Thomas Gaddis a lot in Smithfield, containing nine thousand six hundred square feet, the consideration having been fifty dollars. The names of the trustees were Benoni Freeman, James McCormick, Stephen Smith, Thomas Batt, and Alexander Brownfield.

This church has produced the following-named persons for the local ministry: Henry B. Mathiot, James H. Green, S. E. Feather, and W. Richards.

The leaders of classes have been William McCleary, John Downey, R. C. Baily, William P. Green, John L. Whetstone, and Wesley Laken. At an early date there were others.

FAIRCHANCE METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH.

This church was built jointly with the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, about the year 1819. About 1855 the Cumberland Presbyterians sold their interest in the house of worship to the Methodists, and the latter church has until the last few years used this church building for their meetings. Recently the building has become so thoroughly unfit for meeting, on account of want of repairs, that the house has been abandoned. The congregation thought that it was not worth repairing, and have now collected sufficient money to erect a commodious house of worship, which has been already let to the contractors, and will be completed in the present season [1881].

Among those who organized this church the following members may be mentioned: Elias McIntyre, Theophilus Ellsworth, John Means, Jacob Waid, John Pugh, Samuel Colley, Isaac Harvey, John Carr, Abram Hayden, and their several wives.

The ministers who have preached to this congregation are as follows: Denton Hughes, Peter T. Laishley, Amos Hutton, William Betts, F. H. Davis, Isaac Francis, Henry Palmer, Jesse Hull, James Phipps, John Tygart, John Rutledge, Milton Stillwell, Peter T. Conway, Henry Lucas, George G. Conway, William Wallace, and Edward A. Brindley.

FAIRCHANCE CUMBERLAND PRESbyterian CHURCH.

This society was organized about 1840. Among the first members were A. J. Osborn, William Campbell, Solomon Smith, Joel Leatherman, Mrs. John Hayden, and Adam Canan. As early as 1830 there were some members of this branch of Presbyterianism in Georges township. Prominent among them were William Nixon, Isaac Nixon, and Judge Samuel Nixon.

On the property of William Nixon, now owned by Col. J. Robinson, there was a Cumberland Presbyterian camp-meeting held in 1833, and for several years subsequent. There were a number of substantial tents erected, and the arrangements were complete for camp-meeting. The Revs. Donnell, Bryan, Sparks, Bird, and John Morgan were present during the exercises, and preached to the large concourse of people that gathered to attend something new in that region. The church was much strengthened by the additions from the camp-meeting. Afterwards the members succeeded in building a church in union with the Methodist Protestants, and had preaching for some fifteen years. During the time while the society flourished Revs. Andrew J. Osborn, James Power Baird, William Hannah, and J. Henderson were pastors over the flock.

WOODB RIDGE TOW N SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST CHURCH.

This church was a log structure, and was built by the Rev. Samuel Woodbridge, somewhere near 1790. Mr. Woodbridge acted as pastor himself for many years. Enoch David was also a preacher here; he died Nov. 28, 1798, and his remains were interred at the graveyard near the church. Other preachers were John Corbly, — Stone, — Mayberry, and Thomas Hersey, who was chaplain of a regiment in the war of 1812. William Brownfield preached there sometimes. It has long since gone to ruin.

GROVE GERMAN BAPTIST CHURCH.

On Sept. 15, 1837, William Moser, of Georges township, sold to Samuel Ache, Ephraim Walters, and Daniel Moser, trustees for the German Baptist Association, fifteen and a half perches of land in Georges township, for the purpose of erecting a church. In 1838 this church (a log building) was built. The families who constituted the membership of this church were the Bakers, Gans, Leathermans, Mosers, Aches, Covers, and Longaneckers.

The ministers presiding over this congregation have been Joseph Leatherman, Isaiah Custer, James Kelso, James Pourch, James Quinter, Jacob Mack, Joseph I. Cover, A. J. Sterling, and John Johnson. The two last mentioned are the present pastors. About 1861 the old log structure was torn down, and the site was used for the new frame church which is now used by the church. About 1869 there was a Sabbath-school organized in connection with this church, through the labors and under the superintendency of William Moser. It remained in existence some three or four years.

WAL NUT H ILL MET HOD IST EPISCOPAL CHurch.

There was a society at Walnut Hill as early as 1815, and shortly after that (in 1821) they were successful in building a church, which they used for many years and then converted it into a school-house. The building stood near the residence of Mr. William Trader. George Watters was the chief mover in the organization of this society. Others of the original members were George Griffith, Michael Mink, Noble McCormick, Mrs. Michael Mink, Harriet McCormick, Mary McCormick, Catherine Griffith, Sarah Griffith, Elisha Griffith, and Mrs. Elisha Griffith. On the 17th of January, 1821, a deed for the lot of ground upon which the church was to be built was made by Thomas Downard and Barbara, his wife, to George Griffith, Michael Mink, and Noble McCormick, trustees of the church, the consideration having been ten dollars, for a certain lot from the tract of land called Thomas-town, situate in Georges township, adjoining of James Fouch and Joseph Hadden, containing fifty-eight perches. When this building had become so much dilapidated that it was no longer fitted for the purpose for which it had been built, the society held meetings at private houses and the school-house. About the year 1850 the members concluded that it was best to have a new house of worship. A subscription paper was started, and with such able men as John A. Sangston, John N. Freeman, Howard Griffith, and Andrew McClelland to aid in the progress of the work it soon took definite shape, and the elegant new brick church building in which the congregation now worships was built. John N. Freeman, John A. Sangston, Howard Griffith, and Andrew McClelland all aided with both means and influence to the project. Since that time this church has been very prosperous. The Sabbath-school, which was organized soon after 1850, has been kept up as a summer school. Mr. John N. Freeman bequeathed to the Methodist Episcopal Church five hundred dollars at his death. He was for a great many years actively identified with this the church of his choice. Some of the ministers have been L. R. Beacon, who was pastor in charge when it was built; Joseph Horner, Henry Long, William K. Fouch, William C. P. Hamilton, H. Snyder, W. K. Brown, Isaac P. Sadler, John McIntire, E. B. Griffin, T. H. Wilkinson, Richard Jordan, A. R. Chapman, J. L. Stiffler, Charles McCaslin, J. Monyer, D. J. Davis, Sylvanus Lane, M. D. Litchliter, R. J. White, John T. Stiffler, and W. L. McGrew, the present pastor. It has belonged to Fayette Circuit, and has been allotted the same pastors the other charges have had. Sometimes John Waterman, H. B. Bascom, John Fielding, Simon Lanck, Thornton Fleming, and other prominent ministers of the Methodist Episcopal Church preached to this congregation. Some of the officers in more recent years have been: Stewards, John N. Freeman, James Lewis, William Trader, James Sessler, and Joseph Sangston; Leader, James Lewis; Trustees, John N. Freeman, James Lewis, William Trader, James Sessler, Joseph Sangston.

Squire Hayden has been a local preacher, and is connected with this church. In 1878, under the pastoral charge of Rev. John T. Stiffler, this church was remodeled and painted and papered at an expense of two hundred dollars.

SABBATH-SCHOOLS.

Perhaps the very first Sabbath-school in the township, and certainly one of the earliest in the county, was called the "Ore Bank Sabbath-school." Eliel Freeman was the superintendent in 1825. It was a Union school.

In 1842 a Sabbath-school was organized at Leatherman's school-house. Solomon Smith, Esq., was superintendent. This was a Cumberland Presbyterian school. For the past twenty years there has been a Union school at the Leatherman school-house. During this time Solomon Smith, Reuben Hague, Humphrey Humphreys, Esq., John C. Miller, and Lucien Leech have acted as superintendents. This school is in session about six months in the year.

The Tent Church Presbyterian school was organized about 1828, Eliel Freeman having been the first superintendent. He has been succeeded by the following gentlemen: J. Kennedy Duncan, Alexander Deyarmon, Alfred Stewart, William Custead, John Smith, and John Oliphant. It is a summer school.

The Fairchance Presbyterian school was opened by the efforts of Dr. Ashbel Fairchild, J. Kennedy Duncan, and Fidelio H. Oliphant. The superintendents of this school have been Fidelio H. Oliphant, William Pastories, J. Kennedy Duncan, Samuel Duncan, Joshua V. Gibbons, and Esquire Humphrey Humphreys.

The Mount Moriah Union school was one of the first in the field. Previous to 1820 Mr. Basil Brownfield attended Sabbath-school in the old "Log Meeting-house" at Smithfield. At that time Phineas Sturgis was the superintendent. At that early day there was some dissension as to the propriety of having the school in the church; subsequently it was held for a number of years at private residences. In 1852 the Baptist Church organized a school, and held the sessions in the "Brick Church." In 1838 the Mount Moriah Church held Sabbath-school services in the church for a while. Since the last organization, April 1, 1852, the school has been continued, and the place of meeting has been the church. The school is in session twelve months.

The Methodist Episcopal school was organized by William McCleary about 1850. The next superintendent was William P. Green, and since that time Dr. Henry B. Mathiot and John Downey have presided over the school in the capacity of superintendent. Under the superintendency of William McCleary the school made wonderful progress. He acted as its presiding officer until his removal from Smithfield. In 1861 the numerical strength of this school was one hundred and twenty-five. The number on the roll at present is in excess of one hundred. The school is in session all of the year.

The Haydentown Union school was organized as early as 1838, in the school-house, by F. H. Oliphant and Thomas Paw. Since then the school has had for its superintendents Rev. John McCarty and James D. Lowe.

Paull's Union Sabbath-school has been in existence for about twenty years as a summer school. Mr. George T. Paull was instrumental in securing its organization. The superintendents have been Phineas G. Sturgis, John E. Patton, Joseph Hickle, Andrew J. Stewart, George Miller, and Charles H. Mathiot.

For a number of years a Union Sabbath-school was in existence at the Fairchance Methodist Protestant Church.

The Walnut Hill Methodist Episcopal Sabbath-school was organized about 1850. The superintendents have been Benjamin King, John M. Freeman, and Lucien Leech.

WOODBRIDGETOWN.

This was originally Millintown, named, we believe, in honor of Governor Thomas Millin. It was then a town of some importance. Here John Hall, Joseph Taylor, Aaron Joliff, and David Trystler kept tavern. Col. Thomas Brownfield had a tannery soon after 1800; this tannery was built and for a time operated by Joseph Mendenhall. Benjamin Paine had here a carding-machine before 1800. There was an old school-house here. John Tedrick taught here, as also Phineas G. Sturgis.

FAIRCHANCE.

This place has grown with the increased prosperity of the furnace, until at present it is a town of considerable importance. In this town there are two churches, viz., Presbyterian and Methodist Protestant, and for a time there was a Cumberland Presbyterian. The history of these churches will be found under their respective titles. For a great many years F. H. Oliphant and others who were engaged in the furnace business have had a company store at this place. In more recent years the Fairchance Iron Company's store and those of Robert Goldsboro and James Shay have been doing the mercantile trade.

SMITHFIELD.

This town was laid out by Barnabas Smith on the 13th day of June, 1799. The tract upon which it was laid out was known as "Beautiful Meadows," and was originally the property of Jonathan Reese, who patented it Feb. 10, 1787. Barnabas Smith married Elizabeth Reese, daughter of Jonathan Reese, and through her received this tract of land. John Fisher bought a lot in the town, which was then known as Smithfield; his purchase was made on May 13, 1801. Another lot was bought by Samuel D. Bowman, May 30, 1801. The consideration he paid was fourteen dollars for No. 11 in the plan of Smithfield. Other lot-buyers were Robert Brownfield, Benjamin Wheeler, David Hartman, Isaac Groover, and Samuel Kennedy.

From the very first the name of the town was Smithfield. The Brownfields owned land nearly all around the town. About the time of the war of 1812 it was decided by the governmental authorities to open a post-office in Smithfield, and then the question arose, What should the office be named? Some were in favor of Smithfield, while others favored Brownfield-town. To settle the matter in dispute it was left to the voters of the township to decide what the name of the new post-office should be. Robert Brownfield furnished whisky freely to one of the tavern-keepers, and Barnabas Smith gave an equal quantity to another tavern-keeper, and these gave the aroent freely to the voters. The day was almost gone, and no vot-
There have been two pottery establishments in the town. One was built about 1800 by Robert Brownfield. In 1805 he sold it to John Fisher. Another came into existence afterwards. These were carried on by Stephen Richards, Matthias Allensworth, Charles Brownfield, Jr., and Dunn & Clemmer. Both of them ceased operations long since.

PHYSICIANS.

Dr. James Todd was the first regular practitioner of medicine to settle in this vicinity. He commenced the practice of medicine in Smithfield in 1822. Since then there have been Emanuel Showalter, — Fleming, Henry Matthews, George Gans, Brown Brownfield, Henry B. Mathiot, U. L. Clemmer, D. Vowell, Samuel Sacket, Jr., Frederick Patton, James T. Beazell, James Holbert, Clayton Richards, William Longnecker.

DENTAL SURGEONS.

Drs. T. F. Farmer and Mr. Watson.

CABINET-MAKERS.

John Jackson, Thomas Gaddis, James Ocheltree, and Samuel Sutton.

COOPERS.

Lewis Sammons, John Downey.

CARPENTERS AND BUILDERS.

Henry Huhn, Mr. Phillips, James Vance, John Kramer, Luther W. Burchinal.

WAGON-MAKERS.

I. O. OF O. F.

Gallatin Lodge, No. 517, I. O. of O. F., was organized under charter granted by Sovereign Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania, dated June 26, 1855, and instituted

The Georges Creek Trading Company was organized in 1816, to do a general banking and trading business in the town of Smithfield. The movers in this enterprise were James Brownfield, B. Stevens, A. McMasters, William Abraham, John Showalter, James Showalter, Basil Brownfield, and Richard Patton. Of these James Brownfield was made the first president. The clerk elected was Richard Patton, and the directors or board of managers were B. Stevens, A. McMasters, William Abraham, John Showalter, James Showalter, and Basil Brownfield.

The officers of the company were to consist of a president, clerk, and board of managers. Those first elected to these offices should retain their positions until the last Monday in March, 1817, at which time a new election was to be held. The capital stock was not to exceed fifty thousand dollars. The shares were to be twenty dollars each, payable in gold, silver, or current bank-notes equivalent thereto.

The banking-room was in the brick building then owned by Mr. Basil Brownfield, and now owned and occupied by Mr. William Campbell as a hotel parlor. This banking institution was in existence in 1819, October 10th (see Mount Moriah Baptist Church minutes, volume xi, page 22). In 1822, by action of the stockholders, it was decided to dissolve the partnership and discontinue the business, accordingly all the outstanding paper money of the concern was called in, redeemed in coin, and burned.

Justices of the Peace.
The township was well represented in this office in the days when the justices were appointed by the Supreme Executive Council. The first occupants of the office after the organization of Fayette County were Philip Rogers and Robert Richley; the latter gentleman served in this capacity for more than twenty years under appointment from the Governor. Others holding this office have been Andrew Oliphant, Enoch Abraham, Abraham Stewart, Richard Patton, Daniel Thomas, Stephen Richards, Samuel Nixon (at one time associate judge), Squire Ayers, William Abraham, James Brownfield, Solomon Smith, Joel G. Leatherman, George Hertzog, Thomas Trader, James Beeson, Alexander Brownfield, Thomas Williams, Humphrey Humphreys, Alfred Core, George Mosean, John R. Means, Henry Hayden, Reuben Hague, Isaac Peters, William Conn.

Hon. John Brownfield, son of James Brownfield, was born near Smithfield, Dec. 28, 1808. On the 19th of January, 1833, he married Belinda, daughter of John Hustead. Both are living. Mr. Brownfield has twice had the honor of associate judge conferred upon him, serving in that capacity from 1852 to 1882.

Dr. Emanuel Showalter commenced the practice of physic in Smithfield some forty or fifty years ago, and afterwards went South, where he became eminent in his profession.

Alexander Clear was one of the early school-teachers of Fayette County, and a very excellent one he is said to have been. About the time of the war of 1812 he was engaged in his calling in the town of Monroe. He afterwards settled in Georges township, and taught for a number of years. He was a Christian gentleman, and was noted for his fine accomplishments as a penman. He removed, with his son Thomas, to Cumberland about 1845.

Dr. William Hampton McCormick, son of James McCormick, was born near Smithfield in 1826. After reading medicine with Dr. Smith Fuller, Uniontown, he attended Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia, where he graduated, after which he began the practice of his profession at Donegal, Westmoreland Co., Pa., where he practiced for a while, and then changed his location to Grantsville, Md., and from there he went to Cumberland, where he has been practicing ever since. His practice has been a remunerative one, and he has amassed a considerable fortune.

Dr. James F. McCormick, son of James McCormick, was born near Smithfield, July 6, 1839. He received an academic education at Carmichaeltown, Greene Co., Pa., and at Georges Creek Academy, Smithfield, after which he read medicine under his brother Hampton and attended Jefferson Medical College. After completing his studies he located at Petersburg, Somerset Co., Pa., but afterwards went West, and commenced practicing at Quincy, Ill., and from there he went to Menden, Ill., and from thence changed to Fowler, where he built up a good practice, but his health failed, and he died there in 1874.

Dr. Alecynus Young McCormick, son of James McCormick, was born and raised near Smithfield. He attended school at Carmichael's, Greene Co., and Georges Creek Academy with his brother. He then read medicine under his brother Hampton in Cumberland, attended Jefferson Medical College, where he completed his studies, and then located in Frederick City, Md., where he practiced during the latter part of the Rebellion. When his brother James became sick he located at Fowler, Ill., on the Quincy and Burlington Railroad, and is still practicing there.

Rev. Samuel Woodbridge was the founder of the town which bears his name. He came to this community at a very early date. He was the pastor of the Mount Moriah Baptist Church as early as 1785. Almost contemporaneously with the erection of the church just spoken of he built in Woodbridgetown a Seventh-Day Baptist Church.

Dr. James Brownfield, son of ex-Judge John Brownfield, was born and reared in the town of Smithfield, studied medicine, and is at present practicing in Fairmount, West Va.

Dr. James Holbert was born in Georges. He taught in the public schools for a number of years, after which he attended lectures at Jefferson Medical College, and is at present practicing at Fairchance.

Rev. W. W. Hickman was licensed to preach by Mount Moriah Baptist Church Nov. 11, 1843, since which time he has presided over the Flatwoods, Uniontown, and Waynesburg charges. He is a man eminently fitted for the ministry, and exceedingly popular and useful in his sacred calling.

Rev. George W. Hertzog was raised in this township. In January, 1855, he was licensed to preach at Mount Moriah Baptist Church, and since then has been actively engaged in his ministerial duties.

Phineas G. Scurgis was licensed by the Mount Moriah Church to preach Oct. 7, 1854. For a number of years past he has been engaged in merchandising, and is at present following that business, having as a partner Mr. Luther W. Burchinal, who has been for many years one of the most enterprising business men in this township. His occupation originally was that of architect and builder. He had the contract for building the Georges Creek Academy and the Mount Moriah Baptist Church.

Gideon G. Clemmer was prominently connected with the Georges Creek Academy and the organization of Gallatin Lodge of Odd-Fellows. A number of years since he went West, where he is now engaged in the banking business.

Dr. U. L. Clemmer was raised near Smithfield, practiced medicine in that town for several years, after which he removed to Brownsville. For a number of years he was editor and publisher of the Greenback Banner and Labor Advocate.

Dr. Clayton Richards was born in Smithfield, educated at Jefferson Medical College, and is now practicing in West Virginia.

Mr. A. J. Stewart has been one of the most enterprising and successful merchants of Smithfield for a number of years.

Rev. Joseph Leatherman came to Georges township in 1799. He was a Dunkard or German Baptist preacher, and was for a number of years pastor of the Grove German Baptist Church in this township.

Rev. Isaac Wynne, a Baptist minister, has always been a resident of this township, and preaches very acceptably to the people through this and adjoining townships, usually holding his meetings in the schoolhouses. He resides near Oliphant.

Rev. Andrew J. Osborn, a Cumberland Presbyte- rian minister, was raised near Fairchance. During the war of the Rebellion he acted as chaplain of the Fourteenth Pennsylvania Cavalry. He had six sons in the service. Four of his sons belonged to the same company he enlisted in, viz., Company E. He preached for the Cumberland Church at Fairchance for a number of years.

Dr. Frederick Patton, son of Alexander Patton, read medicine under Dr. H. B. Mathiot, and after attending the lectures at Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia, he practiced for a while as partner of Dr. Mathiot. About ten years ago he went to West Newton, Pa., and located there, where he still remains.

It has been persistently claimed and believed by many that Gen. Sam Houston, President of the republic of Texas, and afterwards Governor and United States senator from that State, was a native of the township of Georges, born at Woodbridgetown, where his father, Paul Houston, was a tavern-keeper about the year 1800, and that the young Houston was in his youth a schoolmate of Basil Brownfield, in Georges. It is no doubt correct that there was a Samuel Houston of which all this was true, but that it was not Gen. Houston, of Texas, is rendered more than probable from the testimony of one who unquestionably knew whereof he spoke. That one was no less a personage than the Hon. Thomas H. Benton, United States senator from Missouri, who, in his "Thirty Years in the United States Senate" (vol. i. p. 676), says, "Gen. Sam Houston was born in the State of Virginia, county of Rockbridge; he was appointed an ensign in the army of the United States during the late war with Great Britain, and served in the Creek campaign under the banners of Jackson. I was the lieutenant-colonel of the regiment to which he belonged, and the first field-officer to whom he reported."

F. B. Oliphant.

"It is in men as in soils, where sometimes there is a vein of gold which the owner knows not of."—DEAN SWIFT.

Fidelio Hughes Oliphant was the third son and fourth in the order of birth of a family of ten children.

1 The steel plate engraving accompanying this sketch is from a daguerreotype taken when he was between forty-five and fifty years of age, and is an excellent likeness of the original at that period of his life.
—four sons and six daughters—of John and Sarah Oliphant. Hughes, the subject of this sketch, was born on the 4th of January, 1800, at Old Fairfield Furnace, on Georges Creek, in Georges township, Fayette Co., Pa. Of this old furnace, the rival of another on Jacob's Creek, Westmoreland County, Pa., for the distinction of being the first at which pig iron was made west of the Allegheny Mountains, in which both localities have zealous advocates, nothing but the cinder pile and some of the larger stones of the stack remain to mark the spot where its proprietors, pioneers in what has grown to be the great industry of Western Pennsylvania, saw and heard their first hantling heave and sigh.

His father, Col. John Oliphant, was born in Chester County, Pa., and his mother, Sarah McGiness, born in Philadelphia, Pa., was the only child of a sea-captain, who was lost in shipwreck. Left an orphan at an early age, she was adopted by her uncle, the Rev. Samuel Woodbridge, of the Seventh-Day Baptist persuasion, with whom she crossed the mountains on horseback in 1778 or 1779, mounted on bales of goods strapped upon a pack-saddle.

Her uncle Woodbridge settled in Springhill township, founded the village which bears his name, built a church in which he preached every seventh day, and erected a dwelling-house, which in its day and locality was considered stylish and commodious. He preached without money and without price there until his lips were sealed in death. His remains rest in the old graveyard adjoining the church, and by his last will and testament he left some of these village lots for the perpetual maintenance of the church and graveyard in good order, which benevolent intention has been sadly neglected. Squatters and trespassers profane the sacred soil with which pious faith meant to cherish and protect "God's half-acre." Church and churchyard both feel the cold hand of time heavy upon them, and the colder charity of neglect chills every pilgrim to this sacred shrine.

Tradition says that Col. Oliphant and Sarah Woodbridge (she took her uncle's name) "made a remarkably fine couple" when they stood up before the venerable uncle of the bride to be united in marriage, some time in the year 1790. Their remains rest in the old churchyard at Woodbridge town.

Andrew, the grandfather of Hughes Oliphant, had his home in Chester County, Pa., previously to the war of the Revolution. He was a trader, and transported goods over the mountains on pack-horses, exchanging them with the Indians and settlers for furs and land, for there was no money there at that time. Gen. Braddock, in his campaign against Fort Du Quesne in 1755, pressed him and his pack-horses into his service. When Braddock fell, mortally wounded, at the battle of the Monongahela, on July 9, 1755, he was carried on a litter swung between two of these horses, under the direction of Andrew Oliphant, in the retreat to Dunlap's camp, the rear-guard of the army, where he died on the fourth day after the battle, and was buried in the road, near the site of Fort Necessity, where Washington fought his first battle, on the 3d of July, 1754. Tradition says Andrew Oliphant assisted in the construction and defense of Fort Necessity.

After the war he moved out to Fayette County, and settled on land near to Merittstown. His remains rest in the graveyard of the Dunlap's Creek Presbyterian congregation.

John Oliphant and Andrew, his younger brother, commenced the iron business at Old Fairfield Furnace, and soon added Fairchance, on the same stream, to it. Subsequently to this they built "Sylvan Furnaces," on the lower waters of Georges Creek, near the village of New Geneva. They made pigs at Fairchance, and converted them into bar iron at Sylvan Furnaces; built boats, launched them on the Monongahela at Geneva, and floated their iron down the river to Pittsburgh and points below on the Ohio to market.

They continued as partners in business until 1816, when they dissolved and divided the property. Fairchance and Sylvan Furnaces being considered about equal in value, John gave his younger brother, Andrew, the first choice. He took Sylvan Furnaces, and the property was partitioned on that basis, without invoking the aid of the courts.

F. H. Oliphant's first schooling was in a log house, still standing in the back-yard at "Liberty Hall," where his father then lived, two miles from Fairfield and half a mile from Fairchance. The teacher was Thomas, father of Gen. A. G. Porter, lately elected Governor of Indiana.

His next experience was with Alexander Clear at Morris X-Roads school-house, where Col. Samuel Evans, the Morris, Hardin, Tobin, Guns, and Griffin boys and others were among his schoolmates. Here he learned to "read, write, and cipher as far as the single rule of three," and acquired some knowledge of English grammar, geography, history, and book-keeping.

After leaving Mr. Clear's school he went to Brownsville, in the same county, to attend a school of Rev. James Johnson, and while there, in consideration of boarding and lodging, assisted Mr. James Brading in his store mornings and evenings. He then secured the life-long friendship and confidence of Mr. Brading, and by his industry and attention to the duty before him attracted the notice of George Hogg, Jacob Bowman, and Joseph Thornton, leading men of that part of the county, and made them his friends for life.

This, with one session of five months at Jefferson College, where his older brothers, Woodbridge and Orlando, and subsequently his younger brother, Ethelbert, graduated, finished the course of his education before he was seventeen years old.

About this period of his life, financial trouble, the result of too much lending of his name, falling upon his father, with the accumulation of years, he entered his office at Fairchance, and at eighteen years of age the entire business devolved upon him. He paid just debts and resisted the payment of unjust claims until all were settled and the property relieved.

On the 8th day of November, 1821, he married Jane Creigh, the oldest daughter of Samuel Duncan, Esq., of the Fayette County bar, from which came a family of eleven children,—John, Duncan, Orlando, Henry, James and Ethelbert, Elizabeth, Mary Louise, Jane, Sallie Ann, and Ellen. On the 8th of November, 1871, they celebrated their golden wedding at the residence of the oldest daughter, Mrs. R. P. Nevin, Sewickley, Pa., at which all the children living and many grandchildren were present. June 5, 1876, his wife Jane died, and he afterwards married her younger sister, Mary E. Duncan, who survives him.

In 1820 or 1821 he purchased Franklin Forge, at the Little Falls of the Youghiogheny River, hauled pigs from Fairchance, hammered them into bar iron, and with the fall and spring freshets floated the iron down the Youghiogheny and Monongahela Rivers to Pittsburgh, and sometimes down the Ohio to Cincinnati, selling what he could for cash, and trading the balance for store goods and provisions for the furnace and forge.

In 1823-24, in connection with two other gentlemen of Pittsburgh, he built the Pennsylvania (now the Wayne) Rolling-Mill, and not agreeing cordially with his partners, he sold his interest to Messrs. Miltenburger & Brown, returned with his family to Franklin Forge, and conducted the business there in connection with Fairchance for a number of years without a dollar of money. It was all barter and trade. Franklin Forge was a centre of business. His iron was the currency of the country. Farmers brought in their produce to the mills, traded it for iron, taking what they wanted for present use, and a certificate of deposit for the balance. His office and iron-house became a bank of deposit. There was no money in the country, and so this system of trade went on for years, the iron not leaving the warehouse only at the semi-annual freshets, when all on hand went down the river, and a new stock would accumulate at the warehouse. The wagons that brought pigs from Fairchance returned loaded with flour and other supplies accumulated in the mill at the forge. He has often declared that this was the most satisfactory period of his business life. But he looked beyond the beautiful hills and wild, romantic surroundings of the "Little Falls" for wilder fields and deeper mines. He saw the day of the forge-fire and the tift-hammer passing away, and in 1832 sold Franklin Forge to Messrs. Miltenburger & Brown, of Pittsburgh.

Leaving his family in Uniontown he started for Tennessee, with a view of entering into the iron business there with Messrs. Yateman, but not being pleased with the situation, he returned to Cincinnati, purchased a steam-engine and the option of a lot of land in Covington, rented a house in Cincinnati, and made other arrangements for building a rolling-mill.

Coming home, he yielded to the eloquent pleadings of the gray hairs of his father and mother and the tears of his sisters, abandoned the Cincinnati scheme, brought the engine to Fairchance, and in the fall of 1832 commenced building a rolling-mill, nail-factory, etc., alongside the furnace, which in the spring and summer of 1833 were in full operation.

He made a superior article of iron and nails. They became popular as soon and as far as they were known, and these iron-works went on through good times and hard without a strike or stop, except for necessary repairs, until after the property was sold to a New York company in 1870-71.

In hard times dicker and trade was resorted to again, as in previous years at "Little Falls." Wagons were loaded at the works, started on the old National road, selling in the towns through which they passed, and the balance converted into store goods and groceries in Baltimore. These in turn were loaded into the wagons to "plo'd their weary way" back to the works.

He had coal and iron ore and limestone in the ground, and timber for charcoal in the mountains. He had only labor to pay for. The raw material went into the furnace, and came out bar iron and nails at the other end of the same building, almost without getting cold in the process. When times were hard and iron was dull, selling for cost, or less than cost, the store made a little profit, or made up the loss.

The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad having made its way out to Cumberland, these tactics had to be and were changed to another direction. The surplus of iron accumulated at the works was shipped on steamboats at Brownsville, and bartered and traded down the river for anything that would be useful at the works, or for which there was a market in New Orleans. There the balance of the iron and such other freight as had been collected by the way were converted into sugar, coffee, tobacco, etc., one part being shipped up the river by steamboats for the works, another shipped by sea to Baltimore and sold or exchanged for dry-goods, which in turn found their way to Fairchance.

In 1848 he purchased "Springhill Furnace," and in 1870 sold two-thirds of both these properties to a New York company, and subsequently sold the other third to the same parties. He seemed then to be entirely out of active business, but in the mean time he had purchased the "Sunnie Bree" property, on the Southwest Branch, Pennsylvania Railroad, from the heirs of Moses W. Nixon, and the site being eligible, and the building of the railroad secured, visions of another furnace soon began to float through his brain.

In the summer of 1875 he commenced preparations, and in the fall and winter of 1875-76 built "Oliphant Furnace," on the Sunny Brae property, getting into operation early in the summer of 1876, but this venture did not prove a success. The times were too hard to make money on pig iron, and to add to other drawbacks, in the night of the 7th of November, 1878, the furnace buildings took fire and burned down, and on the 11th of the same month he sold the Sunny Brae and Oliphant Furnace property to his son Duncan, who at once rebuilt the furnace, put it in operation again in the early spring, added numerous improvements in the way of dwelling-houses for hands, new hot-blast, etc. Under this management it was continued in blast until November, 1880, when it was again sold to the Fayette Coke and Coal Company.

While operating "Franklin Forge" Mr. Oliphant introduced a new process in making iron between the pig and the forge fire or puddling oven, which he called refining, blowing the iron in an open coke fire. It was a very simple and inexpensive addition, was an economy in the end, and improved the quality of the iron.

While in Tennessee he was the first to think of and suggest placing the engine boilers at the top of the furnace stack, instead of consuming and wasting large quantities of wood or other fuel under them on the ground below. Among other improvements he adopted this plan when he came into possession of "Springhill Furnace," where the stone coal was not of a very good quality or very plenty.

In 1836-37 he successfully experimented, and, as is claimed, was the first iron man in the United States who had a real and substantial success in making iron in any considerable quantity with coke. He was not well prepared for this experiment; the furnace stack was old, built for cold blast and charcoal, and but little alteration was made in the blast. The furnace ran a blast of about five months on coke, making a fair quality of iron, good enough for nails, but, although he rolled and piled the iron and then rolled it again, it was not "Oliphant's iron." Timber was still plenty for charcoal, and he went back to his first love.

In the spring of 1837 he deposited in "Franklin Institute" of Philadelphia specimens of the ore, coal, and limestone, and iron and nails made from these raw materials, where they still remained at last accounts, and although the managers conceded that he had substantially earned the medal offered in 1835 it was not awarded, on the technicality that the iron had not been made within the time limited in the offer.

The superior quality of Mr. Oliphant's iron was indisputable. L. W. Stockton, president of the "National Road Stage Company," used large quantities of it at their "stage-yard" in Uniontown, and although they were not on friendly terms, he often declared emphatically that "Oliphant made the best iron that ever went into a stage-coach." Through Mr. Stockton it was introduced to the notice of the War and Navy Departments, where it more than stood every test to which it was subjected, and he sold hundreds of tons to the government for gun-barrels and chain-cables.

In this connection his iron came under the observation of Asbury Kimble, a very ingenious and intelligent man, who believed from its quality that it would make good steel. He visited the works, and the result was the building of a steel furnace at Fairchance in the fall of 1837, in which a good quality of steel was made from this iron. But consumers would not believe it to be as good as the imported; there was little or no sale for it. The enterprise was abandoned, leaving Mr. Oliphant with a stock of steel on hand of his own make large enough to last him for the rest of his business life at Fairchance. He used none other,—the best proof of its good quality.

"F. H. Oliphant inherited all the nobler traits of character which distinguished his father. He was particularly noted for kindness to those in his employ. In their temporal welfare he manifested a deep personal interest. He built comfortable homes for them, planted fruit-trees in their yards, and in every way sought to assist them in lightening the burdens of a toilsome life. He has made tens of thousands for others where he has made hundreds for himself." 1

"The subject of this notice was no ordinary man; he was a remarkable man, and his entire business career, throughout a long life of untinging energy and unselfish and unflinching integrity of purpose, has shown it. In addition to his regular business at times he took hold of others, such as plying steamboats between Pittsburgh and Western and Southern ports. Before the railroads pierced the Allegheny Mountains he owned and ran a fast wagon line between Cumberland and Wheeling. This line carried only fast freight, and soldiers during the Mexican war. His wagons were lighter than the ordinary regulares, and were drawn by mule teams, which were changed at fixed points along the road. 1"

"Perhaps there was no wider known, or more generally respected gentleman in all his time in this county. Of active habits, he did much to develop the mineral wealth of this section of the State, and its people are largely indebted to him for the prominent part he has all the time taken in building up its interests and promoting its welfare." 1

On the 16th of April, 1879, "about one hundred of his employes, men, women, and children, and a sprinkling of neighbors and friends, assembled in the rolling-mill, and sent for Mr. Oliphant. When he walked into the mill he was naturally very much surprised, and inquired what it all meant. This inquiry was hastily answered by the Rev. Peter T. Lashey, who mounted a store box, and after making a neat and appropriate address, presented him, for the people assembled, with a valuable gold-headed cane. When the speaker handed the old captain the cane in token of the donors' respect, the venerable gentleman of iron constitution, as well as manufacturer, read the inscription carefully, and while tears trickled down his cheeks he said, in words ever to be remembered, 'My friends, I have not words to express my sincere and heartfelt thanks and gratitude for this valuable expression of your regard.' The boys threw up their caps and cheered, while the old men and women went forward and grasped his honest hand with the expression, 'God bless you!' trembling on every tongue. After a few side remarks, they passed out, with tears of sorrow and affection flowing profusely down their cheeks. There were but few dry eyes in the crowd.'

In his private life and in his family he was kind and affectionate, consulting more the convenience and comfort of others than his own. With strangers and those who did not understand him he was supposed to be harsh and severe in his nature; but he was a man of deep and strong feelings, and in a way was very sensitive, though a proud reserve kept the secret of this quality so close that few suspected it was there. He was of strong physique, and of extraordinary powers of endurance, often surpassing those of young and vigorous men, working his brain and his body as unsparingly as if they had been machines made of his own iron, insensible to the pleasures or necessity of rest. His manner was sometimes brusque, and more decided than the occasion seemed to require. His words were outspoken frankness when he had anything to say, and sometimes gave offense when none was intended. Always ready to forgive an injury, he was a firm and constant friend, and, like his father before him, seriously damaged his fortune "by the too much lending of his name." Of great moral and physical strength and courage, he "dared do all that might become a man," feeling, with the great poet of nature, that "he who dared do more was none." Strong in his convictions, he was hard to move from them. Impressed by the precepts and the examples of his father and uncle, he naturally fell into political ranks adverse to the Democratic party, but not to Democratic ideas, and remained so through life. Of iron nerve, he seldom gave outward signs of emotion, and those who knew him best can recall but one or two instances in which he was known to have been unnerved. In his younger days he was fond of military parades and displays, loved poetry, and could to the last recite long passages from Scott and Burns. Especially fond of the old Scotch songs, when he was well stricken in years and had an evening at home his daughters charmed the hours away with the music and words of the same airs and lines with which his "Bonnie Janie" chained his heart and hand "in days o' auld lang syne."

From the outbreak to the close of the war of the Rebellion he was intensely loyal to the Union, and nearly depleted his iron-works of hands to put men in the field; nor did he spare his own family. When taking leave of his son Duncan, starting with his company into service, he said, "Go, my son, and do your duty; I would rather see you in an honored grave than hear that you had faltered." There was no tear in his eye, only the faintest tremor on his lip; then added, "I once heard your grandfather say 'No one of the name ever turned his back on a friend or an enemy;' you will not be the first to break the chain. Farewell."

One of the instances in which he was known to have been unnanned was when the cane was presented to him on retiring from business. He was quite unnerved with emotion: sweet and sad memories seemed to crowd upon him, and the strong man, like Jacob of old, "lifted up his voice and wept" tears of joy and grief. And again when the death of his youngest son, "Bertie," at Yorktown, was announced to him, his head sank upon his wife's shoulder; they mingled their tears and sobbed aloud together for their "Benjamin" of eleven children.

It was no unusual thing for him to mount his horse (famous old Marmion, almost as well known through the county as his rider) in the evening after a hard day's work at the forge, ride to Pittsburgh, thirty-five miles away, for breakfast, be on foot all day long, and home again for breakfast next morning; and this often occurred with him in his business between the "Little Falls" and Fairchance. He said he could "sleep quite refreshingly a good part of the time on old Marmion."

About the year 1820-21, in company with other young men of the locality, he raised and organized the "Fayette Cavalry," of which he was elected captain; commanded the company until he moved to Pittsburgh, and after two years' absence, returning to Fayette, he was again elected captain, and continued in command until 1836. Nor had his military proclivities entirely forsaken him when the war broke out in the spring of 1861. He raised and organized a company of mounted men for any service that might fall to it at home or in the field, in which some of his old comrades of the Fayette cavalry joined him.

Hearing that the "Black Horse Cavalry" was plundering Northwestern Virginia and threatening Morgantown, he loaded wagons with provisions, mustered his troop, and started for them. "By the time they reached the Cheat River the command had swelled to two hundred. This advent into West Virginia was greeted with the greatest enthusiasm. The women rushed into the roads, throwing up their hands, and shouting, 'The Pennsylvanians have come! the Pennsylvanians have come!' When he reached Grafton the accession to his force had augmented it to five hundred. There was but little military discipline among the men, but they were all well armed and good marksmen, and to a body of irregulars, like themselves, would have proved no insignificant foe. The rebels abandoned Grafton as they entered it, and there seeming no further use for them they returned home." It is believed this unauthorized raid saved West Virginia to the Union. This troop maintained its organization throughout the war.

There were four things he disliked with a cordial hatred,—whisky, tobacco, a lawsuit, and Gen. Jackson. Once, and only once, a candidate before the people for office, he ran as the Whig candidate for Congress in 1838 against Enos Hook, Esq., a lawyer of Waynesburg, Greene Co., and, as he expected, was badly beaten, but his candidature well illustrates one of these three traits of his character. Being accosted one day by a man who was drunk, he said, "Go 'way, Jack, you are drunk; I won't shake hands with you." A friend suggested "that was no way to be a candidate." He answered, "I can't help it; I won't be seen shaking hands with a drunken man, and if I can't be elected except at the expense of my self-respect I shall stay at home." He banished whisky from the furnace and works, so far as he could control it, from the start. Tobacco was a necessary of life with furnace men, almost as urgent as bread itself, and he had to endure it. His dislike of lawsuits resulted in part from the fact that they would not always go his way, and then the law, the court, the jury, and the lawyers would be all wrong, and he never could get it through his head, although he had a brother and a son at the bar, that lawyers half earned their fees.

† His dislike of Gen. Jackson commenced with the high hand with which he carried things in Florida,—hanging Arbuthnot and Ambruster, and imprisoning the Spanish commissioner, Callava, in Monroe's administration, and for some irregularity or failure of memory on the general's part in regard to an order for a number of large iron salt-pan evaporators, which he ordered while stopping over night in Uniontown, on his way to Washington, as a member of Congress, to be made at Fairchance, to be boated down the river to the mouth of the Tennessee, on the Ohio. He also disliked him later on account of his war on the tariff and the Bank, which he firmly believed would ruin the business prosperity of the country.

When Jackson was a candidate for President there were frequent animated tête-à-tête between him and his sister Juliet, who, in sympathy with her husband, Capt. James A. McClelland, was a stalwart Jackson man, and on one occasion, when words were running higher between them than she liked, their mother laid her command upon them to stop, and said, "Hughes, you are a good deal of a Gen. Jackson yourself when you have the power, and Juliet you are entirely too much of a politician for a woman."

Growing warm in a discussion during the war, he declared a wish "that old Jackson was back to shoot down rebels and hang up traitors to the Union." "What!" said some one present, "would you bring old Jackson back?" "Yes, to save the Union," was the answer. "Forgive him his war on the tariff and the Bank?" "Yes; and the salt-panns too; anything to punish Rebellion and save the Union," was his reply.

Within a year after the sale of the "Oliphanth Furnace" property he began to fail in physical health, and the decline continued until his lamp of life went out on the morning of the 10th of November, 1879, at the residence of his oldest son, John, on the Sunny Brae farm, within two miles of Fairfield, where he was born, within two miles of Fairchance, where he toiled, and within the sight of his last lingering look upon earth he could see over the intervening woods and vales the "old Tent Church" in which he and his wife together, in 1823, professed the faith in which they lived and died, and in which he became a ruling elder in 1838.

On the 12th of November, 1879, he was borne from the Presbyterian Church in Uniontown, where the funeral services were conducted by the Revs. S. S. Bergen and Isaac Wynn, by six of his grandsons, and buried in Oak Grove Cemetery.

HENRY BERNARD MATHIOT, M.D.

Dr. Mathiot, of Smithfield, was born at Connells-ville, Fayette Co., Pa., Aug. 31, 1815. He is of French ancestry, having descended from a French officer who, at the time of the massacre of St. Bartholomew, obeyed the voice of conscience rather than that of the king and charged on the priests with his regiments, for which he was compelled to fly from France. But the king, winking at his official misconduct, furnished him a letter intended to serve as a warrant of immunity from civil arrests, and he returned to France seeking to regain his estates. The family still found France dangerous ground on account of the priests, and Jean Mathiot, grandfather of the doctor, emigrated to America in 1754, settling in Lancaster, Pa. He had the previous year married Catharine Margaret Bernard, daughter of Hon. Jean James Bernard, mayor of Dampierre, France. They had three sons,—Christian, who located in Baltimore, John, who remained in Lancaster, and George, who was the father of the subject of this sketch.

George Mathiot was born Oct. 13, 1793, and raised in Lancaster, Pa., where he enlisted in the patriot army Nov. 18, 1776, and served until the close of the war, when he was honorably discharged. He then located at Elk Ridge Landing, near Elliott's Mills, Md., where he was married Oct. 31, 1787, to Ruth Davies, daughter of Joshua Davies, of Anne Arundel County, Md. This lady was a Quakeress, a perfect type of the gentle but strong character we are accustomed to associate with the sect to which she belonged. In 1796 they moved west of the mountains and located in Connellsville, Fayette Co., Pa., where they resided until his death, which occurred April 4, 1840, at the advanced age of eighty-one. He was a man prominent in his day in affairs of church and State. He was commissioned in 1800 justice of the peace for Bullskin township by Governor Thomas McKean, to serve "so long as you behave yourself well," and served until the infinites of age compelled him to relinquish the office. He was a prominent member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. His house was the home for itinerant ministers, whom his Quaker wife cordially and kindly entertained. George Mathiot was the father of eleven children, viz.: Jacob D., Eliza, Catharine, Mary, Joshua D., Cassandra, John, Susan, Ann M., George F., and Henry B. Of these but two are now living, namely, Ann M. Dorsey, widow of George W. Dorsey, who now resides with her daughter, Mrs. Stephenson, of Parkersburg, W. Va., and Henry B., the youngest of the family. Some of them were prominent in business life and public affairs, and all lived to raise families.

Dr. Mathiot's oldest brother, Col. Jacob D. Mathiot, was well known among the business men of Western Pennsylvania, being extensively engaged in the manufacture of iron at Ross Iron-Works, Westmoreland County. He represented this county in the State Legislature in the session of 1833-34.

Another brother, Joshua D. Mathiot, located while a boy in Newark, Ohio. He became a lawyer, and represented his district, then the Thirteenth, in the United States Congress in 1841-42, refusing a re-election. A daughter of this gentleman married the distinguished Dr. Cuyler, of Brooklyn, N. Y. The doctor's eldest sister, Eliza Mathiot, married Col. Davidson, an officer of the war of 1812. Col. Davidson was in Hull's command at the time of the surrender of Detroit, and marched out the forces immediately under his command and escaped.

Dr. Mathiot had only the advantages of a common-school education, and began life on his own account when, as a boy, he left home with his wardrobe in a cotton handkerchief and fifty cents in his pocket, walking forty miles in a deep snow to accept a position as clerk in the office of his brother at Ross Iron-Works. The courage and self-reliance here displayed in the youth foreshadowed the indomitable energy that has enabled the man to achieve success against every obstacle. In 1837 he went to Newark, Ohio, and entered the office of Dr. Anderson Brown as a medical student. He returned to his native county in 1840, and began the practice of his profession in Smithfield as an under-graduate, which was the common practice of the time in Pennsylvania. He graduated at Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia, in the class of 1852. Nature as well as education made him a physician, and his success was assured from the beginning. For more than forty years he has ranked at the head of his profession in his community. With cool judgment and quick perception he unites large sympathy and an exceeding cheerful disposition. In the sick-room he at once commands the respect and secures the confidence of his patients. Perhaps he has obtained reputation and practice as much from his cheerful, sympathetic manner with patients as his superior skill in administering remedies. His physical endurance has been wonderful. For twenty-five years his professional field embraced an extent of territory that made his average day's riding about thirty miles, and his visiting-list immense. This was done in the saddle, and the older inhabitants well remember his celebrated horses "Bill" and "Charley," which were never seen with their rider, going up-hill or down, in any gait but a full gallop. He is one of the very few old-fashioned doctors who answer all calls, night or day, regardless of weather or roads, attending rich and poor alike.

He married Rebecca Ruth Brownfield, daughter of Col. Thomas Brownfield, of Georges township, Fayette Co., March 19, 1844. His domestic life has been most fortunate and happy. His wife has been a helpmeet in the grandest sense. Her husband's comfort and her children's happiness have been her greatest care, and to her wisely devotion he is largely indebted for the comforts of his home, the hospitable doors of which are ever open. It is proverbial that no house in the community entertains so many persons, friends and strangers, as Dr. Mathiot's. In politics the doctor has been a decided and positive Whig and Republican, an earnest advocate of the principles and measures of his party. He has twice been the candidate of his party for the State Legislature, but as the opposition had an overwhelming majority in the district, he was on both occasions defeated. He is an earnest and persuasive public speaker, and for a quarter of a century his voice has been heard in advocacy of every moral, temperance, and religious movement that has agitated the community in which he lives. Since 1851 he has been an active and consistent member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and has held most of its official positions. He was ordained a deacon by Bishop Morris in 1852, and was ordained an elder by Bishop Simpson in 1872, and consequently occupies the responsible position of a minister in his church. His services are much sought, especially by the poor, to officiate at funerals, as he regards it one of the crowning glories of the Christian dispensation that the gospel shall be preached to the poor.

He is possessed of a comfortable home, most desirably located, and sufficient means to render his old age secure from want. His family has consisted of ten children, five of whom are now living: Caroline, Charles H., Ida F., Edward B., and Perie A. Several of these evince excellent mechanical and artistic talent, in which the doctor takes a father's pride. The daughters are young ladies of careful mental discipline; Charles is engaged in the drug business in his native town; Edward is just graduated (March 30, 1882) from Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia, with every promise of success in his profession. Dr. Mathlott, like many of our self-made men, has been an assiduous reader and thoughtful student of the various subjects touching public interest and general culture, thus largely supplying the lack of a collegiate education. But few vocations in life furnish so many opportunities for usefulness and wide-spread personal influence as that open to an intelligent, Christian physician, imbued with public spirit and possessing a mind richly stored with the fruits of years of careful research. With unremittting energy and consecrations zeal the doctor has endeavored to discharge the manifold duties thus open to him, and is still, at the age of sixty-seven, an active man, earnestly engaged in the various occupations of his busy life.

REUBEN HAGUE.

Reuben Hague, of Smithfield, is of English stock, and was born April 16, 1809. Of his ancestors we have no special account save that they were Quakers; but his maternal grandfather was a farmer of some note, of whose history the legend has been preserved that he plowed in the forefront the field of Brandywine whereon the famous battle took place in the afternoon. Mr. Hague has resided in Fayette County sixty-five years. He was educated in the common schools, and is a bricklayer by trade, and has worked in all parts of Western Pennsylvania. When he started out in life for himself at eighteen years of age he had only a "quarter" and a "fippenny-bit" in his pocket, in all thirty-one cents. He helped lay up the first brick dwelling in Allegheny City. He was once a cavalry officer in the Virginia militia, and has served as a school director of his township for nearly twenty years. For over fifty years he has been a member of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, and has for a long time been an elder therein. He is a rigid temperance man, and has been a constant worker in the cause of temperance since he became twenty years of age. He never spent but three cents for whisky for his own use. He cannot be turned from his course by the taunts and jeers of wine-bibbers. Mr. Hague is the possessor of one of the best fruit-orchards in Fayette County. His property consists mainly of real estate. Whatever criticisms the liquor-loving portion of the community may indulge in over his extreme but consistent observance of abstinence from intoxicating beverages, his neighbors say no harmful words of him.

Feb. 14, 1836, Mr. Hague married Mary Swan, who died July 1st of the same year. Feb. 14, 1839, he married again, being united to Mary Lenley. Of this marriage there are six living children,—Samuel; Rebecca Ellen, who married William Booth; Emily; Frances; Jeffries; and Snyder. The second Mrs. Hague having died, Mr. Hague married a third time, Nov. 27, 1862, his wife's maiden name having been Jane Abraham. A son, James A., is the issue of this marriage.

WILLIAM H. TRADER.

William H. Trader, of Georges township, is a man of mark, distinctively of that honorable class called "self-made," having fought the battle of life to financial success by his own energy and skill. He was born in Maryland, near the line of Virginia, Jan. 15, 1818. When he was two years of age his father left Virginia and settled in Georges township. Mr. Trader never enjoyed opportunities of schooling. What he learned he picked up as he could. His summers were employed cultivating the home farm, his winters in threshing with a flail, until he became eighteen years of age, when he left his father, or "turned out," without money or education, to make his own way in life, first working for a farmer of his neighborhood.

In 1841 he married Charlotte Franks, of Nicholson township. By her he has ten children, all living,—three sons and seven daughters,—all of whom but one are married. Mr. Trader has held the office of school director and other important township offices. Both himself and his wife are members of the Baptist Church. He is a modest, unassuming man, and enjoys an excellent business and general reputation. He has lived upon his present farm thirty-five years, and has steadily worked on to fortune, accomplishing the purpose of his early life, and is now regarded wealthy, his estate being estimated by his neighbors at from sixty thousand dollars to seventy-five thousand dollars. About two hundred and fifty-seven acres of Mr. Trader's homestead farm are underlaid with the five-feet vein and the nine-feet vein, also, of Connellsville coking coal.

ROBERT BRITT.

Robert Britt, of Smithfield, is of Irish descent, and was born in Chester County, Pa., June 4, 1865, and removed from there with his father to Springhill Furnace, Fayette Co., in August, 1811. He received his education in the common schools. Mr. Britt is by occupation a carpenter. He spent two years working at his trade in Kentucky, and, following his vocation, passed eight years of his life in Virginia; the rest has been spent in Fayette County. He has resided in his present home for thirty-two years.

Dec. 11, 1831, he married Asenath Greenlee, a lady of Irish stock, whose mother was three years old only when brought to America. Of this union are three children,—Mary Emily, married to Benjamin Franklin Goodwin; Frances Elizabeth, wife of Albert S. Miller; and Frank P., who was educated in the common schools at Washington and Jefferson College, and the Allegheny Theological Seminary, and is now pastor of the Pisgah Presbyterian Church at Corsica, Jefferson Co., Pa. Mr. Britt and his wife have been members of the Presbyterian Church for more than a quarter of a century. In December, 1881, they celebrated their golden wedding. Mr. Britt has held the office of school director, and other responsible township offices. He has always been a Jefferson Democrat, and never swerved from his party.

JUSTUS DUNN.

Justus Dunn, of Georges township, is a prosperous farmer and stock-dealer, and was born in Erie City, June 8, 1817. He is the son of Simeon Dunn, of Irish stock, and who served in the war of 1812 as a "dispatcher," carrying orders or dispatches from Erie to Buffalo, N. Y. He bore the first news of Perry's victory to Buffalo.

Mr. Dunn began business life at the bottom of the financial scale, churning wood at twenty cents per cord when he first came to Fayette County; but he is now in good circumstances, and owns a valuable tract of land, which is well improved. He settled in his present location in 1844. He has been treasurer of Fayette County for two years and eight months. On May 26, 1852, he married Mary A. Zearly, of Nicholson township, by whom he has had eleven children, four of whom are married and have left the homestead, seven remaining at home. The Dunn family is hardy and long-lived. Mr. Dunn has an uncle who is ninety-eight years of age, and was married for the second time when he was ninety-four. An aunt of his died a few years ago aged over one hundred years.

Mr. Dunn is a good business man, and commands the respect of his neighbors and all others with whom he deals.

COL. JAMES ROBINSON.

Col. James Robinson, of Oliphant Furnace, represents the Scotch-Irish Presbyterian stock. His grandfather settled in 1780, in what was then Georges township, now Nicholson, upon a farm which remained in the Robinson name for ninety-nine years. James Robinson was born Nov. 27, 1806. He was educated in the common schools, and spent over twenty years of his early manhood in the iron business with P. Hughes Oliphant, at Springhill and Fairchance Furnaces. The greater part of this time he was superintendent, as which he was not only successful, but by his unassuming yet potent influence obtained and held the respect and good will of all in his employ. In all business transactions he is a man of the most strict integrity. He obtained his military title by election to the position of colonel in the State militia, receiving his commission from Governor Wolf during the latter's first term in the gubernatorial chair. Jan. 27, 1857, he married Mrs. Catharine Saams, of Allegheny County, who died Sept. 3, 1863, leaving three children,—Margaret Ann, John Taylor, and Emma Caroline. The colonel was again married Feb. 13, 1868, to Miss Lavinia P. Caldwell, of St. Joseph, Mo., and has no living children by his second wife. He was elected director of the first railroad built from Connellsville to Uniontown, now owned by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company (and in which he is yet a stockholder). He was also elected a director of the National Bank of Fayette County at its organization, and held position as such for a number of years, and was elected director of the People's Bank of Fayette County, which position he still holds. Coal lands, railroad and bank stock, and United States bonds constitute his chief possessions.

Col. Robinson is an energetic man, of few words, pleasant and unobtrusive in manner, of a kind, benevolent spirit, especially to the worthy poor, greatly attached to home and fireside, and walks blameless before, and is popular with, his neighbors. Withal, a true gentleman of the old school.

GERMAN TOWNSHIP.

The township of German occupies a position south of a line drawn east and west through the centre of the county. It is bounded north by Luzerne and Menallen, east by South Union and Georges, south by Nicholson, west by the Monongahela River. There are no mountains nor any considerable elevations in it. The township is well watered, but has no large streams except the Monongahela, its western boundary. Its principal creeks are Brown's, Middle, and Deep, all flowing west and falling into the river. The controlling topographical feature is a series of hills or ridges crossing it from east to west. When viewed from a higher elevation, they resemble a plain covered with a multitude of cones, some large, some small.
In the northwest of the township a considerable number of those mounds exist which have so long engaged the attention of travelers and philosophers, and of which Mr. Jefferson speaks in his "Notes on Virginia." Their shape has been so often described that a repetition seems altogether superfluous. Many bits of pottery, stone implements of various kinds, pipes, and remains can be found after plowing or hard rains. Along the Monongahela are rocks, upon which are cut strange hieroglyphics. Others are indented with footprints of birds and animals, said to have been done when these rocks were in the plastic state. Just south of Middle Run several rocks may be seen when the water is low, upon which a great many figures could plainly be seen until recently. Of the indentations the rocks below Geneva are full and perfectly formed. These are out of water during most of the year, and are visited by many lovers of the mysterious.

German is one of the nine original townships into which the county was divided by the first court held at Uniontown, Dec. 27, 1783. The following boundaries were ordered by the court: "A township beginning at Oliver Crawford's ferry; thence up the Monongahela River to the mouth of Jacob's Creek; thence up said creek to the head branch thereof, where Michael Franks, Sr., lives; thence to John Wait's; from thence to Frederick Walter's; thence to pass between James Downer's and George Watson's, to include the three first-mentioned persons, to the head of the west branch of Jennings' Run; thence by a straight line to the head of the Burnt Cabin branch of Dunlap's Creek; thence down the same and the creek to the road that leads from Uniontown to Oliver Crawford's ferry; thence by said road to the beginning."

The township was settled largely by Germans, hence the name given to it on its erection by the court. Although at first a part of Springhill, its early settlers were altogether different in customs and language from those of the former. According to Withers, "Several families had settled on the Monongahela, in what was once a part of German, as early as 1767. Among these were John W. Provance, Joseph G. Provance, and John Hardin,"—a name famous in Kentucky. Frederick Walter is said to have been a very early comer also, but undoubtedly not so early as 1754, at which time he was scarcely three years old. He died Dec. 21, 1834, aged eighty-two years and three months. The oldest land titles are those of Provance's, Gilmore's, and Rabb's, viz.: John W. Provance, warrant dated Oct. 11, 1771; surveyed March 10, 1772; number of acres, 347. Joseph Yard Provance, warrant dated Oct. 11, 1771; number of acres, 366; surveyed March 11, 1772. An-

1 By partition the township is much less in area than when organized. In 1823 a large portion was annexed to Luzerne, and again in 1843 to form Nicholson. In both instances German lost some of the most productive territory in the county, in addition to a loss in wealth and population.

William McClelland kept in what is now McClellandtown for many years, as did also Frederick Stumle. David Schroyer, Zachariah Wheat, Aaron Maple, James Sangston, John Grove in Germantown. Sangston entertained travelers and sold whisky for the long period of forty years. Messrs. Balsingers owned the stand near where now stands Balsinger's schoolhouse, between McClellandtown and Uninontown. David Auld's is now the residence of Mrs. Catharine Hoover, on the Uninontown and Little Whitey Creek road, south of Rabb's mill.

The only highways known to the primal inhabitants were the cardinal points of the compass. The geometrical roads were unobstructed by anything of which they knew, and the traveler pursued the course he desired to without asking. The earliest road ordered by the court to pass through German was the one from Uninontown to Rabb's mill, on Brown's Run; from thence to the Monongahela River, at the mouth of said run. The following is the order, dated 4th Tuesday of December, 1788:

"On the petition of divers inhabitants of the County of Fayette, representing to the Court the great inconveniences they labor under for want of a road from Uninontown to Andrew Rabb's Mill upon Brown's Run, and from thence to the Monongahela River at the mouth of said Run, and praying that the Court would appoint six suitable men to view the ground over which the said road is desired to pass, therefore considered and ordered that Robert Harrison, John Hoffman, Andrew Rabb, Esq., Jacob Rich, John Mevorsor, and Daniel Culp do view the ground over which the said road is desired to pass, and if they, or any four of them, see it necessary, that they lay out a road the nearest and best way the ground will admit of, and make report of their proceedings therein by course and distance to the next Court."

At the same court an order was issued for laying out a road to connect with Hyde's Ferry road, Mr. Veech, in writing of this road, says, "It came from the Ten-Mile settlement through Greene County, crossing the creek at Hyde's Ferry or the mouth of Big Whitely Creek, passing by the south side of Masontown through Haydentown, or by David John's Mill, up Laurel Hill, through Sandy Creek settlement, to Daniel McPeak's and into Virginia." The road from John Gilliland's to Rabb's mill was ordered to be laid out at September sessions, 1788, and Abraham Stewart, John Allison, John Work, Hugh Gilmore, Andrew Rabb, and John Gallaher appointed viewers. This road is the one known as the McClellandtown road at this day. Mr. Abraham Stewart, appointed one of the viewers, was very greatly interested in this road, as it crossed his farm from east to west, he residing at that time and owning the farm now in possession of James Parshall, just out of McClellandtown to the east. The road from Germantown to the mouth of Catt's Run was also ordered, and Andrew Long, James Thompson, William Rabb, James Wilson, Andrew Work, and John Leckey appointed viewers. There are now ninety miles of road in the township, according to the survey of the supervisors. "The Luzerne Road Law" was extended by the State Legislature so as to apply to German in 1871-72.

There are no macadamized roads nor railroads in the township. The "big roads" are used by all classes for reaching markets or traveling. The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad had a route surveyed by Jonathan Knight nearly fifty years ago, down the main branch of Brown's Run to a point on the Monongahela River opposite the mouth of Little Whitley Creek, in Greene County. Short-sighted people and politicians refused the right of way, and forced the road through the wilds of West Virginia. Upon a vote taken for and against granting the right of way through Fayette County there were but two votes in favor of it cast in German (cast by Jacob Newcomer and John Haney). Two other routes have been surveyed in the past few years, viz., the Unitiontown and Catt's Run, and Pittsburgh, Virginia and Charleston Railroads.

The Monongahela has been the great natural outlet for the Western country from a very early date, and since the era of steamboats and slack-water navigation has become still more important. Three ferries connect German with Greene County,—Brown's, at Middle Run; McCaunn's, at or near Little Whitley Creek; and McLain's, west of Masontown.

The earliest saw- and grist-mills were built by Messrs. Gilmore, Work, and Rabb. They were taxed on this class of property as early as 1785, but had been engaged in distilling several years previous. Their whisky, "Monongahela, Pure Rye," had even gained for itself lasting fame. The flour made at their mills was of two kinds, wheat and rye. The practice of eating rye bread prevailed until within the last few years, and does even yet in some localities. There was no home market for flour, and to reach the New Orleans market (the only paying one) caused Rabb to engage in keel-boat building in connection with others. The boats were annually loaded with whisky and flour and sent down the Ohio and Mississippi. The early mills were generally upon creeks, but after a few years several were built upon the river, and to distinguish them from those upon the creeks were denominated "river mills." This class of mills have been superseded by steam-mills, except far up the Monongahela and on its Virginia tributaries.

The first to apply steam motive-power to mills was the venerable John Debolt, who still lives to see the wonderful progress of the age. The engine cost $900 in Brownsville, and was bought of Cuthbertson & Roe, in 1833. Flour, except for home consumption, is no longer made by the country mills. For the purpose of supplying the people of the township with flour the following-named persons have mills: Jacob Johnson, on Middle Run, steam-mill, with saw attached; Joseph Mack, on Brown's Run, steam-mill, saw attached; Joseph Galley, on Brown's Run, water-mill, saw attached; Gilmore Brothers, on Brown's Run, water-mill, saw-mill attached. The ruins of old mills and still-houses are found in many localities. Of saw-mills there are in the township those of John D. Rider, Brown's Run, water-power; Isaac N. Hague, portable, Catt's Run; Ephraim Sterling, saw- and planing-mill on Monongahela River, do considerable business. On Catt's Run John Mason had a mill built at an early day. He sold to Simon Yandes. The Yandes built a still-house, and in turn sold to David Johnson, better known as "Davy Yawns, or Yonts." He added an oil- and carding-mill. Nothing remains but the crushers of the oil-mill.

A Mr. Grool started a tannery in Germantown, at or near the beginning of the present century. For many years an excellent quality of leather was manufactured. The yard passing through many hands has finally become the property of Josiah S. Allebaugh. A Mr. John McKeen, of McClellandtown, also manufactured some forty years ago. The only person engaged in the business now is Mr. Leonard Sapper, and he only in a small way.

John Debolt started a pottery in Masontown in 1823. The ware made was of an inferior quality in comparison with that made now, but answered every purpose in its day. Salt was made by the "Silver Oil Company" at their works east of Masontown in 1866-69, but bad management or other causes ruined the enterprise. The year 1851 has found German where it started in manufacturing whisky first. Dunlevy, Rabb's distiller, succeeded in getting a yield of two and three-eightths gallons per bushel, and refused to impart his secret. This made Rabb a fortune. At one time twenty-seven stills were running in German. The mash was from three to twenty-five bushels, or according to the capacity of the still or wealth of distiller. Sylvanus T. Gray, the only manufacturer in German, now produces daily more than all these old distillers combined. His works are on Catt's Run. In conversation with the proprietor, in presence of United States officials, he said, "The yearly consumption of grain was thirty thousand bushels;" average yield per bushel, three and one-half gallons. According to the above data, there are produced per year 105,000 gallons, amounting to $141,750.

A new enterprise is being developed in German. Mr. Enoch F. Brown has erected the necessary works for the manufacture of cement on his premises near the mouth of Brown's Run. The first kiln burnt was drawn July 16, 1879, and the enterprise promises success.

Many years back in the history of Fayette County a Mr. Baker manufactured guns, making all the different parts from the raw material. His shop and premises are now in possession of Philip Kefover's heirs in Nicholson township, formerly German.

HISTORY OF FAYETTE COUNTY, PENNSYLVANIA.

Margaret Catharine, in her son settlers and pioneer tellers, between the extreme chases his age, was present representative "Walters ago. Mary of and her reunion 1802 apprenticeship unraveled, Alonongahela River, and north of Jacob's Creek; in the central part, Waltzers, Messmores, Rabs, and Antils, on the waters of Brown's Run; in the extreme northwest were the McKibbins, Moores, Crawford's, Sprotes, and a few families of less note. These pioneer citizens of original German were nearly all included in the portions annexed to Luzerne in 1820 and 1821, and still later by the act organizing Nicholson township in 1845. The few remaining of the first settlers were the Moores, Rabs, and Gilmores, after the partitions mentioned. The tide of emigration was almost entirely checked by the Indian troubles between 1774 and 1780, and it was not until 1789 that it again set in. In 1783 one hundred and seventy-eight taxables were returned by the assessor. Of this very great number a few have risen to a prominence which entitles them to notice, viz.: the Wilsons, Hostetlers, Kendalls, Franks, Messmores, Riffles, Sprotes, and Eberlies (now written Everly).

The Franks (or Frankes now) were of French origin. The Frank mentioned (Jacob) was born in 1743. He came to Baltimore, Md., when eighteen years of age, with his father, Michael Frank, Sr. After serving his apprenticeship he married a Miss Barbara Brandeberry, emigrated to Western Pennsylvania, and purchased a large tract of land near High House village, which is called "Frankston." He was prominent in organizing the "Old Dutch Church" in 1785 and 1793. In 1802 he died, leaving a large family. The descendants are scattered over the Western States, and a large branch in West Virginia. The most prominent representative of the family in Fayette County is the present honest and efficient treasurer, Michael Franks, formerly of Nicholson township, but now of Uniontown. In Ohio they have a regular family convention or reunion annually in August.

Of the early life of Nicholas Hostetler little is known except that he was of German descent. He and his descendants were and are hard-working men and women, and embrace many of the best citizens of German township. In addition to their love of hard labor, their fondness for music is characteristic. The celebrated Hostetler blind family are descendants of Nicholas, and children of Daniel Hostetler and Mary Gibbons, who were married nearly sixty years ago. There was nothing unusual in their marriage, except their being first cousins. Their future was as yet unraveled, and time brought them eight children,—five girls and three boys. Of these, two boys and a girl were born absolutely eyeless, and a boy and a girl with but one eye each. Nature, to compensate for her parsimoniousness in withholding sight, gave great musical talents, and from tender infancy these afflicted ones have been the wonder of the land. They are first-class composers as well as excellent performers on the organ, violin, and other instruments. Their names are John, born Jan. 23, 1829; Catharine, Feb. 15, 1835; Bartholomew, April 21, 1845 (these three were born eyeless); Samuel, born Nov. 12, 1842, was born with one eye, but he has since become totally blind.

James Wilson was born in Lancaster County, Pa., 1764, and came to Fayette County when twelve years of age. He was married twice, his first wife being a Miss Mary Rabb, born 1777; the second Miss Elizabeth Lowrie, or Lowry. He was a large landholder, living upon his estate near McClellandtown, on the Morgan-town and Brownsville road, until the day of his death. The family he had by his two wives are many of them living, some in their native township, German, some in Indiana, and other western States. James Wilson was one of the early justices of German, succeeding his father-in-law, Andrew Rabb. He served from 1807 till near 1840, when he became paralyzed. He was unable to articulate for nearly four years before his death. Several of his first wife's children—Dr. William Wilson, Andrew Wilson, and Sarah Yandels—reside in Indiana. John Wilson, Esq., of German, is a son by the second marriage. He has served as justice of the peace, and is one of the most upright and useful citizens of the township. Mrs. Eleazer Robinson, of Uniontown, is also a daughter of James Wilson. Rev. Alexander Wilson and Dr. William L. S. Wilson, of Washington County, are grandsons.

John Messmore was a Swiss by birth, but emigrated to the British colonies at an early day. During the war for independence he was a teamsman in the Continental army under Washington. After the time of his service had expired he came West, not with the intention of remaining, but meeting many Germans here he was induced to stay. He raised a large family of children, many of whom became in later years useful and solid citizens. Squire George Messmore, born in 1791, was an honored citizen of German township. He served one term as justice while residing where Joseph Mack now does on Brown's Run. He then sold and moved to the State of Ohio, and located in Wayne County, where he continued to reside until his death, March 28, 1878. His son is now sheriff of the county in which his father died. From the same forefather is ex-Sheriff Isaac Messmore, of Uniontown. He was elected from Luzerne, but was born and reared in German township. He removed to Luzerne in 1854. Ex-Justice of the Peace John Messmore, also of Uniontown, is his brother. While a citizen of German he was twice elected justice of the peace.

Joseph Sprote was an old Revolutionary soldier, entering the service at the age of seventeen, as he said, "without much reflection, but afterwards repented at leisure." He resided southwest of New Salem until the year of his decease. His daughter Ann married Asbury Struble, Esq., of German; Margaret married a Mr. Thompson; another married Mr. John Huston, of Greene County. Joseph S. Struble and Mrs. Sarah J. Hellen, of Uniomont, are grandchildren of Joseph Sprote.

Jacob Eberly, or Everly, was an honest Dutchman, very piously inclined. He was a consistent member of the "Dutch Church" in German township, the patron for the glebe having been granted to him and others.

Jacob Riffle was a quiet, peaceable man. His talents were not showy but solid. His house was the polling-place where three townships met for many years. His descendants have inherited his estate, with much of his character. They are honest, hard-working, and economical, and several of them have filled township offices with credit to themselves.

Daniel Yandes, Jr., was a son of Daniel Yandes, who owned the property of the late Nicholas Johnson, and called by John Mason "East Abington." Daniel Yandes, Jr., married Sarah Wilson, a daughter of James Wilson, Esq. He sold his farm to David Johnson (known to Fayette County people as "Davy Yawnee") and moved to Indiana, near Indianapolis, in 1823. He became very wealthy, and during the Kansas-Nebraska excitement organized a company in the interest of the Free State party. The Yandes are now prominent citizens of Indiana.

Jeremiah Kendall, a justice of the peace for German township, was a son of William Kendall, who emigrated to Fanquier County, Va., from England. Young Kendall was Washington's secretary during the Revolutionary war, and received a wound at the Brandywine battle. After the war he married a Miss Rhoda McIntyre and came to Fayette County. He moved into a house belonging to Hugh Gilmore, the elder, north of Middle Run. After a short time he had elapsed he purchased a large tract of land on Brown's Run, southeast of where McClellandtown now stands. He engaged in agriculture and distilling, in which he succeeded financially. He left a large family of children to inherit his estate. Jeremiah, Jr., took the home-place, and at his death left it to his sons and daughters. Isaac P. and John C. Kendall own the homestead, and are the only descendants of the male line in German. Mrs. Jane Deffenbaugh, Mrs. Rhoda Reppert, and Mrs. Jacob Dawson are granddaughters. The oldest son of Jeremiah Kendall, Sr., emigrated to Ohio about 1829. The "White Sewing-Machine Company," of Cleveland, Ohio, is largely owned by members of this branch of his descendants.

Hon. David Gilmore was born near the Monongahela River, in German township, in 1786. He was a representative in the State Legislature and a member of the convention to amend the State Constitution in 1838. In the war of 1812 he was a member of Capt. James A. Abrams' company, and saw hard service in the Northwest under Harrison. His brother Hugh was a lieutenant in the same company. He died April 30, 1847.

The Hon. Andrew Stewart was born near McClellandtown, in German township, in 1791. His life and public services are of national fame. He died near Uniomont, July 16, 1872.

Hon. Henry Clay Dean was born in McClellandtown, Oct. 27, 1822; attended Madison College; clerked for George Hogg, Esq., of Brownsville; taught school, and finally entered the law-office of Hon. Andrew Stewart; was chaplain of the United States Senate in 1855-56, and candidate for elector on the Stephen A. Douglas ticket in 1860. He refuses all office, and says he "considers office-seekers the most detestable spaniels that lick the dust from the feet of power." He lives in Missouri, on a farm of eighteen hundred acres on Charlton River. When not engaged in the courts he employs his time in studying philosophy, history, and literature; admitted to the bar of Fayette County Sept. 11, 1863.

Capt. Cyrus L. Conner, born in 1825, was a soldier of the Mexican war. He was captain of a company in the Pennsylvania Reserves in the civil war of 1861-65; promoted to major and served in Georgia. Died in Masontown, April 5, 1877.

William Parshall, Esq., was born near McClellandtown, Sept. 21, 1822; studied law with Hon. Joshua B. Howell; was educated at Rector, Va., and Washington, Pa.

Seth Ely and George W. Rutter, noted musicians and composers, were both of German township.

Ashbel Fairchild Hill was born near Masontown, Oct. 23, 1842. He was a member of Capt. Conner's company, and lost a limb in the war. During his soldiering he wrote "Our Boys." This was followed by "White Rocks," "Secrets of the Sanctum," and several romances for literary papers. He died at the close of the Presidential contest, Nov. 7, 1876.

Capt. George W. Gilmore was born June 9, 1832. He was a prominent actor during the Kansas troubles,—an aid to Gen. James Lane. He raised a company in Fayette County, and was mustered into the Virginia service at Clarkshurg in July, 1861. He resides in Dade County, Mo.

Daniel Yandes was born and raised on the John Mason "East Abington tract," near Masontown. He emigrated to Indiana. His mother was a Rider. He married a half-sister to John Wilson, Esq., and Mrs. Eleaser Robinson, of Uniomont. During the Kansas troubles he acted a conspicuous part on the Free State side.

In the Whiskey Insurrection, after the people had been misled by their leaders, they raised "liberty poles," and proceeded to organize companies for the purpose of forcing the general government to repeal the act of 1791, which imposed a tax on whiskey. The government having raised an army of fifteen thousand men, sent them into the western part of Pennsylvania, where the Whiskey Boys had some seven thousand ill-disciplined men to oppose them. Before this show of force the Whiskey Boys dispersed without firing a gun. Detachments were sent out to arrest prominent offenders, but generally failed. German had furnished a company of one hundred men under the command of Capt. Robert Ross. A squad of cavalry from Union-town attempted to capture him, but were not successful.

PHYSICIANS.

Tradition furnishes no clue by which the historian can discover who was the first regular physician to practice the healing art in this section. Indian root and herb doctors were found in almost every family. In 1809, Dr. Joseph Ross was a regular practitioner, having located in Gernantown some time previous.

His brothers, C. J. and James, were also physicians, having considerable practice in the neighborhood of McClelland-town. Dr. Lewis Switzer followed them in 1822, and Dr. David Rhoads in 1825; he had a very large practice, dysentery and putrid sore throat prevailing for a number of years. For several years Dr. John Wilson was in partnership with him. In 1835, Dr. John J. Steel located in Mason-town, and soon after Dr. John Fithian. Dr. — Bloomino was also practicing near McClelland-town, while Drs. Merchant and Campbell, of Union-town, were called frequently in the northern part of the township. The famous Dr. Braddock was often consulted between 1823 and 1830. About 1838—39, Dr. Rhoads took into partnership Dr. George W. Neff, of Union-town, who was highly recommended by Dr. Hugh Campbell. Neff is said to have been the first dentist in Fayette County, having practiced in Union-town nearly fifty years ago. Dr. Rhoads dying in 1841, Neff took his practice, which he kept as long as his health remained.

In 1843, Dr. Jesse E. Penny settled in McClelland-town, where he resided for several years. Dr. George Ringland bought him out, and in turn sold to Dr. Casper M. Miller, who, in 1870, sold his property to Dr. H. W. Brashier, and in 1880 was succeeded by Dr. James P. Sangston, who graduated in 1868 at the Charity Hospital Medical College, Cleveland, Ohio, now the Medical Department of the University of Wooster.

In Mason-town, in 1848, Dr. N. W. Traxal (now of Brownsville) had a large practice. Near the same place Drs. Charles Myers and Finrock lived and practiced in 1850.

SCHOOLS.

The ruins of many old cabins used in the past as school-houses are still to be seen. Among these were Mason’s school-house in Masonborough; one on the East or Bullit tract, now in Nicholson; later, one on Provance’s Flats; one near the Seceders’ Church, now near the line of Luzerne; one near Rabb’s mill, now Hoover’s; one on Middle Run, to the right going towards the river on Brown’s land; one near High House; one on the German Lutheran and German Reformed Lutheran glebe; one near the cross-roads on the Newcomer lands; one on the farm now owned by John Riley, near cross-roads; one near Dunlap’s Creek, and one or two in the northeast corner of the township. In these huts taught John Knox McGee, Jacob Isb, Samuel Taggart, John Hickenlooper, Thomas Green, Fred Frazer, James Anderson, Joseph Deffenbaugh, Amos Gray, James T. Redburn, Moses A. Ross, John Atkinson, and many others; in the past fifty years, Bridget Hayney, John G. Farmer, John G. Hertig, Henry Jennings, and others. The introduction of the free school system inaugurated a new era in the schools.

At January sessions, 1835, the court appointed Jeremiah Kendall, Jr., and Elisha Langhead school directors of German township. The new system met with great opposition, and several years elapsed before its benefits were seen or appreciated.

The rich opposed being taxed for the purpose of helping to school the children of the poor. The real objection was their objection to schools in general at all. By statute they had been taxed by the county for the same purpose before the passage of the law or act complained of. The township was districted and suitable school-houses erected prior to 1837.

Following are extracts from the county records referring to schools in German:

Order of John Hickenlooper, of German, for teaching poor children, dated Jan. 4, 1812, and

September 24, 1813, to same for same. 28.78

June 23, 1813, to same for same. 16.12

January 13, 1813, to Samuel Taggart for same. 4.64

In 1838 the system had made considerable progress, and Nathaniel Darrall, John Ross, Jesse Antram, David Jennings, Isaac Core, and Richard Poundstone were the directors, and all advocates of the system. Its progress from year to year has been good since that time.

The following is a list of school directors of German township from 1810 to the present time:

1841, Samuel Winners, John Mosier.
1842, John Poundstone, Henry Jennings.
1843, Philip Poundstone, Ellis Freeman.
1844, Samuel Winners, George Vance.
1845, Thomas Conner, William B. Atten.
In 1792 the meeting-house, a log building, was erected by John R. Miller, Lawrence Straeter, Joseph D. Grover, John H. Moore, John D. Miller, John H. Brown, and Michael H. Dearth, the latter of whom was the builder. This log meeting-house was used by the Methodists for nearly a century, and was known as the "Dutch Church." The present meeting house of the church was erected in 1846, and is a brick building.

The patent for the log meeting-house was made in 1836 to Michael Frank, Nicholas Pock, John Mason, John Hartman, and Joseph Yeager. In 1846 the old log meeting-house was replaced by a brick house, the one in use at present. The congregation are about remodeling or erecting a new house. Upon the grounds attached Rev. W. O. Wilson and the church council succeeded in having a cemetery chartered, but not without great opposition. During the time in which the minutes of this church were recorded in German twelve hundred baptisms were performed.

Since the organization in 1793 the following ministers have been in charge: From 1793 to 1806, Rev. John Stough (born in York County, Pa., 1762; died in Crawford County, Ohio, July 25, 1845). Rev. Redman, Rev. Ravenock, Rev. Henry Wiegand, Rev. Charles Koebler, Rev. John Brown, Rev. Abraham Wellis; from 1852 till 1865, Rev. Jacob K. Melhorn (now of Allegheny County, Pa.); 1866 to April, 1873, Rev. Henry Acher; April 23, 1873, to 1881, Rev. William Orris Wilson, of West Chester, Pa. He was educated at Ceylon Grove and other schools. The present membership (1881) of this church is two hundred and forty-five.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

From the most authentic sources it is found that the following-named individuals were the founders of the Methodist Church in German, namely, Andrew Long, Caleb Hanna, and Alexander McDougle, who, in the year 1819, began preparations for building a church. In 1820, in June, the house was nearly completed, when, on the night of the 11th, it was almost entirely ruined by one of the most violent storms that has ever visited this section of the country. It was, however, finished and used until 1833, when, the walls having crumbled, the congregation took measures to rebuild it.

In 1876, when the court erected Masontown a borough, this house was included in the town. Being built by persons of every shade of belief, it has been the bone of contention in many a strife. The most liberal subscribers to the building fund were Ephraim Woodruff and his wife Frances, Miss Rainey Chenowith, Solomon Altman and his mother. A host of worthy ministers have labored here, but to enumerate would occupy more space than can be allotted the subject. The first to preach the Wesleyan doctrine in this new field was Rev. Wesley Webster, an Englishman, in 1818. Then came Revs. Batty and Pool. But the most noted was the eloquent H. B. Bascom. There was connected with this church for nearly a century an individual by the name of Solomon Altman, licensed in Pittsburgh in 1825 as a local preacher, who was eminent for his industry and benevolence. He died near Weston, W. Va., in 1846. The present (1881) minister in charge is the Rev. H. D. McGrew. The present membership is forty-five, — males, twenty-one; females, twenty-four.

The lot on which the Methodist Church stands, as well as the cemetery attached, was purchased from Caleb Hanna.
REGULAR BAPTIST CHURCH.

By an order of the Redstone Association a church was organized near McClellandtown in 1828. The ministers appointed for the work were Revs. William Brownfield and Francis Downey. The church officers were: Deacons, Elias Parshall, Sr., Erasmus Alton; Clerk, John Grove. Following is a list of the ministers in charge of this church from organization till the year of its dissolution: Revs. William Brownfield, Francis Downey, James Seymore, William Woods, Sr., James McCoboy (not certain), Garret Patton, Thomas Rose, in 1851, when the congregation dissolved. The church grounds were donated by Elias Parshall, who, with Erasmus Alton, contributed mainly to its support during the period of its existence.

PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

Presbyterianism was not introduced into German until after the Scotch-Irish element began settling here. The members who resided in it were visited by ministers from more fortunate regions at regular periods. The best known of these missionaries were the Rev. Crittlebaugh and Rev. George Van Enem.

"At a meeting of the Redstone Presbytery an order was granted for the organization of a church in German township. The ministers appointed for carrying the order into effect were Mr. Wm. Johnson, Ashbel G. Fairchild, and Samuel Wilson. On the 23d day of November, 1839, the Rev. committee convened at the Baptist Church on Church Hill, west of and near to McClellandtown, for the purpose of executing the order of the Presbytery. After a sermon by the Rev. Ashbel G. Fairchild, Rev. Samuel Wilson presiding, they proceeded to organize a church. Thomas Wilson, Samuel Gettys, William Grove, Joseph Defenbaugh, and Elisha Langhead were ordained elders. In the year 1843 they erected a brick church, which has been their regular place of worship since (except when being remodeled a few years ago on account of its having been damaged by fire).

From the organization of the church to the present time the following-named preachers have had the congregation in charge, viz.: Rev. Samuel Wilson, Rev. James P. Fulton, Rev. S. S. Bergen. Membership in 1881, fifty.

CUMBERLAND PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

About the year 1839, Revs. Bird and Morgan were sent out by the Cumberland Presbytery as missionaries to preach the new faith. Their success at Masontown induced the Presbytery to select and send "Revs. Abraham Shearer, Isaac Hague, and Daniel A. Murdock to organize a church. These ministers began their labors in the spring of 1840. Having gained twenty-nine members in a very short time, they founded the Cumberland Presbyterian Church of Masontown, July 23, 1840." The Methodists kindly permitted the new sect to occupy their building until they should feel themselves able to build one of their own, which they did in 1852. Their trustees—Samuel Winders, John Henry Bowman, and Jacob Newcomer—purchased a piece of ground of John Ross, west of Masontown, upon which they erected a brick church. On the 7th day of May, 1852, they received the deed for their property.

The following-named ministers have been in charge of this church since its organization, viz.; Rev. Andrew G. Osburn, 1842 to 1853; Rev. John T. A. Henderson, 1853 to 1854; Rev. William Hanna, 1854 to 1858; Rev. Andrew G. Osburn, 1858 to 1863; Rev. James P. Baird, 1863 to 1865; Rev. Jesse Adams, 1865 to 1867; Rev. Ellis E. Bailey, 1867 to 1871; Rev. John S. Gibson, 1871 to the present time. The membership Jan. 1, 1880, as given by Josiah S. Allebaugh, Esq., was one hundred and eighty-three—males, sixty-seven; females, one hundred and sixteen.

MENNONITE CHURCH.

The followers of the teaching of Menno Simon constituted a very great portion of the early inhabitants of German, but they were without any churches for many years after settling. For religious exercises they met at certain of the brethren's residences till about the year 1799, when they built a log church near the road leading from Uniontown to Masontown, via High House, on lands now owned by John Riley. It was used both as church and school-house for many years. In it they taught and taught Peter Longanecker, one of the great lights in those days. The Revs. Jacob Newcomer and Joseph Bixler were contemporary. The first house having gone to decay, the congregation in 1838 built another on lands of Nicholas Johnson, which was known as the "Dogwood Church." In 1870 dissensions in the church caused considerable trouble, and ended by Nicholas Johnson, deceased, donating ground for a site for a new house as well as furnishing the necessary funds for building it. In 1871 their present house (brick) was dedicated. It is located east of Masontown, on the Smithfield road.

DISCIPLES' CHURCH.

The pioneer of this denomination in German was Elder J. D. Benedict, who, in the fall of 1875, held a meeting in McClellandtown. He was followed by Elder M. L. Streator in January, 1874, and in May following fifteen persons professed religion. On the 20th day of July, 1874, the first organization of this sect took place by the election and confirmation of the following persons as church officers, viz.: James W. French, Sr., and Clark B. Scott, elders; Melanchon J. Crow, Elias Parshall, and James W. French, Jr., deacons. The total membership at that time was twenty-nine. In the spring of 1876 nearly the entire congregation emigrated West and South, and at present not more than five or six members remain.
BURIAL-GROUNDS.

The following is a list of cemeteries and burial-places in German township, designating them by the names by which they are commonly known, and indicating their location in different parts of the township, viz.:

Lutheran (chartered), on the globe attached to Lutheran Church, in Southeast German. Dedicated Oct. 1, 1879.

There are numerous family and private burial-places located on farms in different parts of the township. These are chiefly old grounds, many of them in disuse. Some of them are fenced, and others lying common with the lands of the farms on which they are located. Among these are the following:

One near old Mennonite Church and school-house lot on John Riley's farm.

Kendall, on Jonathan Galley's farm. Longanecker, on Louch's farm. Harrison, on John Sterling's farm. Gilmore, on Ephraim Sterling's farm.

Bowman's, on Jonathan Sterling's farm. Gilliland (2), on John Coffman's farm. Messmore, on George Haught's farm. Newcomer, on Newcomer heirs' farm.

Bixler, on David Johnson's farm. Ross, on Asbury Struble's farm. Coldren, on William Schroyer's farm. Hostetler, on John Coffman's farm. Unknown, on William Coffman's farm. Mason, on Mason Borough farm.

There are three other burial-grounds on lands belonging to Poundstone and others, not well cared for.

MASON TOWN BOROUGH.

Masontown, formerly Germantown, was laid out by John Mason on a tract of land called East Abington. By deed dated the 29th of May, 1780, he conveyed to the inhabitants the streets and alleys, with the usual privileges and franchises conveyed in town charters.

For picturesqueness of location that of Masontown is unsurpassed. It is just far enough removed from the mountains to give to them that dark steel blue color which "lends enchantment to the view." The town, although built upon a hill, is surrounded by a higher chain of hills, except upon the west, or side next to the Monongahela River, from which it is distant one and one-half miles. The distance from the county-seat by the shortest route is ten miles. A daily mail to and from Uniontown puts the town in communication with more important places. There are some seventy dwellings in the town, many of which are large and of modern architecture. Population, four hundred.

The following branches of industry are to be found here: three chair-factories, four wagon- and buggy-shops, two saddle- and harness-shops, three smith-shops, tin-shop, tannery, one cabinet-maker, a large flouring-mill, four stores, two milliner-shops, two eating-houses, two undertakers, post-office, large school building, two churches; one physician, Dr. George W. Neff, who is a graduate of Philadelphia Medical College, March 12, 1870.

At March sessions, 1870, the court granted the town the rights and privileges of a borough. The executive officers from that period to the present are and have been the following-named persons:

SOCIETIES AND ORDERS.

Colfax Lodge, No. 565, Independent Order of Odd-Fellows.—Organized May 18, 1869.

Valley Lodge, A. Y. M., No. 439.—Organized Dec. 27, 1869. Andrew Long was the first Mason known in German township.

Grange Society, No. 413.—Organized Dec. 15, 1874. In 1801, John Mason and Apalonia, his wife, deeded to the citizens of Germantown "A house and lot on Water Street for school purposes," enumerating the objects intended, viz.: "An education—German and English—in the Arts and Sciences, Morality and Religion." The trustees were Lawrence Rider, Solomon Overthur. This is the first provision made for the purpose of establishing a system of public instruction in Masontown.

Some historical incidents connected with the history of Masontown are worthy of narration. "Fort Mason" was just below or east of the town, to the north of the spring in the field now belonging to Messrs. Gray. It was built by John Mason near 1750, and was resorted to for safety by the early settlers during the Indian troubles. It was threatened with destruction by the Tories and Indians, but was warned by Mr. Carmichael, founder of Carmichael's, Greene Co., in time to prepare for the enemy, which when they perceived they passed by and attempted to capture Fort Bard. In 1823 it was given by Ephraim Walter to Mr. John Debolt, his son-in-law, who had it removed and re-erected on the Main Street, where it still remains, the dwelling-houses of Isaac N. Hague, Esq. The Whiskey Boys of '94 had a liberty pole here, around which they rallied during the days of the insurrection. Seth Ely, a famous musician, resided here for many years.

The population of Masontown by the United States census of 1880 was 376.
GEORGE TOWNSHIP.

McCLELLANDTOWN.

McCllellandtown was founded by a family of that name, who lived there many years ago. William McCllelland, the founder, died here July 12, 1815, in the eighty-second year of his age. The town is some eight miles southwest of Untiontown, and two and one-half miles east of the Monongahela River. It is pleasantly situated in the midst of a moral and industrious people, and in a rich country. It has produced many men who have won distinction in their spheres of life. Hon. Andrew Stewart and Hon. Henry Clay Dean were born and raised here. The population is one hundred. It contains a post-office, two stores, three blacksmith-shops, two wagon-makers, two saddlers, a buggy-shop, and several shoemakers, carpenters, and millwrights. Several fine residences have been erected in the past few years, and several more will be added the coming year.

HIGH HOUSE.

High House, a hamlet of six or seven houses, is in the extreme east of the township. It contains a post-office, two stores, and a blacksmith-shop. It is five miles from the county-seat, and commands a full view of the Laurel Hill.

MILITARY RECORD OF GERMAN TOWNSHIP.

A large number of these men were members of Capt. James A. McCllelland's company (cavalry). They served in the Northwest under Gen. Harrison. Just before the campaign against the Indians on the Mississinewa, the entire company deserted except six, including the captain. Those who remained were Hugh and David Gilmore, two of the Abrams, and a Mr. Porter.

The soldiers from this township in the war with Mexico were Cyrus L. Conner (returned), Jesse Smith (died), Josiah Winders (killed).

In the war of the Rebellion the following men of German township served in different regiments and companies in the United States service.

According to the report of the United States enrolling officer there were in German in the year 1865 one hundred and ninety-nine persons between the ages of eighteen and forty-five liable to military duty. At an examination held by the authority of the United States twenty-seven were declared disqualified and twenty-seven drafted for nine months. About this time a very great number volunteered. The Legislature having passed an act authorizing school directors to levy a tax, the German township school board levied the requisite amount to hire an equal number of substitutes for those whom the government had drafted. The following are the names of the tax collectors and the amount of their duplicates: Isaac Crow, $10,190.75; Jacob Newcomer, $5428.47; Jacob Newcomer, $7285.82; Thomas D. Bise, $8991.25. Amount of bounty tax levied, $24,999.29.

VARIOS STATISTICS OF GERMAN TOWNSHIP.

With no public works in the township, German exhibits her resources. In her limits are the Waynesburg seam of coal, five feet; two smaller veins, three feet each; and the nine-feet vein. These may be seen cropping out of the creek and river bluffs in nearly every part of her area. The Waynesburg seam is six feet in thickness, and but few, even of coal men, know of its existence in German. An excellent quality of oil was obtained at a depth of six hundred feet on Cat’s Run, on Gray’s land.

The population of German by the United States census of 1850 was 1854, including 90 in the village of McClellandtown.

By actual canvass the following were found to be the production of farms and live-stock in the year 1873 of and in the township:

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

JOHN STERLING.

John Sterling, of Masontown, a farmer of distincion, was born on the farm where he now lives, Aug. 12, 1822. He is of English descent. His father, also John Sterling, was born and reared in Fayette County, and was a farmer, and resided on the farm which John, Jr., now occupies. He married Catharine Knife. They had three sons and three daughters. Three of their children are still living, of whom our subject is one, and was educated in the common schools. When starting in life his father gave him a small farm, but his possessions, which are large, consisting of lands town properties, and bank stock, are mostly the accumulations of his own industry and business tact.

Feb. 6, 1842, he married Elizabeth Debolt, a daughter of John and Charity Walters Debolt, of Nicholson township, by whom he has had eight children, seven of whom are living: Ephraim Walters, a general business man; Amy J., wife of Hon. Jacob Provis; A. J., a minister of the German Baptist Church; Charity A., Mary M., and Rebecca B, all now (February, 1882) attending Monongahela College; Jonathan (dead); and John B., a nurseryman. Mr. Sterling has been for many years a member of the German Baptist Church, and Mrs. Sterling is a zealous church-member as well as excellent woman, a good wife and kind friend. Mr. Sterling has held important local offices, the duties of which he always performed in a satisfactory manner. He and nearly all his male relatives are "sterling" Democrats. If Mr. Sterling’s life has been marked by one peculiarity more striking than another it is to be found in the fact that he has not labored hard merely through a sense of duty, but because he likes to work,—cannot be idle and happy too. Men like him are apt to thrive, and they ought to be, like him, prosperous.

Mr. Sterling and his son, E. W., are the owners of a large saw-mill and planing-mills located on the Monongahela River, and thoroughly equipped with all machinery necessary for carrying on the manufacturing of “worked” lumber. Mr. Sterling and his son’s extensive tracts of land are all underlaid with the nine-feet vein of the Connellsville coking coal, and supplied abundantly with iron ore and limestone. In fact, Mr. Sterling claims to hold, in his own right and that of his sons, one of the best tracts of coal and ore lands in Fayette County. He, with his sons, Rev. A. J. and J. B., own a large nursery, with extensive green-houses, adjoining his home-farm, where they raise all kinds of fruit and ornamental stocks.

JOHN STERLING.

The late Jonathan Sterling, of German township, was born March 29, 1820. He was the son of John Sterling, deceased, of whom we have made notice in the accompanying biography of John Sterling (Jr.). Mr. Jonathan Sterling died Aug. 8, 1881. He was all his active business life a farmer, and in childhood attended the common schools. On March 31, 1849, he married Mary Ann Hart, of Nicholson township. They had ten children, of whom five sons and three daughters are living. Mr. Sterling was a prosperous man and was at one time wealthy, in the local sense. He gave his children good educational advantages, and left them in prosperous circumstances at his death. John, his eldest son, residing in German township, is an excellent farmer, and through his industry and thrift has accumulated a large estate for a young man. Christian C., the second son, owns the most valuable piece of real estate in Masonstown borough, the “Sterling House,” and is also the owner of a very valuable farm about a half-mile from the borough. The third son, Andrew J., Jr., is an active business young man, alert and expert of calculation. He is an enthusiastic politician of the Democratic school, married and has three children, and resides in German township, where he owns a farm of a hundred acres, besides valuable real estate in Masonstown borough. James B., the fourth son, is an active and industrious farmer, and has gathered together quite a property. The fifth and last son living, William M., owns a valuable farm near Mason-town, and is noted as one of the most skillful scribes of the region. The daughters are all well married and in comfortable circumstances. Mr. Sterling was

JOSEPH WOODWARD.

Joseph Woodward, of German township, a farmer, is derived from Irish Quaker stock. His father, Joseph Woodward (Sr.), was born in Chester County, Pa., April 11, 1766, and some time after coming to Fayette County was married therein to Hope Shotwell, a native of New Jersey. He was a farmer. They had eight children, of whom Joseph, Jr., was the third, and she was born Nov. 10, 1810, in Menallen township. June 7, 1832, Joseph (Jr.) married Eleanor Buchanan, of German township. They had thirteen children, of whom nine are living. Mrs. Woodward died Feb. 9, 1853, and June 29, 1854, Mr. Woodward married Sarah Ann Bunker, who died Aug. 6, 1872. He again married March 11, 1875, his third wife’s maiden name being Sarah Black. Mr. Woodward settled in his present home early in life, before his first marriage. His children are widely scattered, some living in Illinois, others in Kansas, and some in Pennsylvania, and all are married and prosperous. Mr. Woodward has been a member of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church for nearly half a century, and an elder in the church for many years. His property consists of lands principally. He enjoys the respect and confidence of his neighbors, always having been noted for excellent good sense, uprightness, and kindly deeds.

DAVID JOHNSON.

The late David Johnson, of German township, was born in Rockingham County, Va., March 5, 1786, and came with his father, Peter Johnson, and the family into Fayette County when David, who was the oldest son, was quite young. They settled in German township. He was educated in the subscription schools of the times, worked on his father's farm, and learned the art of weaving, and remained at home till the time of his marriage to Mary Magdalena Bixler, of German township, June 27, 1809, whereafter he took up his residence with his father-in-law for one year, and then purchased a farm, still in the hands of relatives of his, near Uniontown, whereon he resided for six years, and selling the farm to his brother Jacob, bought the "Yanders farm" near Masontown, upon which he lived the rest of his days. He was the father of nine children, eight of whom were living at the time of his death, which occurred May 24, 1850. All the eight children, six boys and two girls, were also married at the time of the father's death. Mrs. Johnson died some three years before her husband, and both were buried in the private burying-ground on the Newcomer farm, adjoining Mr. Johnson's original farm, and which he owned at the time of his death, and which his daughter Frances, Mrs. John Young, now owns.

Mr. Johnson and his wife were members of the Mennonite Church. Mr. Johnson was in early life a Whig in politics, but became a Republican. He was not an ardent politician, and never sought office. It is said of him that "If David Johnson was not an honest man then there are no honest men."

Mr. Johnson owned about sixteen hundred acres of land, the most of which is underlain with the nine-foot vein of bituminous coal, and left to each of his children a farm of about two hundred acres of land, with house and outbuildings thereon, upon which severally the surviving children are still living in prosperous circumstances.

Mr. Jacob Johnson, the son of David, and the next to the last born of his children, and who, perhaps, more especially than the rest supplies the place of his father in the world, left the old homestead farm, whereon for a long number of years he had wrought, just prior to his father's death, and moved upon "the Middle Run farm," in the same township, to which he has made many additions by purchase until his present landed estate covers about a thousand excellent acres. He married in 1852 Elizabeth Knotts, a native of Virginia. They have had five sons and two daughters. Four sons and two daughters are now living and residing with their father, and being industrious and faithful children are adding to the worth of the already valuable homestead farm. Mr. and Mrs. Johnson are members of the Mennonite Church.

CAPT. ISAAC PHILLIPS KENDALL.

Capt. Isaac Phillips Kendall, a worthy farmer and citizen of Masontown, and a gentleman of individual characteristics and varied talents, was born in German township, April 7, 1822. His grandfather, Jeremiah Kendall, of English descent, was born in Virginia, and was a soldier of the Revolution, and at one time private secretary of Gen. Washington. He was wounded at the battle of Brandywine. He married Rhoda McIntyre, of Virginia, a lady of Scotch lineage, and, nearly a hundred years ago, settled in Fayette County, and had "patented" to him at that time the farm upon which Capt. Kendall's father and himself were born, and on which the father always lived, and the captain has resided until March, 1881. Capt. Kendall's father was Jeremiah. He was a soldier of the war of 1812. His wife was Sarah Phillips, of Nicholson township. Capt. Kendall received his education in the common schools and at Rector College, Pruntytown, Va., Nov. 7, 1844, he married Nancy J. Allebaugh, the oldest daughter of Samuel and Elizabeth Allebaugh. The latter (referred to in the biography of Samuel Allebaugh) resides with her son-in-law, Capt. Kendall. Capt. and Mrs. Kendall have had no children.

Capt. Kendall has held important township offices, but is no seeker after official positions. He derives his military title from his election to the post of captain, commissioned as such by Governor F. R. Shunk in a volunteer company, Nov. 7, 1846, which company tendered their services for the war with Mexico, but were not accepted. He was afterwards elected major of battalion on a 7th of November. He remembers the date of his military election and re-election because it is the same (November 7th) as that of his marriage. Thus peace and war go hand in hand together with him.

Capt. Kendall is a successful business man, and is now engaged in farming and manufacturing coke. He has always been a farmer, and says that he is a poor one; but his neighbors do not think so. His considerable possessions consist of agricultural lands, coal deposits, bank stocks, etc. He is, in the English sense, a very clever gentleman. Indeed, he may be called a "genius" withal, possessing excellent powers of mechanical invention. He is, moreover, a man of refined sensitiveness, studential habits, and strong in-

In 1823, at the January session of court for Fayette County, there was presented a petition of the inhabitants of Wharton township for a division beginning at the Great Falls on Yonghiogheny River; thence to Carroll's mill; thence by said mill to the Virginia (now West Virginia) line. An order was issued, and Morris Morris, Thomas Collins, and Abel Campbell appointed viewers to inquire into the propriety of such division. In obedience to the order they reported that with the assistance of a competent surveyor they had performed the duties assigned to them by taking into consideration the territory of the township, its population, etc., and recommend a division of said township by running lines, viz.: Beginning at the Great Falls of the Yonghiogheny River; thence south 180 perches, south 37° 51' degrees west, 646 perches to the mouth of Laurel Run; thence south 30 degrees east, 34 perches; thence south 75 degrees west, 24 perches; thence south 9 degrees east, 28 perches; thence south 4 degrees east, 78 perches; thence south 7° 30' degrees east, 30 perches; thence south 10 degrees west, 3 perches; thence south 19° 40' degrees east, 29 perches; thence south 8° 51' degrees east, 152 perches; thence south 30 degrees east, 69 perches; thence south 25 degrees east, 49 perches; thence south 300 perches; thence south 43° 10' degrees west, 702 perches to the United States turnpike; thence south 13 degrees west, 245 perches to the burnt cabin at the intersection of the road leading to Car-

SAMUEL ALLEBAUGH.

The late Samuel Allebaugh, of Masontown, was of German stock. His father, Christian Allebaugh, lived in Rockingham County, Va., where he married Catharine Showalter, of the same county, by whom he had ten children, eight sons and two daughters. Samuel was their fourth child, and was born March 3, 1789, and was educated in the country schools of Rockingham County. Growing up he learned the trade of blacksmithing, and finally came into Fayette County, locating at Masontown in 1810. He married Elizabeth Weibel, of German township then, now Nicholson. They had eight children, equally divided as to sex (six of whom are living),—Josiah S., who married Nancy J. Heath, March 4, 1832; James M., who married Elizabeth Guinn; Andrew J.; William R., who married Mary M. Hill, and died June 13, 1875; Nancy J., married Nov. 7, 1844, to Capt. Isaac P. Kendall; Elizabeth A., who married James S. Rohrer, Jan. 25, 1846; Rebecca C., who married Adam Poundstone, Feb. 8, 1846, and died Nov. 1, 1852; Elmira J., who married Capt. C. L. Conner, Sept. 21, 1843. Capt. Conner was a soldier in the Mexican war and in that of the Rebellion, and was engaged in each from the beginning to its close. He was a member of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, and died April 5, 1877.

Samuel Allebaugh died Sept. 16, 1867, and was interred in the German Baptist burying-ground. After leaving Virginia he lived wholly in Masontown, except for a period of about five years which he passed on his farm in German township, on the waters of Brown's Run, and two years which were spent in Fairfield County, Ohio, on a farm which he purchased in 1835, upon which he moved in 1836, and which he sold in 1837, returning in the fall of that year to his old and cherished home in Masontown. His reputation for many virtues was excellent; in fact, he was noted for his good qualities as a neighbor and citizen. According to his means he generously assisted all his children to a start in life. They had all arrived at maturity before his death. His widow, Elizabeth, in her ninety-second year, is an active, intelligent, and amiable old lady. Mr. Allebaugh was long a member of the German Baptist or Dunkard Church. His children are Cumberland Presbyterians.
rol's mill; thence with said road to the Virginia (now West Virginia) line. This report was presented to the court on the 9th day of June, 1824, and by them confirmed, and it was directed by said court that the western section continue to be called "Wharton," and the eastern section be erected into the township of "Henry Clay."

Henry Clay township is bounded on the north by Stewart township, on the east is separated by the Youghiogheny River from Somerset County, Pa., on the south is divided by the celebrated Mason and Dixon's line from the States of Maryland and West Virginia, and on the west (bounded) by Wharton. It lies partly in the Ligonier Valley, and is the south-eastern of the five mountain or highland townships, and is also the southeastern township of the county. Its greatest length from north to south is eight miles, and from east to west is seven and three-quarter miles. Laurel Hill Ridge runs through the township a little west of the centre, with an average width of three miles, and average height of two thousand three hundred feet above the level of the ocean. On the west of Laurel Hill Ridge high hills, rough and broken, extend to the Wharton line. On the east high hills extend to the river, and rise from six hundred to eight hundred feet above its banks. There are here no valley or bottoms, but the river cuts its way through rugged hills. These hills, east of the Ridge, extend as far south as the National road. From the National road south to Mason and Dixon's line is an elevated plain (with a rolling surface) over two thousand two hundred feet above the level of the ocean, a section well adapted to grazing. It was formerly called the "Glades."

Youghiogheny and Cheat Rivers drain the township. Beaver Creek, west of Laurel Hill, Mill, Hall, and Tub-Mill Runs, east, fall into the Youghiogheny, while Cheat receives from the southwest Little Sandy and Glade Runs; both rise in the edge of the township. The rapid fall in the Youghiogheny and these different runs offer many splendid sites for mills or factories. The soil is principally a clay loam on the hills and a sand loam along the streams and on the chestnut ridges of the mountain. Oak is the main timber, next chestnut, then small quantities of sugar, poplar, wild-cherry, dogwood, sycamore, and walnut. Originally it was a very heavy timbered region, but much of it has been cut, yet a large amount remains. Coal exists throughout the township, but in many places the veins are only from fifteen to eighteen inches thick. The Upper Freeport coal-vein, about four feet thick, is found on Hall's Run, Beaver Creek, along the river, and near Markleysburg. Above the river, north of the National road, the Philson coal-vein, two feet thick, is found, and close to the Horse-Shoe Bend the Berlin coal-vein, two feet thick, is found. South of Somerset, and on land of H. J. and J. J. Easter and Susan Lohart, are found veins of bituminous coal six feet six inches in thickness. The coal is of excellent quality, and has been mined here for more than forty years. The principal supply of coal for the villages of Somerset and Jockey Valley, as well as for much of the surrounding country, comes from these mines.

On the same lands there is found a vein of excellent iron ore, which is utilized to some extent, and which will be of great value if railroad facilities should be extended to this township.

The Mahoning sandstone is found in many places, and from twenty to fifty feet thick. Traces of the Morgantown sandstone are found, and other good building rock. The silicious limestone is found on Beaver Creek, well exposed, and also exists in the river hills in veins five to six feet thick, in bowlders or chunks.

Fruits, especially apples, do well throughout the whole township. Peaches are injured by the borer, and do not yield a regular crop. Pears, plums, and cherries do well, and grapes are a never-failing crop. Berries are an abundant crop.

Wheat yields from six to fourteen bushels per acre. Forty years ago it was supposed could not be grown, but a better system of farming than what prevailed then shows that it can be raised. Rye, corn, buckwheat, and oats are raised, while potatoes are the staple crop. The soil, improved by liming and well farmed, would give better results than have yet been attained; but the high elevation of the township above the ocean, with its length of winter season, will always keep most of its productions below the average of lower localities. The township is well adapted to grazing and dairying. The climate is very healthy, from the high elevation, pure air, absence of swamps, and the best of water. The winter season commences with early frosts about two weeks sooner, and ends with rough weather two weeks later than in any other part of the county outside of the other mountain townships.

The township contains two villages.—Jockey Valley, on the National road, within one mile of the river, in the southeastern part, and Markleysburg, in the southern part, one mile and a half southwest of the National road. In 1870 the population was 951, of which 15 were foreign born, and all whites. In 1880 the population was 1232, including Markleysburg, the population of which was 77.

The Indian path known as Nemacolin's trail was the route of the old Braddock road through the township, and where it crosses the river, a half-mile up the river from the Smithfield bridge, on a high hill on lands of J. J. Easter, were several Indian graves. At Sloan's Ford an Indian trail crossed the river, and on land of Charles Tissue, on a beautiful knoll, was a stone pile or Indian grave. Mr. Tissue opened it and found a very large skull, apparently that of an Indian. The body had been laid down on the ground and stones set up edgewise along each side of the body, and then flat stones laid over them, and then about a wagon-load of stones gathered and laid over them. The Indians only used this region as a hunting-ground, and never killed any settlers in the township.

Gen. Braddock's first camp in Fayette was at the Twelve Springs, near Job Clark's tavern stand. Persons have doubted his camping here, as the place does not suit the description of his first camp, but John E. Stone took the description, and after a full day's exploration found the place to agree with it in every particular.

PIONEERS AND EARLY SETTLEMENTS.

In 1768, John Penn granted to Chew & Wilcox several large tracts of land in the township. These proprietary (preferred) grants comprised three hundred and thirty-two acres on the head-waters of Beaver Creek, close to the Glover school-house, called Beaver Dam, a tract on Hall's Run, above W. Barnes, one hundred and fifty acres near the river at Confluence, three hundred and thirty-seven acres back of J. J. Easter's, running to the Maryland line, and over two thousand acres on Glade Run, near the cornerstone in the boundary line of Maryland and West Virginia.

Enoch Leonard was supposed to have been here about 1770. He lived within two or three miles of Sloan's Ford. His wife was Lydia Fish. His son Enoch married Henry Abram's sister, and went to Virginia. His daughter Charity married Joshua Jones, Elizabeth married a man by the name of Clay, and Lydia married Job Clark.

Henry Abrams came soon after Leonard. Job Clark came about 1778. He left home on account of his step-mother and enlisted in the American army, and claimed to have fought at Bunker Hill. He was a small man, with black hair and blue eyes; born in Connecticut, and married Lydia Leonard about 1779 or '80, and built his tavern soon after at the Twelve Springs. He was born in 1758, and died in 1842. The Hon. Andrew Stewart secured a pension of ninety-six dollars a year for him. His son Job was killed at the Inks tavern, in Wharton, by his team running away. Leonard married Hannah, daughter of Benjamin Price, Esq., and went West. Isabella married Andrew Flanigan, and Sallie married John Collier, who kept tavern at Mount Augusta. Moses Hall was supposed to have come here about 1785. He occasionally preached to the people of the surrounding country, though it does not appear that he was very much gifted in that direction. On one occasion he closed one of his sermons in this way. "Suppose," he said, "that all the men in the world were put into one man, all the rivers into one river, all the trees into one tree, and all the axes into one axe; that the one man should take the one axe and cut down the one tree, so that it would fall into the one river, what a splish, splash, and splatter dash there would be!" No doubt this was thought (by himself if by no one else) a very convincing argument. Moses Hall had a son Ephraim, and his son Squire kept tavern after him. Joseph Eiston and Plancton came with Moses Hall. Andrew Flanigan from near Farmington, where his father, David Flanigan, lived. He married Isabella Clark about 1799. He was often in Henry Clay township when a mere child. He was in the war of 1812 under Capt. Andrew Moore. He kept on Braddock and National roads, in the same house. Clark Flanigan, one of his sons, married Mary Roberts and lives above Sloan's Ford, quite an old man, possessed of a good memory of the past.

John Sloan was the ancestor of the Sloans, Sloan's Ford being named after him. He came from Ireland about 1875, then disposed of his property to Sebastian Tissue, and removed with his family to Maryland, where he died. Of his family, William, David, Margaret, and Sarah returned to Henry Clay. William had two sons, Henry and James, and two daughters, Eliza and Sarah. The latter married Jonathan Butler, and is now living near the ford.

John Potter came from New Jersey to Henry Clay (then Wharton) in January, 1787. In 1797 he married Elizabeth Callaghan. John and George, their oldest children, went to Ohio, and died there. Elizabeth married Capt. J. Wickline, and died in Illinois; Ann married a Mr. Hathkinson; Samuel married Sarah Leonard, and lives in Stewart township; Amos, the youngest, lives in Wharton, now seventy-four years of age. John Potter was justice of the peace for many years, and lived on the Braddock road. He was a wheelwright in New Jersey, and the British burned his shop. He built the first bridge near Somerfield, which was burnt. He was the author of a work of two hundred pages called "Potter's Inquiry." He was said to have been in the Revolutionary war. He was born in 1748, and died in 1826.

John Burnworth came in 1792 from Lancaster County. He settled near Fairview Church. He was born in 1767, and died in 1848. His wife was Hannah Hinebaugh. Their children were John R. (whose son is Rev. P. Burnworth), James (who married a cousin to Judge Shipley), Mary, Barbara, George, Christopher, Jonathan, Ziba (who lives near Fairview Church), Susan (the widow of Peter Lenhart, the tavern-keeper), Keziah, Rhoda (who married Julius Kemp, of Somerfield), and Rheuma (who married Charles Tissue, near Sloan's Ford).

In 1800, Ephraim Vansickle came to where A. B. Bradley now lives, close to Jockey Valley. His wife was Anna Robison. They came from New Jersey. Ephraim, one of their sons, is the hotel-keeper at Somerfield, and previously kept at Jockey Valley.

John O'Heagarty came from Lebanon, Pa. He bought the Mount Augusta farm, which was formerly the Daniel Collin stand in the days of the staging on the National road. There were stables for seventy-five horses there. This property is the highest point on
As late as 1824 wolves, panthers, and bears remained in the township. In that year a wolf chased Mrs. Elizabeth Stone, then a small girl, with her sister, into the old Twelve Springs tavern; then kept around the house till he heard a horseman approaching. In the same year Michael Thomas, then a young man, with three dogs and a heavy club, killed a bear near Markleysburg, and Richard Hall in that summer shot a panther. But since 1828 no wild animals but wildcats and deer have been known in the township.

ROADS.

The old roads in the township were: 1st, Braddock's; 2d, Turkey Foot road, from Confluence by Sloan's Ford, past Liberty Church, past Potter's Mill, to Dunbar's Camp; 3d, Selbysport road, from Wharton, passing south of Markleysburg,—often called Haydentown road; 4th, the National road.

Township roads: 1st, River road, from Somerset to Liberty Church, connecting the National and Turkey Foot roads; 2d, Beaver Creek road, from Griffin's stand, past Beaver Creek, and joining Turkey Foot road near Liberty Church; and another branch from Beaver Creek, running into Stewart, to the Falls. And since these roads many minor roads have been laid out in different parts of the township.

Braddock's road entered the township about one-half mile up the river from the Widow Lenhart's, on lands of J. J. Easter. It passed from the ford down to the mouth of Hall's Run, or Jockey Valley, passing up Jockey Valley through T. Conaway's place; thence through lands of William Umbel, passing within one-half mile of Markleysburg, through lands of Michael, and past the residence of George J. Thomas; thence through lands of Jacob Humberston; thence through lands of Squire O'Hegarty, the old Griffin place, and through lands of Andrew Moyes to the township line.

After 1780 wagons were put on the road, and regular tavern stands were established along the road. The first wagon-stand after crossing the river was at Jockey Valley, kept by Andrew Flanagan, a log building, still standing. The second stand was about one-half mile farther west, a log building, kept by John Conaway. The old Jockey Valley school-house now stands on its site. Conaway moved from it to the National road when the latter was opened. The next stopping-point was Squire John Potter's, who from 1790 kept travelers till the road went down, but never had a license or followed it as a business. His house was of logs and stood about seventy yards south of William Umbel's residence on the National road, and during the time of the "Whiskey Insurrection" Potter was known as a government man, although owning a small still. "Tom the Tinker" sent him one or two threatening notices, but he gave no heed to them, and tradition has it that the party who arrested Col. Gaddis stopped at Potter's with him and stayed all night. When the road went down Potter moved to the house now occupied by William Umbel.
The third wagon stand was Moses Hall’s, over half a mile west of Squire John Potter’s. Moses Hall kept tavern at an early day. His son Squire kept a short time before the road went down. The house was a large log house, which stood just across the road from George J. Thomas’ residence. Thomas moved in it in 1864, and the next spring tore it down, Squire Hall built a brick addition of two rooms to it, but never put a roof on it.

The “Standing Rock” is nearly a mile west of the Hall stand, on Squire John O’Hegarty’s land. It is a large rock fifteen feet high, resting on a bed rock six feet square in the ground. The Standing Rock commences small at the bottom (about two feet in diameter), widening out up to the bulge, and then, instead of drawing in, gets wider for three or four feet higher up, and presents a top level as a table and sixteen feet square.

On the road nearly one mile south of Squire O’Hegarty’s, where the Widow Bird lives, and over a mile west of the Standing Rock, John Bowermaster cleared land and kept and pastured pack-horses before there were wagons used on the road.

The fourth wagon stand was Job Clark’s, or “The Twelve Springs,” nearly two miles west of Bowermaster’s, a large log house and log barn, a stone spring-house, and stone game- and meat-house, and within a circle of three hundred yards twelve strong-flowing springs, and on the hillside Clark planted a large orchard.

The National road was built through this township chiefly in 1816-17. In September, 1815, about six and a half miles of the road west of Smithfield was let by contract. It reached the present Wharton line. The contractors were Hagan, Doherty, McGlaughlin, and Nicholas Bradley, Aull, and Evans & Ramsey, and they sublet many parts. Kincaid, Beck & Evans built the Smithfield, or Somerset, bridge in 1817-18 for $40,000.

The bridge is 1465 feet above the level of the ocean, and 513 feet above Uniontown. Barren Hill, or the crest of Laurel Hill, west of O’Hegarty’s, is 2430 feet above the ocean and 1498 feet above Uniontown. Woodcock Hill, or Briery Mountain, a spur or hill just west of Laurel Hill on the road, is 2500 feet above the ocean and 1548 feet above Uniontown.

TAVERN STANDS.

The first stand west of the bridge in the township was the Lenhart tavern stand. A man of the name of Ebert ran a tannery and had a small log house here, and John Lenhart bought it about 1830, and built to it and kept it. He rented to Jacob Tabb in 1839, and William Bruce in 1840, who kept it. His son, Peter Lenhart, kept it from 1841 to 1872, repairing and building to the house. It is a long two-story (frame) building, and was always a wagon stand. It is now occupied by Peter Lenhart’s widow.

The second stand was the Flanigan, or Jockey Valley stand, built by Andrew Flanigan as a tavern on the Braddock road, and when the National road was made through Jockey Valley he repaired his log house, and opened it in 1817 as a wagon stand. He was followed by Maj. Paul and Clement, who was succeeded by Jacob Probasco; then John Baker, Peter Baker, Jacob Richards (1841), Charles Kemp, and James Gooden were landlords. Morris Mauler, from Frostburg, kept and left, and followed the road into Wharton, renting and keeping from Frostburg, Md., to Monroe, Fayette Co.

Aaron Wyatt came next in 1848 as landlord. He afterwards removed to Uniontown, and was succeeded in 1857 by John Olivine, who was followed by Lewis Hamill, now at Chalk Hill, and in 1871 by Alexander Spear, and since that it has been a private residence. It is a long two-story building of log, frame, and stone, and owned by Marshall Spurgeon.

The third stand was a two-story frame building, a few yards west of the Flanigan stand, and was leased by Ephraim Vansickle and his son-in-law, Daniel Bradley, in 1851, and was known as the Vansickle stand. It burned down in February, 1852, and Vansickle & Bradley built a log house and weather-boarded it, and were keeping in it in forty days after the fire. They kept till 1857. It was a wagon stand.

The fourth was the Conaway wagon stand. John Conaway left the Braddock road and built a log house on the National road, near a mile west of Jockey Valley. It was kept by him and afterwards by his sons. The house is now gone. It stood close to Thurman Conaway’s residence.

The fifth stand was the Brown (wagon) stand, a log house kept by Thomas Brown. In 1823 a man by the name of Fuller furnished the material and built a large stone two-story house, forty-five feet front and seventy feet deep. He kept it, and after him his son Jacob, who went West and died. Jacob Humberston bought the property in 1857, and kept it in 1864 and 1865, and still owns and resides in the house.

The sixth stand was the Mount Augusta stand, over a mile west of the Brown stand. John Collier first kept here, about one hundred and fifty yards east of Mount Augusta. Daniel Collier, a son of John, then built a log house and kept it, and in 1824 built a large brick, the Mount Augusta proper. McMillen succeeded Collier, and then Thomas Brownfield bought and changed it from a wagon to a stage stand. He was elected county commissioner and sheriff, and went to Missouri. John O’Hegarty bought the property a few years ago, and the house burned down in 1872. It stood a few yards from O’Hegarty’s present residence.

The seventh stand was the Griffin stand, and about one and a half miles west from Mount Augusta a large two-story stone building was built by John Griffin in 1824, who occupied it as a stage stand. After his death it was changed to a wagon stand, and kept by his widow and his son William in 1827, after whom Jacob Easter bought the property about 1850, and built a new mill in place of the old one, and sold to Jacob Beeghley, who sold to Harrison Hinebaugh, who sold to Jackson Tissue, the present owner.

Years ago people came to mill here for many miles around. The next mill was the old Shipley mill, said to have been built by William Shipley, a small log mill, on a run three-quarters of a mile from the river, about fifty years ago. It was bought by John K. Tissue (father of Jackson Tissue) in 1872, and torn down and a frame mill built in its stead which is running now. The next and last flouring-mill was built by Jacob Probasco at Jockey Valley about 1825, and is now owned by Marshall Spurgeon. It is a steam-mill; an engine was attached to it by Aden Clary. The two Tissue mills are run by water-power.

Distilleries. — About 1794, John Potter had a small distillery on the old Braddock road; about 1800, Jacob Woodmansee had a distillery close to Sloan's Ford, and John Rush had one on the river. About 1814, Barnabas Bond had one close to Plucker's mill, and about 1829, John Kirkpatrick had a distillery on the river, and Michael Thomas one close to Markleysburg; but they are all gone, and there is not a distillery to-day in the township.

TOWNSHIP ORGANIZATION AND OFFICERS.

Henry Clay township was organized in 1824. It was taken from Wharton, and included at that time the territory now occupied by Henry Clay, a portion of Stewart, and a small portion of Wharton. A portion was set off Nov. 17, 1855, to help form Stewart, and a small portion—a strip less than one-quarter of a mile broad—was set off in 1872, along the Wharton line, to Wharton. John O'Hegarty and Harvey Morris were appointed commissioners to run the line setting off this portion to Wharton, and they employed Martin Dixon as surveyor. The cause for it was the complaint of Zeb Hart and others asking to be set off to Wharton, as Wharton schools were near, and Henry Clay schools at too great a distance from them. Before this new line was run, in 1853, a petition was presented for a view of Clay and Wharton line. John I. Dorsey, John F. Foster, and Robert McDowell were appointed viewers. The report was made, renewed, and reissued, and report made and approved March 27, 1854. The review was granted, and J. N. H. Patrick, James Robinson, and Hugh Graham appointed viewers. Their alteration and changing of lines was approved June, 1854, and confirmed Oct. 30, 1854.

Jockey Valley

is located on the National road, about a mile west of the river (in Hall's Run Valley), and consists of nine houses, one flouring-mill, one store, and one blacksmith-shop. A tavern stand on the old Braddock road, kept by Flanigan, was the first house. After the National road was made nearly on the Braddock road other houses were built, and Jacob Probasco in a few years erected a flouring-mill. Upon the decline of the National road, Jockey Valley suffered from the loss of travel, and has gained but slowly since. When the National road was completed there was always to be found at the Flanigan tavern stand one or more horse-jockeys to trade or run races. A race-track was also laid out by James Piper, a merchant of Somerset, and from these circumstances people got to speaking of the place as "Jockey Valley," and the name remained with the village when it was built. The residents of the place are Daniel Bradley, lumberman; J. C. Dehaven, mail contractor; George Smith, blacksmith; H. Hinchbaugh, miller; John Conaway, farmer; and John A. Patton, clerk. The taverns were the Flanigan and Vansickle stands, noticed under head of Braddock and National road stands. The flouring-mill was built by Jacob Probasco, some time between 1820 and 1825. John Baker succeeded him, then Capt. Thomas Endsley, about 1858, who ran it for several years, and was succeeded by Isaac Vansickle, who sold in 1852 to John Rhomsberg, who sold to Aden Clary, agent of Lloyd Lownes. Marshall Spurgeon is the present owner. Jacob Probasco kept the first stock of goods in one room of the Flanigan tavern stand. John Baker next kept in the same room. Aaron Wyatt succeeded him, and next came Aden Clary. After Clary, in 1871, Daniel Bradly occupied the room while building a store-room. After Bradley came O. M. Hatfield, who kept till 1879. When Aaron Wyatt was keeping store Daniel Bradley and Ephraim Vansickle put a stock of goods in a house now torn down. Vansickle soon retired from the firm, and Bradley kept from 1857 to 1871, when he moved his goods and kept in the Flanigan room till he built a new store-room, into which he moved and kept till 1878. In 1880, Mrs. J. C. Dehaven opened a grocery in one room of her dwelling. The Southern Methodists hold services regularly in the school-house under the Rev. Simons.

Markleysburg.

About three miles southwest of Jockey Valley, in the southern part of the township, within two miles of Mason and Dixon's line, is situated the pleasant little village of Markleysburg, laid out by Squire John Markley and named after him. The first house was built in 1860. The town has one principal street, named Main Street, and three back streets. The present residents are Hiram Griffith, merchant; Hiram Umbel, merchant and postmaster; S. K. Thomas, boarding-house keeper; Joseph Reckner, cabinet-maker; Dr. S. Switzer; Jonas W. Seese, carpenter; Rev. John Myers; Adam S. Sell, lumberman; Mrs. Julia Markley; Mrs. Little; James Cassedy, tinner; Mrs. Brown; F. Thomas, farmer; Watson Guard, shoemaker; John Howell, blacksmith; Squire John Markley; I. D. Seese, laborer; J. W. Seese, undertaker; C. Thomas, farmer; Moses Chrisre, shoemaker; Silas Myers, farmer; John Matthews, teacher.

The only post-office ever established in the township is kept here. Situated on level lands, the village has room to build up into a large town. The Shoemaker Church stands in the village, and just on its edge is a very large Dunkard Church.

The first store was kept by Philip Myers and Brown, who were succeeded by George Thomas, when the building burned. A new building was put up on its site, and Hicks & Markley kept in it. They were succeeded by Joseph Reckner. Daniel Umbel then kept in it a while, and moved to the building now used by Reckner as a cabinet-shop, and kept one year; they dissolved partnership, and Reckner kept six years and closed. Sylvanus Thomas, while Reckner was keeping, moved into the room vacated by Reckner & Umbel, and kept four years. Marion Arnett opened a store in 1872 in the house now occupied by I. D. Seese, as Reckner & Thomas had quit, and kept till 1874. Then, in 1874, H. Griffith built the present store-house, and kept until 1879, when he was succeeded by Hiram Umbel, the present occupant.

Physicians.—In 1859, Dr. Benjamin Feichtner came from West Virginia and located here. He served in the army, and returning at the end of his time formed a partnership with Dr. S. Switzer, from Maryland, who had just returned from the army. Dr. Feichtner soon went to Confluence, where he now practices, and Dr. Switzer remains, the only physician in the township, and himself and Dr. Feichtner the only physicians ever in the township.

About one mile and three-quarters from Markleysburg southwest, on the State line and Henry Clay line, stands a small stone pillar, marking the spot where Maryland and West Virginia join the Pennsylvania line.

Religious Denominations.

Old Liberty Church

was built about 1812, as a Union church for all denominations. It was a log building, and stood near the site of Fairview Church. It was also used as a school building. Peter T. Laishley and Henry Clay Dean preached here. The Methodist Episcopal Church formed a class here about 1825. John Burnworth, Catherine McNear, and Job Clark were members. In 1830, John R. Burnworth and wife became members, and John White preached. In 1852 the church was burned.

FAIRVIEW METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH

LUTHERAN CHURCH.

The Lutherans, about 1845, used Old Liberty Church, and in 1850 built Mount Zion Church, about a mile from Old Liberty Church. John Reiber and wife, J. W. Lancaster and wife, William and Jonathan Close and their wives, and Charles Troutman and others were members organizing the church. It burned down in 1872. They immediately rebuilt, and have a small frame house. It belongs to Addison charge. Ministers in charge, Revs. Failer, who preached in Old Liberty Church, and then in Mount Zion when finished; M. Snyder, David Tressler, Beaver, P. Geme, 1870; William Triday, 1874; Singler, David Crozer, A. M. Smith, and Andrew Felton, present minister.

GERMAN BAPTIST.

The Thomases, Myeresses, and Fikes constituted the first organization of the church at Markleysburg some thirty years ago. In 1880 they built a large church at Markleysburg, seventy-six by forty feet, with a seating capacity for a thousand people. Their ministers have been Hinebaugh, S. Hazlett, Beeghly, and John Myers, present minister.

THE BRETHREN IN CHRIST,

or Shoemaker Church, built a house of worship in Markleysburg in 1868. George Shoemaker, the founder of the denomination, and his son Joshua, both from Westmoreland County, preached here, followed by Samuel Smith, but at present the church has gone down, and the building is used by ministers of other denominations.

THE SOUTHERN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH

organized a branch at Jockey Valley several years ago. Ministers: Markwood, Hazlett, Wolf, and Simmons.

BURIAL-GROUNDS.

The Leonard graveyard, on the river, is the oldest burial-ground in the township. The Sloan graveyard is supposed to be next in order of age. It is close to Sloan's Ford, and some three miles down the river from the Leonard graveyard. The early Sloans are buried here, while the old Leonards and Job Clark and the Flanigans are buried at the Leonard graveyard.

Old Liberty Cemetery is now Fairview Cemetery. It is about sixty years old. Zion Cemetery was laid out in 1850, and the Markleysburg cemetery about 1860, being formerly an old graveyard. There is also an old graveyard near the Flanigan tavern and wagon stand, in Jockey Valley, where John Conaway, his wife, and others are buried.

SCHOOLS.

The first schools in the township were what was known as pay schools, taught by the quarter, and the teacher boarding around among his patrons. The free schools succeeded them, and have been well sustained by the citizens, they taxing themselves from five to seven mills on the dollar to keep their schools running.

The condition of the public schools of Henry Clay, as shown by the county superintendent's annual report, made June 7, 1880, is as follows:

- Number of districts: 7
- Number of scholars: 279
- Average number attending: 157
- Average percentage of attendance: 53
- Cost per month of each scholar: $0.64
- Number of miles for school purposes: 5
- Total amount of school tax: $976.38
- State appropriation: $220.24
- Number of school-houses, all frame: 7
- Number of teachers (male 4, female 3): 7
- Amount paid teachers (5 months): $770.89

The following persons have ranked as the leading teachers of the township since 1840: Rev. Patterson Burnworth, Julius Kemp, William Thomas, John Harah, and J. F. Barnes. R. V. Ritenhour and A. C. Holbert, candidates for the county superintendent in 1877, taught their first terms in Henry Clay.
JEFFERSON TOWNSHIP.

Jefferson, one of the richest agricultural townships in Fayette County, lies on the Monongahela River, which flows along the western border at the base of an abrupt hilly range, whose value lies in vast deposits of coal, found, indeed, not only along the river but in every part of the township, except perhaps under a small area in the southeast. Jefferson had in June, 1881, a population of 1613, and in January, 1881, an assessed valuation of $745,903. The township boundaries are Washington township on the north, Redstone Creek on the south (separating Jefferson from Redstone and Brownsville townships), Perry and Franklin on the east, and the Monongahela on the west, at that point the dividing line between Fayette and Washington Counties. Along the river the surface of the country is rough and precipitous, but generally the land is rolling and easy of cultivation. Handsome and well-kept farms, like well-built and tastefully appointed farm homes, are common sights in Jefferson, and as features in a generally attractive landscape invite the pleased attention of the beholder. The interests of Jefferson, except on the river, where coal is mined extensively, are at present purely agricultural, although the interest of coal-mining must one day become a general one when railways push their way into the township, as they inevitably must. The Redstone Extension Railroad, now approaching completion, follows the course of the Redstone in Jefferson, and will straightway open the rich coal region lying upon and adjacent to its course. Other railway lines are yet to come. The township is watered by numerous small streams, of which the most important is the Little Redstone Creek, that rises in Jefferson and empties into the Monongahela near Fayette City.

There were, doubtless, in the territory now occupied by Jefferson township settlements along and near the river-front as early as 1761; but they were interrupted by Indian incursions that drove the settlers back, and, in a majority of cases, frightened them away permanently. A few returned, however, to their lands, and among these William Jacobs appears to be about the only one of whom there is present knowledge. His land lay at the mouth of the Redstone Creek, but that he took a very active part in improving the country is not clear, since in 1769 he sold the property to Prior Theobald and Lawrence Harrison. In 1777 the same tract came into the possession of Samuel Jackson, and was his home until his death. Just when Andrew Linn came to the creek is not known, but it was not long after 1761. He tomahawked a claim to lands on both sides of the creek near the mouth, and put in a patch of corn on the Jefferson side, where he also put up a cabin. Presently he concluded the Indians were getting altogether too threatening, and, fearing harm might come to him and his family, he hastily fled to the country east of the Alleghenies. He came back in the fall, rightly conjecturing that the danger signs were past, and quite luckily found his corn crop intact and ready for gathering. In April, 1769, he applied to have his land surveyed, and August 22d of that year the survey was made. That was the first survey made under the law of 1769 within the present limits of Fayette County. Mr. Linn did not receive the patent for his land until 1787. In view of the fact that this was the first land surveyed in the county, a copy of the patent is given as follows:

To all to whom these presents shall come, greeting: Know ye that in consideration of the sum of thirty-nine pounds, ten shillings and sixpence in lawful money paid by Andrew Linn into the Receiver General's office of this Commonwealth, there is granted by this Commonwealth unto the said Andrew Linn a certain tract of land called Crab-tree Bottom, situated on the east side of the Monongahela River, on the Great Redstone creek, in Fayette County, beginning at a corner sugar tree of Samuel McCulloch's land; thence by the same and a vacant hill south thirty-five degrees, east sixty-eight and a half perches, crossing said creek to a buttonwood tree; thence by said creek south twelve degrees, east one hundred and nine perches and eight-tenths to a buttonwood, south fifty-five degrees, east twenty-nine perches to a small buttonwood; thence across said creek and by vacant hilly land south eighty-seven degrees, east one hundred and sixteen perches to a post; thence by vacant hilly land north sixty-five degrees, east sixty-six perches to a sugar tree a corner of Nathan Linn's land; thence by the same north one degree, west forty-five perches, and north forty degrees, east thirty-three perches to a box-elder tree; thence by vacant land north fifty degrees, west one hundred perches to an elm; north twelve degrees, west twenty-four perches to a Spanish oak; thence by vacant land or land of William Jacobs north seventy degrees, west one hundred and twenty-three perches to a box-elder tree, and south thirty degrees, west seventy-three perches to the place of beginning, containing 2414 acres and allowances of six per cent. for roads, etc., with appurtenances (which said tract was surveyed in pursuance of an application, No. 2561, entered April 5, 1769, by said Andrew Linn, for whom a warrant of acceptance issued on March 27th last). To have and to hold the said tract or parcel of land with the appurtenances unto the said Andrew Lynn and his heirs, to the use of him the said Andrew Lynn, his heirs and assigns forever, free and clear of all restrictions and reservations as to mine royalties, quit-rents, or otherwise, excepting and reserving only the fifth part of all gold and silver ore for the use of this commonwealth, to be delivered at the pit's mouth clear of all charges. In witness whereof His Excellency Benjamin Franklin, Esq., President of the Supreme Executive Council, hath hereto set his hand and caused the State Seal to be hereto affixed in Council, June 16, 1787, and of the Commonwealth the eleventh.

"B. Franklin.

"Attest, James Trimble,

"For J. Armstrong, Jr., Secy."

This tract has been in the possession of the Lynn family since it was surveyed for Andrew Lynn in 1769, and contains to-day valuable deposits of coal and iron ores that add to it a wealth of which Andrew Lynn never dreamed.

Andrew Lynn entered the Continental service during the Revolution as wagonmaster, and upon the close of the war resumed his rural life on the Redstone. About 1790 he moved across the creek, and lived near the present home of J. M. Linn until his death in 1794. After his death his widow enlarged the Linn landed possessions by the purchase of adjacent hilly tracts, and in 1796 built upon the Redstone a grist-mill, where Andrew Linn had some years before erected a saw-mill. The Widow Linn would doubtless have deferred the building of the grist-mill, but Basil Brown, with an eye upon the property, compelled the erection of the mill under the law providing that every owner of a mill-site should put up a mill thereon or abandon the same to the State. Mrs. Linn's son Isaac was for many years the miller. Besides Isaac, the sons of Andrew Linn were Andrew, Jr., William, Ayers, and John. There was but one daughter, Mary. She married John Corbly, a Baptist minister of Greene County, who while on his way to church one Sabbath with his children was attacked by Indians. One of his daughters was scalped and killed, while he and his other children made good their escape by flight. John Linn went out to the Ohio frontier to fight the Indians and was killed. Andrew, Jr., moved to near Fayette City (or Cookstown). William, Ayers, and Isaac lived and died in Redstone. Isaac occupied the old homestead and carried on the mill. He went out as captain of a company of Pennsylvania militia in Col. Rees Hill's regiment in 1813, and served six months. J. M. Linn, son of Capt. Isaac, recollects seeing the company leave Brownsville for the field, and recalls the circumstance that the men crossed the river on the mill-dam, the stream being then quite low. The last survivor of Capt. Isaac Linn's company, Sergt. John Reed, died at the house of S. W. Reed, in Jefferson township, in the summer of 1880, at the age of ninety-four.

sion which is now occupied by his son, J. M. Linn. Henry Hutchinson, one of the hod-carriers at the building of that house, died in Springhill township in 1879, at a great age, nearly ninety. He came of a long-lived family, his mother dying at the age of one hundred and six. Isaac Linn, who died in 1835, upon the farm where he first saw the light, had nine children, of whom the sons were Andrew, John, William, Jacob, James Madison, Thomas, and Ayers. James Madison lives on the old farm, Jacob in Armstrong County, Pa., Ayers in Jefferson township, and Thomas in Perry. J. M. Linn rebuilt the Linn mill in 1844, and still controls it. He has been a miller on that spot since 1820.

One of the conspicuous figures in Fayette County's early history was Samuel Jackson, a sturdy Quaker from Chester County, and a business man of large and liberal enterprise that made him quite famous in his day. Early in the year 1777 he settled in Fayette County, at the mouth of the Redstone Creek, and occupied land now included within the limits of Jefferson township. The deed for the property, now in the possession of E. J. Bailey, of Jefferson, recites that May 22, 1777, Jesse Martin, of Westmoreland County, transferred to Samuel Jackson, of London Grove, Chester Co., for a consideration of two hundred pounds, a piece of land with improvements at the mouth of the Redstone Creek, containing three hundred acres, known as "Martin's Folly," and bounded by the lands of Thomas Brown and Andrew Linn.

This land was originally occupied for a settlement by William Jacobs, who is said to have located upon it as early as 1761. Driven out by the Indians, Jacobs returned after a while and applied for a survey of his land, April 24, 1769. He sold it to Prior Theobald and Lawrence Harrison, to whom he executed a deed bearing date June 2, 1769. Harrison transferred his right to Theobald, July 10, 1769, and April 5, 1776, Theobald deeded the property to Jesse Martin, who, in 1777, sold to Jackson. Mr. Jackson selected a site for his home near the place now called Albany, and built thereon a log cabin. In 1785 he erected the commodious stone mansion now occupied by Eli J. Bailey, and in that house resided until his death in 1817. Although nearly a hundred years old the house is still a shapely, solid structure, and bids fair to remain so for years to come. The land purchased by Jackson of Jesse Martin was not patented by the former until Feb. 7, 1789. Jackson was a millwright, and soon after making a location put up at the mouth of the creek a saw-mill, grist-mill, and oil-mill. He engaged likewise to a considerable extent in the building of flat-boats, for which there was a lively demand from emigrants coming over Burd's road to the river, and thence desiring to journey to the lower country. The craft were each in size large enough to carry a family and effects, and while his customers waited for the construction of a vessel Jackson would furnish them with entertainment at his house for a week or so. 1

Samuel Jackson expanded his business enterprises as time progressed, and grew to be a man of mark. His establishment, in connection with Jonathan Sharpless, of the first paper-mill west of the Alleghenies is spoken of elsewhere. He carried on a store at Brownsville, in company with Ellis Nichols, embarked in the manufacture of iron outside of the county, had interests in various other enterprises, and in 1817 founded the Albany Glass-Works on the Monongahela, of which more anon. Jackson was a man of peculiar and at times eccentric disposition, while not infrequently his Quaker blood would boil with unaccustomed heat and stir up matters rather unpleasantly to the objects of his wrath. When so disturbed he would walk with his long arms crossed behind him, kicking spitefully at sticks and stones that lay in his path. When his paper-mill employees saw him coming in such mood it was understood that trouble was ahead for somebody. On one occasion, while repairing his mill-dam, he kept a boat for the purpose of conveying his hands across the creek. While he and his men were at dinner one day a traveler saw the boat, and knowing no other way to cross the stream appropriated the craft, tied it to the other shore, and proceeded on his way. When Samuel came from dinner and found his boat on the opposite bank he was very angry, and vowed terrible retaliation should the opportunity offer. The opportunity did offer that very day, for the traveler had been only to Brown-ville, and came back by way of Jackson's in the evening, and he frankly confessed to having taken the boat. Mr. Jackson became angry, and excitedly exclaimed, "Friend, I wouldn't strike thee or beat thee, but I have a mind to rub thee down, and that severely." The fellow resented the implied threat, whereupon Jackson cast self-control to the winds, and with his fist did rub the traveler's face so severely as to draw blood. He then caught up his victim bodily and cast him headlong into the creek, calling out at the same time, "There, I'll teach thee manners and likewise force thee to swim." Frightened and half-drowned the fellow scrambled out of the water, and hurried away as fast as his legs could carry him, satisfied doubtless that although a Quaker might look meek enough he could easily show some of the old Adam upon provocation.

"During the Whiskey Insurrection of 1794, 2 Mr. Jackson, who, as a member of the Society of Friends, was conscientiously opposed to distillation, favored the acts of the government as a means of suppression. He had dubbed one of the insurgent meetings a 'scrub congress.' It gave umbrage to them, and at a subsequent meeting it was proposed that a file of men should go to the residence of Samuel, about a mile distant, and bring him before them for condemnation and punishment. Samuel did not much like the visit or the intent of his visitors, and being a large, athletic man might have given them some trouble had he laid aside his Quaker principles; but being a man of peace, he submitted without resistance, and accompanied his escort with his peculiar and accustomed step, his long arms thrown crosswise behind, and with as much thoughtfulness in his manner as if he were going to one of his own First-Day meetings. The late Judge Brackenridge, who was of the assemblage, was personally acquainted with Samuel, and entertained a friendly regard for him. He mounted the stand and addressed the people, admitting that Samuel had been remiss in applying oppressed epithets to so august and legitimate an assemblage, but that he attributed it more to a want of reflection on Samuel's part than to enmity or design, and that the best retaliation would be in stigmatizing him as a 'scrub Quaker.' It had the intended effect. The insurgents discharged Samuel with the appellation of being a 'scrub Quaker.' Had it not been for this ruse of Judge Brackenridge Samuel would no doubt have been personally injured, or, as others had been, in the destruction of his property."

In 1817, Samuel Jackson began the erection of glassworks upon his property, at a place now known as Albany, but died before getting the works in operation. His sons, Jesse and Samuel, pushed the business after their father's death, and made of Albany a busy place. They had an eight-pot furnace, employed about fifty men, and built for their convenience a store and a score or more of tenement-houses. The works produced common window-glass, and obtained sand from the neighborhood of Perrypolis, whence it was hauled in wagons. Glass was manufactured at that point by various persons until 1865, when Ashbel Gabler & Co. carried on the works. Since 1866 nothing has been done there. Bowman & Reppert owned the property for many years to 1881, when it was sold to George E. Hogg, whose intention is to develop the valuable coal deposits underlying it. Samuel Jackson's sons were Samuel, Jr., John, Josiah, Jesse, and Joseph, all of whom ultimately removed to the West and died there. Of Mr. Jackson's three daughters,

1 In 1734 there was in Jefferson, near the mouth of the Richstone, a store-house called the Hangard, built in February of that year by Capt. William Trent for the Ohio Company. Trent set out early in 1734 from Virginia with a company of forty men, to sit in finishing a fort at the Forks of the Ohio already supposed to have been begun by other employes of the Ohio Company. Capt. Trent's line of march was along Nemacolin's trail to Christopher Gist's, and then by the Richstone trail to the mouth of the Richstone, where, at already-told, he built a store-house for the company and proceeded on his journey. On June 30, 1734, M. Condon de Villiers, in command of a force of French and Indians, came from Fort Duquesne to attack Washington at Gist's, halted at the Hangard and encamped on the rising ground about two musket-shots from the building. M. de Villiers afterwards described the Hangard as "a sort of fort built of logs, one upon another, well notched in, and about thirty feet long by twenty feet wide." When they returned in July the French burned the structure. It occupied the present site of the Bailey mill.

2 From the "American Pioneer."
Rebecca was noted for a prodigious strength, touching which a good many stories are still current. One of them is that it was a common thing to see her carry a barrel of flour from her father's mill to his house, and another that to lift a barrel of whiskey clear of the ground was one of her pastimes. She inherited the mill property, and in 1820 built a new grist-mill on the creek to replace the one built by her father, which was burned with the oil-mill and saw-mill before his death. The mill she built was enlarged by E. J. Bailey in 1844, and carried on by him until 1863, when the dam gave way. Since then it has been suffered to remain idle. For her second husband Becky married Joseph Bailey, and then removed her home to Greene County.

William Elliott, one of Jefferson's early settlers, and a man of more than ordinary local prominence, made a location upon which his grandson Robert now lives. In a family of eight children he had but two sons, who were named Johnson and James. William Elliott, the father, was killed by a falling tree a few years after occupying his Jefferson home. His son Johnson lost his life in a similar way when but nineteen years of age. James had a family of ten children, of whom James, Robert, and Joseph live in Jefferson. James Elliott, the father of the three last named, died in 1842.

Before the close of the Revolution four brothers, named Robert, James, William, and Peter Patterson, moved from Dauphin County to Fayette County, where they proposed to found new homes. Robert settled in Westmoreland County and the others in Fayette, Peter and William in Jefferson township, and James in Franklin. The brothers came westward in company, and with their families traveled and carried their effects on the backs of horses. With the journey over the mountains and the pack-saddle mode of progress William became especially familiar, for after their settlement in Fayette he made several trips to the East for salt and other supplies. Peter Patterson patented the land now owned by Emma Cope, near Redstone post-office, and lived there until his death at the age of more than ninety. He had a large family, but of the sons only Thomas made his home in the township after reaching man's estate. He opened the "Red Lion Tavern" on the place and in the house now occupied by David Browneller, but did not keep it a great while. He gave it up before 1809, but while it lasted the "Red Lion" was a stopping-place of some note on the old Pittsburg road leading from the country south by way of the Sharpless' paper-mill. William Patterson warrantied, in 1786, the place now owned by William G. Patterson. He is said to have been born on shipboard during the emigration of his parents from Ireland to America. His children numbered nine, of whom but two were sons, named James and William. James, who lived and died in Jefferson, was a captain in the war of 1812 under Gen. Harrison. Patterson went out as a member of Capt. Reginald Brashear's company, but Capt. Brashear falling from his horse and sustaining severe injury resigned his command, in which he was succeeded by James Patterson. A colored man named Harry Goe, born in slavery upon William Goe's farm, was a teamster in Capt. Patterson's company. Some of Goe's descendants still live in Jefferson. Capt. Patterson followed the business of teaming as well as farming, and hauled goods from Baltimore and Philadelphia to Brownsville until 1823. In that year his son, William G. Patterson, continued the business, and freighted from Baltimore to Wheeling until the Baltimore and Ohio Railway reached the Ohio River. Capt. James died on the W. G. Patterson farm in 1827. William Patterson, brother of Capt. James, lived on the present David Wakefield's farm. He had eleven children, of whom the sons were David, James, William, and Jeremiah. David served in the war of 1812 under Capt. Geisey. Of the eleven children six are living. They are Nelly, Martha, James, and Nancy Patterson, of Jefferson township; Jeremiah Patterson, of Kansas, and Mrs. Sarah Ely (mother of Mrs. Benjamin Phillips), of Redstone township.

In the bend of the river John Dixon, a Quaker, was the first permanent settler. He came from Eastern Pennsylvania in 1770, and bought the tomahawk claim of one Wiseman to about four hundred acres, upon which Wiseman had built a cabin and set out a few apple-trees. Mr. Dixon's home was on the present Bowman place, where about 1800 he built the stone house still standing there. In 1813 he built a woolen-factory on his farm, and carried it on two years, when, the close of the war acting disastrously upon the business, he gave it up. Mr. Dixon had a family of ten children, of whom four were sons. Nathan lived upon the homestead, and died there in 1829. John Dixon, his father, died in 1849.

About 1800, Louis Marchand, a physician, located in the river bend upon a four-hundred-acre tract, and engaged in the practice of his profession. Being a bachelor he took Joshua Wagoner as a farm tenant and lived with the Wagoner family. Dr. Marchand acquired considerable fame as a skillful physician, and enjoyed a large and profitable practice. As the compounder of an anti-hydrophobia pill, his reputation extended far beyond the confines of Fayette County, and from far-distant points, where stories of the marvelous cures effected had penetrated, came candidates for treatment at the hands of Dr. Marchand. That the doctor did produce a pill of wonderful curative powers is verified by the testimony of those who were his neighbors, and from whom we hear to-day of his unbounded success. After practicing on the river about twenty years, Dr. Marchand removed to Uniontown, where he remained about twenty years, and during his residence there married Sally, daughter of Samuel Sackett, of Smithfield. From Uniontown he returned to his Jefferson farm, where he ended his days, dying in 1864.
The Brackenridge tavern stand spoken of was on the road between Perryopolis and Brownsville, near the site of the Mount Vernon Methodist Church. Bryant Taylor was perhaps the first landlord there, and after him Samuel Brackenridge conducted its hospitality for some years. Brackenridge's was a favorite resort, and merry reunions there of young folks were of frequent occurrence. Mr. Brackenridge was peculiar in being easily annoyed, and the mischievous ones of the neighborhood never lost an opportunity to vex and harass him. There was much travel over the road, for it was by that way sand and other supplies were conveyed from Perryopolis to the Albany Glass-Works. Brackenridge kept the tavern until his death in 1840, after which it was closed.

William Forsyth purchased in 1789 a tomahawk right to four hundred acres on the river, and gave in exchange two cows, a bushel of salt, and a gun. Adjoining Forsyth one Isaac Hastings had already made a settlement, but he soon grew tired of staying there and moved away. Eli, son of William Forsyth, threw a cobblestone dam across the river, and for a little time operated a grist-mill on the Forsyth place.

Not far from Albany, at a locality known as Turtle-town, old Billy Norcross was a blacksmith at an early day. He was not a very nice man to look at. Indeed, he was so objectionable in appearance that horses taken to him to be shod utterly refused to go near him until they were blindfolded. At least, such is the story told of him.

William Goe, a Marylander, came to Fayette County in 1789, and located in Jefferson, on the river near Troytown, and there resided until his death. He lived to be nearly a hundred years old, and was buried in a coffin that he had kept in his house for years. He concluded it would be well to have his coffin about him during life, so that he might get used to it, and accordingly ordered Samuel Brown to make one for him. He stored it in his garret, where in due time it became a receptacle for dried fruit, and soon served as a lodging-place for rats. When old Mr. Goe discovered the base uses to which the coffin had come he declared he wouldn't allow himself to be buried in it, and gave it over for the last home of one of his slaves just deceased. For himself a second one was made by Samuel Brown, and in that one Mr. Goe was accustomed to lie occasionally during life, to make sure, perhaps, that he was not outgrowing it. William Goe was eccentric enough to sow his grain while riding horseback through his field, but just why he followed that fashion no one appears to know.

One of the largest distilleries in Fayette was built by Bateman Goe (son of William Goe), on Whiskey Run, about the year 1800. Goe had a still-house, malt-house, and chopping-house, and manufactured great quantities of apple-jack. In 1809 a severe flood came and swept still, malt-house, and all into the Redstone.

A hundred barrels of manufactured whiskey stored in the still-house were carried away in the general wreck, and, like the rest of the property, utterly lost. Nearly forty years afterwards the still "worm" was found buried in the sand on the creek bottom. Mr. Goe rebuilt the distillery and carried it on until his death in 1817. After that his son Henry conducted the business until 1830, and then gave it up. In this connection comes a recollection of a story about W. G. Patterson and John Watson. They wanted some whiskey for harvest-time, and undertook to make it at the old Goe distillery, then abandoned. The whiskey was scorched a little and turned blue, but it passed muster after a fashion, not, however, without some misgivings on the part of the farm hands, who were at first suspicious of the color. Subsequently they gave it the name of bluejay whiskey, and as the manufacturers of the "bluejay" brand, Messrs. Patterson and Watson became famous far and near.

Phillip, another of William Goe's sons, moved to Kentucky, and married a daughter of Daniel Boone. Bateman Goe, the distiller, was grandfather to Robert S. Goe, Gen. John S. Goe, and Mrs. Robert Elliott, of Jefferson. Allusion to Bateman Goe and his distillery suggests the remark that stills were in the early time as plentiful almost as blackberries in June, and that every large farm should have its still-house was expected as a matter of course. David Porter, living near Merrittstown, was the ganger for the government about 1809, and as he embraced within his jurisdiction a large stretch of country, he was kept as busy as a bee.

On Sept. 5, 1784, a tract of land, including four hundred and twenty-three acres, and called "Tunis," was surveyed to Tunis Wells, and in 1790 patented to him for three pounds, ten shillings, and sixpence. Mr. Wells made his settlement about 1780, and, losing his wife by death soon after coming, married for his second wife Margaret Williams. By his first wife he had six children, of whom none are now living. By his second the children were Mary, Joseph, Rachel, Elizabeth, Margaret, James, Jacob, and Charlotte. The only one living is Charlotte, whose home is in Iowa. James died in Jefferson, Jacob in Ohio, and Joseph on the old homestead in 1877. There his widow still lives. Tunis Wells himself died on his Jefferson farm in 1811, and was buried in the Dunlap Creek churchyard. His widow died in 1845. Joseph Wells' widow, now residing on the Tunis Wells place, came with her father, Issachar Shaw, to Jefferson in 1816.

Near the Sharpless paper-mill site William Norris lived on land that he warranted in 1772, Richard Noble on the W. C. Johnson place that he patented in 1785, and John Ray on land now occupied by Joseph and E. D. Stewart, and patented by Ray in 1788. Adam Langhlin lived on a farm adjoining S. R. Nutt's place, where he died in 1811.

Peter Miller, a Quaker, was conspicuous with Jonathan Sharpless as a leading member of the Society of Friends worshipping at Centre Meeting-house, in Redstone. He came to the vicinity of Redstone Creek from New Jersey in 1791, and located land now occupied in part by Thomas Miller, in Jefferson township. Peter Miller was a most excellent gentleman, of particular methods, and famous withal as a model farmer. In illustration of his rustic ideas and non-familiarity with law, it is told that upon being summoned to court as a witness, and being asked how he would swear, insisted upon replying, "I qualify." Much to his and the court's relief, Jonathan Sharpless, there present, came to the rescue with "he affirms."

Mr. Miller and his family were constant and zealous attendants at the Quaker meeting-house in Redstone, whether the young ladies frequently proceeded upon their father's oxen. At the junction of Crab-Apple Run with Redstone Creek may be seen a rock yet known as Quaker Rock, so called from the fact that from the rock the Quakers had thrown a tree across the creek, and thus easily constructed a bridge that served them when they journeyed to church each First Day. Peter Miller had six children. The sons were named David and Joseph. David moved in 1829 to Ohio. Peter, the father, died in Jefferson in 1838, at the age of eighty-five. Joseph died in 1875, aged ninety-two. Of the latter's sons, Thomas and J. D. are residents of Jefferson township.

The place now occupied by Jacob Wolf was originally settled by one McGuire, who sold it to Alexander Deyarmon, a moulder at Jackson & Sharpless' paper-mill. Deyarmon was a very eccentric man, and indulged in such queer freaks of contorting his body and communing with himself while walking out that strangers often thought him demented. He was, on the contrary, a person of exceedingly sound mind and quite shrewd withal. Once, he with his wife, attended divine services at James Patterson's house, where Rev. Mr. Johnston had been preaching. After service the members of the company gathered about the fireside for an after-church conversation. Presently Mrs. Deyarmon asked Mr. Johnston the question, "How long were Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden before they fell?" Mr. Johnston replied, "Well, madame, I have frequently discussed that question with myself, but thus far I have not been able to solve it satisfactorily." At this Mr. Deyarmon jumped up and sharply exclaimed, "I'll tell you, Mr. Johnston, how long Adam remained in the Garden of Eden. He stayed until he got a wife, then he had to quit."

Of Andrew Hammell, who was an early settler on the place now owned by James Easington, it is told that being a strong Covenanter he was most bitterly opposed to the organization of Fairview Methodist Episcopal Church, and when the erection of a church edifice was proposed he prophesied most dire misfortune in the event of the project being consummated. He forbade the members of his family settling foot within the building, and at all times, when occasion offered, lifted his voice in condemnation of the adherents of Methodism. One day he and a lad named James Dunn were riding homeward from mill, and being overtaken by a violent thunder-storm were both with their horses instantly killed by a lightning stroke while passing Fairview Church. When found their bodies were carried into the church, and people pondered over the singular circumstance that when dead Hammell's first resting-place should be the sanctuary that nothing could have induced him to enter while living.

Joshua Clark lived on the Red Lion road before 1860, upon the place now occupied by Archibald Boyd's widow. Clark's son Nathaniel was a schoolteacher, and taught in Jefferson some years. Joshua Clark bought an original tract including the present Amos Cope and James Clark farms, paying for it a horse that cost him forty dollars.

Two of Jefferson's early blacksmiths were Reason Grimes (on the Tunis Wells farm) and James Coulson, on the Mrs. D. Coulson place. Mr. Coulson was noted as a hunter, fisherman, and botanist. Of his resolute character and somewhat eccentric disposition many stories are still extant. His sons, William, Martin, and Sanford, are now among the best known and wealthiest steamboatmen on the upper Missouri. Martin, whose home is in Pittsburgh, once worked for W. G. Patterson for fifteen dollars a month.

Henry Murphy lived on the farm now occupied by Samuel Murphy. Henry's son John lived to be upwards of ninety. James, another son, was a blacksmith on the "pike."

The Copes settled at an early day in the Red Lion neighborhood. They were exceedingly numerous, and ranked among the best known and most highly respected Quakers of Fayette County. The greater portion of the Copes moved from Jefferson to Columbiana County, Ohio, and located at New Salem.

John Lyons settled on the Christian Swartz farm, and George Crawford on a tract that includes the farms of Eli Forsyth and the Messrs. Byers. In the Red Lion neighborhood some of the early comers were the families of Stewart, Stephens, Farquhar, Patterson, Shearer, Ford, Negus, and Clark.

In 1816, Philip Bortnor bought of William Goe the place upon which John Bortnor now lives. Philip set up a wagon-shop there and followed the business many years. In his eighty-fourth year he made a wheel, and it was pronounced a most excellent job. He died in 1847, aged ninety-one.

David Hough, one of the pioneer millers on the Little Red-ton, in Washington township, moved to Jefferson at an early day. In his neighborhood were also Beriel Taylor and Samuel Brown. Samuel Brown was esteemed a mechanical genius of more than ordinary capacity, and according to popular opinion was able to make anything that mechanical skill could produce. For a long time he had a workshop on his place, and manufactured among other useful things a great many cider-press screws, and coffins. Mr. Brown died in 1845, aged eighty-two.

William Parkhill came from Dunbar to Jefferson about 1800, and bought the old Martin Schilling mill property on the Little Redstone, now owned by D. M. Shearer. In 1776 the Schilling mill-site was occupied by John Carmichael, a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1776. Below that point Barzillai Newbold carried on a mill before 1800 on the Krepps place.

Christian Tarr, the potter, lived on the present J. S. Elliott place, and for many years made earthenware there. He was elected to Congress in 1817 and 1819, and served, it is said, with a good deal of credit. Mr. Tarr had on his place a colored man named Charles Smothers, who fought with Perry on Lake Erie, and for whom Mr. Tarr succeeded in obtaining from Congress an allowance of prize money for his share in the capture of the enemy. After Mr. Tarr's death his family removed from Jefferson to Ohio.

The only post-office Jefferson has ever had is the Redstone post-office, in the Pleasant Valley school district. Dennis Smith, who had for some time before that been keeping a store at that point, was appointed postmaster when the office was established in 1836. Successive postmasters and storekeepers were Joseph Wilgus, Hugh Conley, Edward Stephens, Gibson Bains, and James Forsythe, the latter being the present merchant and postmaster.

The people of Jefferson remember with a good deal of distinctness the great wind storm of 1832, which passed through the township over a belt of half mile or more in width and inflicted a great amount of damage. The storm set in after nightfall and continued about two hours. It blew down fences, barns, and houses, killed small stock, and uprooted great trees as if they were twigs, but happily no human lives were lost. Among stories of the freaks of the hurricane one tells how feathers were blown from chickens as completely as if picked by hand. Another that the daughter of Rev. Mr. Rose, lying ill in her father's house, was carried, bed and all, a distance of two hundred yards and set down without the slightest injury, while the house in which she had been lying was utterly demolished. Still another relates that a lot of James Cary's papers were blown from his house through an open window, and one of the documents carried a distance of four miles, to just east of Smithfield, whence it was mailed to Mr. Cary the next day.

W. G. Patterson lost an entire field of wheat, which, ready sheaved, was swept to the four points of the compass, leaving not a straw behind to mark the spot where it stood. Similar instances were common. Some farmers found that after the storm they had no fences left standing. The aggregate loss was very considerable, and the general spoliation consequent upon the blow gave the country a desolate look.

EARLY ROADS.

At the September term of court in 1784, Andrew Linn, Jr., Basil Brown, Samuel Jackson, William Forsythe, William Goe, and John Stephens were appointed viewers upon a petition for a road from Redstone Old Fort to Samuel Jackson's mill, at the mouth of Redstone Creek, and thence to Edward Cook's mill. At the December term the report of the viewers was confirmed. The length of the road was eight miles and a half and thirty-seven perches. At the March term of court in 1788 a road was petitioned for from Peter Patterson's to Samuel Jackson's mill, and at the September session the report of the viewers was confirmed. The names of the viewers were James Crawford, William Campbell, Josiah Crawford, Amos Hough, Thomas Gregg, and William Sparks. At the December sessions in 1789, John Cooper, Richard McGuire, James Patterson, James Finley, and Samuel Jackson were appointed to view a road from Brownsville by Samuel Jackson's mill to Moncraff's Ferry on the Youghiogheny River. In June, 1794, John Fulton, Charles Chaltant, Richard McGuire, Hugh Laughlin, Jeremiah Pears, and Jacob Beson viewed a road from Jackson's new mill to the mouth of the Redstone. In March, 1797, a report of the review of a part of the road from Jackson's mill to Kyle's mill was made by John Patterson, Edward Chambers, Andrew Brown, Moses Davidson, George Crawford, and Joseph Downer. Aug. 15, 1792, an order was issued to James Patterson, William Patterson, John Robison, Peter Miller, Andrew Arnold, and Samuel Freeman to view a road from Andrew Arnold's to Samuel Jackson's new mill. In June, 1798, a petition for a road from Samuel Jackson's new mill to the mouth of Redstone Creek was granted. The viewers were John Work, Ebenezer Finley, Philip Galaday, Samuel Torrance, James Allison, and Hugh Jackson.

The first paper-mill west of the Alleghenies was built upon Redstone Creek, in Jefferson township, and as that incident was a matter of no ordinary importance in the history of Western Pennsylvania, there is good warrant for making detailed reference to it here. In 1791, Jonathan Sharpless, a blacksmith and general mechanic, living in Chester County, Pa., made a western trip to visit his brother-in-law, Solomon C. Phillips, then living in Washington County. While there, Sharpless, who was a stanch member of the Society of Friends, made the acquaintance of Samuel Jackson (also a Friend), who owned and carried on a grist-mill just across the Monongahela at the mouth of Redstone Creek, in what is now Jefferson township. Sharpless made frequent journeys over to Jackson's mill, and in some manner they came to discuss the subject of the want of a paper-mill west of the mountains, and from that to speculate upon the feasibility of themselves supplying the want. The result of their discussions was an agreement to build such a mill upon the Redstone Creek, on some land owned by Jackson. As a precedent thereto Sharpless returned home to provide the sum of fifteen hundred dollars, his half of the capital necessary to start the proposed enterprise, also to further investigate the business of paper-making as conducted on the Brandywine, that the new firm might have some practical knowledge of the business before embarking in it, for neither knew anything of the details of paper manufacture. Sharpless found the work of raising fifteen hundred dollars upon the fruits of his smith-labor a slow process, but within two years he had laid by the amount, and in 1793 he set out with his family for the West, prepared to set the paper-mill in motion. In 1794 the erection of the structure was begun upon the Redstone Creek, in what is now Jefferson township, and on what is the present site of the Parkhill grist-mill, at the mouth of Washwater Run. There was then upon the site an abandoned grist-mill, containing an undershot wheel, but when or by whom that mill had been built is not known.

The paper-mill building was made capacious. Its dimensions were seventy-five by forty, and three stories high, with a half-story cellar on the creek side. The understanding between the partners was that Sharpless should have the sole management of the business, while Jackson should simply provide means, and so, in accordance with that arrangement, Jackson gave his time to his grist-mill business at the mouth of the creek, where he resided, and other important matters, while Sharpless made his home near the paper-mill, and looked closely after matters there. The house in which he lived stood just across the creek in Redstone township. It had been built but a few years, and stands in part yet as a portion of the residence of Joseph Gaidl. It was originally supplied with a "stick" chimney, which Mr. Sharpless replaced in 1799 with the stone chimney now used. Joseph Grist agreed to build the new chimney for eleven dollars, but he was twice as long at it as he expected to be. Nevertheless he held to his bargain, although a poor one, but generous old Mr. Sharpless determined that, bargain or no bargain, Grist should have a fair price for his labor, and so paid him just twice the sum agreed upon. Upon his place Mr. Sharpless had put up a blacksmith's shop, and there, assisted by Nathan Mitchell and John Piersol, worked the iron used in building the mill. Their most important work was the manufacture of six large iron screws intended for pressing the paper. Each screw was five inches in diameter and four feet six inches in length. The threads were cut by horse-power. Sharpless was noted, during his residence in Chester County, as a skillful inventor, and among other things he invented a powerful pressing-screw for use in the United States Mint in Philadelphia. The story goes that when the Mint was in its infancy a visitor remarked upon the poor work made by the coin-pressing machines, saying he knew of a young blacksmith who could make a screw infinitely better than the ones there in use. He named Jonathan Sharpless as the man, and Sharpless was thereupon engaged to make a screw. It proved so satisfactory that he was at once requested to furnish more. His contract completed he was asked to make out his bill, and named two hundred and fifty dollars as his price although, truth to tell, he feared the bill would be rejected as too high, for his work upon the whole job had not covered more than a month's time. "Still," said he, when relating the story afterwards, "I thought the government was rich, and ought to pay me a big price." Not only was the bill not rejected, but it was paid cheerfully and quickly. After paying it the Mint superintendent gleefully remarked, "Mr. Sharpless, those screws are of such value to us that had you asked three times two hundred and fifty dollars you would have got your price."

"That's the time they hit me," remarked the old gentleman while relating the incident years afterwards. As to Mr. Sharpless' shop in Redstone, it may be related in passing that there he made for Capt. Shreve what are said to have been the first steamboat anchors used on the Monongahela River.

Returning to the subject of the paper-mill, the completion of the mill building, tenement-houses for mill-hands, and a small grist-mill was not effected until 1796, in which year the mill was started and the first paper made.

The following editorial is taken from the Washington Telegraph of Jan. 12, 1796, published at Washington, Washington Co., Pa., and refers to this mill:

"We are happy in being able to announce to the public with a considerable degree of confidence that a paper-mill will shortly be erected on this side the mountains; that there is little doubt of its being completed by the ensuing fall. The gentleman who undertakes it is of an enterprising disposition, and capable of going through the business with spirit. The work, for which several preparations are already made, will be erected on a never-failing stream, in a thick-settled part of the country, and close to navigation. The advantages accruing to our community from this addition to its manufactures will be very great, and it behooves every well-wisher to the community to contribute his mite toward the supporting it. It cannot be carried on without a supply of rags. Of these every family can supply more or less, and there will be stores in every town and various parts of the country ready to receive them. Every patriotic family then will doubtless cause all their rags to be preserved and forwarded to some place where they are collected, not so much for the pecuniary advantage to be derived from them as for the pleasure arising from having saved well of their country. We shall shortly be furnished with a list of such stores.

1 Mr. Sharpless wore many years a set of vest buttons that he had himself made and carved with his initials. These buttons are now in the possession of Salina Sharpless of Jefferson.
keepers as can make it convenient to receive them, and shall then announce their names to the public." The Telegraph bearing date May 24, 1796, contains the following advertisement:

"To the Public.

"Samuel Jackson and Co.

"Inform the inhabitants of the Western Country that they are making every exertion to forward the completion of their Paper-Mill, which they are erecting on Redstone, about four miles from Brownsville, in Fayette County, a never-failing stream. That they have experienced Workmen engaged to carry on the work, and hope to be able before the expirat on of the present year to furnish their fellow Citizens with the different kinds of paper usually in demand, of their own manufacture, and of as good quality as any brought from below the mountains. They request their fellow Citizens generally to promote their undertaking by encouraging the saving and collecting of rags, and inform Merchants and Store-keepers in particular that they will give them a generous price in Cash for such clear Linen and Cotton rags as they may collect.

"Redstone, May 19, 1796."

The same paper of June 20, 1797, contains the following notice: "The paper which you now read was manufactured at Redstone, by Messrs. Jackson & Sharpless, and forwarded with a request to publish therein a number of the Telegraph, that the public might judge of their performance."

In the Pittsburgh Gazette of June 24, 1797, appeared the following:

"This paper is made in the Western country. It is with great pleasure we present to the public the Pittsburgh Gazette, printed on paper made by Messrs. Jackson & Sharpless, on Redstone Creek, in Fayette County. Writing-paper, all kinds and qualities, as well as printing-paper, will be made at the mill. This is of great importance to the inhabitants of the country, not only because it will be cheaper than that which is brought across the mountains, but it will keep a large sum of money in the country which is yearly sent out for the article."

The first sheet of paper was dipped by Polly Given, a young woman employed in Jonathan Sharpless' family, to whom she had come from Brownsville. She married Capt. James Patterson in 1801. When Sharpless found that upwards of 80,000 had been laid out in the building of the paper-mill and attachments, instead of the 80,000 reckoned upon, he was somewhat nervous over the great outlay and feared a profitless result, especially as Jackson had furnished the bulk of the capital and held everything in his name, although Sharpless was ostensibly a half-partner. The situation worried Sharpless, for not only all of his money but money belonging to his wife had been put into the affair without any writings to show that he had any claim whatever. Added to that was the information that Mr. Jackson was a sharp one and likely to ignore his partner's claims entirely, in view of the fact that there was no written evidence to them. But Mr. Jackson was the soul of honor in all his transactions with Sharpless, and in 1798 gave him a clear and unquestionable title to one-half of the business, the property, and the profits. The earliest manufacture of the mill was writing-paper, which Sharpless himself carried to Pittsburgh in a two-horse wagon, and there sold as he could find customers. To find them was not difficult, for he placed his goods far below the prices that had ruled before his advent, and at his prices he made a very handsome profit. In his record of the profits he stated that he paid four cents a pound for rags, and sold his paper for one dollar per quire. He used often to tell that when peddling his paper in Pittsburgh he would find his pockets so overloaded with silver that he would have to stop his sales until he could hurry back to the tavern and deposit his coin with the landlord. Then, his pockets being empty, he resumed traffic. In 1797 the mill made chiefly printing-paper, and employed as many as twenty or twenty-five hands.

Samuel Jackson and Jonathan Sharpless carried on the paper-mill together with much profit until 1810, when Sharpless concluded to retire from active participation, and accordingly leased his half-interest to Samuel Jackson for twelve hundred dollars per annum. Jackson thereupon took in as a partner his son Jesse, who had married Jonathan Sharpless' daughter Betsey. Jonathan Sharpless moved to Franklin township, on Redstone Creek, where he had purchased the mill property owned by Jonathan Hill, and which is now owned by Samuel Smock. Mr. Sharpless called the place Salem Mill, built there also a sickle-factory, fulling-mill, blacksmith-shop, etc., and conducted for many years an extensive business. There he died Jan. 20, 1809, at the age of ninety-two, and was buried in the Quaker Cemetery in Centre school district, Redstone township. Upon taking possession with his son of the paper-mill Samuel Jackson removed his residence from the mouth of the creek to the paper-mill, and occupied the stone mansion built by Jonathan Sharpless, near the mill, and yet in good preservation. Upon the death of Samuel Jackson in 1817, Jesse Jackson became the sole proprietor of the paper-mill business, and shortly associated with him Samuel, son of Jonathan Sharpless. In 1822, Jesse Jackson removed to the mouth of Redstone to take charge of the mill there, leaving the paper-mill in the hands of Samuel Sharpless, William Sharpless, and Job Harvey. The latter firm carried on it three years. A time-book kept by them in 1823, still preserved, shows a list of the girls employed at the mill that year. They were named Nellie Shaw, Nancy Castler, Peggy Cochran, Eliza Maxon, Matilda Maxon, Eliza Rose, Ann Shaw, Eliza Dunn, Ann Lyle, Mary Reed, Mary Bowlin, Lucinda Bowlin, and Sabia Robinson. In 1825, William Sharpless and Jefferson Carter succeeded to the business, and in 1832 Samuel Sharpless and his father Jonathan became the proprietors, although the latter took no part in the active management. The next succession was a firm composed of Samuel Sharpless, John Wallace (the latter for many years previously having been the mill foreman), and Richard Huskins. While they were in possession the mill burned, Oct. 28, 1842. The loss was considerable, for the building contained a stock of manufactured paper valued at twenty thousand dollars. All of it was destroyed. That disaster brought the paper business at that point to a close. In 1843-44, Samuel Sharpless erected upon the site the Redstone Flour-Mill, and carried it on until his death in 1846. After that the successive proprietors were James and John B. Patterson, Charles Fouk, Sharpless, Patterson & Baird, Baird, Davidson & Co., Sharpless & Patterson, Linn & Parkhill, and J. P. Parkhill. Mr. Parkhill conducted the business until 1875, since when the property has lain idle.

TOWNSHIP ORGANIZATION AND CIVIL LIST.

At the September sessions of the court in 1839 a petition for the division of the township of Washington was presented. George Craft, Dennis Springer, and Thomas McMillen were appointed commissioners to investigate and report upon the matter of dividing said township. Their report, made at the June session of court in 1840, was as follows:

"We report that we met pursuant to previous notice at the house of Abraham Hough, on Monday, the 11th day of November, 1839; that we then proceeded to make a division of said township of Washington as nearly agreeable to the said order as practicable, making natural boundaries the lines of said new township when the same would arrive at the points mentioned in said order, commencing at a coal-bank on the Monongahela River about ten perches above the mouth of a small run called Cool Ram, on the lands of Abraham Hough; then eastwardly through the lands of said Hough and lands of John Byrte to a point on the north branch of Little Redstone, near a coal-bank on the lands of John Byrte; thence by the meanders of said north branch of the Little Redstone to Evan Cope's sickle shop; thence by a straight line, passing near Hamilton's blacksmith shop, to a point in the line between the lands of Stevens and Asa Chambers; thence by the same to a point in Perry township line, near the residence of Asa Chambers; thence by Perry township line to the line between Franklin and Washington townships, now proposed to be called Jefferson township; thence by said line to Redstone Creek; thence by Redstone Creek to its mouth, thence by the Monongahela River to the place of beginning. The undersigned are of opinion that from what is now called Washington township, and the number of voters residing therein, that the foregoing division is necessary, and they therefore recommend to the Honorable Court to authorize the erection of a new township to be called Jefferson."

At the same sessions the commissioners' report, as above given, was confirmed by the court.

The court record continues:

"And now to wit, June 6th, 1843, the above report having been read in the Court in the manner and at the times prescribed by law, the Court approve and confirm the said alteration."

SCHOOLS.

Early school history in Jefferson is somewhat vague, for previous to 1835 there were no free public schools, and consequently no school records. The first school now recollected as having been taught in Laurel Dale District was held by Mr. O'Conor in 1865. In Washington District school was taught in a log cabin by Nathaniel Clark about the same time Nathaniel's father, Joshua, owned the land upon which the school-house stood. The place is now included in the Boyd farm. In 1871 school was held in one of the unfinished buildings at Albany, intended by Samuel Jackson to be a portion of the Albany Glass-Works. John Sheldon, an Irishman, taught there and in the neighborhood a good many years.

CHURCHES.

LITTLE REDSTONE CHURCH.

Little Redstone Church was organized by Rev. Jacob Jennings in a log cabin that stood close to where the town hall now stands. The year of the organization is supposed to have been 1797, although the loss of the early church records renders positive evidence upon that point unobtainable. For the same reason the names of the constituent members of the organization cannot be given. The first elders chosen were Joseph Lyon, John Blythe, Sr., and John Wells. Among those who served as elders in the early history of the church may also be mentioned William Steele, John Steele, John McKinnon, John Hazlip, Peter Humrickhouse, John Gormly, William Forsyth, Nicholas Baker, J. H. Duncan, Henry Barkman, David Hough, William Hough, Joseph Wells, James Jennings, J. V. Gibbard, and William Parkhill. Little Redstone Church was supplied with preaching by the pastors of Dunlap's Creek Church, and when Rev. Mr. Jennings ended his pastorate Rev. William Johnston took charge. During his term of service the organization at Little Redstone was discontinued and its members transferred to the Brownsville Church. In 1844 Little Redstone was reorganized by the election of William Steele, John Steele, John Wells, and John Blythe as elders. A brick church was built in 1845, about a half-mile north of the old location (William Elliott, William Forsyth, and William G. Patterson being the building committee), and a churchyard laid out. Rev. Thomas Martin assumed the pastorate and remained until 1848, when he was succeeded by Rev. Robert M. Wallace. Mr. Wallace remained until 1860. His successors to the present time have been Revs. Joseph H. Stevenson, George Scott, R. R. Gailey, and C. C. B. Duncan. The latter was the pastor in April, 1881. The present membership is ninety. The trustees in April, 1881, were S. R. Nett and John N. Dixon.

FAIRVIEW (METHODIST EPISCOPAL) CHURCH.

Fairview was organized in 1828, with something like forty or fifty members. Among those who took a leading part in effecting the organization were Samuel Goe, Robert Dunn, Stacy Hunt, William Ball, Jacob Wolf, and William Condon. After using the stone school-house a year for meetings the congregation built a frame church in 1829, and in 1849 built the present brick edifice. The present pastor is Rev. J. J. Mitchell, who preaches once in two weeks. The membership is now about sixty. The class-leader is Johnson Noble, who is also superintendent of the Sunday-school, which has enjoyed a continuous and prosperous existence since Sept. 15, 1839. The church trustees are Playford Cook, George Krepps, Johnson A. Noble, Joseph W. Miller, J. D. Miller, Alexander W. Jordan, James Essington, John Stephens, and Charles Stuckslager. Some of the early pastors of Fairview were Revs. Thornton Fleming, Jacob Young, James Wilson, William Monroe, Christopher Frye, Joshua Monroe, Thomas Jenison, Asa Shinn, David Sharp, John Spencer, Charles Elliott, Robert Boyd, William Stephens, — Bascom, J. G. Sanson, John Erwin, Warner Long, and Samuel Wakefield.

BELLEVUE (PROTESTANT METHODIST) CHURCH.

Bellevue Church was organized in 1832, by Rev. Mr. Dunlevy, of the Brownsville Circuit, in the church building of the Fairview Methodist Episcopal congregation. Among the prominent constituent members were Thomas Barton and wife, Robert Iserwood and family, Alexander Blair and wife, and Robert Dunn and wife. The major portion of the organizing members had been connected with Fairview, and at Fairview as well as at the school-house meetings were held until 1855, when Bellevue Church was erected. The first trustees were H. B. Goe, Thomas Barton, and Robert Dunn. A Sunday-school was not organized until 1856, Previous to that, Fairview had a Union Sunday-school. Rev. Mr. Dunlevy was the first pastor at Bellevue. After him some of the earliest pastors were Revs. Cryington, Palmer, Hull, Valentine Lucas, Henry Lucas, Taylor, Colehour, Crowther, and Stillwagon. Bellevue had at one time a membership of seventy-five, but can boast now of but about forty communicants. Among the early class-leaders were Alexander Blair, Robert Dunn, Thomas Burton, T. W. Dunn, and Jacob Wolf. The present pastor is Henry Lucas, and the leader, Thomas W. Dunn. The trustees are Jacob Wolf, S. W. Reed, and William Bradman.

MOUNT VERNON CHURCH (PROTESTANT METHODIST).

Mount Vernon was at one time a prosperous organization, but since 1872 it has had a precarious existence, and at present may be considered as virtually dissolved. No regular preaching has been enjoyed there for some time. A church building was erected in 1855. In 1872, Francis Herron, the mainstay of the society, removed from the township, and being soon followed by other members, the speedy decline of the church followed. There was an organization of Methodist Episcopalists at Mount Vernon in 1849, but it failed in a few years for want of support.

On the Boyd farm in Washington School District an Episcopal Church stood in 1845. It was a log cabin, minus doors or windows, and had for a pulpit a rough desk, under which the rector's surplice was usually kept. This looseness in hiding the priestly robes led to their being abstracted by certain mischievous spirits, and a consequent dismay when the rector next came and searched for his garments that were non cet. Joshua Clark donated seven acres of land for the church and churchyard. The property was for many years assayed to the Church of England. It is thought the church was built as early as 1800. In 1806 the Episcopalians gave up their meetings, and for a while The coal deposits beneath the soil of Jefferson township are said to extend beneath the entire area of territory, except a small portion in the southeast. The so-called Pittsburgh nine-foot vein prevails here, and the deposits are therefore of an exceedingly valuable nature. Thus far, however, developments in the way of important mining operations for shipment have been confined to the river-front, for the reason that only by means of the river has there been ready transportation to coal-consuming centres. The contemplated completion of the Redstone Extension Railroad along the course of the Redstone Creek will offer an outlet for the product of the creek coal region, and the opening of the railway will of course be the signal for the opening on the Redstone in Jefferson township of extensive mining enterprises. Something like four thousand acres of coal lands lying along the creek have long been owned by the Redstone Coal Company, which has been waiting simply for the march of railway progress to bring forth its hidden treasures.

Upon the river, in Jefferson, coal-mining has been carried on to a greater or lesser extent since 1834, and engages at present the attention of six different mining companies, who ship annually millions of bushels, employ hundreds of hands, and have upon investment hundreds of thousands of dollars. In the olden days mining was pursued according to primitive methods. The coal was wheeled from the pit to the river bottom and there dumped, to remain until such a time as the water in the river became high. Water being plentiful the coal was dumped into flats and floated down the stream to Pittsburgh or other points. Similarly coal was mined along the Little Redstone, and floated out in the same way upon the coming of high water. The largest operators on the river in Jefferson at present are Turnbull & Hall, who have been mining there since 1871. They have a river-front of half a mile (or from the Washington line to Troytown), owned from the commencement from six hundred to seven hundred acres of coal, and of that quantity have three hundred acres still to be mined. They have two openings. Both reach from the river to Little Redstone Creek, while one passes under the creek and so on. Turnbull & Hall have a capacity for mining eighteen thousand bushels of lump coal daily, and employ ordinarily one hundred and twenty-five men. They own a steam tow-boat and forty-three coal-boats, possess also forty tenders in which their miners live; they disseise monthly about twelve thousand dollars in wages, carry on a store for the convenience of their hands, and have upon investment in their business about one hundred thousand dollars.

Adjoining Turnbull & Hall on the west is a miners' village, known for years as Troytown, from one James Troy, who about 1855 began mining operations there and erected a score or more of tenements. The landed interests have been, however, owned in chief for many years by Adam Jacobs, of Brownsville, who has leased the coal privileges to various parties from time to time. Among the mining operators at that point after the departure of James Troy were Thornton Chalfant, Mark Winnet, John Bortner, and Daniel Bortner. Armstrong & Jacobs took the business in September, 1880, and employ at present twenty hands. They get out from three thousand to four thousand bushels daily. Their working territory includes about one hundred acres. Next above the Troytown Works is the Forsyth mine, operated by Harris & Brother, who have two hundred acres under lease and mine about three thousand bushels daily.

Adjoining the Harris place is the White Pine coal-mine, which has been abandoned since 1876, when John Stofft was the lessee. The Forsyth tract has been leased to the extent of two hundred acres by the Little Alps Company, and will be mined in the autumn of 1881. At the Marchand mine, in the river bend, Eli Leonard now takes out from three thousand to four thousand bushels of coal daily, and employs a force of thirty-five men. At the Bud Coal-Works the Little Alps Company has been operating quite extensively since 1873, but that tract, like the Marchand Mine, shows signs of exhaustion. The Little Alps Company's works include the coal under an area of about seventy acres, produce at the rate of six hundred thousand bushels annually, and give employment to fifty men. Next to the Little Alps Works, going up the river, lie the works of Morgan & Dixon, who have been at work since 1874. They owned originally one hundred acres of coal, of which they have yet about fifty to be mined. Their working force averages from forty to sixty men, and their yield is about twenty thousand bushels weekly. They own a steam tow-boat and eighteen coal-boats. Between Morgan & Dixon and the mouth of the Redstone Creek there is an abundance of coal, but as yet the deposits have not been developed.

The Redstone Coal Company, alluded in the foregoing as owning about four thousand acres of coal lands along the Redstone Creek, was organized in May, 1873, by Westmoreland County capitalists. At the head was A. L. McFarland, and associated with him were Messrs. H. D. Foster, Edward Cowan, William Welsh, George Bennett, F. Z. Shellenberg, Israel Painter, the McClellans, and others. They bought coal lands on Redstone Creek, reaching from the mouth of the creek to Vance's mill, and as a condition precedent to their purchases agreed to construct a railway through their territory. The railway company was accordingly formed, with J. H. Bowman as president, and a majority of the directors of the Redstone Coal Company as directors of the railway company. Subscriptions to the amount of one hundred thousand dollars were received from people living along the line, and work upon the road was begun without much delay. The plan was to grade from Brownsville to Mount Braddock, where connection was to be made with the Southwest Pennsylvania Railroad. Smith and Prindiville took the contract for grading. Prindiville completed his portion of the work, but Smith retired from the field before he had fairly begun. His part of the unfinished contract was sold to Campbell & Co., of Altoona, who upon winding up their affairs with the railway company found themselves unable to get much satisfaction upon their unpaid claim of about twelve thousand dollars. They entered suit and obtained judgment, whereupon, in 1879, the road was sold by the sheriff, and bid in by Mr. Prindiville for seventeen thousand dollars. He sold out to Charles Spear, of Pittsburgh, who took in George E. Hogg and Adam Jacobs, of Brownsville, and they in turn sold their interests in the fall of 1880 to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. Meanwhile nothing was done upon the road after the bed had been graded to Vance's mill, but upon the acquisition of possession by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company measures were set on foot to push the work to completion with such effect that the road is now nearly ready for the running of trains from Brownsville to Uniontown. The Redstone Coal Company remains still intact, F. Z. Shellenberg being the president, and S. S. Graham secretary and treasurer, and awaits simply the completion of the railway line to begin the development of the coal-mines.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES,

DR. LOUIS MARCHAND.

In the year 1770, Dr. David Marchand, the ancestor of the Marchands now residing in Western Pennsylvania, settled on Little Sewickly Creek, about six miles southwest of Greensburg, Westmoreland Co., Pa. He was born in the canton of Berne, Switzerland, and emigrated at an early age with his father, David Marchand, to the British colonies in America, and settled near Hagerstown, Md. His father was a Huguenot, and fled his country on account of religious persecution.

Dr. David was a physician of rare ability. He practiced in Westmoreland and adjoining counties, and so great was the number of patients who applied to him at his office that he established a hospital near his home, to which many persons resorted for medical treatment. He died July 22, 1809, in the sixty-fourth year of his age, and his remains sleep in the cemetery of Brash Creek Church, of which he was a liberal supporter. His old German wooden-backed Bible contains this entry upon the first page:

"These are the children which the Lord hath given me. Will the Lord keep them to walk in His way, that in their conduct in life and in death they may, in Christ, grow in patience and virtue:

"Catharine, born March 8, 1767.
"Elizabeth, born Nov. 5, 1768.
"Judith, born Jan. 12, 1772.
"Daniel, born Dec. 8, 1773.
"Esther, born Aug. 23, 1775.
"David, born Dec. 19, 1776.
"Louis, born June 23, 1782."

The daughters all married and settled in Westmoreland County, Pa. The sons all became physicians, and all eminent in their profession, and their distinguished ability, and that of their father, connected the name Marchand in the most prominent manner with the medical profession in that early day. Dr. David, Jr., located in Westmoreland County. He possessed great popularity as a citizen and a man, and was twice elected to Congress, and returned home with a pure and good record. He was the father of nine children, seven sons, all professional men. Dr. Daniel settled in Uniontown, Fayette Co.

Dr. Louis Marchand read medicine with his father, and graduated from the University of Pennsylvania in 1809. He then located upon the Marchand homestead farm, in Jefferson township, Fayette Co., five miles below Brownsville, on the Monongahela River, where he practiced his profession for a few years. Upon the death of his brother Daniel he located in Uniontown. While there he married (about 1823) Sarah, daughter of Dr. Samuel Sackett, who lived on Georges Creek, one mile south of Smithfield. He continued to practice his profession in Uniontown until 1843, when he retired from practice and removed to his farm in Jefferson township, where he led a quiet life until his death, Jan. 11, 1857. His remains rest in the family graveyard upon the farm where he spent his declining years. He was long a member of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, and became a member at the time of its organization in Uniontown. He had the profoundest reverence for God and sacred things, and had implicit faith in the atonement of Christ. Many remember him kindly for his valuable services, and bless his memory for his disinterested love. He practiced medicine from love for his profession, and from a desire to do good to suffering humanity. He was an esteemed citizen and true patriot. "His life was gentle, and the elements so mixed in him that Nature might stand up and say to all the world, this is a man." He had nine children, seven of whom grew to manhood and womanhood,—Elizabeth, married to A. I. Miller; Samuel Sackett Marchand, who was a physician, and noted for ability and skill in his profession. He was educated at Madison College, Fayette County, and Cleveland Medical College. He practiced in Westmoreland County, Pa., and entered the army during the late war as captain of Company H, 150th Regiment (Col. Bayne's). He was wounded at the battle of Fredericksburg, Dec. 13
HISTORY OF FAYETTE COUNTY, PENNSYLVANIA.

1862, and died in Libby Prison, Feb. 28, 1863. His remains were interred at Richmond, but have since been removed to the family burial-ground on the farm in Jefferson township.

The third child, Rachel, married A. I. Miller as his second wife. The other children were Mary Louisa, who married Thomas W. Lilly; Frances Caroline, who married John W. Ward; Lucius A., who married Minerva Vanbrugh, and resides upon the old homestead; and Catharine B., married to Ellis W. Lilly.

WILLIAM FORSYTH.

William Forsyth was born in Jefferson township, Fayette Co., Pa., Aug. 28, 1799; died July 20, 1878; Scotch-Irish stock. He was married, Sept. 18, 1828, to Jane P. Steele, daughter of John Steele, of Jefferson township. Jane died Jan. 24, 1882.

They had eight children,—John, born July 2, 1829, died Sept. 4, 1852; Eli S., married to Kate E. Wood; Nancy J., married to Joseph S. Elliott; William Johnson, married to Lizzie R. Daily; Elizabeth D., married Isaac T. Crouch; Mary A., married to Louis S. Miller; James S., married to Mary E. Morton; Ruth A., married to W. Frank Hough.

Mr. Forsyth was engaged in farming all his life. He was also a coal merchant, and was successful in all his business. He was a model farmer. He and his wife were members of the Presbyterian Church at Brownsville, where he held the office of elder. When Little Redstone Presbyterian Church was organized, about 1849, he was chosen a ruling elder there, and continued in that position until his death. He was an exemplary Christian, respected and beloved by all who knew him. He was quiet, unostentatious, and benevolent.

His grandfather, William, settled upon the Forsyth homestead in 1775. He came from the Eastern Shore, Md. The farm was known as "Wolves' Harbor." He had eleven children. William's father, Eli, was one of the younger. He was born about 1770. He married Jane McKee, who emigrated from Ireland when about seventeen. They had eleven children, William being the oldest.

WILLIAM ELLIOTT.

William Elliott was born in Jefferson township, April 5, 1814, and died July 21, 1878. He was of Scotch-Irish stock, and was educated in common schools and Georges Creek Academy. He was married, April 12, 1837, to Eliza Jane Connell, of Luzerne township. They had eight children,—James Stokely, married to Jane Wood; Annie Mary, married to Robert R. Abrams; George Pratt, deceased; Margaret Davidson; Matilda Florence, married to William Craft; Virginia Bell, married to William P. Allen; Sarah Emma, married to Frank V. Jeffries, and is dead; and Louisa Searight, unmarried.

Mr. Elliott was born in the old Elliott homestead, about a mile from where his family now resides, to which place he moved in 1837, and led the life of a farmer the rest of his years. He held a number of township offices, and was collector of internal revenue for Fayette County, receiving his appointment in 1882. He and his wife joined the Presbyterian Church soon after their marriage. Mr. Elliott was a successful business man. He was honest, and enjoyed the respect of his neighbors. He left his family in very comfortable circumstances. He had but little, if any, aid when starting out in life, and gathered what he had and which his family now enjoy by his own energy and good management.

JOSEPH S. ELLIOTT.

Joseph S. Elliott is the son of James Elliott, whose father, William, came into Fayette County from Westmoreland County at an early day, and had what is now called "the old Elliott homestead," in Jefferson township, patented. His wife was Ruth Crawford. They had eleven children. James was the fifth child and only son who grew to manhood, and was born in Jefferson township, April 25, 1783, and was a farmer. June 3, 1813, he married Mary Cunningham, of Rostraver township, Westmoreland Co. They had ten children,—William, James C., Edward J., Robert, Ruth, Mary A., Joseph S., Alexander, Sarah R., and Martha,—all of whom grew to maturity.

Joseph S. Elliott was born at the old Elliott homestead, Jefferson township, Fayette Co., Pa., April 18, 1827. His school education was limited. His business education, gathered from observation and contact with business men, is excellent. He was married Oct. 7, 1852, to Nancy J. Forsyth. They have six children,—William F., married to Laura A. Wells; Violette H., married to Joseph A. Cook; Orphant P., Ida J., Eva M., and Grace F.

Mr. Elliott spent his early life upon his father's farm. In 1850 he began work for himself upon the farm where he now resides, and has ever since been engaged in farming and stock-dealing. He is a shrewd, energetic, successful business man, one of the real business men of the county. He makes money and enjoys it, and has one of the most comfortable homes in the county. He has no church record, but is a liberal supporter of all causes which he deems worthy. His business status among those who know him is as good as need be. He has held the usual township offices intrusted to business men in a business township. His possessions are chiefly stock and lands. He owns a thousand acres of good land as there is in Western Pennsylvania, and all underlaid with bituminous coal except one hundred and thirty-two acres. He has made his own fortune, with the assistance of a most excellent wife. Mrs. Elliott is a lady of rare general intelligence, and has a wider knowledge of the requirements of business life than have most ladies, and has always eagerly united with her husband in his various enterprises, while at the same time paying special attention to domestic affairs.

A lesson for the young men of Fayette County may be gleaned from Mr. Elliott's career in the fact that he began with but little means, and, contrary to Horace Greeley's well-known advice to young men, refused to "Go West," he holding that a dollar earned here in a settled country is worth two wrought out in the far West. So he settled down in Jefferson township, and went into debt in the purchase, against the judgment of his neighbors one and all, of the "Tark farm," feeling that if he could not make a great sum of money on it he could at least so manage as to make of it a good practical savings-bank, which would on sale render up whatever deposits he might make in it; and by extreme industry, by tact in management, and by possessing himself of and applying the best arts of agriculture, under a system of mixed farming, including the raising of sheep for their fleeces, etc., demonstrate that Fayette County is as good a land as any in the West, or anywhere else, to stay at home in and grow up to fortune.

HENRY BATEMAN GOE.

Mr. Henry B. Goe, late of Jefferson township, but now a resident of Allegheny City, Pa., is the great-grandson of William Goe, a native of Scotland, who migrated to America at an early day and settled in Prince George's County, Md., near what is now known as Upper Marlboro, a suburb of Baltimore. William Goe was there married to Elizabeth Turner, a daughter of John Turner, Jr. He was a planter and slave-holder, but boasted that he never sold a slave. He died in the summer of 1762, leaving a widow and two children,—William, Jr., and Margaret. William Goe, Jr., was born Aug. 4, 1729, and, like his father, was a planter and slave-holder, and was married, Nov. 28, 1754, to Dorcas Turner, a daughter of Philip Turner, and who was born May 4, 1735. They had fourteen children. William, Jr., with his family, migrated from Maryland to Fayette County (then Somerset County, Va.) about 1773, and settled on a farm on the east side of the Monongahela River, between it and Little Redstone Creek, near where the creek unites with the river. He died March 27, 1824, and was buried in a vault of his own construction on the farm. Of the number of his children was one named Henry Bateman Goe (the father of the present H. B. Goe), and who was born in Upper Marlboro', before referred to, June 14, 1770, and came to Fayette County with his father when three years old. After reaching maturity he went to Maryland, and there made the acquaintance of Susan Gettings (born Oct. 2, 1763), a daughter of Phillip and Elizabeth Gettings, of Prince George County, and whom he married Feb. 16, 1792. She died June 30, 1837, and was buried in the same vault with her father-in-law, William Goe, Jr., and her husband, who had died twenty years before her.

Henry B. Goe, Sr., was an unusually active and prompt business man, and lived on a farm east of Brownsville, and near Great Redstone Creek. His farm was patented in the name of "Friendship," by which it is known to this day. Besides carrying on his farm, he ran a mill and distillery located on the farm. He also traded on the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers, going as far as New Orleans by flat-boats, and returning home overland by bridle-path through the wilderness.

At one time, in 1806, failing to make at New Orleans satisfactory sale of a cargo, he crossed over to Cuba, and sold out in Havana. He died Oct. 28, 1817, leaving a widow and an only child, Henry Bateman Goe, Jr., whose name is the caption of this sketch, and who was born on Friendship farm, Dec. 29, 1803. He inherited Friendship farm of three hundred acres, and the adjoining "Springfield farm" of two hundred and fifty acres, together with a smaller farm near by these and a section of land below Zanesville, Ohio. His father dying when he was but fourteen years old, his mother, a woman of wonderful energy, assisted him at first in carrying on the farms and the distillery. He was married, Jan. 29, 1824, to Catharine Shotwell, a daughter of John and Sarah Shotwell, of Fayette County, and continued to operate the farm in connection with his mother until her death, when he came into full possession of the estate of his father, and conducted the farm and distillery as his principal active business until about 1832, when he abandoned the distillery and entered upon the scientific improvement of his farms and the raising of improved stock, and soon became a noted breeder, for those days, of short-horned cattle and merino sheep. He about that time raised an excellent flock of improved merino sheep, descended from the Atwood stock and that of the early importers. His short-horns were better known than his merinos, and perhaps he carried their improvement still farther than he did that of his sheep. He continued actively engaged in the stock-raising business until the fall of 1866, when he relinquished it into the hands of his son, John S. Goe, who, in the course of three or four years, closed it out for him. In 1866, Mr. Goe sold his farm to his son, Robert S. Goe, and moved to Allegheny City, and entered into the oil business in Pittsburgh and Bradford, Pa., and is still interested in the business.

In religion he is a Disciple, or Christian, and was baptized by immersion, together with his wife, in December, 1826. He has for many years held the office of elder in the church, and has been a liberal contributor to missionary and other church causes.

Mr. and Mrs. Goe, having lost one child, are the parents of nine living children,—John S., H. Bateman, Mrs. Susan Gettings Newcomer, Mrs. Sarah Caroline Elliott, Robert S., Mrs. E. S. Gans, Joel S., Rose S., and Laura.
JOHN S. GOE.

John S. Goe, the oldest son of Henry Bateman Goe, a biographical sketch of whom precedes this, was born on Friendship farm, Jefferson township, Dec. 13, 1825. Gen. Goe enjoys to-day a world-wide reputation as the breeder of the finest flocks of pure-bred merino sheep in the world, and as one of the breeders of the best herds of thoroughbred, short-horned cattle to be found. The raising of pure-bred domestic animals and the improvement of his farm have been the special aspirations, aims of ambition, and labors of his life, and, as is conceded by his most envious competitors even, his labors have been crowned with signal success. His stock is sought for from all the States and Territories of the Union, from Mexico and Australia, colonies of his stock having been sent out from his farm to all the States and the countries above named. The fame of his stock, thus widely spread, is a just one, for his short-horns are descendants from special selections from the great herds of the old English breeders, the Collings, Whiticar, Stevenson, Mason, Bates, and Booth. In his herd are descendants of one of the most famous bulls which ever smirched the air, "The Duke of Oneida," 9927, and his dam, "The 10th Duchess of Geneva," said to have been the best pure Duchess in America. She was sold at the great sale of short-horns at New York Mills in 1874 for thirty-five thousand dollars to a foreign purchaser, who took her to England, where she was recognized as the best pure Duchess in that country.

Gen. Goe's experience as an exporter has not always been a smooth one. He has had many obstacles to surmount. The first exportation of his sheep to Australia, in response to an order from there, comprised a struggle of three years or more with the English government. Importation into Australia was forbidden by an old and obsolete law, under penalty of confiscation and fine, and perhaps imprisonment also. The Australian purchaser of Gen. Goe's sheep, after having forwarded a draft of six hundred pounds sterling and an unlimited letter of credit to pay expenses, found himself foiled by the captain of the steamer "City of New York" and by envious Australian breeders who took advantage of the law, and finally a special permit was prayed for from Parliament to land the sheep in Australia, which permit was granted about two years after it was first applied for.

Gen. Goe, having previously held the position of major of the First Independent Squadron of Dragoons of uniformed militia of Pennsylvania, in the Second Brigade of the Seventeenth Division, obtained his title of brigadier-general by commission issued by Governor William Bigler on the 29th day of June, 1834, giving him command of the Second Brigade of the Seventeenth Division of the forces of the Commonwealth.

Oct. 6, 1846, Gen. Goe married Miss Catharine E. Colvin, then residing near Freeport, Harrison Co., Ohio. They have five children,—Dorcus C., John S., Jr., Eva C., Emma Virginia, and Irene.

WILLIAM G. PATTERSON.

William G. Patterson, of Jefferson township, is of Irish descent. He thinks that his great-grandfather was born on the ocean, while his parents were on the way to America. His grandfather, William Patterson, came with three brothers into Fayette County from Dauphin County, Pa., about 1780. His father, James Patterson, was born in Dauphin County in 1771, and about 1801 married Mary Given, a native of Ireland. They had ten children; William G. was the fourth. James Patterson was a captain in the war of 1812. His business was farming, distilling, and teaming. He located on the farm where his son, William G., now lives, about the time the county was organized. He commanded a company in the State militia for many years.

William G. Patterson was born in Jefferson township, upon the farm where he now resides, Dec. 20, 1809, and was educated in the common schools. He was married April 6, 1854, to Mrs. Edith Nichols Craft, daughter of Samuel Sharpless, of Jefferson township. They have three living children,—Samuel S., Mary E., Minerva C. Amanda, another child, is dead. Mr. Patterson's entire life has been passed in Jefferson, except a few years spent in California, Pa., while educating his children. He has been a farmer and general business man all his life, and has been successful. He is a member of the Presbyterian Church, and has been a justice of the peace and held other important town offices. Mr. Patterson is a useful and honorable citizen, respected by his neighbors and all who have known him in life.

CHRISTIAN SWARTZ.

Christian Swartz was born in Germany, near the Rhine, Jan. 6, 1806. He died in Jefferson township, Fayette Co., Feb. 25, 1873. He was educated in the public schools of Germany, and emigrated to America in 1835, landing at Charleston, S. C., and then went to Baltimore. He there took a road-wagon and traveled to Westmoreland County, Pa., near Mount Pleasant, where he rented a farm. There he married Elizabeth Seiglingher, who had emigrated from Germany with him. They remained in Westmoreland County eight years. Then they located in Tyrone township, Fayette Co., where they remained four years. They settled where the family now lives in 1846. They had six children, five of whom are living,—Susan, married to Hugh Laughlin; John, married first to Maggie Blair, again to Mary Kreppe; Christian, married to Mary Jane Clark, who is dead; Lizzie, unmarried; Joseph, unmarried; James, married first to Mary S. Lytle, again to Catharine Beck.
Abraham Boyd
Christian Swartz was a farmer, and one of the best in the county.

Mr. Swartz and his wife had about three dollars when he married and settled in Westmoreland County. By industry and economy he accumulated a good deal of property, leaving his children lands, bonds, etc. He was a member of the Presbyterian Church before he left Germany. He united with Little Redstone Presbyterian Church soon after coming to Fayette County. He was noted for his piety, and was a useful citizen. Mr. Swartz had the respect of all who knew him, and was specially known and esteemed by his neighbors as a kind father to his family, as a faithful friend and honest citizen, upright in all his dealings with his fellow-men. Mrs. Swartz, now seventy-two years of age (1882), survives him, together with three sons and two daughters. Another son, Christian, died in the spring of 1878.

WILLIAM HOUGH.

The Hough families of the old stock in this country are known to have descended from a William Hough, who emigrated from Cheshire County, England, and located first near Plymouth, and then at Gloucester, Mass., and finally at New London, Conn., where he died Aug. 10, 1683, or from Richard and John Hough, who also came from Cheshire, England, in the ships "Endeavor" and "Friendship," in the year 1688, and settled in Bucks County, Pa.

David Hough was the first of the name to settle in Fayette County. He emigrated from Eastern Pennsylvania at an early day, and located upon a farm still occupied by his descendants. He was a tiller of the soil, and lived an industrious, useful life. He married Barbara Orrally. They had twelve children. David died March 3, 1838, aged eighty-four years. Barbara died Oct. 11, 1841, aged sixty-two years.

The subject of this sketch, William Hough, was the sixth son of David and Barbara Hough, and was born in Fayette County in 1812, a few months after the declaration of war against Great Britain. He received his early education in the district schools, and spent most of his life upon the farm of his parentage, where for more than half a century his labor and attention were given to agriculture. His first vote was cast for Gen. Andrew Jackson. Becoming dissatisfied with the policy of the Democratic party, he united with the Whig party, and continued in that faith until the organization of the Republican party, when he joined it, and continued an earnest supporter of its principles until his death.

William Hough was married Nov. 7, 1833, to Catherine Fisher, of Rostraver township, Westmoreland Co., Pa., and there were born to them five sons and four daughters, of whom seven are still living, viz.: Elvira, married to Richard Brown; Abia Allen, married to Mary Atkinson; George F., married to Elizabeth Weaver; David S., married to Elizabeth Krepp; Deraza, married to Daniel Bostner; William F., married to Ruth Forsyth; Clara, married to Ewing McCurdy.

Mr. Hough held a number of township offices, always discharging the duties satisfactorily. He was for many years a devoted member of the Presbyterian Church, and for several years a ruling elder in Little Redstone Church of that communion. During his latter years he was much afflicted with paralysis, which terminated his life Feb. 13, 1876.

He was held in high esteem by his neighbors. His Christian life challenged the respect of all who knew him. His life was one of industry, and he left his family a valuable inheritance, namely, a good name, lands, etc.

ARCHIBALD BOYD.

The late Archibald Boyd, of Jefferson township, was born July 4, 1759, in North Huntingdon township, Westmoreland Co., Pa. He was of Scotch-Irish descent, and was educated in the common schools, learned the business of farming, and worked with his father until he was twenty-one years of age. He then engaged in droving. This he followed until his marriage, Jan. 29, 1833, to Margaret Hunter, of Westmoreland County. He then rented a farm, and worked it for six years. After that he moved to Stewartville, and kept a hotel for one year. He next bought a farm in South Huntingdon township, Westmoreland Co. Here he remained for twelve years, when he bought the present homestead of his offspring, and here he lived until the time of his death, Oct. 9, 1879.

He had three children,—Robert, married to Margaret A. Gray, and who is a farmer, and lives upon the Boyd homestead. His children are Jennie G., Maggie V., Mary E., Carrie E., George M., and Onde O. William, who was born March 13, 1836, and died April 13, 1881.

Mary, who married John H. Bryson. They reside in North Union, Fayette Co. They have seven living children,—Maggie V., Susan V., Andrew O., William H., Melvin H., Robert E., Lulu May.

Archibald Boyd held the usual township offices. He was a member of the Little Redstone Presbyterian Church. His pecuniary start in the world was small. By industry and judicious management he increased this largely, and left his progeny all well situated. He was a first-class farmer, a valuable citizen, a good man.

His father, Robert Boyd, was a native of Adams County, Pa. He married Elizabeth Larimer, of Chester County, Pa. They moved soon after marriage to Westmoreland County, where most of their children were born. They had nine. Archibald was the fourth.
LOUIS SOWERS MILLER.

Louis S. Miller is the grandson of Israel Miller, in his day a leading business man of Brownsville, Fayette Co., and the only child of Augustus I. Miller, a native of the same place. Israel Miller was born April 6, 1783, and on May 5, 1810, married Anna Maria Sowers, daughter of Michael and Dorothy Sowers, who was born June 29, 1790. Michael Sowers was one of the earliest business men of this region, and was born Oct. 16, 1762. Israel Miller died April 16, 1871. Mrs. Anna M. Miller died May 5, 1850, in her sixtieth year. Israel and Anna Maria Miller were the parents of eleven children, five sons and six daughters, of whom was Augustus I. Miller, who was born Feb. 2, 1821, the third in number of the sons. On Nov. 13, 1845, he married Elizabeth K. Marchand, daughter of Dr. Louis and Sarah Sackett Marchand, of Uniontown, Pa. He was a soldier in the war of the Rebellion, and enlisted among the three months' troops in April, 1861, joining the Twelfth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, and after the expiration of that period of enlistment enlisted in November, 1861, for the term of three years, being attached to Company H, Seventh Regiment Pennsylvania Cavalry, and died at Louisville, Ky., Aug. 19, 1863, of disease contracted while in the service.

Louis S. Miller was born in Brownsville, Fayette Co., Pa., March 16, 1848. His early education was received in the public schools, his business education in Iron City Commercial College and the business world. His mother dying when he was two days old, his early life was spent with his grandmother, Mrs. Dr. Louis Marchand. He was married Nov. 10, 1870, to Mary A. Forsythe. They have five children,—Laura, Frank, Oliver, Jennie, and Lizzie. He has occupied his present residence three years. His farm is worked by tenants under his direction. He devotes most of his time to the coal business. His neighbors regard him as a good business man.

JOSEPH WELLS.

It sometimes happens that refined feelings, the domestic virtues, and true nobility of character adorn and brighten the obscurity of a country home, and achieve for the possessor all the happiness and comfort that cultivated society and enlightened civilization can give. Instinctively just and upright in his dealings with his fellow-men, kind-hearted and charitable to the poor, careful and attentive to his business, thrifty and economical, but single-minded and generous,—in short, a good illustration of the domestic and social virtues,—such a man was Joseph Wells, late of Jefferson township, Fayette Co., Pa.

Joseph Wells was of Irish descent, and was born April 19, 1803, on the farm where, with true Irish instinct, he lived all his days. He received such education as the common schools of the Commonwealth afforded in his youthful days, and in early manhood became a "pike boy," driving his team on the National road from Brownsville to Cumberland and return, a business he followed for many years. On Dec. 1, 1824, he married Maria Shaw, an estimable lady, who is still living, and who is well known for her many social and Christian virtues. They had eight children, one of whom died in infancy; two others, married daughters, are dead, and the remaining four daughters and one son are all married and living in the county, the son occupying the homestead.

Mr. Wells began life with little of this world's goods, but by industry and careful husbandry he acquired the ownership of the paternal homestead, and a handsome competence besides, enjoying in his old age the comforts and even the luxuries of life. While struggling to pay for his farm he unluckily lost several hundred dollars by indorsing for a friend, and although he recovered from this financial trouble, his autograph was seldom, if ever, afterwards seen on the back of a promissory note.

In religion he was a Presbyterian, having been a communicant in that church for fifty years. He joined the Brownsville Presbyterian Church under the ministrations of Rev. William Johnston, and in 1840 united with the Little Redstone Church at its organization, where for many years he was a ruling elder, and continued a member until the time of his death. Of Mr. Wells one who knew him long and intimately, pertinently says, "Unlike many Presbyterians we meet at this day, he believed the decrees which constitute the peculiar tenets of his church, or at least he came as near believing them as any person I have ever met, with a single exception." Still in business he was human, and while strictly honest, his excellent judgment often gave him the best end of the bargain in buying a steer or selling a horse. To him the sermon on the mount was law, but in practical operations he had acquisitiveness and secretiveness enough to enable him to do business successfully, and add a balance to the profit account at the end of each year. In politics he was a Democrat of the old school, and held as firmly to the Jacksonian and Jeffersonian Democracy as he did to the everlasting decrees.

The poor of his neighborhood knew in him one of their most charitable friends, and he gave liberally to the benevolent enterprises of the church. Having a sound and vigorous constitution, and being temperate in his habits, he preserved a hale and healthful body for more than threescore and ten years. After one or two premonitory attacks he was stricken fatally with paralysis, and died May 28, 1877, respected by his neighbors, esteemed by his friends, and sincerely loved and mourned by his family. To the last moment of his conscious life he held fast to his integrity and his Christian faith. Not a single doubt clouded his mind or cast a shadow over his peaceful soul. His faith, steadfast to the end, is voiced in the lines,—

"An angel's arm can't snatch me from the grave, Legions of angels can't confine me there."
JOHN STEELE.

John Steele, one of the most worthy men and leading farmers of Jefferson township, Fayette Co., Pa., as well as one of the most methodical, solid business men of the county, is the son of William Steele, who was born in Westmoreland County, Pa., July 22, 1779, and about 1806 married Sarah Elliott, and soon after moved to a farm in Jefferson township, which is now owned by his son John. Upon this farm the eleven children, five sons and six daughters, of William Steele were born. John was the eighth in number, and is the only son now living. He was born Aug. 31, 1822.

Mr. Steele received his education in the common schools. March 6, 1850, he married Mary Jackman, of Washington County, Pa. He has one child living, James Harvey Steele, who married Ruth Nutt.

Mr. Steele has all his active business life been engaged in farming. He owns large tracts of land, two or three good farms of the best quality of soil, and manages them excellently. Mr. Steele's father, a justly considerate and sensible gentleman, gave him a fair start in life, and he has added largely to his patrimonial possessions. About twenty-five years ago he built his present commodious residence and its comfortable outbuildings.

Mr. Steele and his family are members of the Little Redstone Presbyterian Church. He enjoys the confidence and esteem of his neighbors.

LUZERNE TOWNSHIP.

LUZERNE, one of the original townships of Fayette, lies on the Monongahela River, which along the western and northern lines of the township describes a series of irregular bends, and flows for the most part between hilly ranges that give sweeping views of the river's course and a long stretch of country beside. The great bend on the west curves gracefully from Davidson's Ferry to Millsboro', and there taking a sharp turn outward makes a second but more abrupt curve to where William G. Crawford's farm fronts the stream. Across by land from Davidson's Ferry to Crawford's the distance measures less than three miles; between the same points by river it is more than eleven miles. The river separates the township on the north and west from Washington and Greene Counties. On the south the boundary is German township, and on the east Redstone. Steamboats ascend the Monongahela as far as New Geneva. Ferries established at convenient distances give easy access to the opposite shore. These are located at Jacob's, Davidson's, Rice's Landing, Millsboro', Fredericktown, and Crawford's. On the river-front, as already noted, the land lies high and forbids much profitable agriculture. Generally, however, the surface of the township is rolling and offers a fine field for farming. Coal is plentiful, but mining is chiefly confined to production for local demand.

Merrittstown, the most important village in the township, is located upon Dunlap's Creek, whose mill-power is freely utilized at that and other points. Curious features in the landscape are found in so-called carved rocks, of which the most striking are on "the river hill" near Millsboro'. They are two in number, flat of surface, and jutting perhaps a foot above the ground. The larger of the two measures about sixteen feet upon either side, and bears numerous sunken impressions of divers figures said to represent wild animals, fishes, turkey-tracks, etc. Legends make the Indians the carvers of these and in some cases unfamiliar figures, while speculative antiquarians hold to the prehistoric theory. Whatever the basis of argument, it is certain that the impressions were upon the rocks when the first white settlers came to the river region.

The total assessed valuation of Luzerne subject to county tax in 1881 was $1,050,992, or a decline from the preceding year of $2061. The population of the township by the census of 1880 was fourteen hundred and forty-five, including the village of Merrittstown.

The opening of the road from Laurel Hill to the mouth of Dunlap's Creek, by Col. James Burd, in 1759, brought settlers to the vicinity of its terminus at an earlier date than settlements were made in most of the other parts of the Monongahela Valley. Among the early comers William Colvin was the first who came into the territory which is now Luzerne with the intention of making a home here. He acquired a settlement right in 1763, and afterwards sold that right to Thomas Brown (the founder of Brownsville), who, on the 16th of December, 1779, obtained from the commissioners of the State of Virginia a certificate for four hundred and fifty-seven acres, "to include the settlement purchased of William Colvin, near Redstone Old Fort, made in the year 1763." This is recited in the certificate, and thus the date of Colvin's settlement is fixed. What became of Colvin after he sold his settlement right here is not known. The tract which he sold, and which was certified to Brown as above mentioned, was surveyed to the latter in March, 1785. It was then described as bounded on the north by land of John and Samuel McCullough,1 northwest by land of Rees Cadwallader and Thomas Gregg, and on the south by land of Basil Brown. Thomas Brown soon removed to the north side of Dunlap's Creek, where he laid out the town of Brownsville, as before mentioned.

Basil Brown, Sr., brother of Thomas, settled on the land mentioned in the preceding description as adjoining the Colvin tract in the year 1770. It was a tract of four hundred and forty-three acres, granted to him on a Virginia certificate, and was surveyed to him March 22, 1785. The certificate on which it was so surveyed recited that the tract granted was "to include his settlement made in the year 1770." On this homestead tract Basil Brown lived and died. He left two sons, Thomas and Basil, Jr., and a daughter, Sally, who was a cripple. Thomas Brown lived in Luzerne, on the farm now occupied by Lewis Adams. He married Dorcas, daughter of William Goe, and for a second wife the widow of Philip Worley. His brother, Basil Brown, Jr., was a bachelor, who remained for some years in Luzerne, and afterwards removed to Brownsville, where his father had purchased a number of town lots from his brother, the elder Thomas Brown. Basil Brown, Jr., and his sister Sally lived in Brownsville, on Market Street, at or near the corner of Morgan Street, where he died at the age of seventy-five years. Sally, the cripple, died in that town some years later.

John McKibben was a very early settler in what is now Luzerne, locating on three hundred and eighteen acres in April, 1766, as is recited in a deed for the same tract, made by David Breading to Nathaniel Breading, in 1783. The tract is located about one mile southwesterly from Merrittstown, and was for many years the farm and home of Nathaniel Breading. It is now owned by his grandson, George E. Hogg, of Brownsville.

Jehu Conwell and his brother, Capt. William Conwell, settled within the limits of this township in June, 1767. One James Bredin was in the territory before the Convells, who upon their arrival found Bredin living in a log cabin upon a tomahawk claim, where he had girdled a few trees, he having come in the previous April. For a small consideration the Convells purchased Bredin's claim and improvements, and he departed for other scenes. The land thus taken by the Convells lies now in the Heistersburg school district, and is included within the John McMullen farm.

The country was at that time infested by savages and wild beasts, but with neither had the settlers then any trouble, for the former were friendly, and the latter not so much inclined to pursue man as afraid of being themselves pursued. By and by, however, the Indians began to show signs of hostility, and the Convells thought it advisable to withdraw for a brief season to a more populous locality. In August, 1772, Jehu returned to his old home in Delaware, in October was married, and in November of the same year set out with his young bride for the Luzerne clearing. Existence was comparatively quiet and uneventful until 1774, when Indian aggressions set in earnest. Jehu Conwell and his brother, Capt. William, then bestirred themselves and started the project of building a fort. A site was selected upon the Coleman plantation, on the west side of Dunlap's Creek, not much more than half a mile below Merrittstown, on a place now occupied by Harrison Henshaw. There a block-house was hastily constructed, to include within its inclosure the spring near the present Henshaw house. Assisted and directed by the Convells, the settlers had the fort completed in quick time, and in May, 1794, it was occupied. There appears to be no evidence that the fort was ever attacked, or that the people living in that portion of Luzerne met with serious injury at the hands of the savages, although they were for a time in great terror for fear of Indians. Several children are said to have been born within the fort during 1774. The names of only two can now be given. One was Ruth, daughter of Capt. William Conwell. She married Abram Armstrong. Another was a daughter of Jehu Conwell. She married Judge William Ewing. After the autumn of 1774, the clouds of alarm clearing away, block-house life was abandoned, and the peaceful pursuits of the pioneer were pushed forward with renewed vigor.

When the flag of national independence was raised in 1776, Jehu and William Conwell responded to the call, and fought through the Revolution. Happily surviving the struggle they resumed their rural labors, and in good time ended their lives upon the Luzerne lands they had cleared from the wilderness. Jehu died in January, 1834, at the age of eighty-six, upon the farm that had been his home for sixty years, and from which he is said in that time never to have removed himself a distance of more than fifty miles. He was married more than sixty years, and had seven children. His sons Shepard, Yates T., John, and George settled and died in Luzerne. One of his daughters married Judge William Ewing, another Andrew Porter, and the third John Arnold. With his brother, Capt. William, he rests now in the old Conwell burying-ground upon the George Conwell farm, where lie also numerous others of the same name.

Jehu Conwell was not only a farmer, but a manufacturer and miller. He built a log grist-mill upon Big Run, which was certainly the first grist-mill in the township, and, according to some authorities, the first in the county.2 A half-bushel measure, made

1 These McCulloughs were Indian traders who acquired settlement rights here nearly as early as Colvin, but they were not permanent settlers, and soon migrated.

2 Clark Breading, of Uniontown, says John Conwell told him he constructed the mill the year after he came to the township. It was used simply for pounding corn. A-flutter-wheel was the motive-power for a great sweep, to which a pounder was attached. The mortar was a rock of mulberry wood and used in the mill when the latter was first erected, is yet in the possession of George W. Connell. Jehu built also a distillery at the same place, and as the business transacted there assumed an appearance of extraordinary briskness, while it attracted many patrons, the locality was given the name of Frogtown, and by that name was known for many years.

About the time of the coming of Jehu and William Connell there came also to Luzerne Aaron Hackney, grandfather of Aaron Hackney, now of Luzerne. He settled in the Connell neighborhood, but, like the Connells and other early settlers, was soon compelled to vacate his new home by the threatening danger of Indian aggressions. He returned to his former home in Virginia, but came again to Luzerne after an absence of about two years, and remained there ever after until his death in 1807. His sons were George, Joseph, John, Jehu, and Aaron. George, Joseph, and Jehu died in Luzerne, John moved to Menallen, and Aaron to Mercer County.

Richard Ashcraft, a Revolutionary spy and scout, claimed also to be a settler and land-owner upon the Monongahela, just above Heaton’s mill, nearly opposite the mouth of Ten-Mile Creek. He was living there about, and perhaps before, 1767, and likely enough was simply a hunter, scout, and trader, without any ambition in the direction of a husbandman’s vocation except to raise what little he needed for home consumption. From the record of the proceesings of the West Virginia Historical Society in 1871 it is taken the following copy of an affidavit made by Richard Ashcraft and Thomas Carr before James Chew, July 19, 1777:

“Richard Ashcraft and Thomas Carr, two of the spies, came before James Chew, one of the Magistrates for Monongahalia County, and made oath that on Thursday evening, the 17th inst., they discovered on the head-waters of Buffalo creek (tracks) which to the best of their knowledge appeared to be them of the enemy, and that from the sign of the said tracks their number might be seven or eight, that the said tracks were making toward the Monongahala river, and appeared to be gone the said day.”

The land tract on the river known as “The Bone of Contention” is thus alluded to by Veech:

“The land just above Bridgeport, on the river, embracing some three or four hundred acres, was in early time the subject of long and angry controversies—from 1769 to 1785—between adverse claimants under military permits. It was well named in the official survey (which one of the parties procured of it under a Pennsylvania location) ‘Bone of Contention.’ One Angus McDonald claimed it, or part of it, under a military permit from Col. Bouquet, dated April 26, 1769, and a settlement on it. In March, 1776, he sold his claim to Capt. Luke Collins, describing the land as ‘at a place called Fort Eard, in which an excavation was made. Connell said he had grown tired of going miles upon miles to mill, and was determined to have a mill of his own. Inclusion the field cleared by me where the saw pit was, above the mouth of Dohop’s Creek.’ Collins conveyed it to Michael Creep (of Logan speech celebrity) on the 18th of April, 1772, ‘at half past nine in the morning,’ describing it as situated between Point Lookout and John Martin’s land,” recently owned, we believe, by the late Mrs. John T. Kropp. Creep’s executors, in June, 1781, conveyed to one William Schoddy, an old Brownsville merchant, who conveyed to John Cadwallader. The adverse claimants were Henry Shryock and William Shearer, assignees of George Andrews. Their claim reached farther southward towards the creek, and farther up the river, covering the John Martin land. They sold out to Robert Adams and Thomas Shain. Although they had the oldest patent (in 1762), their title seems to have been overcome by the settlement and official location and survey of their adversary. One Robert Thun seems also to have been a claimant of part of the land, but Collins bought him out. This protracted controversy involved many curious questions, and called up many ancient recollections. No doubt the visit to this locality of Mr. Deputy Sheriff Woods of Bedford in 1771 was part of this controversy. Many of these early claims were lost or forfeited by neglect to settle the land according to law, and thus were supplanted by others. They were valued by their owners at a very low mark, and often sold for telling sums.”

The Crawford settlement in Luzerne was important in one respect. It was the first location in the bend of the river, and included an extensive tract that reached along the river front from Millsboro’ to Crawford’s Ferry, south of lock No. 5. The heads of the Crawford families were James and Josiah, who came together from Maryland to Fayette County in 1771 or 1777, and bought about sixteen hundred acres on the Monongahela, in Luzerne. James Crawford built his cabin a little below Fredericktown, on the bank of the stream, and not long after established a ferry there. Before that ferry was established, Josiah Crawford, his brother, who had settled near the river upon the place now occupied by Joseph Crawford, south of lock No. 5, had put a ferry on at that point. That was probably the pioneer ferry on the Monongahela along the Luzerne line. Illustrative of the wild character of the country when he founded his settlement, James Crawford said that when he and his brother Josiah came out on their land-prospecting tour, they found houses so scarce they had to sleep in the woods at night with the snow knee-deep all about them, and that when he (James) put up his cabin it was the only house between the river at that point and Uniontown. The log house that James Crawford built at the river is still standing, and is said to be in good preservation despite the fact that scarcely any repairs have been put upon it. The weather-boards with which he inclosed it he got out by hand upon his place with the aid of his slaves, of whom he had several. James and Josiah Crawford were known to the Indians as Quakers and friends to William Penn. For this, it is said, the savages not only did not molest them, but took frequent occasion to show an exceedingly friendly disposition. Once the Indians gave James and his family a severe fright. A party of them came down the river one evening and put up for the night upon James' place. In the morning they said to the old gentleman that they had determined to take one of his children with them, and to emphasize their remarks with an apparent threat showed him some scalpels. The old man pretended that he wasn't much frightened, and in that fiction was helped along by his good wife, who knew as well as did her husband the value of a strong policy of conciliation toward the redskins, and thus they acquiesced in the taking of the child, while in response to the Indian demand that he (James) too should accompany them apparent willing resignation was yielded. To the un-speakable relief of the Crawfords the Indians informed them, laughingly, that neither child nor old man should be taken, and that the project was simply put forward by way of a joke. Joke as it was, the Crawfords did not for many a day forget the terror it had brought upon them.

In the course of time James Crawford concluded to go still farther west, and dividing the bulk of his property among his children, moved to Ohio and settled upon land now occupied by the city of Chillicothe, where he died. His sons were John, Ephraim, William, and Joseph, all of whom died in Luzerne. John and William lived to reach the age of ninety-six. Josiah (brother of James Crawford), who died in Luzerne at the age of eighty, had seven sons, named James, Josiah, Jr., Benedict, Elijah, Levi, Ephraim, and Abel. Benedict was killed on the river by the Indians; Elijah, Ephraim, and Levi died in Luzerne; the rest removed out of the township. There are still among the residents of Luzerne many bearing the name of Crawford. Of these the oldest representatives are William, aged eighty-two; Joseph, eighty-three; Ephraim, seventy-five; and George, seventy.

The ferries established by James and Josiah Crawford were maintained for many years by some member of the family, and before the great volume of traffic between the East and West was diverted to the National road they were kept busy day and night transporting passengers, live-stock, and freight that at one time moved through that region. There was at a very early day a John Crawford at what is now known as Jacobs' Ferry, where he had a ferry. He was not of the other Crawford family, but belonged, it is believed, to the Crawfords of Greene County. He disappeared from Luzerne history, and gave place at the ferry to Jeremiah Davidson, who came from Mercer County before 1800, and continued the ferry established by John Crawford. Davidson must have been in the river region during the time of Indian troubles, for recollections of him and his time mention the circumstance of his assisting at the organization of a party of settlers who went out upon an expedition that had for its object retaliation upon a band of savages who had been committing depredations. Davidson's first ferry-boat is said to have been a dug-out, which he soon replaced with a flat-boat. Besides being a ferryman and farmer, he was also a boat-builder, and constructed barges for himself as well as for others. Not infrequently he would journey down the river in one of his barges on trading expeditions, and thus became a pretty well known character. The ferry he maintained until his death, about 1850.

The old Davidson property is now owned by Adam Jacobs, of Brownsville, who in 1862 bought and took possession thereof. His land embraces two tracts, patented respectively by John Crawford and Samuel Stokely. The Stokely farm was called "The Cave," by reason, it is said, of the fact that early explorations noted the presence thereon of a cave, but what sort of a cave, what its dimensions, or even its locality are to-day unknown, since not one of the many later searchers has been able to locate it. Capt. Jacobs has about one thousand acres of land near the river, and has at the ferry a summer residence, store, grist-mill, boat-yard, etc. At his boat-yard he has built four steamboats and numerous barges. During 1881 he employed a large force of men in the boat-yard upon steamboats and barges already contracted for. Upon the hill overlooking the river Capt. Jacobs has sunk a shaft running perpendicularly down one hundred feet, and four hundred and sixty feet along a slope. At that depth he has found the "nine-foot Pittsburgh vein," and intends developing the coal interests of that region. A branch wire of the Western Union Telegraph Line from Brownsville to Davidson's Ferry connects the latter place with Jacobs' Ferry. East Riverside post-office was established at Jacobs' Ferry in 1894. The first postmaster was Adam Jacobs, Jr. The second and present one is John N. Jacobs.

Another early ferry was the one established by David Davidson, where his son David has maintained a ferry for many years. At this place a steam ferry-boat was once put on, but business did not warrant its retention. There was another ferry at Rice's Landing, and still another at Millboro', which latter was owned by Henry Heaton and Rezin Virgin. Below were the Crawford ferries, already spoken of.

In 1772, Andrew Frazer built a fine log house on the present W. S. Craft place, and placed high up on the chimney the mark "A F 1772." A lock weighing eleven and a half pounds secured the door, and is still held as a relic by his descendants in Cincinnati. Some of the apple-trees planted by Mr. Frazer about the time of his settlement are still bearing. Mr. Frazer died in 1800.

Robert Baird, Sr., was the eldest son of Moses Baird, Sr., of New Jersey, and was born in the year 1756. He came to this county first in the year 1777, a young man, and bought the lands in the southeastern part of which is now Luzerne township, and southwestern part of Redstone township, now owned by Jeremiah Baird, heirs of Uriah Higinbotham, Samuel M. Baird, and others, in all six hundred acres or more. He returned to New Jersey, married a Miss Elizabeth.
Reeves, and came back with his young bride, bringing their household goods on horseback over three hundred miles. They had a good cabin near a large spring, amidst the almost trackless wilderness of sugar, black walnut, oak, etc. He was an energetic man, and soon had several acres cleared. His brothers and sisters came after a few years, and a family by the name of Frame, who settled on the next farms south. His brothers, John, Moses, and James, soon married, and moved to Ohio, as did also his younger sister. Moses was the father of Mrs. James Ewing, of Union-town, Pa. His sisters Jane and Margaret married Charles and John Porter, of this county. The former was associate judge for many years.

Robert Baird, Sr., and his wife were very industrious and frugal, and raised a family of four sons and four daughters, all of whom married and raised large families. He was a man of true Christian merit, and stood among the best of men in his day. His wife's brothers, Manassah and Michael Reeves, came to Western Pennsylvania soon after, and settled near to where Belle Vernon, Pa., now stands. Some of their descendants are in that section yet.

Mrs. Elizabeth Baird died in 1826, and Robert, Sr., married for his second wife Mrs. Sarah McClelland, of Greene County, Pa. He lived until Oct. 5, 1833. His oldest son, Alexander, inherited that part where the widow Uriah Higinbotham now lives and where Samuel M. Baird lives; his second son, Aaron, the part where Mr. Grove now lives; and his son Moses, where Jeremiah P. Baird now lives. His youngest son, Rev. Robert Baird, D.D., was educated at Jefferson College, Pa., and at Princeton, N. J., where he married Miss Gertrude O. A. DeBoisson. Dr. Baird was for a long time corresponding secretary of "The Foreign Christian Alliance," during which time he crossed the ocean fourteen times and visited eighteen different crowned heads. He could converse in many languages, and was the author of several works. His "Travels in Northern Europe," "Religion in America" (written in French and afterwards translated into English), with many smaller works, live after him. He died in 1861, leaving a wife (who died a year afterwards) and four sons.—Rev. C. W. Baird, D.D., of Rye, N. Y.; Rev. H. M. Baird, D.D., Professor of Greek in the New York University; Judge E. P. Baird, of New York City; and William W. Baird, Esq., of the same place. Among the descendants of Robert Baird, Sr., now living there are six ministers of the gospel, five ruling elders of the church, and many that are useful mechanics and farmers.

Shortly after Robert Baird, Sr., settled in Fayette County, Pa., a family by the name of Morgan settled near where Morgantown, W. Va., now stands. The Indians were troublesome; the men who cleared the lands had to keep their guns with them or near at hand in the fields. On one occasion the elder son of the Morgans went away on business, and when he returned he found their house burned, and his father, mother, one brother and sister murdered by the Indians. He stood terror-stricken. Two of the younger children, a boy and girl, had run away and hidden themselves. John Morgan, then and there, took an oath that he would kill every Indian he ever set eyes on. Several years after this, during which time he did kill many a redskin, he went to Baltimore for salt with his pack-horses. In the city one day he saw a small crowd of men and boys who were having fun over something; as he looked in among them he saw an Indian cutting pranks. Capt. Jack Morgan turned pale as he started away, and remembering his oath he turned, went back, pushed into the crowd, and with his knife stabbed the Indian to the heart and walked away. Of course he was remanded to jail for trial for murder. His attorney heard his story, his oath, etc., then asked if he had no friend that could testify to these things. He said Robert Baird, of Western Pennsylvania, could. So Baird was sent for, and when he heard of Capt. Jack's bad luck went to him in time to give testimony before the court and jury that tried the case. After the hearing the jury returned a verdict of not guilty. Capt. Morgan and Mr. Baird came home together, with their train of pack-horses laden with salt, etc. They were fast friends.

Mr. Baird's treatment of his youngest son, Robert, Jr., showed his wisdom and judgment in planning the future of his boy. The parents desired very much to educate their youngest son, whom they had so often prayed God to call into the ministry, so they toiled hard to get means and clothing (home-made at t'cat) to send him to school. There was a grammar school at Uniontown, Pa., (twelve miles away), taught by Mr. Gilbert. When the spring of the year came they took Robert, Jr., to the school, arranged for his board and tuition for six months, by which time he could enter college. Robert stayed a few weeks, when he packed up and walked home. It was near noon when he arrived. His mother soon learned with sorrow that he did not want to stay at school. His father came in from work, found his boy there, and learning his dislike to books, etc., or rather staying from home, he said, "Well, Robert, get a mattock, and come with me after dinner down to the thicket and help grub." Here they toiled for several days beneath a hot sun. Robert's hands blistered,—the thorny wild plum was hard to grub,—but still his father did not say a word about a change of work. About ten o'clock, the fourth or fifth day, Robert, Jr., said, "Father, I'll go to school and stay." "Well, my son," said his father, "if you are determined to do so you can go, otherwise this thicket must be cleared." "I'll stay." Young Baird went. At the end of six months he entered college, and graduated with honors and became one of the great men of America.

Robert Baird, Jr., was greatly attached to the cause of religion and education; gave a great deal to the support of the church and schools and colleges. He was a ruling elder in the Dunlap's Creek Presbyterian Church more than forty years.

None of his children are living now. When his youngest son, Robert, Jr., brought home his wife, a few days after their marriage, according to the custom of those days, there must be a gathering of friends and a dinner. The old father had invited all his children and grandchildren to be present at the old mansion, Oct. 14, 1824, to take part in the festive occasion. They were all present: his three sons and four daughters, with their children, making in all forty-five persons, besides the bride and groom and the family. After dinner Rev. Robert Baird, Jr., made a short address to the young folks. And the old grandfather handed each grandchild, thirty-eight in number, a copy of the New Testament, bound in calf, saying, "My dear grandchildren, this is a small gift, but a very precious one. Make it the guide of your lives." Many of these are yet in the families of those grandchildren.

In September, 1879, the Bairds held a centennial gathering at the old home, in memory of the first settling of old grandfather Robert Baird, Sr., on these lands. There were present thirty-eight representative, a singular coincidence. There are now living descendants in Fayette County of the family of Alexander Baird, one; of Aaron Baird, six; of Moses Baird, two; of Elizabeth, who became the wife of Randolph Dearth, one. The rest are scattered in the West and South.

Lewis and John Deen came to Luzerne among the earliest settlers, and located a tract of four hundred and fifty acres, which include now the farms of James Cunningham, J. N. Craft, and John Acklin. Lewis built a log cabin upon the present Craft place in 1777. John put up his cabin on the Acklin farm. The portion now owned by James Cunningham was bought of the Deens by Eber Homan. A part of the house built by Homan in 1780 still serves as a portion of the residence of James Cunningham, and, as far as appearances go, is yet stanch and tight. Eber Homan set up a blacksmith's shop on the Cunningham place, and employed also a hand-mill for grinding corn, not only for himself, but for many of his neighbors, who were glad of even that primitive kind of a mill. Grated corn was a common and sometimes exclusive diet with some people, simply because they were too poor to buy anything else. Instances are given of how farmers, preliminary to harvesting, finding themselves unable to purchase bread, would cut unripe wheat, dry it and take it to mill, so that bread might be provided to feed the harvesters at their coming to gather the crop.

In the list of Luzerne's pioneers—a list of some magnitude—may be recorded the names of James and William Dearth, the Vernons, Acklins, Ewings, Samuel Durnell, John Patterson, Joseph Ritchie, John Denny, John McConnell, John Wane, Swethen Chandler, Charles and John Stewart, Job Briggs, and the Thorntons. Samuel Durnell was a Chester County shoemaker, and about the year 1800 located in Luzerne upon a place now owned by William Roberts, where he resumed his trade of shoemaking. He bought a farm later, and in 1819 he sold it, intending to remove to Ohio. While making his preparations for the journey he was taken ill and died.

John Wallace, of Chester County, migrated to Luzerne with his family, and settled on the river hill near Jacobs' Ferry. Of his two sons, Robert moved to Washington County; William settled in Ohio, returned to Luzerne, and died in the township. The only member of John Wallace's family living is the widow of Aaron Baird, now residing in Merrittstown.

Hugh Gilmore, a settler in German township about 1780, built a grist-mill and saw-mill on Redstone Creek, in Redstone township, and gave the charge thereof to his sons, James and Hugh Jr., who lived over the creek in Luzerne. James and Hugh Jr. died in Merrittstown. Three brothers named Dearth came in before 1780, but only two, James and William, made actual settlements. The third brother was a great hunter, and devoted himself almost constantly to the sports of the chase. As civilization advanced and cleared the forests he kept in the advance, and still clinging to his nomadic life among the wilds, pushed on westward as the pioneer's axe opened the way for the march of progress, and so kept on toward the setting sun a hunter and a roamer to the last. He died somewhere in the far West.

William Ewing, who married one of John Conwell's daughters, lived on the J. W. Conwell place, and operated for some years the distillery started by John Conwell. He was father of Nathaniel Ewing, who served the county as president judge. William Miller was on the present William Miller place (located by Amos Hough in 1784) in 1800, where he died in 1822. Samuel Hurford, one of his farm-hands, married his daughter Margaret, and died in the township in 1842. David Jamison, from Delaware, and afterwards of Washington County, settled in 1804, in Luzerne, near the river, upon land now occupied by A. G. and J. R. Jamison. There were one hundred and forty-seven acres in the tract that had been warranted to Jonathan Arnold in October, 1785, at which time also his son, Jonathan, Jr., located an adjoining tract. In July, 1785, William Hammond received a warrant for three hundred and fifty-two acres upon which is now the Andrew Porter farm.

In 1784, Rezin Virgin located the lands now occupied by Jacob Jamison and William Huler, the property being known as "Perkins' Beauty." The Richard Covert place was first settled by Kinsie Virgin, and in 1792, John Lawrence located land west of William Hammond. The Nelan family was warranted to Thomas Gilpin, and called "Gilpin's Adventure;" the William Hurford farm (known as Ulster) to Thomas Lingan in 1785. Daniel Goble and Thomas Goodin warranted lands in 1784 just west of Cox Run, and Obed Garwood tracts near by in 1789 and 1792. Michael Cox received his warrant in 1786, and James Williams his on June 30, 1796. John Covert, who came to the river about 1800, lived there until his death. William Horner and Nicholas Black ranked among the old settlers on the river. Black was one of William Hammond's slaves, received his freedom because of his faithful service, turned basketmaker, and in time earned money enough to buy a farm, upon which his descendants are living at this day.

A deed dated Nov. 10, 1777, recites the transfer from John Craig to Charles Porter of three hundred acres (consideration £600), adjoining lands of John McKibben, Robert Smith, Lewis Deem, and others. Feb. 7, 1798, a tract called "Newby" (adjoining Jonas Kitts) was patented by Robert Adams, and sold by Adams to Alexander Nelau, July 8, 1799.

Before the outbreak of the Revolution James Cunningham, of Chester County, Pa., came out to Washington County, and tomahawked a claim near the present site of Washington borough, where there was at that time but one house, and that a log cabin. Mr. Cunningham put up a hut, did a little chopping, and returned to Chester County to make ready for a return trip to his proposed new settlement, looking to a permanent location thereon. He did come back that fall, but found that his cabin was already occupied, and although he hated to be beaten away from what he considered his own by right, he concluded not only to leave the interloper in peaceful possession, but to abandon utterly the project of settling in the Western wilds, being urged to that conclusion, no doubt, by the conviction that the country looked a trifle wider and more desolate than he at first thought it did. So back he went to Chester County, bought a farm, and pursued a quiet and uneventful existence until the tocsin of war sounded, and then with four of his brothers, living also in Chester County, he entered the service in the Continental army. His brother John and a William Ramsey were captured by the enemy and confined in one of the abominable prison-ships into which the English thrust many of their captives.

The ship in which Cunningham and Ramsey were confined was dispatched to a far-off port, and en route the unhappy prisoners in the dark and reeking hold died each day in great numbers, of actual suffocation. Ramsey and Cunningham were lucky enough to sustain life at a small aperture through which refreshing air came to them, but it was at that only by dint of sticking closely and constantly to the opening that they did manage to keep breath in their bodies. During their subsequent confinement on shore they had a terrible and painful experience. As a portion of their daily food (it is said) they received bread mixed with lime, and as a part of their daily exercise they found employment in separating the lime from the bread so that eating the latter seemed possible. They passed safely if not happily through their captivity, to be restored at last to home and friends.

The experiences and sufferings they had endured in common made them fast friends, and at the close of the war they resolved to seek together a new home in the West. Both were bachelors, and a location and settlement in the wilderness was a matter of speedy accomplishment. They bought lands in Luzerne township, Fayette Co., and erected a distillery upon the place now occupied by Armstrong Porter. The log house they built for a dwelling they used in part as a malt-kiln, and in a little while they were doing quite a business in the manufacture of whiskey. Ramsey generally carried the product by flat-boat to New Orleans, and in making the return trip would sometimes come back on foot, but most frequently proceeded by sea to Philadelphia, and thence by horseback over the mountains, taking occasion also to bring a lot of salt with him, and such necessaries as the backwoods failed to afford.

Some time before the year 1800, Mr. Ramsey concluded to leave Luzerne for Cincinnati, where he judged there was a wider and more profitable field for the exercise of his energies. The Luzerne distillery had brought much profit to himself and his partner, but Cincinnati promised more, and so he dissolved his business partnership with his old friend Cunningham and moved to the future Queen City. Not relinquishing the idea of being left alone, John Cunningham wrote to his brother James, still living in Chester County, that if he would come out to Luzerne and build a good stone house he might have in exchange one-half of the distillery business, as well as one-half of the land connected therewith. James responded promptly by selling his Chester County farm and moving to Luzerne with his family. The house that he built upon his arrival, according to contract, is the one now occupied by Armstrong Porter. Set in the stone-work is a wooden tablet, bearing the inscription, "James and Mary Cunningham, 1806." Of William Ramsey it will suffice to say that he engaged in business in Cincinnati, grew up with the town, and became in time one of its wealthiest merchants. John and James Cunningham carried on the distilling business in Luzerne until 1829, and grew rich. The distillery was operated by others until 1835, William Porter being the last proprietor.

John Cunningham died in the old stone house in 1839, at the age of eighty-seven, remaining to the last a bachelor, and bearing wherever he was known the title of "Uncle John." He was a member of the State Legislature thirteen successive years. For the fourteenth time he was nominated, but was defeated in the contest by Charles Porter, afterwards county judge. Uncle John took his defeat sorely to heart, but declared he would stand another nomination, just to show that he could beat Porter, and, in fact, both being nominated the next year, he did beat him. His ambition fulfilled, he declined to appear any more as a candidate. Upon his first election he sent to England for a silver watch, that he might properly support the dignity of his exalted station, and wore it ever after with much pride. It is now in the possession of his brother's grandson, and although an article of some consequence in Cunningham's time, does not now look like much of a watch as compared to time-pieces of modern production.

John Cunningham's brother James died on the home farm in 1832. Of his two sons, William became a merchant at Merrittstown, and died in 1819. John boated on the Monongahela for his father and uncle, and died at an early age. In his school life he was a famous debater, and was, with his brother William, a schoolmate of Andrew Stewart, who entertained a high regard for John's educational abilities. James Cunningham's daughters were Arabella and Jane. The former married David Porter, and the latter William Gallagher.

Armstrong Porter came westward in 1774, and bought seven hundred acres of land in Luzerne township, including the farm now owned and occupied by W. J. Stewart. He lived in a two-story log house on the present Stewart place. His sons numbered six and his daughters two. The sons were named Andrew, Jared, William, David, John, and Armstrong, all of whom, except John (who moved to Ohio), settled and died in the township. Their mother lived to be over ninety, and each of them to an advanced age. Andrew died at the age of eighty-seven; Jared, at eighty-one; William, at eighty; David, at ninety-one; and Armstrong (in 1879), at ninety-six—a remarkable showing of long life in so many members of one family.

Early settlements were made along Cox Run, near Dunlap's Creek. Among them a conspicuous figure was Michael Cox, who was famous as a great Indian-fighter and an ex-Revolutionary soldier. The Coxes were at one time quite numerous in Luzerne, but now may be looked for in vain. A story about Michael Cox and a hog stands as a laughable episode in the old man's experience. He had been so much troubled by the animal's depredations that he arose one day in his might and swore he would jerk the hog to an unmentionable place, meaning to throw him over a high bluff into a depth known locally as "hell." Accordingly Cox caught the hog by the tail, and dragging him toward the precipice put his available strength into a last pull that was to land the porker in pediction. Unluckily Cox pulled with such vigor that he fell on the precipice brink, the earth gave way, and Cox promptly relinquishing his hold upon the tail, descended into the place where he had hoped to send the beast. It was a terrible fall and well-nigh killed Cox, who lying where he fell and groaning out his misery attracted a lad named John Covert to the scene, and the boy running for assistance Cox was got home and to bed. His injuries were serious indeed, but he recovered after a long confinement. John Covert, the boy above named, died in Luzerne in 1881 at the age of ninety-three. Michael Cox died in Luzerne, and was buried upon the present C. H. Swan place. Cox had a large family, and to each of his sons gave a farm. One of these sons was a captain in the militia, and, what was singular for a militia captain, invariably appeared upon parade in his bare feet. One day at parade he got a thorn into one of his feet, and halting to repair damages yelled to his men, "Go ahead, boys, and march to yon mullein stalk while I pull this blasted thorn out of my foot."

Upon the farm where C. H. Swan lives a man (whose name is now not remembered) put up a fulling-mill and carding-machine as early as 1800. He dug at the expense of much time and labor a race through the limestone, and tried hard to make the venture a paying one. It proved instead a failure, and was abandoned by the projector in disgust. After lying idle some time the property was bought by Rev. William Johnston.

James Coleman was among the early settlers on the run, and on Oct. 24, 1783, deeded a tract to John Roiley, of Westmoreland, who for a consideration of $575 sold it to Andrew Oliphant, of Chester County. The land is described in the deed as "lying and being in Menallen township, Westmoreland County, adjoining the lands of Andrew Fraser, William Gray, Thomas Gregg, Michael Cox, Sr., Henry Swindler, and M. Douglas." The Thomas Gregg mentioned was a Quaker, but was charged, nevertheless, with holding his house open as a Tory rendezvous. The name of Gregg is now extinct in Luzerne. A grandson of Thomas has been recently the subject of some public notoriety in one Elihu Gregg, who burned the jail of Preston County, W. Va., in 1809, was sentenced to be hanged, escaped the day before the date fixed for his execution, was recaptured in Greene County, Pa., two years afterwards, tried a second time, and a second time sentenced to death. Governor Matthews commuted his sentence to a life-imprisonment, but this commutation the prisoner (then seventy-seven years old) refused to receive, saying he would have liberty or death. His case was reviewed a year later by Governor Jackson, who, in April, 1881, issued an unconditional pardon.

As an evidence of the kindly and self-denying humanity that characterized some of Luzerne's early settlers stands the story of the man who, coming into the township from Hagerstown to find employment, accidentally broke his leg only a little while after he came in. He was poor and unable to pay for such service as his case required, but eight of the inhabitants of old Luzerne improvised a hammock, laid the wounded man thereon, and shouldering the burden marched through the woods and over hills until they reached Hagerstown, and there delivered their charge into the hands of a surgeon, whom they bade attend him at their expense. Five of these men were

Passing down from Cox Run towards Brownsville, the chronicler of history comes upon an early Quaker settlement south of Bridgeport. Among those prominent among the "Friends" were Stephen Darlington, Jonas Cattell, Robert Miller, Obed and Jesse Garwood, David Cattell, John Haines, Joshua and John Moore, Jonathan and Septimus Cadwallader, and Thomas Gregg. Septimus Cadwallader was a fuller, and set his mill on Dunlap's Creek, where Miller's mill now stands. Jonas Cattell built a tannery in 1508, and hired Samuel Wheaton, now living in Redstone, to dig the vats for him. William Dales became a proprietor of the tannery, and carried it on until his death in 1845. William Binns had also a tannery, which Joel Painter subsequently converted into a malt-house. Capt. I. C. Woodward, who was raised in the family of David Cattell, and began his service on the river in 1834, lives now in the same neighborhood that knew him in his boyhood's days.

The Quakers built a log church about 1800 in the Charleston District, at the site of the old graveyard. This church was destroyed by fire, and when a new house of worship was built the location was changed to Bridgeport. Among the Dearth's known as early settlers in Luzerne, John Dearth is known to have been here in about 1780, for in August, 1783, he quit-claimed to Armstrong Porter a tract of land lying on Dunlap's Creek, and adjoining lands of Rogers, Robert and Lewis Decem.

Henry Heaton, at one time a prominent man in Luzerne history, was a miller on the river at Millsboro', and carried on a mill upon each side of the stream. He was a representative in the Legislature, but far from a handsome man. As to the latter reference to his personal appearance a good story is still extant to the effect that a man calling at his mill to see him was told that Mr. Heaton was attending a Legislative session at Harrisburg. The visitor was exceedingly anxious to see him, and accordingly started for Harrisburg. Although a stranger to Heaton he knew the latter as soon as he encountered him at the capital, and at once assenting he proceeded to unfold his business. Heaton appeared to be impatient while the man told his story, and before the latter had got half through broke in with, "See here, my friend, I'm mightily curious to know how you, who had never seen me before, knew me the instant you saw me. I'm so curious to learn that your business can wait until I find out." The man fidgeted some and said he'd rather not tell, but upon being informed that he must tell or go without transacting his business replied, "Well, Mr. Heaton, if you must know, I met a man near your mill of whom I asked a description of your personal appearance, so that I could pick you out unsaid. He told me it would be the easiest thing in the world for me to know you, for I had but to look about me until I saw the ugliest-looking man in America and call him Heaton, with a positive assurance that there would be no mistake." Heaton was philosopher enough to laugh, and as a proof that he was not sensitive about it used himself to tell the story as a capital joke. Another story about Heaton deals with him as a miller. He set out one day with a boat-load of stones to stop a hole in his mill-dam. He got his boat around in what he judged the proper position, and caught hold of a great bowlder which he proposed to push into the opening. By some mischance he failed in his intent, so that instead of pushing the bowlder in he lost his balance and himself went headlong from the boat into and through the aperture. He shot into the lower depths with considerable velocity, but managed to scramble up and out of his involuntary bath without feeling seriously damaged. Indeed, he was more surprised than hurt, and as he recovered his mental balance he exclaimed, with a good deal of emphasis, "By Jove, the man that beats that performance will have to go through the other way!" He said, moreover, that it was about the closest shave he had ever sustained, for his body just about fitted the opening, and while he was going through even he feared he might stick fast and be drowned. Mr. Heaton was widely known and highly respected, and in business as well as politics bore a conspicuous place. Singular to relate, four of his children were born mutes, and thus remained all their lives.

Nathaniel Breeding, living in Cecil County, Md., found himself at the close of the Revolutionary war in possession of considerable Continental money, and not knowing what better to do with it, carried it away on horseback over the mountains to Southwestern Pennsylvania, and laid it out in about seven hundred acres of land lying upon Dunlap's Creek, in Luzerne township, about one mile above Merrittstown. Having bought his land, Mr. Breeding proceeded at his leisure to bring his family out, and got comfortably located some time during 1784. Later he built a grist-mill and saw-mill down the creek, and hired Samuel Bunting as his miller. Mr. Breeding always appeared in knee-breeches and silver buckles, and wore his hair in a curl. He rose to the distinction of member of the Supreme Executive Council from 1790 to the close of the Council, and of associate judge of the County Court, serving from 1790 until his death in 1821. He bore otherwise a prominent part in local affairs. The stone house which he built in 1794, and in which he died in 1822, is still a solid structure, and serves as the occasional residence of his grandson, George E. Hogg, of Brownsville, who owns the old Breeding farm. A portion of the land purchases of Nathaniel Breeding, as above noticed, appears to have been acquired by him from David Breeding, his brother, of Lancaster, as per recorded deed bearing date May 8, 1783, the consideration being £500. The land is mentioned as being "a certain tract lying and being on Dunlap's Creek, in the township of Menallen, in Westmoreland County, containing three hundred and eighteen acres, adjoining lands late of Robert Evans. Charles Porter, John Ewing, and other lands, it being the tract wherein John McKibben, of the County of Westmoreland and Commonwealth aforesaid, settled on the 24th of April, in the year of our Lord 1766, and which was surveyed and located to the aforesaid John McKibben by Alexander McLean, but without warrants.” McKibben sold to David Breading, and he to Nathaniel Breading, as stated. A tract adjoining this, and containing two hundred and twelve acres, was surveyed under two warrants, dated respectively Nov. 6, 1771, and June 4, 1772. Rev. John McMillan, a pioneer preacher in the West, recorded in his journal under date of “second Sabbath in August, 1775,” “Preached at the house of John McKibben, and lodged there all night.” David Breading, who with his brother Nathaniel served through the Revolutionary war, bought land in Fayette County while still living in Lancaster, and in 1786 followed Nathaniel to the new country as a settler. He lived on the farm now owned by Robert Hogsett, who lives in the stone house erected there by David Breading in 1800. Both David and Nathaniel Breading died in Luzerne. None of Nathaniel’s children are now living. David’s son, Clark, the only remaining member of the family bearing the name of Breading, resides in Uniontown.

The hamlet of Heistersburg, so named from Governor Heister, was in 1825 the location of a roadside inn that Yates S. Conwell opened to accommodate the travel that passed between the river and the mountains over the State road. A store was opened there in 1839 by Robert Brown, who kept also the Conwell tavern. This latter house has been a house of entertainment since 1825, and for a long time was known as “The Exchange.” The last landlord was Samuel Kelly, who died in the winter of 1889-91. In 1827, Samuel Roberts built a brick house at Heistersburg, and in a little while afterwards William Rice bought it, and kept store in one portion of it. In 1837, Zebulon Ridge rented it of Rice and converted it into a tavern stand. For some years Heistersburg boasted two taverns, each of which was tacitly understood to be a rallying-point for members of each political party, and report has it that Heistersburg was on more than one occasion a very animated locality. The best known of the respective landlords during the exciting political eras were Zebulon Ridge and John S. Conwell. Thomas Acklin is remembered as among the early store-keepers at Heistersburg, but he failed to make much of a mark as a merchant. The present brick store, kept by John Ridge, was built by John S. Conwell, and kept by him for some time. The first postmaster at Heistersburg was John S. Conwell. The office was discontinued after he resigned, and remained so for some time. Upon its revival Neil Hostetler was appointed. Succeeding him the incumbents have been Taylor Lynch and David Conwell, the latter being the present postmaster.

From 1785 to 1800 licenses to tavern-keepers in Luzerne were issued as follows: William Homan, March, 1785; Abram Forker, March, 1792; Job Briggs, December, 1792; Samuel Large, June, 1796; Eber Homan, September, 1796; James McCoy, September, 1797; John Black, September, 1797; Elijah Crawford, March, 1799; Isaac Kimber, September, 1799; Adam Blair, June, 1800.

In the records of the September sessions in 1784 appears the following entry: “William Homan, of Luzerne, having been reported to the court by the constable of that township for keeping a tipples-house, and Thomas Scott, Esq., having declared upon his oath to the court that in his opinion all the property of said William Homan would be insufficient to pay the fine and costs on an indictment, and that he must become a charge on the township, the Court duly considering these circumstances do recommend to the attorney for the State not to prefer a bill of indictment against him.”

EARLY ROADS.

One of the early roads laid out through Luzerne was the one extending from James Crawford’s ferry to Uniontown. Upon a petition for the road, presented at the June sessions of court, 1784, Roger Roberts, Josiah Crawford, Aaron Hackney, William Royl, David Jennings, and Nathaniel McCarty were appointed viewers. A report of the road was made at the September sessions of the same year. The course of the road lay through Luzerne, Redstone, and Menallen townships, by way of “Mr. Lawrence’s,” “Mr. Fentng’s,” and “Big Meadow Branch,” and so to Uniontown. At the same sessions the court confirmed the report and ordered it opened, cut, cleared, and bridged, thirty-three feet wide. A petition for a road from Oliver Crawford’s ferry to Uniontown was presented at the June sessions in 1784. Samuel Adams, William Ross, William Gray, James Hammond, Andrew Fraser, and William Haney were appointed viewers. The road is spoken of as “the nearest and best way from Oliver Crawford’s ferry to Uniontown,” and passed by Thomas Davidson’s house, Absalom Littel’s, Charles Porter’s, intersecting the road leading from James Crawford’s ferry to Uniontown, and thence by the course of said road to Uniontown. A road twenty-five feet wide from Josiah Crawford’s ferry to Uniontown was reported at the December sessions of 1784 by the viewers, Messrs. Armstrong Porter, Henry Swindler, Amos Hough, Samuel Douglas, Josiah Crawford, and Thomas Gregg, and accordingly confirmed. The route was from the ferry by way of Daniel Gudgel’s, Samuel Douglas’ mill (at Merrittstown), Amos Hough’s mill, and intersecting the road from James Crawford’s ferry to Uniontown, the course of which road thereafter being followed.
A report of two roads from Redstone Old Fort was made to the court at December sessions of 1788. One of the roads reached from the ferry of Thomas McGibbin, just below the Redstone Old Fort, on the Monongahela River, to Septimus Cadwallader's grist-and-saw-mill, and from thence to intersect the road from the Friends' meeting-house to the ferry aforesaid, near the mouth of Joseph Grayble's lane. The second road was the road from the Friends' meeting-house to the ferry aforesaid. The viewers were Samuel Jackson, Josiah Crawford, James Crawford, Lewis Decem, Samuel McGinley, and Robert Baird. In September, 1794, John Conwell, Charles Porter, Jr., Robert Baird, Michael Cox, Thomas Gregg, and William Oliphant laid a road thirty-three feet wide from Kinsey Virgin's ferry towards Brownsville, a distance of six miles and seventy-eight perches, intersecting a road leading to Brownsville. June, 1795, a road was laid from near Robert Adams' to James Crawford's road. The viewers were Jeremiah Peers, Robert Adams, Samuel Adams, Thomas Gregg, Hugh Laughlin, and Charles Porter, Jr.

TOWNSHIP ORGANIZATION AND LIST OF OFFICERS.

At the December session of the Court of Quarter Sessions for 1783 the county was divided into townships, of which one was Luzerne. The limits were described as follows:

"A township beginning at the mouth of Dunlap's Creek, thence up the Monongahela River to Oliver Crawford's Ferry, thence along the road leading from Oliver Crawford's Ferry to Unerton to McKibbin's Run, thence down the said run to Dunlap's Creek, thence down Dunlap's Creek to the beginning, to be hereafter known by the name of Luzerne township."

At the December sessions of 1820 a petition of a number of persons living near the dividing line between the townships of German and Luzerne was presented, setting forth,—

"That the said line being declared to be the old Muddy Creek path, which is now obliterated, its precise location being known to few or none, whereby inconveniences may occur; besides, as the market and business of your petitioners are at Brownsville, it would be more convenient for them to be included in Luzerne township; they therefore pray the court to appoint three impartial men to enquire into the expediency of so altering said line as to make the same more certain and more convenient to your petitioners by beginning at Seeiders' meeting-house, and running thence by a straight line to the headwaters of Patterson Run, and down said run to the Monongahela, or by such other course as they may think proper whereby the greater part of said line will be a natural boundary not liable to mistake or dispute. Viewers appointed, George Craft, Charles Porter, and Robert Boyd. Order issued; returned March 6, 1821; confirmed June 7, 1821."

A petition was presented to the court at this sessions of June, 1845, for the alteration of the line between German and Luzerne township. An order was issued and commissioners were appointed. A report was made and approved Sept. 4, 1845, and confirmed Dec. 12, 1845. The change of boundary is indicated in the report of the commissioners, as follows, viz.: "Commencing at the corner between German, Luzerne, and Redstone townships, thence up Lilly's Run to Bixler's line, thence with said line until it intersects the present township line."

A list of the principal township officers chosen in Luzerne between 1784 and 1881, as gleaned from the imperfectly preserved records, is here given, viz.:

SCHOOLS.

The oldest school record extant in Luzerne is an ancient document now in the hands of John M. Moore, dated 1802, and inscribed "School-House Subscription." The document reads as follows:

"We, the undersigners, do promise to pay such sums as shall be laid on us by James Thompson, John Work and David Breeding, to William Moore and Ebenezer Finley, trustees for the purpose of building a school house near Thomas Barnes, at the intersection of the Morgantown and James Thompson road, the size of 20 ft. by 18 do. Such sums we promise to pay in manners following: The one half payable in wheat at 9 p. rye at $3 corn 2-6 p. du. in James Thompson or Ebenezer Finley's mill; all on demand, as witness our hands and seal this last day of Dec. 1802. Further, we agree that the above witness shall purchase a seven-plate stove and set it up in the house when finished.

"JAMES THOMPSON,

The school-house they built still stands, and is known as the old cross-roads or Morgantown road school-house. It was constructed of round logs, chinked and daubed, and covered with slat-boards and shingles; chimney made of split sticks. Slabs with two sticks under each end served for seats. Rough boards fastened against the walls were writing-desks. Two square holes about two by two and a half feet, one on each side of the house, were windows. There was one door, which was all that was necessary. The building has been inhabited for a number of years by Aaron Moore and John White, who vacated it on April 4, 1881.

Merrittstown was a little more fortunate than the surrounding country in the matter of educational advantages, for it had a school that was enough better than the ordinary school of the time to win the honor of being designated as "the college." The school-house, which stood near the old Baptist graveyard, was not any different from the log cabin school-houses of the period, but old Anthony Burns, the teacher, must have been considered a superior sort of pedagogue, since in that respect only was the superiority of the Merrittstown school discernible. Schoolmaster Burns must have been a teacher in great favor, for he taught in Merrittstown and vicinity about fifty years, and gave up the business of teaching only when, at eighty years of age, he found himself too infirm to continue it. Andrew Stewart (afterwards known to fame as "Tariff Andy") took his first lessons in that school-house under a teacher named Carr, who ruled there before 1805, or before the advent of Burns, and who boasted in his school a Latin class, of which three members were Andrew Stewart, John Cunningham, and William Cunningham. Andrew Stewart's father was a blacksmith at Merrittstown for a while, and thus Andrew was a pupil in Daddy Carr's school. Later the Rev. William Johnston, pastor of the Dunlap's Creek Presbyterian Church, opened a Latin school at Merrittstown, and conducted it successfully for some years. Mention may likewise be made that William Darby, afterwards editor of The Gazetteer, was among the earliest teachers in the old Merrittstown log school-house, which, standing until 1836, was then accidentally burned. In 1806 the school-house in the present Crawford district stood about three-quarters of a mile distant from the site of the house now in use. The teacher in that year was Joseph Wanee, son of John Wanee, then living where John Wanee now lives. School children were not over plentiful there even in 1806, and by dint even of strongest effort the number available fell short of the requirement; whereupon Joseph Crawford, exceedingly anxious for a school, agreed to pay for the tuition of ten children, although he could send only three, and so the school was started. In 1813 the house in the Charleston district stood near the present house. Murdock, the then teacher, was succeeded by Mr. McCleary, Anthony Burns, and others.

The following is a list of the school districts of Luzerne as formed in 1835 under the operation of the school law of the previous year, and of the districts of the township at the present time (1851), viz.:

The amount expended in the year 1835 for school purposes was $811.36. Teachers' wages then were from eleven to twenty-five dollars per month. The directors in 1838 were Joseph Crawford, Jr., John Moore, David Porter, Jr., Clark Breeding, P. F. Gibbons, and David Craft. Joseph Crawford, Jr., was president, and David Craft secretary. The list of school directors of Luzerne elected since the year 1840 is as follows:

CHURCHES.

Although Luzerne contains now but three houses of worship,—a Cumberland Presbyterian, a Methodist Episcopal, and an African Church (the latter at Luzerne Village),—no less than four other churches have been known to the township’s history, although of those four nothing now remains save the recollection that they once flourished. Each church had a history that began almost as soon as the history of the township itself, and each has for so many years been a thing of the past that but little save a reference to their existence can be here presented, since the church records have disappeared, no one knows where. One of the oldest of the four was the Baptist Church at Merritt-town. It must have been organized as early as 1800, for the present recollection is that when the church building was destroyed by fire in 1836 it was old and dilapidated. The church stood near the school-house, and was burned with the latter structure. Among the leading members of this Baptist organization were Abram Vernon, Josiah Richards, David Wilson, the Crafts, Harford, Hibbs, and others. The congregation was a large one for many years, but towards the last it became weakened, and was virtually dissolved even before the church was burned, so that there was not strength to create a revival of the organization or the building of a new house of worship, and so the record was closed. The last pastor the church had was the Rev. William Brownfield, whose home was near Uniontown. He was a very eccentric preacher, and seems to take great comfort in doing and saying things widely out of the common way. Mr. James Cunningham remembers going one Sunday with James Walker to hear Brownfield preach, and that the parson paused suddenly in the midst of his sermon to point his finger sharply and apparently at Cunningham and his companion, to exclain, in a loud voice, “Did you ever see me fly?” Then, keeping his eyes intently fixed upon the two young men, who blushed and looked much confused, he said, quite as loudly but more deliberately, “No, you haven’t, and what’s more you never will.” Having thus relieved his mind of a seeming burden, he went on with his sermon. He was once engaged in reading the Declaration of Independence at a Fourth of July celebration, when, coming to that part of it where recital is made of the English king’s oppressive acts, he grew quite excited, and with flashing eyes commented upon the passage with the single exclamation, “The villain!” delivered in such emphatic and fiery manner that none who saw or heard him could doubt for a moment that if Parson Brownfield could get at King George at that instant he would make short work of him.

HOPESWELL METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH

was formed not long after the year 1800, and near what is now known as Heistersburg, where its house of worship stood until about 1835. Singing-scholls are said to have flourished there with considerable vigor, but the church organization did not maintain a very long lease of life. It may be well to say, however, that the dissolution of the church organization was chargeable as much as to anything to the fact that the location of the church edifice was not a convenient one. This statement would appear to be borne out in the declaration that when West Bend Methodist Episcopal Church was formed, about 1835, many of Hopewell’s old members participated in organizing the new church.

In the southern portion of the township a Seeders', or United Presbyterian Church was formed so long ago that no one now living remembers anything as to the details, and it is believed that none of the constituent members are living. For more than fifty years the church history has been but a memory. A strong effort was made some years ago to revive the organization, but the effort resulted in failure.

There was a Quaker Church in the Charleston district even before 1800. It was a log structure, and stood near where the old graveyard in that district may yet be seen. It was burned about 1820, and replaced by a stone church, whose location was fixed in Bridgeport borough. The land for the church lot in the borough was deeded by Jonah Cadwallader "to the Society of Friends and citizens of Browns-ville and Bridgeport, for the purpose of building upon it a house of worship." The church is no more, and Quaker meetings in Luzerne a thing of the past.

HOPewELL CUMBERLAND PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

In the autumn of 1831, Revs. Alfred M. Bryan and Milton Bird, acting as missionaries under the General Assembly of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, were called to visit the neighborhood of Hopewell, and as their ministrations were met with an interested awakening of religious fervor, it was thought expedient to form a Cumberland Presbyterian Society at Hopewell. The Methodist Episcopal Society of Hopewell tendered the use of their house, and May 14, 1832, the Cumberland Society was formed with a membership of eighteen, to whom the Lord's Supper was administered for the first time June 17, 1832, by Rev. A. M. Bryan, assisted by Rev. Samuel M. Aston. Thenceforward preaching was supplied by Revs. Bryan, Sparks, and Aston. Liberal accessions were made to the congregation, and on Sept. 19, 1832, the formal organization of a church was effected. Sixty members were enrolled, and there were, in addition to these in the congregation, twenty-five seekers after religion. The constituent members were Samuel Roberts, Josephus Lindsay, James Gibson, John Davidson, William Downey, Robert Baird, Enoch Baird, William Chambers, Eleanor Mcaffie, Sarah Davison, Rachel Ritenhour, Isabella Milligan, Mary Gibson, Ruth W. Gibbons, Orpha McDougal, Moses Baird, Rachel Baird, Mary Porter, Rachel Downey, Mary Longley, Eliza Abrams, Mary B. Henderson, Eleanor Gibbons, Naomi Hurford, Sarah Moss, Ann Moss, Ann Hurford, Jane Louden, Eliza J. Paul, Lydia G. Gibson, Mary Jamison, Ann V. Gibbons, Eleanor Irwin, Ursula Arnold, Alexander Wilson, Deborah Wilson, Andrew Porter, Jr., Henry Alexander, William Kelly, Maria Porter, Mary Hurford, Eliza Rogers, Edward Rose, Hugh Kerns, Melinda J. Porter, Esther Pennell, Achsa A. Roberts, Mary Lawrence, Rebecca Kennedy, Hester J. Roberts, William G. Roberts, Caroline Roberts, Tirza Roberts, Isaac Covert, Nancy Porter, Mossill Jamison, George W. Baumgartner, Elisha Pierce, and Mary Pierce. Samuel Roberts, Josephus Lindsley, and James Gibson, Jr., were chosen and ordained ruling elders. Lindsay being selected to represent the church in Presbytery, reported that Revs. A. M. Bryan and S. M. Sparks had been assigned to preach at Hopewell during the ensuing six months. Nov. 3, 1832, John Davidson, Samuel Jennison, and Moses Barnes were chosen trustees.

In the spring of 1835, Rev. Mr. Wood was ordered to the charge as stated pastor, and remained until the spring of 1838. In April of that year Rev. A. M. Blackford succeeded to the pastorate. In April, 1840, came Rev. John Cary, and remaining one year was followed in April, 1841, by Rev. Samuel E. Hudson, whose term of service endured to 1846. In the fall of 1846, Fairview and Hopewell Churches united in a call to Rev. J. T. A. Henderson, who remained nearly all the time until 1856, Rev. Jesse Adams preaching also occasionally meanwhile. Rev. J. H. Coulter was the pastor a while after 1856, and then Mr. Henderson returned, to give way again to Mr. Coulter. Since April, 1889, Rev. A. W. White has been in charge.

The first house of worship was built in 1833-34. The second and present one was built in 1872. It is a handsome brick structure, 60 by 40 feet in dimensions, and cost six thousand dollars. The membership is now about two hundred and forty. The elders are John Vernon, William Keller, A. G. Swan, Samuel Baird, and Elijah Craft. The trustees are William Acklin, John Vernon, Oliver Miller. The Sunday-school superintendent is Jesse P. Crawford.

WEST BEND METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

The dissolution of the Hopewell Methodist Episcopal Church, about 1839, led to the formation of a Methodist Episcopal class in the river bend, the members being John Covert, Patience Lawrence, Richard Jamison and wife, George Lawrence and wife, and William Roberts, formerly of Hopewell. John Covert was chosen leader, and for many years afterwards was one of the ruling spirits in the church. Services were held in a school-house a few years, and when the congregation became prosperous enough to warrant the erection of a house of worship the one now used was built. Increase of membership has made the house too small, and within a short time it will be replaced by a spacious brick edifice to cost about six thousand dollars. The members number now about one hundred. The pastor is Rev. J. G. Gaugley. The trustees are Samuel Jamison, Benton Covert, John Covert, William Hurford, Albert Jamison, John Wance, and Joshua Strickler. The class-leader is Joshua Strickler.

A Union Church near Jacobs' Ferry is a monument to the generosity of Mrs. Adam Jacobs, of Brownsville. Residing during the summer seasons at the Ferry, she caused the church to be built for the purpose of having Episcopal services therein regularly during her suburban stay, and then caused it to be declared that all denominations were free to hold meetings in the house at all times save such as were chosen for the meetings of the Episcopalians.

BURIAL-GROUNDS.

Burial-places are numerous in Luzerne, and include among private and public graveyards some that are old and neglected, but yet dotted with weather-stained headstones that record the deaths and virtues of many of Luzerne's pioneers. There is the old Quaker burying-ground in the Charleston district (but little used now), one at Merrittstown, where the old Baptist Church once reared its modest front, one at Hopewell (or Healsburg), one on the John Horner farm near the river, one on the David Porter farm, another at the site of the United Presbyterian Church, another on J. W. Dearth's farm, and still another on the Joseph Crawford place. All these are burial-places dating from 1800 or near that period. There is a neat cemetery at the Hopewell Cumberland Presbyterian Church, and one at the West Bend Methodist Episcopal Church, at which latter place there is also an unused graveyard, originally laid out for the family of Jonathan Arnold, but used also by the neighborhood.

THE VILLAGE OF MERRITTSTOWN.

Merrittstown, lying upon Dunlap's Creek, and on the eastern line of Luzerne township, ranks among the old villages of the county, but that it has materially improved with age cannot be truthfully said. It contains to-day as its representative business interests two stores, a grist-mill, tannery, and the usual minor village industries, and a population of sixty-two inhabitants by the census of 1880. Seventy years ago it was a livelier place, for then it was a station on one of the traveled routes between East and West, and a halting-place for stock-drivers, freighters, etc. The opening of railway communication diverted such traffic, and took away much of Merrittstown's importance, but now the probability of a railway to touch at this point has awakened hopes of renewed prosperity, and brightened the prospect materially.

Merrittstown was founded and laid out by two brothers, named Caleb and Abram Merritt, of whom Abram was a man of considerable energy. Just when the Merritts laid out the village cannot be ascertained, although the statement is made that the original plat of the town is in the hands of some person living in the far West. The date may, however, be fixed with moderate certainty as not far from 1790. It is known that Samuel Douglas had a grist-mill and saw-mill there as early as 1785, and sold his interests to the Merritts, who conceived the notion of building a village around the nucleus of a mill. The place was at first called New Town, but directly after Merrittstown, Abram Merritt's house stood opposite the present shoe-shop of Lewis Durof Liberty, which he left to subscribers en route. Dennis was a white-haired old man, but a merry one, and regularly upon his approach to Merrittstown was greeted by the village lads, then in waiting for him, with the announcement, "Here comes old white head!" Having delivered his mail Dennis would bestow himself in the bar-room of the village tavern, and sing rollicking songs as long as the landlord would pay him for the songs in cider. Then Denny was in his glory, and the gathered villagers in a state of delight. Denny bore about with him a pair of ears of which each was ornamented with a slit. Rather proud than otherwise of the marks, he called frequent attention to them, and boastingly related that early in life he had been taken captive by the Indians, and thus received from them signs of their kindly attention.

Elijah Coleman did not fancy being postmaster because of the trouble it always gave him to make out his quarterly returns, and failing to get a better idea of the business as time passed he resigned in utter disgust. Adam Farquhar, who kept the village tavern, is said also to have had a bowling alley in it, and between selling whiskey, furnishing entertainment, and running the nine-pin alley managed to make life pleasant and lively for the travelers who came that way in considerable force and halted at old Farquhar's for the night.

In 1808, John McDougall came from Maryland to Merrittstown and set up a cabinet-shop. He was also a builder, and with John Allander to assist him did a good deal in the house-carpentering way. In 1810, George Hogg having given up business as a village trader, William Cunningham, son of James Cunningham, the distiller, opened a little store on the lot now occupied by L. C. McDougall's residence, and built also the house known as the Baird residence adjoining McDougall's. Mr. Cunningham's establishment was known as the Continental store, and as he had other business interests to look after, he employed John Gallagher and Benjamin Barton as his store clerks. He bought also the grist-mill property, and employed John Dunlap as his miller. He was excise officer for some years, and altogether had his hands full of industrial enterprises. He removed from the village to the Cunningham farm in 1817, and there died in 1819. During the latter portion of his stay at Merrittstown he operated a fulling-mill as an attachment to the grist-mill. Merrittstown had in 1810 a hatter named Joshua Wilson, who had a shop across from where Lewis Durnell's shoe-shop is, and there made heavy fur hats. He had in front of his place a great sign, upon which he had painted the picture of a hat, a fox, and other fur-coated animals. Matthias Lancaster, his workman, succeeded him in the business. Lancaster afterwards moved to Redstone. Caleb and Joshua Harford were the village blacksmiths, and Daniel Wilson the wagon-maker. The blacksmith's shop stood near where Mr. Moore's house now stands. In that shop James Cunningham, now of Luzerne, worked as an apprentice under George Brown, beginning in 1826. Speaking of his impressions of Merrittstown's early history, Mr. Cunningham says he is sure that Daniel Wilson, the wagon-maker, was in the village in 1812, for Daniel Wilson's wife Hester once told him (Cunningham) that she carried him, then a babe, to the window one day in that year to see a company of soldiers march past on the way to the army. George Chandler was then the village tailor, and in his shop he had as apprentice Josephus Lindsey, who afterwards set up a shop of his own and became the village postmaster. Chandler carried on tailoring until his death, when the business was continued by his son Isaac, who not long afterwards removed to Ohio. Noah Lewis succeeded Adam Farquhar as the village tavern-keeper in a house occupying the lot that adjoins Gadd's blacksmith's shop.

One of Merrittstown's local characters about 1812 was Lott Green, a Quaker and a good mechanic. He was a noted manufacturer of flax-buckets and also a skillful repairer of firearms.

The year 1823 saw considerable activity in Merrittstown. John McDougall, the carpenter (who was said, by the way, to have put the cabin upon the first steamboat built at Brownsville), built a brick tavern stand upon the site of William Cunningham's Continental store, the frame of which latter was included within the new structure. Mr. McDougall kept the brick tavern until 1845, since when it has been used as a family residence, it now being the home of Mr. L. C. McDougall. John McDougall died in 1856.

In 1826 there were three village taverns in Merrittstown, namely, McDougall's, Hiram Miller's (in the old Noah Lewis stand), and Daniel Marble's, in the building now occupied by Lewis Durnell. A new grist-mill had replaced in 1824 the old Douglas mill, and was owned by Joseph Thornton, whose miller was John Grimes, who removed at a later date to Ohio. William Ramsey and his son Jesse were for many years millers at the Thornton mill and the Gilmore mill, a short distance up the stream. The Thornton mill is now carried on by Lynch & Hanna. After John McDougall closed his tavern stand no public-house was kept in Merrittstown from that day to this. The opening of the National road had turned traffic from the route through Merrittstown, and of course the consequence of no travel was no tavern.

After William Cunningham closed his store, in 1817, Merrittstown was without a local trading-place until 1839, when John Smith opened trade in a store-house built by George Brown, the blacksmith. In that year Hugh Gilmore had a distillery near the town, and Elijah Coleman was still carrying on his tannery. Coleman was no less famous for being a tanner than he was for being the father of nineteen children. Hiram Durnell had been the village shoemaker from 1818. George Brown, the blacksmith, had opened his shop in 1822, prospered, and went to store-keeping. He traded about ten years, when in consequence of business misfortunes he became deranged. George Brown, who was Merrittstown's fourth store-keeper, was the successor of Robert Brown, and the predecessor of Samuel Henderson and John Gallaher. In 1876 the village had two stores, kept by Alfred Cunningham and Thomas D. Miller. Cunningham's store was burned in 1877 and Miller's in 1879, at which time the post-office with all the mail, being in Miller's store, was likewise destroyed.

In 1822 the foot-bridge across Dunlap's Creek at Merrittstown was washed away by a flood, and from that on to 1836 fording or ferrying was the method of crossing. In that year John Langley and Liberty Miller built the mason-work, and Stoffel Balsinger, with his son Perry, the framework of a new bridge. The mason-work remains, but the frame, being badly constructed, fell soon after it was put up. The present frame was constructed by William Antrim.

In the post-office the successor of Elijah Coleman was William Cunningham, who was succeeded in 1817 by Josephus Lindsley, the tailor. Lindsley resigned in 1832 and left the town. The next postmaster was George Brown, the blacksmith, who, after holding the place several years, was followed by Hugh Gilmore. Then came Margaret Gilmore, Alexander Brown, John Armstrong, and James McDougal. The succession after McDougal was Hiram S. Horner, 1861-62; Lewis Durnell, 1862-68; Mary Messmore, 1868-69; Samuel H. Higinbotham, 1869-72; E. H. Baird, 1872-75; T. D. Miller, 1875-79; Harriet A. Cook, 1879, to the present time. For a small place Merrittstown appears to have had a pretty extensive supply of postmasters.

The first resident physician at the village now remembered was Dr. Morrill Parker, who located there in 1821 or 1822. He was at no time very popular, for he appeared to esteem himself a grade above his neighbors in the social scale, and instead of cultivating friendly relations with them he had visitors from abroad at his home constantly, and rather delighted in showing off what he was pleased to term his aristocratic company before the villagers. By the latter he was termed a high-flyer, and when he left the town, after a stay of a few years, he was not much regretted. He aspired to be an author, and wrote "The Arcanum of Arts and Sciences," but it is not known that it created a very great commotion in the world of letters. After Dr. Parker's departure there was no village physician for some time.

Dr. McCon was the next to locate, and after him Dr. Wilcox, but neither remained more than a year. In 1827 came Dr. Elliott Finley from Westmoreland County, who, after a stay of a few years, moved to Greene County, where he was killed by an accidental fall from a wagon. After another interval the field was occupied by Dr. William L. Wilson, who left after the expiration of about a year. In 1840 an office was opened by Dr. J. N. Craft, son of David Craft. Dr. Craft practiced in Merrittstown and vicinity until his death in 1846, and achieved a popularity that causes grateful mention of his name to this day. His successor was Dr. H. R. Roberts, who had but little practice. N. L. Huyt followed Roberts, and in 1847 was succeeded by Dr. Henry Eastman, who came to Merrittstown in June of that year. Since then he has been steadily in practice in and about the village, and rides a wide circuit in a practice that has been extensive and profitable through his residence of thirty-four years and made his name a household word in hundreds of families in the county.

The only civic society in Merrittstown is Merrittstown Lodge, No. 772, I. O. O. F., which was organized Aug. 5, 1871, with charter members as follows: Isaac Messmore, P. G.; Samuel H. Higinbotham, John A. Messmore, P. G.; James M. Jackson, William Knight, Johnson Miller, James H. Ball, Jesse Coldren, William H. Higinbotham, George W. Green, Jacob N. Ridge, Samuel L. Stewart, Jacob Huber, Casper Haynes, George Thompson, William S. J. Hatfield, F. F. Chalfant, R. Brashear, John Coldren, J. C. Wood.

The first officers were J. A. Messmore, N. G.; Isaac Messmore, V. G.; S. H. Higinbotham, Sec.; James M. Jackson, P. S.; Johnson Miller, Treas. The Noble Grands have been J. A. Messmore, Isaac Messmore, John Allen, James Jackson, Samuel Higinbotham, S. J. Gadd, William Gadd, S. L. Stewart, George Roberts, W. S. Craft, Absalom Hostetler, J. N. Ridge, Johnson Miller, John Williams, and Newton Jackson. The members are now twenty-four, and the officers as follows: Newton Jackson, N. G.; John Norman, V. G.; Robinson Savage, Rec. Sec.; Richard Miller, P. S.; Joseph Woodward, Treas.

The most important industry in Luzerne, aside from that of agriculture, is the distillery of George W. Jones, on the river near Bridgeport. The business was founded there and a distillery built in 1857 by John Worthington and J. S. Krepps. Fire destroyed the establishment in 1839, and in 1869 John Worthington rebuilt it. He carried it on until 1866, when he sold out to Britton & South, who were succeeded in 1868 by Britton & Moore, and they in 1869 by Jones & South. In 1876 George W. Jones became the sole proprietor. Mr. Jones has recently enlarged the works. They have at present a capacity of one hundred and fifty bushels, employ fifteen hands, and produce about twelve barrels of whiskey daily.
Among the immigrants into Fayette County at an early day was Judge Nathaniel Breading, a man of strong character and of peculiar note in his times. His grandfather, David Breading, was of Scotch descent, and was born near Coleraine, Londonderry Co., Ireland, and coming to America settled in Lancaster County, Pa., about 1728, bringing with him his family, of whom was his son James, the father of Nathaniel Breading.

Nathaniel Breading, son of the above-named James and Ann Ewing Breading, was born March, 1751, in Little Britain township, Lancaster Co., Pa. Being given a fine classical education, he took charge of an academy at Newark, Del., and afterwards taught school in Prince Edward County, Va.

We next hear of him serving in the army of the Revolution under his future father-in-law, Gen. Ewing, commissary of the Pennsylvania line, while the army was encamped at Valley Forge during the hard and gloomy winter of 1777. Having married Mary Ewing, he removed his family to Tower Hill farm, Luzerne township, Fayette Co., in 1784. During 1783 he was appointed one of the five justices of the peace, who were the sole judges in the Court of Common Pleas for some years, until Judge Addison was appointed president judge, on which event Mr. Breading was appointed associate, and continued such until his death. After the close of the war he was chosen as one of the Supreme Executive Council of Pennsylvania, with whom was lodged all the executive power of the State. This office he held about five years, until the adoption of the new constitution of 1790 providing for the election of a Governor.

At an early day Judge Breading did much to develop the infant trade between the western counties of the State and New Orleans by sending annually to that market a flat-boat laden with flour and whiskey, at that time almost the only articles of production and export, though as he was early engaged with John and Andrew Oliphant in the furnace business, they occasionally included salt- and sugar-kettles, hollow-ware, etc.

During the troublous times of the Whiskey Insurrection Judge Breading, as a law-abiding citizen, used all his influence in maintaining the laws taxing whiskey, notwithstanding these laws were destructive to his interest and so obnoxious as to create a rebellion which could be suppressed only by the strong arm of military force. So strong indeed was public opinion against the excise laws that large amounts of Judge Breading’s property were burned by the insurgents. He, in connection with Edward Cook and John Oliphant, was a delegate from Fayette County to a convention of gentlemen which met at Pittsburgh, Sept. 7, 1791, to take measures in regard to suppressing the Whiskey Insurrection.

Judge Breading was commissioned by the State, March 5, 1785, to survey all the lands then recently purchased from the Indians north and west of the Ohio and Allegheny Rivers to Lake Erie, as also to assist in running the lines between Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Ohio.

We recur here to the days of Judge Breading’s early manhood to note that he purchased the Tower Hill farm, before referred to, in 1783, buying at that time the tomahawk right of one McKibben, who had taken it up and was then living upon it, and “paid out the land” to the State in 1784, and immediately moved upon it, and in 1790 built thereon a stone house, which is in perfect preservation, and is now in the possession of one of his grandsons, George E. Hogg. Judge Breading lived continuously in this house after its erection, and died therein.

Judge Breading was very enterprising, and aside from various other important operations he, in company with others, built at Brownsville, in 1814, a steamboat named the “Enterprise,” which was the first steamer built at Brownsville, and which, after making a number of trips to Pittsburgh, was sent down the river to New Orleans and never returned. In 1816 the same persons built a second steamer.

Nathaniel Breading died April 22, 1822, his wife, Mary Ewing, surviving him, and dying Aug. 31, 1845, aged seventy-eight years. Their children, now all deceased, were George; Mary Ann, intermarried with George Hogg; James E., who married Elizabeth Ewing; Sarah, who married Dr. James Stevens, of Washington, Pa.; Harriet, who was the wife of Dr. Joseph Gazzam; Caroline Margaret, who married Dr. Joseph Trevor, of Connellsville and Pittsburgh, Pa.; Elizabeth, who married Rev. Wm. B. McIvaine; William E., a lawyer, who died in the twenty-fifth year of his age; and two children who died in infancy.

Nathaniel Breading and his wife Mary, as also his father, James, and his wife, Ann Ewing, were interred in the Langhin burying-ground, two and a half miles east of Brownsville, in sight of the National road.

James E. Breading,

James E. Breading, son of Judge Nathaniel and Mary Ewing Breading, was born at Tower Hill farm, Luzerne township, Fayette Co., Pa., Oct. 19, 1789. While quite young he entered on his long career as a merchant at New Haven, in his native county, then the centre of the largest and almost the only iron interest west of the mountains. Thence he removed to Brownsville, and there pursued the same line of business until the death of his father made it necessary for him to take charge of Tower Hill farm in 1822. He removed to Pittsburgh, Pa., in 1829, where, in connection with his brother-in-law, George Hogg, and William Hogg, the uncle of George, both of Brownsville, he embarked very largely in the wholesale trade of groceries and dry-goods. Herein, by his recognized character for honesty and integrity and his fine business capacities, he was eminently successful, and secured the confidence and respect of a large community with which he had business relations. He retired, however, some years before his death to enjoy that rest in the evening of his days to which his long life of activity entitled him.

Mr. Breading was connected with the commissary department during Gen. (afterwards President) William H. Harrison's campaign against Tecumseh and his braves. He was for many years connected with a large mercantile establishment in St. Louis as a silent partner, holding the most responsible position in the house.

In 1821, Mr. Breading married Elizabeth, daughter of William and Mary Ewing, and died without issue in Allegheny City, Nov. 19, 1863, his wife surviving him. His remains were interred in Allegheny Cemetery.

Mrs. Elizabeth Ewing Breading, his widow, now in the eighty-fourth year of her age, resides at Emsworth, a few miles west of Allegheny City, on the Fort Wayne Railroad, where she passes her venerable years in affluent domestic quiet, her life being now given, as her earlier days were in a great measure expended, in literally doing good, and commanding the affection of all who know her.

DAVID BREADING.

David Breading, who was the son of James and Ann Breading, was one of the early settlers of Fayette County, moving thereinto in 1794 from Lancaster County, Pa. He entered the army as a private in 1776, and passed the winter at Valley Forge, and was afterwards made an officer of the commissary department, wherein he continued during the remainder of the war of the Revolution, except for a short time while he was aide-de-camp to Gen. Maxwell in the battle of Monmouth, during which Mr. Breading was witness of a notable incident in the military career of the "Father of his Country." While the battle was progressing, Gen. Maxwell, thinking that the division general, Lee, was not conducting his forces as he should, sent Breading to Gen. Washington, then in a distant part of the field, to inform him of the state of affairs. Washington on receiving the dispatch asked, "Young man, can you lead me to Gen. Lee?" Breading replying, "Yes, general," Washington promptly said, "Well, you lead and I will follow," and soon Breading became witness of the se-sons,—all associate names well known among the early inhabitants, and in these times also.

William Ewing and his son, John H., of Washington, constructed the National road between Hillsborough and Brownsville. He was appointed by the Governor of the State a justice of the peace, and held that office with great credit to himself and satisfaction to the public until the constitution of the State made it elective.

He was a man of strong mind and excellent judgment, together with great physical strength; an active and enterprising business man, who kept up close relationships with the prominent characters of his day. He was a Federalist in politics, and often took an active part, especially in the Ross and McKean campaign of 1800.

William Ewing died Oct. 21, 1827, of what perhaps would now be called typhoid fever. He lies buried in the Counell family graveyard, on the old homestead farm of John Counell, and is remembered as one of those substantial, honorable, public-spirited men of whom the community was justly proud.

ALEXANDER GIBSON.

The progenitor of the Gunsons of Luzerne township was one James Gibson, who migrated from Ireland in 1779, and located in Chester County, Pa., and engaged in farming. He followed his vocation until 1776, when he entered the Continental army and served until the surrender of Cornwallis. After the surrender he found that two of his brothers were soldiers in the British army, having been pressed into the service by the mother-country. At the close of the struggle they settled in Virginia, and their descendants nearly all reside there. James Gibson's home continued in Chester County until 1790, when he emigrated to Southwestern Pennsylvania, and settled upon a farm in Luzerne township, where his son Alexander afterwards lived and died, and which is now in possession of Mr. Oliver Miller. James Gibson was married to Margaret Lackey in 1792. They had six children, of whom Alexander, the subject of this sketch, was the third. He was born June 8, 1797. His early life was spent upon his father's farm, and received his education in the country schools of that period. He began work for himself at the age of twenty years, engaging in wagoning from Wheeling to Baltimore, and in 1820 changed his route to and from Baltimore to Nashville, Tenn. Here he, in company with Levi Crawford, now living in Luzerne township, spent two years trading with the Cherokee Indians. In 1826 he returned to Pennsylvania, sold his team, and purchased a farm. On the 24th of June, 1824, he was married to Mary Hibbs, of Redstone township. To them were born six children, four of whom are living, viz.: James G., married first to Mary Rodgers. They had two children,—John A. and Mary R. Mary died in 1869. He was married again June 25, 1867, to Rebecca J. Haney. Margaret J., married to William H. Miller; Mary A., married to Oliver Miller. They have two children, Albert G. and Emma V. Albert M., married to Alice Frey. They have one child, Nellie.

The most of Alexander Gibson's active business life was spent in farming and stock-dealing. He was industrious, a good manager, and accumulated enough property to give each of his children a fair start in life. He never sought political preferment. He was prompt to perform what he promised, and was highly esteemed by his neighbors. He was eminently a man of peace, and never had a lawsuit in his life. He was for many years an active member of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, and his Christian life challenged the respect of those who knew him. He died July 12, 1875, and his remains rest in the Hopewell Cemetery. His wife, Mary, died Jan. 25, 1876.

BENJAMIN COVERT.

The progenitor of the Coverts in the United States was one Abraham Covert, who came from Holland to the colonies about 1707. Of his family nothing is now known except that he had a son Abraham, who raised a family of eight children,—four sons and four daughters. The sons were Abraham, Isaac, John, and Morris. These four sons in time became widely separated. Abraham remained East, while the others sought their fortunes in the West. John settled north of Pittsburgh. Morris first lived in New Jersey, and there married a Miss Mary Mann. After his marriage he moved to Col. Cresap's estate on the Potomac, in the State of Maryland, where he resided some years. About the year 1780 he moved to Fayette County, Pa., and located about three miles west of Beccontown, now Uniontown, where he purchased a farm of three hundred acres for eight hundred and fifty dollars, on the old Fort road leading to Redstone Old Fort. Here he lived and died, and raised a family of eleven children,—six sons and five daughters. The oldest son, Joseph, married Nancy Borer, of Harrison, Ohio, where he lived and died. The second son, Abraham, married Catharine Black, and they removed to Harrison County, Ohio. The third son, John, married Amy Doney, and lived on the Monongahela River, in Luzerne township, Fayette Co., and died in his ninety-third year. The fourth son, Morris, was an itinerant Methodist preacher. He married Nancy Purrill, of Chesapeake Bay, and died near Clarksburg, W. Va., aged about sixty years. Jesse, the youngest son, married Henrietta Gibson; resided principally in Fayette County, Pa., and died at the age of fifty-five.

Benjamin Covert was born July 10, 1799, on the old homestead, where he grew to manhood. He married Abigail Randolph, and removed to Harrison County, Ohio, in 1820, settled on the Stillwater, and there resided until 1839. Two of his children, Richard and Mary, were born there. He next removed MENALLEN TOWNSHIP.

MENALLEN, one of the most prosperous agricultural townships of Fayette County, contained in June, 1880, a population of 1461. The assessment for 1881 gave the total valuation subject to county tax as $826,827, a decline of $239,443 as compared with 1880. The township is bounded by Redstone and Franklin on the north, Georges, South Union, and German on the south, Franklin, North Union, and South Union on the east, and German and Redstone on the west. Menallen has as yet no railway line, but that famed highway known as the National road crosses it from east to west, and is a great convenience to the people. There are three small post-villages in the township,—Upper Middletown (or Plumsock), on Redstone Creek; New Salem, six miles westward therefrom; and Searight's, on the National road, five miles westward from Uniontown. Mill streams are abundant. Among them are Redstone Creek, Dunlap's Creek, Jennings' Run, and Salt Lick Run. The surface of the township is uneven. Coal and iron ore are found in great quantities, but beyond supplying the wants of home consumers do not contribute to local wealth, for the reason that lack of railway transportation facilities puts out of the question the matter of profitable mining operations. The valuable coal and iron interests of Menallen, however, will soon be developed, as a result of the opening of the Redstone Branch of the Pittsburgh, Virginia and Charleston Railroad, which passes along the northeast border of the township, and is now near completion.

EARLY SETTLEMENTS.

Of the considerable number of settlers who were found located in the Redstone Valley when the Rev. John Steele made his tour of observation in this region, in the spring of 1768 (and whose names were given by him in his report to the Governor on his return east), it is not known which or how many of them were settled within the territory that now forms Menallen township, though there is no doubt that some of them were living within its boundaries. A very early settler, and not improbably the first within the township of Menallen, was William Brown, who came here in 1765. His children were Sarah, George, Mary, James, Alexander, Alice, and John. The last named (and youngest) is now living in Kansas, at the age of ninety-six years. Little beyond this has been ascertained of the history of this first settler, William Brown. The tract on which he settled is now a farm owned (but not occupied in person) by his great-grandson, Richard H. Brown, of Franklin township. As early as the year 1765 the Rev. James Finley, then living upon the Eastern Shore of Maryland, came out through Southwestern Pennsylvania on a tour of exploration in the service of the church with which he labored, his mission being presumably to learn how the people of that region were supplied with the means of religious worship. He was accompanied on his journey (made on horseback) by a Mr. Philip Tanner, a fuller by trade, whose object in undertaking the excursion was the looking for a favorable land location. This object had likewise something to do with Mr. Finley's journey, for he had a family of six sons, and he conceived the idea that perhaps he might find for his boys a place where they might grow up with a new country and lead a life of independence. Mr. Finley is supposed to have been the first minister of the gospel to penetrate westward of the mountains for the purpose of spreading the influences of religion among the inhabitants, Army chaplains had been there before him, but they could scarcely be classed in the same category. He preached wherever he found a place and opportunity, and returning to the same country subsequently on similar expeditions in 1767, 1771, and 1772 became well known. In 1771 he selected some lands lying in Redstone and Menallen townships, and in 1772 brought out his son Ebenezer, a lad of fourteen, whom he intended to be trained in the hardy experience of a pioneer. With his son he bought also a few negro slaves and Samuel Finley (not related to the Rev. James), to the latter of whom he gave the charge of the lands and the guardianship of young Ebenezer.

The Rev. Mr. Finley himself never became a resident of Fayette County. He lived in Maryland until 1783, when he accepted a call to preach for a church in Westmoreland County, Pa. There he remained in charge of the congregation until his death in 1795. Ebenezer Finley grew to manhood and prospered. He became an owner of much land in Redstone, German, and Menallen townships, but had his home in Redstone. A more extended reference to him will accordingly be found in the history of that township, where he died in 1849, aged eighty-eight years. In 1826 his son, Ebenezer, Jr., moved into Menallen, and settled upon some of his father's land. There he still resides, hale and hearty, although nearing his eightieth year. He and his excellent wife celebrated in 1876 the golden anniversary of their wedding, and on that occasion gathered within their hospitable mansion friends, relatives, and children even from distant parts of the country. The reunion was a joyous and memorable one. Another son of Ebenezer Finley the elder, living in Menallen on a portion of the early Finley purchase, is Eli H., whose home is near the village of New Salem. There is an amusing story told of the appearance of Rev. James Finley and Philip Tanner in the Dunlap's Creek Valley. It recites that Messrs. Finley and Tanner rode up to the house of Capt. John Moore, of German township, and upon their near approach were espied by Capt. John's youthful son Aaron, who, running as fast as he could into the house, cried out almost breathlessly to his father, "Pap, pap, there be two great men out there. I know they're great men 'cause they've got boots on." Evidently "men with boots on" must have been rare objects in that country at that day.

There were many of the Society of Friends among the early settlers of Menallen. They came from Virginia soon after the close of the Revolutionary war, and in considerable numbers located in the neighborhood of New Salem, in Menallen, German, and South Union townships. Among them were James Sidwell, Joseph Mendenhall, William Dickson, John Hackney, Caleb Antrum, Abraham Vail, John Woods, the Campbells, and many others. At Sandy Hill, on Jennings' Run, upon the road between New Salem and Uniontown, the Quakers built at an early day (as early as 1784, and perhaps before) a log meeting-house, and laid out a graveyard. The meeting-house stood for many years, and was long a place where the Friends assembled regularly for worship. After a while, however, the members of that sect, lessening by deaths and removals, became so few in number that meetings were discontinued, and by and by the meeting-house was demolished. The graveyard, thickly dotted with old headstones, is still used for its original purpose.

Joseph Mendenhall was a prominent figure in Menallen's early history, and although he was known as a Quaker, and attended at the Quaker meeting-house, he was said to exhibit at times a boisterous disposition utterly at variance with the peaceful tenets of the Society of Friends, and is indeed reported to have gone so far on more than one occasion as to swear roundly. Mr. Mendenhall came from Philadelphia directly upon the close of the Revolution, and settled in what became the Mendenhall school district, on a stream, and at a place called to this day Mendenhall's dam, where he built a saw-mill. He claimed to have been a captain in the Revolution, and for that reason, more perhaps than for any other, he was known as "the fighting Quaker." His greatest delight was to be chosen supervisor, so that he might follow the bent of his inclinations, or hobby more properly, towards the working of the township roads. He was township supervisor many successive years, and always filled the office with the highest credit. Although he was generally chosen without much opposition, he worked hard at each election, and invariably carried to the polls a jug of whisky, upon the contents of which he and his adherents would make merry over the result. The jug, and sometimes more than one, bore a prominent part in the supervisors' highway labors, for he ever made it a point to provide whisky at his own expense for the refreshment of those whom he called to the work of repairing the roads. Inasmuch as he frequently had as many as fifty or sixty men laboring at that business at a time, his expenditures for whisky must have amounted to a considerable sum. Mr. Mendenhall lived to be ninety-four years old.

James Sidwell, a Quaker, came from Martinsburg, Va., in 1790, and made his home upon a tract of three hundred acres of land that he had bought of Benjamin Whaley, who had bought the land of the patentees, Grant, Pitt, and Buchanan, to whom the patent was issued April 24, 1788. Upon that land now lives Hiram H. Hackney, grandson of James Sidwell. The latter had but two children, and they were daughters. He died on his Menallen farm in 1815, aged seventy-seven years. One of his daughters married James Stevens, and moved to Indiana. The second became the wife of John Hackney, of Lazenoe, who settled on the Sidwell homestead.

Although James Sidwell himself took no part in the Revolutionary struggle, all of his brothers—to the number of three—fought through the campaigns with conspicuous gallantry. There was a Quaker named William Dickson adjoining Sidwell on the west when the latter settled, and near him a number of Quakers. John Hackney died in 1808, at the age of eighty-five. He had seven children, of whom four are living. Of these Hiram H. and John are residents of Menallen.

In 1793 there was a school-house on the Sidwell farm, at which John Hackney's wife (James Sidwell's daughter) took her first lessons in education from Daniel Roundtree, who taught a long while there and in the neighboring school-houses.

Caleb Woodward moved from Chester County at an early day, and set up a blacksmith's shop in Menallen, on James Sidwell's farm. He was a somewhat noted mechanic, and was esteemed especially skillful in the manufacture of plows, chains, etc. The plows of his day were made of wood and plated with strips of iron. People came to him from afar off, nine miles and more, to have him make for them chains and plows. He did also a brisk business in plating saddles. He settled eventually on a farm now occupied by Joseph Woodward, and died in New Salem. Caleb's brothers, John, Joshua, and Joseph, located in Menallen about the same time. All of them were farmers. Joshua's home was on the place now owned by his son Ellis.

William Barton came also from Chester County about 1775. He bought of a man named Rayall the land now occupied by J. W. Barton. His sons were William, Joseph, Robert, Thomas, and Benjamin. His daughters were two in number. All the children were born on the Menallen place. His son Thomas married Priscilla B. Gaddis, of South Union. She died in Menallen, aged, it is said, one hundred years. Her father, John Gaddis, saw an extended period of active service during the war of 1812. There was a school-house near the Barton place in 1805, to which Barton's children went, and in that year had as teacher a Mr. Thomas.

The Quaker settlement near New Salem was increased in 1795 by the arrival of Caleb Antram, himself a Quaker, who migrated from Virginia, with a family consisting of a wife and three children. He bought one hundred and fifteen acres of land of Henry Vandemont, and after he had been in a short time bought also the William Dickson farm. Antram died in 1840, aged eighty-seven years. Of his seven children but two are living, Caleb and Joshua. John Butterfield was living upon the site of New Salem village when Antram made his location, and there were also in the vicinity, besides those already mentioned, the Rodericks, Campbells, Millers, Woods, and Johnsons. Daniel Johnson had been living on the present Abram Roderick place since 1783. He was a cabinet-maker by trade.

Robert Jackson settled about 1790 on the John Deart farm. His son Zadoc married a daughter of Caleb Woodward. Giles McCormick, a native of Ireland, came to Fayette County in 1808, and bought of Mr. Watt a farm in Menallen, upon which James Gaddis now lives. There Mr. McCormick died in 1835. Samuel Harris and Ralph Higinbotham were early settlers in the Mendenhall neighborhood; Jeremiah Pierson (who died in 1881, aged ninety-five), the Campbells, the Shaw, the Grables, Coleys, and Keys, near Searight's; and the Vails, Gaddis, McGinnis, Works, Fullers, Rutters, Coopers, Osborns, Kellys, and Radcliffs, near Plumsock.

Redding Bunting, who died May 22, 1878, was born near New Salem, and was one of the noted stage-drivers on the National road; was stage agent, tavern-keeper, mail contractor, and generally a busy man in matters appertaining to stage-coaching in its palmy days.

Immediately after the close of the Revolutionary war, Col. William Roberts migrated from Bucks County to Southwestern Pennsylvania, and settled upon a three-hundred-acre tract of land that included what is now known as Searight's, on the National road. William was commissioned colonel of the Fourth Battalion of militia in Bucks County, May 6, 1777, and after serving through the war, was at its close commissioned major of the Third Battalion of Bucks County militia, Oct. 11, 1783. Both commissions are now in the possession of his granddaughter, Mrs. Zenas Van Kirk, of Redstone township. She has also a certificate of the marriage of William Roberts and Rachel Griffith, dated Aug. 7, 1760. The document is signed by the contracting parties, the officiating clergyman (John Thomas), and no less than fifteen witnesses. Col. Roberts lived in Menallen until his death. All of his sons except Benjamin moved to the far West. He lived a while at Plumsock, and ended his days at the house of Mrs. Zenas Van Kirk, in 1845. His brother John had been one of the county commissioners, and he himself a justice of the peace twenty-five years. His son, William B., of Uniontown, was an officer in the Mexican war, and died in the city of Mexico.

"Searight's," on the National road, five miles westward from Uniontown, has for many years been a well-known locality to travelers upon that thoroughfare, and in the days of great traffic over the road was a somewhat famous stopping-place for stage-coaches and freighters. There are at that point now a tavern, post-office, store, blacksmith-shop, and perhaps a half-dozen houses, but the bustling activity that once marked the spot when the National road was in its glory has given place to a dozing quietude, albeit the tavern still greets with entertainment occasional wayfarers. The tavern was built by Josiah Frost in 1819, but before he had made it ready for business he sold it and adjacent landed property to William Searight.

William Searight was by trade a fuller, and in 1807 had a mill on Dunlap's Creek. From there he moved to Cook's Mills, and thence to Perryopolis, where he built a fulling-mill. While there he bought the tavern stand property, and when he had completed the erection of the buildings, including with the tavern a blacksmith's and wheelwright's shop, he leased them, but to whom is not now remembered. In a little while Mr. Searight sold his Perryopolis mill, and removing to his new possessions on the National road, became himself the landlord of the wayside inn, which he soon made a noted and popular halting-place. In that day there was a great volume of travel over the National road, and as the tavern was maintained in most excellent order, "Searight's" soon became well known from one end of the road to the other as a place where good cheer for man and beast awaited all comers, and where great numbers of people and teams were constantly entertained. Four-horse passenger-coaches rolled over the road in rapid succession, and as Searight's was a "stage-house," there was always plenty of business, bustle, and profit at the "Corners."

Before James K. Polk was chosen to the Presidency, and while he was a congressman, he rode with his wife by stage-coach over the National road en route to Washington to attend a congressional session. When near Searight's the stage-coach broke down, and it being decided that the journey could not be resumed before the following morning, Mr. and Mrs. Polk walked to Searight's, where they proposed to pass the remainder of the night, it being then well on towards morning. They found the landlord up, in anticipation of their arrival, and they found, too, the floor of the great bar-room thickly strewn with sleeping wagoners, who had halted there for the night. In response to their request for a room with a fire the landlord made ready to execute their commands, but expressed the fear that they might be annoyed over the delay in the making of the apartment comfortably warm. At this declaration Mrs. Polk, looking earnestly at the cheerful, brightly-burning fire in the bar-room grate, as if charmed with its inviting warmth, proposed that they should sleep there. A "shakedown" was accordingly made, and they passed the remainder of the night in the bar-room. In the morning they breakfasted and went forward upon their journey. The accidental visit of Mr. and Mrs. Polk to Searight's was for a long time afterwards a topic of interesting discussion among those who tarried to enjoy the hospitality of the tavern, and Searight's was greatly profited by the incident, in fame if not in exchequer.

One McDermott was a landlord at Searight's at an early day, and so was old Johnny Gray, but it is likely that some Boniface had possession before McDermott's time. Mr. Searight himself did not take charge of the tavern until 1828, or two years after his marriage. He resided as landlord a few years, and then retired to his adjacent farm, after leasing the tavern stand to Joseph, son of old Johnny Gray. Mr. Searight was appointed by Governor Porter superintendent of that portion of the National road passing through Pennsylvania, and in 1852 he received the Democratic nomination for the office of canal commissioner. Before the election he died, August 12th. Col. William Hopkins, of Washington County, was nominated in his stead and elected. Mr. Searight's widow, who survives him, lives in Uniointown, where also live his sons, Thomas B., William, and J. A. Ewing, another son, resides upon the old tavern property.

In 1830, Mr. James Allison (who had worked in Mr. Searight's fulling-mill on Dunlap's Creek) came to Searight's, and at the Corners he has lived ever since. He found Hugh Keys keeping a store there. In 1833 a post-office was established at Searight's, and Thomas Greer, the blacksmith, appointed postmaster. He served until 1834, when the office was discontinued. In 1849 it was revived and James Allison appointed postmaster. He was the incumbent until 1850, when Elias Hatfield, the present postmaster, was appointed.

Hugh Graham, a carpenter and architect, landed in Philadelphia in 1822, and worked two years for Stephen Girard. His entire possessions upon reaching Philadelphia amounted to ten guineas and a chest of carpenter's tools. In 1824 he journeyed on foot from Philadelphia to Pittsburgh, and although suffering from an injured foot (as is said to have) made the trip of three hundred miles in six days,—most excellent time if true. In route he passed the house of Jacob Black, in Menallen, near which, at a spring, he saw Mr. Black's daughter Margaret washing clothes. She was so much amused at the appearance of Graham's foot-gear, consisting of a big boot and a small shoe, that she laughed most immoderately. This incident was Graham's introduction to Margaret Black, and as he happened to return that way from Pittsburgh, after a sojourn of two weeks at the latter place, he stopped for rest at Jacob Black's house, and renewed his acquaintance with the young lady. The acquaintance proved to be so satisfactory upon both sides that Miss Margaret eventually became Mrs. Graham. Mr. Graham became a builder and architect of some renown at Uniointown, and in 1855 he retired to a farm in Menallen that was originally taken up by Hugh Crawford. In 1840 he came into possession of the Jacob Black farm, and lived there until his death, which occurred May 19, 1878, when he had reached the age of eighty-five years. His father-in-law, Jacob Black, was a German, and came to Menallen about 1790. His location was made upon the farm now occupied by his grandson, Thomas B. Graham, and there he died.

William Wheatley enlisted from New Jersey for the war of the Revolution, and served through the conflict as captain of a company of light cavalry. After the Revolution he settled in Menallen. An old account-book kept by him and beginning with the date June 13, 1785, is now in the possession of his great-grandson, John S. Marsh, of Cook's Mills. Mr. Marsh has also a full set of silver buttons worn by Capt. Wheatley upon his Revolutionary uniform. Anthony Cummand, an early settler in Franklin, married one of Capt. Wheatley’s daughters. She used to tell how during the battle of Trenton she sat in the Wheatley mansion when a cannon-ball tore its way through the house. Anthony Cummand himself fought through the Revolution, and shared in the victory of Yorktown. Thomas Marsh, grandson of Capt. Wheatley, died in Indiana. His living children are Mrs. Westcott, of Fayette City, Mrs. Duval, of Ohio, and John S. Marsh.

In 1808, Menallen’s taxable property was assessed at $117,950. The quota of county tax was $177. The taxable acres numbered 12,944. There were seven mills, one forge, one rolling-mill, two tan-yards, eleven distilleries, one slave, three hundred and sixty-five houses, and three hundred and twenty-eight cattle.

EARLY ROADS.

At the March term of the Court of Quarter Sessions in 1793 mention of an early road was made in the following report: “We, the undersigned subscribers, being by Your Honors appointed to view a road from Ebenezer Finley’s saw-mill, to intersect the road leading from Uniontown to the old fort at or near the Episcopal church, according to order, etc.” In September, 1788, a petition was granted by the court to Menallen for a road from Jeremiah Pears’ saw-mill to the door from which the Uniontown road bore south 16° 45’ east, past Robert Gadd’s house, on the middle of Peters Street and centre of Middle (Meadow) Alley. June, 1784, a petition was presented for a road “from Robert McLaughlin’s to Jeremiah Pears’ mill, from there to strike the road that leads from Uniontown to Middle Run near John Watson’s,” December, 1794, a petition was presented for a road from Meason’s furnace (in Dunbar) to Pears’ forge, to intersect a road from Uniontown to Redstone.

EARLY TAVERNS.

At the March term of court in 1784, John McMartin was recommended for a license as tavern-keeper in Menallen, but he did not at that time obtain it. At the December term, 1784, Reuben Kemp and Jacob Hewitt were licensed; December, 1785, Matthew Campbell; June, 1786, Joseph Price and John Heath; June, 1790, Patrick Tierman and John Farquar; December, 1791, George Krumen. In addition to the list given, Josiah Tannehill was licensed June, 1788; George Mitchell, March, 1789; Zachariah Doty, June, 1789; Ephraim Hewitt, March, 1790; Robert Willis, John Ayers, and William Ayers, June, 1790; George Kinnear, September, 1790; Jonathan Hickman, Richard Weaver, Anthony Swaine, John Brown, and John Grier, September, 1795; William Cox, December, 1776; Amos Wilson and Benjamin Bowman, September, 1776; John Jones, Francis Griffith, and Peter Kinney, September, 1797; James Brown, December, 1798, and Alexander Williamson, March, 1800.

TOWNSHIP ORGANIZATION AND LIST OF OFFICERS.

Menallen was one of the original townships created by the Court of Quarter Sessions at the December term in 1788. The court decreed as follows:

“A township, beginning at the mouth of Redstone Creek; thence up the same to the mouth of Jennings’ Run; thence up the same to the head of the west fork thereof; thence by a straight line to the head of the Barat Cabin branch of Dunlap’s Creek; thence down said branch and Dunlap’s Creek to the road that leads to Oliver Crawford’s ferry; thence along the said road to McKibben’s Run; thence down the same and Dunlap’s Creek to the river; thence down the same to the beginning, to be hereafter known by the name of Menallen township.”

In March, 1797, the petition of sundry inhabitants of Menallen township prayed for a division of the township. In response thereto the court, at the December term in 1797, set off and erected Redstone township from the west and northwest part of Menallen.

The records containing the civil list of the township are imperfect. From 1784 to 1808 the elections of township officials are recorded and kept. From 1808 to 1840 nothing of consequence has been preserved. From 1840 to 1881 the records have been kept, and from the lists for that period have been taken, as given below:

THE TOWN OF NEW SALEM.

New Salem, also known as "Muttontown," is a small village of about one hundred and fifty inhabitants, lying on the western border of Menallen township. It contains three stores, a post-office, an Odd-Fellows' hall, three churches, and a fine public school, the district in which it is included being independent in school matters from the township. The village site was owned by John Butterfield in 1790, and later by James Vandemont, who was also the owner of no considerable land tracts in that locality besides. David Arnold bought the village property in 1799, and August 17th of that year laid out a village which he named New Salem, containing sixty lots. Why he called it New Salem no one knows. From a copy of the original plat of the town it appears, however, that the land upon which he laid it out had been called "Stuffle's Policy." The nucleus of the village was James Thompson's grist-mill, a rude log structure, built some time before Arnold conceived the idea of founding a town. Others than himself thought favorably of the village prospects, for one Solomon Hickman opened a tavern there in 1802, at the same time that his father, Dr. Hickman, located as the village physician. In 1803, John Funk came from Maryland in pursuit of a favorable opening for trade, and found at New Salem one to suit him. He put a few goods into a log cabin on the "Odd-Fellows' corner," and traded a year, until 1804, when he died. There was John Boner, the village blacksmith, and soon afterwards Alexander Campbell, who thought the field so promising that he too opened a smithy. Campbell was, moreover, a firm believer in his ability to discover the secret of perpetual motion, and bestowed so much time upon his efforts in that direction that he did not spare much time to the blacksmithing business. He did something in the way of making pottery, but perpetual motion was his hobby, and of course he wore himself out without achieving the object of his ambition. Dr. Hickman and Alexander Campbell lived in two log houses that stood near together. Campbell's house has been demolished; Dr. Hickman's still stands, and is now the home of Henry Funk, son of John Funk, store-keeper in New Salem in 1803, at which time Henry was two years old. After that he lived back from the village until 1835, when he resumed his habitation at New Salem and set up a blacksmith-shop. Since 1835 he has lived in New Salem, although long since retired from active business.

For some reason unexplainable at this day New Salem soon assumed and maintained a reputation for immorality and disorder that made its name a byword and reproach among peaceful and law-abiding people. What especial circumstance led to this is not now apparent, nor is it necessary to inquire. But by common consent New Salem was mentioned as a place conspicuous for dram-drinking, horse-racing, drunkenness, and vicious idleness. Well-behaved people shunned it, and in derision rechristened it Muttontown,—some say because many a stolen sheep was traced to the village. Taverns, so called, but really whiskey-shops, were numerous and flourishing.

In 1816 certain keen-eyed speculators concluded a bank would pay at New Salem, and accordingly built a stone banking-house in that year upon the lot now occupied by J. W. Scott's store, and without delay began to issue seductive-looking bank-bills of all denominations, ranging from six and a quarter cents upwards. The bank was called The Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of Fayette County, at New Salem. Aaron Torrance was president, and Timothy Smith cashier. The people of the surrounding country failed to exhibit any very great confidence in the matter of depositing money in the bank, but Messrs. Torrance, Smith, and others managed to keep themselves moderately busy and the bank in a state of temporary prosperity by an industrious issue of bills, which penetrated not only into remote corners of Pennsylvania, but into Maryland, Ohio, and other States. In a little while, when no more hills could be issued, the collapse came, for of course a collapse was inevitable. The banking-house was closed. Torrance, Smith, and their associates departed for other scenes, and the unhappy bill-holders, whose name was legion, were left to bewail an overweening confidence in promises to pay. This New Salem bank was from the outset looked upon with distrust by the State banking authorities. It appears that a letter of inquiry concerning the bank came to the Union Bank at Uniontown in June, 1816. To that letter the cashier of the Union Bank made the following response:

"Union Bank of Pennsylvania, July 11, 1816.

"Dear Sir,—Your letter of the 27th ult. was duly received. As I could not answer it before this day (when our Directors meet), I laid your letter before them; they say from information received in regard to the Association named in your letter that they have reason to believe that such does exist, but that the persons composing it are not of sufficient respectability to render it reputable; for myself, I know none of the names mentioned, and from that am led to believe they are not men of much consequence. The village where the bank in question is to be established contains a few small log houses, as I am informed; is situated about six miles from this place, and five or six miles from Brownsville, where there is a chartered bank.

"I am, respectfully, your ob't servant,

"E. P. Harrison, Esq."

There is still in preservation one of the plates from which were printed bills of the New Salem Bank of the denominations of one, three, and five dollars. The one dollar note bore the vignette of a recumbent female holding a sheaf of wheat. Over the figure is the line "Instituted in 1816." Below the figure appears the following:

"The Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of Fayette County promise to pay ———, or bearer, on demand, one dollar out of their joint funds according to their articles of association.

"————, Cashier.

"————, President."

The three and five dollar notes were essentially similar to the one described, except that the vignette of the three is a soaring eagle, and of the five an eagle perching upon the back of a lion.

Of this bank one Peter Black was one of the directors. An advertisement appearing in the Genius of Liberty under date of April 20, 1819, thus alludes to Mr. Black:

"$100 Reward, and all necessary expenses, will be given by the subscriber for the apprehension and delivery of Peter Black in any jail in the United States. Said Black is charged with the murder of Crawford Laughlin. Peter Black is a man six feet high, of dark complexion, has a large head thickly covered with black hair, has prominent cheek bones, and large shoulders. He is a man of about thirty years of age. He had on when he went away a blue surcoat, pantaloons, and vest, and it is supposed he has also taken with him a quantity of gray clothes. He was formerly a director in the Muttontown, or New Salem Bank of Fayette County, Pa., and he will be doubtless recolllected in Ohio, where he distributed large quantities of the paper of that bank. It is supposed that Black has gone into the State of Ohio. The circumstances attending this horrid deed are as follows: On the 20th inst., while the deceased was at the house of Black, in Fayette County, a dispute arose between the deceased and another man. Black interfered and stabbed deceased in the neck, making a gash about one and a half inches deep.

"March 27, 1819."

Hugh Laughlin."

Alexander Wilson had a store in 1811 on the Jonah Deirth place.

Harmon Ficke came here in 1816, announcing that he had come from Baltimore for the purpose of starting in trade at New Salem. He put a few goods into John Funk's old store building, and declared himself ready for business. Ficke claimed to be a doctor as well as trader, but his medical and surgical skill were not made apparent. He kept his store open six or eight years, and departed because store-keeping in New Salem was overshadowed in importance by whisky-selling and rendered a profitless undertaking. There was no store at New Salem for many years after Harmon Ficke left, but taverns abounded and whisky was king. Martin Wolf was one of the tavern-keepers at this time, and soon after him came two others, named Emmons and Mitchell. At one time there were three taverns in the village. Jacob Balsinger was one of the later and most widely known of New Salem's tavern-keepers, but during his time the popular voice made itself heard in emphatic protest against a further continuance of whisky traffic at the village, for matters had been going from bad to worse, and, like other evils, that evil had got to the point where it was likely to cure itself. A temperance society was organized in 1835 at the village school-house, and at that meeting speeches were made by Gen. Joshua B. Howell and Dr. Hugh Campbell. The temperance reformers once fairly started, kept the ball in motion and worked assiduously. The whisky men fought to stop it, but to no purpose. Balsinger finding his business waning, sold his tavern—the only one then in the village—to James Downard. Downard got the impression that the temperance wave would exhaust itself and eventually leave him master of the field, but the longer he waited the more certain became his conviction that the temperance crusade had come to stay. All the village dramshops but his had been driven out of existence, and his was doomed. One day he received a note of warning, threatening him with an immersion in the horse-pond if he failed to close his bar within a week. Discretion prevailed with him, and within less than a week his house was closed and he on his way to other parts. That was in the year 1845, and from that day to this no strong drink has been sold in New Salem. From one of the worst and most disorderly it was changed to one of the most orderly and peaceful villages in the State. Persistent hard work by the persevering and unaltering advocates of temperance worked a reform for which that section of the country became grateful years ago. Ebenezer Finley, who took a leading part in the contest against whisky and disorder, was chosen the first president of the temperance society, and has been its president ever since. To him belongs a very large share of the credit for the wholesome results that followed the warfare.

About 1849, Joseph Gadd and William Boyd were keeping a store at New Salem; Balsinger had a tavern, and in it the post-office was kept, his son being postmaster. There was no village physician in 1849, although there had been previous to that date. In 1841, Dr. Jacob Post made New Salem his home, and lived on the Joshua Scott property. To go back a little, there was a school-house in 1812 upon the site of the present school-house, and in that year Thomas Campbell was the teacher. After him an old man named Gray taught school. It will be well also to mention that William Allison, a gunsmith, had a shop at New Salem as early as 1820; that Nedly Hughes was that year the village shoemaker, and that in 1821 Ebenezer Finley organized a Sunday-school. The old log grist-mill passed from James Thompson to Robert Boyd, and from Robert Boyd to his son Samuel, who built a new mill, the same now owned by Jesse Frost, Sr.

Dr. Hickman has already been mentioned as being a resident physician in New Salem in 1802. He remained only a couple of years, and then there was no resident doctor until 1811. In that year Dr. Joseph Rose and his brother Erasmus located and practiced in conjunction for several years. After their departure there was a lack of village doctors until 1844, when Dr. Jacob Post opened an office and remained a village fixture for some years. He removed to Winona, Minn., and there died. While Dr. Post was here Dr. Fitz came in, but stayed only a short time. Then there appeared in succession Dr. C. D. Chalfant in 1867, and Dr. I. C. Hazlett a little while thereafter. The only village physician now is Dr. Samuel E. Johnston, who has been practicing in New Salem and vicinity since 1870.

New Salem’s first postmaster was Christopher Balsinger, who was appointed in 1820 and served until about 1840. He was succeeded by C. S. Seaton and Mr. Kline. J. W. Scott followed Kline in 1861, and in 1868 was succeeded by W. D. Swearingen, who held the office less than a year. C. H. Scott was the incumbent from 1869 to 1877, and in the latter year William P. Green, the present postmaster, received his appointment.

New Salem Lodge, No. 559, I. O. O. F., was organized in 1858. The membership is now twenty, and the officers William Jeffries, N. G.; J. C. Moore, V. G.; S. E. Johnson, Sec.; Elijah Tracey, Treas.; A. J. Tint, Asst. Sec.

UPPER MIDDLETOWN.

Upper Middletown village, better known as Plumsock, is a small hamlet lying upon Redstone Creek, on the eastern side of the township. It is simply a rural town without special industry, beyond the maintenance of such business as is afforded by the support of the adjacent rural population. The name Plumsock has clung to the place since the time its village existence began, but why it was so christened is not known. Various stories are told to account for the origin of the name, including one about an intoxicated individual, who, while riding through the place, fell from his horse into the mud, and remarked, “Here I am, plum sock!” The expression is said to have so pleased the ears of those within hearing that they concluded to call the town “Plumsock” to commemorate the incident. How true the story is it is perhaps not important to inquire. Another story traces the origin of the name as far back as 1794, when a company of “Whiskey Boys” rendezvoused on the village site. ‘Tis said they contrived with a certain citizen of the neighborhood to supply them with subsistence during their stay, and that when the citizen delivered his first load of provisions the “Boys” endeavored to cajole him into giving them credit for a few days. At that proposition the purveyor is said to have waxed wroth, and exclaiming, “No, sirree, my men; if you want me to supply you you must pay me the cash, ‘plumpsock’ on the nail,” was about to depart in displeasure, when they came forward with the cash, and agreed unanimously that the place ought to be called “Plumsock” forever afterward in commemoration of the man’s business principle.

Nov. 28, 1789, Jeremiah Pearis (or Pearce, or Pears) patented a piece of land containing one hundred and twelve acres, called “Prophetic,” and lying in Men-
Allen and Franklin townships. Edward Hall and Jeremiah Pears held land adjacent to this tract, and laid out lots in the form of a town, which they called Middletown (now known as Upper Middletown, or Plumsock). Hall sold to Rev. Robert Warnocks. The one hundred and twelve acres mentioned as belonging to Jeremiah Pears included the site of the Mason rolling-mill, hereafter to be mentioned, and for a long time popularly known as Forgetown. On that site Pears had a mill as early as 1784, and perhaps before, for in the road records of the county, under the date mentioned, "Jeremiah Pears' mill" is noticed. In 1794, "Jeremiah Pears' forge" was recorded as being then at the same point, and in 1804 he had there a saw-mill, grist-mill, forge, slitting-mill, and rolling-mill,—quite a large collection of industrial enterprises for the time. Thomas Cook, then of Perry, and afterwards of Cook's Mills, in Redstone, was one of the builders of the Pears' forge, which was probably erected in 1794. Pears carried on the manufacture of iron at Plumsock until about 1804, when he sold out to George Dorsey. Dorsey sold in 1809 to Benjamin Stevens, he to Meason & Keller in 1813, and Keller sold his interest to Col. Isaac Meason in 1815.

In a recently published account of early iron industries in Western Pennsylvania occurs the following: "The first rolling-mill erected west of the Alleghenies to puddle iron and roll iron bars was built in 1816 and 1817, on Redstone Creek, about midway between Connellsville and Brownsville, at a place called Upper Middletown, better known as Plumsock, in Fayette County." The inventor of the enterprise was Thomas C. Lewis, and it was carried into effect by Col. Isaac Meason, of Union Furnace, in Dunbar. The chief engineer in the erection of the mill was Thomas C. Lewis, whose brother, George Lewis,—both Welshmen,—was turner and roller. The mill was built "for making bars of all sizes and hoops for cutting into nails." "The iron was refined by blast, and then puddled." Active operations were carried on at this mill until 1831, Mr. Arthur Palmer being in possession to the date named. By a flood in the Redstone the mill was partially destroyed. Subsequently the mill machinery was conveyed to Brownsville. Concerning this rolling-mill Samuel C. Lewis, son of Thomas C. Lewis above mentioned, said that his father and his uncle, George Lewis, not only superintended the erection and put in operation the mill of which notice is here made, but that he himself as a boy assisted in rolling the first bar of iron, his uncle being chief roller. Besides the two Lewis brothers, Thomas and George, there were also Samuel Lewis, heater, and James Lewis, catcher, who participated in starting the mill and in the rolling of the first bar. Henry W. Lewis, another brother, was a clerk in the office. Samuel C. Lewis was then a boy of fifteen, and "heaved up" behind the rolls. There were in the mill two puddling-furnaces, one refinery, one heating-furnace, and one tilt-hammer. Raw coal was used in the puddling- and heating-furnaces, and coke (for a short time) in the refinery. James Pratt worked the refinery. David Adams was the puddler.

The State report on iron-making in Pennsylvania, published in 1878, says, "We think it extremely probable that at the Plumsock rolling-mill was done the first puddling, and that here was rolled the first bar of iron in America." Careful inquiry in well-informed quarters fails to discover the existence in the United States of any rolling-mill to roll bar iron and puddle pig iron prior to the enterprise at Plumsock in 1816.

Benjamin Rutter, who lives near Plumsock, worked for Arthur Palmer at the Plumsock rolling-mill, as did also Francis Duff, whose widow now lives in the village. One of the early rolling-mill proprietors was J. L. Keller, who built a great roomy brick mansion near the mill. Keller's house was a fine building for that day, and is to-day even a handsome-looking residence. Since 1858 it has been the property of James Nickel. Mr. Keller died after a few years' occupancy of the premises, and when a family of strangers undertook to occupy the red brick house their stay was soon brought to a hurried close by the idea that the house was haunted. They averred that old Keller's spirit roamed through the mansion at will, that doors were opened and shut by unseen hands, and with a great noise, while unearthly and discordant sounds made every night hideous and the lives of the tenants a torture. People to whom they told these stories laughed at them and scoffed the stories as the result of excited imaginations. When, however, another family moved into the red brick and moved quickly out again, declaring that ghosts and goblins peopled the house, public belief was inclined to think that there might, after all, be a haunting presence in the mansion. When a third family was precipitately driven forth but a two days' occupancy opinion generally conceded that the house was indeed haunted. By that time the circumstances were public gossip, and while the curious came to look with awe upon the mysterious abode of alleged spirits, no one cared to undertake the task of living in it, although it was offered for rent at a nominal price. So it was suffered to be untenanted for some time, when a matter-of-fact family took possession, and kept possession peaceably too. The supposed spirits seemed to have taken a permanent leave of the abode, and have not reappeared to this day. Although keen investigations were set afoot in pursuit of a desire to discover the source of the disturbing elements that drove people out of the house after Keller's death, no satisfactory result was achieved.

Time dispelled the fears of the timid, but to this day there are seemingly intelligent persons who insist that old Keller's ghost did haunt the house. The story goes that Keller, who married a daughter of Gen. Douglass, and built the brick house in 1812, squandered in various ways money that had come to him through his wife. She had taken great pleasure in the embellishment of their home, and when Keller's failure entailed the loss of that home she felt much embittered against him. Declaring that she could never forgive him for causing the loss of so much that she had endeared to herself, she vowed that she would haunt the place after she was dead. Therefore people who firmly believe that the house was haunted must always be in doubt whether the visitation was by the spirit of Mrs. Keller or by that of her husband.

Before the rolling-mill enterprise had been put in operation, Isaac Meason carried on at Plumsock a small forge that Jeremiah Pears had built. That forge was the beginning of manufacture at that point. There was a pottery there in 1822, that was started by James Lewis, and continued by him and his son Nathan for twenty-seven years afterwards. James Lewis worked at the rolling-mills before he was married, and it was during his time there that a nail-factory was attached to the works. Thomas Duncan, now of Brownsville, was also one of the rolling-mill hands. Nathan Lewis, of Franklin township, says that when he was a lad of twelve he worked at Plumsock for Arthur Palmer, the iron-worker, and that in 1823 he was employed to wheel coal from a coal-bank to a coke-oven that Arthur Duncan (father of Judge Duncan, of Brownsville) had built for Palmer and was in charge of. This oven, Mr. Lewis thinks, was erected before 1823, and in it Mr. Palmer burned coke for use in his iron-works. It was constructed entirely of stone, and held about forty-eight bushels. Slack or fine coal only was burned. Palmer had at his works a rolling-mill, a puddling-furnace, refiner, saw-mill, and grist-mill. The immediate locality of the works was known as Forgetown until the departure of Mr. Palmer and the abandonment of the iron manufacture in 1831.

The inauguration of the rolling-mill industry at Plumsock created a village near there, and of course a store and tavern sprang quickly into existence. Robert Thompson was the store-keeper as early as 1808, and Henry Dick tavern-keeper in 1806. John Bathe succeeded the latter in 1809. A Mr. Bodkin was in 1813 the tavern-keeper (or, more strictly speaking, the whisky-seller, for a village tavern then meant "whisky-shop" more than it meant public-house). Bodkin's tavern was simply a log shanty, and presently Elijah Gadd opened a second tavern in another shanty. Of Gadd it is said that he sold his whisky to the mill hands, and took his pay at the mill once a month in bar iron. When the mill stopped Gadd had on hand sufficient bar iron to pay for a good farm.

Some of Gadd's successors as tavern-keepers at Plumsock were William Stevens, John Gadd, and Edward Jones, but that either made the success in the business that Elijah managed to achieve is extremely doubtful. There was a small log grist-mill close by the rolling-mill, and although it was a crude and clumsy concern, it was one of the prime necessities of the locality. It was built by Jeremiah Pears, and afterwards continued by successive mill-owners. Keller, the proprietor of the rolling-mill, had a store, and Palmer probably kept a stock of goods on hand while he carried on the iron-works. After the mill interest ceased Plumsock fell into a disheartening quietude. There was no store there or very much call for one after that until 1831, when John Morrison built the brick residence now owned by James Lewis and stocked one corner of it with goods.

About 1829, Henry Creighton was the village blacksmith, and Reuben Jones the village carpenter. The first cabinet-maker in Plumsock was Daniel Whetzel. In 1824 there was a log school-house at the village, in which Maclennan Mayer taught, and in which Joseph Garrett and Oliver Sproul were his immediate successors. A post-office was established at Plumsock about 1825, and a Methodist Church was built in 1829. There was probably no resident physician until 1840 or later. Robert Muir should have been mentioned as the landlord of the Cross Keys tavern about 1829. He kept it for some years, and rented it then as a dwelling. In 1847, Henry Fuller reopened it as a tavern, and kept it twenty years. Since 1867, Plumsock has been without a licensed tavern.

In 1844, Thomas Hazen was keeping store in the Lewis brick, and David and John Huston one at the upper end of the town. The Hustons sold out to Abram Hornbeck, who was for a time both store-keeper and tavern-keeper. In the Hornbeck building Edward Roddy afterwards carried on trade about twelve years. Then came William Smith, Gibson & Arison, and Gibson & Thompson, who moved from the old quarters into the building now occupied by Mansell & Thompson. Daniel Binns & Co. occupied the Lewis brick in 1857, and in 1858 moved to the Keller mansion. In 1864, Binns retired, leaving his partner, James Nickel, to succeed the firm.

The post-office succession at Plumsock may be given as follows: Joseph Gadd was appointed about 1825, and resigned in 1828. Henry Creighton, the blacksmith, succeeded him, and in 1840 William Morrison became the incumbent. Morrison held the office until 1857, when Edward Roddy received the appointment. To him succeeded Daniel Binns, William Smith, and Daniel Binns (second term). James Nickel served from 1865 to 1869; Samuel Thompson, 1869-70; D. T. Gibson, from 1870 to 1890; and Hugh Thompson, from 1890 to the present.

The first physician to locate at Plumsock was a Dr. Rogers. Just when he came is not easy to say, but the time was not far from 1840. Drs. Brownfield and Crane were in village practice shortly after Rogers departed for the West in 1844, but their stay was brief. There was no resident physician afterwards until 1851, when Dr. Samuel B. Chalfant opened an office and established his home at Plumsock. He continued steadily in practice at the village until his death in 1877. Meanwhile, Dr. W. W. Osborn came in 1879, and still remains. Dr. John Hankins came in 1875, and removed to Uniontown in 1878. Besides Dr. Osborn, there is now one other physician in the village, William H. Hopwood, who located in 1878.

Redstone Lodge, No. 499, I. O. O. F., was organized at Plumsock in 1852. The membership in March, 1881, was twenty-five, and the officers Nathan Holloway, N. G; M. V. Whetzel, V. G.; A. N. Osborn, Sec.; James Lewis, Treas.

CHURCHES.

Grace Church (Protestant Episcopal).

Grace Church, located on the National road, near Seargent’s, was organized before 1739, in which year the congregation were occupying their own house of worship. There are, however, no records from which to write a history of the early days of the organization, and as human recollection is of course unavailable as a matter of reference, absolutely nothing can be said with certainty touching the events that attended upon the organization of the church, except that Robert Jackson donated some land for a church and churchyard. The first house of worship was a homely log structure, but it did excellent service for nearly fifty years. In 1840 it was replaced by the house now in use. For the erection of the latter the subscribers were Hugh Keys, William Seargent, Hiram Jackson, Zadoc Jackson, William Hogg, George Hogg, Robert Clark, John Bowman, John Snowdon, Eli Abrams, Samuel J. Krepp, Henry Sweitzer, Christopher Buchanan, David Jackson, John Moore, Aaron Moore, William Moore, John Hibbs, Johnston Van Kirk, Ebenezer Finley, Ebenezer Finley, Jr., Elizabeth Finley, Joseph Gadd, E. Balsinger, Joseph Wilson, Joshua Antram, Caleb Antram, Jr., Richard Beeson, J. C. Simmons, Benjamin Roberts, Arwind McIntire, John Gadd, N. P. Bowman & Co., Jacob Bowman, Wesley Frost, G. W. V. Bowman, G. W. Cass, G. W. Curtis, William Sloan, John Allison, John Dawson, Rezin Moore, D. N. Robinson, Joshua B. Howell, N. Given, R. P. Flenniken, A. Stewart, James Fuller, Isaac Beeson. The congregation, at no time large, includes now perhaps twenty families. At no time has there been a resident rector. Rev. R. S. Smith supplied the church from 1868 to 1878. The present rector is Rev. S. D. Day, of Brownsville. The wardens are James Allison and Ewing Seargent. The vestrymen are James Seargent, Ewing Seargent, Thomas Graham, Buchanan Jeffries, Andrew Keys, Hiram Jackson, and Levi Beal. The superintendent of the Sunday-school is James Allison. The graveyard at the church, laid out some time before the year 1800, has within it as the oldest headstone now distinguishable a tablet erected in 1799 to the memory of a member of the Jackson family.

Upper Middletown Methodist Episcopal Church.

About 1825, when Arthur Palmer took charge of the Plumsock rolling-mill and established his home in the Keller mansion, he began to hold Methodist meetings therein, himself being the preacher. Mr. Palmer was a very energetic worker in the religious field, and preached regularly at his house once a fortnight until 1829. In that year he succeeded in effecting a church organization and in causing the erection of a stone church known as Asbury Chapel. As far as can now be remembered, the organizing members of the first class included Arthur Palmer and wife, James Hedden and wife, John Lewis and wife, William Bradley and wife. In 1840 the stone church was replaced with the present brick structure. The preacher in charge is Rev. O. E. Husted, of the Redstone Circuit. He preaches once a fortnight. The class numbers now about forty. The leader is William Hormel.

Methodist Episcopal Church of New Salem.

Public worship by Methodists was held in the New Salem school-house in 1834, and in that year a class was organized with twelve members. Among these were Booth McCormick and wife, Richard Miller and wife, Mr. Carpenter, his wife and wife’s sister, and Nancy Whitehill. Booth McCormick was the leader. In 1849 a spirited revival set in and about forty persons joined the church. In 1850 a house of worship was built, and in 1851 the membership was fully one hundred and twenty-five. Prosperity attended upon the progress of the organization for a while, but afterwards dissensions were created by a disaffected member, and with such disastrous results that in 1867 the total membership had been reduced to five persons. Dissolution was imminent, but the few energetic ones worked hard for a reawakening of interest to such good effect that the membership steadily increased, and the church rested once more upon a sure foundation. In March, 1881, there were in good standing about thirty active members. The leader was then Johnston Roderick, and the preacher Rev. Mr. McGrew, of the Smithfield charge.

Presbyterian Chapel.

A Presbyterian chapel was built at New Salem in 1853 by members of the Dunlap’s Creek Church, and since that time has been used simply as an adjunct to the last-named organization, whose pastor preaches also at New Salem. A Presbyterian Sunday-school was organized at New Salem by Ebenezer Finley, Sr., in 1825, and to this day it has had an uninterupted and active existence. The elder Finley was the superintendent from 1825 to 1849, and his son Ebenezer from 1853 to 1881.

Pleasant View (Cumberland Presbyterian) Church.

During the years 1832 and 1833 Revs. Morgan Bird, and Bryan were preaching in Fayette County as the advance guard of the Cumberland Presbyterian ministers just then being sent out from Tennessee to Pennsylvania. They were invited to preach at the Centre school-house, near John C. McCormick, and from that time forward there was more or less preaching there for several years. Mr. McCormick himself became a member of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church at Uniontown, where he was a ruling elder ten years or more. Afterwards he joined Hopewell Church, in Luzerne township, where he remained until the organization of Pleasant View in 1839. During the years 1857 and 1859 Rev. John S. Gibson, pastor of the East Liberty Cumberland Presbyterian Church, frequently held services in the McCormick neighborhood, and one result of his ministrations was the organization of a Sunday-school by E. Campbell and John McCormick. The Sunday-school being well on its way, attention was turned to the subject of a church organization. The Union Presbytery being appealed to, authorized Revs. Jesse Adams and A. G. Osborn to take charge of the business. Accordingly they organized Pleasant View, Oct. 1, 1859, in a schoolhouse that stood near where the church now stands. The constituent members numbered twenty-four, viz.: Emanuel Campbell, Mary Campbell, Samuel Brown, Louisa Brown, Henry Hornbeck, Sr., Rebecca Hornbeck, Henry Hornbeck, Jr., John G. Hornbeck, James Ridlinghafer, Catharine Ridlinghafer, Robert Hagerty, John Ball, Jr., Mary Hess, Eliza B. Powell, Margaret Wheaton, Sarah J. Arison, Mary Mitchell, Mahala Hill, Amy Work, Anne Stewart, Ebenezer Hare, Rebecca Hare, John C. McCormick, Hannah McCormick. The elders chosen were John C. McCormick, Emanuel Campbell, and Samuel Brown. In 1869 a house of worship was erected. The trustees were Robert Hagerty, John Ball, Jr., and James Ridlinghafer.

The first pastor was Rev. Andrew G. Osborn, who served from April 1, 1869, to April 1, 1862. Eli E. Bailey was pastor from April, 1862, to April, 1886; J. Power Baird from April, 1866, to April, 1880. Since Mr. Baird's departure Rev. William Hays has had the supply. Several gratifying revival seasons have marked the history of the church. In 1866 about twenty persons were received as members under the preaching of Rev. E. E. Bailey; and in 1871, 1874, and 1875, during the pastorate of Rev. J. Power Baird, large accessions, to the number of one hundred and twenty-eight, increased the strength of the church. There are at present one hundred and fifty-two members. The elders are Emanuel Campbell, Samuel Brown, John E. Craft, and Thomas H. Higinbotham. Martin Hess donated, in 1869, one acre of land, lying two and a quarter miles north of Sea-right's, for church and cemetery. In 1878 two acres were added by purchase.

1 Since deceased.

CUMBERLAND PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH OF NEW SALEM.

Fairview Church, now the Cumberland Presbyterian Church of New Salem, was organized by Rev. Samuel E. Hudson. Members of the denomination living in the vicinity of New Salem, who attended for public worship at Uniontown and New Hopewell, expressed a desire for a church organization, and in response thereto Rev. Samuel E. Hudson, then supplying the church at New Hopewell, began, in the spring of 1842, a series of protracted meetings at New Salem. A number of conversions followed, and in June, 1842, the Lord's Supper was commemorated at the New Salem school-house. In September of that year about one hundred persons joined in a petition to the Union Presbytery for the organization of a congregation in the New Salem neighborhood. In the spring of 1843 the Presbytery appointed Revs. Samuel E. Hudson and Carl Moore, with Isaac Beeson and John McCormick, as a committee to attend New Salem for the purpose of effecting the desired organization, and authorized Rev. Samuel E. Hudson to supply the new church for the space of one year. One hundred and five persons were received as constituent members. Among these the names of the following only have been preserved upon the record: Caleb Antram, Samuel Brown, Eliza Brown, Miranda Luckey, Hugh Poundslow, John Hackney, Sr., John Hackney, Jr., Lydia Hackney, Amy Hackney, Joseph Rockwell, Catharine Rockwell, Jacob Allamon, Levi Linn, Joseph Woodward, Nancy Woodward, William Jeffries, Jane Jeffries, Taylor Jeffries, Sarah Jeffries, E. F. Moss, Rebecca Johnson, Hannah Walters, Lydia Jackson, Eliza Haceock, Hannah Dunlap, Jane Luckey, Sarah L. McWilliams, Louisa Gilmore, Catharine McDougal, Jane Carey, Henry Funk, Zabina Keener, Lydia Worley, Keziah Watson, John Watson, Mary Jeffries, John Williams, Sarah A. Williams, Elizabeth Sickles, and Mary A. Poundslow. The elders chosen were Caleb Antram, Joseph Rockwell, Abel Campbell, Jr., and William Thompson. Caleb Antram donated land for a church and churchyard, and in 1844 a brick house was built at a cost of two thousand dollars. In April, 1856, the church had so prospered that the membership aggregated one hundred and eighty-four. The pastors of the organization have been Revs. Samuel E. Hudson, A. B. Brice, J. T. A. Henderson, Alexander Blackford, Jesse Adams, and J. S. Gibson. Mr. Gibson has been the pastor since 1872. The membership in March, 1881, was one hundred and eighty-one. The Sunday-school has fifteen officers and teachers and eighty-three scholars. The superintendent is Christopher Woodward. The elders of the church are Joseph Woodward, Joseph Rockwell, H. H. Hackney, Lewis Antram, and John Funk. The deacons are Christopher Woodward, J. W. Hackney, Taylor Jeffries, Samuel Newcomer, and A. J. Tuit.
BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

WILLIAM SEARIGHT.

William Searight was born near Carlisle, Cumberland Co., Pa., on the 5th day of December, 1792. His father came from Londonderry, Ireland, in the year 1760, and first settled in Lancaster County, Pa. His mother, Anne Hamilton, removed from Belfast, Ireland, the same year to the same county. His mother was an aunt of James Hamilton, once Governor of South Carolina, was a sister of William and McHugh Hamilton, wealthy and influential citizens of Lancaster County, and was remotely connected with Alexander Hamilton. Her ancestry were of Scotch descent. A grandniece of William Searight was in the "siege of Derry." He lived to get out of the besieged city, but soon afterwards died from weakness and exhaustion. In 1789 the parents of William Searight removed from Lancaster County to Cumberland County, Pa., settling near Carlisle. The names of their children were Samuel, Alexander, William, Mary, John, and Hamilton. About the beginning of this century they moved into Indiana County, Pa., where they remained only a short time, and came over into Westmoreland County, Pa., and settled permanently on the Loyalhanna River, a few miles above the town of Ligonier, where they lived until their death. About the year 1819, Samuel Searight settled in Tippecanoe County, Ind.; Alexander Searight settled in Ohio County, Va., and William Searight settled in Fayette County, Pa. The remainder of the family lived, died, and were buried in Ligonier Valley without issue. William Searight received only a plain English education. He was endowed with the precepts of stern integrity and honor, the elements of his future success in business, and of his elevated character. In the neighborhood in which he was reared he had learned the business of fulling cloth, a knowledge of which, his native energy and honorable character being his only stock with which to commence and push his own fortune. He arrived in Fayette County at about the age of twenty-one, and commenced business at an old fulling-mill on Dunlap's Creek, known as Hammond's mill. He afterwards prosecuted his vocation at Cook's mill, on Redstone Creek, and again near Perryopolis. He next purchased a farm and hotel at Searight's, the property and village deriving its name from him, and there made his permanent settlement. In 1828 he married Rachel Brownfield, daughter of Thomas Brownfield, of Uniontown, Pa. Here he laid the foundation of a large fortune, and his integrity, united to a generous and benevolent heart, gave him a high place in the esteem and affection of the community in which he lived. His sound judgment soon impressed itself upon his own county, and he became one of her most influential citizens.

Mr. Searight was a prominent and zealous old-time Democratic politician, and wielded a large influence. On one occasion he rode on horseback from Searight's to Harrisburg, a distance of over two hundred miles, to aid in preparing to nominate Gen. Jackson for the Presidency.

In the early history of Fayette County political conventions of both parties were accustomed to meet at Searight's and plan campaigns. A memorable meeting, of which Mr. Searight was the chief instigator, was held there in 1828, known as the "Gray Meeting," from the name of the then keeper of the local hotel, John Gray. At this meeting the Jackson and Adams men met to measure their strength. They turned out in the meadow below the hotel, formed in rank, and "counted off." The Jackson men outnumbered their opponents decisively, and it was regarded as a great Jackson victory. In the political campaign of 1856 a large Democratic meeting was held in Uniontown, and the delegation from Searight's bore a banner with the inscription, "Menallen, the battle-ground of the 'Gray' meeting." Many prominent political leaders of the olden time were there. Among them, on the Jackson side, were Gen. Henry W. Beeson, Col. Ben Brownfield, Westley Frost, William F. Coplan, Henry J. Rigden, James C. Beckley, Benedict Kimber, Solomon G. Kepps, William Searight, Hugh Keys, William Hatfield, Col. William L. Miller, John Fuller, Provence McCormick, William Davidson, Alexander Johnson, and Thomas Duncan. On the Adams side were Andrew Stewart, John M. Austin, F. H. Oliphant, John Kennedy, John Dawson, Samuel Evans, James Bowman, William Hogg, Stokely Connell, William P. Wells, Basil Brownfield, George Mason, Kennedy Duncan, and John Lyon. The many similar political meetings with which William Searight was identified go to show the esteem in which he was held by the citizens of the county by all parties. But Fayette County, although the first, was but little in advance of other communities to learn and admire his worth. He early became known and appreciated throughout the entire State. He was appointed commissioner of the Cumberland (National) road by Governor Porter, in the most prosperous days of that great thoroughfare, a position he held for many years. In 1845 he was superseded by Col. William Hopkins, of Washington, Pa. Subsequently an act of the Legislature placed the road in the hands of trustees appointed by the courts, and these trustees restored William Searight to the commissionership, the duties of which office he continued to discharge with great fidelity and industry. He was thoroughly familiar with all the hills and valleys of that grand old thoroughfare, once so stirring and active, but now still and grass-grown. Previous to his appointment as commissioner of the National road he was a contractor on the same. He was one of the contractors who built the iron bridge over the mouth of Dunlap's Creek, between Brownsville and Bridgeport. He was... also a contractor on the Erie extension of the Pennsylvania and Ohio Canal.

At the time of his death he was the candidate of the Democratic party for one of the most dignified and important offices of the State, that of canal commissioner. To this office he would have undoubtedly been elected had not death interposed and called him from the active duties of this life to the realities of another world, as after his death William Hopkins, of Washington County, was nominated by the Democratic party for the same office, and was elected by a large majority. He died at his residence in Menallen township, on the 12th of August, 1852. He left a wife and six children,—Thomas, Ewing, Jane, William, James, and Elizabeth.

William Searight was a man of the most generous and humane character, ever ready to lend his counsel, his sympathies, and his purse to the aid of others. Though a strong political party man, yet he ever treated his opponents with courtesy. In religion he was, like most of the race to which he belonged, imbued with Calvinism. The brightest traits of his character were exemplified at the last. So far as human judgment may decide, he died a Christian, in peace. Although death plucked him from the very threshold of earthly honors, yet it caused him no regrets. The scenes upon which he was about to enter presented higher honors, purer enjoyments. To him they offered

"No midnight shade, no clouded sun,
But sacred, high, eternal noon."

A more emphatic eulogy than is in the power of language to express was bestowed upon him on the day of his funeral by the assembling around his coffin to perform the last sad duty of friendship of as great if not a greater number of citizens than ever attended the funeral ceremonies of any one who has died within the limits of Fayette County. Among that vast assemblage were both the patriarchs of the county and the rising youth, all come to give their testimony to the lofty worth in life of the distinguished dead. A few days after his death a large meeting of the citizens of Fayette County, irrespective of party, convened at the court-house for the purpose of bearing suitable testimony to his memory and character.

The following gentlemen were chosen officers: Hon. Nathaniel Ewing, president; Hon. Daniel Sturgeon (ex-United States senator) and Z. Ludington, vice-presidents; John B. Krepps and R. P. Flenniken, secretaries. On motion of Hon. James Vecch (later author of "Monongahela of Old") a committee on resolutions composed of leading citizens was appointed, which committee presented the following preamble and resolutions, which were unanimously adopted, viz.:

When a valued citizen dies, it is meet that the community of which he was a member mourn their loss. A public expression of their sorrow at such an event is due as some solace to the grief of the bereaved family and friends, and as an incentive to others to earn for their death the same distinction. In the recent death of William Searight, Esq., this community has lost such a citizen. Such an event has called this public meeting, into which enter no schemes of political promotion, no partisan purposes of empty cloy. Against all this death has shut the door. While yet the tear hangs on the cheek of his stricken family, and the tidings of death are unread by many of his friends, we, his fellow-citizens, neighbors, friends, of all parties, have assembed to speak to those who knew and loved him best, and to those who knew him not the words of sorrow and truth to sincerity and soberness. Therefore as the sense of this meeting,—

Resolved, That in the death of William Searight Fayette County and the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania have lost one of their best and most useful citizens. The people at large may not realize their loss, but the community in which he lived, over whose comforts and interests were diffused the influences of his liberality and enterprise, feel it, while his friends of all classes, parties, and professions, to whom he clung, and who clung to him, mourn it.

Resolved, That while we would withhold our steps from the sanctuary of domestic grief, we may be allowed to express to the afflicted widow and children of the deceased our unfeigned sorrow and sympathy in their great bereavement, and to tender to them our assurance that while in their hearts the memory of the husband and father will ever be cherished, in ours will be kept the liveliest recollections of his virtues as a citizen and a friend.

Resolved, That among the elements which must enter into every truthful estimate of the character of William Searight are a warm amity of manners, combined with a great dignity of deportment, which were not the less attractive by their plainness and want of ostentation, elevated feelings more pure than passionless, high purposes, with unfailing energy in their accomplishment, an ennobling sense of honor, and individual independence, which kept him always true to himself and to his engagements, unfaltering fidelity to his friends, a liberality which heeded no restraint, but means and merit, great promptness and fearlessness in the discharge of what he believed to be a duty, private or public, guided by a rigid integrity, which stood all tests and withstood all temptations, honesty and truthfulness in word and in deed, which no seductions could weaken nor assaults overthrow, in all respects the architect of his own fortune and fame. These, with the minor virtues in full proportion, are some of the outlines of character which stamped the man whose death we mourn as one much above the ordinary level of his race.

Resolved, That while we have here nothing to do or say as to the loss sustained by the political party to which he belonged, and whose candidate he was for an office of great honor and responsibility, we may be allowed to say that had he lived and been successful, with a heart so rigidly set as was his, with feelings so high and integrity so firm, and withal an amount of practical intelligence so ample as he possessed, his election could have been regretted by no citizen who knew him, and who placed the public interests beyond selfish ends and party success. As a politician, we knew him to hold to his principles and party predilections with a tenacious grasp, yet he was ever courteous and liberal in his deportment and views towards his political opponents.

Resolved, That in the life and character of William Searight we see a most instructive and encouraging example. Starting in the struggle of life with an humble business, poor and unbefriend, with an honest mind and true heart, with high purposes and untiring industry, he by degrees gained friends and means which never forsook him. He thus won for himself and his family ample wealth, and attained a position among his fellow-men which those who have had the best advantages our country affords might well envy. That wealth and that position he used with a just liberality and influence for the benefit of all around and dependent upon him. Though dead, he yet speaketh to every man in humble business,—go thou and do likewise, and such shall be thy reward in life and in death.

"Resolved, That the proceedings of this meeting be furnished for publication in all the papers of the county, and a copy thereof, signed by the officers, be presented to the family of the deceased."

JEREMIAH PEIRSEL.

Jeremiah Peirsel was born in what is now Perry township, March 4, 1787, and died in Menallen township, Nov. 20, 1880. He was of Welsh descent, and educated in the common schools. He was married to Mary Beal, of Menallen township, in 1810. They had twelve children, seven sons and five daughters. He was always a farmer, and located upon the farm where his son Samuel now resides in 1824, and remained there until his death. He was an exemplary member of the old Redstone Baptist Church for more than sixty years. He never held a political office; never had a lawsuit; never had any difficulties with his neighbors. His long life was due in a measure, no doubt, to his amiable disposition. He had all the good qualities that usually attend a lovable disposition. He belonged to a long-lived family. The average age of himself, brothers, and sisters is eighty years.

His father, William Peirsel, came to Fayette County from Chester County, Pa., early in life. He married Grace Cope. They had eight children. Jeremiah was the third. William died in 1848, supposed to be over one hundred years old. Grace died in 1854, aged ninety-four.

Seven of the children of Mr. Peirsel are living,—Elizabeth, married to James McLaughlin; Samuel, married to Melvina N. Frasher, and has one living son, Isaac E., who has received a liberal education, is a farmer, and is married to Mary Hormel, and has one child, Arthur L. Peirsel, the only grandson of Jeremiah, Jr. The other four children are Sarah, married to Henry Frasher; Anne, married to Jacob Grant; William, married to Catharine McKay; and Uriah, married to Dettie Swayne. One of his sons, Levi, was killed in the late war at the battle of Petersburg.

For a great part of her life the wife of Mr. Peirsel was seriously afflicted by mental maladies, and he took the utmost tender care of her, never being heard to complain of his unhappy lot.

Jeremiah Peirsel, Jr., well maintains the goodly name he bears, is industrious and thrifty, and in the enjoyment of a comfortable home and a competency, which he has acquired through his own energy and business sagacity. He, like his father, has the con-

James Allison, without whose biography the history of Menallen township, and particularly of the village of Searight's, would be incomplete, was born near Laurel Hill, in Fayette Co., Pa., Dec. 22, 1801. His parents lived and died in that neighborhood, and their remains were buried in the Laurel Hill graveyard. In early life James Allison moved from the locality of Laurel Hill, and settled on Redstone Creek, Fayette Co., Pa., and learned to be a fuller of cloth under William Searight, in whose family he ever afterwards made his home. When William Searight bought the homestead on which is the village of Searight's, James Allison moved with him to it, where he lived and died. He was born to no other inheritance than that of a noble character and good name, and was in early life thrown upon these his only resources. He held the responsible office of commissioner of the county from 1837 to 1849, and, as was the case in all his business transactions, acquitted himself creditably and honorably. He also held the office of justice of the peace for many years, and was postmaster at the village of Searight's from the time of the establishment of the office in 1845 until within a very short time of his death, having filled the longest continuous term of office of any postmaster in the State, and perhaps in the United States. So long and so very attentively did he occupy this position that he became a part of the town, thought to be entirely indispensable. He was a conscientious and consistent member of the Episcopal Church, and was for very many years senior warden of Grace Church, Menallen. He was married in early life, and his wife died shortly after their marriage. He had no family. The life of James Allison is well worthy of imitation. It was straightforward, unaltering, unchequered, and uneventful. His habits were extremely plain, simple, sensible, sober, temperate, and industrious. His manner was free, open, friendly, frank, and courteous. His character was a perfect light-house of honesty, truthfulness, and uprightness. So highly was he esteemed for these qualities, it became a common saying in the surrounding community of which he was a part that "If Jimmy Allison says it is so it must be so;" or, "If Jimmy Allison did so it must be right." These sayings still reverently linger in the memories of his old neighbors. He died suddenly on July 4, 1881, of a congestive spasm, to which he was subject. His remains were interred in Grace Church burial-ground on July 5, 1881. The Rev. R. S. Smith, rector of St. Peter's Church, Uniontown, and Grace Church, Menallen, officiated at his funeral, and in the course of his remarks said that he had known James Allison intimately for twenty years, and for that period had been his personal friend, and he knew of nothing in his life and character that he would have blotted from the book of remembrance. Notwithstanding it was mid-harvest, and the weather was extremely hot, Grace Church was crowded by neighbors and friends to witness the funeral rites of James Allison—an honest man—"God's noblest work."

Robert Jackson.

Robert Jackson was born in Menallen township, upon the farm where he now resides, Oct. 11, 1831. He is of Irish descent, and was educated in the common schools. He learned the business of farming, and has always been engaged in it. He was married Nov. 7, 1867, to Catharine Murdock, of Pittsburgh, Pa. They have no children. He has never held any office, and never sought one, and is not a church-member. His father left him a small legacy, to which he has added yearly by good farming.

His father, Zadock Jackson, was born in the same township, and was a farmer. He married Lydia Woodward. They had a family of eight children, only three of whom grew up. Robert is the eldest. Zadock, the father, died May 7, 1861, aged fifty-six; Lydia, his widow, is still living. Mr. Robert Jackson is a modest, unassuming man. He has a good farm, and enjoys the respect of his neighbors. He takes delight in his business, does all his work well, and is noted for his hospitality, charity, and industry. Mr. Jackson is a Republican in politics.

Hugh Graham.

Hugh Graham died at his home in Menallen township, May 19, 1879, aged eighty-three years. He was born in the northern part of Ireland in 1796, and was of Scotch extraction, his father and mother having been born in Scotland. His education was received in the “pay schools” of Ireland. At an early age he learned the carpenter’s trade in all its branches. When twenty-two years of age he emigrated to America. He stopped in Philadelphia for a short time, and was there in the employ of Stephen Girard, for whom he built some of the finest houses then in Philadelphia. He then moved to Pittsburgh, thence to Uniontown. Here he remained and worked at his trade for a number of years, building some of the finest houses in the county, among which are the Gallatin house of Springhill township, now owned by Mrs. John L. Dawson; the residence of Col. Samuel Evans, of North Union, the dwelling occupied by Judge Wilson, the fine house on Main Street, Uniontown, formerly owned and occupied by the late Judge Nathaniel Ewing, etc. In 1822 he was married to Margaret Black, an estimable woman, of Menallen township. They lived together for fifty-two years, she dying about five years before her husband. They had eight children,—Catharine and William died young; Jacob married Caroline Gaddis, and is a farmer; Albert Gallatin graduated at Jefferson College, read law, and practiced in Jonesboro, Tenn.; he was also editor of the Jonesboro Union, and is now dead. Margaret married L. B. Bowie; Thomas Baird, who attended Emory and Henry College, near Abingdon, Va., read law and graduated from the Lebanon Law School of Cumberland University, Lebanon, Tenn., and practiced in Tennessee, Missouri, and at Pittsburgh, Pa., for several years. He is now engaged in farming. Hugh died when eighteen years of age; Jennie G. married William Thorndell, deceased.

Mr. Graham held several important township offices; was also director of the Poor Board. In all public positions he discharged his duties well. He was a member of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church for a number of years. Although his early opportunities for education were limited, he by careful study during his spare moments stored his mind with a vast fund of useful knowledge. He possessed a retentive memory, and having once learned a fact he was able to repeat and detail it with the ease and grace of the true gentleman. He was a great admirer of the poet Burns, and could repeat from memory probably more of his poems, in their Scotch dialect, than any man who ever lived in Fayette County. He was ever ready with the Psalms of David and sacred lyrics learned at his mother’s knee. He was especially noted for his retentive memory, his genial Irish wit, his great physical ability, honesty, charity, and industry. Mr. Graham was reticent in regard to his charities; in other words, modest, apparently not letting his left hand know what his right hand did. Like all generous, really strong men, he was never boastful, and was quiet in demeanor. Probably no man exceeded him in a due sense of all the proprieties of life and society. He suppressed all scandalous tongues that wagged in his presence, carrying out practically the maxim, “Let no evil be spoken of another.”

NORTH UNION AND SOUTH UNION TOWNSHIPS.

For the reason that during the ninety-eight years which have elapsed since the formation of the original townships of Fayette County the territory (or nearly all of it) now embraced in North and South Union was for almost seventy years included together in the old township of Union, it is evident that much of the history of the two present townships should be written together as that of old Union, and accordingly that method has been adopted in the narrative which follows.

In December, 1783, the Court of Quarter Sessions of Fayette County at its first session—held in the month above named—decreed the erection of "a township beginning at the head of the west branch of Jennings' Run; thence down the same to the mouth of said run; thence up Redstone Creek to Burul's old road; thence along the same to the foot of Laurel Hill; thence along the foot of Laurel Hill to Charles Brownfield's; thence by a line or lines to be drawn by Charles Brownfield's, Thomas Gaddis', and the Widow McClelland's, including the same, to the head of the west branch of the Jennings' Run aforesaid, to be hereafter known by the name of Union township."1

At the first election in the township James Finley, Alexander McClean, Henry Beeson, Jonathan Rowland, John Gaddis, and Moses Sutton were elected justices of the peace. In reference to the election of these officers, Gen. Ephraim Douglas wrote, in a letter dated Uniontown, Feb. 6, 1784, and addressed to John Dickinson, president of the Supreme Executive Council of Pennsylvania, as follows:

"Want of an earlier conveyance gives me the opportunity of enclosing to Council the return of an election held here this day for Justices of the Peace for this township; and I trust the importance of the choice of officers to the county will excuse me to that honorable body for offering my remarks on this occasion.
Col. McClean, though not the first on the return, needs no pamphlet of mine; he has the honor to be known to Council.
James Finley is a man of a good understanding, good character, and well situate to accommodate that part of the township most remote from the town. Henry Beeson is the proprietor of the town, a man of much modesty, good sense, and great benevolence of heart, and one whose liberality of property for public uses justly entitles him to particular attention from the county, however far it may be a consideration with Council.
Jonathan Rowland is also a good man, with a good share of understanding, and a better English education than either of the two last mentioned. but unfortunately of a profession rather too much opposed to the suppression of vice and immorality,—he keeps a tavern. John Gaddis is a man whom I do not personally know, one who has at a former election in the then township of Menallen been returned to Council, but never commissioned, for what reason I know not. His popularity is with those who have been most conspicuous in opposition to the laws of this Commonwealth. Moses Sutton is remarkable for nothing but aspiring obscurity, and a great facility at chanting a psalm or stammering a prayer.

"Duty thus far directs me to give Council an impartial description of the men who are to be the future officers of this county, but both duty and respect forbid my saying more or presuming to express a wish of my own; for I have no predilection in favor of, or personal prejudice against, either of them.
"I have the honor to be, etc.,
"EPHRAIM DOUGLAS."

But evidently Gen. Douglas afterwards changed his opinions as above expressed, as is shown by a letter (found in the Pennsylvania Archives, 1773-86, p. 696) as follows:

"E. DOUGLAS to SIR's ARMSTRONG, 1785."

"UNIONTOWN, 27th Jan'y, 1785.

"SIR,—Unwilling to send you this certificate in a blank, and desirous of saying something on the subject, I have sat with my head leaning on my hand these ten minutes to consider what that something should be, and after all have considered that whatever I could say upon it would amount to nothing, for I have knowledge of Gentlemen foremost on it to justify my giving a character of him.

"I have already been deceived into a misrepresentation to Council on a former one, for which I most penitentially beg forgiveness, protesting at the same time my innocence in it, for the Constable who made the return, and several others of the township of Menallen, assured me it would be petitioned against, but I find they have not done it, nor are they attempting it.
I can offer nothing more on that subject, unless it be that the township is in great want of a justice. I have given their characters faithfully as I received them from the general voice of the inhabitants hereabout. Council in their wisdom will do the rest. I have the honor to be with high esteem, Sir, "Your most humble and
"Obedient servant,
"EPHRAIM DOUGLAS."

Of those elected justices of the peace, as before mentioned, James Finley, John Gaddis, and Moses Sutton were commissioned as such. Following is a

NORTH UNION.

EARLY SETTLEMENTS.

The only instance of a direct grant of land having been made in Fayette County prior to April 3, 1769, was that of Hugh Crawford, who, in 1767, was an interpreter and conductor of the Indians" in the running of the western part of Mason and Dixon's line. The grant was given by Governor John Penn, dated Jan. 22, 1768, and was a conveyance of land, called a "Grant of Preference," for a tract of five hundred acres. It was, besides, save the Gist tracts, the only instance where any one person was given more than four hundred acres. In consequence of this unusual proceeding the tract of land was given the name of "Injustice." Previous to this, however, Peter Redstone, or Indian Peter, who was the acting interpreter for Hugh Crawford in his official term as Indian agent, claimed to have owned this same land. In a letter to His Excellency the Governor, Redstone stated that he had lived peaceably upon the land given him by Penn until one Philip Shute, a Dutchman, came and quarreled with him. He therefore asked that another tract be given him, which was done, and he vacated the first one to occupy the second, located near Brownsville, on the opposite side of the Monongahela River. Conflicting titles of the original five hundred acres caused numerous lawsuits between Crawford and Shute, which were decided in favor of Crawford, and he became the owner under the "Grant of Preference," as stated. The order of survey of this land was made July 4, 1779, and in that year Crawford died. Not long after his death the property was sold by his administrator, William Graham, by an order of the Orphans' Court of Cumberland County, to pay his debts, Robert Jackson being the purchaser. The records of early transfers of property show that on June 15, 1773, Hugh Crawford (probably a son), in consideration of £50, purchased of Walter Briscoe "a plantation containing two hundred acres, being upon the waters of Big Redstone Creek, on a branch called Lick Run, joining line with John Allen and Elias Newkirk, it being a tract of land that said Briscoe took possession of in the year of our Lord 1768, to have and to hold." Again, March 10, 1783, Walter Briscoe, in consideration of £300, sold to Robert Jackson three hundred acres of land "lying on the waters of the Redstone, adjoining lands now held by Benjamin Phillips, Hugh Crawford, and the said Jackson." The property included in Hugh Crawford's "Grant of Preference" is now within the limits of the farm of Col. Samuel Evans, containing fifteen hundred acres, and formerly owned by Judge Ken-dy.

Philip Shute, after the decision against him in the Crawford lawsuits, settled upon a tract of land called Thorn Bottom, on what is now known as Shute's Run, which was warranted to him Sept. 9, 1769. He was one of the first persons to make a home here, and his name appears upon the records as early as 1768 among those settlers who met the commissioners at Gist's place on March 23d of that year. On May 9, 1788, there was surveyed to Phillip Shute ninety-nine and one-half acres of land. Elizabeth Shute had received a warrant for thirty-two and one-quarter acres as far back as April 1, 1773, but the tract was not surveyed to her until Nov. 11, 1815.

The tub-mill which Philip Shute built on "The Neck," now a portion of Col. Evans' large farm, is said to have been the first one erected in the county.

William Cromwell was a son-in-law of Capt.
Christopher Gist, and like him one of the earliest settlers in the county. In 1786, Cromwell claimed a piece of land on which Philip Shute was living that year. This piece of land was called "Beaver Dam," and is a part of that now owned by Col. Evans.

Josiah and Nathan Springer were members of the party whose applications for land were in the land-office awaiting the first issue of warrants. The one issued to Josiah was No. 819, for three hundred and sixteen acres, and dated April 3, 1769, the first day warrants were ever given for land in Fayette County.
This tract was surveyed under the name of "Elk Lick," on June 2, 1770. Josiah Springer died at his home in 1785, and his descendants all removed to the West. His will is the first on record in the county.
Nathan Springer's land was located next to his brother's on the southwest. It contained three hundred and six and one-quarter acres, and was called "Springer's Lot." The warrant, No. 1830, was granted the same day as that of Josiah, and the survey was made June 22d of the same year. Nathan Springer eventually removed with his family to the West. Dennis Springer, another brother, in pursuance of a warrant bearing date Feb. 28, 1786, located a tract of three hundred and twenty-seven acres just north of that belonging to Josiah, which was surveyed May 15, 1788. The names of Dennis and Nathan Springer also appear as purchasers of lots upon the original plat of Uniontown in the year 1776. Dennis was the contractor for the building of the court-house erected in Uniontown during that year, and the bricks for the purpose were manufactured on his farm.
His family of five sons and three daughters—Jacob, John,
Dennis, Uriah, Josiah, Anna, Hannah, and Sally—all reached the estate of men and women. The two oldest sons were born before the parents crossed to the west side of the mountains. All the two sons, except Dennis (who had a part of the homestead), settled on lands near or adjoining that of their father,—John, where Henry Smith now lives; Jacob, on the farm now owned by Dr. Walker; and Uriah, upon a portion of the William Hanks farm. The daughters
—Anna, Hannah, and Sally—married, respectively, Morris Morris, Griffith Morris, and William Morris, three brothers. They are all buried in the churchyard of the old Baptist Church at Uniontown. Calvin Springer, of Uniontown, is a grandson of Dennis, Sr. As a result of Dennis Springer's becoming security for Daniel P. Lynch, the old homestead was brung under the hammer and sold at sheriff's sale.
It is now the property of Greenbury Crossland. Levi, a fourth son of the Springer family, was a resident in this vicinity as early as 1782, as on May 12th of that year he answered at the Court of Appeal held at the house of John Collins, at Uniontown, and sent a substitute on the Crawford expedition. On Sept. 3, 1796, he purchased of Jacob Beeson a piece of land adjoining the plat of Uniontown, lying north of Peter and west of Pittsburgh Streets. This was a part of the "Stone Coal Run" tract, afterwards known as Mount Vernon, and was originally surveyed to Henry Beeson.
The same property now belongs to Levi, a grandson of the elder Levi Springer. Dennis Springer, a son of Levi, Sr., married Sally, a sister of Ewing Brownfield. She is now a widow, eighty-two years of age, Daniel M. Springer, of Uniontown, is her grandson, and Zadoc Springer, of the same place, is a great-grandson.

James, William, and Hugh Rankin were early in this county, and each became the owner of a large farm in North Union. James purchased 321 acres called "Siege," which was warranted July 8, 1769, and surveyed May 18, 1770. Tracts of land in Washington, Franklin, and Tyrone townships also came into his possession afterwards, as did 338 acres called "Sugar Bottom," on Shute's Mill Run, and 185 acres was warranted May 30, 1788, to William Martin, including his improvement. John Walter purchased 300 acres of one tract and sold it to Andrew Hoover, Sr. Financial troubles overtaking Mr. Rankin, he disposed of his property about the year 1800 and removed to the West. William Rankin's farm, called "Narrow Bottom," comprising 355 acres, was warranted July 8, 1769, and surveyed September 30th of the same year. His whole life was passed upon the place. The name of the property upon which Hugh Rankin settled was "Extent." It contained 225 acres, which was warranted to him Feb. 27, 1770, and surveyed May 18th of the same year. In 1799 he sold 193 acres of this land to Andrew Bryson. His family numbered four children,—William, Esther, Ann, and Thomas. The first three upon reaching maturity settled in the West. Thomas remained upon the homestead until 1851, when he removed to the borough of Uniontown, and died there the same year. The old farm has become the property of Robert Parkhill and others. Thomas Rankin was the father of eight children, but only three are now living,—Hugh L. Rankin and Mrs. Albert G. Beeson, of Uniontown, and Mrs. Anna Smith, of Clarisburg, W. Va.

Isaac and Jonathan Pearce, two brothers, came to this county with the earliest settlers, and each took up a considerable tract of land. On Sept. 14, 1769, a tract of 320 acres was surveyed to Isaac, which was given the name of "Discord," and upon which a patent was issued March 10, 1786. In 1785 the business of a distillery was carried on here, and June 29, 1791, the property was sold to Mordecai Lincoln, of Derry township, Dauphin Co. While yet in the possession of Isaac Pearce the survey of "Discord" was disputed by the attorney of Thomas Gaddis, for William Cromwell, by virtue of an order issued from the Ohio Company. The property located by Jonathan Pearce was called "Bowling Green," a body of 186 acres, adjoining that of Samuel McClean and Jonathan Pearce. A survey of it was made March 20, 1787.

Samuel Lyon, Sr., and Samuel Lyon, Jr., came here in 1769, and purchased extensive bodies of land north of that located by Isaac Pearce. Samuel, Sr., had three hundred and fifteen acres, which was called " Pretention and Contention," and which was surveyed June 13, 1769. In later years the title of this property was disputed by the attorney of Thomas Gist for William Cromwell, under an order from the Ohio Company. The tract of Samuel Lyon, Jr., contained two hundred and seventy acres, which was surveyed to him June 12, 1769, under order No. 3352, and named "White Oak Level." This land was afterwards found to have been granted to James Finley, assignee of Henry Boyle, under warrant No. 2107, dated April 3, 1769, the earliest day upon which warrants were issued for lands in the county. James Finley entered a caveat against the acceptance of the Lyon survey, and he must have come into possession of the property, as he lived here until his death, holding prominent offices the entire time. In August, 1791, he was appointed associate judge, remaining in the position until his death, which occurred in 1828. He was also a member of the Senate of Pennsylvania from this district, succeeding John Smillie, who was elected to Congress in 1792. Mr. Finley was the inventor of the first chain suspension bridge ever put up in this county, which was built in 1801 across Jacob's Creek, on the road between Mount Pleasant and Connellsville.

Thomas Junk settled in Union township on one hundred and eighty-six and three-quarters acres of land, warranted to him Feb. 1, 1796, and surveyed under the name of "Consolation." The patent of this tract to him dates April 16, 1798. Its location was on a branch of Redstone Creek, and adjoining land of William Craycraft. Descendants of Thomas Junk are still living in North Union.

A part of the property in this county upon which Alexander McClean lived for many years is that now owned and occupied by the Stewart Iron Company. On June 11, 1769, James Stewart made application for three hundred acres of land, described as "about one mile from Laurel Hill, on a branch of Redstone Creek, adjoining the lands of Phillip Shute and John Davis, including his improvement made that year." On this application warrant No. 3465 was issued to James Stewart, June 14, 1769, for three hundred and thirty-nine acres and one hundred and forty perches of land, which was surveyed to him. On Sept. 26, 1769, Stewart assigned and delivered to Alexander McClean all right and title to this property. Upon it McClean built a log house, which was the home of himself and wife on their coming into the county. Upon this place all their children were born, and here they lived for many years, but in after-time financial difficulties necessitated the selling of a part of the property. In 1822 the sheriff sold a portion to James Piper. Later the greater part of the original tract came into the hands of Gen. H. W. Beeson, and Nov. 8, 1880, the Stewart Iron Company purchased one hundred and seventy-one acres of Beeson's heirs. Most of the sons of Alexander McClean settled in North Union township, on farms their father bought for them in his prosperous days. James McClean, a brother of Alexander, located his lands in North Union township, near the base of Laurel Hill, and near the site of the present village of Monroe. John McClean, another brother, located one hundred and forty-six acres of land upon the side of the mountain, but soon disposed of it and removed to Washington County. Samuel McClean, also a brother of Alexander, was a surveyor, and in that capacity was of great assistance for many years to Alexander in his profession. Samuel first located fifty-six and one-half acres of land on the mountain, and afterwards purchased six hundred acres of a squatter, who had cut off the timber from about three acres, paying him forty pounds therefor. Another tract of sixty acres, which Samuel McClean had located some years previously, was taken possession of by a man named Nealy, who built a cabin upon it in the night, and purchased some implements for working the land. This caused a lawsuit, which was tried at Hannonstown and decided in McClean's favor. That tract of land is still called " Nealy's Moonlight Discovery."

Samuel McClean had two sons, William and John. William removed to Butler County, Ohio, in 1808, and died there in 1824. John lived for some years on the farm which the Lemont Furnace now occupies. In the war of 1812 he went out as captain of a company of soldiers. After the war he lived upon the farm now owned by George McClean, where he died in 1831. All the daughters of Samuel McClean, except Nancy and Sarah, removed West. Nancy became the wife of Stephen McClean, her cousin, and a son of Alexander McClean. Sarah married George McRea, and lived upon the homestead until her death. Mrs. William Hankins is a daughter of Stephen and Nancy McClean.
Robert and John Gaddis, sons of William Gaddis, came from "Apple-Pie Ridge," near Winchester, Va., to North Union township some time in the year 1785. At this time John was forty-five years of age. He purchased 295½ acres of land, with an allowance of six per cent. for roads. The tract joined that of Robert Gaddis and John Patrick, and was called "Gaddistown." The warrant for it was dated Feb. 7, 1785, the patent being granted March 30, 1786. Adjoining this "Gaddistown" tract John Gaddis, in 1797, purchased two other tracts,—one, called "Oxford," containing 40½ acres, and the other, called "Cambridge," of 16½ acres,—with the allowance of six per cent. for roads, as before. The warrants for the last two were dated March 6, 1794. During his life John Gaddis was a prominent member and worker in the Great Bethel Baptist Church of Unionsville. He died April 12, 1827, aged eighty-seven years. His wife, Sarah Gaddis, died a quarter of a century before, Jan. 7, 1802. Five sons and six daughters made up the family of John and Sarah Gaddis. They were Thomas, Jonathan, William, Jacob, John, Mary, Anna, Elizabeth, Priscilla, Sarah, and Ruth. Jonathan died in 1793, and Anna in 1799, six years later. William and Sarah removed to the West; Mary became Mrs. Allen and lived in Franklin township, and Elizabeth and Ruth married and moved to Wilmington, Del., and died there. Priscilla married Thomas Barton and lived in Menallen township, where she died during the winter of 1880–81, at the age of ninety-five years. John and Jacob each took a part of the old homestead. John married a daughter of his cousin, John Gaddis (son of Robert), and she is now living in Unionsville with her son Eli, her husband having died in 1868. Oliver Gaddis, son of Jacob, lives on the property formerly owned by his father.

Robert Gaddis came to this township with his brother John in 1785, and purchased 237 acres of land at that time about two and one-half miles northwest of Unionsville, on the National road. This land adjoined that of John Gaddis, and was surveyed to Robert April 19, 1788. Of his large family of children, all of the daughters and the sons Benjamin, William, and Jesse removed West. John inherited a part of the homestead, and some of his descendants still live upon it. His wife was Rachel Davis, a daughter of James Davis, an old settler of Union township. Henry Gaddis, a brother of Robert and John, came to North Union soon after their settlement here. He purchased 252 acres of land (adjoining John's property), which was surveyed to him March 15, 1788. Henry Gaddis, who now lives in this township, is one of his descendants.

John Patrick settled here in 1785. He received a warrant for two hundred and ninety-six and one-half acres, the warrant being dated Sept. 30, 1785. The patent was issued May 12th of the following year. This tract of land was named "Crooked Path," situate on Redstone Creek opposite the Buffalo Lick, and adjoining the lands of Robert Gaddis, Nathan Springer, Josiah Springer, and Cornelius Conner. The property has now passed out of the family.

Dec. 27, 1785, there was surveyed to Eleanor Dawson, wife of George Dawson, three hundred and twelve acres of land in this vicinity, by virtue of a certificate from the surveyor of Yohogania County, Va., of which the following is an exact copy:

"Virginia Surveyors Office, Yohogania County.

"Eleanor Dawson produced a certificate from the Com's for adjusting Titles and settling claims to lands in the Counties of Yohogania, Monongahela, and Ohio for four hundred acres of land in this county on the waters of Redstone to include her settlement made in the year 1779 in right of herself during her natural life; the remainder to Nicholas Dawson ex' of George Dawson Dec'd to be distributed according to the will of d'George.

"Jany. 21, 1780.

"W. Crawford, S.Y.C."

A similar certificate was procured by Henry Dawson Jan. 21, 1780, while the commissioners were in session at Cox's Fort, for which he was granted two hundred and fifty acres of land "on the waters of Redstone, to include his settlement thereon made in the year 1771." This certificate and entry claim Henry Dawson assigned to Joseph Little, Feb. 23, 1786, and on March 23, 1811, Little sold it to Samuel Muns grove and Robert Davis. The land in question lies adjoining the Eleanor Dawson tract and William Rankin's farm on the east, and joins the James Finley property on the west. George Dawson's son Nicholas removed to the Virginia Pan Handle and died there, leaving two sons, John and George. The latter lived at Brownsville. His son, John L. Dawson, became very prominent at the bar and in political life. His last years were passed on "Friendship Hill," where he died. John Dawson, the other son of Nicholas, was quite a prominent lawyer, and well known in public life. E. Bailey Dawson, of Unionsville, is his son. Elizabeth M. Dawson, daughter of George and Eleanor Dawson, married Col. William Swearingen. Their great-grandson now lives on the original property in North Union.

John Hankins, a native of North Carolina, came with his wife and children to Beesontown in this county in 1784. On June 11, 1786, in pursuance of a warrant dated June 2d, there was surveyed to him a tract of land in North Union township containing one hundred and twelve acres, the same upon which his grandson, William Hankins, now lives. On the north side of his land was that of Richard Waller; on the east, that of Dennis Springer; south, that of James Rankin; and west, that of Uriah and William Martin. Martin was then in possession of the tract, and had built a cabin upon it, besides having cleared a part of the land. These improvements Mr. Hankins bought and moved into the cabin, while Martin took up one hundred and eighty-three acres in the vicinity, for which he received a warrant May 30, 1788. At the same time Mr. Hankins purchased the one hundred and twelve acres mentioned above he also bought another tract of one hundred acres. This he afterwards sold to Matthew Clark, and it now belongs to Col. Samuel Evans. The sons of John Hankins were James, William, Samuel, Richard, and Arthur. They lived in this section until they reached manhood, when, with the exception of James, they all removed to Tennessee.

When Mr. Hankins removed his family to this county James was but four years old. He remained upon his father's farm and died there, leaving two sons, William and John. William still lives on the homestead where he was born. His son, Dr. John Hankins, is practicing medicine in Uniontown. John Hankins, the brother of William, and second son of James, lives on a farm that his father bought of Benjamin Lincoln.

Joseph Huston came to Union township in 1790, and in the same year was elected sheriff of the county. He had previously lived with his father in Tyrone, and afterwards with Col. James Paul in Kentucky, and for many years he led a roving life. On Oct. 5, 1791, the year after his election to the sheriffalty, he bought ninety-four and one-quarter acres of land on Redstone Creek, in what is now North Union, it being a part of the tract of land which had been patented to Samuel McCarty, under the name of "Union Grove." On Feb. 20, 1792, he purchased of Henry Beeson lot 39, in Uniontown, that where Mrs. Dr. David Porter now lives. Subsequently he bought the lot and built the brick house which adjoins the residence of E. Bailey Dawson upon the west, and which he afterwards sold to Jonathan Rowland. For several years Joseph Huston pursued a mercantile business. Becoming interested in the manufacture of iron, he, in December, 1795, purchased of Dennis Springer a share in fifty-one acres of land in North Union, adjoining that of John Patrick and Ephraim Douglass, which was patented to Jacob Knapp in May, 1788, and a part of it sold to Dennis Springer in the same year. On this land Huston Springer built the "Huston old Forge." In 1803, Huston bought of Jeremiah Pears the Redstone Furnace, in the present township of South Union, and continued the business at these places until near the time of his death. His wife was Mary, daughter of John Smiley, and by her he had two daughters,—Jane, who married Isaiah H. Marshall (at one time manager of the Fairfield Furnace), and Sarah, who became Mrs. Andrew Bryson. Jr. Mrs. Huston died in 1799, and Mr. Huston in 1824, aged sixty-one years. Of Joseph Huston's brothers, William and John, the former lived in Tyrone township until his death in 1821, and his son Eli still resides there. In 1783 John lived in Union-town, where for two or three years he kept a tavern. He purchased lands on tax titles until 1792, when he went to Kentucky.

Some time previous to 1791, Benjamin Lincoln, son of Mordecai Lincoln, left his home in Perry township, Dauphin Co., and emigrated to the west side of the mountains, and lived for a time on the Rankin farm in Union township. While there his father visited him, and was so well pleased with the country and its prospects that on June 29, 1791, he purchased of Isaac Pearce the tract of land called "Discord," containing three hundred and twenty acres. Mordecai Lincoln had four children,—Benjamin, John, Ann, and Sarah. A few years later Benjamin purchased a farm on Whitley Creek, in Greene County. Afterwards he became the owner of the farm now occupied by John Hankins, and lived there until his death. John and Ann Lincoln went to Virginia. Sarah was married before coming to North Union to John Jones, a Philadelphian of Welsh descent. Jones remained upon the old farm until the death of Mordecai Lincoln, when he became its purchaser. He lived there until 1802, when he died, and was buried in the family burying-ground where his father-in-law and other members of the family had been laid. The children of John and Sarah Jones were six in number, of whom William, Ann, and John remained in this township, and the other three went West. William lived a bachelor on a part of the homestead, and died in 1872, aged eighty-three years. Ann married Daniel Canon (brother of Col. John Canon, of Washington County), and resided in Uniontown. John is still living on the homestead farm. This farm, like many others in this section, is underlaid with a vein of coal, nine feet in thickness. The Youngstown Coke Company have purchased the right to mine the coal under this farm and some others adjoining. On this, which was the Isaac Pearce tract, was one of the early "Settlers' Forts," built for protection against the Indians.

In the year 1796, Jacob Lewis, accompanied by his sons Freeman and John, came from Basking Ridge, N. J., and settled in the vicinity of Uniontown (near Hogsett's Station), at Minor's mill. Jacob came as a miller for John Minor. At that time Freeman Lewis was sixteen years of age. He studied surveying with Col. McClean, and assisted him in many of his surveys. He was also employed with Jonathan Knight, when surveying the route of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, as well as in most of the important works of surveying in the western part of the State. He was appointed county surveyor by Governor Wolf, and held the office until the incoming of Governor Ritner. Freeman Lewis was a fine musician, and published a book on the "Beauties of Harmony." In December, 1860, he married Rebecca Crafts, daughter of David Crafts, and for several years taught school at Uniontown. From 1814 to 1829 he lived in Merrittstown, after which he removed to Uniontown, staying there until his death, Sept. 18, 1859. The map of Fayette County, published by Freeman Lewis in 1832, is reproduced in the pages of this history. His sons were three,—Levi, Thomas, and John. The first two live in Uniontown, and John is a civil engineer and surveyor in Ohio.

John Lewis, the other son of Jacob Lewis, was a saddler, and learned his trade of John Campbell. His home was in Uniontown, and his sons, Samuel and Marshall Lewis, are still living there, the former having filled the office of justice of the peace for many years.

Andrew Bryson emigrated to this country from Ireland, and Oct. 29, 1799, purchased of Hugh Rankin one hundred and seventy-three acres in this township. He lived and died upon the place, and his son Andrew is still living there, very far advanced in years. The sons of Andrew Bryson, Jr.,—John H., Andrew, and Robert,—are also residents of North Union, occupying the homestead and other lands adjoining.

Jesse Evans was a native of Wales, who having emigrated to America, was for many years a resident of Springhill township in this county. In 1831 he removed from there to "Spring Grove" farm, a large tract of land which his son Samuel had purchased some ten years previous. His active business life was passed in the supervision of Springhill Furnace, with which he was connected from 1797 to 1831. He was also quite extensively engaged in mercantile pursuits, conducting branch stores in many different sections. His official career as justice of the peace extended over many years, and was throughout very honorable.

The last years of his life were passed upon his farm and in Uniontown, where he died in 1842 at an advanced age. Samuel Evans, a son of Jesse Evans, was born June 5, 1800. His earliest education was acquired at the academy at Dunlap's Creek, and in 1812 he entered the academy at Uniontown, then in charge of Dr. James Dunlap. When eighteen years of age he entered the office of Judge John Kennedy as a student of law; remained there three years, when he went to Philadelphia and studied with Jonathan W. Condy, a prominent lawyer of that city. Upon his return to Uniontown he commenced the practice of law, which he continued for two years, and then served one term as member of the State Assembly. In 1825, Col. Evans, Thomas Irwin, John Kennedy, and James Todd were appointed a committee from Fayette County to attend a convention at Harrisburg, the object of which was the consideration of plans for the development of public improvements. The result was the adoption of a comprehensive system which included the construction of the canals of the State. Of the one hundred and thirty delegates who attended that convention, Col. Evans is the only one now living. Soon after this he and Judge Irwin made a trip to Buffalo, from thence to Albany and New York City, for the purpose of examining the Erie Canal (then just completed) and other public improvements. The winters of Col. Evans' early life, after 1823, were many of them passed by him at Baltimore, that he might have opportunity for examining the old documents and maps pertaining to the early history of the country. The fruits of his labors in this direction were many and valuable, and were passed over to Mr. Veech, in the preparation of his "Monongahela of Old." Among the old maps is one which shows Redstone Creek under the French name "La Petite Rivière." His intimate association with the prominent men of the country in its early days, and his thorough knowledge of the history of the county, make him a cyclopaedia of interesting reminiscences and information. He owns and lives upon a tract of land of 1500 acres about two miles from Uniontown, in which is included Hugh Crawford's "Grant of Preference" of 500 acres. This part is in the bottom-lands below Col. Evans' house, where Philip Shute built the tub-mill, the ruins of which are still visible.

William Craig was a native of Ireland, who emigrated to this country in 1785, settling at East Liberty, where in later years he started a store. In the year 1798 he married Jane Smilie, a daughter of John Smilie, and about 1811 removed to Union township and commenced work in Huston's old forge, where he was intrusted in the manufacture of nails. Mrs. Craig died in 1835, and Mr. Craig in 1838. They left one son, John S. Craig, who in 1817 commenced work in Huston's old forge, and soon took the management of it. Three years later he went to Dunbar Creek, where for a year he had the supervision of a rolling-mill, also the property of Joseph Huston. As Mr. Huston sold the rolling-mill to Isaac Meason, John Craig returned to the old forge, and remained until he was twenty-two years of age. He then spent two years at Redstone Furnace, and in 1827 purchased the farm where Robert Huston now lives. Leaving that, he spent a few years in Menallen township and in the West, after which he returned to Union township, and in 1859 purchased the farm on which he now resides in North Union.

Ephraim Douglass, although a settler in Uniontown, purchased forty-one acres of land known as Douglass Bottom, lying north of the fair-grounds, and another tract of three hundred and thirty-nine acres. In his later years he lived in what is now North Union township, and died there in July, 1833. But his earlier life, after his settlement in Fayette County, was passed in Uniontown, in the history of which borough he is more fully mentioned. His son Ephraim died in 1839. His daughter Sarah was the wife of Daniel Keller, a well-known iron-master of this county. Another daughter, Eliza, was the wife of Allen King, of Clark County, Ohio.

James Gallagher purchased and became a settler upon a tract of land on the north bank of Redstone Creek, adjoining Uniontown, now in North Union township. To this property was given the name of NORTH UNION AND SOUTH UNION TOWNSHIPS.

"James' Fancy." Mr. Gallagher's grandson still occupies a part of this farm.

ERECTION OF THE TOWNSHIP AND LIST OF OFFICERS.

The partition of old Union township into the present divisions of North Union and South Union was effected by an act of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, approved March 11, 1851, which provided and declared, "That hereafter the township of Union, in the county of Fayette, shall be, and is hereby divided into two separate election districts, to be called North and South Union; and that the Cumberland road be the dividing line between the same; and each township shall have a separate window to vote at, in the courthouse in the borough of Uniontown."

The township of North Union then, under this division, is bounded on the north by Franklin and Dunbar townships, on the east by Dunbar and Wharton, on the south and southwest by the borough of Uniontown and the township of South Union (against which last named the boundary is formed by the old National road), and on the west by the township of Menallen. The population of the township by the census of 1880 was 3170.

SCHOOLS.

One of the earliest schools in what is now North Union was taught, not long after the commencement of the present century, by James Todd, afterwards attorney-general of the State, in a house situated near Mount Braddock, on land adjoining the Pearce tract. There are few, if any, surviving of the scholars who attended that school except Mr. John Jones, now eighty years of age, who has still a vivid recollection of attending there under the teaching of "Schoolmaster" Todd.

In 1822 a school was taught in a log building standing on the Widow Murphy place, now owned by Robert Hogsett. This school was then under charge of Hugh Ellerton, but the names of his predecessors and successors, if there were any, have not been ascertained. About 1826 the people of the vicinity united to build a large log school-house on the site of the present one near William Hankins'. In that school-house Daniel Keller, who had been identified with the early iron interests of this section, taught from the time of its erection till the inauguration of the free-school system under the law of 1834.

In 1857 the county superintendent reported for this township nine schools, nine teachers, four hundred and sixty-four scholars, and the sum of $14390 levied for school purposes.

The township is now (1881) divided into seven school districts. The report for the last year gives five hundred and sixty-three pupils, eleven teachers; total expenditure, $2014.25; valuation of school property in the township, $810,000.

Following is a list of those who have served as school directors in North Union from the division of the old township to the present time:

SOLDIERS’ ORPHANS’ SCHOOL.

The following sketch of the Soldiers’ Orphans’ School, located at Dunbar’s Camp, in North Union, is taken from an account of its establishment furnished by James Paull, and published in “Pennsylvania Soldiers’ Orphans’ Schools.”

On the 7th of May, 1866, the Hon. Thomas H. Burrowes, ex-superintendent of common schools, and to whom the labor and responsibility of organizing a system of soldiers’ orphan schools had been intrusted, wrote the Rev. A. H. Waters, who had just retired from the school superintendency of Butler County, Pa., earnestly requesting him to look out a suitable location for a soldiers’ orphan school somewhere in the western counties of the State not already furnished with a school. After considerable inquiry and search without success the efforts were about to be abandoned, when circumstances rendered it necessary for him to visit this county in the discharge of another duty. While here his attention was called to the Madison College buildings, then used only for a small day-school, and owned by the Hon. Andrew Stewart. Having found Mr. Stewart very desirous to have the property used for that purpose, and Dr. Burrowes warmly approving of the location, the buildings were secured and arrangements made for opening the school. On the 19th of September, 1866, the first scholar was admitted, and in a few days large accessions were made on order and by transfers from other schools. The first year of the school’s history was attended with many difficulties and discouragements. The want of adaptation in the buildings, and the great uncertainty of the continuance of the system, made it hazardous to incur any great expense in the erection of additional buildings. After a year of struggle the system was made permanent, and by the erection of new buildings and changes in the old the school was placed upon a solid footing, and started on a career of gratifying prosperity. Credit was due to Mr. Stewart for his devotion to the interests of the school, which was shown by his willingness to contribute to the necessary changes, and his generous contribution of six hundred dollars annually—being one-half of the annual lease—as rewards to meritorious pupils.

After nearly eight years of encouraging success, and when from the nature of the case this, as well as all the other schools, must soon begin to decline, for various reasons it was thought advisable to change its location. After giving the matter due consideration, and with the consent of the State superintendent, it was determined to move to Dunbar’s Camp, four miles and a half east of Uniontown, on Laurel Hill. This point was selected on account of location, commanding one of the finest natural scenes to be found in the country; and, also, because it was sufficiently removed from the influence of a large town. Accordingly, in the fall of 1874 work was begun, and in April, 1875, large and convenient buildings were so far completed as to enable the school to move into them. The 8th of April in that year was memorable in its history, as on that day it was transferred from the old home in Uniontown to the new one at Dunbar’s Camp.

The change has been demonstrated to be a wise one. The children are healthier, have more freedom, and are happier. They breathe the pure air of an altitude of two thousand five hundred feet, and drink the pure mountain water. It is claimed that there is no finer location for a school in the State, and it is hoped that when this school shall have finished its noble work an educational institution may still be continued in this charming spot.

The school has continued in a very prosperous condition, containing at present (July, 1881) one hundred and eighty pupils. It is still under the efficient management of the Rev. A. H. Waters.

RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES.

The Bethel Presbyterian Chapel congregation in North Union is a branch of the Laurel Hill Presbyterian Church in Dunbar township. A small chapel was built for its use near the Youngstown Station in 1877.

The congregation of the Methodist Episcopal Chapel in this township is a branch of the Uniontown Methodist Episcopal Church. The society in North Union built a chapel in 1877 near the Youngstown Station and adjoining the Presbyterian Chapel.

MANUFACTURING INDUSTRIES.

LEMONT FURNACE.

In pursuance of an arrangement made early in the spring of 1875 between Ewing, Boyd & Co. and the Lemont Furnace Company, Lemont Furnace was begun and hastened to completion as rapidly as labor and material could secure that end. It was started on the 1st of January, 1876, and has been in blast continuously ever since, except a few months during which its lining was renewed and its power repaired. The stack is sixty feet high, with a maximum diameter of twenty-two feet, it is sixteen feet in the bosh, and has a capacity of fifty tons per day, running mostly on native ores. It has two hot-blasts, two large blowing-engines, four boilers sixty feet long by three and a half feet in diameter, also stock- and casting-houses of adequate capacity to meet the wants of the furnace.

* The tramways to the mountain and coal ore mines, as well as to the limestone-quarries, and switches to the coke-ovens, furnish every facility for cheap and expeditious delivery of all material in the stockhouse. As both the Baltimore and Ohio, and South-west Pennsylvania Railroads pass within a short distance on either side of the furnace, it has ample connections to secure for it the fullest advantages of competitive freight rates.

The furnace property consists of two thousand acres, all underlaid with several veins of ore yielding from thirty-five to forty-two per cent. of iron. Its fine limestone-quarries and large coal-fields, on which one hundred and fifty coke-ovens are now in operation, supplying fuel to the furnace, together with its other advantages, assure Lemont Furnace an independence which but few such establishments enjoy.

The present owners of Lemont Furnace are Robert Hogsett (one-half interest), James P. Hanna, and Thomas H. Rabe.

STEWART IRON COMPANY'S COKE-WORKS.

This company, who have iron furnaces at Sharon, Mercer Co., Pa., as well as in other parts of the country, began the manufacture of coke in North Union for the purpose only of supplying those furnaces. On the 8th of November, 1880, they purchased here one hundred and seventy-one acres of coal-land of the heirs of Gen. H. W. Beeson, and commenced work in the opening of the slope and the erection of one hundred and twenty ovens, which are completed and now in operation. The slope has been extended to six hundred feet, with two flat headings, one of three hundred and one of five hundred feet.

MOUNT BRADDOCK COKE-WORKS.

A company, composed of Robert Hogsett, T. W. Watt, W. H. Bailey, John Taylor, and Hugh L. Rankin, commenced these works in 1871 on four hundred acres of land purchased of Robert Hogsett. One hundred and twenty-seven ovens were built, and all the coal mined manufactured into coke. For the first two years their coke was sold to Dewey, Vance & Co., of Wheeling, West Virginia, but afterwards was disposed of in open market.

In the spring of 1881 the works were sold to A. O. Tinstman, of Pittsburgh. The product of the ovens at the present time is fifteen car-loads per day. The works are located on the extreme northeastern border of the township, on the line of the South-west Pennsylvania, and Baltimore and Ohio Railroads.

THE YOUNGSTOWN COKE COMPANY'S WORKS.

This company was organized Sept. 29, 1879, the corporators being John Stambaugh, Henry O. Bonnell, Augustus B. Cornell, and Thomas W. Kennedy, who constitute the board of managers. Operations on their lands in North Union were commenced very soon after the organization of the company. They now own five hundred and four acres of coal and one hundred and forty-eight acres of surface, their coal-right extending under lands of John Jones, B. V. Jones, Samuel McLean, George Swearingen, and Elizabeth Canon. They have now in operation two hundred and forty coke-ovens, with all the necessary machinery and appliances, and have also erected twenty-four double dwelling-houses and a large storehouse. The main slope of the mine is 1250 feet, with six flat headings varying from 300 to 500 feet. The daily production of coal is about 500 tons, making about 380 tons of coke. John Shipley is the mining engineer.

John Stambaugh is president of the Briar Hill Iron and Coal Company; Augustus B. Cornell, manager of the Himrod Furnace Company; and Henry O. Bonnell, manager of the Mahoning Valley Iron Company, all of Youngstown, Ohio. Thomas W. Kennedy is also manager of an iron company's works in the same place. And it was for the purpose of supplying these several furnaces and iron-works with fuel that the Youngstown Coke Company effected its organization and established its works in this township.

THE PERCY MINING COMPANY'S WORKS.

In the spring of 1879 this company, composed of A. W. Bliss, G. C. Marshall, A. B. De Saulles, and Maurice Healy purchased one hundred and forty-two acres of coal-land in North Union, and commenced the mining of coal and ore, and the manufacture of coke. They have now sixty-nine ovens in operation, and from thirty to fifty tons of ore is mined daily. Their coal, coke, and ore are shipped by rail and sold in open market.

The Lemont Furnace Company have one hundred and fifty coke-ovens in blast, as is mentioned in the account of their iron-works.

The fire-brick works in this township are under lease to Messrs. Bliss and Marshall, of the Percy Mining Company. These works, which were first put in operation in 1874, now produce daily from four thousand to ten thousand fire-bricks, which are principally used in the construction of coke-ovens in this part of the county.

SOUTH UNION.

EARLY SETTLEMENTS.

According to tradition Wendell Brown and his sons were the earliest settlers in South Union town.

1 Veech gives the following in reference to the Browns: "It is well known that while the Indians held undivided sway in the region they had one or more head-mine in our mountains, the locations of which they guarded with inviolable secrecy. The discovery of these by the Browns would have been an invaluable acquisition to their venatorial pursuits. Many efforts did they make to find them, and many sly attempts to follow the Indians in their resorts to the mines, but all in vain. And more than once did they narrowly escape detection, and consequent death, by their eagerness to share the forbidden treasure. Abraham Brown [grandson of Wendell] used to relate of his uncle Thomas that, having offended the Indians by some tricks played upon them (perhaps in contrivances to discover their head-mines, and by repeatedly escaping from them when taken prisoners), he once escaped being burned only by the timely interposition of a friendly chief; but that eventually they caught him when no such intercessor was nigh, and knocked out all his teeth with a piece of iron and a tomahawk. This was savage cruelty. Now for savage honesty. In a season of scarcity some Indians came to ship. Judge Veech, in his “Monongahela of Old,” says, “When Washington’s little army was at the Great Meadows, or Fort Necessity, the Browns made provisions, corn, and beef to him; and when he surrendered to the French and Indians, July 4, 1754, they retired with the retreating colonial troops across the mountains, returning to their lands after the reinstatement of the English dominion by Forbes’ army in 1758.” The Browns had originally located on Providence’s Bottom, on the Monongahela, but after their return settled in what is now South Union and Georges townships. Upon finally making permanent settlement here, Adam Brown located on three hundred and twenty-seven acres of land which was warranted to him June 14, 1769. Maunus Brown had three hundred and six acres warranted to him the same day. Adam Brown was in his earlier life a lieutenant under the king, and served with the Virginia provincials in the French and Indian wars. He induced many of the former acquaintances of the family to come to this section, and they located lands now lying in both Georges and South Union townships, as is shown by the records, which give the titles of the tracts, number of acres contained therein, and the date upon which they were warranted. Of these settlers one was William Downard, who took up two hundred and ninety-three acres of land on the waters of Brown’s Run, adjoining the tracts of Adam and Maunus Brown. This property was warranted to him June 14, 1769, under the name of “Walnut Hill.”

David Jennings came to this section in 1768, selected a desirable tract of land, and then returned to his home in the eastern part of the State to persuade others to come here and settle with him. John and James Henthorn, two brothers of his wife, came back with Mr. Jennings, and all three of the men entered the Browns for provisions. The old man sold them eight rows of corn.

He afterwards found they had taken just eight rows, and not an ear more.

“Adam Brown—’old Adam,’ as he was called—boasted of having been a king’s lieutenant in his early days, having probably served with the Virginia provincials in the French and Indian wars. For his services he claimed to have had a royal grant of land of nine miles square, extending from near Mount Braddock along the face of Laurel Hill southward, and westward as far as New Salem. I have seen a large stone, standing a little southwest of the residence of Daniel (or William) Moser, in George township, which the late John McClelland said was a corner of Adam’s claim. The old lieutenant, it was said, induced many acquaintances to settle around him on his grant,—the Downards, Greens, McDonalde, McCurtey, Brownfields, Henthorns, Kinckels, Scotts, Jennis, Higgasons, etc., and out of abundant caution he and his brother Maunus and they entered applications for their lands in the Pennsylvania Land-office on the 18th of June, 1769, and had them surveyed soon after. They seem to have been incorrect in the boundary controversy. But it was said that early in 1775, Adam and some of his associates had employed an agent to go to London to perfect the royal grant; when, upon the breaking out of the Revolution, which ended the king’s power in this country, they gave up the effort, and in due time perfected their titles under Pennsylvania. From this and some other grounds arose the current allegations that ‘Old Adam’ and many of his neighbors were unfriendly to the cause of American independence, but we believe they were never guilty of any overt acts of Toryism. . . . The Maunus Brown branch of the family has always been considered free of the taint charged to ’Old Adam,’ and has been productive of good citizens.”
Crawford expedition, and was a prominent leader in the Whiskey Insurrection of 1794. In 1816 he sold the farm upon which he had lived for nearly half a century to John Miller and John Kennedy, and emigrated to the "Miami country," Ohio.

Charles Brownfield was a native of Scotland, who, with his brother James, emigrated to this country and lived for a time near Winchester. His wife was Betsey, the sister of Col. James Burd, and when they came to this township they located a tract of land containing 300 acres, which, in a deed of later years, is described as "near Laurel Hill, on one of the head branches of the Redstone, including my improvement made in the year 1769." Warrant No. 3456, dated June 14, 1769, was given for this land, and the survey was made in September of that year. In 1783, Mr. Brownfield sold this property and removed to Kentucky. Alexander McLean made a second survey of it at this time, and one entry upon the records says, "Said Brownfield removed to the Kentucky country, having sold the above part to Benjamin Brownfield, his son, and the residue to Moses Sutton and George Troutman." In the same connection he further says of this survey, that he "resurveyed the same as by the different purchasers."

Charles Brownfield had eight sons,—Edward, Charles, Robert, Thomas, Empson, Richard, William, and Benjamin. There was but one daughter, Sally, who married Raphael Naylor, of Philadelphia, whither she went to reside, and where she died. Edward Brownfield settled upon a tract of land at the same time his father did, and adjoining that of his father, which contained 250 acres, and was called "Mount Pleasant." Several years later, when the general exodus from this section to Kentucky took place, he removed with his family to the place called "Bear Grass," where John Brownfield, a son of his brother Benjamin, now lives. Empson Brownfield took up 295 acres of land on the waters of Georges Creek, but near the waters of Redstone Creek, partly on the dividing ridge and on the road leading from the gap of the mountain to Cheat River, in George township. This land was surveyed Dec. 23, 1785, "by virtue of certificate from the Commissioners of Monongalia, Yohogania, and Ohio Counties for 400 acres of land on the waters of Redstone Creek, to include his settlement made in 1779."

In the year 1776, Empson Brownfield's name appears in the list of purchasers of lots in Unions town, or Beesontown. In 1781 he purchased a lot in Unions town, upon which he later built and kept a tavern. It is said that he was the first to start a store in Unions town, for which he brought the goods over the mountains on pack-horses. After a few years he, too, removed with his family to Kentucky. Charles and Robert Brownfield both settled at Smithfield. The descendants of Charles are all dead. Robert was with Crawford's expedition. His son Basil settled on the old Gaddis place in 1829, and lived there until his death, Aug. 21, 1881.1

Thomas Brownfield settled upon a farm between Monroe and Unions town, and his grandson, Isaac Brownfield, now occupies the place. Richard Brownfield lived near Morgantown for a few years, and then emigrated to Kentucky. William also removed early to Kentucky. Benjamin, the son to whom Charles Brownfield sold his pioneer home on his removal to Kentucky in 1783, always remained upon the farm and died there. His son, Col. Benjamin Brownfield, died there March 28, 1880, at the remarkable old age of one hundred and one years. The property is now owned and occupied by a grandson, Marion Brownfield.

James McCoy settled in South Union in 1769, when, with many others, he made application for a tract of land in the valley east of Unions town. He was a native of Ireland, and when about fifteen years of age ran away from home and came to America. He had been attending the races with his father, who had entered a favorite colt, and which, at the close of the races, James had been sent home with. On the way he and some other boys ran the horses, when by some mishap the colt stumbled and fell, breaking one of its legs. This so frightened him that instead of going home he started for the coast, where he shipped on board a vessel and worked his passage to America. He remained in the East until twenty-four years of age, when he came to this county, as stated. The warrant for Mr. McCoy's land bears date June 14, 1769, and the order of survey was made Sept. 23, 1769. The property was named "Flinthill," comprised 305 acres, and an allowance of six per cent. was made for roads. This tract of land is recorded as adjoining those of Thomas Brownfield and Isaac Sutton. Another tract of 221 acres adjoining was surveyed to him the same date, Sept. 23, 1769.

Before leaving the East, Mr. McCoy had married Ann Bruce, who was like himself born in Ireland, and who came to this country when but twelve years old. Upon locating here he built a log cabin, which was situated at the foot of the Bailey orchard. Very soon, however, this cabin was reconstructed and made into "McCoy Fort," which was the rendezvous for all the immediate neighbors in times of danger, the "Col. Thomas Gaddis Fort" being two miles away to the southwest. Mr. McCoy then built for his own residence a house of hewn logs, which stood upon the site of the brick house afterwards built by Eli Bailey.

1 An obituary notice of Basil Brownfield, published at the time of his death, contained the following: "Mr. Brownfield was born near Smithfield, this county, in 1786. His ancestors came here from Apple-pie Ridge, Shenandoah Valley, Va. He was a man of strong will and aggressive disposition, as the result of which he was well known, and had acquired a large amount of valuable estate. His connections by blood and marriage are very extensive. He leaves four sons and four daughters living, two of these being in Texas, one of the latter being Mrs. William Gore. Mr. Brownfield's wife was Sarah Collins, daughter of Joseph Collins, one of the original settlers of Unions town."
The original property, which was quite extensive, has been divided and sold at different times, until but comparatively little of it remains in the hands of Mr. McCoy's descendants. A tract of nine or ten acres was leased by himself to Thomas Brownfield for ninety-nine years for a mill-site. A large portion of the land is now the property of the Chicago Coke and Coal Company, sold to them by Eli Bailey, who bought it of the heirs of McCoy after his death. His death occurred in 1808, and he was buried in the churchyard of the South Union Baptist Church, of which he was long a worthy and consistent member. The children of James and Ann McCoy were William, George, Isaac, John, Rachel, Ann, Sarah, and Mary. John married and lived on the old homestead, dying there when fifty-two years of age. His wife was a daughter of Col. Thomas Gaddis. Of their several children, John, the eldest, is still living on the old place, and is eighty-three years of age. George, who never married, went to Ohio to live, and died there. Isaac married, lived, and died near his father's home, and left a family of five children. Rachel and Ann married and removed from the State. Sarah became the wife of Samuel Sutton, son of Moses Sutton. They lived on the farm one mile southwest of the Redstone Coke-Works, which has since been owned by John Hagan. Mary McCoy married Thomas Brownfield, son of Charles Brownfield. The farm on which they lived is now owned by their son, Isaac Brownfield. William McCoy became a Baptist minister. He was married in Uniontown, and in 1789 removed to Kentucky. His son Isaac, born in this place in 1783, became a noted Indian missionary. He was but six years of age when, with his parents, he removed to Kentucky. While living there in 1803 he also married, and very soon after emigrated to Fort Wayne, Ind., to preach and labor among the Indians.

On Oct. 17, 1817, he received from the United States Baptist Board of Missions an appointment as a missionary. In compliance with the request of Dr. Turner, the Indian agent, Mr. McCoy, in 1820, settled at Fort Wayne, Ind., and May 29th of that year opened a school numbering twenty-five scholars,—ten English, six French, eight Indians, and one negro. March 12th of the next year the number had increased to thirty-nine Indian scholars. Being authorized to select a site to establish a mission, after much thought and many examinations Mr. McCoy chose a tract in Michigan, one mile square, on the south side of the St. Joseph River. On Aug. 29, 1821, a treaty was made by the government with the Indians for the transfer of this land, which was ratified March 25, 1822, and July 10th of the same year Mr. McCoy received an appointment from Gen. Cass to take charge of this Indian mission. On October 9th following a company of twenty-two persons left Fort Wayne for the new station on the St. Joseph River, where they were to erect buildings, clear the land, and make other improvements for the growth and development of the "Carey Mission." On December 9th of the same year a train of thirty-two persons, three wagons drawn by oxen and one drawn by horses, and having with them five cows and fifty hogs, left the old school at Fort Wayne for the new home. They arrived at their destination safely, and the first report made to the government, dated July 1, 1823, announced sixty acres of land cleared. In 1825 came the report that two hundred acres had been inclosed, thirty acres were in corn, three hundred peach-trees were growing finely, and a flouring-mill was in operation. With all this advancement the sale of whisky by the traders to the Indians outside of the mission tract caused so much trouble that Mr. McCoy was induced to seek another place for the mission. He studied thoroughly the Indian question, and wrote a work entitled "Remarks on Indian Reform." The principal design of this work was to show the practicability of the meditated reform, and suggested measures to be adopted for its accomplishment. He says, "We discovered that our Indians could not possibly prosper when they knew they had no settled residence, and when the influx of the white population, and with it the introduction of floods of ardent spirits, had already added discouragements to their spiritless minds." On Sept. 15, 1826, a treaty was held with the Pottawatomies on the Wabash, at which there was granted to fifty-eight Indians, by descent, "scholars in the Carey Mission" school on the St. Joseph, under the direction of Rev. Isaac McCoy, one-quarter section of land to be located by the President of the United States.

In 1827, Mr. McCoy left the station to visit New York, Philadelphia, and Washington on business connected with the Indian interests. He held interviews with the President and Commissioner of Indian Affairs with a view to getting a territory for the Indians set off, and in this effort he was successful. The land and improvements of the "Carey Mission" were appraised and sold, and the school gradually declined. Mr. McCoy and Mr. Lykins, his son-in-law, were instructed to visit the region west of Missouri and Arkansas to inspect and report upon the condition of the country there, and select a suitable location for a mission. The tract of land on which the "Shawnee Mission" house in the Indian Territory is located was selected, and Aug. 11, 1833, the little band that was left of the "Carey Mission" gathered there and organized a church. The whole of Mr. McCoy's long life was a constant endeavor to soften and civilize the Indian race.

The Sutton family of five brothers, all Baptist ministers, came to this county as early as 1779, and after that date all located land here. The property of Isaac and Moses Sutton was south of the present village of Monroe, adjoining that of John Hopwood, Jeremiah Cook, and James McCoy. Moses Sutton was one of the purchasers of the residence of Charles Brownfield, and in 1788 he was assessed upon a distillery as his property. Isaac Sutton was one of the early ministers of Great Bethel Baptist Church at Uniontown. James Sutton settled in Georges township, but afterwards removed to Anwell township, Washington Co., Pa., where, in the year 1774, he was pastor of the Ten-Mile Baptist Church.

Jeremiah Gard owned a tract of land in this township some time before 1780. It contained two hundred and forty-eight acres, and was located next to the farm of Thomas Gaddis. In 1789, Mr. Gard built a mill on Redstone Creek, which is still standing, and is known as the Hutchinson mill. He was also engaged in the manufacture of cseythes, and served as a private in the Crawford expedition. He died upon this place, and left three sons,—Daniel, Simeon, and Jeremiah. They all settled near their father and lived here for many years, but after his death removed to the West.

On Nov. 20, 1783, George Troutman purchased of Charles Brownfield thirty-nine acres of land, a portion of the property Brownfield sold upon his removal to Kentucky. The regular survey of the transferance of this property was not made to Mr. Troutman until March 2, 1786, at which time there was also surveyed to him, under a warrant issued from the land-office Feb. 23, 1786, another tract of land containing one hundred and twenty-three acres. Later he purchased still more land, and July 16, 1791, he sold one hundred and sixty-two acres to Jonathan Gray, whose descendants still occupy the property. In the year 1788, George Troutman was running a distillery.

The name of Job Littell appeared upon the assessment-roll of Union township in 1785, as being assessed upon a tract of land containing fifty acres. From that time his taxable property increased, and in 1788 he was assessed upon a saw-mill; in 1796 upon a saw-mill, grist-mill, and a house; and in 1799 upon six hundred and thirty-nine acres of land. On Nov. 22, 1802, Job Littell purchased of the commissioners of Fayette County, for the unpaid taxes of 1799-1800, a tract of land of three hundred acres, “situate on the branch of Redstone Creek south of Uniontown.”

A portion of Job Littell’s property was given the name of “Job’s Hollow.” In this is still visible the ruins of an old mill, with a half-filled race, the old mill-stones, moss-covered and gray, lying in the debris and surrounded by a thicket of underbrush, while the stone house, which was built upon an adjacent hill, has also crumbled and fallen to the ground.

Samuel Littell was a son of Job and Elizabeth Littell. His son Alonzo is now a resident of Cleveland, Ohio, and was for several years editor of The Genius of Liberty, of Uniontown. Elizabeth, the daughter of Job and Elizabeth Littell, married John Custead, and with her husband lived in this section. In May, 1819, John Custead advertised that he had “added to his trade of Cabinet-Making that of Making and Painting Signs,” his place of business being three miles south of the borough of Uniontown, near Littell’s mill. When Job Littell purchased his property there was reserved an acre of ground for a burial-place, in which himself and wife and John and Elizabeth Custead are buried. Mr. Littell died in 1824, aged eighty-one years, and his wife in 1835, aged eighty-eight years. Other graves are found in this burying-ground, but none are marked save by a common field-stone at the head and foot.

Samuel Work was assessed in 1785 on a tract of 290 acres of land. In the names of property-holders in 1783 appears that of Esther Work, undoubtedly the widow of Samuel, assessed upon 188 acres. Robert, Andrew, John, and Alexander Work were assessed as single men. Shortly after this, however, Alexander Work was assessed upon a grist-mill in Menallen township. About the year 1817 he built a mill in Union township (now South Union), which is still standing, and is known as the Barton mill.

In 1785, Jeremiah Cook was assessed upon property consisting of sixty-three acres of land, a saw-mill and a grist-mill. In 1791 a distillery was added to the above amount of property, and all of it was assessed to him in Union township. In 1793, Richard Sturgeon was assessed upon one hundred and fifty-nine acres of land, a grist-mill, saw-mill, and a fulling-mill, also in Union. From what can be learned both of these men seem to have carried on considerable business here, and to have remained here several years, but no information can be gained as to what section of the township of Union they lived in.

In February, 1788, William Campbell came to this section and purchased a tract of land of one hundred and four acres of Henry Beeson, upon which the former settled in 1768. In 1789, Mr. Campbell took out a warrant for two hundred and seventeen acres of land in Union, in the survey of which he desired to include the land he had previously purchased of Mr. Beeson. It was all surveyed to him in the manner desired, and is now in the possession of E. B. Dawson and Nathaniel Brownfield. In 1788, Mr. Campbell was proprietor and conductor of a distillery, which was situated on the tract of one hundred and four acres purchased of Henry Beeson. The following is a verbatim copy of a marriage certificate given in Mr. Campbell’s family in 1790. The original certificate is written on parchment, in a large, bold, and beautiful style of penmanship. The copy is here given as of interest in this connection:

"Whereas Abel Campbell, son of William and Mary Campbell, of Union Township, Fayette County, Pennsylvania, and Susanna Dixon, daughter of William and Rebecca Dixon, of Mcallen township, county aforesaid, having declared their intentions of marriage with each other, before several Monthly Meetings of the People called Quakers at Westland, according to the good order used among them; and having Consent of Parties concerned, their said proposals were allowed of by the said meetings. In the year 1804 the name of John Barnes is given on the assessment-roll as a coppersmith. In 1807 a shop was built on the Thomas Gard property by James Barnes for the manufacture of sickles.

It was frequently related by Mr. Basil Brownfield, who died in South Union in August, 1881, at the age of eighty-six years, that about twenty years ago he was told by Judge Friend, of Carret County, Md., that his (Judge Friend's) grandfather was a great hunter and an acquaintance and friend of Daniel Boone, the pioneer of Kentucky, and that upon one occasion, being out on a hunting expedition with Boone, they crossed the Laurel Hill in what is now Fayette County and bivouac'd for the night by a fine spring at or near the spot where Gaddis Fort was built nearly twenty-five years later. Here at daylight the next morning they were surprised and captured by a party of French and Indians, by whom they were disarmed, robbed of everything they had but their clothes, and taken to the summit of Laurel Hill, where they were dismissed with the admonition never to be again found west of the mountain on penalty of death by torture. This, Judge Friend said, was told to him by his grandfather, who placed the date of the adventure at about 1750.

ERECION, BOUNDARIES, AND LIST OF OFFICERS.

The erection of South Union township by act of General Assembly, March 11, 1851, has already been noticed in connection with North Union, which was erected at the same time from the territory of old Union. The township of South Union lies wholly on the southwest side of the old National road, which forms its boundary against North Union. Its other boundaries are Wharton township on the southeast, Georges on the southwest, and Menallen on the west and northwest. Its population by the last census (1850) was eleven hundred and seventy-seven, including the village of Monroe.

The list (nearly complete) of the principal town-ship officers of South Union from its formation until the present time is given below, viz.:

SCHOOLS.

The first school in the township of South Union was taught on the Hellen Hill farm, adjoining the Peter Hook farm; another very early school was taught on the Benjamin Brownfield farm. Oliver Sproull (who was a sergeant in Col. Hantmack's regiment) was a teacher here for about twenty years in the early days.

In 1857 the county superintendent's report showed that there were then in this township four schools under five teachers and 278 school children. The amount of tax levied for school purposes was $618. The report of the school year of 1880-81 shows 242 pupils and five teachers. Total expenditure for school purposes, $1088.15; valuation of school property, $6000.

The township is divided into five school districts, called Hatfield, Monroe, Hutchinson, Hague, and Poplar Lane. The list of school directors from the formation of the township to the present time is as follows, as shown by the election returns, viz.:

THE REDSTONE COKE WORKS.

These works, owned and operated by J. W. Moore & Co., are situated about three miles south of Uniontown, near the railroad leading from that town to Fairchance. The property embraces about six hundred acres of land, with a frontage of nearly two miles along the line of the railroad. A part of this land was purchased in 1889, and the construction of ovens then commenced. On the 1st of May, 1881, seventy-five were completed, and ninety-five have since been added. It is the intention of the owners to increase the number to three hundred.

The mine is entered by a slope or "dip-heading," with a grade of one foot in twelve, and has been extended to six hundred feet. Three hundred feet from the entrance is the first flat-heading, which extends southward, and from this another runs parallel with the slope-heading.

Several blocks of houses, each containing eight rooms, and intended for use of the miners, have been built at the works. A large brick store building has also been erected. Two stone-quarries have been opened on the property near the oven-beds. The location of the works is near the head of a mountain stream, which furnishes an abundant supply of pure water. The coke manufactured here is contracted for by J. D. Spearman Iron Company, in Mercer County, Pa.

CHICAGO AND CONNELSVILLE COKE COMPANY’S WORKS.

The land on which the works of this company are located (being a part of the McCoy tract, taken up in 1769) lies on the line of the Southwest Pennsylvania Railroad, about three-fourths of a mile south of Uniontown. About four hundred acres of coal right and twenty-one acres of surface was purchased of Greenbury Crossland and William Hopwood by Jasper M. Thompson, Alpheus E. Willson, Dr. Smith Fuller, William H. Playford, Daniel Kaine, John Snyder, Charles E. Boyle, and Thomas B. Schnatterly, and on the 14th of February, 1889, these gentlemen sold to Robert Montgomery, of Pittsburgh, the twenty-one acres of surface, and the right to all coal and minerals underlying three hundred and twenty-six acres of their lands. Therupon the Chicago and Connelsville Coke Company was formed, consisting of Robert Montgomery, Mr. McNair, of St. Louis, and Alexander J. Leith, of Chicago, the last-named gentleman being its president. In the month following the purchase they commenced the sinking of the shaft and the construction of ovens, of which one hundred and six had been completed by the 1st of May, 1881, and one hundred and seventy-eight have been added since that time. The shaft has been sunk two hundred and seventy-eight feet, and a derrick one hundred feet in height erected over it. From the base of the shaft six entries (including the air-course) radiate in different directions. The main entry of flat-heading was in July, 1881, two hundred and twenty feet in length, and the one of the other two hundred feet, rising towards the surface. The company have erected at the works a large brick store and thirty blocks of tenements for the use of the miners and other employés.

The coal mined by this company is all manufactured into coke, and the product of the ovens is sold under contract to the Joliet Steel Company, of Joliet, Ill., of which company Mr. Leith is also the president.

MONROE.

This town, located on the line between North and South Union, was laid out by John Hopwood, Nov. 8, 1791, and by him then named Woodstock. The tract of land upon which the town was erected was patented by John Hopwood from Richard Penn, Governor of Pennsylvania, April 1, 1786. The patent granted four hundred and fifty acres lying in the valley along Redstone Creek. Prior to this, viz., Nov. 23, 1785, he had purchased a tract of land from James McLean, brother of Alexander McLean. In addition to these valuable possessions, John Hopwood acquired by purchase from Moses Sutton two other tracts of land bounding his other property on the West. John Hopwood readily discerned that his location was advantageous in many respects, being on the old Braddock road, over which passed the travelers from the East to the land of Boone, and being at the base of the Laurel Hill, where the rapids were utilized for driving mills and factories. The traveling traffic had so increased that it became imperative to afford the new-comers public-house accommodations. With all these, and doubtless many additional views, John Hopwood founded the town, and for the accomplishment of this design he set apart two hundred acres of the land he had received by patent, and divided these two hundred acres into four hundred lots.

The charter of the town guaranteed the following benefits and general advantages, viz.: Each purchaser of a lot was to have the privilege to enter upon a three-hundred-acre tract lying contiguous to the town, and take therefrom any stone or timber necessary for the erection of their buildings free of charge, also any timber for the purpose of improving their lots in said town, for the period of ten years from the date of their respective purchases. The terms of sale required the purchaser to pay an annual ground-rent of one-half a Spanish milled dollar or a bushel of wheat. The founder of the town further stipulated that unless the purchasers of these lots or their heirs or assigns should improve their lots by building thereon a good dwelling-house at least twenty-four feet front and sixteen feet in depth, with sufficient stone or brick chimney thereto, at or before the expiration of five years from the date of the purchase, then the said lot or lots should be forfeited to the grantor.

John Hopwood was a thorough scholar, and desiring that the inhabitants of the town might have facilities for acquiring education, he set apart for the building and furnishing of an "Academy of Learning" all ground-rent which should become due and be paid on the lots for the period of twenty years from the date of the charter, together with all the moneys arising from the sale of any lot or lots forfeited as aforesaid for the space of twenty years, also one-fifth part of the first purchase money of all lots in said town for the same period, and to further the object Alexander McLean, Dennis Springer, and Joseph Huston, Esq., or their successors in office, were to act as trustees, to collect, receive, and hold the fund for building and endowing the "Academy of Learning" in the said town, to be built whenever a majority of the inhabitants residing in and holding lots in fee simple in the town, and proprietors of improved lots although non-residents, should think the said fund sufficiently large to warrant the undertaking of erecting such buildings as would be proper for an academy. As a suitable location for the academy, he deeded lots Nos. 1 and 2 to the inhabitants of the town and their heirs and assigns forever, to be used for this and for no other intent or purpose whatever. This academy was afterwards built, and in the minutes of the Great Bethel Baptist Church are found resolutions looking to their patronizing the "Union Academy of Woodstock" as a denomination. This was July 19, 1794, and was doubtless one of the first academies in this part of the State.

In the general plan of his town, lots Nos. 80 and 81 were reserved for a market-house, and "for the erection of said Academy and Market-House" the inhabitants were to have the privilege of using all the stone and timber from the aforementioned three-hundred-acre tract, free. The proprietor of the town had granted so many privileges that the town grew rapidly. Among the earliest settlers and citizens of the town were Nicholas Sperry, Moses Hunter, John Haymaker, Nathaniel Wills, Edward Slater, John Sockman, Joseph Chambers, Philip Koontz, Adam Albert, Frederick Snyder, Richard Holliday, Luke D. Reddecoard, John Morrow, John Fessler, Richard Bowen, Peter Long, Caleb Hall, Patrick Byrne, Ann Barnholdt, Simon Lauck, John Formwalt, William Tyler, William Thorn, Jacob Storm, George Tilley, Johnston Smith, John Rhea, John Shietz, Jacob Closer, John Schley, Alexander Smith, Alexander Doyle, Joseph Semnes, Henry Walker, William Deakins, Jr., George Gilpin, Robert Peters, John Leese, John C. Sneider, John Ritchie, Josiah Starberry, Isaac Sutton, Sr., Peter Deast, Sr., Zachenes Morgan, Christian Street, Archibald McLean, Margaret Reynolds, Isaac Sutton, Jr., Daniel Roberdean, David Russell, William M. Lemmon, William Lemmon, Sr., Samuel Sutton, Christopher Sowers, and William Lucas.

In 1793 the occupations of some of the lot-owners and residents of the town were as follows, viz.: Patrick Byrn, merchant; George Tilley, merchant; Christian Street, minister; Isaac Sutton, Sr., minister; John C. Sneider, physician; Hanson & Bond, printers; Richard Bowen, printer; Nathaniel Wills, printer; Simon Lauck, gunsmith; John Fornwalt, baker; William Tyler, bookbinder; John Shietz, gunsmith; John Closer, blacksmith; John Schley, cooper; John Haymaker, blacksmith; Edward Slater, cabinet-maker; Adam Albert, blacksmith; John Fessler, clock-maker; Joseph Chambers, blacksmith; Peter Long, tavern-keeper; Caleb Hall, cabinet-maker; Philip Koontz, butcher.

Thus the town grew and prospered. In 1802, John Hopwood, the proprietor, died. In 1816, Moses Hopwood, the only son of the founder, who by will had inherited all the wealth of his father, decided to lay out an addition to the town. At that time the National road was rapidly approaching Monroe, and as it was completed from point to point supplanted the old "Braddock road." During the Presidential campaign of 1816, James Monroe came through here on his trip westward, and was the guest of Moses Hopwood, who informed the Presidential candidate of his intention to enlarge and rename the town, and asked Mr. Monroe what he should call it. The future President requested that it be named for him, and accordingly when the town had been completed in plan in May, 1818, it was so named,—Monroe. Prior to this (in 1817) he had christened one of his sons for the President. The new town was laid out so as to conform to the original Woodstock plat. It consisted of eighty-eight lots. The front or main street received the name of Franklin, and afterwards became the National road. The other principal streets were Perry, Findlay, Washington, Jefferson, and Madison.

From 1818 until the opening of the railway system the National road was the great thoroughfare of travel between the East and West, and during all this period of more than thirty years this town enjoyed a prosperity that few towns of equal size participated in to such an extent. To illustrate the business which was done in the town during its prosperous years, it need not be mentioned that acres of covered wagons could be seen every night in the week in Monroe, and from five to ten thousand head of hogs and cattle were centred at this point every evening, so that the drovers might get an early start over the mountains before daylight in the morning. Then, in addition to these caravans and trains of covered wagons, there were numerous gangs of slaves on their way from Virginia to Kentucky. The town of Monroe was the place which all travelers aimed to reach at night, so that they might be fresh for the task of passing over the mountains in the early morning. As further indicative of the prominence and importance of the town, the proposition to change the county-seat from Uniontown to Monroe was at one time considered. Gaddis Hopwood, Esq., made the argument in favor of the change, but the larger town continued the county-seat.

TAVERNS.

One of the first requisites in a town is accommodation for the traveling public; this necessity brings public-houses into existence. Soon after the founding of Woodstock, in 1791, tavern-houses were opened there by John De Ford, James McLucas, Jesse Barnes, Lewis Williams, and Benjamin Minton. At that time it was considered a good day's travel to drive from Woodstock to John Slack's, only four miles distant, but that was prior to the existence of the National road, when the old Braddock road was too rough for vehicles. When the addition had been made other taverns began to spring up in rapid succession on the new Main Street.

The John De Ford tavern was the first in the new town. His stone building was erected in 1818. The persons who did the stone-work were John Sutton, Matthias Chipps, and his son, David Chipps; the carpenter-work was done by Gabriel Getzendirger, John Farr, and Elias Freeman. Mr. John De Ford kept it as a hotel for a number of years, and then removed to Carrollton, Ohio. Matthias Frey succeeded him in the business, and then Henry Fisher. It is now used as a residence.

The German D. Hair tavern-house was built in 1818, by William Morris. He sold it to Thomas Brownfield, March 13, 1822, after which it was completed, the stone work being done by Benjamin Goodin, Robert Cooper, John Sutton, and John Harvey, Sr., and the carpenter-work by Gabriel Getzendirger and Enos West. After William Morris retired from it, Joseph Noble, Andrew McMasters, and German D. Hair occupied it as a tavern.

The Morris tavern was built by William Morris in 1823, on an elevated site west of the town. This building was of brick. The mason-work was done by Benjamin Goodin and Matthias Chipps, and the carpenter-work by Elias Freeman, Gabriel Getzendirger, and John Farr. William Morris kept this, his second public-house, for a number of years, and was succeeded by Calvin Morris and Matthias Frey. May 22, 1846, it was sold to Moses Hopwood, James Hopwood, Gaddis Hopwood, and John N. Freeman. Since that time the house has been occupied as a residence by the person operating the coal farm, which was sold with the house.

The Andrew McMasters tavern was built in 1825. The stone-work was done by Abraham Beagle, John Harvey, and William Harvey. The carpenters were James Thirlwell, Enos West, Gabriel Getzendirger, and Lawrence Griffith. The following persons occupied it as a public-house: Andrew McMasters, Lott Clawson, Enos W. Clement, Thomas Acklin, Matthias Frey, James Shaffer, and John Worthington, after which it passed into the possession of Benjamin Hayden, and has since been used as a residence.

The Clement House, since known as the Shipley Hotel, was erected by Enoch Wilson Clement in 1839. John Harvey, Jr., did the stone-work. Mr.
Clement kept it five years, at the expiration of which time it was sold to Col. Benjamin Brownfield, whose son, Elijah Brownfield, kept it as a tavern two years. It then went into the following hands successively: Benjamin Brownfield, Jr., Archibald Skiles, John Worthington, John Wallace, Matthias Frey. Aaron Wyatt then bought the property, and after keeping it one year sold it in 1858 to Samuel Shipley, who sold it to his son, Julius, after which it was rented to Ezra Burke, Redding Bunting, and Lindsay Messmore. The property is at present in the possession of A. C. Brant, and is by him used as a dwelling-house.

The Miller Hotel, a large stone building, was erected by Moses Hopwood, Jr., as a residence. He disposed of it to Elisha Hyatt, who in a few years resold it to Hiram Miller. The latter gentleman kept a public-house for some twenty years. Since then it has been used as a private residence by Mrs. M. M. Beeson.

The Frame Tavern building was originally intended as a dwelling-house when erected by William Ellis. He afterwards disposed of it to Matthias Frey, and that gentleman enlarged it and converted it into a tavern. He was succeeded in business by James Dennison and Thomas Acklin.

STORES.

The first store in the town was opened by Reuben Mockabee. In it was kept a general assortment of dry-goods and groceries. He kept in Woodstock, and when Monroe was laid out removed to Franklin Street, and built a store and residence where the dwelling of Mrs. Elizabeth Hays is at present. Mr. Mockabee afterwards removed to Brownsville. Benjamin Hayden was the next to follow the mercantile business in the town, and he was soon followed by Gaddis Hopwood, Thomas Hopwood, James Hopwood, and Monroe Hopwood. These brothers were not in partnership, but kept the store in succession. The last one, Monroe Hopwood, carried on the business for twenty-five years. Coming on down through the history of the town, the following persons are found engaged in the store-keeping, viz.: James Canan, Joseph Peach, William Shipley (who in 1865 bought the store of Benjamin Hayden), Jacob Llewellyn, and A. S. Ingles, who in 1868 sold out to Frank M. Semans, but in 1870 embarked in the business again. In thirteen years Mr. Ingles sold one hundred thousand dollars' worth of goods in Monroe. F. M. Semans has carried on the business successfully for fifteen years past in the old store occupied by the Hopwood brothers in former days. Other merchants have been James E. Goff, N. H. Black, W. H. Cotton, Morgan Canan, A. Shipley, and Benjamin Kissinger.

MANUFACTORIES.

As early as 1810, David Wilcox made shoes, boots, and moccasins in this town, and Hezekiah Reinier and Thomas Barnes tanned and dressed deerskins for leather breeches, which were at that time considered necessary to an aristocratic dress.

Among the earliest industries of the town was that of wagon-making. The needs of the times when all the travel was overland brought these shops into existence. John Farr and John Hannah were the first wagon-makers in the town. They carried on the business for a number of years, and were succeeded in 1830 by Lott Clawson, who has carried on the business for fifty years. In the mean time others have established themselves here, among whom were Horatio Griffith, who carried on the business some ten years, and then John Custead, who is yet engaged in it.

The first to engage in blacksmithing in the town were Dennis Bryan and Lewis Williams. These were followed by Zachariah White, John Johnson, Philip Horner, Fogg Jenkins, William Amos, Jonas Pratt, Joseph and David Fisher, William Wallace, Bryson Devan, Samuel Hickle, and O. Devan.

At one time there was an extensive comb manufactory in Monroe, the business being carried on by Thomas Nesmith. From 1828 until 1855 he conducted the business, and most of the time had peddlers on the road selling the product of his horn-comb manufactory.

About 1840, William Graham opened a chair- and wheelchair-factory, and this remained in operation until 1847, at which time the works were removed to Waynesburg, Pa.

In 1832-33, Thomas Hopwood, now of Oregon, had built the Monroe Flouring-Mill, which has been successfully carried on ever since. Jacob Dutton was the contractor and millwright.

For the past twenty years John Ingles has been carrying on the business of broom-making in the town.

Isaac Barkley has followed the harness- and saddle-making business a great number of years, and thousands of specimens of his workmanship are in the country.

A carding-machine was put in operation here about 1829 by George Gregg and William Stumph. They carried on the business for a number of years.

TRIP-HAMMER FORGE.

Soon after 1800 there was a trip-hammer forge constructed in the town of Monroe (then Woodstock) by the Hopwoods. This was called Vulcan Forge, and in 1800 John Hopwood had all of the materials in readiness for its construction. Soon after (in 1802) he died, and his son Moses completed the work. This forge and trip-hammer was in operation some fifteen years. It is said that Nathaniel Mitchell had charge of it for a time, and in 1815 Lewis Williams bought it from Moses Hopwood, and the consideration was payable in a good assortment of hoes, axes, mattocks, plow-irons, and shovels before April 1, 1818. The cupola and trip-hammer were operated by the stream of water which flows through "Lick Hollow."

DISTILLERY.

There was a distillery in the southern limits of Monroe. It was owned by Joseph Frazier, and then by James Calhoun. Long since it was removed from the stream of water where it was located, and a residence was made of it on the front street in Monroe.

THE PROFESSIONS.

These have been well represented from Monroe. Among the lawyers of the place we have Rice G. Hopwood, for many years one of the foremost members of the Fayette County bar, and Albert Hayden, an active practitioner at Fairmount, W. Va.

Among the physicians of Monroe may be mentioned Jordan Morris, son of William Morris, who is now practicing in the West; Thomas Hudson Hopwood, son of William Hopwood, Esq., who was a promising young physician at the breaking out of the Rebellion, and allowing his patriotism to overcome his other desires, he enlisted, passed through the war, and came home in 1867 a major in the United States army, to die from injuries and wounds received on the battle-field.

Moses Hopwood, son of Rev. James Hopwood, removed to Iowa, where he practiced medicine a number of years, and finally yielded to that fell destroyer consumption.

Dr. Alonzo Hopwood, now of Vinton, Iowa, was born in this town, and removed to his new home in 1861.

Dr. William H. Hopwood, son of William Hopwood, Esq., now located at Upper Middletown, Fayette Co., is a graduate of Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia, Pa., class of 1876.

Among the clergy men who have labored in Monroe may be mentioned the following:

James Hopwood, son of Moses Hopwood, Sr., began his ministerial career in 1827, and was for many years an efficient preacher in the Methodist Church. He died March 4, 1881, at his home in Vinton, Iowa.

William Ellis commenced preaching at the same time James Hopwood did. Subsequently he united with the Baptist Church, but has now ceased labor on account of age.

James Brown, pastor of the Baptist Church at Confluence, Pa., commenced his ministry in the Monroe Methodist Protestant Church.

William Wallace was formerly a blacksmith in the town. Having been converted, he left the forge and anvil to preach the glad tidings to the world of sinners. He is now a successful preacher in the Pittsburgh Conference, Methodist Protestant Church.

Moses Hopwood, Sr., Gaddis Hopwood, and Thomas Nesmith were all useful as local ministers.

CHURCHES.

The earliest church organization in the town was the Methodist Episcopal. This society was formed as early as 1823, at which time, and for several subsequent years, they had preaching at the residence of Moses Hopwood, Sr., when such eloquent divines as John H. Fielding, Charles Elliot, Henry B. Bascom, John A. Waterman, James G. Sansom, and Thomas M. Hudson preached to this society. In 1830 the Methodist Protestant Church was organized, and many seceded from the Methodist Episcopal Church and united with the new organization. The early members of the church prior to the formation of the new society were Joseph Frazier, Stephen Brown, Hannah Hopwood, Moses Hopwood, Gaddis Hopwood, Thomas Farr, Lucy Farr, Mrs. Brown, John De Ford, Lydia De Ford, James Hopwood, William Hopwood, Thomas J. Nesmith, and William Ellis.

When this circuit was first organized the charge was in the Uniontown Circuit, afterwards changed to Fayette Circuit. It has since received the name of Smithfield Circuit. Since its organization this society has had the following persons as class-leaders, viz.: Moses Hopwood, Gaddis Hopwood, Jesse Sacket, Perry G. White, Monroe Hopwood, George Hopwood, Jesse Reed.

In 1828 and 1829, under Charles Elliot, there was a great revival, which lasted through the summer and winter, and there were about one hundred and fifty accessions to the church. This revival, under the same preacher, swept all Uniontown and Madison College, and hundreds were there converted. This is said to have been the most remarkable revival of religion ever known in this part of the country.

THE METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH.

As has been previously stated, there was a division in the church in 1829. In 1833, soon after the Methodist Episcopal Church had succeeded in building a house of worship, the Methodist Protestant Church also erected a church edifice. Their first class con-supported the following persons, viz.: Joseph Frazier, John De Ford, Sr. (who afterwards removed to Ohio and died there, aged one hundred and four years), Samuel Littell, Stephen Brown, Sr., James Hopwood, Louisa Hopwood, Thomas Hopwood, Elizabeth Hopwood, Thomas Brownfield, Obadiah Ellis, Thomas Nesmith, Lydia De Ford, Harriet De Ford, William De Ford, Elizabeth De Ford, Hannah Brownfield, Margaret Rankin, Margaret Frazier, William Ellis, Margaret Devan, and Moses Farr. James Hopwood was the first class-leader. His successors in that office were Thomas J. Nesmith, William De Ford, Moses Farr, Stephen K. Brown, John Bennington, Sr.

The first preacher for this church was Moses Scott, who was followed by the following-named ministers: Thomas Stynchiam (who afterwards intermarried with the family of "Stonewall" Jackson), John Huntsman, James Robinson, John Burrs, William College, — Porter, — Piper, D. B. Dorsey, James Hopwood, John Scott (now editor of the Methodist Recorder), John Woodruff, Valentine Lucas, Joseph Burns, — Ross, John Stillion, Denton Hughes, P. T. Laisley, Ames Hutton, William Betts, F. H. Davis, Isaac Francis, — Boulton, Henry Palmer, Joel Woods, Jesse Hull, James Phipps, John Tygart, John Patton, John Ratledge, M. Stillwell, P. T. Conaway, Henry Lucas, Geo. G. Conaway, William Wallace, and E. A. Brindley.

Prior to 1833 this church held its services in an old log house which had been fitted up as a school-house.

SABBATH-SCHOOLS.

For a great many years the Methodist Episcopal and Methodist Protestant congregations have had Sabbath-schools here in connection with the churches. The Methodist Episcopal Sabbath-school has been very prosperous during the term of its existence. The present superintendent is Mr. George Hopwood, under whose management it has taken front rank among the live schools of the county; and from the report made at the last county convention of Sabbath-school workers we glean the fact that there were sixty conversions in this school during the year 1880. At present the number of officers, teachers, and scholars on the roll is about two hundred and ninety. Other superintendents and prominent workers have been John Custead, N. H. Black, John S. Dawson, James Reed, O. Devan, J. E. Golf, Monroe Hopwood, Simon Matson, James Williams, A. Hayden, A. Shipley, Daniel Crawford, M. Silbaugh.

THE METHODIST PROTESTANT SABBATH-SCHOOL is at present in excellent condition, and in the past it has done good work. Among the superintendents may be mentioned William Barnes, Thomas G. Barnes, Jacob D. Moore, and Abram Hayden. Prominent among the workers have been Moses Farr, Rhinaldo Farr, Mrs. L. W. Clawson, Mrs. W. N. Canan, and Mrs. Priscilla White. This school has the names of about one hundred and fifty teachers, officers, and scholars upon its roll.

SCHOOLS.

After the death of John Hopwood his academy was discontinued, yet the desire for knowledge had received such an impetus that it never ceased to exist, and to the teachers and the schools the town owes much of its prosperity. One of the earliest teachers was Alexander Clear, a lame man, who had some thirty pupils, and boarded at the home of Moses Hopwood, Sr. Following him were William Downer, J. Muckadoo, Samuel Latbrop, Mr. Rolin, William Hart (a surveyor and teacher), Mr. Sproul, Mr. Canby, John L. Dorsey, Benjamin Hayden, William Ellis, Calvin Watson, Abram Hayden, Messrs. Vandingburg, and — Morton. After this time the common school law of Pennsylvania came into effect, and a stone school-house was built on the site of the present frame building. William Ellis was the first teacher after the enactment of the new school law. At that time Col. Samuel Evans and William Bryson were directors in Union township.

In 1851 the township was divided for school purposes, and the old brick school-house was erected in South Union. The first teacher in this school was J. P. Blair. The school-house was torn down a few years since, and a new brick building erected in its place.

LEVI SPRINGER.

Levi Springer, a notable and characterful man of his times, was born in North Uniontown, Aug. 14, 1777, and died Feb. 15, 1862. His ancestors came to America from Sweden, but his stock was remotely German. The name "Springer" was given, in sport, by an emperor of Germany, in the eleventh century, to a relation of his, in consequence of an adventurous leap by the latter into the river Saale from the castle of Giebichenstein, where he had been imprisoned for an alleged crime. This original Springer was pardoned by the emperor, and his estates and powers also increased.

Dennis Springer, the grandfather of Levi Springer, lived in early life in New Jersey, where he married at Burlington, in 1736, Ann Prickett, where, it is said to be without doubt, Josiah, Levi, Sr., and other children were born to him. Levi, born 1744, married, about 1768, Annie Gaddis, by whom he had seven children,—Drusilla, Abner, Ruth, Annie, William,

1 For the "etymology" of the name Springer, and above-mentioned facts concerning Dennis Springer, the writer is indebted to the "Genealogical Table and History of the Springer Family," by M. C. Springer, of Lincoln, Kan."
Zadoc, and Levi, Jr. His wife died in 1778, and in 1780 he married the widow Sarah Duke (whose maiden name was Shephard), by whom he had eight children,—Sarah, Hannah, Elizabeth, Lydia, Rachel, David, Dennis, and Job. Levi, Sr., died March 26, 1823, and his second wife, Sarah, Oct. 25, 1832. Dennis eventually moved to Virginia, and purchased and settled upon land surveyed to him on Apple-Pie Ridge by George Washington. It was obtained from Fairfax, who resided in the neighborhood. Levi Springer, Sr., lived for a time with his father, Dennis, in Virginia, where he married, and where were born two of his children, with whom and their mother he removed into Fayette County about 1773, and here the younger Levi, as noted above, was born, and here raised, being instructed in childhood, according to the manner of the times, in domestic private schools. Early in life he engaged in boating from Brownsville to New Orleans, La., and frequently made return trips home from that far-off point on horseback through the wilderness, though sometimes coming back by vessel as far as New York. His active lifetime was within a quarter of a mile of his birthplace, which is now in possession of the family of Dennis Springer (deceased), having never been sold since first taken possession of by the elder Levi under the law of "tomahawk improvement."

Mr. Springer after his boating days led the life of a farmer mainly, but occasionally dealt in real estate, and withal became a man of wealth. His judgment of the value of lands and other property was excellent, and leading operators in his vicinity were wont to consult him when proposing to invest their money. He bore an unsullied character for integrity, was a man of large stature, very energetic, of strong will, and, it is said, never failed to accomplish what he undertook. He was an old-line Whig, and afterwards a Republican, taking earnest interest in politics.

In the spring of 1828 he married Catharine Todd, a widow (whose maiden name was Condon), and who had one child, John O. Todd, who resides in North Union township. Mr. and Mrs. Springer (who died in March, 1859) were the parents of three daughters,—Ruth Ann, who married Henry W. Gaddis; Kate, married to John Fuller; and Priscilla G., wife of D. O. Cunningham, of Pittsburgh.

JOHN JONES.

Mr. John Jones is the grandson of one of the first settlers of Hummelstown, near Reading, Pa., and the son of John Jones (Sr.), who migrated, with his wife, from Berks County to Fayette County, and settled in Union township in 1792. His mother was Sarah Lincoln, of Quaker ancestry, the daughter of Mordecai Lincoln, born in the neighborhood of Hummelstown, and of the same stock as Abraham Lincoln, the martyred President. Mr. Jones was born near where he now lives, Oct. 8, 1802, the youngest child, of his parents, who had two sons and three daughters. In childhood Mr. Jones went to the common schools, and enjoyed the instructions of a gentleman who afterwards became the distinguished Judge James Todd, and at sixteen years of age attended a select school for a while. In 1819 he was apprenticed to learn the trade of cabinet-making, at which, as apprentice and journeyman, he continued for five years, during which he took a course of book-keeping. Thereafter for two summers he was occupied with the civil engineers who made the United States surveys for the then contemplated extension of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal westward from Cumberland, under Capt. Shriver. He next engaged for a while in stock-driving, wherein he obtained an experience which has since in life availed him profitably as a stock-raiser and dealer. In 1826 he betook himself to the life of a farmer, stock-raiser, etc., which he has since pursued. In 1835 he bought a farm, which he now occupies, and to which he has added until it now covers about two hundred and forty acres of excellent land, one hundred and twenty acres of which are underlaid with the celebrated nine feet stratum of Connellsville coking coal. On July 36, 1851, he suffered a notable disaster in the destruction of his house and farm buildings, near midnight, through a violent tornado, being then obliged to retreat from his house with a family of thirteen persons. He rebuilt the house and barns in the same year.

Mr. Jones is a life-long Democrat, but not a politician, always averring that he would not accept political office on any condition. He is, and has been for forty-seven years, a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, having been steward nearly all that time. During his long life of eighty years he has borne himself with unquestioned fidelity to duty, and enjoys among his neighbors a high character for probity and honorable business dealing.

He was in June, 1826, united in marriage with Jane Van Horn, of Fayette County, who died Feb. 10, 1879, in her seventy-seventh year, and by whom he had five sons and six daughters, all of whom reached majority, and eight of whom are now living.

SAMUEL M. CLEMENT.

Mr. Samuel M. Clement, of English descent and Quaker stock, was born at Camden, N. J., Aug. 8, 1798, and emigrated thence with his father and family to Fayette County at the age of twelve years. He was educated at the schools of Uniontown, and resided on a farm in North Union township for a number of years. About 1834 he kept a hotel in the mountains at the old Inks stand, half a mile east of Farmington; and about 1835 he and a partner took and prosecuted a valuable contract for macadamizing on the National road, a few miles east of Wheeling,
W. Va. Leaving the mountains he removed to his farm in North Union township, where he conducted for several years, and very successfully, a woolen-mill, which he subsequently converted into a grist-mill that is still in operation. Mr. Clement died Jan. 8, 1876.

He was a gentleman of genial temperament, jovial, possessed of much humor, and of course was very social. Honest in all his business transactions, he was held in high esteem by his neighbors. He was especially remarkable for the purity of his life, and despised all such vices as profanity. Although not a communicant, he attended and aided in the support of the Baptist Church. In politics he was an earnest Republican, and the very last time he left his house it was for the purpose of going to the polls, as a matter of duty to his country as he regarded it. During the war of the Rebellion he was, though too old to go into the field, one of the most ardent of patriots, giving all his moral influence and much of his time and money to the furtherance of the cause of the Union.

In 1823, Mr. Clement married Miss Rebecca Springer, daughter of Jacob Springer, of Uniontown. His wife died only a few months before him, on the 20th of September, 1875. They had nine children, only one of whom is now living, Miss Elizabeth Clement, who resides on the old homestead and skillfully manages the farm.

ISAAC BROWN.

Among the active, practical men who have contributed to the prosperity of Fayette County is the now venerable Isaac Brown, of South Union township, who was born Jan. 4, 1802, in Georges township, less than a mile from his present home. Mr. Brown's grandfather, Emanuel Brown, came from Germany, and was one of the earliest settlers of Fayette County, whose son Abraham, the father of Isaac, settled upon a tract of land lying near Uniontown, on which Isaac Brown now lives, and one of the most valuable tracts of the region. Abraham, the father, was born on the same spot on which Isaac first saw the light. Isaac was married first to Sarah Hutchinson, Aug. 28, 1829. Sarah died July 30, 1834. By this marriage there were three children,—Mary A., who died in infancy; Sarah, who died April 6, 1876; and Phebe A., who married Robert Brownfield. They have one living child, Robert. Isaac was married again Jan. 6, 1839, to Mrs. Mary Jane Grier. To them were born four children,—Caroline, Clarissa, Elizabeth, and Isaac Skiles Brown, who married Helen Moore, and resides upon his father's farm. They have two children,—Carrie May and Isaac. Mary Jane died Sept. 19, 1875.

The rule of Mr. Brown's life has been, "Owe no man anything." He is an acute business man, is hospitable, and respected by his neighbors for his honesty and charity. He has always been an ardent Democrat, casting his first Presidential vote for Andrew Jackson. His memory is retentive, and he delights in relating incidents in the early history of the county. His race is nearly run, and he realizes the truth of the proverbial saying, "Once a man twice a child."

BASIL BROWNFIELD.

Basil Brownfield, one of the most remarkable men who ever lived in Fayette County, or any other part of the world, died at his residence in South Union township, Aug. 21, 1881, in the eighty-sixth year of his age. It is a matter of but little importance from what stock was descended, or where was born and reared, or what special business in life was followed by such a man as he; for nature gave him stature and intellect of such large proportions as to derate or distinguish him from almost any special race of men, —made him a giant, a symmetrical anomaly, who might properly look with contempt down upon whatever ancestral line led up to him, as well as upon his fellow-beings generally. But since Mr. Brownfield left a brief record of what he was pleased to declare his lineage, it is well enough to say here that according to that record he was of Brito-Scotch-Irish stock, and was the great-grandson of Charles Brownfield, who emigrated to America from Ireland before the Revolutionary war, but whose parents were Scotch Presbyterians, who left their native land and settled in Ireland, and who traced their line back to one George Brownfield, a native Briton, who belonged to Cromwell's horse, and went over to Scotland with the great Protector and his army.

Charles, with other members of his family, settled near Winchester, Va., and finally came into Fayette County through the persuasion of the husband of a sister of his, Col. Burt, the builder of Redstone Old Fort, at the mouth of Redstone Creek. Charles remained in the region now known as Fayette County, built a cabin near where stands the present Brownfield Station, on the Southwest Pennsylvania Railroad; was several times dislodged and driven away by the Indians, but at last succeeded in fixing his abode. The first fee simple deed on the records of Fayette County is that of Charles Brownfield, granted to George Troutman, and dated Nov. 29, 1783.

Charles married and became the father of Robert Brownfield, who in his turn had a son, Robert Brownfield, Jr., and this latter Robert was the father of Basil Brownfield, our hero, who was born March 2, 1790, on the Brownfield homestead farm, near Smithfield, Georges township. At the age of twenty-four, March 2, 1820, he married Sarah Collins, daughter of Joseph and Margaret Collins, of Union township. She died Oct. 1, 1870, aged sixty-eight years. They had eleven children,—Joseph C., Robert, Margaret C., who married Jehu, son of Col. Benjamin Brownfield; Mary, who married Isaac Hutchinson, a son of Isaac H., of Union township, but a native of Trenton, N. J., and died Feb. 3, 1857; Eliza, who died unmarried July 20, 1853, in the twenty-fourth year of her age; Sarah N., who married Wm. F. Core; Ruth, who married Joseph Barton, son of the late William Barton, Esq.; William N., who for his first wife married Elizabeth James, and after her death married Elizabeth Sackett; Isaac Allen, who married Sarah Burchfield, of Pittsburgh; Lydia C., wife of Thomas McClelland; and Harriet Helen, who died March 22, 1870, in her twenty-fourth year.

Basil Brownfield enjoyed some, but little, opportunities of early education in the subscription schools, and though quite generally understood by his acquaintances throughout life to be, as they expressed it, "unlettered," in the sense of ignorant of books, investigation discovers that he read books extensively, was particularly well versed in ancient history and in the history of his country, and read the Bible so carefully and appreciatively as to be able to quote it fluently and pertinently upon occasion of warm discussion.

Mr. Brownfield commenced his active business life (dating from about twenty years of age) equipped with little "book-learning," but with extraordinary native intellect, a marvelously retentive memory, and an herculean body. By industry, rare tact, with which from the beginning he was gifted, and by economy, he made his way steadily on to fortune, so that at the age of about thirty-five he was accounted wealthy in the local sense. But at about forty or forty-five years of age, burdened through unfortunate free-hand indorsements and universal bail-giving for others, prompted by his great benevolence, he became financially embarrassed, and mortgaged much of his real estate, but finally managed to lift his burdens. But during this period of financial difficulty his business complications became numerous and vexations, and a career of litigation in his history was inaugurated which won for him a remarkable distinction in the courts, and which continued till the day of his death,—a career in which he was for the most part the victor, by one means and another. Litigation became a recreation to him, obviously a necessity to his happiness. Strong-willed, aggressive, evidently feeling that great intellect, massive muscles, and tireless endurance are "gifts of God" to men with which to fight the battles of life, and the assertion of a powerful manhood a very duty, Mr. Brownfield made of course hosts of enemies to himself, but he had an army of friends; and there was another body of people, neither friends nor foes, who stood aloof, admired the prowess and diplomacy of the man, however much they might have questioned the propriety of some of the weapons with which he fought. These were wont to descend about what a throne this provincial demi-god might have occupied in the world if his education in literature and the sciences had only been fitting to his superb natural gifts. He was doubtless much misunderstood by even those who thought they knew him best; for underlings and the commonality possess no means of measuring the mental capacity or weighing the moral worth, or, for this matter, touching the bottom of the ingenious diabolism, it may be, of the giants about the outskirts of whose being they hang.

But want of space forbids our enlarging on this head. Many legends and stories of more or less truth and some fancy are current regarding Mr. Brownfield's peculiarities, his methods of operation, his eccentricities, his heroic struggles against his foes, his victories, his sagacious demeanor under defeat, turning it often into victory, etc. —such tales, as everywhere, cluster about the memory of extraordinary men; but they mostly lack verity in details, and can hardly be crystallized into permanent history.

Mr. Brownfield's great experience as a litigant made him conversant with the arts of the practice of the law, and gave him very considerable knowledge of common law principles and of the statutes of the State, and his fine intellect was not slow to take the measure of the attorneys who swarmed about the Fayette County courts. He held the most of them in royal contempt. To his mind they were pigmies, and he was wont to say, among other things, of those attorneys and petitfoggers that they were "not fit to feed stock," a declaration which had its great weight with his acquaintances, and probably its effect upon the career of the luckless attorneys, for such men as Brownfield make "public opinion," and, it may be said, the law too. And here a well-authenticated tale regarding him, a peculiar fact in his history, such as possibly never had place in the history of any other man, may be pertinently narrated. The gist of it is this, that Brownfield, in his large-hearted good nature and consummate adroitness, as well as dominating wisdom, was accustomed to freely feed and shelter in his own house his most active, belligerent foes, harboring and nursing them while they were bitterly "lawing" him (to use the provincialism of the county) in the courts. These men were mostly "savages," too, from the mountains, who not only accepted his courtesies when extended, but, knowing his good nature, often quartered themselves unceremoniously upon him, turning their horses into his pastures, and betaking themselves to his table and fireside, when they came down to town to wage legal war upon him. He at one time owned many thousands of acres of land in the mountains, and here and there made clearings therein, put up cabins, and got tenants to occupy them. Almost invariably these fellows quarreled with him, launched suits at law for one cause or other against him, and in the midst of their bitterest legal fights camped at his fireside, as above related.

The reader who admires the tender Christian kindness, the forbearance, the benevolence, and other virtues which Mr. Brownfield surely evinced under such extraordinary circumstances must not suspect him of having indulged in childlike simplicity and imbecility in all this. He knew not only how, with the Christian graces, to draw the temper and dull the edge of his adversary's sword or turn the point of his stiletto, but how as well to catch him at fault, put him in repose, and woo from him the details of his plot and circumvent him. He understood, in short, that it is better to have a legal foe at your fireside and quietly study his weapons than to keep him at bay and be unconscious all the while whether or not he carries dynamite torpedoes in the shape of "testimony" of peculiar coinage, etc., which he may cast and explode under your feet at any time. Mr. Brownfield's great benevolence was not of the crude, undisciplined, indiscriminating kind, though it was often spontaneous and hearty; but his great brain was ever supreme, and probably even his occasional religious zeal was never so hot-tempered as to set his good sense agog.

If Mr. Brownfield at times forgot his great virtues of benevolence, great social virtues, and rigid sense of justice and stooped to the use of questionable arts in his life warfare, it must be said in his defense that he was surrounded by a corrupt set of men, some of them, too, men of comparatively good education, able jurists, for example, who when off the bench kept the ermine spotless by hanging it away out of sight while they systematically wallowed in the mire of business hypocrisies, and attempted to, and sometimes did, plunder Brownfield himself,—in short, surrounded by pious knives of all kinds, and of a high degree of "respectability," and who, like Basil himself, belonged to churches which were for the most part cages for unclean birds; and Brownfield was, in a sense, compelled to fight these wretches with their own weapons, and learned of them what may have been bad in his life and ways. It is safe to say that with his large nature he was always better than his surroundings.

That the poor, who through his whole life enjoyed his largesses, sorely felt his loss and tenderly mourned him dead, speaks volumes for the man. And it should be added regarding him that he so profited by the iniquities which he discovered hidden under the cloaks of his fellow church-members and members of communions other than his as to be aroused to strong suspicion that church membership is not necessarily a sure road to "glory." Indeed, he was bitter in denunciation of some church-members, and as he had doubts at last about the existence of an orthodox "hell," he seemed to think that there could be no suitable home for them in the future.

But even Basil Brownfield, who potently "lives after he is dead," the favorite public sobriquet of whom, "Black Hawk," a name which when associated with his will and brawn bore terror to evil-doers, living and to live on forever in history, even this "Black Hawk" Basil must not be allowed too much space in this history, though eventful and wonderful was his life, and this sketch must come to a close. Perhaps nothing more fitting in its ending could be added than the following extract from an obituary notice of him, published editorially in the Genius of Liberty of Unióntown, Aug. 25, 1881, four days after Mr. Brownfield's death:

"His neighbors bear testimony that he was a man of good impulses, and was always ready to forgive an injury when he was approached in a proper way.

"His physiognomy had the impress of greatness strongly marked in every lineament, and we venture to say that no man ever lived and died in Fayette County with a stronger cast of expression. Mr. Brownfield was a pleasant and agreeable gentleman, and his home was always open for the reception of his friends and neighbors, and whilst he was always able to impart correct knowledge of the secular things that had transpired around and about him for more than threescore and ten years, he was notable as a good listener, which is a sure indication of a well-balanced mind."

This was written of the wonderful man when near the close of a life of eighty-six years, in far-lengthened old age, when most men of like years would be passing through second childhood into the nursed infancy of drivelling dotage. Brownfield had no peer in his domain, and nature's monarchs, unclassified, spring from and found no races. Their histories, like their lives, are grandly individuate, and other men record but cannot imitate them.

J. W. Moore.

Mr. J. W. Moore, a portrait of whom appears in this work, is a resident of Greensburg, Westmoreland County, in which county he owns extensive tracts of coal lands, and has other possessions, but he is also largely interested in the manufacture of coke in Fayette County, especially at the coke-works of J. W. Moore & Co., in South Union township.

WILLIAM BARTON.

William Barton, who was born in New Jersey, Sept. 13, 1795, of Quaker stock, and of English ancestry, came into Fayette County with his parents at about twelve years of age. He enjoyed good advantages of education for the times, and in early life was occupied for some years as clerk and manager of a furnace in Unióntown.

On Nov. 28, 1824, he married Mrs. Hannah Collins Foster (born Oct. 28, 1795), widow of John Foster, a captain in the regular army in the war of 1812, and daughter of Thomas Collins, of Unióntown, who was a colonel in the same war, and at one time sheriff of Fayette County, a man of great business capacity. Soon after marriage Mr. Barton settled with his wife
Nicholson Township

Nicholson Township lies south of German and north of Springhill township. Its area is over twenty square miles, and its topography is similar to that of all the western portion of the county. Along the river, from the mouth of Georges Creek to that of Jacob's Creek, the river-bluffs crowd close upon the river, in many places leaving scarcely enough space to form a road. From Jacob's Creek down to Catt's Run are the broad flats known as "Provan's Bottoms." The principal stream, next to the river, is Jacob's Creek, near the centre. Georges Creek receives several considerable affluent on the south, and Catt's Run several small ones on the north. The soil is generally very fertile, being for the most part heavy limestone. Wheat, corn, oats, and other grains are produced in great abundance.

Nicholson township was formed of territory taken from the old townships of Springhill, German, and Georges. The first movement (unsuccessful) towards forming a new township from parts of these townships was made a little more than forty years ago, as follows:

At the September term of court, 1841, a petition was presented "of divers inhabitants of Springhill, Georges, and German townships for a new township, to be composed of parts of the aforesaid townships, to be called "Gallatin."" Thomas Boyd, of Bullskin, George Craft, of Redstone, and George Dawson, of Brownsville, were appointed commissioners. A favorable report was made, and approved Dec. 11, 1841. On the 11th of June, 1842, objections were filed, which were confirmed by the court on the 24 of January, 1843, and thus the proceedings of Dec. 11, 1841, were rendered void and of no effect.

The effort was renewed with success in 1845. At the June session of the court in that year, "On the petition of divers inhabitants of Springhill, George, and German for a new township, to be composed of parts of the aforesaid townships, to be called 'Nicholson,' James Paull, James H. Patterson, and Jacob Murphy were appointed commissioners. . . . to lay out a new township to be called Nicholson out of parts of Springhill, George, and German townships." On the 19th of August, 1845, these commissioners reported, "That a new township should be made within the following boundaries, to wit: Beginning at the mouth of Georges Creek: thence up the same to Robert Long’s falling-mill; thence along the Morgantown road to a point at or near Rev. A. G. Fairchild’s; thence by a road as far as Bonaparte Hardin’s; thence by a straight line to the northwest branch of York’s Run to a stone-pile near a white-oak; thence [by various courses and distances] to a stone in Catt’s Run, westwardly of Jacob Emley’s, and on land of George Defenbaugh, about three perches from a spring-house; thence down Catt’s Run to the land or farm of John Poundstone, where the road crosses said run; thence by said road, running north of said Poundstone's house, nearly due west to the Monongahela River; thence up said river to the place of beginning."

On the 19th of December, 1845, this report was approved and confirmed by the court, and by this action Nicholson was erected a township with the above-described boundaries.

In the December session of court, 1846, a petition was presented "to change part of the boundary line between George and Nicholson townships." An order was issued and viewers appointed, viz.: John Robinson, Isaac Core, and Jeremiah Kendall, who made a report on the 26th of February, 1847, favorable to a change in the line between Nicholson and Georges townships, the effect of which was to include the petitioners, John Harris, James Abram, and Henry Bowell, in the township of Nicholson. The report was approved and confirmed by the court June 12, 1847, making the change of boundary as prayed for by the petitioners.

The name Nicholson was given to the township in honor of James Witter Nicholson, a noted citizen of New Geneva. He was the second son of Commodore James Nicholson, U.S.N., who became senior officer in the navy October, 1776, and who died in New York, Sept. 2, 1804. His mother was Frances Witter, a native of Maryland, as was also her husband, James W. Nicholson was born April 20, 1773, his parents residing on Nicholson manor, near Nicholson Gap, Md. His wife was Ann Griffin. He was employed by Albert Gallatin to manage the financial affairs of his glass-factory on Georges Creek, one mile east of New Geneva, which he established in 1794. Nicholson died at his residence, Oct. 6, 1831, aged seventy-eight years. His property was known in the early land titles as "Elk Hill;" title dated June 26, 1770. He was a brother of Albert Gallatin's second wife. Charles N. Nicholson is his grandson.

One of the earliest settlers within the territory now Nicholson township was George Wilson, who came to this section about the year 1765, and settled on Georges Creek. From the time of his first settlement here he appears to have been a notable man among the pioneers of the Monongahela Valley, and he, with Thomas Scott, of Dunlap's Creek, were marked by Lord Dunmore, and arrested by his order, in 1774, as chief among the Pennsylvania adherents in the territorial controversy between this State and Virginia, which was then at its height. It was at the house of George Wilson that the Rev. John McMillan stopped when he first preached to the Mount Moriah congregation in 1775. On the breaking out of the Revolution Wilson entered the Revolutionary army in the Eighth Pennsylvania Regiment, and became its lieutenant-colonel. Referring to him, and to his honorable career, Judge Veech says,—

"Col. George Wilson is a historic character. He was a Virginian, from Augusta County, where he had been an officer in the French and Indian war of 1755-62. He came to the West about 1768-69 [Mr. Veech has the date about three years too late, and settled on the land where New Geneva now is, owning the land on the river on both sides of Georges Creek, to which it is believed he gave the name, and being from a locality in Augusta called Spring Hill, he caused that name to be given to the township in which he resided. He was a Pennsylvania justice of the peace there while it was a part of Bedford County, and his commission was renewed for Westmoreland. Pennsylvania had no more resolute officer than he was in all the boundary troubles. . . . He died in the service of his country as lieutenant-colonel of the Eighth Pennsylvania Regiment, Col. Enos McKay, at Quibblenton, N. J., in April, 1777."

His family received the first intelligence of his death from his black servant, who returned from New Jersey with the colonel's horse. Of the children of Col. George Wilson little is known with certainty, except that William George, John, and Jane were three of them. Jane married, for her first husband, a man named Bullitt, who proved a spendthrift and ran through his wife's patrimony. She was at one time the owner of the farms now owned by Jason Woolsey and Daniel Sharpnack, as also of many acres of other lands. After Bullitt's death she married Mr. Hawkins, an excellent man of the Friends' Society. By him she had children, among whom the most widely known was the Hon. William George Hawkins, of Pittsburgh. After a few years Mr. Hawkins died, and his widow married, for her third husband, Gen. John Minor, of Greene County, by whom she had two children,—Lawrence L. Minor, Esq., of Greensboro, Greene Co., and Minerva, who married John Crawford, of Greensboro, and who died in 1864, aged about fifty-six years. Her son, Lient. John Minor Crawford, served in the war of the Rebellion in the Eighty-fifth Pennsylvania Regiment, and is now a resident of Greensboro, Greene Co., Pa.

When the Rev. John Steele and other commissioners were sent to the Monongahela country, in 1768, to ascertain what settlements had been made here, they reported to the Governor the names of those found settled in this region, and among them were mentioned living "near Redstone," "John Wiseman, Henry Prisser, William Linn, William Colvin, John Vervalson, Abraham Teagard, Thomas Brown, Richard Rodgers, Henry Swazt, James McLean, Jesse Martin, Adam Hatton, John Verval, Jr., James Waller, Thomas Donter, Capt. Coburn, John Delong, Gabriel Conn, George Martin, Thomas Down, Andrew Guidgeon, Philip Sute, James Crawford, John Peters, Michael Hootor, Daniel McCoy, Josiah Crawford, one Providence." Of these, several can be located. Gabriel Conn was an early settler in the Monongahela Valley, where many of the descendants are found to-day. The Crawfords were located in what is now Southwestern Luzerne; Abraham Teagard, on Big Whiteley Creek, in Greene County, where the name is common, several residing in Jefferson and other places in the same county. The “One Province” evidently means John W. Provance, who resided on the river bottom between Jacob’s Creek and Catt’s Run, in Nicholson township, and who settled there in 1767.

William Yard Provance was also one of the very early settlers on the Monongahela in the same section. In the early years of their residence here an old Indian chief named Bald Eagle lived in or frequented the valley of the Monongahela. He was on the most friendly terms with the white settlers, and in passing up and down the river on his hunting and fishing expeditions never failed to stop to visit the Provances. Finally, while hunting at some point up the river (supposed to be near the mouth of Cheat), he was murdered in cold blood by three white men named Jacob Scott, William Hacker, and Elijah Runer, who after doing the deed thrust a piece of cornbread into the mouth of the dead chief, and placed the lifeless body in an upright position in the canoe, which was then sent adrift on the river. It floated slowly down the stream, and finally came close in shore opposite the residence of Mrs. Sarah Provance, who saw it, and wondered that the Bald Eagle maintained his motionless position in the canoe, making no movement to land. Going down to the bank she made a closer observation and learned the truth, that he was dead. She procured assistance, had the body brought ashore, and buried in a Christian way. The Indians were greatly enraged when they learned of the unprovoked murder, but they were as deeply grateful to Mrs. Provance and her family for the respect they had shown to the remains of the murdered chief. The bones of Bald Eagle still rest in an unmarked and unknown grave by the Monongahela, near the place where the old Provance house stood more than a century ago. The Provances were noted for their size and muscular powers as well as for their love of all athletic sports. Many of the descendants of the family still reside in Fayette County. By some of them the name has been changed to Provis, one of them being Jacob Provis, of Masontown, who is a representative in the State Legislature from Fayette County.

The brothers John Hardin and Martin Hardin have already been mentioned as among the first settlers in the Monongahela Valley. All of Martin Hardin’s family afterwards removed to Kentucky, and became prominent citizens of that State. They are mentioned in Marshall’s “History of Kentucky,” in which it is stated that Martin Hardin, who was the father of the somewhat famous Col. John Hardin, of Kentucky, emigrated from Fauquier County, Va., to Georges Creek, in Fayette County, Pa., within what is now Nicholson township, when his son John was twelve years old. That was in 1765. Not long after their arrival on Georges Creek there came Indian troubles, and the situation of the settlers became precarious and alarming, but they held their position and did not abandon their possessions, as was the case with many other settlers.

The location of John Hardin, Sr., was upon a tract of land which he called “Choice,” containing three hundred and nineteen and a quarter acres and allowance. The warrant for this tract was dated April 17, 1769. It was surveyed May 22d of the same year. On this tract he made his residence, and lived on it until his death. Martin Hardin located a tract named “Harlout,” of three hundred and seventeen and a quarter acres and allowance, warranted April 17, 1769, and surveyed on the 22d of May, 1770. He emigrated to Kentucky in or soon after the year 1789. His son John (afterwards Col. John Hardin) went to Kentucky in that year, and took up lands for himself and friends in Nelson County, afterwards Washington County, in that State, but returned to Fayette County, and remained here six years longer before he finally removed to Kentucky. In Dunmore’s war of 1774 he (John Hardin, Jr.) served with a militia company as an ensign. In the Revolution, in the year 1776, he joined the Eighth Pennsylvania Regiment, and became a lieutenant in one of the companies. In December, 1779, he resigned, and returned home to Georges Creek, declining the proffered promotion to the rank of major in a new regiment. In 1784 he received the nomination for sheriff of Fayette County, and was returned to the Executive Council as one of the two candidates receiving the highest number of votes. On that occasion and under those circumstances Gen. James Wilkinson asked the Council to commission Hardin as sheriff in a letter addressed to President Dickinson, of the Council, dated November, 1784, and running as follows:

"... On the present return of the Election for Fayette County, Major John Harden stands second for the Sheriff’s Office; permit me briefly to state to your Excellency this man’s merit without detesting from that of his competitor. Mr. Harden served in the alert of the Army under Generals (then Colonels) Morgan & Butler, in the Northern Campaign 1777. His rank was that of a Lieutenant, and I can, as the Adjutant General of the Army of States, assert that he was exposed to more danger, encountered greater Fatigue, and performed more real service than any other officer of his Station. With Parties never exceeding 20 men, he in the Course of the Campaign made upwards of sixty Prisoners, and at a Personal Encounter in the rear of the Enemy’s position, he killed a Mohawk express, & brought in the dispatches which he was conveying from Genl. Burgoyne to the Commanding Officer at Ticonderoga with the loss only (indeed) of a Lock of Hair, which the Indian’s Fire carried away. It is sufficient for me Sir to testify his merits; the Justice which characterizes your administration will do the rest."

In 1786 he removed his family to the new settlement in Kentucky, where his father and brothers had preceeded him. In the same year he volunteered under George Rogers Clarke for the expedition against the Indians on the Wabash, and was appointed quartermaster. He was afterwards engaged in the succeeding Indian campaigns in Ohio and Indiana, and rose to the rank of colonel. He was killed in the campaign against the Miami villages in the fall of 1792. A son of his was killed Feb. 23, 1847, at the battle of Buena Vista, under Gen. Taylor, in Mexico.

Miss Martha Hardin, a granddaughter of John Hardin, Sr., now living in Nicholson township in her eighty-sixth year, gives the following account of the family of which she is a member: The Hardins, she says, came originally from France. John Hardin, Sr., Martin Hardin, and Lydia Hardin (who became Mrs. Tobin) were brothers and sister. John Hardin, Sr., married Isabella Shubranch, by whom he had eleven children, viz.: John, Absalom, Henry, Nestor, George, Cato, Hector, Mary Ann, Miriam, Matilda, and Alice. He died in Fayette County, and his wife survived him many years. Martin Hardin married Elizabeth Hoagland, by whom he had seven children besides Col. John. He (Martin) emigrated from Fayette County, as before mentioned, to Kentucky, and lived in the latter State until his death, though he revisited his old home in (then) Springhill township, and the narrator recollects that when she was a little girl she saw him here on one of those visits. All the Hardins of Kentucky, she says, are his descendants.

Lydia Hardin, sister of John and Martin, married Thomas Tobin, from which marriage came the family of Tobins of Fayette County.

Robert McLain was a Scotchman who settled in Nicholson township, south of the mouth of Catt's Run, on the bank of the Monongahela River. He was an elder of the Mount Moriah Presbyterian Church of Springhill, which was organized by the Rev. James Power in 1774. Among the early settlers he was highly esteemed and respected. He was so unfortunate as to be compelled to kill a fellow-being to save himself and family from being burned to death. The region along the Monongahela was infested by a band of robbers, called "Bainbridge's Gang," with headquarters at a high bluff of the river, now owned by Jesse E. McWilliams, and known as the Robbers' Den. McLain was the owner of a very valuable stallion, which they resolved to take. McLain having been notified of their intention, stabled his horse in the kitchen of his house. When they arrived they soon discovered the whereabouts of the horse, and commanded McLain to bring him out. Receiving no reply, they warned him that unless he did as they bade him his house would be fired. Still receiving no an-aver, Bainbridge commanded some of his men to get straw, and he would show the d—d Scotchman whether his commands were to be disregarded. Seizing the straw and advancing to execute his threat, McLain fired, killing him instantly. He was then carried off by some of the gang, who wrapped the body in a bed coverlet, with stones, and sunk it in the Monongahela. Mr. McLain, in the later years of his life, was greatly troubled in mind by the recollection of this justifiable homicide. Mr. John Bowman (deceased), grandfather of Morgan H. Bowman, Esq., of Uniontown, told the writer that Robert McLain frequently visited his father's house, and that he had often heard him express his deep regret for having killed the desperado Bainbridge. The date of Mr. McLain's death has not been ascertained. His remains lie in the McLain burial-ground, in Nicholson.

Isaac Griffin was one of the pioneer settlers, as well as one of the most prominent men in public and private life for many years in what is now Nicholson township, owning a large amount of land here, a part of which is known as the Morris farm. He was a native of Delaware, being born and reared in Kent County in that State. Although wild and reckless while young, he won the heart of a young Quakeress, named Mary Morris, whose family were strict Friends. She was locked in a room up-stairs to prevent her union with the young worldling. He found out the situation, obtained a ladder, put it to the window, and she climbed down and eloped with him. This bit of romance has been handed down in that neighborhood to this day. A meeting of the Friends was called, when she was notified that "If thee will say thee is sorry that thee married Isaac, thee can stay in." But as she would not say it she was expelled from their membership.

Isaac Griffin was a captain in the war of the Revolution, and had a great deal of trouble with the Tories, who were very numerous in Delaware. He was mainly instrumental in capturing their leader, Chany Clow, who was executed. When Clow came home from the Tory camp, Capt. Griffin with his company, and accompanied by Maj. Moore, surrounded the house. It was dark, and in attempting to reach the door Griffin stumbled and fell. Maj. Moore got ahead of him and was shot dead by Clow, who said he was sorry it was not Griffin. The adherents of Clow hated Griffin intensely, and after the close of the war his personal safety was endangered. This in part caused him to change his residence. He bought his first lands in Springhill (now Nicholson) township, Fayette Co., Pa., of the Hardins, but the Indians lingering near, his wife feared to move there. He then traded his Western lands to his relative, Charles Griffin, for a farm in Delaware, where the town of Clayton now stands. His wife having lost her health, and his enemies constantly harassing him, she finally consented to go to Western Pennsylvania. He again visited the West and bought land of the Evans'. He afterwards bought several farms, and became one of the most successful stock-raisers on the Monongahela.

Mr. Griffin owned a few negro slaves that he brought with him to Fayette County. Soon after he became a citizen of Pennsylvania the Governor appointed him justice of the peace, in 1794, in which capacity he served several years. In 1807 he was elected to the Legislature, and re-elected until he served four successive terms. In 1809 there were six candidates for the office, but Mr. Griffin ran far ahead of all the others, receiving the entire vote of Fayette County with the exception of about two hundred votes. Although living in the opposite end of Fayette County from Mr. John Smilie, Mr. Griffin was appointed by that gentleman one of the executors of his will, and at his death in 1812 Mr. Griffin was elected to Congress as Mr. Smilie’s successor. It is related of him that upon being notified of his election he brought cloth of home manufacture to Thomas Williams, Esq., of New Geneva, for the purpose of having him make him a suit of clothes. He informed the persons present that “he raised the sheep, carded, spun, dyed, and wove the cloth on his own premises.” At a mass-meeting in Uniontown he was nominated for Congress by acclamation. At the election his competitor was Gen. Thomas Meason, a prominent member of the Fayette County bar. He defeated Gen. Meason by a large majority, and was once re-elected without opposition. He served in the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Congresses. In 1812 a gloom was cast over him by the death of his favorite son, James Morris Griffin, who was killed in battle in the war with England.

Mr. Griffin voted to sustain Mr. Madison in all his war measures, and ever enjoyed his confidence, as well as that of his constituents. For no vote that he gave during the ten years that he was in public life was he censured, but for a vote that he did not give he was blamed. It was said that when the vote was taken to increase the pay of members of Congress he was not in the house. He felt stung by the comments of a writer in his home paper, and would not allow his name used as a candidate for re-election.

In 1824, Mr. Griffin was the Crawford electoral candidate for the Fayette district, but was of course defeated, as the State went largely for Jackson. Mr. Griffin could never be induced to make a public speech, but his conversational powers were of a high order, and these made him a general favorite. The ablest men of the nation would with pleasure listen to hear him talk. His personal dislike to Gen. Jackson was caused by the hanging of Alexander Arbuthnot and Robert C. Ambrister in Florida after they were cleared by court-martial. This opposition to Gen. Jackson caused Mr. Griffin to lose his great popularity among his neighbors, where Jackson was a great favorite.

Mr. Griffin had features of the Roman type, with black hair and deep-blue eyes. In height he was six feet two inches, and had a powerful physical organization. Although he was modest and retiring he possessed a chivalric nature, and he was not slow to resent an insult. While in Congress he had a difficulty with a member from South Carolina, which would have been a serious affair but for the timely interference of other members. At a public dinner in Uniontown an Englishman, who was an officer of the old Uniontown Bank, spoke of Mrs. Madison in the most disgraceful terms, and for this act of ill-breeding Mr. Griffin knocked him down at the table, an act for which he was greatly applauding at the time.

Soon after he settled in his new home in Fayette County his wife joined Father Woodbridge’s Seventh-Day Baptist Church, and remained a consistent member until her death, which occurred in her eightieth year, although she had been an invalid for fifty years. Her husband, although not a member, gave his support to the regular Baptist Church. This caused them to have a Sabbath and a Sunday in their house for about forty years, but this occasioned no jar, for everything moved on smoothly, and they traveled life’s pathway harmoniously, although differing widely in most things. After Mr. Griffin retired from public life he remained on his farm until his death, at the age of seventy years, occasioned by a fall from a loaded wagon. The Rev. John Patton, of the Baptist Church, who performed the funeral service, said, “Mr. Griffin did not attach himself to the church for reasons best known to himself, but he was an Israelite indeed in whom there was no guile.” His wife survived him several years. They had ten children, four sons and six daughters, all of whom survived their father except the sons James M. and Isaac. One of the daughters, Ann, married James W. Nicholson. She resided during her life near New Geneva. Charles Nicholson is the only representative of this branch of the family remaining. Mary Griffin married Andrew Oliphant, Joseph E. Griffin was formerly a member of the State Legislature from Fayette County, and is now living in Texas. William P. Griffin is of the original stock, a descendant of Isaac and Mary Griffin.

Robert Ross was an early settler. It does not appear that in the early part of the Revolutionary war he was reckoned among the adherents of the patriot cause, but in June, 1779, he took the oath of allegiance to Pennsylvania, and afterwards served to the end of the war under Gen. Anthony Wayne. At the close of the struggle he, like thousands of others, was paid the arrears due him for services in Continental money, which was depreciated to one-fortieth of its face value. He afterwards served in the various Indian campaigns in Ohio and Indiana, rising to the rank of captain. In the Whiskey Insurrection of 1794, Capt. Ross was on the side of the insurgents, and commanded a company of about one hundred men of the western and southwestern parts of the county, a part of the (supposed) available force of the insurrectionists to be used in opposition to the government. At the head of this company Capt. Ross marched to Uniontown in August, 1794, to raise the "liberty poles" in the town, and two miles south of it at Gaddis' place. When Gen. Lee came in with his army to suppress the insurrection, a squadron of cavalry was sent towards the Monongahela for the capture of Robert Ross as insurgent leader, but the expedition was unsuccessful. The powder-horn and other Revolutionary accoutrements of Capt. Ross are in the possession of his grandsons in Iowa. Another of his grandsons is the Hon. Moses A. Ross, of Somerset County, Pa.

In Nicholson, on the road leading from Masontown to New Geneva, via the "Goose Neck," is a tract of land on which was the settlement of a Mr. Graham, who came there from Washington County, Pa. On this he erected a mill and distillery, some vestiges of which are still in existence, located on Jacob's Creek. Graham having become heavily indebted to Jesse Evans (father of Col. Samuel Evans, now living near Uniontown), sold this property to one Haught. The buildings were destroyed by fire soon afterwards. Graham emigrated to Cincinnati, Ohio, where he became engaged in the manufacture of paper. It has been said of him that he was a brother-in-law of President William H. Harrison, but this is not known to have been a fact.

The first white men who visited the place where now stands the village of New Geneva were William Childers, John Pringle, Samuel Pringle, and Joseph Lindsey, soldiers belonging to the garrison of Fort Pitt, who deserted from the post in the year 1761, and traveled up the Monongahela to this place, at the mouth of Georges Creek, but before the stream had ever been known by that name. They remained here but a short time, however, and not liking the location moved eastward to the upper waters of the Youghiogheny, where they lived in the "Glades" region for about a year, and then moved southward into Virginia, and lived for some years on the waters of Buckhannon River.

These men, however, could not in any sense be regarded as even temporary settlers on the Monongahela, the first person who actually settled at or in the vicinity of the site of New Geneva being Col. George Wilson, who, as has already been mentioned, came there about 1765, and gave to the creek his own name,—George,—and thus to the township, when it was formed (embracing the south part of what is now Nicholson), the name of Springhill, from his former home in Virginia. His residence on Georges Creek, however, was not directly at the mouth, but a short distance above it, and his first purchase of land here did not include to the bank of the Monongahela, where Geneva village stands. This was warranted to Col. Wilson's sons, Sept. 15, 1783, eight years after their father's death. The title afterwards passed to Albert Gallatin.

The first actual and permanent settler within the town limits was Thomas Williams, a native of Delaware, and a tailor by trade. The precise date of his settlement here is not known, but it was not far from the close of the Revolutionary war. On the 19th of February, 1793, he married Joanna Phillips, daughter of Theophilus Phillips, who was one of the earliest settlers in this section, but on the south side of Georges Creek. Thomas Williams became a somewhat prominent man, and was one of the most highly respected citizens of the township. He received the appointment of justice of the peace in or about 1797, and served in that office satisfactorily to the people and creditably to himself until his death in 1857, a period of forty years. His son, Joseph G. Williams, also filled the office of justice of the peace in Nicholson for thirty-five years.

From the time when Thomas Williams settled here a few other settlers gathered round him from time to time, until a number of straggling dwellings had clustered on the river-bank and on the bluff above it, and in the early days, before the present name had been given to the village, these little groups of houses had received the names of "Wilson Port" and "George Town," applied respectively to the settlement on the river margin and to that on the bluff, the two embracing the two names of the early proprietor of the neighboring lands, George Wilson.

The title to lands embracing the site on the river being purchased by Mr. Gallatin, as before mentioned, he laid out upon it the town of New Geneva, so named by him from Geneva, in his native Switzerland. The "charter" was acknowledged by Mr. Gallatin before Justice Isaac Griffin, Oct. 31, 1797, the town plat bearing date the 28th of the same month.

The building of the old glass-works in the vicinity by Gallatin and his partners, and the establishment of the gun-factory, together with the residence of Mr. Gallatin and some other persons of note in the vicinity, gave to New Geneva (as the post-town of the surrounding country) a considerable growth and much prospective importance, which latter, however, has proved to a great extent delusive. In 1797 the impending danger of a foreign war and the passage of an act to procure twenty thousand stand of arms for the State, as also similar action in other States and by the general government, led to the establishment of gun-factories in various parts of the country, and among these was the one established by Albert Gallatin and Melchoir Baker near New Geneva in 1799, for the manufacture of muskets, broadswords, and other arms. It was located in that part of Springhill township which is now Nicholson, on land now or recently owned by Philip Keefover. The establishment employed from fifty to one hundred men. In 1800 the State contracted with this establishment for two thousand muskets, and about the same time the firm received an order from the general government for a large number of arms. In 1801, when Mr. Gallatin was about being called to the head of the Treasury Department, he came from Washington to New Geneva, and closed out his interest in the factory of his partner, Mr. Baker, because his prospective position as Secretary of the Treasury would render it improper for him to be privately concerned in contracts to which he would of necessity be a party on behalf of the government. Mr. Baker continued the business for several years and with some success until the government armories at Harper’s Ferry and Springfield, Mass., were established, when he abandoned the gun-works in Fayette County and removed to Clarksburg, Va.

A memorable event in the history of New Geneva was the visit, in 1825, of the Marquis de Lafayette to Albert Gallatin, at the residence of the latter, at “Friendship Hill,” on the south side of Georges Creek, in Springhill township. To reach that place he would pass through the town of New Geneva, and the time of his arrival had been announced a sufficient time in advance to give an opportunity to make preparations for a fitting reception.

“The streets were swept perfectly clean, the dwellings decorated, and the inhabitants, dressed in their best, patiently awaited the arrival of the distinguished foreigner. For the purpose of escorting the General to Gallatin’s they had raised a company of men, who were commanded by Captain Joseph Wood, with James W. Nicholson as first lieutenant. These men escorted the General and his suite through the town, he the while standing uncovered in his carriage, responding to the salutations of the citizens. Having arrived, he was conducted to Gallatin’s house, where the speeches of welcome and reply were made. Lunch was served to all upon the ample grounds. After the speech-making and dining, several survivors of the Revolution were called for by the Marquis. Frederick Eberhart, who assisted in bearing the wounded General from the disastrous field of Brandywine, was there. The meeting between these old comrades was most affecting; they embraced and wept like children.” After the ceremonies and festivities were concluded, Lafayette and suite, accompanied by Mr. Gallatin, returned to Uniontown, from whence the Marquis proceeded on his way to Pittsburgh.

Manufacturing has always been carried on to some extent in New Geneva, though the high hopes that were indulged in that direction on the establishment of the old glass-works and gun-factory, more than eighty years ago, are long since dead and almost forgotten. In 1837, Andrew Kramer, Baltzer Kramer, Theophilus P. Kramer, and Philip Reitz established a glass-factory here. The style of the firm was Andrew Kramer & Co. The brand was the same as that of Albert Gallatin and the Kramers, who established the first factory on Georges Creek in 1794, viz., “New Geneva Glass.” The last glass made in this factory was by John C. Gabler and Charles Kramer, in 1857. The sheriff had sold the works. Alexander Crow became the owner, and sold to William H. Sheldon, and he to Isaac P. Eberhart. Mr. Eberhart has demolished the factory, and the lot is cultivated for garden produce, which pays better than a glass-factory so far from the needful material.

In 1840, William James established a foundry here. After running it for a season, Shealor & Merryman bought it and began making the celebrated cook-stoves known as “Drum Stoves.” The patent was granted to J. J. Anderson, Aug. 17, 1843. These stoves had a large sale and were considered perfect. The foundry has not run since the war of the Rebellion. Just on the river-side of town stood the “Old River Mill,” of whose erection none can tell. It belonged to a class of mills now only found far up the head-waters of the Monongahela. During dry seasons it did all the grinding for miles around. Daniel Hough has the only mill now. The French Mills were located on Georges Creek. They now belong to Warwick Ross’ heirs.

The town of New Geneva is located in the extreme southwestern corner of Nicholson township, having Georges Creek on the south, and the Monongahela River as its west line. Its site embraces the river bottom, the bluff above, and intermediate levels. The streets, except along the river and creek, are in most parts steep and difficult. There are few pretentious buildings here, either business structures or residences. The town is antiquated, and has little of the modern look, yet a considerable amount of business is done from this point, chiefly on the river, this being practically the head of slack-water navigation on the Monongahela. The fine steamers “Geneva,” “Germania,” and “James G. Blaine,” belonging to the Pittsburgh, Brownsville and New Geneva Packet Company, make daily trips from this town to Pittsburgh, compensating in a great degree for the lack of railroad facilities.

Among the buildings, institutions, and business of the town are included a post-office (established before the year 1800), signal service station, two school buildings, six stores, a grocery, warehouse and commission business, three eating-houses, wagon-shop, blacksmith-shop, a merchant tailor’s establishment, two physicians, two pottery-works, a saw-mill and grist-mill (built by A. B. & M. Eberhart in 1837), three religious organizations,—Presbyterian, Baptist, and Methodist,—and two hundred and eighty-six inhabitants, according to the United States census of 1880.

The only places in Nicholson township besides New Geneva which can claim any approach to town or village importance are Anderson and Woodward’s Cross-Roads. The former has a post-office, two stores, and a blacksmith-shop, and is the polling-place for the township. Woodward’s Cross-Roads has a store and several dwellings.

The township contains a number of saw-mills and grist-mills. Among these are the Gray grist- and saw-mills, Poundstone grist- and saw-mill, and Honacker’s saw-mill. Many years ago Peter Johnson carried on a foundry on Jacob's Creek, which is now abandoned.

SCHOOLS.
Before the passage of the common-school law of Pennsylvania, schools in this section, as elsewhere, were supported by subscription, but they were few and of low grade, and were generally taught but a few weeks in the year. In 1811 a school was taught here by the Rev. James Dunlap, a Presbyterian clergyman, who had among his scholars at that time James Nicholson, Thomas Nicholson, Jr., David Bradford, Jr., and Samuel Evans, who is now living, an octogenarian, on his fine estate near Uniontown. Under the free-school system, inaugurated by the law of 1834, the following-named school-houses have been built, viz., two in New Geneva, and one in each of the following-named districts: "Woolsey's," "Griffin's," "Robinson's," "Dogwood," "Pleasant Hill," and "Valley." CHURCHES.

MOUNT MORAIA CHURCH.
The records of Fayette County show that a Presbyterian Church was building in Springhill township as early as 1773. The land upon which the church was erected (about four acres) was purchased of Joseph Caldwell. The following is taken from the records of the church:

"The congregation was organized as a church by Rev. James Power, of New Castle Presbytery, in 1774. The elders were Robert McLain, James Pollock, Theophilus Phillips, Thomas Ramsey, William Hill, Abram Crow. Rev. James Power in 1776 settled with his family on Georges Creek, where he continued to reside for some years. In 1778, Rev. James Dunlap preached for the congregation. Many important changes took place about this time, the most notable being the organization of the Redstone Presbytery. The Georges Creek or Mount Moriah Church divided in 1781, the members north of Georges Creek organizing the 'Old Frame,' thus becoming the principal church and assuming control of the mother or Mount Moriah Church, the whole congregation being known as the 'Mount Moriah Church.' Rev. James Findley preached the regular sermon, and Henry Robinson, Joseph Caldwell, Robert Richey, Robert McLain, David Frame, and William Hill were ordained elders. This was in 1788. The church was without a regular pastor. The supplies were Revs. Thaddeus Dod, James Hughes, Joseph Patton, James Dunlap, Samuel Porter, and others. In 1789 they purchased of Richard Brown a log house twenty by twenty, which answered their purpose. It was used as a church in winter, but during the summer the congregation worshiped in an adjoining grove. Robert Findley preached as supply in 1790-91, the church adding to their ground by a purchase made of Isaac Phillips, Esq. By alterations the house (now a frame) was enlarged to forty-eight by thirty-six, and to Robert Findley were added as supplies Revs. William Swan, George Hill, George Mercer (president judge of Washington County, Pa.), Jacob Jennings, and David Smith. In 1793 the church united with Union or Tent, and in September, 1794, Rev. David Smith was regularly installed pastor (the first of this congregation). He continued in charge a little over three years.

1 The following, having reference to the purchase of the church land from Joseph Caldwell and the erection of the church building upon it, is found in the recorder's office at Unatown:

Know all men by these presents that whereas the members of the Congregation of Mount Moriah have fixed with me my free will & consent on a spot of the land I claim to erect a presbyterian church upon that I do hereby bind myself my Hairs Ext. & Adm. & every of them finally by these presents to John Swearingen & George Wilson Trustees & to their successors for ye standing use of that congregation to give grant and bequest & a good legal title to make 4 acres of land & the benefits of ye spring joying the same where ye meeting house is now a building for ever as soon as it shall Be in my power to make it To the just performance Here of For and in consideration of One Shilling to me in hand paid by ye said Trustees for ye Congregation the Receipt Whereof I hereby acknowledge I bind me my Heirs Ext. & Adm. & every of us and them in the just sum of one hundred pounds as Witness my hand & Seal July ye 1st 1773.

John Forrest.

In 1798, Georges Creek, Muddy Creek, and Union or Tent united, with the Rev. James Adams in charge, he being the second regularly installed, Oct. 16, 1799. He resigned in 1808. The members having nearly all emigrated West, the church was suffered to fall into decay. An occasional sermon was preached by the Rev. James Dunlap to the remnant. He was at this time teaching school in New Geneva. This state of things continued for some years. In 1816 the house was thoroughly repaired, and in the following year Ashbel Green Fairchild, a licentiate of New Jersey, preached for the members. This he continued to do in 1818, and in July, 1819, was ordained and installed as pastor. The membership at this time was ten, with Henry Jennings as elder. In a few months the membership was increased to ninety persons. In 1822 he was in charge of Georges Creek, Morgantown, and Greensboro', Greene Co., Pa., congregations, with a salary of $300. In April, 1827, he resigned the charge of Morgantown and Greensboro' congregations and took Union or Tent Church. The Old Frame was under his care until 1854, a period of thirty-six years. This justly celebrated divine continued in charge of the Tent Church until his death, June 30, 1864.

The great addition to membership was made from 1829 to 1832, when it reached one hundred and eighty. Eighty joined during the year 1829.

In July, 1854, the 'Mount Moriah Church' called H. O. Rosborough, who on June 5, 1855, was ordained and installed the fourth regular pastor of this church. His salary has been increased several times. Georges Church agreed to pay him $600 alone in September, 1872, the remaining portion of his time, one-third, being in the service of Mount Washington, twenty-four miles distant. The property of Ashbel G. Fairchild was purchased by L. S. Hough, executor of his estate, March 31, 1866, for the sum of $2188, consisting of seventeen acres and buildings. This is now attached to Mount Moriah, Old Frame, or Georges Creek Church, as a parsonage. Rev. H. O. Rosborough, the minister in charge, resides here, a short distance south of Smithfield.

The parsonage property was paid for and freed of incumbrance in less than two years.

The ministers in charge since the organization by Rev. James Power in 1774 have been the following:

Rev. James Power, 1776; Rev. David Smith, August, 1794; Rev. James Adams, 10th October, 1799; Rev. Ashbel G. Fairchild, called 1817, regular from July, 1819, to April, 1854; Rev. H. O. Rosborough, called July, 1854, and remained from 1855 to the present time (1881).

Membership of the church in 1788, 50. Membership in 1819, 10; in 1832, 180; in 1881, 160.

METHODIST CHURCH AT NEW GENEVA.

The history of Methodist worship at this place and vicinity prior to 1852, and the various efforts for the establishment of a church of this denomination, belong to the religious history of Springhill township. In the year named a congregation was gathered here, and a frame building erected as a house of worship, mainly through the efforts of the Rev. J. C. Pershing. The church building stands on land formerly belonging to the estate of Miller Denny, and sold by his executor, Jonathan Monroe, Esq., to the church. Trustees, Isaac Crow, Frederick Eberhart, David Franks, Alexander Conrad, and Joseph Provance.

The present membership of the church is thirty-five. Pastor, Rev. S. W. McCurdy.

BURIAL-GROUNDS.

There are in Nicholson the following-named burial-grounds, most of them being the last resting-places of old settlers in the township, viz.: One at the stone school-house, New Geneva; one at McLain's, Provance Bottoms; one at Provance's, Provance Bottoms; one at Fair View (German Baptist); one at Young's; the Debolt ground at Rice's; the Cover and Anghey ground at Woolsey and Cover's; and the old Frame Church burial-ground. The last named, as also the Fair View and the burial-place at Young's, are well kept and cared for. The same can hardly be said of the others.

NICHOLSON SOLDIERS.

In the Mexican war of 1846-48 a number of men from Nicholson entered the United States service, among whom were Albert G. Nicholson and William Fairchild Nicholson, the latter of whom died of cholera on his way home from Mexico.

In the war of the Rebellion, 1861-65, Capt. William West enlisted many men in this part of Fayette County, and had them mustered into the service as West Virginia troops. Capt. Thompson and Leasure, of Morgantown, also did the same. The length of time elapsed since the war has caused the names of many to be forgotten. The following persons were among the number who enlisted in Virginia regiments: Joseph G. Provance, Jesse Poundstone, Harrison Mack, John Knife, Martin Stoneking, James Wood. In Capt. George W. Gilmore's company, which was mustered to the credit of West Virginia, were the following-named men from Nicholson: Joseph Provance, John Debolt, John Gilmore, James W. Nicholson, Albert G. Sandusky, Johnson J. Malory, Abijah Farmer. Following is a partial list of Nicholson men who served in Pennsylvania regiments in the war of the Rebellion:

In the 189th Regt., Capt. Joseph Stacy, Henry Miller, William Harrison, Peter Bricker, Robert Armstrong, John Hill.

In the 112th Regt., Capt. Amzi S. Fuller, A. Turner Dougherty, David J. Provance, Harmar Denny, Hugh T. Davenport, Nicholas Honsaker, Warwick H. Ross, John Campbell, sub.

In the 14th Cavalry, Capt. Duncan, William Conn, John Wesley Poundstone, Joseph E. Dilliner, John Beatty, William Abram.

Other regiments which cannot now be designated contained the following-named soldiers from Nicholson:

MANUFACTURING INTERESTS.

The Catt's Run Coke-Works are located on Provance Bottoms, nearly two miles south of Catt's Run. They were built by a company of Uniontown capitalists in 1877, the first coke being made in October of that year. The style of the company was Ewing, Kendall & Co. Having erected sixty ovens, the works were leased to a Pittsburgh firm, Messrs. Charles H. Armstrong & Son. At these works the coal is crushed and thoroughly washed before being placed in the ovens. The entire product of these works is sold to the Ironton Manufacturing Company, of Ironton, Ohio, at three dollars per ton.

The minerals of Nicholson township are the same that are found generally in Fayette County. Iron ore has been mined and shipped to Wheeling from Fred's Run (a tributary of Catt's Run), but the cost of transportation is found too great for the profitable working of the mines. Petroleum has been obtained at a depth of five hundred feet on Jacob's Creek in this township.

The manufacture of stone-ware from clay found in Springhill township has become the most important industry of New Geneva. The manufacture consists of milk-pans, jars, jugs, fruit-jars or "jungos," also chemical pots and piping. Two firms are now carrying on this business, viz.: Isaac P. Eberhart & Co. and Alexander Conrad, each producing about forty-eight thousand gallons of ware per year.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

JOHN POUNDSTONE.

John Poundstone, of Nicholson, is of German descent. His grandfather, Philip Poundstone, came from Germany and settled in Nicholson township at an early day. Nicholas Poundstone, father of John, was born in Fayette County, and spent his life here as a farmer. He married Elizabeth Everly, and they had eight children. Their son John was born in Nicholson township, Aug. 30, 1804, and was educated at the public schools, and growing up learned the trade of cabinet-making, and followed it for about four years in Masontown. In 1830 he moved to where he now lives, and has ever since "farmed it."

Aug. 12, 1827, he married Susanna Rider, of German township, who died in June, 1869. They had ten children, seven of whom are now living. June 4, 1871, Mr. Poundstone took to himself another wife in the person of Barbara A. Hunsaker. Of his children, one, a son, is living in California, another son is a hotel-keeper, and the others are farmers. He has but one daughter living, Louisa, who married a farmer by the name of — Law.

Mr. Poundstone has held important township offices, that of school director, etc., and is a member of the Lutheran Church, in which he has held the office of elder for many years. His possessions consist chiefly of lands. Mr. Poundstone is a gentleman of unassuming modest manners. His neighbors speak highly of him as an honest, honorable man, whose life is gentle, and whose good deeds, quietly done, are numerous.

MICHAEL W. FRANKS.

Michael W. Franks, of Nicholson township, the late popular treasurer of Fayette County, is of German lineage. His father, Michael Franks, was born and raised in Fayette County, upon the farm whereon he, Mr. Franks, our subject, now resides. He was a farmer, and married Charity Kendall, of Nicholson township, by whom he had seven children. Michael W. (the third, for his grandfather as well as father bore the same Christian name) was born April 29, 1832, and was educated in the common and select schools, learned the business of farming, and since his marriage, in 1864, has resided where he now lives, except for three years, during which time he held public office and resided at Uniontown.

He was elected treasurer of Fayette County by a very large majority in November, 1878, and performed the duties of his office from Jan. 1, 1879, to Jan. 1, 1882, giving universal satisfaction. It may be added here that he was nominated by his party for that office over more good men, probably, than were ever before beaten as aspirants for the same office at the same time in Fayette County.

It is generally conceded by his political opponents that Fayette County never had a better treasurer than Mr. Franks, and there are gentlemen of standing in the county who declare it never had so good an one as he. He is popular in all parts of the county, generous, and gentlemanly.

Mr. Franks and the family of Franks are distinctively Democratic in politics.

May 17, 1864, Mr. Franks married Martha J. Bell, of Greene County, and has three children,—Emma R., Charles O. B., and Estella R.

DR. WILSON GREENE.

Dr. Wilson Greene, of New Geneva, Nicholson township, was born in Greene County, Dec. 1, 1829, and is of Puritan descent on his paternal side, but on his maternal of German extraction.

His grandfather, William Greene, was born in New England. He migrated to Greene County, Pa., at an early day, and settled on Whitely Creek, near "Wilbur Tree." He married Rebecca La Rue, and their issue were five sons and three daughters.

Henry Sykes, his maternal grandfather, was a native of Virginia, but while quite young removed with his father to Greene County, Pa., and settled on the waters of Dunkard Creek, in Monongahela township. They were among the pioneers that first permanently located west of the Monongahela River. Young Henry participated in the Indian wars of the period, and endured the privations and hardships incident to border life. He was united in matrimony with Barbary Selser, a daughter of a contemporary settler, and ten children were the fruits of their marriage.

Matthew Greene and Rachel Sykes, the parents of Dr. Greene, were married in 1828, and reared four children, of whom the subject of this notice was the only son, born on the farm his great-grandfather located, where his mother was born, and where she died, and where his father still resides.

Dr. Greene is eminently a self-made man. His advantages for acquiring an education were very limited. Supplementing his scant public school opportunities by several terms of select school, which he was enabled to attend through the summer by teaching district school through the winter, he succeeded in obtaining a very liberal and thorough English education. In like manner he earned the means that supported him at Cleveland Medical College, Cleveland, Ohio, where he completed his professional studies.

March 20, 1859, he formed a propitious matrimonial alliance with Pleasant M., second daughter of Evan Evans, who owned an adjoining farm. He was of pure Welsh lineage, both parents having been born in Wales. Mrs. Greene's mother, Nancy Myers, was a granddaughter of the historic Rev. John Corby, whose wife and several children were massacred while on their way to church, Sunday morning, May 10, 1782, by the Indians, near Garard's Fort.

They began their married life at Bristol, Perry Co., Ohio, where he soon acquired a lucrative practice. Having pursued his profession here for five years, he returned to Pennsylvania and located in New Geneva, where he now resides. Here, too, he soon attained to an extensive practice, which he still retains. Personally he is eminently popular, having merited the esteem of his fellows by being instant in good words and works. Professionally he has been signal success, and is held in high esteem by the medical fraternity. At present he is vice-president of the Fayette County Medical Association, and holds the appointment as delegate to the National Medical Convention, to be held in St. Paul, Minn., in July next.

Dr. Greene is the father of two children,—Isa D., and Willie W. Isa is an accomplished young lady, educated at Monongahela College, and a graduate of Dana's Musical Institute, Warren, Ohio. She possesses a rare talent for instrumental music and enjoys a sweet and delicately-cultured voice. Willie is at present pursuing a course of study at Monongahela College.

The doctor has for a number of years been a prominent and influential member of one of the leading Evangelical Churches, of which also his wife and children are all communicants.

Though not luxuriating in unbounded affluence, he has accumulated much valuable property, which consists of houses and lands and moneys at interest, etc. He is one of the solid and useful citizens of the county.

WILLIAM P. GRIFFIN.

Mr. William P. Griffin, of Nicholson township, is of Welsh stock. He is the son of William and Rhoda Griffin, who, coming to Fayette County, settled on Georges Creek, in Springhill township. He was a miller. They had a family of eight children, of whom William P. was the seventh, and is the only one living, and was born Sept. 2, 1809. He was educated in the common and select schools, and has been engaged in farming all his business life. He has resided upon the farm which he now occupies for fifty years.

In August, 1837, Mr. Griffin married Ann Gan, of Springhill township, by whom he has had thirteen children, eleven of whom are living. Mr. and Mrs. Griffin were for many years members of the Baptist Church, but about 1868 they united with the Christian Church, of which they are honored and useful members, Mr. Griffin being an elder thereof. He was once a lieutenant in the State militia, and two of his sons, William L. and Charles A., served in the war of the Rebellion, the former of whom is a physician, the latter a general trader. Mr. Griffin's third son, Newton, is a farmer; the fourth son is a grocer; and all the sons have left the old homestead and the county, living in various parts of the Union.

Mr. Griffin is a substantial, excellent farmer, an honest, hard-working man; and Mrs. Griffin has contributed to their success in life her full share of management and hard work. They command the respect and esteem of their neighbors. Mr. Griffin has held important township offices.

HENRY DILS.

Henry Dils, of Nicholson township, who was born July 3, 1816, in what was then Springhill township, is descended from good old Dutch stock, it is believed. His father, Philip Dils, married in Springhill township Mary Hager, and located in the same township about 1807. They had five children, of whom Henry was the third. Three are yet living,—Henry, Peter, and Mary Core. Mr. Dils' father passed most of his life as a farmer, and was successful, leaving each of his children a good farm.

Mr. Dils received a limited education in the common schools, but is a man of observation and intelligence, and has held the position of school director and other offices. He has been a member of the Old Frame Presbyterian Church for many years, and has for several years been an elder in that church. He was first married Dec. 28, 1843, to Martha Vander- vort, of Nicholson township. They had eleven children, eight of whom are living. His wife being deceased, he married again Nov. 10, 1870. Six children were the issue of this latter marriage, four now living. Mr. Dils has resided in his present home thirty-eight years. Here his children have been reared, and he has assisted his grown-up children to a start in life. His sons are all farmers. Mr. Dils is a gentleman of excellent moral character, without reproach as a business man. His possessions are chiefly lands.
PERRY TOWNSHIP.

Perry is one of the northernmost townships of Fayette County, its northern line being a part of the boundary between this county and Westmoreland. On the east the township is bounded by Lower Tyrone and Franklin, on the south by Franklin, and on the west by Jefferson and Washington. Perry lies on both sides of the Youghiogheny River, which flows through the township in a general northwesterly course. Its other principal streams are Jacob’s Creek, Washington Run, and Virgin Run. The last named enters the Youghiogheny from the south, and marks the southeastern boundary of Perry against the township of Franklin. Washington Run flows northeastwardly through the central part of Perry, past its principal town (Perryopolis), and falls into the Youghiogheny. Jacob’s Creek enters the Youghiogheny from the eastward, and marks the northeastern boundary of Perry against Westmoreland County.

That part of the township which lies east of the Youghiogheny, and between it and Jacob’s Creek, is mountainous, rising in some parts quite precipitously from both streams, and having but little bottom-land. In that part of the township which lies on the south-west side of the river the land rises to a considerable height from the Youghiogheny, then slopes back to what are called Washington Bottoms, which are drained by Washington Run. Where the village of Perryopolis is located is a moderate elevation of land, which from there has a gradual descent in all directions. This section is excellently adapted for the production of grain and grass, and nearly the whole township, particularly that part southwest of the river, embraces very fine lands for purposes of agriculture. The Pittsburgh and Connellsville Railroad—now generally known as the Baltimore and Ohio, because leased by that company—traverses the township along the right bank of the Youghiogheny River, and has within the boundaries of Perry two stations,—Layton and Banning’s. The population of the township by the census of 1880 was fourteen hundred and seventy-six.

EARLY LAND PURCHASES AND SETTLEMENTS.

The earliest as well as the most extensive purchaser of lands in what is now Perry township was Gen. (then Col.) George Washington, who received a warrant for lands here on the first day of the land-office of the proprietaries for the sale of tracts west of the mountains, April 3, 1769. Nearly two years prior to this, however, Washington had begun to entertain the idea of purchasing large tracts in this region, as is shown by the tenor of a letter written by him to Capt. William Crawford, of Stewart’s Crossings (now New Haven), as follows:

"Mount Vernon, Sept. 21, 1767.

"Dear Sir,—From a sudden hint of your brother’s! I wrote to you a few days ago in a hurry. Having since had more information to the purpose of knowing the condition of those lands comprising the tract of 707 time for reflection, I now write deliberately and with greater precision on the subject of my last letter. I then desired the favor of you (as I understood rights might now be had for the lands which have fallen within the Pennsylvania line) to look me out a tract of about fifteen hundred, two thousand, or more acres somewhere in your neighborhood, meaning only by this that it may be as contiguous to your own settlement as such a body of good land can be found. It will be easy for you to conceive that ordinary or even middling lands would never answer my purpose or expectation, so far from navigation and under such a load of expenses as these lands are incumbened with. No: a tract to please me must be rich (of which no person can be a better judge than yourself) and, if possible, level. Could such a piece of land be found you would do me a singular favor in falling upon some method of securing it immediately from the attempts of others, as nothing is more certain than that the lands cannot remain long ungranted when once it is known that rights are to be had.

"... It is possible, but I do not know that it really is the case, that the custom in Pennsylvania will not admit so large a quantity of land as I require to be entered together; if so, this may perhaps be arranged by making several entries to the same amount, if the expenses of doing it is not too heavy. If the land can only be secured from others it is all I want at present. The surveying I would choose to postpone, at least till the spring, when, if you can give me any satisfactory account of this matter, and of what I am next going to propose, I expect to pay you a visit about the last of April."

No information is found as to the preliminary steps taken by Capt. Crawford to select and secure these lands on behalf of Washington, but it is certain that on the opening of the land-office at the time above mentioned warrants were issued for lands in the present township of Perry, amounting to more than sixteen hundred acres, all of which came into possession of the general. The only tract in this township warranted to George Washington was one named "Meadows." The warrant bore date April 3, 1769, and the survey October 27th of the same year. There was, however, at the same time one tract called "Forks," warranted to John Augusta [Augustine?] Washington, to Lawrence Washington; one called "Bear Hills," to William Athel; one called "Flatts," to John Bishop; one called "Crab-Tree Run," to John Paty; and one called "Deer Range," to Thomas Jones. The surveys, made with large allowance, gave the area of these several tracts as follows: "Meadows," 329 acres; "Forks," 326 acres; "Bear Hills," 329 acres; "Spring Run," 333 acres; "Flatts," 319 acres; "Crab-Tree Run," 320 acres; and "Deer Range," 332 acres. There is nothing found tending to show that either John A. Washington's "Forks" or Laurence Washington's "Bear Hills" tract ever came into the hands of George Washington; but that he did purchase or otherwise acquire all the other tracts above enumerated, amounting in the aggregate to 1641 acres, and that they were patented to him Feb. 28, 1782, is made certain by a recital to that effect in deeds given in the year 1802 by his executors. None of the names of the warrantees of the tracts above named as having been patented to Gen. Washington are found in connection with any later settlement or transfer, and therefore it is probable that they took up the lands in his interest; and it is certain that the warrants taken by them passed to him before the issuance of the patents.

Capt. Crawford, who selected these lands for Washington, acted also as his agent in locating many other tracts in what is now Washington County, Pa., in Ohio, and along the Ohio River Valley in Virginia. In 1770, the year next following the location and survey of these lands, Washington made a tour through this section, and down the Ohio to the Great Kanawha, and kept a journal of the trip. A part of that journal is given below, commencing on the date of his departure from Mount Vernon, viz.:

"October 5th.—Began a journey to the Ohio in company with Dr. Craik, his servant and two of mine, with a led horse and baggage. Dined at Towliston's, and lodged at Lee's Ford, distant from Mount Vernon about forty-five miles. Here my portmanteau horse failed. [Here follows the journal of six days' journey by way of Old Town, Md., and Fort Cumberland to 'Killman's,' east of Castlemain's River.]

"12th.—We left Killman's early in the morning, breakfasted at the Little Meadow, ten miles off, and lodged at the Great Crossing (of the Youghiogheny at Somerset), twenty miles farther, which we found a tolerably good day's work. . . .

"13th.—Set out about sunrise, breakfasted at the Great Meadows [Fayette Co.], thirteen miles, and reached Captain Crawford's about five o'clock. The land from Gist's [Mount Readock] to Crawford's is very broken, though not mountainous, in spots exceedingly rich, and in general free from stone; Crawford's is very fine land, lying on the Youghiogheny, at a place commonly called Stewart's Crossing.

"14th.—At Captain Crawford's all day Went to see a caiman not far from his house on the banks of the river. The caul seemed of the very best kind, burning freely, and abundance of it.

"15th.—Went to view some land which Captain Crawford located for me near the Youghiogheany, distant about twelve miles. This tract, which contains about one thousand six hundred acres, includes some as fine land as I ever saw, and a great deal of rich meadow; it is well watered and has a valuable mill-seat, except that the stream is rather too slight, and, it is said, not constant more than seven or eight months in the year; but, on account of the fall and other conveniences, no place can exceed it. In going to this land I passed through two other tracts which Captain Crawford had taken up for my brothers Samuel and John. I intended to have visited the land which Crawford had procured for land Washington this day also, but, time falling short, I was obliged to postpone it. Night came on before I got back to Crawford's, where I found Colonel Ste..." phen. The lands which I passed over to-day were generally hilly, and the growth chiefly white oak, but very good notwithstanding; and, what is extraordinary and contrary to the property of all other lands I ever saw before, the hills are the richest land, the soil upon the sides and summits of them being as black as coal, and the growth walnut and cherry. The flats are not so rich, and a good deal more mixed with stone.

16th. At Captain Crawford's till evening, when I went to Mr. John Stephenon's, on my way to Pittsburgh. . . . 17th. Dr. Craik and myself, with Capt. Crawford and others, arrived at Fort Pitt; distance from the Crossing forty-three and a half measured miles. . . ."

On the 20th, Washington, with Dr. Craik, Capt. Crawford, William Harrison, Robert Beall, and others, with some Indians, proceeded down the Ohio in a large canoe, having sent their servants back to Crawford's with orders to meet the party there on the 14th of November, but they did not reach there until ten days after the time appointed. The journal then proceeds,—

"Nov. 24th. When we came to Stewart's Crossing at Crawford's the river was too high to ford, and his canoe gone adrift. However, after waiting there two or three hours, a canoe was got, in which we crossed, and swum our horses. The remainder of this day I spent at Capt. Crawford's, it either raining or snowing hard all day.

"25th. I set out early, in order to see Lund Washington's land; but the ground and trees being covered with snow, I was able to form but an indistinct opinion of it, though upon the whole it appeared to be a good tract of land. From this I went to Mr. Thomas Gist's and dined, and then proceeded to the Great Crossings at Hugoland's, where I arrived about eight o'clock."

From there he journeyed back to Mount Vernon by the route over which he came.

Except by the parties above mentioned as receiving warrants April 3, 1769, the only purchases made in the present township of Perry during that year were those of Eleanor and James Hunter, of Philadelphia, the tract of the former being 316 acres, and that of the latter 276½ acres. They were located on the waters of Virgin Run, and warranted April 19, 1769.

Of all these purchasers of lands in the present township of Perry in the year 1769, none ever became settlers on them. And from that year until 1784 no other purchases of land were made within the present bounds of the township.

It is evident from the language of Washington's journal, above quoted, that the tracts of his brothers, Samuel and John A. Washington, were on the route from Capt. Crawford's (New Haven) to his own land, at and near the site of the present town of Perryopolis, but that Lund (Laurence) Washington's land lay some distance away from the direct route. It has not been ascertained to whom the title of these lands passed, nor their exact location.

In the extracts above given from Washington's journal of 1770 it will be noticed that he makes reference to a mill-seat on the small stream (since named Washington Run) which flowed through his tract. It was his purpose to build a mill at this place, and preparations were soon after commenced for it by Gilbert Simpson, whom Washington sent out as manager of his property here. His first business, however, was to erect a log house, which stood adjoining the present residence of John Rice. This was the farm-house which was the headquarters of the operations carried on by Simpson for the proprietor. The mill was built on the run, in the immediate vicinity of the present village of Perryopolis. From the time of its completion until the present (with the exception of a few years prior to 1790) a mill has been in constant operation on this site.

Between 1770 and 1774, Valentine Crawford (who had settled on Jacob's Creek) succeeded his brother, Capt. William Crawford, as Washington's financial agent in this region, Simpson being merely the manager of his farming and other operations on his lands in the present township of Perry. Below are given some extracts from letters written in the year last named by Valentine Crawford to Col. Washington, having reference to the improvements then being made under the direction of Simpson on the Washington tract, viz.:

"JACOB'S CREEK, April 27, 1774.

"I went to Gilbert Simpson's as soon as I got out and gave him the bill of sealing you gave me, and the bill of his articles. I offered him all the servants that he might take them to your Bottom until we got our crew at work; but he refused for fear they would run away from him. . . ."

"JACOB'S CREEK, May 6, 1774.

"As to the goods, I have stored them; and I went to Mr. Simpson as soon as I came up, and offered him some of the carpenters and all the servants; but he refused taking them,—the latter for fear they would run away; he has, however, now agreed to take some of both, the carpenters to do the framing for the mill, and the servants to dig the race. Stephenson has agreed to quit, provided the Indians make peace, and it would be out of his power to get them back again, as he has no means of conveyance. I am afraid I shall be obliged to build a fort until this erection is over, which I am in hopes will not last long. I trust you write me full instructions as to what I must do. Mr. Simpson yesterday seemed very much scared; but I cheered him up all I could. He and his laborers seem to conclude to build a fort if times grow any worse."

"GIST'S, May 19, 1774.

"DEAR Sir,—I write to let you know that all your servants are well, and that none of them have run away. Mr. Simpson has as many of the carpenters as he can find work for, and has got some of the servants assisting about the sent for the mill until this storm of the Indians blows over."

"JACOB'S CREEK, May 27, 1774.

"From all accounts Capt. Connolly's fight with the Indians was determined for war. . . . I have, with the assistance of some of your carpenters and servants, built a very strong block-house; and the neighbors, what few of them have not run away, have joined with me, and we are building a stockade fort at my house. Mr. Simpson, also, and his neighbors have begun to build a fort at your Bottom; and we live in hopes we can stand our ground till we can get some assistance from below.""

A letter from Crawford, dated June 8th, informed Washington that Simpson had completed the fort at the Bottoms:

"JACOB'S CREEK, July 27, 1774.

"My wagon and team have been at work at your mill for some time, hauling timber, stone, and lime and sand for it. I went over to assist in hauling some of the largest of the timber, but the late alarming accounts of the Indians have stopped the workmen, and I have brought home my team. I consider it a pity that the mill was ever begun in these times. It appears to me sometimes that it will be a very expensive job to you before it is done. All the carpenters I brought out for you stopped work on the sixth of May, except some who were at work on your mill. These I pay myself. I shall observe your orders in regard to settling with the carpenters."

But it seems that the work on construction of the mill was delayed for some cause (doubtless the opening of the war of the Revolution), so that two years had elapsed from the time of its commencement before it was completed and put in operation, as is shown by a letter, dated Sept. 20, 1776, written by Valentine Crawford to Gen. Washington when the latter was engaged in the operations of his army around the city of New York after the battle of Long Island. The following extract from that letter has reference to the building of the mill, and tells the time when it was first started, viz.:

"I this spring, before I came over the mountain, called at Simpson's to see your mill go for the first time of its running, and can assure you I think it the best mill I ever saw anywhere, although I think one of a less value would have done as well. If you remember, you saw some rocks at the mill-seat. These are as fine millstone grit as any in America. The millwright told me the stones he got for your mill there are equal to English burn."

From this time until 1785 little is known as to what was done with Washington's mill, or on his lands in this vicinity. On the 23d of September in that year he wrote to Thomas Freeman (who had succeeded Valentine Crawford as his agent) as follows:

"If you should not have offers in a short time for the hire of my mill alone, or for the mill with one hundred and fifty acres of land adjoining, I think it advisable, in that case, to let it on shares, to build a good and substantial dam of stone where the old one stood, and to erect a proper fore-bay in place of the trunk which now conducts the water to the wheel, and, in a word, to put the house in proper repair. If you should be driven to this for want of a tenant, let public notice thereof be given, and the work let to the lowest bidder, the under-taker finding himself and giving land and security for the performance of his contract. The charges of these things must be paid out of the first moneys you receive for rent or otherwise. If I could get fifteen hundred pounds for the mill and one hundred acres of land most convenient thereto I would let it go for that money.""

"G. WASHINGTON."

Gen. Washington, however, did not succeed in selling or otherwise disposing of his lands until the fall of 1789, when they were leased for a term of five years to Col. Israel Shreve, who afterwards became their purchaser. He (Col. Shreve) emigrated to Western Pennsylvania in 1788 from New Jersey, leaving his old home in Hunterdon County in that State on the 7th of July. With him came others, forming a party of thirty persons in all, viz.: Israel Shreve and Mary, his wife, with their children,—Keziah, Hester, Israel, George, Greene, Rebecca, and Henry, with John Fox and James Starkey; William Shreve and Rhoda, his wife, with their children,—Anna and Richard (the preceding named traveling in three two-horse wagons and driving three cows); Joseph Beck and Sarah, his wife, with their children,—Benjamin, Rebecca, Elizabeth, Henry, Joseph, and Ann (in one three-horse wagon); Daniel Hervey, his wife, Sarah, their son Job, a mulatto boy, Thomas, Joseph, and Ann Wheatley, and John Shellow, the last-named seven traveling with one three-horse wagon, one two-horse wagon, and one cow.

They came over the mountains to Westmoreland County, Pa. Without pausing to follow the fortunes of other members of the party, it is sufficient to say that Col. Shreve stopped with his family in Rostraver township, occupying the house of Joseph Lenman for something more than a year, until he rented the Washington lands, as before mentioned. Soon after concluding the bargain, he wrote to his brother, Caleb Shreve, of Mansfield, N. J., a letter which shows what was the condition of the Washington lands at that time, as also the fact that the mill built by Gilbert Simpson was then in disuse, and too much out of repair to be again started without considerable expense. The letter referred to is here given, as follows:

"DEAR BROTHER,—Having an opportunity to Philadelphia, I embrace it and mention my situation or intended one. Since I have been here, have worked to get Washington Bottom, and have at last obtained the whole tract on rent for five years.

"I wrote to the treasurer by his Agent in this county, Col. Isreal Shreve was born Dec. 24, 1739, at the Shreve homestead, Mount Pleasant, Mansfield, Burlington Co., N. J., but at a later period removed to Huntington County in the same State, where he was living at the outbreak of the Revolution. When the first two battalions were raised in New Jersey for the Continental army, he was appointed by the Congress (Oct. 28, 1775) lieutenant-colonel of the Western Battalions, William Macwell being appointed colonel and David Ray major. These officers were commissioned Nov. 8, 1775, and the battalion was mustered into the regular Continental service in the following December, and marched to the vicinity of the city of New York, which was then occupied by the British.

On the reorganization of the New Jersey line he was made colonel of the Second Regiment, and remained in that command to the close of the war, serving in Maxwell's brigade, and taking part in many of Washington's most important battles, including that of Monmouth. His brother was colonel of the First New Jersey Regiment, and another brother (Samuel) lieutenant-colonel of the First Battalion of New Jersey in the Continental line.

This letter, as also the account of the party with which Col. Shreve emigrated from New Jersey to Western Pennsylvania, was published in the American Magazine of History in 1842.
Nearly two years after Gen. Washington's death his executors, George Steptoe Washington and Samuel Lewis, constituted James Ross, of Pittsburgh, their lawful attorney, to convey the five tracts in pursuance of the agreement of July, 1795; and accordingly, on the 17th of June, 1802, Ross did so convey the property to the heirs of Israel Shreve.

Col. Shreve had four sons,—Henry, John, Samuel, and Israel, Jr. Henry was a civil engineer, and was employed by the government to clear the channel of the Red River in Louisiana. He finally settled on that river at the present town of Shreveport, which was named in his honor. John Shreve lived in what is now the township of Perry, and represented the district in the Assembly with John St. Clair and Col. Henry Heaton. Samuel Shreve settled in Perry, and was one of the original proprietors of Perryopolis. Israel Shreve, Jr., also lived and died in Perry.

The heirs of Col. Shreve sold the greater part of the property purchased from Gen. Washington to Isaac Meason. In the division of the property after his death the Shreve homestead, containing one hundred and sixty-one acres, was set off to Mrs. Williams, of Greensburg, by whom it was sold to Caleb Antrim, a Quaker. He left it by will to his daughter Mary, Mrs. William Campbell, whose heirs sold it to the present owner, John Rice.

A tract of two hundred and thirty-six acres of the Washington lands was set off in the partition of the Meason estate to Alfred Meason. He sold to Benjamin Martin, who in turn sold in 1838 to Pierson Cope, who still occupies it. His father was one of the early settlers in Jefferson township, and he is himself one of the oldest living settlers of Perry.

Other purchasers of lands belonging to the original tracts of Gen. Washington were Isaac Sparks, one hundred and eighty-five acres; Ruel Sears, one hundred and fifty acres; and John Lloyd, one hundred and sixty acres. Of the latter, the heirs of Alexander Thom now own fifty acres. The tract of Isaac Sparks was purchased by James Fuller and John F. Martin, Jan. 19, 1831. James Fuller, of Dunlap's Creek, came to this township in 1817, and purchased two hundred acres of the Washington lands of the widow of Isaac Meason, and one hundred and fifty acres of Conrad Shultz, a merchant of Baltimore. He also purchased one hundred and twenty acres of Thomas Burns, it being a part of the Burns tract, which extended to the Youghiogheny River, and on which the Burns Ford was situated. David and John Fuller were two of the six sons of James Fuller.

withstanding what has been done, and in consideration of our ancient friendship, I give you further indulgence. Take this letter to Col. Thomas Collins, sheriff of Fayette County, and it will operate as a stay of execution." Col. Shreve took the letter to the sheriff as directed; but further time was given, the payments were met (though with great difficulty) by Shreve, but both he and his great creditor passed from earth leaving the transaction uncompleted and the lands still unoccupied. The letter referred to remained in the possession of sheriff Collins and his widow for many years.
A tract lying directly south of the town plat of Perryopolis, and containing one hundred and seventy-two acres of the Washington lands, was sold June 13, 1802, to Joseph Sayre. Of this, fifty-one acres was sold in 1806 to John Baldus, who sold in 1810 to John Kubbs. On the 11th of May, 1815, it was conveyed to Samuel Shreve, and on this was surveyed and laid out the outer tier of lots that was added to the town plat in 1815. The land comprising the original plat of the town was purchased before 1814 of George Meason by Samuel Shreve, Dr. Thomas Hersey, and Nathan Hersey.

The Washington Mill property passed to Powell Hough, and from him to John Strickler and Jacob Strawn. Strawn's heirs sold it to George Anderson, who repaired it in 1850, and later sold to Samuel Smith, in whose possession it still is. The site has been occupied by a mill in active operation for a period of one hundred and five years without intermission, except for a few years prior to 1790, during which it was out of repair and in disuse.

James Hunter and his wife, Eleanor, were among the owners of original tracts in this township, two hundred and seventy-six acres on Virgin Run being warrants to him, and three hundred and twenty-six acres to her, on the 19th of April, 1769. They were residents of the city of Philadelphia, and he a land speculator. It was said of him that he could ride from Philadelphia to Lake Erie and sleep every night on his own land. He and his wife were in the habit of riding through the country together to visit his lands. Pierson Cope says he remembers that when he was a boy James Hunter and wife came together to the house of his father (who was Hunter's agent) in a private carriage, with a white man for a driver. This driver had heard of sugar-trees, and asked young Cope to show him one. This he did, but the man after examining the tree remarked that he saw no signs of sugar upon it, whereupon the lad explained at length (and much to the driver's surprise) the process by which it was manufactured from the sap. Both the two tracts above mentioned became Mr. Hunter's property. He lived to a very advanced age, and in a codicil to his will (made Dec. 14, 1819) devised his lands in Perry township to his niece, Mrs. Eleanor H. Curwin. Afterwards the greater part of these lands were sold by Pierson Cope, as agent, to Obadiah Bowne, Sr., and John H. Blaney.

The Bowne tract was sold by order of court after the death of Mr. Bowne, Sr. The widow of Obadiah Bowne, Jr., had an interest of $500 in the property by will if she married, and the whole of it if she remained single. She preferred matrimony, and in the course of time married James Blair, Jr., her manager. They bought in the farm, she paying one-half of the purchase-money and he the other half. Mrs. Blair by this last act helped to pay for the farm three times, —first, in assisting her husband in helping his father pay for the place originally; second, in paying off legacies under the will of Obadiah Bowne, Sr.; and third, in the half-payment at the time of purchase by Mr. Blair.

The remainder of the Hunter tract was purchased by John H. Blaney, James Blair, Sr., John B. Blair, James Pieroul, John Carr, John Hamilton, Samuel Johnson, and Ephraim Lynch. A brother of Ephraim, Robert Lynch, was a blacksmith and an axe-maker. For a time he had a shop on the Israel Shreve farm, afterwards built on what is now the King farm. The coal to supply his forge was brought from Little Redstone. A few years later a vein of coal was found within a short distance of the forge.

The tract of land situated north of the Hunter tract, and running to the Youghiogheny River, contained over three hundred acres. Charles March became the possessor of the tract from the warrantee about 1790. It passed from him to his sons, John M. and James. The widow of the latter is now living on the place.

Christian Patterson became the owner of over one hundred acres of land before 1800. He sold to Benjamin Martin, who later conveyed it to Thomas Price, by whom the present brick house on the farm was built. The property now belongs to Mrs. Sutton.

The place where Aaron Townsend now lives was owned fifty years ago by his father, Aaron Townsend, Sr., who purchased of Joseph Radcliff. Freeman Cooper resides on a farm purchased by his father, Joel Cooper, of John Patterson.

Hugh Patterson is a son of James H. Patterson, of Franklin township. The latter purchased many years ago.

North of the Joseph Radcliff tract is land that formerly belonged to Patrick Robinson, who left it by will to his wife. She conveyed it to Robinson Murphy and Samuel Watson, who both live on the place. Adjoining this last tract on the northwest is four hundred acres of land now owned by James Pieroul, which was purchased by his father, William Pieroul, before the commencement of the present century. Samuel, a brother of James, owned land adjoining, also a part of the land of his father. His son Levi now owns this, and has added considerably to it.

Benjamin, Sarah, and Elizabeth Powers, all advanced in years, are old settlers, and live on an old homestead.

Thomas Cook, a native of Chester County, Pa., came to this township about 1800, and purchased over three hundred acres of land south of the Washington tract. He was a weaver and wheelwright, and forsook farming after a time and bought the John Follies mill on Big Redstone Creek, and resided there till his death. He had a number of children. John, a son, settled on Big Redstone Creek, and now owns the mill his father purchased years before. Rebecca, the daughter of Thomas Cook, married James D. Cope, the father of Eli and Pierson Cope. The farm of Thomas Cook was purchased by George Stickle, Patrick Watson, Josiah King, and David Jones. Josiah King, in addition to his original purchase, now owns part of the George Stickley farm.

A property lies in this section of the township formerly owned by William Wallace, and now by John H. Patterson, that contains a fine vein of coal, which is the eastern outcrop of the Pittsburgh or Monongahela basin.

West of the Cook farm, adjoining the Jefferson township line, is a farm formerly owned by Samuel Brewer, whose son Henry now owns it. Adjoining this tract north lies a tract that many years ago was owned by John Negis. Later it was owned by William Binns, by whom it was conveyed to William Price, who now owns it.

Jonathan Hewitt, a native of Ireland, came to this country in 1770, and in 1786 to this section. No account is shown of purchase until Sept. 15, 1807, when he purchased of Thomas Barns one hundred and sixty acres of land, part of the tract which was patented Oct. 26, 1795. The children of Jonathan were Abel, Joseph, John, Elizabeth, Mary, and others who moved West. Abel lived on Washington Run, near the mouth, where he erected a saw-mill and carding-machine. He died there, leaving a widow and large family, now scattered in the West. John Bradley now owns the Abel Hewitt property. In 1870, Bradley started the manufacture of fire-brick in the run, and later removed above Layton's Station, where he is still manufacturing.

Joseph Hewitt lived on part of the old farm. His son Milton now owns it, and is devoting it to fruit culture. In 1877 he started a fruit-house for preserving apples late in the spring. He studded and sheathed an old house with eighteen inches space, which was filled with saw-dust. The first year he kept successfully five hundred barrels, which were sold in March for four dollars and seventy-five cents per barrel. In 1879 five hundred barrels were also kept, and in 1880 twelve hundred barrels were put up, which were finely preserved. An additional house was built in 1878, which was intended to keep them still later.

John A., son of Jonathan Hewitt, settled on part of the homestead where his daughter, Mrs. George Jackson, now lives. Elizabeth married James Binns and went West. Mary married Asa Chambers; they lived and died in the township. A son, Asa, now lives on part of the farm left to his mother.

Jacob Harris purchased five hundred acres of land of the warrantee. It lay west and northwest from Washington Bottoms. He had four sons—Benjamin, James, Isaac, and Jacob—and six daughters,—Amy (Mrs. Andrew Work), Annie (Mrs. Thomas Patton), Rachel and Sally, who married brothers by the name of stemm; Jemima (Mrs. John Coder), and Eliza (Mrs. Harvey Henderson). Jacob in his will devised his real estate to his sons and grandsons. The hundred acres were owned by Benjamin H., one hundred and sixteen by Jacob, and one hundred and ninety by James Harris.

Henry Stow, Samuel and David Luce now own land long known as the Powers farm, a tract of over four hundred acres. From Powers it passed to Hurst, who sold it to John H. Martin, by whom at different times it has been conveyed to its present owners.

Joseph McGara many years ago owned a tract of two hundred acres. He died. His family sold out and removed West. The farm is now owned by Philip Luce, Eliot Porter, William Wiggle, and others.

The section of the township known as the Bowneller settlement was formerly owned by Thomas and William Blankley. Frederick Browneller came from Franklin County, Pa., and purchased the Thomas Blankley tract, and Jacob Snyder that of his brother, William Blankley. The heirs of Jacob Snyder still own the property. On the Snyder farm was built the old log church belonging to the Cumberland Presbyterians, and known by the name of “Harmony.” The present church stands nearly on the same site.

Frederick Browneller built a saw-mill on a small stream near his place, which was discontinued a few years ago. He had four sons,—William, Samuel, Frederick, and George. The two former remained on the farm, and the other removed West. A steam saw-mill at the mouth of Van Meter's Run is owned by Peter Van Meter, of Rostraver township. He married a daughter of Peter Marmie, who was for many years connected with the Jacob's Creek Iron-Works.

The land now owned by Oliver Porter and John Bryan was owned many years ago by one Peter Reed. Joseph Whitsett took up a warrant for one hundred and forty-four acres of land in the section. The land where Ralph C. Whitsett now lives, on the Youghiogheny River east of Van Meter's Run, was formerly owned by a Mr. Thompson, who sold to Robert Wilkinson. The Martin Elwell farm was formerly owned by Henry Stone, Sr. A Mr. Rhodobaker purchased of the warrantee the farm now owned by the heirs of David Carson. Job Straw, from Berks County, Pa., prior to 1800 purchased a tract of three hundred acres. When the excitement of magnificent enterprises broke out at Perrysopolis, he became interested in the glass-works and the bank at that place, and when the crash came, his property was swept away by the disastrous management of the former. The farm was sold at sheriff's sale and purchased by his son Jacob, who lived there until his death in December, 1855, by an accident on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad near Layton Station. His son is now a merchant at Perrysopolis. Job Straw, after the sale of his property, removed to the West.

Thomas Carson many years ago purchased a tract of land known as the "Round Bottom." It passed from him to his sons John and James, and recently the homestead was sold to Albert Martin. Joel, a grandson of Thomas, owns a part of the farm formerly owned by his grandfather.
Samuel Burns bought of the warrantee a tract of land, which was patented to him Dec. 28, 1809, and known as “Liberty Hill.” He devised the property to his son, Thomas E. Burns, who sold it on the 8th of November, 1823, to Robert Bleakley. On the 31st of January, 1848, it came into possession of James Fuller, and is now owned by his son, David Fuller. Of the other sons of James Fuller, John resides in the borough of Peryopolis; James, William, and Alfred are residents of Philadelphia. The last two are engaged in shipping beef to London, and are also very extensive manufacturers of olemargarine. William acts as managing partner in London.

The settlements before mentioned were all south of the Youghiogheny River. In that part of the present township north of the river, and thence to the county line on Jacob’s Creek, the largest purchaser was William Turnbull, of the firm of Turnbull, Marmie & Co., merchants of Philadelphia, who became interested in iron ore which was found in these lands. This firm, in the spring of 1789, began the erection here of the first furnace built west of the Allegheny Mountains. At what time the warrants were taken out is not known. The tract on which the furnace was built was named “Rocksbury,” and contained three hundred and one acres. The patent was issued on the 13th of July, 1789. At this time the furnace was so far completed as to be mentioned in a petition to the court of Fayette County, at the June session, for a road “from the furnace on Jacob’s Creek to Thomas Kyle’s mill.”

A tract of three hundred and one acres, named “Frankford,” and another adjoining of two hundred and nineteen acres, named “Springsbury,” were patented to Mr. Turnbull at the same time. A tract of two hundred and twenty-three acres adjoining, named “Luton,” was patented to Jacob Lowrie, Jan. 9, 1789. This was purchased by Turnbull & Marmie on the 9th of October, 1791. In addition to the ten hundred and forty-four acres owned by Mr. Turnbull in Fayette County, there was obtained by patent and by purchase thirteen hundred and eighty-one acres of land across Jacob’s Creek, in Westmoreland County, as follows: “Rural Felicity,” 262 acres, patented Nov. 1, 1787; “Bannockburn,” 308 acres, patented July 11, 1789; “Darby,” 312 acres, patented July 13, 1789; “Abington,” 200 acres, patented April 17, 1790; and a tract of 290 acres, named “Springfield,” which was patented to John Gebhart, March 10, 1785, and sold to Turnbull, Marmie & Co., Oct. 9, 1791. These tracts of land, by reason of the financial difficulties of Mr. Turnbull, were transferred to Col. John Holker (one of the firm) on the 10th of February, 1797. But little was done at the furnace after 1793, although it continued in operation till 1802, when its fires went out forever. Col. Holker, on the 20th of January, 1817, entered into an agreement with Henry Sweitzer for these lands. In accordance with this agreement, Col. Holker, on the 27th of June, 1821, conveyed all the lands mentioned to Pauc Smith, in trust to convey to Henry Sweitzer, and on the 27th of July, 1822, he conveyed the property by deed to Henry Sweitzer and Jacob Bowman as tenants in common. The greater portion of the lands were afterwards sold to the Jacob’s Creek Oil Company, by whom they are still owned.

The ruins of the old furnace-stack, charcoal-house, and other structures are still visible. The two first mentioned are in Fayette County. The abutment of the bridge which crossed the creek at this place is still standing, a pile of stones without form. The ruins of the forge are on the north side of the creek, in Westmoreland County. The ruins are approached from Burns’ Ford north to the school-house, thence westly by an old road to the woods, and winding down the hill into the deep valley of Jacob’s Creek. As the approach is made to the creek the stack is visible below, and upon the upper side of the road, directly in rear of it, are the ruins of the charcoal-house, a solid wall of masonry, sixty feet in length, twenty feet in height, and two and a half feet thick, the end walls extending back to the hill, about twenty feet, the rear wall being formed by the natural rock. With the exception of the east end and the top of this wall, it is as solid and as true as when first laid. After passing the ruin the road extends several rods westerly, still descending to the creek, where it is met by another road coming up from the mouth of the creek.

From this junction the road runs up the stream on the low level a few rods to where the furnace is located, and at which place the road crosses the creek into Westmoreland County. The stack is about twenty-five feet square, with two arches, now partly broken away, one on the north side and one on the west. A part of a low wall is standing that extends from the south side of the stack towards the hill. The northeast corner is still true for a height of eight or ten feet, except the lower stones, which have fallen away. The others are crumbled. Shrubs, mosses, and climbing vines partially hide the ravages of time, and trees are growing from the upper part of the stack, one of which is five inches in diameter. A view of the ruins will be found with the article on furnaces in the general history of this county.

On the extreme northwest corner of the township, at the junction of Jacob’s Creek and the Youghiogheny River, Christopher Beeler took out a warrant for 293½ acres of land, Dec. 16, 1788, and received a patent therefor March 11, 1789. He came from Virginia, and lived in this section before he took out his warrant, as he was with Col. Crawford in his campaign of 1782. He sold this tract to Col. Isaac Meason, who gave it to his daughter Mary, who married Daniel Rogers. They lived in Connellsville, and the farm was rented many years. It was finally purchased by A. R. Banning, and when, about 1859, the Pittsburgh and Connellsville (now the Baltimore and Ohio) Railroad was completed, a station was opened at that place. called Banning's Station. The land is still owned by Mr. Banning. About 1870, Daniel Hohenschell started a store, which was kept for a year or two. In 1879, M. L. Wright built a store at the station, which is still there. A brick manufactory is in process of construction by Smith & Hough.

Gen. J. B. Switzer owns 240 acres of land adjoining the Beeler tract, east on Jacob's Creek. This was part of the Turnbull lands.

Thomas Forsyth took out a patent for 171 acres of land in this part of the township. He had sons,—Ezekiel, David, and Thomas. Ezekiel settled on the homestead. His son Thomas now lives on the farm adjoining. Henry and John, sons of Ezekiel, both live near. David, son of Thomas, lived in Westmoreland County.

Valentine Secrist took up a tract of one hundred and eight and three-quarter acres on a warrant dated Sept. 29, 1791, for which he received a patent dated October 26th the same year. He also received a warrant for two hundred and forty-five acres the same date, which was surveyed November 2d of the same year, and another of one hundred and ninety-eight acres, warranted Oct. 5, 1790, surveyed Feb. 11, 1791. These last two tracts were in what is now Tyrone township, adjoining the Turnbull lands. A part of these lands are now occupied by descendants of the family. David Secrist lives on the tract in Perry township.

John Zizing came to this region of country as a cowboy with Peter Galley. He learned the trade of a cabinet-maker, and for many years worked among the farmers before purchasing any land. On the 10th of March, 1819, he took out a warrant for sixty-eight and one-quarter acres, and on the 25th of February, 1822, a warrant for one hundred and fifty-eight acres. These tracts were patented to him June 23, 1822. He had three sons, John, Gottlieb, and Solomon, who live on the lands a short distance from Layton's Station.

Henry Stemm purchased a tract of land which was a part of the Turnbull lands, now owned by Mrs. David Morrow. Samuel and John Stemm, sons of Henry, live in the township.

The land on which Layton Station is situated was a tract called "Springfield," and was patented April 6, 1791, to Mary Higgs (a daughter of John Shreve), and contained two hundred and seventeen acres. It was deeded by her June 3, 1795, to Francis Bryson, and was sold by him Aug. 2, 1797, to George Johnston, who conveyed it on the 2d of April, 1806, to William Espy. It was devised in his will to his sons, Hugh and Robert, in December, 1813. On the 25th of October, 1821, they conveyed the greater portion of it to Abraham Layton for $2352. Upon his death the land passed to his sons, Michael and Abraham, who for a long time built keel-boats on the river to ship sand and glass down the river. The land was sold by the Laytons to Daniel R. Davidson, and in 1864 was conveyed to Joseph Wilgus. Michael Layton, after the death of his father and sale of the lands at Layton's Station, purchased a tract south of the river, said to have been formerly owned by — Lloyd, and now owned by Jacob Henderson. It is a tradition that before the warrant was obtained for this land Michael Sowers lived in an old cabin and ferried people across the river. After his death one Dunn lived in the cabin. He was drowned a few years later, and the place was long known as "Dunn's Deep Hole." There is an old burial-place in the rear of where the cabin stood, where seventy or seventy-five years ago hundreds of graves were to be seen. In 1812, Aaron Jones lived there, and his wife was drowned in the river while crossing in a canoe. The name was changed from Dunn's to Layton's after the purchase by Abraham Layton in 1821.

A tract of three hundred acres was located next east of the Turnbull lands on Jacob's Creek. It was patented by Andrew Robinson, and owned by him as late as 1859. He sold the farm to Plummer and Stiner. It now belongs to Pierson Cope.

Many years since a grist and saw-mill were erected on this tract at the falls, which are at this point twenty-five feet high. Two dams have rotted down. No improvements are on the place at present.

ERECTION OF TOWNSHIP AND LIST OF OFFICERS.

A petition of inhabitants praying for a township to be formed out of parts of Washington and Tyrone townships was presented to the January term of court, 1839. William Davidson, Thomas Boyd, and Joseph Torrance were appointed commissioners. They made a report at the June session of court the same year, from which the following is extracted, viz.:

"That in pursuance of said order they met at McDonald's Mill, on Virgin Run, in Franklin township, being the most convenient point of meeting for said viewers, and after viewing the ground proposed to be formed into a new township, and finding great unanimity of sentiment so far as heard expressed by all included therein, they unhesitatingly recommend to the court the formation of a new township out of parts of the townships of Washington, Franklin, and Tyrone, with the following boundaries, viz.:

Beginning at Robinson's Mill on Jacob's Creek, on the line between Fayette and Westmoreland Counties, in Tyrone township; thence a straight line to Robert Hutchinson's barn, in Tyrone township aforesaid; thence a straight line to the foot of Grassy Island, in the Youghiogheny River, at the head of the round bottom; thence up the said river to the mouth of Virgin Run; thence up the said run to McDonald's Mill; thence by a new road recently located from said mill to the old road leading from Union Town to Pittsburgh near Robert Patterson's; thence with the said Pittsburgh road to the top of the hill near Martin Lutz's house; thence by a straight line to the Perrysville and Cookstown road, near where a ravine crosses said road on Thomas Patton's land; thence by a straight line to a white-oak tree on the Westmoreland County line, on the land of Jacob Snyder; thence by the county line aforesaid to the place of beginning."

June 7, 1839, the report was confirmed by the
HISTORY OF FAYETTE COUNTY, PENNSYLVANIA.

Court and a township erected "according to the lines of the plot returned, to be called Perry township." The following is a list of township officers of Perry from the time of its erection to the present:

PERRYPOLIS.

Before the year 1814, Dr. Thomas Hersey, Nathan Hersey, and Samuel Shreve had bought of George Meason a part of the Washington tract, with the intention of laying out a village or town upon their purchase. Thomas E. Burns owned land on the northeast of them, and became interested with them in the plating of the town. On the 16th of March, in the year named above, these four proprietors executed the "charter" of the town of Perryopolis, as follows:

"To all to whom these presents shall come, Greeting: Whereas we, the undersigned, Nathan Hersey, Thomas Hersey, Thomas E. Burns, and Samuel Shreve, of Fayette County, & State of Pennsylvania, for divers good causes and considerations thereunto moving, have caused to be laid off on the contiguous parts of our lands in Washington Township, County, & State aforesaid a number of lots interspersed with Streets and Alleys, in order to promote the erection of a Town, to be known by the name of Perryopolis. Now know ye that in order to promote the prosperity and encourage the improvement of said Town, and secure to the purchasers of lots therein the privileges and immunities necessary for the common interest, we, the undersigned Proprietors of Perryopolis aforesaid, feel it our pleasurable duty to give forth this our Charter, to wit: "Washington's Diamond," in the centre of said Town, is laid off one hundred and sixty feet square. The two principal Streets, 'Liberty' and 'Independence,' crossing each other at right angles in said Diamond, are laid off eighty feet wide. The alleys proceeding from each of the four corners of said Diamond are laid off twenty feet wide. All the other streets are laid out and intended to be sixty feet wide, and all other alleys are laid off and intended to be fifteen feet wide, as by the general plan hereunto annexed will appear. All which said Diamond, Streets, and Alleys shall be and remain of the above stipulated width and dimensions severally, any excess or deficiency in the measure of any lot or lots notwithstanding, and they are hereby declared to be public highways, and appropriated solely to that purpose. To have and to hold the free and undisturbed use of the ground of the above-described Diamond, Streets, and Alleys for the above purposes to the Purchasers, Inhabitants, and Citizens of the aforesaid Town of Perryopolis, its vicinities, and all other persons whatsoever demeaning themselves peaceably and as liege citizens of the United States, in common with ourselves, our heirs, and assigns forever, reserv-
In the laying out of the alleys eight triangles were formed, which were set apart for public uses as follows: No. 66, religious; 67, female school; 68, academy; 69, male school; 70, religious; 71, Masonic, medical, mechanic; 72, library; 73, "paupery." The charter and plat were filed May 3, 1837.

At the time of the laying out of Perryopolis there were but two or three straggling dwellings on its site. One of these was the house or cabin of John Wilgus, who as early as 1806 came from his native State, New Jersey, and settled on the Washington Bottoms, then in the township of Washington. He became a justice of the peace, and filled that office for many years. He is still remembered by the older citizens of Perry township. His son Joseph was born in 1807, where Perryopolis now is, and he is now living at Layton’s Station. Edward Wilgus, a brother of John, came here at about the same time. He was a shoemaker, worked at his trade here, and ended his days here. Some of his family are still residents of Perryopolis.

The platting of the new town had the effect to attract considerable attention to the place, and the discovery of sand suitable for the manufacture of glass induced the organization of a company for that purpose. The project being pushed with energy, and recommended to the people in glowing terms, the farmers and other well-to-do inhabitants of this section of country subscribed liberally to this enterprise, as also to the stock of a banking concern which was started about the same time. A flint-glass factory was erected where the Methodist Church and cemetery now are. From bad management or other causes none of these projects proved profitable to the original stockholders or of permanent advantage to the town. Their failure brought disaster to many public-spirited people who aided them by subscriptions, and Perryopolis never realized the prosperity and importance which at one time seemed assured by the establishment of these enterprises.

The Perryopolis Glass-Works is a name well known in this region, but very little definite information can now be obtained concerning their starting and subsequent operation. They were carried on by Thomas Bleakley, whose management resulted in disastrous failure and the sale by the sheriff of about twenty of the best farms in this section, their owners having sunk their property in subscriptions to the stock of the glass company. After 1839 the glass-works property came into the possession of John F. Martin and Jonathan Baker, and under their management became more successful. Later it came into the hands of Henry B. Goucher, under whom the business languished, and was finally discontinued. The property now belongs to the heirs of the late Andrew Stewart.

The Youngs^h^g^h^e^ny Banking Company was organized in 1814 by Eastern men, who succeeded in inducing the farmers through this section to subscribe largely to its stock. The only definite knowledge obtained of any of the affairs of this bank is the following advertisement, found in the columns of the Genius of Liberty of the year indicated, viz.:

"YOUGHOOGHE^N^Y BANKING COMPANY.

"Stockholders to attend at the house of Caleb B. Potter, in Perryopolis, on Monday, Nov. 18, 1816, in order to elect a Cashier, and for other purposes.

"JOSEPH BENNETT,"

"CASHIER PRO TEM.

"PERRYOPOLIS, OCT. 19, 1816."

The affairs of the bank were wound up gradually, and the management finally came into the hands of Robert Lynch and Jesse Arnold, and every dollar of its notes (presented for payment) was redeemed. So that the public lost nothing, though the original stockholders lost all. The old stone banking-house, on Liberty Street, was purchased by John F. Martin, who afterwards kept a store in it. It is now occupied by the Perryopolis post-office.

David Barnes and Joseph Barnet came here from Connellsville soon after the opening of the glass-works, and sunk a well near Washington’s Run to the depth of nearly three hundred feet in the hope of finding salt water. Their expectations were realized to the extent that they struck a vein of strong salt water, from which they were enabled to produce about two hundred bushels of salt, and they began to entertain high hopes of brilliant success, when, at the end of about a week, the flow suddenly and entirely ceased, and the manufacture of salt in Perryopolis was terminated, probably forever.

A newspaper was started in Perryopolis (soon after the laying out of the town) by William Campbell, a brother of Dr. Hugh Campbell, of Uniontown. He (William) had been the editor of the Fayette and Greene Spectator, in Uniontown, for one year from its first publication in 1811. The name of the paper he published in Perryopolis has not been ascertained. The office where it was published was on a lot opposite the residence of John Fuller. Campbell, the editor and publisher, had moved from Uniontown in 1812 to Washington township, where, in January, 1813, he married Priscilla, daughter of John Porter. The paper which he started in Perryopolis was short-lived, and after its discontinuance he removed to New Lisbon, Ohio, where he soon after commenced the publication of another journal.

The first tavern in Perryopolis was opened in 1815, by Caleb Porter, on the corner where Davidson’s Hall now stands. In this house all the public meetings of that time were held. Gen. Lafayette dined there in 1825, when on his way from Uniontown to Cookstown (Fayette City) and Pittsburgh. Among the landlords of the place from time to time were John Waldron, George Hazen, and Moses Jeffries, the latter of whom lived at the lower end of the town, where James Shepard now lives.

Among the early blacksmiths of Perryopolis were Daniel Fields, whose shop was on the school-house lot; Thomas Van Hook, on the McDonald lot; and William Kyle, where Adam Hixenbaugh now has a shop. In 1830, Mr. Hixenbaugh took the shop, and has been in the business continuously till the present time.

Samuel Porter came from Greene County, Pa., to Perryopolis in 1819. He was connected with the glass-works till about 1851, when he bought a part of the Turnbull tract, north of the Youghiogheeny River, where his son James now lives,—a part of the old Secrist tract. On this land he, with his son John, quarried stone for furnace use until 1860. About that time stone of the same quality was discovered in the mountains above Connellaville, where John and James Porter are now engaged in quarrying of it.

The first resident physician in Perryopolis was Dr. Thomas Hersey, one of the original proprietors of the town. He afterwards removed to the West. Among those who succeeded him in practice here were the following-named physicians: Dr. William Morris practiced and died here. Dr. McSherry came from Brownsville, practiced here for a time, and afterwards removed to Mineral Point, Wis. These were followed in practice by Dr. Mitchell; Dr. James E. Estep (died here in 1836); Drs. Patterson, Way, Crawford, Gordon, Johnson, F. Shugart, James Storer, Robinson, Abrams, H. B. Arnold, Grader, and McKeary. The present physicians of the town are Drs. O. P. McKay and J. H. Davidson.

Dr. McKay studied medicine at Washington, Pa., with Dr. J. W. Blatchley; attended lectures at the Ohio Medical College, Cincinnati; came to Perryopolis Feb. 12, 1866, and has since been in practice in the town to the present time.

Dr. Davidson is a native of Redstone township. He studied medicine with Dr. S. W. Chalfant, at Upper Middletown; attended lectures at the Western Reserve Medical College, Cleveland, Ohio; has been in practice in Perryopolis since Dec. 12, 1872. He is a member of the Fayette County Medical Society.

The postmasters of Perryville from the establishment of the office to the present time have been (as nearly as can be ascertained) as follows: Caleb Trevor, Moses Jeffries, William McCray, Adam Hixenbaugh, John Ebbert, Allen Murphy, John Voorhies, James Murphy, William Grist, John McCullough, Mary Campbell, and Lucy Martin, the present incumbent.

In 1838 a pottery was put in operation where Aaron Higbee now lives in Perryopolis. It continued to be worked by him for about fifteen years, then it was sold to John Ebbert, who ran it for one year. He sold to Thomas Suttle, who carried it on for about twenty years, after which it was discontinued. The kiln is still standing.

David Anderson, of Pittsburgh, built a pottery below the glass-works and near Washington Run in 1859. Three years later it was sold to John A. Murphy. It was kept in operation till 1868.

John Porter & Brothers started a pottery in 1859 in the rear of the Methodist Church. It was in operation only about three years, and then discontinued.

The sand and clay of Perryopolis and vicinity were found to be admirably adapted to the manufacture of glass and pottery-ware. Large quantities of sand were shipped about 1825 from this place to Pittsburgh, Monongahela City, Brownsville, Cookstown, and Elizabethtown. A vein of clay sixteen feet in thickness was used largely, both for the pottery-works here and for shipment to other markets.

In the year 1853, when stone blocks were being contributed from all the States of the Union for the erection of the Washington Monument, at Washington, D. C., a block for that purpose was quarried by Pierson Cope, owner of a part of the Washington Bottoms, from which it was taken. Its removal from the quarry to the "Diamond" in Perryopolis was made the occasion of a Fourth of July (1853) celebration, of which Gen. Joseph Markle was the president; William Campbell (who lived on the site of the old Washington house), Dr. David Porter, and other vice-presidents; and Col. William Y. Roberts, orator of the day. The procession which escorted the block from the quarry to the "Diamond" was large, and accompanied by a band of music. The stone (five feet in length and eighteen inches square) was loaded on a wagon drawn by four fine horses, trimmed and decorated with flowers and evergreens. Sitting on the block, and dressed in "regimentals," was an old negro called "Funty Munty," or Simon Washington, who had been a slave, and owned by Gen. Washington. This old man, with a stone hammer in his hand, occasionally pecked the stone, so that it might truthfully be said not only that the block was taken from land once owned by Gen. Washington, but that it was worked by one of his former slaves. The celebration was attended by nearly three hundred people, and great enthusiasm was manifested on the occasion.

Schools were taught at different times in an early day in several of the dwelling-houses of Perryopolis. Mrs. John F. Martin remembers attending school about 1820 in the bank building, where she now lives. The school was taught by a man named Tower, and afterwards by Isaac C. Murphy and — Ayres. In 1828 a school-house was erected on lot No. 69, which had been designated and set apart in the original plat.
and charter for the purpose of a male school. Under the school law of the State, this school-house came under charge of the school directors. It was used for schools for some years, and then abandoned. The present school-house was built in 1852, on lot No. 79, which was donated by the proprietors in the charter of the town for "Paupery." The schools of Perryopolis are at present under charge of Noah Patton as principal.

A lodge of the Independent Order of Good Templars was chartered in Perryopolis in May, 1879, with John A. Ebbert as W. C. Templar, and Miss Lucy A. Martin as Vice-Templar. It now contains about thirty-five members. The present (1881) officers are: Noah Patton, W. C. T.; Mollie Strawn, V. T.; Walter Hixenbaugh, Sec.; Lewis Herwick, Treas. Meetings are held in Davidson's Hall, Fayette Lodge, No. 172, Ancient Order of United Workmen, was chartered March 23, 1880, with sixteen members. It now (June, 1881) contains twenty-seven. The present officers of the lodge are as named below: P. M. W., E. K. Chalfant; M. W., William C. Drumm; Foreman, Joseph Newcomer; Overseer, T. G. Herwick; Recorder, N. O. Stinger; Financier, J. H. Davidson; Receiver, J. Baker, Jr.

The population of Perryopolis by the census of 1880 was three hundred and twenty-one.

LAYTON STATION.

This railway station, which has given its name to the small village clustered about it, is located on the right bank of the Youghiogheny River, in the east part of Perry township, on the line of the Pittsburgh and Connellsville Railroad, and was established at the time of the opening of that line. The first store was opened there by Henry H. Brollier, who was also a telegraph operator. He became successful in trade, and afterwards left the place and removed West. His successor in the store was James Stickle, who kept it two or three years, and sold to Baugh & Drumm, who are the present proprietors. Another store was opened by P. M. Hunt in 1876, and one has recently been built for Carson & Carr. The first postmaster at Layton Station was Henry H. Brollier, who was succeeded by James Carson, the present incumbent.

About 1868 the rock on the farm of Joseph Wilgus, at Layton, was found to contain a large percentage of pure silex, rendering it valuable in the manufacture of glass. Samples were sent to Pittsburgh, where its quality was pronounced excellent, and from that time to the present large quantities of it have been shipped to that city for use in the glass-works. Mr. Wilgus has sold a part of his land (about four acres) containing the rock to Noah Spear, who is constantly employed in supplying it for the glass-works in Pittsburgh. The amount now shipped daily to that place averages forty tons.

A bed of fire-clay, lying above the sand-rock, is found admirably adapted for union with German clay for fire-pots, and also unites well with the Missouri clay. This fire-clay is taken out and shipped by Mr. Wilgus at eight dollars per ton. In the past twelve years he has sold it to the amount of thirty thousand dollars, mostly for shipment to Pittsburgh. There is also found on his tract a Bond clay, which is used for the manufacture of fire-brick. In the year 1871 "The Diamond Fire-Brick Company" commenced work at this place, and in 1879 sold out to Davidson & Drumm, who have manufactured about two million bricks the past year. About an equal number are manufactured by the Keystone Fire-Brick Company, who commenced operations in the spring of 1880. These bricks are chiefly used in the construction of furnaces and coke-ovens.

Land on the bottoms along the Youghiogheny River was, in the early years, considered as of little value, and the locality was known as "Poverty Neck," but it has since proved a mine of wealth to its possessors by reason of the development of its sand-rock and fire-clay resources.

"Big Falls" in the Youghiogheny, near Layton Station, is a place noted for the many drownings and other accidents which have occurred in its swift current. In 1805 a man named Moorhead was drowned there by the swamping of a flat-boat. In 1807 another accident of the same kind occurred at this place, resulting in the death of one man. In 1810 a Mr. Dougherty, when in liquor (as was said), attempted to ford the river here and was drowned. In 1814 a flat-boat, loaded with pig-metal, was sunk here and one man drowned. In the same year George Ebbert and Martin Kennedy, both of Perryopolis, were drowned here from a raft of logs. In 1822 a man, while attempting to land an iron-loaded flat-boat, after passing through the dangers of the falls, jumped for the shore, but fell into the river and was drowned. In 1834 a coal-boat coming down the river at a high stage of water was wrecked at this place, drowning four men,—Andrew Butt, John Franklin, Andrew Knight, and Wesley Johns. In 1836, Andrew Bobb was killed while assisting in turning a flat-boat. In 1839, Uriah Strickler was drowned while attempting to take a boat through the falls. The accident occurred in March, but the body of the drowned man was not found till the following May. In 1850 a man was lost from a log raft above Connellsville, and his body was found a month later at these falls.

SCHOOLS OF THE TOWNSHIP.

Under the operation of the public school law of 1834, school districts were organized in the territory now Perry township, then included in Washington and Tyrone. After the erection of Perry as a separate township it was redistricted as it is at the present time into seven school districts, as follows:

Summer Hill District is in the north part of the township, bordering on the line of Westmoreland County, and west of the Youghiogheny River. The school-house is nearly in the territorial centre of the district.

West Point District embraces all the territory of the township lying between the Youghiogheny and Jacob's Creek.

Poplar Hill District lies west of Perryopolis, and extends to the west line of the township. The school-house is located near the line.

Perry District embraces the greater part of the village of Perryopolis, and extends northwardly to the Youghiogheny.

Herschel District includes part of the village of Perryopolis, and extends eastward along the Youghiogheny. The school-house is about a mile southeast of the village.

Stickle District lies in the southwest part of the township. The school-house is near the centre of the district, on the main road running southwest from Perryopolis.

Jackson District is in the southeast part of the township. Its school-house is near the residence of J. B. Blair.

The number of pupils attending the several schools of the township in 1880-81 was four hundred and forty-four. Number of teachers, nine; valuation of school property, $8,000; total expenditure for educational purposes during the school year, $1632.50.

RELIGIOUS WORSHIP—BURIAL-GROUNDS.

The Methodist Episcopal Church in Perryopolis was organized within a few years after the laying out of the town, and was from the first embraced on a circuit with other appointments. For many years their services were held in the school-house and in the bank building. About 1832 they erected a church edifice, which has been used as a house of worship until the present time, it having been repaired and remodeled in 1872. Among the preachers who have served this church may be named the Revs. Robert Boyd, — Sawhill, John Coyle, James Larcom, Samuel Wakefield, John Wakefield, J. C. Pershing, Patterson, Sheets, Davis, Cartie, and others. The church has now no regular pastor, but has a membership of about seventy-five. It belongs to the Redstone Circuit, being one of four appointments, viz.: Perry, Upper Middletown, Jones', and Dunbar.

Other denominations hold occasional services in the village of Perryopolis.

The Harmony Church (Cumberland Presbyterian) congregation, in Perry township, first used as a house of worship a log building which was erected for the purpose on land owned by William Bleakley, where there had previously been a distillery. The present church edifice (a frame structure) was built in the fall of 1859.

Among the pastors who have labored with this congregation have been the Revs. John Gibson, H. J. Anderson, A. J. Swain, James Beard, Luther Axtell, S. E. Hudson, and W. M. Hayes, the present pastor.

On the road leading from Perryopolis to the Red Lion, and near the township line between Perry and Jefferson, stands the old Quaker meeting-house, or rather the ruins of it, for the roof has fallen in, leaving only the ancient walls standing. This was built by the Friends of this vicinity so many years ago that none now living remember its erection. Adjoining the site of this old meeting-house, and also adjoining lands of S. Strickler, T. Shepard, and heirs of Benjamin Brown, is the old Quaker burial-ground, surrounded by a substantial iron fence, and kept in good condition by a small fund donated by some one of the Quaker sect for the purpose. In this old cemetery ground lie interred the remains of many of the early Friends and other settlers of the vicinity,—Jonathan Hewitt, John Shreve, Joseph Shreve, Samuel Cope, Joshua Cope, Isaac Cope, John Negus, Joseph Negus, Joseph Shepard, William Nutt, Jesse Coulodron, William Griffith, and many others. With the exception of this old ground the places of interment of those who died in Perry township in early years were upon the farms.

In Perryopolis a burial-ground was established on the land of the Methodist Episcopal Church, but burials are now chiefly made in the Mount Washington Cemetery, which was laid out on land taken for the purpose from the farm of Cyrus Martin, about a mile and a half south of the town.

There is also a cemetery in use at the Cumberland Presbyterian Church in the Browneller settlement.

BIODGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

JOHN H. DAVIDSON, M.D.

Although a young man, Dr. John H. Davidson, of Perryopolis, is one of the prominent physicians of Fayette County. He was born Nov. 15, 1845, in Redstone township, Fayette Co., at the old Brownfield tavern stand, two miles east of Brownsville, on the National pike. His early life was passed upon his father's farm in much the same manner that farmers' boys usually spend their time. He was educated in the common schools and Dunlap's Creek Academy, and read medicine in the office of Dr. Samuel B. Chalfant, of Upper Middletown, Fayette Co., and attended lectures at and graduated from the Medical Department of the Western Reserve University, of Cleveland, Ohio. He began his course in this college in 1868, and graduated in 1870. He was married Dec. 26, 1871, to Chilnissea J. Chalfant, daughter of Dr. S. B. and Elizabeth Chalfant. Mrs. Davidson died June 27, 1877. They had one child, Clayton Torrance Davidson, now a bright boy of eight years. The doctor was married again Jan. 10, 1881, to Mary E., the sister of his former wife.

Dr. Davidson is of English stock. His father, Jacob Davidson, was born in Westmoreland County, Pa., and married Hannah Kelley, of the same county. Soon after his marriage he located upon the farm where the doctor was born. He died in 1858. Mr. Davidsou's occupation was farming. He was a prominent member of the United Brethren Church, and was noted for his piety, and was a local preacher.

The doctor's grandfather, Jacob Davidson, was born in England. When quite young his father, who was a minister of the gospel, emigrated to America, and located in Philadelphia. Jacob, the doctor's grandfather, married Mary Young, of Franklin County, Pa. They came to Fayette County in 1837, and settled on the Basil Brown tract of land, near Brownsville. He died April 15, 1856, aged seventy-four years. He was a miller by trade, owned a large amount of land, and was long a director in the Monongahela Bank, of Brownsville.

After graduating Dr. Davidson first practiced his profession in company with his preceptor and father-in-law, Dr. Chalfant. He located in Perryopolis in December, 1872. From the beginning his practice there has been large and lucrative. He is recognized as a skillful physician. His judgment is excellent; his knowledge of men and general business acute. He has held the office of school director in Perry township, and, according to a late county superintendent of schools, was one of the very best directors in Fayette County. His possessions are houses, lands, bank stock, brick-works, book accounts, energy, good health, good sense or brains.

The doctor's maternal grandfather, Jacob Kelley, was born in England, came to America when young, and settled in Westmoreland County, Pa.

Dr. Davidson's parents, Jacob and Mary Davidson, were married June 2, 1855, and had ten children, nine of whom are living,—Mary, married to John Rice, Nov. 2, 1855; Elizabeth, married March 12, 1862, to Otho Brashear; Kate, married Jan. 23, 1867, to Benton Bennett; Lou, married Jan. 3, 1871, to James E. Crable; Haddie, married July 24, 1875, to Jesse Coldren; Anna, married Nov. 12, 1874, to Luther Noble; Amos W., married May 29, 1878, to Maggie Vernon; and Ada, who is single.

JAMES PEIRSON.

Among the old families of Perry township we find the name of Peirson. The first of the family to settle in Fayette County was William Peirson, who bought of Thomas Estel, in 1784, the farm now owned in part by James and Lewis Peirson. He was married to Miss Grace Cope, and was born, according to the Cope genealogical history, about the year 1748. For a time Mr. Peirson lived in a rudely built cabin, which in time gave way to a log house, which at that time was considered a model of elegance and comfort, and which still stands on the farm of James Peirson. In this he resided till his death at a ripe old age. His children were John, born in 1782; Sarah, 1785; Jeremiah, 1787; Samuel, 1789; Mary, 1792; Elizabeth, 1794; William, 1797; and James, the subject of this sketch, May 29, 1799. All of the children grew to man's and woman's estate. On the 29th day of June, 1823, James was married to Elizabeth Gue, who was born Oct. 2, 1806. To them have been born John, June 10, 1825; Mary Jane, Dec. 2, 1827; James A., Feb. 5, 1830; Sarah, Feb. 6, 1832; Joseph, July 4, 1834; Emeline, Feb. 2, 1837; Edith, March 17, 1839; Nancy V., May 6, 1842; and Jacob L., Nov. 28, 1851. After his marriage he went to Ohio and settled on a tract of wild land owned by his father. Here he remained four years, clearing away the forests and improving the farm when not engaged in his favorite pursuit of hunting, of which he was passionately fond, and at which he became an expert. Not liking his new home, he returned at the expiration of the four years, his place being filled by an older brother. On the death of his father the old homestead fell to him, on which he still resides and to which he has added, until it now comprises 300 acres of valuable land. For more than thirty years Mr. Peirsol has been a consistent member of the Baptist Church, and through a long life has been an honored and respected citizen.

Josiah King.

In the year 1816, George King, with his wife and children, moved into Fayette County, and in the township of Perry bought the fulling-mills which are now known as the Strickler mill property. It was a part of the General Washington tract. George was the son of Michael King, who was of German descent, and was born in York County, Pa. After his marriage to Susan Husbands he moved to Somerset County, where he bought a farm, on which he passed the remainder of his days. He was a local Methodist preacher, and his descendants have nearly all been of the same religious faith.

George was born July 4, 1774, on the home-farm in Somerset County, and, as set forth above, emigrated to Fayette County in 1816. He was a carpenter, and at intervals followed that calling for many years, quitting it finally for the farm. In 1794 he was joined in marriage to Miss Catherine Stickley. The result of this union was nine children, two of whom died in infancy; the others were Susan, Josiah, Enos, Caroline, Rachel, Mary, and William. He operated the fulling-mills a few years, then sold out and bought the farm now owned by James Carson. In 1840 he built a house near Perryopolis, in which he resided till his death, Nov. 7, 1844; his wife died July 24, 1838. Both were members of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

Josiah King, of whom this brief sketch is written, was born Dec. 18, 1801, on Laurel Hill, in Somerset Co., Pa. His chances for an education were limited to a few months' attendance at a country school, and completed in the school of life by observation and remembering what he saw, making his judgment on any subject desirable. From the age of sixteen to nineteen years he served as an apprentice as a cloth-dresser with Myers & McClay. He was then for three years a partner of William Searight in woolen cloth dressing, when the building of woolen-factories made their business unprofitable. We now for a few years find him building boats on the Youghiogheny River, and shipping sand and stone to Cincinnati and other points. This business proved remunerative, and he obtained a start in life. In 1835 he went on the farm he with others had bought in 1828 in Jefferson township. There he remained until 1845, when he rented of Robert Lynch the farm which he now owns (bought in 1848), and where he intends to pass the remainder of his long and upright life. The farm now consists of 180 acres of well-improved land, the result of industry and good management. On the 3d day of July, 1823, he was married to Nancy Lynch, daughter of Robert and Mercilla (Martin) Lynch. She was born May 27, 1804, on the farm where they now reside. Their children are L. R., born Aug. 11, 1824, married to Rebecca Shepherd. He emigrated to Winona County, of which he was three terms sheriff; died Nov. 8, 1868. Elizabeth, born March 5, 1826; married Dec. 25, 1845, to S. B. Chalfant. Catherine, born Jan. 28, 1828, married Michael C. Cramer; died May 21, 1855. E. L. King, born Feb. 17, 1830, married March 21, 1854, to Miss Mary M. Samborn. He is a physician of Ashtabula, Ohio, of which place he is now mayor. Enos King, born June 12, 1834, married June 12, 1856, to Polly C. Stephens. Mary Jane, born March 19, 1836, married to Rev. John McIntyre, March 15, 1860. Mercilla Ann, born Aug. 17, 1838, married Aug. 18, 1864, to John H. Martin. She died May 6, 1870. And George F., born Feb. 11, 1841, died May 17, 1851.
REDSTONE TOWNSHIP.

Redstone, one of the western townships of Fayette, has for its boundaries Jefferson on the north, Menallen and German on the south, Franklin and Menallen on the east, and Brownsville and Luzerne on the west. The total valuation of Redstone subject to county tax in 1881 was $660,948, or a decrease from 1880 of $8895. Its population June, 1880, was 1065.

Redstone contains valuable coal deposits, but these lie deep in the earth in most localities. Upon the land of Robert Tate and in the contiguous region the coal vein is rich and easy of development. The great highway through Redstone is now the old National road (so called), but a line of railway (the Redstone extension of the Pittsburgh, Virginia and Charleston Road) running along the northeastern border of the township is now nearly completed and will prove of great benefit to the people of Redstone.

Innumerable water-courses traverse the township, but Redstone and Dunlap's Creeks are the most noticeable and about the only ones having mill-power. The surface of the country is uneven and in many places quite hilly. There are many valuable farms and some rough ones, but generally considered the agricultural resources are quite up to the average. Oil deposits have been found on Redstone Creek and in other places. Oil-wells were sunk in 1870 by a company styled the Farmers' and Mechanics' Oil Company, and in some cases to the depth of a thousand feet, but operations were not satisfactorily pursued, although indications of more than ordinary promise were apparent. It is thought by many that profitable oil-wells will yet be sunk and operated in this township.

The township received its name from that of the creek which forms its northeastern boundary. The reason why the name was originally given to the creek is told in the "American Pioneer" (vol. ii. p. 55), as follows:

"The hills around abounded with bituminous coal, and along the water-courses, where the earth had been washed off, the coal was left exposed. The inflammability of that mineral must have been known to the inhabitants at that early period, for where these exposures happened fire had been communicated, and an ignition of the coal taken place, and probably continued to burn until the compactness and solidity of the body and want of air caused its extinguishment. These fires in their course came in contact with the surrounding earth and stone and gave them a red appearance; indeed, so completely burned were they that when pulverized they have been substituted, in painting, for Spanish brown. Many of the red banks are now visible; the most prominent one, perhaps, is that near the junction of a creek with the Monongahela River, a short distance below the fortification, and which bears the name of Redstone, doubtless from the red appearance of the bank near its mouth."

But the State geologist, in the third annual report on the geological survey of the State of Pennsylvania, gives a different account of the origin of the ignition of the coal-banks, viz.: "In many places the coal of the roofs has been precipitated by a slipping of the hillside upon the lower part of the seam, in which case the latter has often taken fire from the heat evolved by the chemical decomposition. This has occurred particularly at the mouth of Redstone Creek, in Fayette County, where the overlaying slate has been reddened by the combustion."

The earliest settlements in what is now known as the township of Redstone were made west and south of the centre, although there was but little difference in point of time between settlements in that section and in the country along the Redstone Creek. Indeed, some authorities give the creek region the precedence, but the advantage upon either side was too slight to call for special investigation. Among the first who came into Redstone to stay, if not indeed the very first, was George Kroft, the ancestor in this county of the now numerous Crafts, who through the changes of time have Anglicized the spelling and pronunciation of the name from Kroft to Craft. Mr. Kroft came from Germany to America as a "redemptioner,"—that is, he sold himself to pay his passage. Upon arriving in America he was indentured to Samuel Grable, a farmer living on the Eastern Shore of Maryland. In 1771, Kroft found himself in the possession of a family, some means, and an ambition to better his fortunes in a new country. Such a country he discovered in Southwestern Pennsylvania, and in Fayette County in the same year of 1771 he tomahawked a claim of eight hundred acres in the present township of Redstone. The land lay near and north of the site of the Dunlap's Creek Church, and near that site, not far from Dunlap's Creek, he put up his cabin. In testimony of the wild and lonesome condition of the region in which he located, he used to relate that his nearest neighbor was nine miles distant in German township, at a place called High House, and his next nearest at Beesontown (now Unioneontown). It would appear from these declarations made by Mr.
Kroft that he must have been at the time of his location the only settler in what is now Redstone township. In 1772, Mr. Kroft made a trip to Eastern Maryland for a supply of salt and other commodities, and upon his return brought a half-dozen young apple-trees and set them out near his house. One of the six apple-trees brought in by Mr. Kroft in 1772 still bears fruit, and, beyond that distinction even, is claimed to be the largest apple-tree in Fayette County. Six inches from the ground it measures two feet six inches in diameter, and it is said to have borne one season seventy-five bushels of apples. This tree stands on George M. Craft's farm.

Mr. Kroft (dying in 1806) had four sons, named Samuel, Benjamin, David, and John. Benjamin lived and died on a portion of the old farm, Samuel died in Luzerne, John in Greene County, and David on the old farm in 1837. David, who was the father of Mr. Elijah Craft, of Redstone, used to tell his son about the trials and privations that waited on pioneer life in Redstone, and among other things told how he and one of his brothers once rode twenty-five miles to a mill on the Youghiogheny to get a grist ground. For subsistence while they were gone they carried a mess of boiled corn, and when they got to the mill they found so many customers before them that by the time their turn came they had eaten all their boiled corn and spent a couple of days and nights in waiting, so that when they started for home it was upon empty stomachs that landed them at the parental roof-tree in a condition bordering upon starvation. David Kroft, herein referred to, became the father of thirteen children, and when his wife died the youngest of the children was but three weeks old. David bestowed watchful care upon them all, small as they were, despite the exhaustive field of labor incident to his farming pursuits, and gave to each a good education. Of the thirteen children six were boys. Of the six boys, Elijah Craft, of Redstone, is the only one now living. His brother George, who died in Ohio in 1877 at the age of eighty-eight, rode when a boy with his father to Brownsville in the winter of 1799-1800 to view the funeral ceremonies of Washington there displayed.

One of the daughters of old George Kroft married Peter Colley, one of Redstone's noted pioneers and a popular landlord of his day. George Kroft died in 1806, but how old he was he did not know himself, for he was a man but little given to either learning, reflection, or observation. George B. Craft, one of his grandsons, died in Redstone in 1878, aged ninety-three. Another of his grandsons, George, was at one time sheriff of Fayette County.

During the early period of George Kroft's residence in Redstone settlers felt much apprehension concerning Indian ravages, and although no very serious trouble came to them from that source, they were in constant dread for a time. There was at Mertittstown a fort, whither at the first alarm of the near presence of Indians neighboring inhabitants would flee, to remain until the signs of danger were past. A story told of a Mr. Wade, who lived on the present Fought place, is to the effect that each night he used to send his wife and little ones to the fort at Brownsville, while he himself would crawl into a hollowed log, and thus rest securely if not comfortably until morning, consoled with the reflection that if the savages should happen along there they would never dream that an innocent-looking log contained human prey.

Isaiah Ratcliffe, a Quaker, was one of Redstone's pioneer blacksmiths. He set up his shop near Dunlap's Creek Church, but did not tarry long. He died before 1800. He had made the journey from the East with Alexander Nelson, who made his settlement in Luzerne on the river. A son of Isaiah Ratcliffe now lives in Brownsville in his eighty-sixth year.

William Colvin, mentioned in early accounts as having been in the territory now called Redstone township as early as 1768, was doubtless a settler two years before that, or in 1766. He homesteaded a claim to a large tract of land, and put up a log cabin near what is now known as the Dunham place, not far from the Bath Hotel property. An old account-book kept by William Colvin, and now in the possession of Samuel Colvin, of Redstone, discloses the fact that William Colvin traded in a small way at his home near Brownsville as early as 1766. Under that date he charged John Sarvil, John Wise-man, Mr. Hamer, David Cook, Jonathan Himer with such articles as fine combs, rum, broadcloth, whisky, tobacco, egg-punch, egg-nog, vinegar, etc. In 1767 charges appear against John Davis, Capt. Colvin, Andrew Grigen, James Brown, Jacob Dri - ners, Richard Ashcraft, George Coran, George Moran, George Martin, Morris Brady, Moses Henry, Charles Ferguson, Aaron Richardson, Moses Holladay, John Jones, Alexander Bowlin, John Henderson, and John Martin.

William Colvin lived in a log cabin, as mentioned, and as can best be gathered from the records he left, must have kept a trading-place and tavern as well as a distillery. How long he remained after his first location cannot be told, but it is probable that he withdrew from that region about 1771, frightened away, doubtless, by fears of Indian aggressions, since it seems pretty well authenticated that when George Kroft settled on Dunlap's Creek in 1771 his nearest neighbor was nine miles away. Accepting that statement as true, the conclusion follows that Colvin was not in the vicinity at that time. That his absence was not prolonged to any great extent is tolerably certain. It is said that the floor of his cabin was composed of a single flat rock, which was at a late date broken up and used for house foundations in Brownsville. William Colvin, grandson of the William Colvin first named, was a surveyor of some note. He died in 1870 on the farm now occupied by his son Samuel, the only son of William Colvin in the township. Of eight sons six are, however, still living. William Colvin's widow, aged seventy-six, still resides on the old homestead with her son Samuel.

The settlement of the Finleys in Redstone was one of the conspicuous features of early local history, although, as a matter of fact, the Finley settlement proper was effected by a person who, although named Finley, was not akin to the actual owner of the land on which he settled. To trace the thread of the story from the source, the declaration is made that in or about 1765, Rev. James Finley, then a Presbyterian minister living in Cecil County, upon the Eastern Shore of Maryland, came into Southwestern Pennsylvania on a tour of observation, which included not only a religious mission looking to the preaching of the gospel to such settlers as he might find, but looking for land locations where he might after a while make homes for his sons. Accompanying Mr. Finley was a Chester County farmer and fuller, by name Philip Tanner, who was similarly in search of lands. Tanner and Finley made a wide circuit of the then almost unbroken wilderness of country, and tarried perhaps a month, Finley preaching here and there as he found opportunity. He is said to have been the first minister of the gospel (except army chaplains) who ever penetrated into Western Pennsylvania. Finley came into the country again in 1767, and again in 1771, each time on a preaching tour, and each time encountering an experience that must have made him not only familiar and warmly welcome to the people, but an experience that taught him valuable lessons in the school of pioneering, and toughened his own nature to endure the rigors of the wilderness. What had seemed a predilection in favor of the country in 1765 was confirmed as he became acquainted with it, and in 1771, considering that the population had then become numerous enough to warrant an effort to make such a land settlement as he had long looked for, he purchased a large tract of land upon Dunlap's Creek, within the present limits of the townships of German, Redstone, and Menallen. To this land then he returned the following year with his fourteen-year-old son Ebenezer, a farm hand named Samuel Finley (not related to the Rev. James), and a number of negro slaves. Philip Tanner, who bore Rev. James Finley company to Western Pennsylvania in 1765, located lands adjoining Finley's tract in 1779, and doubtless made a settlement about 1772; but details touching his residence in this county are so meagre that nothing can, with any degree of certainty, be told concerning him except that he died on his Redstone farm in 1801. In 1802 his executors sold the farm to John Moore. As to Rev. James Finley, he was at no time himself an actual resident of Fayette County, although his son lived and died in the county, and left within it many descendants who have to this day worthily maintained the name. Rev. James was settled in 1783 over Rehoboth Church, in Westmoreland County, and died in 1795. With this statement his history may be considered closed as concerns this record of Fayette County, save the remark that from the time of his coming in 1765 to 1783, thirty-four families, connected mainly with his congregation in Cecil County, removed to Western Pennsylvania. These families, it is said, intended to make their Pennsylvania settlements near each other, but coming out in straggling detachments as circumstances allowed they found themselves unable to secure lands as they desired, and thus they became scattered, although only so far that the area that included their homes measured less than forty miles between extreme points. There was nevertheless a Providence in this scattering of the families, for it was the instrument through which Presbyterian Churches were established at least at five points, to wit: Chartiers, Cross Creek, Rehoboth, Laurel Hill, and Dunlap's Creek. Of the thirty-four families named, twenty-two of the heads thereof became ruling elders of the churches named at their organization.

Ebenezer Finley played a conspicuous part in a perilous adventure with Indians near Fort Wallace in 1776. "Finley had gone from Dunlap's Creek on a short tour of militia duty to the frontier as a substitute for Samuel Finley, then in charge of the Finley farm. While Finley was at Fort Wallace tidings 1 were brought by a man on horseback in breathless haste that Indians had made their appearance at a little distance; that he had left two men and a woman on foot trying to make their way to the fort; and that unless immediately protected or rescued they would be lost. Some eighteen or twenty men, among whom was young Finley, started immediately for their rescue. About a mile and a half from the fort they came unexpectedly upon a considerable force of savages. They were for a while in the midst of them. A sharp fire began immediately, and a zig-zag running fight took place. Our people making their way back toward the fort, numbers of them were shot down or tomahawked.

"Finley's gun would not go off. He stopped for a moment to pick his flint and fell behind. An Indian was seen leveling his gun at him, but was fortunately shot down just at the moment. Being fleet of foot, Finley was soon abreast of his companions, and in passing around the root of a tree, by a quick motion of his elbow against his companion's shoulder, succeeded in passing him, when, the next moment, this comrade sunk beneath the stroke of a tomahawk. A Mr. Moore, seeing Finley's imminent danger from a bridge upon which he stood, stopped, and by his well-directed fire again protected him and enabled him to pass the bridge. At last, after several doublings and turnings, the Indians being sometimes both in the rear and ahead of him, he reached the fort in safety. But the most remarkable part of the matter remains to be told. Mr. Finley, the father, then at home east of the mountains, three hundred miles off, had, as he thought, one day a strange, undefinable impression that his son was in imminent danger of some kind, but he could form no distinct conception of its nature or cause. He betook himself to intense and agonizing prayer for his son, continued in this exercise for some time, felt at length relieved and comforted, as though the danger was past. It was altogether to himself an extraordinary thing, such as he had never before experienced. He made a note of the time. A few weeks afterwards he received from his son an account of his narrow escape from death. The time corresponded exactly with the time of Mr. Finley's strange experience. This is the substance of the statement we have received. Its accuracy, in its most essential features, may be relied on. What shall we say of it? Mr. Finley was a man of most scrupulous veracity. We leave the simple statement of the case to the reflections of the reader."

Ebenezer Finley grew to manhood in his adopted home, and rose to importance in the community. His home was in Redstone, on Dunlap's Creek, where at an early day he erected a grist-mill and saw-mill. The foundations of the saw-mill may still be seen, as may also the miller's house. Mr. Finley was married four times, and with his four wives rests now in Dunlap's Creek churchyard. He died in 1849 at the age of eighty-eight. Three of his sons, Ebenezer, Elliott, and Eli II., live now in Menallen, on portions of the land located by their grandfather, Rev. James Finley, in 1772. Robert, another son, died in Redstone in 1874. Of Ebenezer Finley the elder it is stated that he was upon one occasion plunged into great distress consequent upon his having hauled a liberty pole over to New Salem during the days of the Whiskey Insurrection. He did not happen to learn until after he had hauled the pole to its destination that it was intended to take part in a defiant demonstration on the part of the Whiskey Boys, and with that knowledge came the apprehension that the authorities might consider him equally culpable with the Whiskey Boys in defying the law. He was not a partisan, and he felt sure the Whiskey Boys and their abettors would be ultimately overthrown and punished, and knowing that circumstances pointed strongly toward him as an abettor as far as concerned the liberty pole business, he was in great fear lest he should meet with punishment. Happily for him no serious results attended his action.

John Laughlin, a conspicuous character in Redstone's early history, tomahawked a four-hundred-acre claim that included the present Benjamin Phillips and Colvin places. Laughlin was a bachelor, a farmer of some enterprise, and employed slave labor almost exclusively. He must have occupied his land as early as 1780, if not before. He was esteemed a man of considerable wealth, and was noted for keeping a large amount of it, in the form of gold and silver, tied up in a pair of buckskin breeches. Once when he lay quite ill he sent for his neighbors, William Colvin, Thomas Wells, and Samuel Grable, whom he requested to count in his and each other's presence the gold and silver that was within the buckskin breeches. That task they performed, and left him satisfied, and his mind relieved. Contrary to his expectations, however, he did not die that time, but he did die about six months later; and then, strange to relate, not a vestige of either his buckskin breeches or the wealth they contained could be found. There were many conjectures as to what had become of the money, and many faithful searches in every place of supposable concealment, but every search was fruitless, and the disappearance remained as much a mystery as ever in the end. People whoseupidity outran their judgment dug upon the present Benjamin Phillips farm in various places and under cover of night, hoping to unearth the treasure which then was and to-day is confidently believed by some persons to be hidden in the earth, placed there by the hands of old John Laughlin himself; but as the case stands at present, they are not likely to learn whether their theories are or are not correct. Mr. Laughlin's death occurred shortly after the year 1800, and although his silver and gold were not found, he left behind him a bountiful supply of this world's goods for those who came after him. He had been an excellent master to his slaves, and in his will left to each one a substantial reminder of his thoughtful care for them. Laughlin was not only a kindly-disposed and gentle master to his servants, but he was an earnest and faithful worshiper at the Dunlap's Creek Church, despite the fact that he was not a member thereof. For a long time, however, it was the generally-accepted belief that he was a member, and indeed the church-members themselves were so convinced that he was one of them that they chose him a ruling elder. When they learned from his own lips that he had never been in membership they were surprised and disappointed. That one so devout and regular in attendance upon church meetings could be without the circle did not once occur to them.

John Laughlin was as precise in his dress as in his manners, and as famous almost for his knee-breeches, slippers, silver buckles, and periwig as he was for his simple and correct methods of speech and honorable dealings with his fellow-men. He followed the business of distilling to a considerable extent, and kept his neighbors as well as his own farm-hands well supplied with the juice of the grain. An old manuscript in the possession of Mr. Benjamin Phillips purports to be an order from some person (signature missing) upon John Laughlin for the delivery to John Miller of two gallons of whisky "the day he begins to reap, and not before."

John Fulton, who located upon the present Samuel Colvin farm about 1800, died there in 1818. One of the daughters of his son, John L. Fulton, is Mrs. Benjamin Phillips.

The first survey of lands in Fayette County under the law of 1769 appears to have been made to Andrew Linn, Aug. 22, 1769. It lies in what are now Redstone and Jefferson townships, upon the Redstone Creek. The tract, including two hundred and forty-four and one-half acres, was called Crab-Tree Bottom, and is said to have had at one corner of the survey a plum-tree that was spoken of for a long time afterwards as a noted tree because it marked the beginning of the pioneer land survey. It stood upon a bank of the creek, into which it was washed many years ago. The tract named is now owned by J. M. Linn. At the point now occupied by J. M. Linn's mill a grist-mill was built by Andrew Linn's widow in 1796.¹ Additional surveys to the Linn's in 1769 are quoted as follows:

"To William Lynn two hundred and ninety-three acres called 'Whiskey Mound,' situated on the east side of the Monongahela River, in the new purchase, Bedford County, and surveyed Aug. 25, 1769, by order of survey No. 2847, dated April 5, 1769."

"To Andrew Lynn, in right of Thomas Pearce, 136½ acres, called 'Purchase,' situated on the east side of the Monongahela River, in the new purchase, Bedford County, and surveyed Aug. 26, 1768, by order of survey 1768, dated April 3, 1769." The first-named survey was made by Archibald McClean, deputy surveyor, the last two by A. Lane, deputy surveyor.

Some time before the year 1800, Benjamin Phillips (an ex-Revolutionary soldier) came with his wife from New Jersey, in company with Jonathan Hill, for whom he had agreed to drive a team across the mountains. Among Hill's effects was a chest that contained—so relates Mr. Benjamin Phillips, of Redstone—fully three bushels of silver and gold. The chest was in the possession of Mr. Benjamin Phillips, of Redstone, until within a few years, but where it is now is not known. Jonathan Hill located in Franklin, and built a mill upon the present Samuel Smock place. When he sold his property to Jonathan Sharpless, in 1810, he moved to Virginia, and there died in a lunatic asylum. Benjamin Phillips rented a small place in Jefferson township of Bateman Goe, and worked for the neighbors whenever he got the chance, for he was poor, and stove to get something laid by so that he could buy land for himself. He worked so hard that his health failed, and he spent a season in bed. His wife was, however, just the sort of a wife a man like him needed, for while her husband lay ill, and it was for some time, she not only attended to her domestic duties, but worked their small farm, and did it all, too, without calling for assistance from the neighbors. After tarrying a few years in the present township of Jefferson, Benjamin Phillips moved to Redstone township, and located upon the old State road, near the Menallen line, where he opened a tavern. Ultimately he changed his habitation to the farm whereon the widow of David Phillips now lives, and there he died in 1831, aged upwards of eighty-five. The only one of his children now living are Mrs. Edward West, of Iowa; Elijah Phillips, of Iowa, aged eighty-three; and Benjamin Phillips, of Redstone. Daniel C. Phillips died in 1878, aged seventy-five, and David Phillips in 1881, aged eighty-five.

Mr. Benjamin Phillips remembers a story told to him by his mother of her trip with her husband to New Jersey upon horseback on a visit to her parents, only a few years after they (the Phillipses) had come to Southwestern Pennsylvania. Mrs. Phillips carried her babe before her upon her horse, while Mr. Phillips had likewise a load, and thus on horseback they journeyed across the mountains by way of a road that for a great part of the distance was no better than a mere path through forests. Her experience had the effect of urging her to forswear forever any more journeys from Pennsylvania to New Jersey, and so she persuaded her parents to remove westward, which they shortly did, much to their daughter's gratification.

In 1789, Thomas Gallagher came from east of the mountains with a wife and two children, and with them first found a home in the West in the loft of a spring-house on Ebenezer Finley's farm, in Redstone township. Mr. Gallagher had bought the land known as the James Black tract, but the tenant upon the place was not prepared to move out of the farm-house, and so until the following spring Mr. Gallagher and his family had to get along as best they could. Thomas Gallagher was commissioned, Oct. 18, 1813, as adjutant of the Ninety-first Regiment. He was taken ill in service and came home to die. Gallagher occupied a portion of a tract of six hundred acres taken up by Robert Evans. Nov. 25, 1771, the proprietors of Pennsylvania patented to Robert Evans two hundred and fifty acres in the forks of Dunlap's Creek and Four-Mile Run, joining lands of John McKibbin's, and including a stony spring to the eastward of Thomas Scott's cornfield, in the county of Bradford. Of Thomas Gallagher's grandparents now living, J. M. and W. K. are citizens of Redstone, and E. T. a resident of Luzerne. J. M. Gallagher, now a farmer near Merrittstown, was a merchant in the last-named place from 1815 to 1856. His wife is a granddaughter of Sam Brady, famous in the olden time as a scout and Indian-fighter.

Capt. John Moore, a famous figure in Redstone's early history, was a settler as early as 1770 in the southern portion of the present township, upon a farm until recently owned by John and William Moore. Capt. Moore came out to prospect, and lived six weeks in a hut. During that time he devoted himself to hunting and land-looking, and saw no human being until one day at the end of six weeks he encountered old Billy Davis, who was living in German township, and who, like Moore, was living in a hut alone while considering the matter of making a new home in the wilderness. Capt. Moore had a large family of children. Their names were George, John, Aaron, Rezin, Ezekiel, Rachel, Hannah, and William. Rezin and William settled in Redstone. William was never married. Rezin had ten children. Of them living now are John M., Mrs. Samuel Herron, and William R. Capt. Moore served in the war of 1776, and won a record for more than common bravery. Upon the old Moore place in 1778 he planted an apple-tree that still bears largely of fruit. He brought it over the mountains along with a half-dozen others in his saddle-bags. Capt. Moore died in Redstone, and was buried on the old Moore farm.

Abraham Landers, a settler about 1790 in the southern portion of Redstone, was one of the early sawyers at Ebenezer Finley's saw-mill. His children numbered four. They were named Polly, Sallie, Abraham, and Jacob. Polly was the mother of Mrs. W. R. Moore. James Frost, to whom a place called "Laphand" was surveyed Feb. 5, 1784, was a prominent pioneer in Redstone. When but seven years of age he came to the township with his step-father, William Rose, who located on what is now known as the David Fuller place. Mr. Frost was grandfather of Mrs. W. R. Moore. He was married three times, and died in 1854 upon W. R. Moore's farm. His son, J. L., who died in Redstone in 1869, had ten children. Eight are now living, and of the eight all save one live in Fayette County. Jacob Hibbs is supposed to have come from Loudon County, Va., to Redstone as early as 1789. Lacey, the only one of his sons to make Redstone a permanent home, married Sallie, daughter of George Kroft, and lived at first on the farm now owned by Aaron J. Hibbs. He died in 1819. He had five sons and three daughters. The only son now living is Samuel C. Hibbs, of Redstone. William Ball, one of Redstone's pioneer blacksmiths, had a shop in 1809 near Redstone Creek. He died in 1865. His widow still lives in Redstone.

Philip Fought, a German, emigrated to America to escape the turmoil incident to a religious commotion in Germany, and settled in Chester County, Pa. About 1780 he moved to Fayette County, and made a settlement in Redstone township upon a seven-hundred-acre tract of land, now comprising the four farms that are owned by James Fought, Daniel Craft, Mathias Hess, and John L. Reisbeck. James Fought's place in Redstone, always owned by a Fought, is now in the third generation of succession in the name. Mr. Philip Fought, who was singular in his dress, and appeared invariably in attire fashioned in a peculiar style of his own, established a wagon-shop, blacksmith-shop, and plow-shop upon his farm, and carried on the business with perseverance until old age ended his labors. Of the elder Fought's family of six children there were four sons,—James, William, George, and Philip. George was a soldier under Mad Anthony Wayne at Stony Point, where he was wounded in the left arm, rendering it useless. Some time later he took a boat-load of supplies down to New Orleans, where he died of yellow fever. James and William died in Virginia. Philip died on the old farm in Redstone in 1850, aged eighty-two.

Joseph Gadd located in 1800 upon the S. C. Hagerty farm, a half-mile west from Tuckertown. He died in Redstone in 1852, aged seventy-nine. One of his daughters married William Hatfield. Isaiah Stephens was an early comer to the place now owned by Joseph Gadd, who married one of Stephens' daughters. Thomas Hatfield, grandfather of Joseph Gadd, fought under Jackson at New Orleans. The wife of the elder Joseph Gadd (first named above) died on the present Joseph Gadd place in 1875, aged ninety-six years. Isaiah Stephens died on the same farm in 1814.

The McCormicks were among Redstone's early settlers, and among the most esteemed. James McCormick settled in Jefferson in 1789, and died there in 1847, aged eighty-five. John C. McCormick, one of his sons, was born on Dunlap's Creek, where his father was at one time a settler. John C. was a house-carpenter as well as farmer. His farm, south of Cook’s Mills, was during his possession thereof regarded as a model. He was an ardent Presbyterian, and with others founded the Central Presbyterian Church of Menallen. He died in 1876. Of James McCormick’s seventeen children the living are seven in number.

Griffith Roberts, of Chester County, with a family of four children, traveled westward over the mountains in company with William Jeffries and family about the year 1800. Roberts made his home in Redstone township, on the farm now occupied by John Hibbs, in Pleasant Valley District, and bought by Roberts of Anthony Sills. Jeffries settled in Union township. Mr. Roberts was a stone-mason and plasterer by trade, and upon his settlement in Redstone pursued that occupation with great industry. George Chalfant, a lad whom Roberts had brought west with him, worked and lived with the latter, and became a skillful mason. George Chalfant bought a farm in 1809 of Cavalier Wheaton. There he died in 1858, aged seventy-six, and there his son Finley now lives. Mr. Roberts himself did not live in a very magnificent house, for it was, as a matter of fact, simply a log cabin with a clapboard roof; but he constructed good houses for other people, and is said to have done his work exceedingly well. He plastered a house in Bridgeport about seventy years ago, and the plaster is as firm and smooth now as it was when put on. Mr. Roberts died in 1825, aged eighty years. His only son, Griffith, married a daughter of Edward Morris, who lived in the Finley settlement.

Edward Morris was especially noted for being a large man. His weight was three hundred and thirty pounds, and that of his daughter, who married Griffith Roberts, Jr., three hundred and twenty. Morris moved from Redstone to the State of Ohio. Griffith Roberts died in 1819. His son, Judge Griffith Roberts, lives now in Bunker Hill District, Redstone township.

There was a pretty numerous settlement of Quakers along Redstone Creek where the stream separates Redstone township from Jefferson and Franklin, and the members of this settlement, coming in about the year 1800, were located in each of the three townships named. Among these people the most prominent personage was Jonathan Sharpless, who lived first in Redstone, afterwards in Jefferson, and lastly in Franklin, where he died. He was a quaint, blunt-spoken Quaker, who always said what he meant, and for whom his brother Quakers felt a very high esteem. The first of the family who emigrated to this country were John Sharpless and two brothers from Wales, who came with William Penn. They took up a thousand acres of land in Chester County, about twenty miles from Philadelphia. John had a son Joseph. He also had a son Joseph, who was the father of Jonathan, who emigrated to Fayette County. His first wife was Edith Nicolls, of Wilmington, Del., in which place they lived until their two children, Samuel and Elizabeth, were born. Jonathan was a blacksmith by trade, having served an apprenticeship of seven years. He settled on Big Redstone in 1796, in which year the firm of Sharpless & Jackson erected the famous Redstone paper-mill, it being the first paper-mill west of the mountains, and first lived on the Gillespie farm, where West Brownsville now stands, but Jackson in a short time converted an old stable into a house on the paper-mill grounds. His second wife was a daughter of Peter Miller, of Redstone. He died Jan. 29, 1809, at the Redstone homestead, in the ninety-third year of his age, his first wife having died in May, 1823, and of the death of his second wife we have no date. He left eleven children. Those who were living in 1870 were William, Sabina, Edith (Mrs. Piersol), of Mehaska County, Iowa, and Priscilla (Mrs. Morgan Campbell), of Scottsdale, Westmoreland Co., Pa.

William Sharpless was born on the Redstone paper-mill farm, Feb. 7, 1797. He was married to Mary Colvin, Oct. 23, 1823, who was born Jan. 30, 1802, and died Aug. 12, 1870. He had no children, and was in the paper business most of his life. The product of his mill was widely known as the standard paper of the country. The old paper-mill was burned many years ago, and on the ground now stands what is known as the Parkhill flouring-mill. He was long a member of the Baptist Church, and the present edifice, well known as the Redstone Baptist Church, was erected chiefly through his individual effort and means. He died Nov. 22, 1881, at the residence of Capt. S. C. Speers, Allen township, Washington County.

Among other prominent members of the sect in that locality may be named Theodore Hoge, Peter Miller, James Veech, Samuel Vail, Joseph Woodmansee, and Micah Smith. These were instrumental in erecting a log meeting-house in what is now known as Centre School District, and there the Friends regularly assembled for many years. By and by the ranks began to grow thin, and the number of Friends had dwindled away in 1856 to less than half a score. In that year the meetings were discontinued, and with the death of Jonathan Sharpless, in 1860, passed away about the only remaining evidence of the existence in the neighborhood of a community of Friends. A graveyard laid out by the Quakers at the church is still used occasionally, though it is a neglected spot, where broken and crumbling headstones and rankly growing weeds contribute to the appearance of desolation. But few of the headstones bear any inscriptions, but simply initials rudely cut. Two stones record the burial of “Mr. Sharpless” and “Joseph Sharpless.” Others are marked W. P.; P. C., Esq.; C. M.; J. F.; D. C.; C. P.; E. S. F.; and H.

In 1789, Samuel Grable came from the Eastern Shore of Maryland and located a tract of about six hundred acres in the present township of Redstone. Mr. Grable's property was known as the "Maiden's Bower," and was patented to him in 1785. He lived on what is called the Beal place, and died there in 1811. His children numbered nine. His sons were David, Samuel, and Philip. David removed at an early day to Kentucky. Samuel, Jr., and Philip remained on the old farm and died in the township. Philip married a daughter of Jeremiah Downs, who in 1787 patented land lying in Redstone, upon the creek where William Norcross now lives. In 1795 Philip bought of Peter Rothwell the place on which Earhart Grable now lives, Rothwell himself living then where Thomas Canfield now resides. The Earhart Grable place Rothwell had got from Zelah Rude, who was living on it in 1789. Two daughters of Philip Grable, aged respectively eighty-one and eighty-two, are at present living with their brother, Earhart Grable.

 Mentioning as among the early settlers of Redstone the names of Samuel Wheaton (now living in the township at the age of ninety-three), Barig Brashears, John Tate (who died in 1799), James Winders, Stephen Randolph, Timothy Smith, James Frost, the Hibbs families, and Christopher Perkey, we come to Samuel West, who established a wagon-shop near the river in Luzerne township before 1800, and after gaining much fame and profit in the business moved over into Redstone, and located as a farmer near the place now occupied by his son James. The last named has been constantly engaged since 1831 in the manufacture at his farm of waggons and carriages, in which business he is still largely employed.

In 1809, John-on Van Kirk (whose father, William, was a Revolutionary soldier) rented a piece of land near Merrittstown, and farmed it until 1816, when he moved into the Finley settlement in Redstone, where he had purchased two hundred and thirty acres of land of John Moore's heirs. This John Moore was a man of considerable note among the pioneers, and was especially famous as a skillful manufacturer of spinning-wheels. Johnson Van Kirk lived in the Finley settlement until his death in 1879, at the age of eighty-three years. Three of his sons now reside in Redstone. They are named Zenas, Theodore, and Elijah. Zenas lives on a patent obtained by Robert Evans in 1775, and sold by Evans to Thomas Gallaher in 1799. George Gallaher carried on at that place at one time a distillery of considerable importance. Leonard Lennhart, living now on the pike in Redstone, settled on the place in 1800. His father, Michael Lennhart, came over the mountains about 1800, and locating first on the Yongh, removed soon after to Cookstown, where he set up as a wagon-maker. Michael was drafted in 1814 into the military service, but the war closed before he was called upon to go. Upon one of his periodical trading trips down the Ohio he was taken ill and died near Cincinnati. He had twelve children; five were sons, and of them two are living,—Leonard in Fayette, and Philip in Westmoreland County. J. A. Noble, living now in Redstone, located in 1863 upon his present farm, which was patented in 1796 by Thomas Jones. Mr. Noble worked as a glass-cutter at the Albany Glass-Works, on the Monongahela, in 1832.

On the 28th of February, 1785, Alexander McLean, deputy surveyor, surveyed a tract of land to Elizabeth Briscoe, in trust, containing 297 acres. McLean described the land as "situated on the north side of Burd's road, and on the new road leading to Pearce's mill on the Redstone Creek, in Menallen township, Fayette County." He adds this note to John Lukens, Esq., surveyor-general: "This survey was made in order to give a proper representation of a controversy between Thomas McIlroy and Elizabeth Briscoe, in trust for her children. McIlroy had obtained a warrant, which I had executed previous to this coming to hand, and which is caveat'd by her attorney, viz., Jacob Beeson. It appears that all of McIlroy's pretensions to a right previous to the warrant was a pen raised three logs high and his name marked on a tree. Edward Todd also caveat's the acceptance of this survey as well as that of McIlroy's, alleging some kind of equitable right to a part of it."

William Price came to Fayette County from Washington County, Pa., in 1797, having received a patent for his land June 27, 1796. Of his eight children the sons were Joel, William, Harmon, David, Isaac, and Henry. Joel Price had six children. He died in Redstone, Nov. 4, 1864. His three sons—W. D., T. B., and H. W.—are still living.

One of the early grist-mills of Redstone stood upon the Redstone Creek, just north of where the Baptist Church stands, and upon land patented in 1794 by John Gary, who was the mill proprietor. The mill-site was occupied in 1836 by Levi Colvin, Morris Truman, Joseph Truman, and William Sharpless with a paper-mill. When the floors were laid the mill was dedicated by religious services by Rev. Mr. Speer, in the presence of a large company of guests. Sharpless & Co. continued the business until 1845, when John Taylor bought out the Trumans, and as then formed the partnership of Taylor, Sharpless & Colvin endured until 1859. William Sharpless then retired from the firm, but in 1860 purchased the entire interest in the mill and became its sole proprietor. He experimented in the manufacture of straw paper, but his venture was not successful, and after a brief experience he abandoned the mill, which stood idle from that time.

The following tavern-keepers were licensed in Redstone between 1798 and 1800: John Bartlett, Ams Wilson, Jonathan Hickman, Francis Griffith, Peter Kinney, in September, 1798; Elias Bayliss, December, 1798; George Kinnear, September, 1799; Tobias Butler and Samuel Salter, September, 1799; James Brown, December, 1799; John Richards and Herman Sudger, in June, 1800.
The National road traverses Redstone township, and in the days of its livesth travel imparted much animation to that portion of the township lying along its course. Previous to the days of the National road, however, there was a State road, over which a great deal of traffic passed, and upon which there were in Redstone several taverns. This road entered the township near the site of the Menallen Cumberland Presbyterian Church, and passing towards the west along by the place known as the old Colley tavern stand, traversed thence to Brownsville, about the course now pursued by the National road. One of the earliest taverns on that highway in Redstone was a house kept by Benjamin Phillips before the year 1800. Morris Mahler kept a tavern a little south of Phillips' place, where a man named Green, and succeeding him John Piersol and Robert Johnson, kept the Green Tree inn in a log house that stood upon the farm now occupied by Nathan Phillips. There was also old Peter Colley's tavern farther along on the State road, and still westward the Red House tavern, on the present G. H. Bowman place, where Matthias Hess lives. Cuthbert Wiggins (known for short as "Cuddy") was the landlord of the Red House as far back as 1810. That house is now and has been for as long as any one can remember the voting-place for Redstone township. The stone house in which Elijah Craft lives was built in 1817 by Wilkes Brown for a tavern, and a stable, compact house it is even at this day. It stands a little back of the pine now, but when built was upon the old State road. Wilkes Brown, Thomas Brown, and Basil Brown were early comers to Fayette County, and in Brownsville and vicinity, reaching into Redstone, owned a great deal of land. Taverns were also kept on the old road by William Hastings (where Leonard Lenhart lives), and by some person on the Higginbotham place, east of the Red House. There were indeed taverns in great abundance, such as they were, but they were at best nothing to boast of. Business was, however, brisk, for travel was lively, and besides freight traffic there were stages too, but the stage-houses were elsewhere than in Redstone. Tradition repeats tales of robbery and even murder when speaking of the old State road, and refers especially to one old dreary wayside inn where travelers were often despoiled, and where a peddler was once robbed and murdered; but such stories oftimes attach to the past of historic highways, and there is doubtless in them, as in this case, a liberal amount of fiction.

When the National road came into existence in 1818-20 the tide of travel, largely increased in volume, was turned from the old State road into a new and broader channel, and as a consequence there came a demand for better taverns. The best of its class in Redstone was the stone house now occupied by William Hatfield, at a place called Tuckertown, so named, it is said, by Col. Thomas B. Searight in a spirit of sport, for there is not at the spot, nor ever was there, a sign of a village. Johnson (who had, by the way, been landlord of the Green Tree tavern on the State road, and some years before that a hand in Jackson & Sharpless' paper-mill on the Redstone) built the stone tavern about 1816 or 1817. In 1814 there was nothing at Tuckertown but the blacksmith's shop and residence of George Wintermute. In that year a twelve-year-old orphan lad named William Hatfield (born near Plumsock) tramped into Wintermute's shop and asked to be taken as an apprentice. Wintermute rather fancied the lad, and not only agreed to take him as an apprentice but soon adopted him as his son. Hatfield worked faithfully with Wintermute until 1836, and upon the latter's removal to Ohio purchased his shop and business at Tuckertown (or Johnson's, as it was then called). Hatfield carried on a good business as blacksmith and farmer until 1840, having in 1836 provided the State with all the iron toll-gates erected on the pike within Fayette County. In 1842, Mr. Hatfield bought of Robert Johnson the stone tavern stand which, as before observed, had been built (by Randolph Dearth) for Johnson in 1817. After the sale of his Redstone tavern stand Johnson moved to Franklin township, where he died.

By 1842 Johnson's tavern had become a famous place, and was well known the whole length of the road. It was not only a stage-house, where the stages of the Good Intent Line changed horses and dined passengers, but where throngs of travelers put up every night. The great tavern-yard was always crowded with wagons and teams, and the noisy barnroom with troops of drivers and travelers, among whom the spirit of sociability made friends and boon companions of all hands. As an evidence of the amount of travel passing over this portion of the National road in the early days, Mr. Johnson Van Kirk says that once, while journeying from Johnson's to Uniontown, he counted no less than eighty great freight-wagons, hauled by teams of six horses or more, besides stages and a miscellaneous assortment of four-wheeled vehicles. Arthur Wallace rented Johnson's of Hatfield from 1842 to 1843, and in 1844 Charles Guttery was the landlord. In 1845, when James K. Polk, President-elect, passed over the pike to his inauguration, he traveled by the Good Intent Stage Line and dined at Johnson's. His progress had been a sensation that drew in his train many curious sightseers, and when he stopped at Johnson's for dinner there was a numerous crowd in attendance to get a good look at the man who had been chosen to be the people's ruler. Andrew Jackson stopped at Johnson's while making a trip over the road, and it is said also that Henry Clay tarried there briefly one day. Landlord Guttery reigned over the fortunes of Johnson's six years, and was followed by John Foster (1849 to 1851), and Hiram Holmes (from 1851 to 1852). In 1852, William Hatfield took charge of the tavern, and kept it open until 1855, when the opening of railways diverted traffic from the pike, closed the doors of the famous roadside taverns, and hushed the stir and animation that had for years made the old National road a panorama of busy life. William Hatfield, who had become by that time a man of means and a large land-owner, lived at Tuckertown until his death. He served in Redstone township as justice of the peace for the space of ten years, and associate judge of the Court of Quarter Sessions. There were besides Johnson’s the taverns of Peter Colley and others on the pike within the limits of Redstone township, but they were of no especial consequence, and came in for only irregular and uncertain patronage.

Richard Mills, an old man of more than ninety, still living in Minnesota, was in his day a famous character in Redstone, and indeed a famous man from one end of the National road to the other. He lived on a portion of the Hatfield place, and was known far and near as a slave-trader. When the season permitted it he traveled the road between Virginia points and the Monongahela in charge of gangs of slaves, purchased in the Old Dominion. The sight of Dick Mills marching a company of chained slaves was a common one in the olden time.

Timothy Canfield, who emigrated from Ireland to America in 1809, came to Fayette County in 1813, and in 1820 took a contract to do a large amount of work on the National road. In 1834 he bought a farm in Redstone originally occupied by Joseph Woodmansee. There he settled and lived until his death in 1874, aged ninety years. Three of his sons are still living,—Thomas on the old farm, John in Iowa, and Daniel in Kansas.

Cook’s Mills, so called from the establishment at that point by Thomas Cook in 1812 of a saw-mill and grist-mill, is a small hamlet lying on the Redstone in the northeastern corner of the township. The settlement at Cook’s Mills was founded by John and Richard Fallis, who about the year 1800 built there a grist-mill and fulling-mill. They pursued the business until 1812, when they sold out their interests to Thomas Cook, previously living near Perryopolis, where he located in 1791, and carried on until 1812 the business of general mechanic. With the mill property on the Redstone Cook acquired from the Fallis brothers about seventy-five acres of land, and building there a shop for the manufacture of plows, etc., he set himself to the pursuit of that industry, while he gave to his son John charge of the grist-mill, and leased the fulling-mill to William Searight. The elder Cook was a skillful workman in iron, and in the manufacture of plows was so famous that people came from afar to give him orders. He was, moreover, a millwright and carpenter, and until a few years before his death in 1842, at the age of eighty-seven, was industriously employed in mechanical pursuits at Cook’s Mills and the vicinity.

John Cook, whom his father placed in charge of the grist-mill, knew scarcely anything about practical milling, and protested to his father that he would make a sorry mess of it, but the old gentleman insisted, and John determined then to do what he could to promptly master the situation. The first grist he ground was a three bushel lot of wheat for Joseph Woodmansee, and out of it he got one hundred and twenty pounds of flour. John knew the quantity was up to the standard, but he was not quite sure as to the quality, and with much solicitude he begged Mr. Woodmansee to report upon the flour after the family test had been made. Accordingly Mr. Woodmansee happened at the mill three days afterwards, and, much to Cook’s gratification, reported that the flour was the best the Woodmansee family had ever had in the house. Cook was delighted, and to this day refers with pleasure to the excellent luck he had with his maiden grist. He got to be a successful and even famous miller, and did such a brisk business that he ground day and night on custom and merchant work. Sixteen barrels of flour was his average yield for twenty-four hours. He bought wheat all over the country from Uniontown to Belle Vernon, and shipped flour to Philadelphia, as well as to many customers along the line of the National road in Fayette County. For fifty-five years, or from 1812 to 1867, John Cook stuck faithfully to his post as the miller of Cook’s Mills, and during that extended term of service he never lost a day while he had health and strength. He is still living at Cook’s Mills in his ninety-third year, and in the enjoyment of moderately good physical health and mental vigor. In 1832 he built a new grist-mill, the one now carried on by his son Henry. From 1812 to 1881 the mill property has always been in the hands and possession of a Cook. The old log fulling-mill that had been operated by the Fallis brothers upon the present site of the Cook Brothers’ woolen-factory was leased by Thomas Cook to William Searight, who made the business so successful that he had in a few years saved five thousand dollars from it. He fulfilled as high as two hundred pieces of cloth in a year.

In 1829-30, Thomas Cook, Jr., built the present woolen-factory, stocked it with valuable machinery, and leased it to Ephraim Pilling, James Pilling, and James Hamer, who were the first to manufacture woolen cloths at Cook’s Mills. Thomas Cook, Jr., took possession of the factory business after a while, and carried it on until his death in 1873. His sons, Thomas and Playford Cook, are the present proprietors of the business, in which they manufacture blankets, flannels, satinets, cassimeres, jeans, and all kinds of yarn. They use both steam- and water-power, and employ usually a force of six hands. John Smith is believed to have opened the first store at Cook’s Mills, but when he opened it or how much of a store he had are now not to be ascertained. Likewise Shadrach Negus did a small tanning business on the creek at Cook’s Mills, but recollection of him as well as of Smith is vague and uncertain. The first store of any consequence was first kept by Thomas Cook, Jr.

The store now at Cook's Mills was established there by John S. Marsh in April, 1881. He was a storekeeper at the place twenty years or more before that date, but in 1862 transferred his store just over the creek into Jefferson township, in which year he was appointed postmaster of Tippecanoe post-office. The Tippecanoe post-office was established about 1856, at which time there was a sharp contest between the residents of the respective localities of Cook's Mills and the Sharpless paper-mill for a post-office. Mr. William Colvin, of Jefferson, acted on behalf of the paper-mill location, and not only suggested the name as not borne by any other office in the State, but was mainly instrumental in securing the office location at the mill. W. C. Johnson claims that he and Postmaster Sloan, of Brownsville, fixed upon the name of Tippecanoe, in remembrance of the old-time election songs of the Harrison campaign. John B. Patterson, then keeping a store at the paper-mill, was appointed the first postmaster, and was succeeded by William W. Strebig. In 1862, John S. Marsh was appointed, moved the office to Cook's Mills, and since that date has been the postmaster.

Cook's Mills' first resident physicians were Dr. Washington Barras and his brother William, who practiced in partnership from 1862 until a short time afterwards. Both are now dead, William being said to have been blown up on a Southern steamer. The next physician was Dr. Houston Finley, who remained about three years. He resides now in Streator, III. Dr. John Davidson, who came after him, stopped but two years. He is now in Perryopolis.

Andrew Guiler, the present village physician, located here in 1879. A Dr. Baltz built a water-cure establishment in Redstone in 1846, and conducted it to 1850, when, discouraged with his poor success, he abandoned the enterprise.

William Thornton, one of Redstone's early settlers, was killed in 1853 by one Peter Kelly. They met on the National road, and in the heat of a controversy that was but a renewal of an old feud Thornton was killed. Kelly was sentenced to a term of twelve years' imprisonment and served his full time.

TOWNSHIP ORGANIZATION AND CIVIL LIST.

In March, 1797, certain citizens of Menallen township petitioned for the division of the township, whereupon the court ordered at the December term in 1797 as follows: "On the petition of sundry inhabitants of Menallen township praying a division of the same township, beginning at the corner of German township; thence with Dunlap's Creek to Ebenezer Linsley's saw-mill; thence with the great road to John Townsend's mill; thence with the new road leading to Brownsville to a draught or run at Thomas Fitz Randolph's; thence with the said draught or run past Conrad Muller's to the forks of the same at David Brewer's; thence in a direction to intersect the Broad Ford road at the house of Andrew McKinney, the property of John Tate; and thence with the said road to Redstone Creek, it is considered by the court that the said township be divided according to the prayer of the petitioners, and that the lower or western division thereof be called 'Redstone' township, and that the upper or eastern part retain the old name." In November, 1817, Brownsville township was erected from a portion of Redstone.

The records of the elections in Redstone have not been well kept, and it is therefore impossible to obtain a complete civil list of the township from the time of its erection. A list of the principal officers of the township from 1840 to the present time is given below, viz:

SCHOOLS.

Brief mention only may be made of Redstone’s early schools before the organization of districts in 1835, and less even about the schools at the last-mentioned date, since the school records beginning then have disappeared. In 1807 a log school-house stood in the Centre school district near the Quaker Church, and in it the teacher that year was old Sammy Lappan. In 1810, John Simpson taught school in a log house that still stands in the Redstone District and is the residence of Aaron Hess. In 1832, John Hankinson taught in a house near the Green Tree tavern, and in 1813 there was a school-house in the Bunker Hill District near Gallaher’s, but who was the first teacher is not known. In the Colvin neighborhood a school was taught by a Mr. Walbridge in 1808. Of course schools were taught in Redstone some time before the earliest of the dates above given, but the oldest inhabitants do not recollect any earlier particulars than those mentioned.

In 1828 a hewn-log school-house was built upon land donated by Robert Baird near the Luzerne line, in Oak Hill District. It measured twenty-four by eighteen feet, having windows on three sides. Each window was nine feet long and two feet and a half high. Many years afterwards the fourth side was pierced for a window. Desks were fastened along the wall below the windows, and upon slab benches the children sat and pursued their studies. Those concerned in the building of the house were Hon. Charles Porter, Robert Baird, Sr., Johnson Van Kirk, Aaron Baird, Maxwell Dearth, Alexander Baird, James E. Breading, and others. The carpenter was Joseph Mahaffey. School was opened the second week of May, 1828. Sarah Henderson, the first teacher, taught there four years. Then she removed to Ohio, where she died in 1834.

CHURCHES.

DUNLAP'S CREEK PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

Presbyterian preaching, and perhaps preaching of any kind, was first heard in Dunlap's Creek Valley in 1765, in which year Rev. James Finley, living on the Eastern Shore of Maryland, made an expedition through that region. He preached wherever opportunity offered, in tents, groves, school-houses, and barns. He made similar tours in 1767, 1771, and 1772. In the summer of 1774, Philip Tanner, a companion with Rev. Mr. Finley in 1765, and a settleer in Redstone soon afterwards, agitated the subject of the organization of a church in his neighborhood, and invited Rev. James Power, his son-in-law, to come out from Chester County for the purpose. Mr. Power responded promptly, and in September, 1774, he organized the Dunlap's Creek Church at a meeting held in a sugar-grove on Mr. Tanner's farm. There were sixty-one constituent members, of whom the ruling elders chosen were Charles McClean, Andrew Frazer, Robert Baird, John Parker, Samuel Torrance, Daniel Reeder, Ebenezer Finley, and William Frame. The large number of constituent members would seem to indicate that nearly all, if not quite all, the church-going people in that region were Presbyterians.

The region tributary to the church organization soon embraced not only Dunlap's Creek Valley, but Union-town, Brownsville, and the country known as the Redstone settlement. Mr. Power preached two years, and then being requested to settle permanently among the people as pastor returned to Chester County for his family, and with them came over the mountains in the fall of 1776 by way of Braddock's road. He rode upon one horse, his wife and one child upon another, and his two other children upon a third in baskets slung across the animal's back. Shortly after Mr. Power organized the church a log meeting-house was built upon Mr. Tanner's farm, and in that house—and occasionally in tents in the woods—the Dunlap's Creek congregation worshipped until 1814, when a new edifice was erected. Mr. Power was comfortably settled with his family, and was promised a yearly salary of £120 ($320). He remained, however, but three years, when he accepted a call to be the pastor at Mount Pleasant, where he afterwards preached for thirty years. Rev. James Dunlap was secured to succeed Mr. Power at Dunlap's Creek. Mr. Dunlap was the first installed pastor, for it was not until 1781 that the Redstone Presbyterian was organized. The Presbytery intended to take action that year upon the call to Mr. Dunlap to be pastor at Dunlap's Creek and Laurel Hill, but the members did not assemble because of prevailing Indian troubles, and so it was not until Oct. 15, 1782, that he was installed, although he had been officiating as pastor from 1780. The Presbytery consisted that year of the Revs. James Powers, of Sewickley and Mount Pleasant; Thaddeus Dold, of Ten-Mile; John McMillan, of Pigeon Creek and Chartiers (who preached at Dunlap's in 1774 and 1775 in conjunction with Rev. Mr. Power); and Joseph Smith, of Buffalo and Cross Creek.

Mr. Dunlap continued to be the pastor until 1789. In 1787 the church had a session of eight elders and eighty-three members. The elders were Charles McClean, Robert Baird, Ebenezer Finley, Samuel Torrance, Andrew Frazer, John Parker, William Frame, and Daniel Reeder. The members included the foregoing named elders and their wives, together with William Lynn, John and Jane Moore, Margaret Smith, William and Anne Norris, John Jones, Linn Ophian, Linn Gillen, John and Sarah Miller, Widow McKinn, James and Margaret Adams, Thomas and Ann Gallaher, Samuel and Agnes McKinley, Samuel Adams and wife, Jacob and Eleanor Reeder, George Hill, William and Mary Grey, Stephen Reeder, Susanna Adams, James Brown, David and Mary Reeder, Eliza and Jemima Reeder, Mary Hubbell, William Rose and wife, Elizabeth Adams, James and Susanna Frame, Richard and Elsie Watts, James Adams, Jr., Benjamin Adams, George Smith, Sarah Wilson, Samuel and Elizabeth Sprout, Mary Alton, Mary Wilson, John Baird, William Powell and wife, Eleanor McClain, Absalom Little and wife, William Conwell and wife, Lewis Davidson and wife, Joseph Moss, Reuben Winget, James and Agnes McLaughlin, James and Rebecca Veech, Samuel Adams, Jr., and wife, Martha Work, and George Lee.

Between the date of the departure of Mr. Dunlap and 1792 the church depended upon supplies. In the year last named Rev. Jacob Jennings was installed as pastor, and remained in the pastorate until 1811, when he resigned because of age and infirmities. He continued his residence at Dunlap's Creek, and occupied the pulpit occasionally until his death in February, 1813. Mr. Jennings was a physician as well as minister, and during his entire pastorate pursued the practice of his medical profession.

In September, 1812, it was determined to secure the services as pastor of Rev. William Johnston. The pledge for support was signed by ninety persons, and read as follows: "We whose names are hereunto subscribed, desirous of having the means of grace statedly administered at Dunlap's Creek meeting-house, and having a prospect of obtaining, in connection with Brownsville, the ministerial labors of Mr. William Johnston, at present a licentiate of the Ohio Presbytery, do engage to pay for his support, and as an acknowledgment for one-half of his labors in the Dunlap's Creek congregation, the sums set opposite our names per annum in half-yearly payments." The paper was dated Sept. —, 1812, and signed by Ebenezer Finley, George Gallaher, John McClean, Robert Baird, John Moss, Enoch French, James McCormick, James Adams, John Wallace, Jacob Walter, F. Lewis, Aaron Baird, Ecal Del, John McCormick, Alexander Baird, John Cunningham, Jr., William Ewing, Com-

In March, 1813, Rev. Mr. Johnston entered the pastorate, and continued therein until December, 1839. Soon after the commencement of his pastorate (in 1814) the handsome stone church now in use was built. Mr. Johnston’s successor was the Rev. Samuel Wilson, who was called Jan. 1, 1840, and installed November 17th of that year. His pastorate lasted until May 1, 1869, after which he moved to Illinois. When he began his labors at Dunlap’s Creek the church membership was eighty-two; when he closed them it was one hundred and eighty-three. Rev. J. P. Fulton, his successor, was the pastor from 1870 to 1879, when the present pastor, Rev. W. G. Nevin, began his labors.

In 1853, to accommodate the large number of members living in the neighborhood of New Salem, the society built at New Salem a substantial brick chapel, where services are regularly held by the pastor of Dunlap’s Creek. There is also at New Salem a flourishing Sunday-school in connection with the church. Of that school Ebenezer Finley has been the superintendent twenty-eight years. He is, moreover, the oldest member of Dunlap’s Creek Church, his period of connection therewith embracing fifty-three years. For forty-seven years he has been a ruling elder. Dunlap’s Creek Church enjoys much prosperity. The membership in March, 1881, was about two hundred and seventy-five. The church property consists of two houses of worship, a parsonage, and twenty-six shares of bank stock, bequeathed by Mary Ann Gilmore, widow of Hugh Campbell, of Merrittstown. The elders are Finley Chalfant, Johnson Van Kirk, E. T. Gallaher, Hayden Baird, Ebenezer Finley. The trustees are Theodore Van Kirk, W. S. Craft, Joseph Woodward, and Albert McMullen. Johnson Van Kirk is superintendent of the Dunlap’s Creek Sunday-school.

During the pastorate of Rev. Samuel Wilson the Dunlap’s Creek Presbyterian Academy was founded in 1849, partly by the churches of the Presbytery, but chiefly by members of Dunlap’s Creek Church. Rev. Samuel Wilson was the first principal, and John S. Craig the first tutor. The principals succeeding Rev. Mr. Wilson were James Black, Joseph Power, Simon B. Mercer, Caleb B. Downs, George W. Chalfant, S. J. Craighead, T. D. Ewing, D. H. Sloan, R. B. Porter, W. J. Burchinal, and William Fulton. The academy was a very popular school in its day, and frequently had upwards of one hundred students on the rolls. In 1875 it ceased to exist, because the support extended to it had become inadequate for its continuance.

The Dunlap’s Creek graveyard, in the centre of which stood the old Dunlap’s Creek log church, contains within its weather-beaten and time-worn old stone-wall inclosure many reminders of the past and of those who were foremost among the pioneers. There are to be found in it many handsome monuments, as well as neglected graves and broken tablets, which tell how apt the living are to forget the dead. Many old tombstone inscriptions are defaced and illegible, others are still easily read. Among the latter are those erected to the memories of Jane Moore, who died Dec. 6, 1787; Jane Findley, June 5, 1793; Lewis Davidson, Nov. 16, 1793; “Elizabeth, ye wief of Lewis Davidson,” April 24, 1794; John Mackey, May 19, 1794; Samuel Terrance, 1797; Jacob Jennings, 1796; Mary Hany, Jan. 10, 1802; Violet Findley, 1804; Jane Terrance, 1808; John Porter, 1812; Ann Porter, 1813; Margaret, consort of David Craft, 1812; William Wallace, 1814; Thomas Gallaher, 1806; Mary Cunningham, Oct. 23, 1822; John Fulton, 1825; John Gallaher, 1829; and David Breading, who died (aged 85) in 1844. Upon the tombstone of Elizabeth Baird, who died in 1826, is written, “N. B. The deceased was consort of Robert Baird.”

Two of the pastors of Dunlap’s Creek Church were laid to rest in the old churchyard. They were the Revs. Jacob Jennings and William Johnston. The tablet over Mr. Jennings’ grave has the following:

“In memory of the Rev. Dr. Jacob Jennings, who for twenty years was pastor of this congregation. That he was a true follower as well as a faithful minister of the Lord Jesus Christ was testified by his long-continued efforts and labor of love in two arduous careers combined. He died in the faith of the gospel of Christ, and in the hope of that life and immortality which are thereby brought to light, Feb. 7, 1813, aged sixty-nine. And I heard a voice from heaven saying unto me, Write, Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord. Yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors, and their works do follow them.”

A handsome shaft perpetuates the memory of Rev. William Johnston, and bears this inscription:

1 Physician and minister.
"In memory of Rev. William Johnston, who departed this life Dec. 31, 1841, in the fifty-eighth year of his age and thirtieth of his ministry. In him talents, intelligence, and those Christian virtues which adorn the relations of life were happily united and blended. 'They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever.'"

Beneath the same stone lies Martha, his wife, who died June 9, 1860. In the old churchyard lies also Ebenezer Finley, one of the fathers of Redstone, and by his side lie the four worthy women who were his wives.

REDSTONE BAPTIST CHURCH.

Baptist worship was held in Redstone before 1847, but until that time there was in the township neither church organization nor meeting-house connected with the Baptist denomination. Brownsville was the point to which the Redstone Baptists journeyed to church, although public services were sometimes held in private houses and school-houses in the neighborhood of the creek. In 1847 a meeting was held at the house of William Colvin to discuss the subject of building a church; and a lot being offered for the purpose as a donation from Levi and D. C. Colvin, prompt action was taken by the appointment of William Sharpless, William Colvin, and Elias Hutchison as a building committee to take charge of the matter of erecting a house of worship. Assistance being readily forthcoming, the house was built that year near the junction of Colvin's Run and Redstone Creek. An inscription upon the front of the structure testifies that it is the "Regular Baptist Meeting-House." At the dedication Rev. James Estep preached the sermon.

Rev. E. M. Miles and William Penny were engaged to supply the preaching, but no church organization was effected until Mr. Penny came, when he and the Rev. William Wood formed the church, with a constituent membership of upwards of forty-five. Among the pastors who served the church after the organization may be named Revs. John Scott, William Hickman, Daniel Kelsey, and — Smith. The last pastor was Rev. O. O'Brien Strayer, who relinquished the charge in November, 1889, April, 1881, the membership was thirty-eight. The deacons were D. E. Whetzel and Earhart Grable; the trustees, Benjamin Phillips, Estep Colvin, and Alfred Cooper.

CHURCH OF CHRIST.

Feb. 1, 1874, Alanston Wilcox, an evangelist of the Church of Christ, met with a company of persons at the Redstone school-house, and by the advice and consent of Elder Wesley Lorimer, of Cookstown, formed the Church of Christ in Redstone. The organizing members were Robert S. Goe, Hittie Goe, Catharine Goe, Dora Goe, Lizzie A. Higinbotham, Louisa Higinbotham, Stephen Phillips, Caroline Phillips, D. R. Hazen, C. R. Hess, Emily R. Hess, Otho Brashears, Lizzie Brashears, Lucy Brashears, Anna Brashears, Emanuel Stewart, Rebecca Stewart, Hester Hess, Maggie Simpson, — Shook, W. G. Hubbs, John Johnson, Levi Colley, Caroline Colley. Those baptized at the first meeting were George Higinbotham, Emma Higinbotham, Rachel Higinbotham, Louise Higinbotham, Dilworth Craft, Mary F. Craft, Hattie F. Craft, William Matthews, Mary A. Matthews, Aaron Hess, Lizzie McHenry, Rockey McCune, Mary E. Eagle, David Shook, John Wilgus, Mrs. B. E. Wilgus. One hundred and twenty persons have been received as members of the organization to the present time (April, 1881), and of these about sixty remain.

In 1875 the present house of worship (called the Christian Chapel) was erected at a cost of $3500. The successive pastors have been Revs. S. F. Fowler, J. W. Kemp, D. L. Kincaid, and — Satterfield. The pastorate is at present vacant. The elders are Clark Hess and Solomon Cromarine. The deacons are Robert Goe, John Colley, Otho Brashears, and Levi Colley.

BIографICAL SKETCHES.

ROBERT FINLEY.

Robert Finley was born April 4, 1809, in Redstone township, and there died Oct. 7, 1874. He was of Scotch-Irish descent. His education was received in the common schools, and was supplemented by extensive reading. He was a man of keen observation, and was noted for the wonderful powers of his memory. He was married to Catharine Caruthers, of Sewickley, Jan. 23, 1833. There were six children. Four died in infancy. Mary M. married Jeremiah Baird; Samuel E. Finley married Sarah Burchinal; Catharine died June 9, 1842.

Robert was married again May 13, 1845, to Anne Hurford, of Luzerne township. They had five children, two of whom are dead. The three living are Thomas W., John E., married to Josephine Hazlett; Margaret A., married to James G. Wilson.

One who had known Mr. Robert Finley long and intimately thus wrote of him, "Seldom are we called upon to record a death which makes so sensible a breach in the church and community as that of Mr. Robert Finley. For forty-five years he was a member, and for thirty-five an active and efficient trustee, of the Presbyterian Church of Dunlap's Creek. He was the youngest son of Ebenezer Finley, Sr., deceased who had been a ruling elder for some seventy years; a grandson of Rev. James Finley, one of the first ministers of the gospel who crossed the Allegheny Mountains, and founder of Rehoboth, in the Presbytery of Redstone, who was a brother to Rev. Dr. Samuel Finley, president of Nassau Hall, New Jersey, an ancestry in covenant with God. Mr. Finley possessed great vigor of constitution and energy of char-
HISTORY

HON. GRIFFITH ROBERTS.

Hon. Griffith Roberts was born in Redstone township, Fayette Co., Pa., where he now resides, March 7, 1807. He is of Welsh stock, and was educated in the common schools. His early life was spent upon his father’s farm. He was married Dec. 14, 1826, to Nancy Fought, of Redstone. He remained upon his father’s farm one year after marriage, and then moved to a farm adjoining the one upon which he now lives, and remained there twenty-five years, and then moved to his present place of abode. He has had four children,—Hannah, married to James M. Cook; George, married to Eliza Franks; Philip (now dead), married to Eliza A. Balsinger; Elizabeth, unmarried. The first office Mr. Roberts ever held was that of captain of a militia company when a young man. He has held all the offices of the township, except that of constable. He was nominated and elected associate judge of Fayette County in 1876 by a flattering vote. He held the office until it was abolished in 1881, discharging the duties in a manner creditable to himself and satisfactory to his constituents. He held the office of county commissioner for three years, 1856, 1867, 1868. His wife, Nancy, died Dec. 25, 1858.

His father, Abraham Roberts, was born in Chester County, Pa.; came to Fayette County when a young man, and married Elizabeth Morris, of this county. They had eight children,—four sons and four daughters. Griffith was the second, and is the only one residing in Fayette County. The others who are living reside in the West. Abraham died in 1819; Elizabeth died in 1845.

Mr. Roberts’ grandfather, Griffith Roberts, came from Wales when a young man and settled in Chester County, Pa., where he married Rachel Jeffries. They had but one son, Abraham, and came to Fayette County with him. They were all Quakers. Griffith, Sr., died in 1823, his wife a few years afterwards. Hon. Griffith Roberts has no membership in any church, but has always been a liberal contributor to the various denominations. He rather leans to the belief of his father. His morality is unquestioned. He is well and favorably known in the county. He is worthy of the confidence his friends have in him, and is a genial gentleman of the old school.

JAMES MADISON LINN.

The grandfather of James Madison Linn, Andrew Linn, settled in Fayette County at a very early date. He had his farm patented. He was a soldier in the Revolutionary war, and was one of the first settlers west of the Alleghenies. They were driven back east of the mountains several times by Indians.

James M.’s father, Capt. Isaac Linn, was born upon the farm where his son now resides in 1774. He was married on Oct. 22, 1796, to Jemima Voorhes. They had eight children. James M. was the fifth. Isaac Linn was a soldier in the war of 1812. He was captain of an infantry company, and served during the war, going during his period of service into Canada.

James Madison Linn was born July 20, 1808, upon the farm where he now resides, and was educated in the common school, and studied the classics under a private tutor. He was married May 13, 1841, to Mary Linn, of Redstone township. They had eight children,—William Voorhes, now dead; Isaac, married to Emma Stewart; Ayers, deceased; Jemima A., married to John C. Hanna; Samuel S. B., married to Florence A. Holmes; Charlotte L., married to S. A. Phillips; Alcinda C., not married; Mary E., married to O. D. Porter.

In the early portion of his life Mr. Linn was occupied as a clerk, and afterwards engaged in distilling. For many years past he has followed farming and milling, and has held important township offices. He is a member of the Old Redstone Baptist Church, as is also his wife. He started in life with nothing, and gradually accumulated his considerable property, which consists mostly of lands, but he has a good share of money also.

DAVID HIBBS.

The late David Hibbs, who died May 18, 1868, was born in Redstone township, July 15, 1809. He was of English descent, and was educated in the common schools. He was married April 18, 1839, to Hannah Walters, daughter of Ephraim Walters, of Nicholson township, and sister of Ephraim Walters, of Mason-town, German township, and of Dr. Jefferson A. Walters, now living in Dayton, Ohio, a gentleman of prominence, and a considerable and careful contributor to genealogical literature. They have had nine children. Two died in infancy. The seven living are Jefferson W., who married Ellen Van Kirk; Mary Frances, who married Joseph Antram; Elizabeth, married to Dr. J. P. Sangston; Harriet A., married to John F. Hess; Lucetia, George L., and John G., unmarried.

Mr. Hibbs held the usual township offices intrusted to a careful business man, and was for three years a member of the almshouse board. In all these positions he conducted the public business in a satisfactory manner. For many years he was a member of the German Baptist Church, and held the office of elder for a number of years. His pecuniary start was small. By industry and careful business management he was able to leave his family in comfortable circumstances. His success was due to his integrity, his industry, his devotion, his unselfishness, and charity. These made his character great,—"the virtues are the forces and powers in life." He was a quiet man, made but little show, and did his duty as nearly as he was able, and was content. The best legacy he left his family was a good name.

SAMUEL C. HIBBS.

Samuel C. Hibbs was born in Redstone township, Feb. 14, 1802. He is of English stock, was educated in the common schools, and learned the business of farming, and has been engaged in it all of his life. He was married in January, 1833, to Elizabeth Beal, of Menallen township. They had six children,—Malinda, married first to James Nicolls, again to Dr. King, of Bloomington, Ill.; John, married to Hannah Lackey; Aaron, married to Margaret Weltner; Benjamin, who was a soldier in the late war, was wounded at City Point and died there. His remains are buried in the Presbyterian Cemetery at New Salem. Robert, married Anna Davidson; Elizabeth, married to James Finley. The sons are all farmers. Mr. Hibbs has long been a member of the Presbyterian Church. His wife, Elizabeth, died in 1874. He had a small start in the world in a pecuniary way. The fine farms which he owns, or rather which he has given his children, thus sensibly starting them well in life, he made by his own industry. He is active for one of his age, and is evidently contented and happy. His moral status is excellent. Those who know him respect him as a citizen and a man. His father, Lacy Hibbs, was born east of the Alleghenies, and came to Fayette County early in life and settled upon the farm where his grandson, Aaron, now resides. He married Sarah Craft, of Fayette County. They had eight children. Samuel was the sixth, and is the only one living. His ancestors were Quakers.

THOMAS CAUFIELD.

Thomas Caufield is of Irish stock. His father, Timothy Caufield, was born in County Galway, Ireland, in 1784, and migrated to America in 1810, locating in Belmont County, Ohio. He married Nancy Hynes, of that county, in 1826. Mrs. Caufield died in 1831, leaving three children, John, Thomas, and Daniel. John resides in Clarke County, Iowa. Daniel was merchandising in Kansas during the struggle for supremacy there between the Northern and Southern political forces, and has not since been heard of by his friends in Pennsylvania.

Timothy Caufield moved from Belmont County, Ohio, into Fayette County, Pa., in 1834. He was a contractor on the National pike, and spent much of his life in operating upon public works, building roads, etc. He was married a second time in 1836. The maiden name of his second wife was Elizabeth Detson, who died in 1872. Mr. Caufield died Dec. 30, 1873.

Thomas Caufield was born April 24, 1829, in Belmont County, Ohio, and removed with his father to Fayette County, Pa., in 1834. He was educated in the common schools, and has spent nearly all his life upon the farm where he now resides. He was married July 15, 1874, to Maggie L. Lynn, of Millsboro', Washington Co., Pa. Her great-grandfather, William Lynn, was one of the pioneers of Fayette County, settling in Redstone township, on a farm adjoining her husband's, about the time the county was organized. The farm remained in the name for three generations. Mr. and Mrs. Caufield have had four children, three of whom are living,—John Gibson, Carrie Lynn, and Mary Edna.

Mr. Thomas Caufield has never held or sought political office. He is a well-informed gentleman, having read much, particularly of history, remembering well what he reads, and applying the results of his study to practical purposes, much more than it is customary for farmers to do. His neighbors esteem him for his honesty and fair dealing.

JAMES W. CRAFT.

James W. Craft's grandfather, George Craft, came from Germany, and lived in Maryland, near where the battle of Antietam was fought, until the year 1771, when he removed with his family to Western Pennsylvania, and settled on the farm on which his descendants have ever since resided. David Craft, the father of James W. Craft, was born in 1763, and married, in 1788, Margaret Woodrow, who died in 1812, leaving him a family of thirteen children, only two of whom are now living,—Elijah Craft, of this county; and Elizabeth Sprout, of Guernsey County, Ohio.

David Craft approved of the cultivation of the minds of his children. He wrote some of his neighbors engaged a graduate of the University of Oxford to teach a select school, in which he placed his sons.

The old Craft homestead is one mile east of Merristown, Fayette Co., Pa.

The late James W. Craft, of Redstone township, was born Feb. 13, 1807, and died Feb. 29, 1880. He was of German stock, and was married in 1847 to his cousin, Caroline E. Craft, of Redstone township. There were born to them nine children, seven of whom are living, five daughters and two sons,— Ellen L., married to Samuel Colvin; Loretta, married to Joseph O. Miller; Hester B., married to Dr. H. W. Brashbear; Richard N., married to Rebecca Nutt; Hayden R., married to Laura Bell Colley; Annie M., married to John R. Carethers; Jessie Benton, single.

Mr. Craft was a justice of the peace in his native township for about thirty years, and was not only a justice in every sense of the word, but was eminently a man of peace, never failing, contrary to his own pecuniary interest, to urge upon litigants a peaceful settlement of their difficulties. As nearly as possible he followed the golden rule. Under the preaching of the pioneers of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church,—Morgan, Bryan, Sparks, and others,—he became a member of the Hopewell branch of that communion. When the final hour came he expressed himself as ready and willing to die, "having full assurance of a blessed immortality."

Mr. Craft was educated in common and select schools. He cultivated a taste for the higher grades of literature, and had great admiration and love for the English classics, a high appreciation for Campbell, Gray, and others of the British poets, and was able to quote many of their finest productions.

In early years he showed a proficiency in music. While quite a boy he became the leader of the celebrated military band which discoursed music for Capt. Geisy's company of Brownsville, and Capts. Trevor and Beeson's companies of Uniontown. This band made the music at the reception of Marquis de Lafayette in Uniontown in 1825, and was urged by him and the celebrated Albert Gallatin to accompany them to the home of the latter on the Monongahela above New Geneva, and partake of the festivities of his visit there, but were obliged to decline the flattering compliment.

This band, under the leadership of Mr. Craft, furnished music for all the Masonic and military parades of Uniontown, Washington, Brownsville, and many other places from 1824 to about 1835. So good was its music that Gen. Jackson said it surpassed any martial music he had ever heard. So great was Mr. Craft's fondness for music that he continued to play on his two favorite instruments, the flute and the clarionet, up to the hour of his last sickness. So noble and gentle was Mr. Craft during his whole life that it is safe to say that no man in the wide region throughout which he was known was ever more missed after death than he, or his loss more sincerely felt.
Leonard Lenhart
LEONARD LENHART.

Leonard Lenhart is of German descent. His father, Michael Lenhart, was a native of Carlisle, Pa. He married Martha Kline, and soon after his marriage located in Fayette City, Fayette Co. He was a wagon-maker by trade, and followed his vocation for some time in Fayette City, and then removed to a farm in Washington County, Pa., near Greenfield. He died in 1825. His wife, Martha, died in 1860, aged eighty-three. They had twelve children. There are four of them now living,—Philip, in his eighty-second year; Mary Ferry, Sarah Kendall, and Leonard.

Leonard Lenhart was born in January, 1809, in Fayette City, Fayette Co., and was educated in the common schools. He was married April 23, 1828, to Hannah Baldwin, of Fayette City. They had eleven children,—Michael, married to Maggie Dodson; Martha, married to George W. Clarke; James S., unmarried; George, married to Sarah Chatland; Lanra J., married to William Guiker, Esq., who are living; William B., Maria, John R., Mary F., who was married to William S. Hatfield; Catharine, and Philip, are all dead.

Mrs. Hannah Lenhart died Aug. 2, 1858, and on July 24, 1860, Mr. Lenhart married Mrs. Elma Nicolls, a daughter of William Eberhart, Esq., of Redstone township, who died Feb. 23, 1882, in the eighty-second year of his age.

And here a few words concerning Mr. Eberhart will not be out of place. He spent the last few years of his life in the family of Mr. Lenhart, his son-in-law. Mr. Eberhart was a man of great energy and of enterprise as a business man; was at one time an extensive manufacturer of glass. In the days of his thrift he was open and liberal with his means, ready to assist others. But a reverse came to his good fortunes at last in the destruction by a devastating fire at Cincinnati of several thousand boxes of glass which belonged to him. From this misfortune he never recovered, but his assistance was sought by other manufacturers, and he was engaged actively in manufacturing until old age pushed him into retirement. He was kind in spirit, possessed fine colloquial powers, was very social, and, above all, honest in purpose.

Of his latter marriage Mr. Lenhart has three children,—Lizzie Bell, Charles E., and Leonard II. Mr. Lenhart began life as a boat-builder in Fayette City. In 1831 he worked in John S. Pringle's yard in Brownsville. Several years after he went there he was made foreman of the yard. In 1846 he engaged as a partner in the business with Mr. John Cock, and continued with him until 1859. In 1860 he moved to the farm where he now resides, and has been engaged in farming ever since.

He had no pecuniary start. He has made all he has by his own labor. He has held a number of important township offices. He enjoys the respect of his neighbors, has a pleasant home, and is surrounded by more comforts than farmers are usually supplied with.

SALT LICK TOWNSHIP.

Occupying the extreme northeast portion of the county is the township of Salt Lick, which has for its northern boundary Westmoreland County, for its eastern Somerset County, from which it is separated by Laurel Hill. On the south is the township of Springfield, and on the west is the Chestnut Ridge, which cuts it off from Bullskin. The surface is mountainous. Rising above the general level are high hills which constitute a plateau in the western part. Along the streams are deep valleys, in some localities possessing considerable width and noted for fertility. In other parts of the township the soil is thin and only fairly productive. Limestone is abundant, and coal of a good quality crops out along the streams. Iron ore and other minerals abound, but have not yet been developed. Centrally, flowing through the township from northeast to southwest, is the chief stream, Indian Creek, which was known in early times as the Great Salt Lick Creek. Being fed by numerous springs it has considerable volume, whose constancy, although affected by the summer heat, bears favorable comparison with other water-courses of like size in the western part of the State. The larger tributaries are Back, Poplar, and Champion Runs, each having affluent brooks. The former heads in the Laurel Hill range, and after flowing southwest unites with Indian Creek a mile above the Springfield line. Champion Run rises in the Chestnut Ridge, near the northwest corner, thence flowing southeast till it loses its waters in the Indian Creek north of the centre of the township. Poplar Run also rises in the Chestnut Ridge, near the southwest corner, which it drains, then flows out of the township into Springfield. On these streams are a number of good water-powers, which have been utilized from the first settlement of the country. Salt Lick was originally heavily timbered, and many parts are yet covered with fine forests, free of undergrowth, adapt-
The pioneer settlers came from the eastern part of the State and from Maryland about the period of the Revolution, a few possibly coming earlier. Concerning some of the pioneers but little can be said. They removed from the township more than half a century ago, and the bare record of their having lived in Salt Lick alone remains. To that class belonged Christian Perkey. He made early and noteworthy improvements on Indian Creek, near the north line of the township, his lands being partly in Westmoreland County. Near his former residence are now the mills of William Newell & Son. Perkey had sons named Daniel and Christian, and a few other children, but none of their descendants are left in the county. Several miles south, on Back Run, were Peter and George Bucher, both of whom had sons bearing their names. George Bucher was the owner of a slave, commonly called Black Ben, who, whatever virtues he may have had, was possessed of a weakness for strong drink, a liking which did not much promote his personal welfare. Peter Bucher died at his home near the Berg Mills about 1807, but the others bearing that name removed in the course of a dozen years. John Martin lived on a tract of land east of the Buchers, where he died before 1810, but his family remained a score of years longer, when they left for the West.

Benjamin Davis was the pioneer on the present Joseph W. Gallentine place, where he kept a licensed tavern as early as 1795, while northeast, on the same road, George Batchelor kept a public-house the same year. But both families removed from the township more than seventy years ago. Occupying a fine tract of land at an intermediate point between the above was Andrew Trapp, the first justice of the peace. He was by birth a Pennsylvania Dutchman, but possessed shrewd, sound sense, and was, in his day, a person of so much importance in the community that his place was the centre of business, notwithstanding the early elections were held at the house of Benjamin Davis. He had sons named Philip, Andrew, David, and John, and six daughters. He died in 1824, and was buried in the cemetery at the Lutheran Church. Thereafter his business was carried on by his son Andrew a few years, when all of the family removed. The original Trapp farm is now the property of H. L. Sparks.

In the southern part of the township George Poe was one of the first settlers. He was a native of Maryland, and a brother of Adam and Andrew Poe, the celebrated frontiersmen, who sometimes came from their home, near the Ohio River, to visit their brother. The latter had a son named George, and another named Andrew. His daughters married Henry Adams, Levi Adams, and Christopher White, all of whom lived in Salt Lick. About 1810 the Poes emigrated to the Ohio country. There is much of interest connected with the name of Poe on account of the exploits of George Poe's brothers, Adam and Andrew Poe, who lived in the western part of Washington County. One adventure in particular, occurring on the Ohio River in 1781, in which Adam Poe killed the famous Wyandot chief "Big Foot," after a long and dubious hand-to-hand struggle with the savage, is related at length in several histories of early border warfare, and is familiar to a majority of readers.

The Poes were all muscular men, none of them being less than six feet in height, and although noted for their heroic achievements, were peaceable, kindly-hearted, and greatly esteemed by their neighbors. Henry and Levi Adams, sons-in-law of George Poe, were also natives of Maryland. They came to Salt Lick some time about 1799, and Levi, after living a time there, went to the West to join the Poe family. Henry Adams settled on Back Run, dying on the farm now owned by David Adams about twenty years ago, at the age of eighty-five years. He had sons named John, Henry, and George, the latter still living in Bullskin at the age of eighty years. His sisters were married to Jacob Pritts, Abraham Dumbauld, and Daniel Witt, all of Salt Lick.

The Dumbauld family was the first to make a permanent settlement and retain it to the present time. The progenitor of the family was Abraham Dumbauld (formerly Dumbauld), a native of the canton of Bern, Switzerland, who emigrated to America when he was nineteen years of age. He settled at Hagers-town, where in time he married a daughter of the founder of that town, and subsequently came with a number of other immigrants to the Ligonier Valley. He laid claim by tomahawk right to large tracts of land on Four-Mile Run, west of the Chestnut Ridge, and on Champion and Indian Creeks, in Salt Lick. This was before the Indian troubles were settled, and after being in the country a short time, the Dumbaulds with others sought safety by going back to Hagerstown. About 1769 they returned to the Ligonier Valley and erected a block-house on Four-Mile Run, to which they might flee in case of Indian incursions or when they apprehended an attack by the savages. Abraham Dumbauld had two sons and several daughters: the former were named Peter and Abraham. The latter left the home of his father and brother, in Westmoreland County, and about 1777 settled on the Dumbauld claim on Indian Creek, near where Judge Dumbauld now lives. Even at that time they did not live secure from the Indians, and on several occasions Abraham Dumbauld took his family from Salt Lick to the block-house on the Henry farm in the Ligonier Valley, burying such of their valuables as they could not carry with them. On one occasion a lot of dishes were thus hidden in the hurry of their departure, and when they returned the most diligent search failed to reveal the spot, the dishes being finally given up as lost. A sister of Abraham Dumbauld, who came with him to Salt Lick, was the first person to die in the township. Her coffin was a trough-shaped box, hewed out of a chestnut log, and the place of burial was on the Dumbauld tract, where they made a family graveyard. This tract of land embraced three hundred and sixty-seven acres, the warrant therefor being dated 1785, and extended on both sides of the Indian Creek north of Champion Run. Abraham Dumbauld died about 1828, upwards of seventy years of age, and his wife, whose maiden name was Catharine Boyer, survived him, dying at the age of eighty years. Their children were all born in Salt Lick, as follows; Frederick, Feb. 6, 1778; Mary, July 6, 1780; Philip, June 10, 1783; David, June 18, 1785; Peter, Dec. 29, 1787; Christiana, March 3, 1790; Barbara, Sept. 16, 1792; Dolly, March 24, 1795; Elizabeth, Sept. 8, 1797.

Frederick Dumbauld was the first white child born in the township. He lived on the homestead until about 1832, when he moved to Ohio. Philip, the second son, lived on an adjoining farm, and after his death, some time about 1839, the family also emigrated to Ohio. David settled on Back Run, where he died after 1840. He was the father of Hugh and Samuel Dumbauld, who removed to Indiana. Peter married Sally Cable, and lived on the homestead until his death in April, 1875. For many years he was a justice of the peace. He was the father of Abraham C. Dumbauld, living in the western part of the township; Jonathan, living in Somerset County; Samuel, living in Illinois; Peter and Solomon, who removed to Indiana; and David W. C., the youngest son, yet living on the homestead, which has been occupied by the family more than a century. He has held many offices of public trust, and is better known as Judge Dumbauld. The only daughter, Elizabeth, became the wife of Samuel File, of Licking County, Ohio. The daughters of Abraham Dumbauld married: Mary, John Lohr, and died on the homestead; Christiana, Samuel Fulton, of Somerset County; Barbara and Dolly, Joshua Davis and Jacob Miller, both of Salt Lick; and Elizabeth, Henry Phillips, of Somerset County.

Shadrach Davis, by birth an Englishman, came to Salt Lick about the same time as the Dumbaulds. He was the father of Abraham and Joshua Davis, who were prominent in the history of the township. The former first lived on Champion Run, on the farm now owned by Amos Miller, but died at the hamlet of Davistown, where he owned and operated mills. He reared sons named Samuel, who moved to Springfield in 1839, settling on the farm now owned by his son Solomon, where he died in 1878; Jacob, yet living.

In Westmoreland; Benjamin and William, who removed to Defiance, Ohio; John, Jehn, and Solomon died in Salt Lick. The daughters of Abraham Davis married William Stull, Samuel Eicher, David Stull, Jacob Snyder, Eli Gallenstein, and Daniel Bruner. Joshua Davis lived in the northwestern part of the township until his removal to Jefferson County, about 1838.

Adam Bungard, a German, settled on the tract of land which is yet in part owned by the Bungard family, where he died in 1833 at the age of eighty-seven years. He reared sons named Adam, George, John, Christian, Daniel, Jacob, and Michael. His daughters married Jacob Miller, Samuel Berg, and Samuel Hahn. Of the sons, Jacob and Michael yet live in the southern part of the township. On "Plentiful Hill" John Grindle was a pioneer. He was the father of John, David, and Christian Grindle, who after living in Salt Lick a number of years moved to the West.

The Schlater family were among the first settlers in the Ligonier Valley, where they had many adventures with the Indians. One of the Schlater daughters was scalped and left for dead, but recovered and became the mother of a large family. In the possession of Isaac Schlater is the door of one of the pioneer cabins in which the family lived, which shows numerous bullet-marks and gashes made by the tomahawks of the Indians in one of their attacks. Some of the family lived near the Salt Lick line, and Isaac Schlater was for a number of years the owner of the Mount Hope Furnace in that locality. Henry Schlater for a number of years lived in Salt Lick, removing from the township to Ohio. In the extreme northwest of Salt Lick lived the Kesslar family, some of the members residing in Westmoreland. William Kesslar improved the farm now owned by James Coffman, and George Kesslar the Martin Wrinkler place.

Ludwig Miller was born in Somerset County, but in 1800 moved to the present Christian farm, in the southern part of Salt Lick, where he died in 1845. His son, Jacob H., was just a year old when his parents settled in the township. He yet resides in the eastern part of Salt Lick, one of the oldest and most hale men in the county. For twenty-five years he was a justice of the peace, and in that period of time joined two hundred and forty couples in matrimony,—a very large number considering the sparsely-settled condition of the country. The other sons of Ludwig Miller were Ludwig H., who moved to Ohio; George H., who died near Sparks' Mill; Henry H., whose death was caused by falling from a horse; Abraham H., who died in Springfield; Frederick H., who fell from a cherry-tree and was killed; John H., removed to Ohio; and Isaac H., the youngest, died in the township. The daughters married Christian Bungard, Ludwig Hart, Jacob Bungard, George Sleeman, and Henry Cassell. There were thirteen children in all, and when Mrs. Ludwig Miller died, at the age of eighty-six years, she had one hundred and fifty grandchildren and two hundred great-grandchildren, some of her children being parent to eighteen and twenty children. Nearly all the Millers in Salt Lick originated from this family, and have displayed remarkable unanimity in their political predilections. At the late Presidential election the family cast twenty votes for Gen. Hancock. John Harbaugh, who resided for many years on the head-waters of Poplar Run, was the grandson of the Millers. He received from Gen. Jackson a hickory cane, which passed from him to the Millers, and is cherished by them as a memorial of the stern old hero of New Orleans.

At the head of Laurel Run, Charles Worrick, a Revolutionary soldier, was a pioneer who came in about the close of the war. He died in Springfield township at an advanced age. Of his sons, William died at Connellsville, and John was burned to death while attempting to rescue his family from his burning house. This sad event occurred about 1832.

On Champion Run, John Robison was one of the first settlers. The land passed from his to the hands of his son John, and from him to his son Jacob. The farm at present belongs to the latter's son, Wm. L. Robison, a member of the fourth generation. The present Lyons farm was first settled and improved by John Crist, and sold by him to Henry Yeldeson about 1812, when Crist removed to the West. He was the father of Frederick Crist. On the Peterson place Wm. Hess was a pioneer, and after the death of Hess the farm was occupied by his son-in-law, Samuel Lohr.

George Sleasman, a native of New Jersey, came about 1800 and settled in the southeastern part of the township, near Worrick's and Anthony Miller's, the latter living on the present Yinkey place. He died in 1812, and his son Peter was then bound out to Andrew Trapp. He is still a resident of the township at the age of seventy-two years. George Sleasman last lived on the George Batchelor farm after the latter had removed. David Berg, a native of Lanesletter County, became a settler of Salt Lick a little later, locating on the farm which is now occupied by Elijah Cramer. Of his sons, Benjamin, David, and Joseph are yet residents of the township. Other sons were John, Frederick, Samuel, Jacob, George, and Emmanuel. John Yinkel was one of the pioneers on Laurel Hill, where he lived until the death of his wife, when he removed to Ohio, but returning to Salt Lick after many years, died at the house of his son-in-law, David Berg, at the age of ninety-eight years. In the western part of the township, Christian Echard, the father of John, David, Jacob H., George, Christian, Peter, and Levi Echard, settled some time after 1800, and some of the above yet remain in the township.

TOWNSHIP ORGANIZATION AND LIST OF OFFICERS.

The township was created at the December, 1797, term of Court of Quarter Sessions, "on the petition of sundry inhabitants of the Salt Lick settlement, in the township of Bullskin, praying for a division of said township, and that the top of Chestnut Ridge may be the line of separation. It is considered by the court that the prayer of the petitioners be granted, and that the eastern division be called Salt Lick township."

Although thus officially named, it was for several years known by the name of Young township, not only locally but in official transactions. In the second volume of "Com. Records," page 38, under date of Jan. 13, 1798, the name of Reuben Skinner appears as the assessor of Young township. Again, March 1, 1798, "the house of Benjamin Davis, of Young township," is designated as the place where appeals from assessments might be heard. The name of John Robison appears as the collector of taxes, July 7, 1798, for the township of Young, and the tax-roll for that township is closed Feb. 16, 1799, over the signatures of John Robison and George Batchelor, his assistant. Other accounts were opened about this time with Young township, and continued later as the accounts with Salt Lick; but there is nothing on record to show that the name of Young was ever authorized. It was probably unwittingly used in a local sense, and thus received semi-official sanction until the error was corrected. The term Salt Lick was derived from thelicks of salt along Indian Creek, the principal stream in the northeastern part of the county, and the name was for many years applied to all that part of the country lying east of the Chestnut Ridge and north of the Youghiogheny River. A petition for the division of this large township was presented to the court at its June session in 1831, and William Davidson, William Andrews, and Samuel Rogers were appointed viewers, with orders bearing date Nov. 1, 1831, continued Jan. 13, 1832, and March 8th of the same year. At the following session of court, June, 1832, they reported that they had "met to view the contemnated division line as set forth by the order, and are of the opinion that it is inexpedient to grant the prayers of the petitioners." The court approved the report, and for several years the subject was allowed to rest. But at the June session in 1839 the court was again petitioned for a division, and commissioners were appointed, who reported unfavorably Sept. 5, 1839, their report being approved by the court. After the lapse of eight years a petition again went to the court praying for a division of the township of Salt Lick, and Thomas R. Davidson, Alexander M. Hill, and Joseph Torrance were appointed viewers. These reported Sept. 18, 1847, and on the 11th of December of the same year their report was confirmed as follows: "The court approve the division of said township by the clay turnpike; the south side of said road to be the line from the Connellsville and Bullskin township line to Indian Creek, and from thence to the Somerset line, the northern side of said road to be the line. The northern township to retain the name of Salt Lick, and the southern township to be called Youghiogheny township."
It appears that the above division did not prove satisfactory to the citizens of the newly-constituted township, and at the September term of court, 1848, that body was petitioned for a new township, to embrace parts of both Salt Lick and Yonghigheeny. Abraham Pershing, Levi Bradford, and Provance McCormick were appointed commissioners to investigate the matter, and a report was made by them Dec. 4, 1848, and ordered filed in favor of a new township. This report was confirmed on the 10th of March, 1849, as follows: "The new township is established according to the within report, and the court direct that the said township shall be called 'Springfield.'" By this order Salt Lick was limited to its present bounds, and those of Springfield were enlarged in November, 1855, by the addition of that part of Yonghigheeny township which had not been absorbed by the formation of Stewart township.

Before Salt Lick was erected Andrew Trapp held a commission as a justice of the peace in and for the township of Bullskin, his name appearing in that connection as early as 1796. He was also the first justice of Salt Lick. He served as a justice a number of years, but in 1810 appears the name of Richard Skinner as a justice, and later, and before 1837, Frederick Dumbauld, William Kessler, Peter Dumbauld, and Peter Kooser.

Since 1859 the principal officers of Salt Lick have been the following:

ROADS.

One of the oldest roads of the township of which any record appears was petitioned for December, 1874, praying that it be located from the Broad Ford to Christian Perkey's mill, and thence to the Redstone Old Fort. At the March term of the court, 1875, Robert Beal, Edward Doyle, Andrew Arnold, William Miller, and Joshua Dickerson, as viewers, reported "that the road was of great use and very necessary, as well for the county adjacent as for the inhabitants to said road in general, and we presume it to be necessary to be of the width of thirty feet." "Therefore, after due consideration, the court do confirm the same, and order that the said road be open, cut, cleared, and bridged, twenty-five feet wide.” The road was run with the assistance of Alexander Moreland, and has always been one of the chief highways of the township, whose importance has only been exceeded by the State road across the mountains, which was also opened about this time. In December, 1800, the court was petitioned for a bridge across Salt Lick (Indian) Creek at the crossing of the State road. The Grand Jury recommended that the bridge be built, and the court at the March session in 1801 directed the commissioners to have it built in accordance with the plans presented. The road from Andrew Trapp’s to the west of the Laurel Hills was ordered in April, 1806, while the road from Trapp’s to Perkey’s and thence to Lovenier’s was ordered in April, 1808, Abraham Kinnear, Henry Adams, Abraham Dumbaund, John Grindle, George Batchelor, and James Patten being the viewers. The road from John Grindle’s to the bridge on Indian Creek was ordered by the same court, and was viewed by Andrew Trapp, Abraham Kena, John Robinson, Peter Dumbaund, Daniel Perkey, and John Muir. The township is well provided with highways, which are usually kept in a passable condition.

GENERAL INDUSTRIES.

Although agriculture has always been the leading pursuit of the people of Salt Lick, considerable importance has always been attached to its manufacturing interests. The first was probably the mill built by Christian Perkey, on the waters of Indian Creek, near the north line of the township. It was put in operation some time about 1780, and was at first a very small affair. Later a better mill was built of logs on a good stone foundation, which was allowed to remain when James Muir took down the old mill and built in its place a one-story frame mill, with improved gearing and a pair of French burrs in place of the ordinary mountain stone which previously did service. That mill in turn gave place to the present structure, which was erected in 1878 by William Ne-will, under the direction of James Leeper as millwright. It is a three-story frame of large size, has three runs of stones and modern machinery, being in all its appointments one of the best mills in the county. The motive-power is furnished by a Leffel turbine-wheel, and the mill is rated at $10,000. The present owners are William Newill and his son, A. M. Newill, the latter operating the mills. The property has had many owners, passing from Christian Perkey to his son Daniel; thence to Frederick Fleck, who had the grist-, saw-, and an oil-mill in operation in 1823, the latter being continued about ten years; thence to William Murray, thence to James Muir, and from him to James Muir, Jr., who owned it until his death, when Mr. Newill became the proprietor of both the grist- and the saw-mill, continuing both, as above stated. The oil-mill was long since discontinued. Passing down Indian Creek to a point above Champion Run, the next power was improved, about 1829, by Peter Dumbaund to operate a saw-mill, which after a number of years became the property of George Ritner. On the same place was a fruit and grain distillery, which was discontinued about 1836.

On Champion Run are several water-powers, one of which was improved by William W. Robinson about 1852, and made to operate a saw-mill, which is at present the property of Jacob Bruner. Farther up the stream, John Spear had a linseed-oil mill about 1846, which had also as owners John Piper and Henry J. Ritner, but has not been operated the past twenty years. On the south branch of the run a saw-mill was put in operation about 1840 by William Kessler, which passed into the hands of John W. Kinnear, and thence to others, a new mill being erected on the site by James Coffman, which is yet profitably operated.

On the main branch of Indian Creek, at the ham-et of Davistown, Abraham Davis built a saw-mill about 1830, and not long after, a carding-machine and fulling-mill. Ten years later he built a small grist-mill, which was displaced by the present mill in 1872, which was built by John Davis. After his death in 1873 the mill became the property of Lemuel Mathews. The mill-house is three stories high, and contains three runs of stones. A new saw-mill has also recently been built at this point, and while the carding-machine is still kept in operation, the fulling-mill has long since been discontinued.

On Back Run, a mile above its mouth, the power was first improved about 1790 by Peter Buccher, to operate a saw-mill, which was a great convenience to the settlers of this part of the township. A saw-mill is yet maintained at that point by Joseph Berg. A short distance above, Henry White, a resident of Bullskin, built a log-mill about 1796, which is yet in use, and is in a well-preserved condition. The stone basement appears perfect, and there is little to show the age of the mill, as the internal arrangements have been changed from time to time. At present there are two runs of stones, which are run by the power of an overshot water-wheel, fed by a long race. Among the early operators of the mill were Daniel Perkey, George Huey, and Adam Leppert. The mill was sold by White to the Berg family, and still remains in their possession, the present owner being Daniel Berg. The saw mill at this point has become practically useless, although the mill still remains. A short distance above, Daniel Witt has had a sawmill in successful operation the past fourteen years. Yet farther up the stream David Dumbaund built a saw-mill about 1840, which passed from him to Daniel Eiseman, thence to Jonathan Ash, and to David Saylor, the present owner. Another mill was operated on Back Run, above the latter, by James H. Miller, but the power has been abandoned, the water supply being too small to be advantageously em-pplied. On Poplar Run a small saw-mill is owned and operated by Manasseh Burkholder.

At the mouth of Back Run, Andrew Trapp built a saw-mill about 1800, obtaining power by means of a long raceway from the run to a point near the Indian Creek. Trapp operated the mill a number of years, and was thereafter succeeded by his son Andrew. The subsequent owners of this power have been John and Gabriel Christner, Daniel and John Senff, Abraham Gallantene, Alfred Cooper, and the present, H. L. Sparks. Alfred Cooper established the tannery business at this point in 1855. His yard contained thirty-eight vats, and the building was a story and a half high. In 1863, Mr. Sparks became the owner of the property, and after ten years he remodeled the tannery and the mill. The power was increased by the substitution of water-wheels of the Leffel pattern, whose capacity aggregates thirty-nine horse-power.

The old tannery was displaced by the present building, which is 50 x 80 feet, two and a half stories high. Although supplied with a boiler, steam has not yet been used, the proprietor preferring to finish his work in cold water, thus securing for his products a most enviable reputation in Eastern markets. From two thousand to three thousand hides per year are tanned into harness- and skirting-leather, about one-third of which is finished at the currying establishment of the firm at Connellsville. The saw-mill was rebuilt in the fall of 1879, the capacity being increased to fifteen hundred feet per day. In the spring of 1881 a planing-mill was attached to the same power, and the manufacture of builders' materials of all kinds begun. The products of the mill are mainly oak, chestnut, and poplar, chiefly the latter two; the woods yet abounding with trees from which first-class lumber may be cut. In 1875, H. L. Sparks associated with him his son S. H., and the firm has since been known as H. L. Sparks & Son.

In former times there were a number of small distilleries in the township, which were employed to a large extent in working up the fruit which grew so abundantly on many farms. Among the principal distillers were John Dull and David Berg on Back Run, and the Dumbaulds and Andrew Trapp on Indian Creek; but all of them have been discontinued more than thirty years since. George Rees made hats in a small shop on the old State road, and had the reputation of being a very skillful workman. Powder was made in a small way at Davistown by Joshua Davis; and in the southwestern part of the township, J. Yoder had in operation, after 1820, a loom of ingenious construction for weaving woolen, cotton, and linen goods. He wove linen sheets of such fineness and texture that they were in great demand and highly prized by the housekeepers of Eastern Fayette.

A good quality of mountain coal abounds on nearly every farm, and has been developed in many localities to supply the home demand, there being yet no facilities for shipping to outside markets. At Sparks' Mill appear two layers of coal, in veins four feet thick and about one hundred feet apart, and in many other localities similar strata manifest themselves, some of the chief mines being on the old Henry Adams place, and on the Brooks, Lohr, Robison, and Berg farms.

Within the past twenty years limestone of a superior quality has been found in many accessible places, and has been quarried to a considerable extent for fertilizing purposes, to the manifest benefit of the lands to which it has been applied. One of the finest strata thus far discovered is on the old George Poe place, now owned by Henry Bungard. It is nearly sixty feet in thickness and very easily developed. In the northern part of the township iron ore was formerly mined to supply the Mount Hope Furnace, which was in that locality, in Westmoreland County. But since it has gone out of blast no further development of that mineral has been made. Mount Hope Furnace was built in 1808, and blew out about 1820.

MERCANTILE AND OTHER INTERESTS.

Before the clay pike was opened through Springfield, in 1810, the old State road was the great thoroughfare from Somerset County to Connellsville, and many taverns consequently were kept on that route to accommodate the numerous teams toiling up and down its course. Three of these were licensed as early as 1795, viz.: George Batchelor, on the present Peter Sleasman place; Benjamin Davis, on the Joseph Gallantene place; and Melchior Entling, the latter being in the present township of Springfield. These were continued a number of years, and at the Davis stand was afterwards Peter Feike. Eastward were the taverns of Andrew Trapp, David Berg, George Batchelor, George Rees, and Frederick Murray, the latter being at the foot of Laurel Hill. Nearly half a century has elapsed since Salt Lick has had a licensed tavern.

It is probable that Andrew Trapp was the first to engage in mercantile pursuits, having a small store near the site of Sparks' tannery as early as 1799. His original account-book, to which the writer has had access, contains the names of nearly all the pioneers, and shows that he must have carried on quite a flourishing business. The chief articles of traffic were liquor, lumber, flour, tallow, and salt. In addition, Trapp was the keeper of a public-house and justice of the peace, making his transactions numerous and multifarious. In 1800, Adam Bungard was debited to "one bushel of salt, for which he promised to deliver me eight bushels of corn." December, 1800, George and Andrew Poe were made debtor to writing "Two Bonds of Performance and other writings, at 1s. 6d. per paper." Christian Senff, 1801, was credited by one heifer, £3, and charged with ten bushels of wheat, at 5s. per bushel; one gallon of whisky, 5s.; three gallons of apple brandy, at 4s. per gallon. Abraham Workman, 1804, "Dr. by wife to five quarts of whisky,
At Sparks' store is kept the Indian Head post-office, the oldest office in the township. It was established with the name of Dawson, but later took the name of Indian Creek, and in October, 1875, was given its present appellation, the other names causing confusion on account of titles nearly similar which are borne by other offices in the State. In 1873 the office was removed from Davistown to the present place, H. L. Sparks being appointed postmaster \textit{vice} John Davis, deceased. He has since continued to serve in that capacity. The office has two mails per day, the service being by the route from Stewarton Station, in Springfield, to Jones' Mill, in Westmoreland County.

There is properly no hamlet in Salt Lick, the only approach to one being Davistown, where are a few houses and a church clustered around the mills at that point. Whatever other interests were here have been diverted to the places named above as being more suitable trading points.

Religious and Educational

The first denominational services in the township were maintained by the Lutheran and German Reformed settlers, who belonged to those churches in the eastern part of the State. These meetings, held first at the house of Peter Bucher and other places, resulted in a purpose to have a house of worship where both sects might hold their meetings, and the increasing congregations might be better accommodated than in the limited rooms theretofore available. To this end Peter Bucher and Andrew Trapp deeded a tract of land on a gentle hill-slope near the west bank of Back Run, where the present was erected about 1800. It is of logs, but has been weather-beamed, and in general appearance resembles a frame house. Originally it was provided with side and end galleries and a high pulpit; but these have been removed and the internal arrangements made to conform to modern architecture. The house was remodeled in the summer of 1851, and on the 29th of November of that year the "Lutheran Congregation of Good Hope" was organized. At this time there were ninety-one members, and the church council was composed of Rev. J. R. Focht, pastor; John Snyder and Peter Snyder, elders; A. C. Dumbaum and Frederick Miller, deacons.

The time when the congregation was first organized is involved in obscurity. In the first church-book appear the names of children baptized as early as 1788; but it is possible that some of them may have been transcribed from the record of other churches, since no other idea but that of baptism is conveyed. The first date of any authentic moment is Aug. 23, 1785, when a list of communicants is given, which embraces the names of Mathias Kern, Peter Bucher, Sr., Frederick Herman, Ludwig Bane, Anna Maria Bane, Catherine Senff, Christopher Loser, Christian Senff, Frederick Meator, Peter Strayer, Catherine Strayer, Abraham Craft, Jacob Stanch, Catherine Stanch, George Rees, Jacob Morrix, George Wolf, Anna Maria Wolf, Conrad Roeshenberger, Anna Maria Roeshenberger, Dorothea Shaefer, Catherine Herman, Philip Brickman, Elizabeth Brickman, Catherine Rees, Christian Ausman, Abraham Hay, Christiana Dumbauld, Simon Schneider, Ludwig Hay, Jacob Hentz, Eva Elizabeth Loser, Sally Ehrenfried, Anna Barbara Loser, Elizabeth Hay, Anna Margaret Ehrenfried, Barbara Herman, Susanna Senff, G. Van Cassell, John Crist, Barbara Harbaugh, Henry Harbaugh, and Conrad Lutz.

In February, 1796, the names of the Reformed members of the “Good Hope” are given as follows: Frederick Smith, George Hoffhance, Andrew Weil, Adam Shafer, John Robison, Christian Perkey, Henry Schlater, Barabara Schneider, Elizabeth Weil, Barbara Robison, Catherine Meator, Elizabeth Mackendorfer, Frederick Dumbauld, Adam Hoffhance, William Smith, Frederick Crist, James Mitchel, Anna Maria Dumbauld, Betsey Robison, Elizabeth Crist, Catherine Crist, Elizabeth Smith, Elizabeth Weil, Elizabeth Hoffhance, and Julia Ann Meator.

The members of the two congregations were first under the ministerial care of the Revs. Long and All, but some time prior to 1822 the Lutherans had as their pastor the Rev. Smucker, and the German Reformed minister was Rev. Kieffer. The latter was succeeded by the Rev. Voigt, whose connection with the congregation was not terminated until 1856. He appears to have been the last regular minister, for the congregation became too feeble to maintain its organization, which was suffered to go down about that period.

In 1827 the Rev. Jonas Mackling succeeded the Rev. Smucker as the pastor of the Lutheran congregation, and ministered to them in holy things until 1849, when the Rev. J. J. Suttre entered upon a short pastorate. In 1851 he was succeeded by the Rev. J. R. Focht, who was the spiritual teacher until 1856, when the Rev. J. Gannenter entered upon a pastorate which was terminated in 1868. In connection with the Donegal and Franklin congregations, the Rev. John Wellfey assumed the pastoral relation in 1868, which continued until 1875. The following year the Rev. D. Erhard became the pastor, and yet fills that office.

The congregation had in 1880 ninety communicants, and the following church officers: Elder, A. C. Dumbauld; Deacon, Ludwig C. Miller; Trustees, Jacob Styer, Henry Bungard, and John H. Snyder. Among the elders and deacons since the organization of the church have been Frederick Miller, John Snyder, Peter Snyder, Ludwig Hort, Henry Kemp, Jacob Imel, Ludwig C. Miller, and Abraham C. Dumbauld. The latter was for many years at the head of a Sunday-school which was maintained in the church, but which has not been kept up the past ten years.

On the 13th of December, 1879, the Lutheran congregation of Good Hope appointed Ludwig C. Miller, Jacob Imel, and George A. Dumbauld a building committee for the purpose of erecting a new church edifice, but no material progress to this end has yet been made. In connection with the old church is a graveyard, where lie interred many of the old citizens of Salt Lick and the surrounding country who were formerly members of either the Lutheran or Reformed congregations worshiping in the modest old building, which is now one of the oldest landmarks in Northeastern Fayette.

The Evangelical Association was the next denomination to maintain regular preaching. Their missionaries, entering the township fifty years ago, found willing hearers and hearts that quickly responded to the gospel call as proclaimed by these plain but earnest men. Among those who accepted their doctrines were Jacob Barned and his son-in-law, Abraham Davis, whose homes thereafter became the places of worship until a church building could be provided. Barned died in the faith, while attending a pioneer camping meeting, many years ago, but he had lived long enough to see the church of his adoption flourish and become firmly established in Salt Lick. Others who shared the burdens of pioneer membership were the younger Davises, several persons by the name of Resler, Kesslar, and the Senff family.

In 1846 the membership had become strong enough to assume the building of a church edifice, and that year was erected at Davistown the Bethlehem Evangelical Church, which is yet used as a place of worship. It is a frame of modest proportions, but the society whose spiritual home it is has been parent to a number of other flourishing classes in Salt Lick and Bellskim. The trustees in 1881 were William Moody, Samuel Eicher, and George W. Kern, and the twenty members constituting the class here were under the leadership of George W. Kern. Jacob M. Davis is the superintendent of a Sunday-school which has about forty attendants.

The Mount Olivet Evangelical Church edifice was built in 1872, in the northern part of the township, on land donated for church and cemetery purposes by Elijah Lyons. The building committee was composed of Jacob Davis and George W. Gloss, and the church was consecrated in the early part of the winter of 1872 by the Rev. William Houpt. The house is a plain but neatly painted frame, thirty by forty feet, and in 1881 was under the trusteeship of Jacob Davis, George W. Gloss, and D. W. C. Dumbauld. The class which has this house as its place of worship sprung from the Bethlehem Church, and numbers at present about seventy members, who are under the leadership of D. W. C. Dumbauld. The Sunday-school, which is maintained here in the summer season, has an enrollment of seventy-five members, and William Bumford for superintendent.

Both the foregoing churches belong to the Indian Creek Circuit of the Somerset District of the Pitts-
HISTORY

Mount Airy was a field of the Evangelical Association. The circuit embraces also, as other appointments, the McClellan school-house class; Poplar Run, in Springfield; Mount Pisgah and Stauffer, in Bullskin, the stewards of the several appointments being Jacob M. Davis, George W. Gloss, John Mull, Daniel Stauffer, and Levi M. White. The preacher in charge in 1881 was the Rev. George W. White; Rev. William Moodey was a local preacher.

It is impossible to give a complete list of the ministers who served what is now Indian Creek Circuit, as no records of such appointments, made very often as frequently as once a year, have been preserved. But among others who were itinerants in Salt lick were the Revs. Abraham Dreisbach, Henry Niebel, John De Hoff, Moses De Hoff, Walter, Riddle, Wilt, Barber, Staumbaugh, George Brickley, Daniel Brickley, Samuel Mottinger, Henry Rohland, Henry Bucks, Thomas Beek, Abraham Baker, M. J. Carothers, J. M. W. Seibert, George Kopp, John Lutz, A. Frey, Uriah Everhart, Levi Everhart, S. W. McKesson, Craig, Einzel, Daniel Long, Samuel Kring, Conrad Kring, Austein, Hemple, Miller, Strayer, Poling, Boyer, Ross, James Dunlap, L. H. Hettrick, D. K. Levan, William Reininger, and G. W. White.

In addition to the foregoing, the now eminent Chicago divine, Dr. Thomas, began his ministerial career as a youthful preacher in the Evangelical Association, serving as an itinerant in Salt Lick. Some of the older ministers recollect that he even then was remarkable for his profound discourses,—a bent of mind which has given him a national reputation as a preacher in the Methodist Episcopal Church.

The Hopewell Methodist Protestant Church is a small frame house of worship northwest of Davis-town, which was built about the same time as the Bethlehem Church. One of the chief promoters of the enterprise was Abraham Gallentine, who was also one of the first members. Others associated with him were William Moodey, Joseph Gallentine, Harriet Kesslar, Mary Bundorf, and a few others. For a time the church flourished under the preaching of the Revs. Francis, Betts, Bolton, Stillings, and Scott; but the removal of some of the members so weakened the body that after a time no regular services were maintained, and the remaining members connected themselves with other religious bodies. The last preacher was a man named Colclough. The Baptists and other denominations sometimes preached in the old Hopewell Church, but as far as has been ascertained no organization was attempted. The house has been little used lately for religious meetings, and is in a somewhat dilapidated condition.

In the northeastern part of the township is a small church, in which Winebrennerian meetings were formerly held, but which is now seldom used for any purpose. The house was built largely through the efforts of John Faust, one of the leading Winebrennerians. Others of that faith in that neighborhood were David A. C. S. Hostetter, Gideon Hostetter, and their families.

The Union Church house of worship is in the Miller neighborhood, in the southeast part of the township. It is a log building of fair size, erected by the united efforts of the community soon after 1850. The lot on which it stands was set aside for church and cemetery purposes by Jacob H. and Peter H. Miller. The graveyard is one of the finest in Salt Lick, and is the general place of interment for the people of southeast Salt Lick and northeast Springfield. The title to the property has been vested in the Church of God, the present local controlling committee men being Jacob H. Miller, Jr., and James H. Miller. Although open for the use of other denominations, the Church of God (Winebrennerian) has been the principal body to occupy the building with any regularity for the purposes of stated worship, and at present their organization numbers about fifty members. Among the early Winebrennerian members were the Pritts, Worick, Gallentine, Ridenour, and a few other families, the first meetings being held at the house of the former by the Rev. John Dobson. Other ministers were the Revs. Hickernell, Plowman, Wurtz, Stevens, Floyd, Lucas, Gallentine, and the present, George A. Barkiebaugh.

The Dunkard meeting-house, in the northern part of Salt Lick, near the Westmoreland County line, was built in 1852, on a lot of land donated for this purpose by John Fleck. It is a large and substantial frame, built after the manner of the plain people who worship in it, and has accommodations for about six hundred people. The Fleck and Hass families were among the first Dunkards in Salt Lick; but the present large membership is almost entirely from Westmoreland County, and the history of the church consequently has but little interest for the people of Fayette County.

Schools were taught in the township as early as 1803, John Wibel, a German, being the teacher. It is probable that most of the instruction was in the German language, although it is said that Wibel was also an English teacher. In the winter of 1802-3 he taught a three-months' term near Trapp's Mill, his charges for instruction being ten shillings per pupil. As teachers became more numerous the rate of instruction was reduced to nine shillings per quarter. Wibel removed from the township some time about 1808. Some of his schools were taught in a log building erected for school purposes in the spring of 1894 by the Lutheran and German Reformed congregations, and which stood near their meeting-house. Andrew Trapp seems to have had the building in charge, furnishing what lumber and nails were used, the latter being brought from Connellsville by Peter Strayer. George Poe laid the floor, and Jacob Grindle made the door, the hinges and bolt for the same having been made by Jacob Barned. These also sent their children to the school, while other pupils came from the Bruner, Wolf, Norrix, Bungard, and Dumbauld families.

At this period Christian Menscrsmith and Henry Rush were also teachers in the township, their schools being taught in houses occupied in part by families. About 1807 another school-house was built on the old Ludwig Miller farm, where Peter Frick taught the first school. Later William Arthur and James McCloy taught in that house. The latter was an Irishman, a good teacher, but thoroughly detested the custom of barring out at Christmas, a custom to which the German teachers graciously conformed. This school-house and the one near the "Good Hope" Church were abandoned about the same time, but when cannot be positively determined. On the Jacob Lohr farm George Bucher, Jr., taught an early school, which was attended by Abraham C. Dumbauld, John and Adam Kalp, Mary Tederow, and the Schlaters, of Mount Hope Furnace.

In due time the township accepted the provisions of the common school law, but the records pertaining to the organization of the schools, as well as the records for many subsequent years, have not been preserved, so that no authentic account of them can be given.

In 1881 the township was divided into districts, which bore the names of Kesslar, Washington, Black Creek, Trout Run, Longwood, Franklin, McClellan, Centre, Clinton, and Buchanan, in most of which good schools were maintained.

The school directors of Salt Lick since 1840 have been as named below:

1840.—Daniel White, Peter Dumbauld, William Kesslar.
1841.—Jacob H. Miller, Robert Workman.

Along the Somerset County line, between the townships of Salt Lick on the north and Stewart on the south, is Springfield township. From the former it was set off in 1847, and to constitute the latter it contributed of its territory in 1855. The Youghiogheny River forms the southwestern bounds, and on the west are the townships of Connellsville and Bullskin. Springfield is traversed by the Chestnut Ridge and the Laurel Hills, which give its surface an elevated and mountainous appearance, and cause a large portion of it to be unfit for cultivation.

In many places along the streams the hills are almost precipitous, while in other localities they slope gently to the water's side. Originally they were covered with fine forest growths, of the hard woods chiefly. On the tops of the smaller hills the lands appear level, and have generally been reduced to cultivation. The hills themselves are the depositories of great mineral wealth, coal and iron being most abundant, although fire-clay and limestone have been profitably developed in several localities. The drainage of the township is good, there being numerous springs, brooks, and creeks. Indian Creek, the principal stream, flows almost centrally through the township from the northeast, emptying into the Youghiogheny about a mile above the Connellsville line. Its northern and western affluents are Poplar, Stony, and Resler’s Run. The opposite tributaries are the North Fork, Buck and Mill Runs, the latter in point of size being the second stream in the township. It is sometimes called Skinner’s Mill Run, after one of the early settlers on its waters. Above its mouth, along the Indian Creek, were natural meadows of considerable size, where were the celebrated “Bullock Pens,” which have caused a historical interest to attach to that locality.

These pens were used by Capt. Harris to confine a herd of cattle which were destined for the troops under Gen. Forbes. It is said that Capt. Harris with a small detachment of men left Fort Cumberland with a herd of cattle in 1758, intending to reach the line of march of Gen. Forbes by Braddock’s road. At Turkey Foot he was met by Oliver Drake and other frontiersmen, who warned him of the Indians living in ambush on the Laurel Hills, and offered to conduct him to a place of safety until he could communicate with the commanding officer of the British forces. Their services being accepted, Drake and Rush led the way over the Laurel Hills, east of the Youghiogheny, down the waters of Mill Run to the above meadows, where the cattle might be pastured and the soldiers enjoy the desired seclusion. In the daytime the cattle were allowed to graze, but at night they were confined in pens made of rails, which remained until the township was settled, when the pioneers applied the name of “Bullock Pens” to the locality, and when the land was surveyed the name was employed to designate that tract, thus perpetuating it. After remaining at the “Pens” about a month, Capt. Harris was ordered to drive the cattle up Indian Creek to Fort Ligonier, where Gen. Forbes’ forces were stationed.

On their march up the stream they passed through a deserted Indian village, and saw so many evidences to indicate that the red men frequented the waters of this stream for the purpose of hunting and fishing that they called it the Indians’ Creek, from which the name was derived. In early times the presence of many salt licks was noted along this stream, which led to operations for discovering the source of these saline supplies.

In 1836, Christian Painter began boring for salt near Rogers’ Mills, and after attaining a depth of three hundred feet the drill stuck fast, causing the abandonment of the enterprise. But while there was a failure to find a stream of salt water, he struck a heavy vein of water strongly charged with sulphur, which overflowed the well and rose several feet above the surface, forming a large and superior sulphur spring. An analysis of the water shows the presence of many medicinal qualities, which place this spring upon the same plane as some of the most noted sulphur springs of the country. Mineral springs are found in other parts of Springfield, making the selection of that name for the township very appropriate.

Since Springfield has been so recently organized, its pioneer history is to a large extent inseparable from the histories of Bullskin and Salt Lick, in which lists of surveys and settlements covering what is now Springfield are given. In a general sense this township was not settled near as early as other parts of Fayette County, very probably not until the close of the Revolution, although a few may have lived here prior to that event; but as they removed so many years ago, the traditionary accounts pertaining thereto are vague and conflicting.

Reuben Skinner, a native of New Jersey, after living in the Turkey Foot settlement a few years, located on Mill Run, on the Elijah Kooser place, where he built mills and made other substantial improvements. After his death, about 1821, his family emigrated farther west, the mills becoming the property of Jacob Ketchum, and subsequently of the Kooser family. It was from Reuben Skinner that Mill Run took its additional name.

Several other Skinners were pioneers in Springfield. James B. Leonard’s place was the former home of James Skinner, a Baptist clergyman, who removed to Perry County, Ohio. Willits Skinner came at a later day and remained until his death, living on the farm now occupied by his son, A. Skinner. The latter, now an aged man, has resided there since he was six years of age. The farm was first occupied by men named Packer, Williams, and Rush, although the land was warranted to Isaac Meason. Richard Skinner, of another family, settled on the Silas Prinkey farm, where he reared a large family, which removed from the township half a century ago. Moses Collins was the pioneer on the Jacob Saylor place. After his death his son Henry owned the farm, and afterwards the latter’s son Henry, who was the last remaining member of the family, which has become extinct in Springfield.

Another well-known pioneer was Alexander Cummings, a Scotchman, who lived on the George Kern farm, on the old Turkey Foot road. His settlement was one of the first in the township. Cummings was a man of considerable ability, and possessed many fine traits of character, which gave him prominence among the early settlers. He died about 1842, and was interred on his old farm. The Collins family also were all interred in a burial-plat on their old farm. Another of that class of settlers was the McCune family. James McCune (in early times McKeown), the grandfather of the James McCune yet a resident of the township, was the first of that name in Springfield. He was the father of Samuel McCune, who lost his life in a coal-bank about thirty-five years ago.

Maj. Abraham Workman came to the township about the same period. He rendered military service under Col. Morgan, who owned several tracts of land in the township, three hundred acres of which became the property of Maj. Workman. This he improved, and lived upon the farm until his death, about 1836. His wife and son Smith moved to Perry County, Ohio, several years later, the former dying in that county at the age of one hundred and two years. The homestead passed into the hands of Robert Workman, who was born on it in 1799, and lived there until his death in 1878, since when his son, Robert W., is the occupant of the farm, which is on the river hills in the southwestern part of the township.

Henry Trump came from Germany and settled in what is now Springfield township, on Indian Creek, near its mouth, about 1780. He patented a tract of about four hundred acres, now owned by the heirs of Henry Walters. He erected a saw-mill some distance up the creek, and the lumber sawed in it he, with the aid of his sons, John and Michael, floated down the Youghiogheny to the Pittsburgh market. The saw-mill was said to be the first erected in that part of the county. He had also a small grist-mill on the creek, propelled by a "tub" water-wheel. Henry Trump, however, was less famous as a sawyer and mill-owner than as a hunter. For many years his chief employment was hunting deer and bears, and he derived considerable profit from the sale of the skins of these animals and bear's oil. At his home on Indian Creek he had several deer and bears which he tamed and kept as pets. He lived to a great age, said to be over one hundred years. His son John settled in what is now Connellsville township, near the line of Springfield. Michael Trump, son of Henry, settled in Connellsville borough.

Daniel Resler, a native of Berks County, Pa., settled on the stream of water which bears his name about 1787, and died in that locality before 1817. He had three sons and three daughters, the latter becoming the wives of Solomon Kern, Christian Senff, and John Murphy. Daniel and David Resler, two of the sons, moved to Ohio many years ago. John, the other son, married a daughter of Peter Bruner, and lived on Resler's Run until his death in 1856. His widow yet lives in the township at the age of eighty-four years. She was born in Stewart, but since she has been three years of age has been a resident of Springfield. The children of John Resler were Daniel, deceased; David and Jacob, removed to the West; Mary, the wife of David Barned; Elizabeth, of John Brooks; and Susan, of Samuel Scott.

Peter Bruner settled in what is now Stewart township some time during the Revolution, but in 1798 settled on the Rogers farm, on Indian Creek. His son Daniel moved from the township. At that time Indians yet roved along the stream, but did not disturb the family.

Conrad Senff, a German, was one of the earliest settlers in Eastern Fayette, living in what is now the township of Salt Lick, on the Shaefler farm. After the marriage of his son Christian the latter became a resident of Springfield. He lived on the old Resler farm a number of years, then moved to Ohio. One of his sons, eighty-one years of age, yet resides in the eastern part of Springfield. He was the only son who remained in the county. His sons are Jacob, yet living in Springfield; Henry, in Westmoreland County; Wesley and Daniel, in Illinois.

Melchior Entling was a pioneer in the northwestern part of the township, on the old State road, where he kept a public-house as early as 1796. The farm at present belongs to John J. Joseph Brooks was a member of Entling's family, coming with them from the East. After attaining manhood he married a daughter of Michael Beasinger, a pioneer on the present Daniel Brooks farm. All the members of the Beasinger family moved to the West, except Jacob, who died in Springfield about 1865. Joseph Brooks died about 1865. He had reared a large family, his sons being John, Henry, Jacob, William, George, Erwin, and Daniel, whose descendants are very numerous in Springfield.

On the Fulton farm Jacob Minerdi settled about 1791. He was a native of Washington County, Md. Twenty years after his settlement he died, and was buried in what is now the Baptist graveyard at Mill Run. Of his twelve children, nearly all removed from the township, Jacob settling in Somerset County, and Henry in Dunbar township. One of the daughters married Leonard Harbaugh, father of the Leander Harbaugh at present living in Springfield. The former became a resident of the township about 1825, but before his death returned to Somerset County. Another of Minerdi's daughters married John Ream, the founder of Ursina village, in the latter county. Among Minerdi's early neighbors were William Jones, living on the Dickey farm, and a man named Cipliner, on the Imel farm. Where Henry Imel now lives, at the age of eighty-five years, first lived his father, Henry. The former is yet hale and able to do manual labor on the farm. In the harvest of 1889 he and his son John, a man sixty-four years of age, crawled, bound, and shocked up forty dozen bundles of heavy rye in a single day, working from sunrise to sunset, a heavy job even for men in the prime of life.

On the Elm farm, now the site of Springfield village, Daniel Eicher, a native of Lancaster County, settled about 1790. Joseph Eicher, his last remaining son, died Aug. 4, 1876, aged ninety-two years. Other sons were Peter, Henry, and Daniel. His daughters married Jacob Long, John Harbaugh, and John Rowan. The sons of Joseph Eicher were Samuel, William, John, Daniel, Joseph, Henry, Abraham, and Isaac. His daughters married Thomas McCloy, William Justice, and Leonard Harbaugh. The descendants of this family have become very numerous in the eastern part of the county.

The Kern family emigrated from Holland to Eastern Pennsylvania about 1700. From thence some of the family moved to Westmoreland County, settling in the neighborhood of Jones' Mills. There one of the family was killed by the Indians, while returning home from a visit to a neighbor, several of those who had accompanied him escaping. Among the sons of the above family were Michael, William, George, and Peter. The latter died in Westmoreland County, George becoming a resident of Washington County. William Kern served in the Revolution, and after the war married Catherine Hoover. He moved to Springfield, buying out the claim of a man who held a town-hawk right to a tract of land in the present Murray district. On this land he died about 1857, at the age of ninety-one years. He reared sons named Solomon, Abraham, William, Jacob, Jonathan, and Joshua, and daughters who married Joseph Eicher and George Nicholson.

Solomon Kern was born in the township, and died in 1862, at the age of eighty-one years, his father being probably one of the very first settlers, and he one of the first born in Springfield. Solomon Kern was a carpenter by trade, and made many of the early carding-machines. He also had in operation wood-carding machinery in different parts of the State. For a time he was engaged in the Baldwin machine-shops at Connelsville, but finally settled on a farm west of Springfield village, which is at present the home of his son, Judge John Kern. Other sons were Josiah, Solomon, and Simon. His daughters married Samuel Davis, Henry Gebhart, Henry Griffin, and Aaron Hart.

Abraham, the second son of William Kern, removed to Ohio; William, the third son, married Nancy White, and lived and died on the Kooser place. Jacob lived little south of Springfield village, where he died about twenty-eight years ago. He was the father of George Kern and William Kern, both of the township. His sons, Abraham and David, died in the Rebellion. Jonathan, the fifth son of William Kern, became a resident of Greene County, and Joshua, the youngest and the only survivor, lives on Indian Creek, more than eighty years old. He has sons named William M. and George yet living in the township; and John and James died in the war for the Union. The Kerns have become one of the largest and best-known families in Springfield.

Abraham Gallantte, a German, who had served in the Revolution, came from Chambersburg in 1801, settling in the northern part of the township, near the Salt Lick line, but subsequently lived at the Fayette Furnace. He was by trade a cooper, and died about 1820, upwards of eighty years of age. He had sons named Daniel, Jacob, Abraham, and Joseph. The former was married to a daughter of Christian Scull, and died in Salt Lick. Jacob removed to McKeesport. Abraham lived near the central part of Salt Lick. He served in the Legislature, and subsequently removed to Ohio. Joseph married Sophia Worrick, and also lived in Salt Lick, where he died in 1875, at the age of eighty-five years. He was the father of Joseph W. Gallentine, living on the old Benjamin Davis farm, in Salt Lick, and of other sons living at Scottsdale.

Jacob Murray moved from the eastern country in 1816, and settled on the old Elder farm, but later made a home on Mill Run, where he died many years ago. He had a number of sons, viz.: John M., deceased a few years ago; Samuel, also deceased in the township; and Jacob, yet living on Mill Run. Three of his daughters married Peter Ullrey, Henry Fletcher, and Reuben Eicher.

Robert Bigam was another of the early settlers on lower Mill Run, although his permanent settlement was not made until 1828. He cleared up a great deal of the flats, and still, at the age of eighty-seven years, resides on one of the farms he opened. He is the father of David and John Bigam, residing on parts of the homestead at Mill Run, and of George M. Bigam, a teacher of note at Mount Pleasant, Westmoreland Co. The Bigams moved from the Jersey settlement in Somerset County, where their ancestors were among the earliest settlers.

Peter Kooser moved from the same county in 1832, buying the Ketchum mills, which had been built by Reuben Skinner, on Mill Run. Afterwards he lived on the Henry Phillippi farm, where he died June 25, 1866, aged seventy-two years. He reared sons named Elijah, Samuel, John, William, and Alexander, the latter dying in the United States service in the Rebellion. In 1868, George Dull moved from Somerset County and settled on the John Harbaugh place at Mill Run. He was a blacksmith by trade, and served many years as a justice of the peace. He died Nov. 1, 1880, at the age of seventy-two years. His sons living in Springfield are Daniel W., Uriah, Jacob, William, and John. Romanus died in the army while a prisoner at Salisbury, N. C., and four of the above also served their country in the Rebellion. The daughters of George Dull married David L. Colburn, Solomon Davis, Hiram C. Sipe, and Alexander Brooke. The Daniel W. Dull farm was improved by Martin Williams, who afterwards occupied the Abraham Williams farm, where he died. The William Dull place was long known as the Peter Sipe farm, but was first improved by John McCune. Sipe removed to Indiana a few years ago, where he died. A portion of the old Sipe place is now occupied by Cyrus B. Sipe, a grandson of Peter, and son of Jacob, who moved to Somerset County. The Sipes made some of the finest farm improvements in the township.

The Elder family was in early times largely interested in real estate in Springfield, owning about two thousand acres of land, a portion of which yet remains in their possession, Clifford Elder, the head of the family, resided in Somerset County. William G., the eldest son, was a well-known citizen of Washington. Other sons were Clifford, Henderson, Samuel, and Robinson. The latter was the only one to reside permanently in the township. He was a man of fine ability, and became celebrated as a lecturer on temperance. He died in the service of the Union in the late civil war. One of the daughters of Clifford Elder was the wife of Dr. Phythian, the first practitioner in the township, and a maiden lady, Eliza, was a resident of Springfield until 1873.

In the early history of the county three brothers, Thomas, John, and James Rogers, came from Frederick, Md., and settled at New Haven. Their sister was married to Col. James Paul, at that time one of the leading men of Fayette. Thomas and John Rogers remained citizens of Dunbar, but Maj. James Rogers, after living some time at the Findley Furnace, settled on Indian Creek, in Springfield, about 1828, and resided there until his death, about 1842. He superintended the building of the Fayette Furnace for the mining company, which also controlled about three thousand acres of land, which Maj. Rogers sold to the settlers. He had nine sons,—John, William, Phineas, Joseph, James, Thomas, George, Daniel, and Erwin. Of these William served in the war of 1812, and died of disease contracted in the service; George is yet living at Ironton, Ohio; and Dr. Joseph Rogers, after living in Springfield more than two-score years, actively engaged as a practitioner and a manufacturer, died March 29, 1876, at the age of seventy-nine years. In 1801 he was married to Elizabeth Johnston, of Connellsville, who yet resides in that city. They reared sons,—Dr. James K., who died after the late war; Dr. Alexander, residing at Scottsdale; John, at the same place; and William D., yet residing on the homestead.

George Campbell, a Scotch-Irishman, settled in Dunbar some time about 1800. His only son, James, after living in that township a number of years, became a citizen of Springfield, and yet resides there at the age of seventy years. In 1841 he was associated with the Messrs. McCormick, Taylor, and Turner in manufacturing the first coke by the improved system of burning. At that time two ovens were built on the site of the old salt-works on the Youghiogheny, in which coke was successfully burned, and shipped to Cincinnati by means of flat-boats. The enterprise proved a failure, so far as these parties were concerned, but was afterwards prosecuted with partial success by the Cochran's, of Tyrone.

The Pritts family has lived in the township the past fifty years, and one of its members, Samuel, is upwards of eighty-six years of age. Another of the old citizens of Springfield is Jacob Lichleiter, who came from Somerset County about thirty years ago. He has attained the unusual age of ninety-three years. The population of the township in 1880 was 1714.

TOWNSHIP ORGANIZATION AND LIST OF OFFICERS.

Springfield was organized as a separate township by the Court of Quarter Sessions in December, 1848, but was not constituted with its present bounds until November, 1855, when it absorbed what remained of Youghiogheny township after Stewart was erected. The orders of the court by which this was effected appear in the history of the latter township, and in the history of Salt Lick, of which Springfield was originally a part, the same being here omitted to avoid repetition.

ROADS.

One of the oldest roads in Springfield is popularly known as the "Turkey Foot" road, from the fact that it led through that important settlement in Somerset County on its route to Pittsburgh. It is also known as Smith's road, from one of the commissioners who located it. The road followed in a general way the blazed path of Oliver Drake and William Rush, along which Capt. Harris drove his cattle to the mouth of Mill Run, thence across the hills to the clay pike, near Springfield village, from which it bore to the northwest across Chestnut Ridge to Mounts' Creek, which was crossed at Andrews' (now Long's) Mill; then northwest across Bullskin to Jacob's Creek, in Tyrone, intersecting Braddock's road near the old chain bridge. It was several miles shorter than Braddock's road, and was by some preferred on that account when the other road was rough, not naturally being as good a road as the former. After the National road was located it was of little importance, and much of its course has long since been effaced, retaining only from Mill Run northward much semblance of its original courses. The most important highway in the township is the "clay pike," so called because it has been graded but never piked with stones. Its course through Springfield is nearly east and west north of the centre of the township, varying only to get an easier ascent of Laurel Hill. It was surveyed in 1810, but was not completed until about 1829. The survey divided the road into quarter-mile sections, a post being set up at such intervals. These sections were in charge of different contractors, among the builders being Dr. Joseph Rogers, Solomon Kern, and John Williams. The road became the great thoroughfare for the passage of live-stock from Ohio and Kentucky to the East, and immense droves of horses, mules, cattle, sheep, and hogs were almost constantly trudging along its course, often more than a hundred per week passing through Springfield. Consequently many stock-taverns sprung up along the road, some of them having large barns, having stabilizing capacity for fifty horses, at which the farmers found a ready market for their products. Among the chief drovers' inns were those kept by John Resler, Peter Eicher, Solomon Kern, Samuel Long, Charles King, Mary Taylor, James Crichfield, Henry Garlets, John Prinkey, Thaddens Aughenbach, and Adam Dietz. After the Pennsylvania Railroad was completed the droves diminished in number, but the road was considerably used for this purpose until the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad was built along the Youghiogheny in 1871. This railway has stations at Stewarton and Hampton, in Springfield township.

GENERAL INDUSTRIES.

It is stated on good authority that Reuben Skinner was the first person in the township to employ water-power to operate machinery for milling purposes. Some time after the Revolution he built a small grist-mill on Mill Run, on the present Elijah Kooser place, which had one run of stones and rude machinery. A saw-mill was put in operation at a later day. From Skinner the mill passed to Jacob Ketchum, thence to Peter Kooser, thence to L. D. Wilgus, and from him to Elijah Kooser. The reconstructed grist-mill had two runs of stones and a fair grinding capacity, and although the mill remains, it has not been running the past few years. The saw-mill is yet kept in motion.

The second mill in the township was built by a man named Van Trice, on Resler's Run, and was a very small affair, the capacity being only seven bushels per day. Daniel Resler subsequently owned the mill, and at later periods the waters of that stream operated saw-mills for John Resler, Josiah Miller, and Maxwell Clark.

On Mill Run, below the old Skinner mill, John Harbaugh built a saw-mill thirty years ago, which is at present owned and operated by James Russell. Yet farther below, George Dull put in operation a saw-mill in 1841, which has had as subsequent owners Daniel Shearer, John A. McBeth and Daniel Dearborn, Bradford & Co., and the present Dr. Gallagher. The capacity is small. Near the mouth of this stream Wm. R. Turner had a saw-mill some time about 1830, to which was added a run of stones for grinding purposes. The latter were soon removed, but the saw-mill was kept in operation a number of years longer, when it was allowed to go down. Turner also had a saw-mill on Indian Creek, near the site of Hampden Forge, which was discontinued after that enterprise was abandoned. Several miles from the mouth of Mill Run, John and Elijah Kooser erected a grist-mill in 1851, which is yet operated by John Kooser. The mill-house is a four-story frame, thirty-six by forty-eight feet, and is supplied with three runs of stones. The power was secured by digging a race sixty rods long, whereby a fall of twenty-five feet was secured. The motor is an eighteen-foot overshot wheel. The mill has a large patronage.

In the northern part of the township, on Indian Creek, the Rogers family has had in operation a small grist-mill since 1832, which has been repaired several times and is now accounted a good mill. The saw-mill at this place was built about 1806 by Wm. D. Rogers, and is yet carried on by him. It has a good cutting capacity.

On Stony Run a water-power was improved about 1820 to operate a carding-machine for Solomon Kern. It was continued about ten years, when the machinery was removed, but the saw-mill which had been built here meantime was operated a few years longer. In 1857, James Campbell built another saw-mill on that site, which he conducted about five years, when, after having many owners, it was allowed to go down. Near the same time the Brooks family had a mill on the same stream, three-quarters of a mile above, which was carried on about ten years. Other mills have been operated on Poplar Run and on the Middle Fork, all of them having a limited capacity; while a number of portable steam saw-mills have been operated for short periods in various localities, of which no account is made here. The shipment of native lumber has been carried on quite extensively the past few years by John J. McFarland, much of the timber shipped being destined for European markets for use in ship-building and fine cooper-work. Locust and oak constitute the bulk of the shipments from the several stations on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad in Springfield.

The mountain forests furnish a good supply of bark for tanning purposes, and that industry has for many years held a leading place in the township. At Springfield village, John Crossland began tanning leather in a small way, having half a dozen vats, about 1830, and carrying on the business seven or eight years. He was followed by Alexander Johnston, who enlarged the tannery and made other changes. About 1850, Alfred Cooper became the owner of the property, and while belonging to him the tannery was rebuilt, the number of vats being increased to thirty. He sold it to Schallenbarger & McBeth, and subsequently it was owned by John A. McBeth alone. He still further enlarged the tannery, and was the last to operate it, about 1875. It is a large and well-appointed building, with an engine-room attached, and spacious bark shed adjacent. The capacity was 3000 hides per year, tanned into sole and harness leather, which had a most excellent reputation in the markets of the East.

When the tannery was first carried on horse-power was employed, but under the ownership of John A. McBeth steam was supplied, the boiler having a very much larger capacity than the engine. In 1868 an explosion occurred which wrecked the building, and which would undoubtedly have resulted disastrously to the lives of the workmen but for the fortunate fact that they had left the tannery to eat their dinners just a short time before. The ends of the boiler were blown through the smoke-stack, carrying with them heavy timbers in their course. The engine was taken up bodily and hurled more than one hundred and fifty yards from its bed, half burying itself in the earth in a semi-upright position in a garden near the tannery. The shock was felt in the entire neighborhood, and the accident was the theme of conversation for many days.

At Mill Run a tannery was built in 1861 by Daniel Shearer, which is yet in successful operation under the management of Lewis Marietta, as lessee for the proprietor, Dr. Gallagher. There are about thirty vats, capacitating the tannery to handle two thousand five hundred hides per year. The product is harness- and belting-leather, tanned with rock and chestnut-oak bark. About ten years ago steam was introduced, and is used in connection with water-power. Employment is given to from six to ten men. The saw-mill at this point belongs to the tannery property, and both have had the same ownership.

The distillation of liquor was engaged in by many persons in the early days of the township, among the chief distilleries being those carried on by Willits Skinner, John Prinkey, and on the Nott farm by a man named Davis. But the manufacture of iron was a pioneer interest, compared with which all others were of secondary importance. The ores of Springfield are very rich, yielding a large percentage of excellent iron, with sufficient limestone therein to flux the metal. They are usually found in beds of shale, holding the place of the upper Kittanning limestone of the Johnstown cement-beds. The metal has been found superior for foundry purposes, and only the inaccessibility of the mines has prevented the general development of this great mineral wealth. Years ago, when the Youghiogheny River was regarded as a possible channel for the shipment of the products, a forge was built on Indian Creek about half a mile above its mouth, the waters of that stream being used to operate it. It was generally known as Hampden Forge, and the owners, when it was first operated, about 1810, were Reuben Mockabee and Samuel Wurtz. The latter subsequently was the sole owner. It was kept in operation until some time after 1830. Considerable bar and other iron was wrought, which was carried down the river by means of flat-boats. The raw material was brought from the Laurel Furnace, in Dunbar, and the St. John Furnace, on Indian Creek, several miles above the forge. The latter was built on the eastern base of the Chestnut Ridge, and apparently in an almost inaccessible place. But the ore could be easily procured, and it was believed that flat-boats might descend Indian Creek many months of the year, a calculation which was soon demonstrated to be erroneous, and which ultimately caused the enterprise to be abandoned. St. John Furnace was built about 1807, by Jackson & Gibson, but in a few years became the property of Col. James Paul. It was operated by different parties as lessees, the last by Dougherty & Steele, who blew it out of blast in 1828. While it was in operation that locality was the scene of bustling activity, a large number of men being employed, and a public-house was maintained by the McCune family. The masonry of St. John Furnace was done by Jesse Taylor, and was so substantial that it remained long after everything else had passed away.

A number of miles above, on the same stream, a mining company, composed of Freeman, Miller, and Linton, secured a large tract of mineral lands, which were placed in charge of Maj. James Rogers, under whose direction as superintendent the Fayette Furnace was erected in 1827-28. In 1831, Joseph and George Rogers became the owners of the furnace, and several years later Dr. Joseph Rogers alone, who kept it in blast until 1841. Its capacity was from two to three tons per day, and much of the metal was cast into kettles, cooking utensils, etc., which were sold at the furnace, or conveyed to Connellsville on wagons and sleds, and thence shipped to Pittsburgh. When the furnace was carried on at its best many men were employed, who lived in small houses in that locality, forming a hamlet, which contained twenty-six buildings, most of which have been removed.

Almost the entire Indian Creek Valley, with its adjacent hills, is underlain with fine coal possessing many of the qualities of the celebrated Connellsville coal. It is found in three distinct veins, at different elevations from the bed of the creek, varying from three to six feet in thickness. Coal was first used in the township for blacksmithing purposes about 1835, being taken from a bank on the clay pike, east of Springfield village, in such small quantities that it was carried away in a bag. Soon its value for fuel was found out, and mining at that place and other points was begun, and has been continued to the present. In 1881 the following mines were in working condition: Jacob Minor, east of the village of Springfield, the place where coal was first mined; David Shank's, south of the village; the old Solomon Kern bank; John Shultz's and James Gallentine's, on Stony Run; Jacob Murry's, near Poplar Run; Jackson Rose's, on Indian Creek; George Showman's, on the lower part of that stream, the bank being three hundred feet above the level of the creek, and the coal appearing in a five-foot vein; Garrett Hall's; the Eicher and Solomon Davis' banks, farther up on the same stream; the John Miller bank, on the old Shumax farm, has a six-foot vein; and the John F. Campbell bank has been opened to the extent of fifty yards; the Rogers mine, on Buck Run and Middle Fork, has a working passage the distance of one hundred yards, and the coal appears in a vein six feet in thickness. South of Indian Creek, on Mill Run and affluent streams, are coal-banks owned by John Bigam, Eli Grill, John Dull, George Dull, R. W. Workman, Samuel Nickerson, Abraham Williams, and others, which serve only to supply the demand for home use.

VILLAGES AND BUSINESS INTERESTS.

After the completion of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, in 1871, a station was located at the mouth of Indian Creek, which bears the name of the stream, and a post-office established with the name of Hampton. The station is a store, and the post-office was kept by W. F. Walter, but the wild nature of the country in that locality made it advisable to continue the latter two but a short time. The railroad company still maintains a flag-station for the accommodation of the farmers of that neighborhood. The history of the post-office at Stewarton Station is given in the township of Stewart, from which the office was removed but a short time ago.

The hamlet of Mill Run is along the old Turkey Foot road, where it crosses that stream, and consists of a tannery, mills, several stores, and a dozen houses, built without thought of forming a village and on unplatted ground. The first improvement was the Kooser grist-mill, built in 1851, although the old Bigam meeting-house had before directed attention to this locality as a central point for the people of Springfield south of Indian Creek. In 1851 was also opened the store of Weller & Dull, in a building erected for that purpose, and which yet remains. Daniel W. Dull became the sole owner of the store in a few years, and sold out to John W. Sherbondy, who removed the stock of goods to Springfield. For a time the place was without a store, but in 1863 Jonathan and Hiram C. Sipe engaged in a trade which passed into the hands of the latter, and was continued by him until his death in 1878. He was a very successful merchant, and in the later years of his career also here carried on a banking business, a small house being erected for this purpose especially. It was supplied with a large safe, which a party of burglars vainly attempted to move, in an attempt to despoil Mr. Sipe of his wealth, having been led to believe, doubtless, that if the bank were small the safe must necessarily be diminutive. The morning following the futile attempt revealed the work of the miscreants, who in their disgust had left their tools and tackle behind them, scattered on the floor of the bank. The goods of the Sipe store were sold to Augustus Stickle, who had opened a store near the tannery in 1877. This was destroyed by fire in June, 1880, but a new building was erected in its place, where Mr. Stickle carries on a growing trade. Meantime, Evans Bigam opened a store near the mill, which he yet carries on, and lately the old Sipe stand has been filled with a stock of goods by C. K. Brooks and Martin H. King.

The Mill Run post-office was established in 1866, with Hiram C. Sipe as postmaster. He was succeeded by Levi Bradford, and he in turn, in 1876, by John A. Kooser, who keeps the office at his mill. The mail service is daily from Stewarton to Jones' Mill. Prior to 1871 it was from Farmington to the latter place, several times per week.

Springfield, a hamlet approximating a village in size, is on the clay pike, northwest of the centre of the township. Originally the land belonged to the Eicher family, and later to Samuel Long, who sold three hundred acres to Jonathan Miller, of Somerset County. On the lower part of this tract Levi and J. H. Miller erected a large brick house in 1847, which is the oldest house in that part of the hamlet. This house and a number of acres of land became the property of Charles King, who in 1852 laid out thirty-six quarter-acre lots for village purposes, which constitutes the plat of the lower part of Springfield. In 1853 King erected his present residence on one of the lots, and the same year James Gallentine built a house opposite the Campbell store, which is yet standing. Passing over an unoccupied space one-fourth of a mile westward, the upper end of the hamlet contains a house which was built about 1835, by Joseph Scott, and around which a dozen more buildings were erected in subsequent years. Some of these are rather dilapidated, and the hamlet throughout, after the importance of the clay pike declined, gave little promise of continued or future prosperity. The population diminished until the number maintaining their permanent homes in 1889 was only about one-half of what it was several decades earlier. Lately, however, there have been signs of renewed life, and the former activity may again be restored. Springfield contains two churches, a school-house, a large tannery (not in operation), two good stores, a number of mechanics-shops, and one hundred and twenty-five inhabitants.

The first goods were sold by Joseph Scott, about 1836, his trade being continued a few years. Henry and John Brooks opened the next store in the building now occupied by Capt. James B. Morris, merchanising from 1839 to 1847. Next came Levi and J. H. Miller, who, in 1853, established their place of business in the lower part of the village, where they continued until 1861. The present Campbell store room was occupied in 1873 by J. F. Campbell; but the business is at present carried on by George W. Campbell, who has a large room well stocked with assorted goods for a general trade. On the opposite corner a new store has just been opened by Benton L. Miller. Among other merchants in the hamlet have been Lohr & Detweiler, John Brooks, J. W. Sherbondy, Rogers & Campbell, John F. Murray, McBeth & Morris, Reisinger & Cole, and William Augenbaugh.

Samuel Long was the first to open a public-house in the lower part of the village. This house has been used for the entertainment of the public almost ever since, among the keepers of the inn being Moses Coughenour, Eli Gallentine, Samuel Koozer, Martin Kring, and William H. Brooks. At the upper end of the village J. W. C. Brooks kept an inn from 1871-72, which was known as the "Utah House." J. H. Miller also entertained the public, and lately Benton L. Miller has accommodated the traveling public, the Brooks house also being continued.

A post-office was here established about 1851, with the name of Springfield, Alfred Cooper being the postmaster. In 1853 the name of the office was changed to "Elm," which it yet bears, and J. H. Miller appointed postmaster. In 1862 he was succeeded by Nathan B. Long, and he in turn by John W. Sherbondy, J. T. Coughenour, William Brooks, J. F. Campbell, and since the spring of 1881 the present, George W. Campbell. Two mails per day are supplied by the route from Stewart to Jones' Mill, John Brooks, of Springfield, being the carrier. The first mail service was from Connellsville to Berlin, in Somerset County, once a week; thereafter from Farmington, on the National road, three times a week.

The first physician in the township was Dr. J. B. Phythian, a son-in-law of Clifford Elder. He was a native of Gloucestershire, England, but became a resident of Pittsburgh in 1825. Several years later he settled in Springfield, and remained until his death, not many years thereafter. His remains were taken to Somerset County. The next physician was Dr. Joseph Rogers, son of Maj. James Rogers, the builder of the mills, where Dr. Rogers had his home, and where he died, March 20, 1876, at the age of seventy-nine years. After graduating at the University of Pennsylvania, he engaged in the practice of medicine at Ligonier. In 1828 he became interested in the Fayette Furnace, but did not wholly relinquish his practice. In 1841 he settled permanently in Springfield, and was for many years the sole physician of the township, practicing the healing art until within a year of his death. His son, James K., after graduating at Jefferson College, studied medicine, and served in the Rebellion as a surgeon. For some years he was connected with the hospital at St. Louis, and contracted a disease which proved fatal to his life a few years after the war. Another son, Alexander, graduated from the same institution, and is now a physician at Scottsdale, Westmoreland Co.

The resident physicians of the township are Dr. A. G. Grubb, at Mill Run, since 1877, and Dr. A. H. McCoy, at Springfield, since 1861. The latter is a well-known practitioner, having a ride which extends many miles around, where he enjoys the reputation of being a successful physician.

There have been a few others as physicians in the township, whose residence did not have sufficient duration to secure them a practice.

EDUCATIONAL AND RELIGIOUS.

Among the early schools in Springfield was one taught in a small house which stood where is now the principal place of business in the hamlet of Springfield. It was kept up a few years, probably from 1810 to 1813. As this was an English school, many of the children of the early settlers continued to attend the schools in Salt Lick, where instruction was given in the German language also. On the present McMillan farm was a pioneer school-house, in which Daniel Turner, a Revolutionary soldier, taught several years more than half a century ago. While a good teacher, his age caused him to be petulant and hard to please. Other early teachers were George Gregg, David Barnes, Eli Smith, and Frederick Berg. The house was destroyed by fire while occupied as a residence by Jacob Ritourn.

On the old Sipe place was a very primitive school building, in which Jacob H. Rush taught one of the early schools. Another pioneer school-house stood on the Silas Printkey farm. And near the Collins' graveyard was what was called the Temperance School-house, in which Martha McCune taught fifty years ago. Later John Dixon, A. J. Mitchell, and George M. Bigam were teachers there. The old Bigam or Presbyterian meeting-house was also used for school purposes, Peter Lohr being one of the first teachers. Other pioneer teachers were Jacob and Henry Ulrey, Clark Tubbs, Leonard Harbaugh, Elizabeth Murray, Catharine Ulrey, Sarah Bigan, Mary and David Rowan.

Since the organization of the township the directors of the public schools have been as follows:

1848.—James Morrison, John Hall, Jacob Kern.
1849.—Robert Workman, James Morris, Sylvester Skinner.
1850.—Abraham Skinner, Jacob Sipe, Jonathan Sipe, and Sylvester Skinner.
1851.—James Morrison, George Harbaugh, Everhart Liston, and David Ogg.
1852.—James Reed, Henry Collins.
1853.—Robert Workman, Abraham Skinner.
1854.—James Morrison, David Ogg.
1856.—John McBeth, Henry Grin, Coulson Coughenour.
1857.—John Kern, John Sherbondy, Aaron Hart.
1858.—John Kern, Henry Grin.
1859.—William Collins, J. A. H. Miller.
1860.—John R. Elder, John W. Sherbondy.
1861.—Robert Workman, James Sneear.
1862.—William Collins, J. A. McBeth.
1864.—Daniel Shearer, Henry King, Robert Workman.
1865.—A. Dull, Samuel Murray, Abraham Gallentine.
1866.—John A. McBeth, Josiah H. Miller, James B. Morris.
1869.—Solomon Davis, Frederick C. Miller, Joseph K. Eieher, William Rogers.
1870.—S. B. Tederow, J. F. Campbell.
1873.—C. B. Sipe, Messmore Carner.
1874.—E. W. Workman, A. J. Case.
1875.—Joseph L. Baker, T. J. Buchinal.
1876.—Henry Bargard, Eli K. Harbaugh.
1878.—S. P. Eieher, John Davis, George Yonkin.
1879.—J. W. Lichlter, Ross Marietta.
1880.—Georg Korn, Ross Marietta.

In 1880 the number of schools maintained in the township was twelve, nine of which had male teachers and three female teachers. The average wages of the former were $24.50 per month, and of the latter $22 per month. The total amount raised for school purposes was $1669.21; and the value of the school buildings aggregated only $3000.

SPRINGFIELD METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

As early as 1825 the Rev. James G. Sansom occasioned preached at the house of Solomon Kern, while on his way from Bedford to Connellsville; and other Methodist ministers in the years that followed preached to those who gave their adherence to that church, among the number being Michael B. Lohr, David Resler, and the Elder family. After a space of time a class was formed and regular worship maintained, the preaching services being held in school-houses. About 1844 the members formed themselves into a society to build a house of worship. This was built near the home of M. B. Lohr, the first class-leader, on a lot of land deeded for this purpose by Eliza Elder; and there the meetings were stately held until the fall of 1863, when it was consumed by a fire lit by the hands of an incendiary, who thought in this way he might reck his spite against the church which refused to longer extend him the hand of fellowship, owing to his failure to observe its ordinances. From this blow the church slowly recovered, again being dependent upon the school-houses for a place of worship, where, and in the United Brethren Church, the meetings continued to be held until the summer of 1881, when the new church edifice at Springfield was completed. It has an eligible location on half an acre of ground donated by Abraham Miller, and is a Gothic \(\text{f}\)ame, thirty-two by forty-two feet, surmounted by a neat belfry. The movement to build this house was begun in the spring of 1879, when the Rev. Zenas M. Sillbaugh was the preacher in charge of the circuit of which Springfield is a part. A building committee was appointed, composed of Solomon Davis, George Kern, N. B. Tannehill, George W. Campbell, and Benton L. Miller, who, in spite of many difficulties, carried the work to successful completion. The church presents a fine appearance, and is a credit to the society and the community. The Methodists worshipping here form a class of forty-five members, who have as a leader N. B. Tannehill. In 1876 the society organized a Sabbath-school which had as its superintendent John Kern, and which is continued under the superintendency of Solomon Davis. It has from forty to seventy members. Methodism in Springfield township embraces a small class at Mill Run, whose preaching services are held at the schoolhouse; and both the above appointments are a part of Springfield Circuit, of the McKeesport District of the Pittsburgh Conference. The preacher in charge in 1881 was Rev. John J. Davis, and among the clergymen preceding him were the Revs. Z. M. Sillbaugh, M. D. Lichlter, Sylvanus Lane, James E. Williams, George A. Sheetz, J. R. Mills, E. H. Baird, J. W. Kessiar, James Hollingshead, and J. F. Hill.

UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH.

Half a century ago this denomination maintained preaching at the homes of its adherents in the township, among them being Daniel Resler, Solomon Kern, Christian Seniff, Joseph Gallentine, and George Dull. The pioneer preachers were the Revs. Worman, Stake, Pershing, Troxel, Berger, Buttsfield, and others. After a lapse of time the membership became so large that a larger place for worship was demanded, and in 1849 the brick meeting-house at Springfield was erected to meet this want. It stands on a fine lot, used for church and cemetery purposes, which was donated by Solomon Kern, and although bearing the marks of age, is yet a comfortable place for religious assemblage. When the house was consecrated it was stipulated that the use of it might be enjoyed by other bodies under proper restrictions; or in the words of the compact, "The power is in the trustees to grant liberty to other societies to preach in the church, if not occupied by the society." In compliance with these terms various denominations have used the brick meeting-house as their place of worship. In 1881 the trustees were John Brooks, J. W. C. Lich- leiter, and Samuel Scott.

The members of the United Brethren Church number at present about sixty, forming a class, of which John B. Tederow is the leader. The Sunday-school here maintained was organized about thirty years ago, and has for its present superintendent Winfield Taylor. Others who have served in that capacity were John B. Tederow and J. W. Lichleiter. The school was attended in 1880 by about one hundred persons.

At Mill Run a class of those giving their adherence to the United Brethren was formed in 1840, George Dull being the leader and serving until his death in 1880. Among those who belonged at that early period were Robert Bigam, Nicholas Romburgh, Daniel Harbaugh, David Bigam, John Bigam, George Bigam, and in most instances their wives. The class has at present twenty-five members, and John Dull is the leader. Their regular meetings are held in the Mill Run school-house. In that building a Union Sabbath-school has been maintained the past fifteen years, George Dull being long the superintendent, but Dr. A. G. Grubbs serving at present in that capacity. There are fifty-four members.

The minister in charge of the above classes in 1881 was the Rev. John Buel, and others who have ministered to them in holy things were the Revs. William Beichtel, William K. Shimp, William Dick, Martin Spangler, William Ragg, Jacob Rosler, Benjamin Noon, J. Medsbar, H. O. Lane, John Briggs, John L. Baker, and John Wert.

INDIAN CREEK BAPTIST CHURCH.

This body was constituted June 24, 1843, in a log building used for general meeting purposes, which stood on the site of the present church edifice, three-quarters of a mile from Mill Run post-office. The Council called for recognizing the church was composed of Revs. Milton Sutton, R. E. F. Browning, B. Gault, Hiram Hartzell, and John Patton. The members consisted of John Williams, Sylvester C. Skinner, Hulda Skinner, John Harbaugh, Rebecca Harbaugh, Henry Collins, Elizabeth Collins, J. R. Bailey, Mary Bailey, Martin Williams, Michael Bailey, Frances Bailey, Mary Bailey, Margaret Bailey, Sarah Spangler, Martha Rowan, Thankful Stull, Rebecca Hess, Keziah Eicher, and Mary J. Williams,—twenty-one in all. The church had had an aggregate membership of 162, and the present enrollment numbers 116. John Harbaugh was chosen church clerk, and John Williams and Sylvester C. Skinner deacons, the latter being ordained the following day, June 25, 1843.

For a time the meetings were held in the log house, but in 1844 a stone building took its place and served for many years as the place of worship, being in turn displaced by the present frame building, which stands on the same foundations. It was erected in 1871, and consecrated April 28, 1872, the sermon of consecration being preached by the Rev. William S. Wood, his remarks being based on the third verse of the twelfth chapter of Isaiah. He was assisted by the Revs. Z. C. Rush, B. F. Woodburn, J. R. Brown, and N. B. Crichfield. The house has a seating capacity for three hundred and fifty persons, and stands on a very fine lot, a portion of which is used for cemetery purposes. Here are the graves of some of the oldest settlers of the township. The lot was set aside for its present uses by Willis Skinner. The church edifice is thirty-six by forty-six feet, and cost $2,500. The work was done under the direction of William M. Kern, who, with J. R. Bailey and John Harbaugh, now deceased, has been one of the most active members; but the church has had many who were faithful to its ordinances.

Among those who have ministered to the church, either as pastors or supplies, have been the Revs. Levi Griffith, Caleb Roswell, John Rockefeller, Milton Sutton (minister when the church was formed), W. W. Hockman, in 1846; J. A. Pool, in 1851; G. Lanham, in 1853; John Williams, in 1855; Courtland Skinner, in 1860; S. C. Skinner, in 1861; J. R. Brown, in 1867; N. B. Crichfield, F. M. Cunningham, Z. C. Rush, J. E. Walter, and since June 19, 1877, the Rev. J. R. Brown.

Of the deacons of the church, John Williams and S. C. Skinner were both ordained to the pastoral office, John Harbaugh died while filling that position, and William R. Mountain, William M. Kern, and E. S. Jackson yet hold the office of deacon. The church clerks have been John Harbaugh, Abraham Skinner, Samuel W. Bailey, Allen E. Harbaugh, William M. Kern, and George W. Bailey.

The Sabbath-school had its beginning nearly as long ago as the church, having since been kept up with varying interest. It usually has seventy-five members, and its last superintendent was E. S. Jackson, John Harbaugh being one of the first.

INDIAN CREEK PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

At Mill Run, in what was known as the Bigam meeting-house, a small log building near the house of Robert Bigam, erected for the use of those who chose to occupy it, the Rev. John Hawkins, of the Connellsville Presbyterian Church, preached as early as 1833. These services were held once a month for the space of a few years by the Revs. Hawkins, Gray, Stevenson, and others, sent to Springfield under the direction of the Presbytery. These meetings were not held in vain. About 1846 a congregation was formed, which had as its ruling elder Dr. Joseph Rogers, and among its members persons belonging to the Cummings, McCune, Crichfield, Kern, Brooks, and other families. Others were added in the course of years, but Presbyterianism was never warmly accepted by the people of the township, and a few years ago the congregation, which never had its own house of worship, became disorganized. The Rev. Joseph McKee preached for the members about twenty years, and the last to hold meetings was the Rev. William Bergen, of the Somerset Church, who preached in 1877. Dr. Rogers served as elder many years, and for about six years Levi Bradford filled the same position.

In the southwestern part of the township was formerly a Dunkard Church, which has been sold and is now used as a school-house, having been purchased for that purpose in 1872. Its use as a place of worship by the Dunkards was discontinued three or four years earlier. The house was built more than twenty-five years ago, mainly by the Sipe family, who constituted the chief membership of the Dunkards in the township. At the house of Peter Sipe, Sr., the first meetings were held, and the church occupied a corner of his former farm. Among those who occasionally preached there were Jacob Murry, James Quinler, and Martin Meyers. Many persons from Somerset County attended the meetings, which were discontinued after the death or removal of the Sipe and Smith families.

Biographical Sketch.

George W. Campbell.

George W. Campbell, of Springfield, is the son of James Campbell, of the same place, and Rebecca Kilpatrick, daughter of Esquire Thomas Kilpatrick, who were married in 1849. George W., our subject, the sixth son of James, was born May 18, 1853. His grandparents on his paternal side came to America from near Belfast, Ireland. Mr. Campbell attended the common schools of his village until fourteen years of age, when he entered as clerk the general merchandise store of his brother, John F., where he became a proficient book-keeper and developed a fine business character, continuing a clerk until 1876, when he became a partner with his brother, remaining such till 1880, and then bought out his brother’s interest, and has since carried on the business very successfully.

He became assistant postmaster of Elm, in the township of Springfield, in September, 1869, and acted as such till March 21, 1881, when he was commissioned postmaster by Postmaster-General James. He is a stalwart Republican, and has been frequently sent by his party as a delegate to county conventions. On the 1st of January, 1882, Mr. Campbell established a small monthly paper called The Mountaineer, he being editor thereof as well as proprietor, and which has attained a profitable circulation.

On the 11th of August, 1880, Mr. Campbell married Miss Ida May Sparks, daughter of Horatio L. Sparks.
SPRINGHILL TOWNSHIP.

This is the extreme southwest township of the county. It has Nicholson on the north, Georges and Wharton east and northeast, West Virginia on the south, and the Monongahela River on the west. The surface is greatly diversified. In the east Laurel Hill, with all the characteristics of a mountain. From the foot of the mountain westward, as far as Morris Cross-Roads, the land rises, attaining its greatest height just before reaching the Uniotown and Morgantown road; thence still westward there is a general decline in elevation until the river bluffs are reached. The river hills are of considerable height, and in general crowd close upon the stream. Some very fertile bottom land is found both along the Cheat and Monongahela Rivers, but in general they are narrow. The most important stream next to the Monongahela is Cheat River, which flows through the southwest corner of the township for a distance of six or seven miles, entirely severing a part of the township several miles in length at its base, and two or more from base to apex. This is called the "Forks of Cheat," or the "Neck." The other streams are Grassy Run, Harulin's Run, McCollick's Run, McFarland's Run. These with their tributaries reach almost every part of the township.

The soil is not remarkably fertile except in a very few localities, and is better adapted to grazing than to tillage. Fruits of all kinds flourish, but grapes especially. Large vineyards are planted from the cross-roads towards the river. Iron and coal are the chief minerals. Potters' clay and glass-sand abound.

Springhill is one of the original townships of Fayette County, having been erected as such by the Court of Quarter Sessions of the county at the first term, held in December, 1783. The name "Springhill" was given by Col. George Wilson, the earliest settler on Georges Creek (at its mouth, in what is now Nicholson township), who had come here from Springhill, in Augusta, Va., and had given that name to the new region in which he settled. That was while all the Monongahela country was included in Cumberland County; and the old Springhill township of that county embraced an immense territory, covering all the southern part of what is now Fayette, all of Greene, and the south part of the present county of Washington. The township as erected by the Fayette County Court, in December, 1783, was embraced in the following description of boundaries, viz.:

"A township beginning at the mouth of Jacob's Creek; thence up the Monongahela River to Mason and Dixon's line; thence by the same to the line of Wharton township on the top of Laurel Hill; thence by the same to the line of Georges township; thence by the same to the place of beginning. To be hereafter known by the name of Springhill township."

The surveyor has never yet (in accordance with this description) reached "the place of beginning;" and Springhill is really only bounded on three sides and a part of the fourth, according to the act of the court. Sixty-two years after the erection into a township, Springhill lost the Egypt of her territory by the formation of Nicholson township, losing all that rich farming land lying between Jacob's Creek on the north and Georges Creek on the south, including New Geneva with all its historical associations. In New Geneva was one of the four post-offices of Fayette County in 1865, the other three being Uniotown, Brownsville, and Connelsville.

Prominent among the early settlers of Springhill township was Col. Theophilus Phillips. In May, 1767, he, in company with his brother-in-law, the Rev. James Dunlap, emigrated to Fayette County from New Jersey, and settled, or rather squatted, on a stream which has been called Dunlap's Creek for more than a century. After clearing a piece of land and farming it jointly for a time, they dissolved partnership and cast lots for the land, which fell to Dunlap. Phillips then purchased a large tract of land in Springhill township, called "Phillips' Choice," containing 433 acres and allowance. The patent is dated Dec. 12, 1786. Mr. Phillips enjoyed the respect and confidence of all who knew him, and was often called to fill public positions. It was near his residence that the courts of Monongalia County, Va., were held in the last half of the eighteenth century. The buildings have long been demolished, and nothing but the foundations of them remain to mark the site. To the left of the New Geneva and Springhill Furnace roads, via Morris' Cross-Roads, and about two hundred yards from the same, on a long knoll, with a direction northeast, stood the Phillips residence, with many outbuildings, including shop, negro quarters, still-house, and stables. Among his grandchildren are Theophilus P. Kramer, Theophilus Williams, and Adolph Eberhart, whose ages are eighty-one, seventy-eight, and sixty-four years respectively. They recollect hearing their parents say that the Monongalia court was held in the shop which stood near the old Phillips dwelling-house.

_col._ Phillips was ordained an elder of the Mount Moriah Church, in Springhill township, in 1774. He was among the first to ship flour and whisky to New Orleans from Wilson Port, as the mouth of George Creek was then called. In 1789 he was elected to the State Legislature, which at that time met in the city of Philadelphia. His boats were ready laden for New Orleans, and he resolved to go with them, and instead of crossing the mountains, sail round by the Gulf and the Atlantic to Philadelphia. Before starting he willed his estate, giving to each of his children their portion, in case he should never return. This proved to have been the act of a sensible man, for not long after leaving the port of New Orleans, en route for Philadelphia, he fell a victim to ship-fever, and was buried at sea. He left a numerous family. Capt. John Phillips, of the war of 1812, was his son. He died of cholera near Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1832. Of the Williams family, many of whom have been elected justices, are John P., Thomas, Joseph G., and Thomas, Jr., grandsons, and great-grandson of Col. Theophilus. Dr. William Wilson, of Indiana, brother of Mrs. Elizer Robinson, of Uniontown, married a granddaughter, Miss Elizabeth Kramer. Theophilus Phillips married a Miss Joanna Prater. It is said that on several occasions Washington visited the Monongalia court-house, near Col. Phillips' place. It is, however, doubtful whether he was ever in that vicinity more than once,—in the year 1784.

Though Theophilus Phillips was among the earliest, if not the very first, of the actual settlers within the territory now Springhill township (col. George Wilson, however, being considerably earlier on the other side of George Creek), yet there were a considerable number of warrants taken by others for lands in Springhill antedating the warrant to Phillips of the tract, "Phillips' Choice," on which he settled. Among these early locations of lands in Springhill were the following, viz.: Andrew Contraul, a tract containing 347 acres and allowance, warrant dated July 3, 1769, surveyed 24 of July, 1779; Joseph Cox, 392 acres, warrant July 3, 1769, surveyed Nov. 17, 1779; Hugh Evans, 181 acres, surveyed 1783, warrant dated March 23, 1785; Thomas Asby, 307 acres, warrant dated July 3, 1769. There were a great many others whose warrants and patents are one hundred years old and upwards. Settlements increased very slowly for some years, but much more rapidly after the close of the Revolution, so that in the year 1783 the number of taxable persons, including " single men," in Springhill was over two hundred, and the total assessed valuation of property £12,532 5s. 6d. This, however, included in addition to the territory that is now Springhill a considerable additional territory that is now in the township of Nicholson.

John Swearengen and Van Swearengen, father and son, were among the earliest settlers in Springhill, being here as early as 1779, and possibly in 1769, Van Swearengen being in the latter year twenty-six years of age. Thomas Swearengen, Sr., and his son Thomas came to Western Pennsylvania about the same time, and settled west of the Monongahela. The ancestors of all the Swearengens in this region were Garrett Van Swearengen and Barbara De Barrette, his wife, who came from Holland to America, settled in Maryland, and were, with their children, Garrett and Barbara, naturalized in that province in April, 1669, as is shown by the records in Baltimore. Two other children of theirs, Elizabeth and Zachariah, were born in the Delaware counties, and so needed no naturalization. The prefix "Van" was afterwards dropped from the surname of the family, but was used, as we see, as the Christian name of the son of John Swearengen.

Of this John Swearengen who settled in Springhill township very little is known beyond the fact of his settlement here, and that he was a resident of the township in 1785. His son, Van Swearengen, did not remain long in Springhill,1 but removed to a new location on the east side of the Monongahela, near the mouth of Redstone, but retaining the ownership of his lands in Springhill at least until 1785. Before that time, however, he had left his second location near Redstone and removed to Washington County, of which he was elected sheriff upon its organization in 1781. After a few years spent by him in Washington County he removed to land which he had located as early as 1772 in Ohio County, Va., and died there Dec. 2, 1793. During all the period of his residence west of the Alleghenies he was a prominent man both in civil and military life.

The Crow family were very early settlers of this section of country. Michael Crow was born in Maryland, near Williamsport, and was the first of the name to settle in Springhill. After a short residence in his new home he married Hannah Huhn. (The Huhns owned the property where Crow's mill now stands, but the number of acres is not known.) At the death of Huhn, the father of his wife, Michael Crow, inherited the farm. Here he continued to reside until his death in 1838, at the age of ninety-eight years. His descendants are perhaps more numerous than those of any of the first settlers of this region. Several of them have filled important county offices. Jacob Crow was at one time treasurer of Fayette.

1 Van Swearengen and four other persons were the builders of the old log fort built as a place of refuge during the Indian troubles of 1774, near Morris Cross-Roads, on lands now owned by Mr. Crow. The Indians captured a son of his named Luke, whom they never restored. Peter Hurdin, a soldier of the war of 1742, after his return from service told several that he believed he saw Duke Swearengen among the Indians during his stay in Ohio, near Sandusky.
SPRINGHILL TOWNSHIP.

Hon. Alexander Crow, of New Geneva, was associate judge. The family is noted for its firm adherence to the principles of the Democratic party.

Mary Duvall's name should not be omitted from the list of early settlers of Springhill, though it does not appear that she ever reflected much credit on the township. Free from fear, she came from the East with the first settlers more than one hundred years ago, and located on a small stream, a tributary of Grassy Run, in an unbroken forest, inhabited only by Indians and wild animals. But the Indians had no terrors for her. "Logan was the friend of the white man," and it does not appear that he regarded this white woman as an enemy. When the Indians visited Springhill they always encamped at her spring and enjoyed her hospitality. If the community feared an Indian raid, and fled to the fort for protection, Mary Duvall remained at home in quiet and peace. Several years before her death she told many of her friends that the Indians knew of lead-mines not far away from her house, because they were never gone long when they needed a supply of lead, and that they always ran their bullets at her house. She was, it was said, a Roman Catholic, and hated most devoutly all Protestants, particularly the Methodists.

For them, in particular, her hatred was sleepless and unceasing. She left a family, mostly boys, who were said to have exhibited strong Indian peculiarities, both physical and mental. They were very quarrelsome, and exceedingly expert in the use of the rifle.

Daniel married in Springhill, and emigrated to Kentucky, selling his land here to George Hardin. Lewis also emigrated with his brother Daniel. All traces of the other members of the family are lost.

Jacob Gans was an early settler of Springhill, emigrating hither from Virginia with a large number of other hardy adventurers more than a century ago. Little is to be said of him except that he lived and died in Springhill, and left an untarnished character, as well as a numerous progeny in this part of Fayette County. To sketch all of his descendants would be to write the biography of a large portion of the citizens of the township. Anna Gans, a granddaughter of his, married a Mr. Arnold, and lives or did live on Ten-Mile Creek, in Greene County. Susanna, another granddaughter, married Jeremiah Burchinal, one of the most respected citizens of Springhill, and is now living, at a very advanced age, on Grassy Run, west of the old Springhill Furnace property.

John McFarland was one of the early adventurers who dared the dangers of the Indian country west of the mountains. His settlement was made in Springhill, near Cheat River, where he had also a mill and still-house. He left several children, among the number being John McFarland, who married Nelly Morris, daughter of Absalom Morris, after whom Morris Cross-Roads was named. Morris was the tavern-keeper who resided between the cross-roads and Geneva. From the McFarland and Morris union have sprung many prominent families of Springhill. The Weltmers of Cheat Forks are also connections of the family.

Robert Jones and Benjamin Jones, brothers and natives of Wales, came to Fayette County in 1792, and located in Springhill township. In 1793, Robert Jones entered a large tract of land in this township, and on that tract he, with his brother Benjamin, erected in 1794 the Springhill Furnace, and commenced the manufacture of iron, Robert being the principal man in the concern. After a few years the furnace was leased (and afterwards sold) to Jesse Evans (a son-in-law of Robert Jones), who carried it on with success. Benjamin Jones was little of a business man, but of fine scholarly attainments and an ardent promoter of education. While living with his brother Robert, and to some extent concerned with him in the furnace, Benjamin Jones opened a select school in Smithfield—sometimes called Brownfield-town. How long he taught this school is not known, but it is certain that by his example and efforts the people of the township became greatly favorable to select schools, and the establishment of the Springhill Academy was the result. Benjamin Jones was an ardent Baptist, and a substantial supporter of the worship of that denomination in his vicinity. From Springhill township he removed to Greene County, where he died, and was buried in the ground of the Baptist Church near Garrard's Fort, on Big Whitley Creek.

Robert Jones was born in Wales, March 29, 1743, and died April 16, 1809. His executors were his brother Benjamin and his only son, John, but before the estate was settled John died at his residence on Whitely Creek, Greene Co. The furnace and other property of Robert Jones passed to his daughter Mary, the wife of Jesse Evans, who had leased the old furnace in 1797. A son of Jesse and Mary Evans is Col. Samuel Evans, who is now living, at more than eighty years of age, in North Union township, about two miles from Uniontown. He has filled many offices of honor and trust, and has for more than half a century enjoyed the esteem and friendship of many of the most notable men of the State and nation. His sister Eliza—daughter of Jesse Evans—married Mr. Wilson, of Morgantown, Va., who lost his life by drowning in the Monongahela River below Brownsville. They were the parents of the Hon. Alphens E. Willson, now president judge of the courts of Fayette and Greene Counties. His sister is the wife of the Hon. J. K. Ewing, of Uniontown. Rachel Jones married Lewis Evans. They resided and died in Greene County. Lieut. Lewis K. Evans, of Waynesburg, is their son.

John Jones left a large family of sons and daughters. The eldest, Robert, married Ann Eberhart and emigrated to Cincinnati, Ohio. His son, Adolph

1 A full account of this old furnace is given in the general chapter devoted to iron-works in the county.
Jones, A.M., M.D., is a prominent politician as well as physician. A younger son, Frederick, was killed Dec. 31, 1862, at Stone River, Tenn. The celebrated Robert Jones Burdette is a son of Frederick Burdette and Sophia Jones. He was born in Greensboro', Greene Co., in 1838.

The brothers John and Andrew Oliphant were among the most enterprising men of South Fayette, living on or near Georges Creek. Andrew Oliphant was commissioned a justice of the peace for Springhill township Jan. 2, 1804. He married Mary Griffin, a daughter of Hon. Isaac Griffin; only two of their children lived to maturity, Mary Ann and James M. Mary A. Oliphant married Edgar C. Wilson, of Morgantown, Va., but died not long after her marriage. Mr. Wilson married as his second wife her cousin, a daughter of John Oliphant. She is still living at Morgantown, W. Va. James M. Oliphant, son of Andrew, was married three times, but left only two heirs. The property once owned by the Oliphants is now in the possession of Samuel H. Hunter, Esq. Just above the residence was "Sylvan Forge," established by John and Andrew Oliphant in 1808.

Hon. Joseph Eneix was born June 16, 1788. He married Hester Oliphant, Sept. 20, 1807. His education was much neglected, and he began life but half-armed, yet by industry and application he became a prominent man. By trade he was a blacksmith and scythe-maker. About 1823 he was elected to the State Legislature from his native county, Fayette. His course in the Legislature meeting the approbation of his constituents, he was returned, serving in all three terms down to 1835. During President Jackson's second term, in 1834, he received the appointment of receiver of public moneys at Mineral Point, Wis. In 1839 he resigned on account of ill health. He gradually failed in health, and died in 1858. He was a large land-owner at one time, but died comparatively poor. James Eneix is a son of Joseph. A daughter married Samuel Dilliner, Esq., of New Geneva.

Nicholas Blake, an Englishman, was once the owner of "Friendship Hill," which he sold to Albert Gallatin, and which became the statesman's residence. Blake, before his death, became almost penniless. He left a son, James, who followed butchering. In disposition he was very peaceable and of few words; he managed to make a living by hard work and rigid economy. Thus he passed his life until about thirty years of age. The surprise of the Springhill people was very great when, in 1808, an attorney from England arrived at New Geneva and made inquiry for Nicholas Blake or his heirs. James Blake was the heir he found. A large landed estate in England had fallen to him by the death of a relative. The law of England prohibits the sale of certain estates, and this entailed fortune of Blake must remain, and to enjoy his good luck he must become a British subject or lose it. Without money he was unable to take possession. In this extremity he applied to Jas. W. Nicholson, Esq., who generously furnished the necessary amount of funds. His correspondence with Nicholson is lost, and with it all trace of the subsequent career of James Blake in his father's native land.

The celebrated estate called "Friendship Hill," once the home of Albert Gallatin, is situated southwest of New Geneva, in Springhill township. It consisted originally of three hundred and seventy acres and allowance, and belonged to Nicholas Blake, as already noticed. Gallatin, after purchasing Blake's warrant for the tract, had it patented in his own name Jan. 26, 1788. By later purchases the number of acres was raised to five hundred. In 1823 the main building of Gallatin's residence was built, during his absence in Europe. His son James had the management of affairs during this period, but spent most of his time in New Geneva at his uncle Nicholson's. He, however, found leisure to change his father's plan of the building, changing the front from east to south, and thereby greatly injuring it and necessitating the later addition of a wing and verandas to cover the defects. The elder Gallatin was greatly out of humor when he saw it on his return, and did not fail to express himself in forcible language to that effect.

It was in this house that the Marquis de Lafayette visited Gallatin when he passed through this section in 1825.

Gallatin sold the estate to Albin Mellery, May 26, 1832, nearly fifty years after having purchased it of Blake. Mellery was a kinsman of Gallatin, but lacked essential financial abilities. He had "too many irons in the fire," and so divided his forces that he became the prey of his creditors. To escape their importunities he built two steamboats, in one of which he went down the Mississippi, where he died between 1839 and 1843. The principal creditors were Charles and Frederick Tennig. Upon their claims Sheriff Morris sold the estate, the creditors becoming purchasers. For many years the property was without proper care. In 1856 it was sold to the Hon. John L. Dawson, who greatly improved it. For several years he resided here, enjoying the quiet of domestic life. Many visitors have expressed their surprise upon visiting this historic mansion, wondering how it ever came that Gallatin or Dawson should choose a place so isolated for a residence. Among these visitors was Mrs. Henry Adams, who accompanied her husband when visiting the place in 1879, just before completing his life of Gallatin. Of the historical interest which clings to this venerable mansion of "Friendship Hill," the greater part is due to the fact that it was for many years the estate and home of Albert Gallatin, the great financier and Secretary of the Treasury; but only second to this is the fact that in after-years it was the favorite seat of the Hon. John L. Dawson, who here ended his brilliant and useful life.
It has already been mentioned that Gallatin's son James superintended the erection of the "Friendship Hill" mansion, during his father's absence in Europe in 1822-23, and that the elder Gallatin, returning in 1823, was disappointed, if not disgusted, at the changes which had been made in the original plan of the building. On his return from Paris, in May of that year, he remained for some time in Washington, then went to New Geneva to inspect his new house, and (presumably) with every hope of finding a commodious mansion suited to his taste. Unquestionably he was disappointed. Meeting his son at New Geneva, they, in company with Ed Brawley, drove out to see the house. On coming within sight of it he turned to his son and made the inquiry, "Which is the front?" He was told it fronted south—nearly opposite the direction from which it was approached! Upon this (as is narrated) he used language as forcible and nearly as reprehensible as that which Washington used at the battle of Monmouth when he met Lee in full retreat over the causeway. But it was an accomplished fact, and vigorous language could not change it. He recovered his equanimity, made the best of what was then past help, inspected the mansion, liked it as well as he could, and two or three months later wrote to his daughter a letter somewhat humorous, giving his ideas with regard to the Monongahela country and the new mansion on "Friendship Hill," as follows:

"Notwithstanding all my exertions you will find it hard enough when you come next spring to accommodate yourself to the privations and wildness of the country. Our house has been built by a new Irish carpenter, who was always head over heels, and added much to the disorder inseparable from building. Being unacquainted with the Grecian architecture, he adopted an Hiberno-Tectonic style, so that the outside of the house, with its port-hole-looking windows, has the appearance of Irish barracks, whilst the inside ornaments are similar to those of a Dutch tavern, and I must acknowledge that these form a singular contrast with the French marble chimney-pieces, paper, and mirrors. On one side of that mass of stones which Lucien calls "Le Chateau," and in full view as you approach it, is a wing, consisting of the gable end of a log house, with its chimney in front, and I could not pull it down, as it is the kitchen and dining-room, where are daily fed two masons and plasterers, two attendants, two stone quarrers, two painters, a carpenter, Lucien, Albert's black Peter, and Mr., Maid, Messieurs, et les petits Buffle. The grounds are overgrown with chiers, iron-weeds, stinking-weeds, laurel, several varieties of briars, impenetrable thickets of brush, vines, and underwood, amongst which are discovered vestiges of old asparagus-beds and new artichoke-beds, and now and then a spontaneous apple or peach-tree. As to Albert, he has four guns, a pointer, three boats, two riding-horses, and a pet Colt, smaller than a Jackass, who feeds on the fragments of my old lilies and other flowers. His own clothes adorns our parlor and only sitting-room in the old brick house, for the frame house is partly occupied by the Buffle family, and partly encumbered by various boxes and Albert's billiard-table, the pockets of which are made with his stockings."

1 Adams' Life of Gallatin, page 589.

The first physician in Springhill township was Dr. Jacob Green. Nothing, however, is known of him, except that his name appears on the assessment-roll of the township in the year 1786. Of those who followed him in practice in this township were Dr. Samuel Sacket, Dr. Secly, of Greene County, Dr. Todd, Dr. James C. Ramsey, and several others. But a great portion of Nicholson originally belonged to Springhill, including the town of New Geneva, where the greater number of physicians resided.

EARLY ROADS.

The first road laid out by the Fayette County Court to pass through this township was one petitioned for at the December session of 1788, viz.: "A public road from Unionsown to the southern boundary of this county, or Mason and Dixon's line, to meet a road that is laid out and cleared by order of the court of Monongalia County, Va., to the said line near John McFarland's ford on Cheat River." This road is the one now passing through Morris' Cross-Roads, and is the direct Unionsown and Morgantown road. Another road ordered by the court at the same session was "a road from Miller's ferry, on the Monongahela River, across the Laurel Hill, by the way of George Williams', Jr., thence to the Widow Moore's, on Sandy Creek, to join the Pennsylvania or Maryland road." This road connected with the Washington, Ten-Mile, and Muddy Creek road at the Monongahela River, or Miller's ferry, now the New Geneva and Greensboro' ferry. The map of Pennsylvania published in London, August, 1792, has this road marked upon it. Starting at Washington, it has a course southeast, passing near or through Carmichael's, Greene Co.; thence to Minor's Mill, now Mapleton, Greene Co.; thence east-southeast to Greensboro', same county; then by the route prayed for as above to the Widow Moore's, on Sandy Creek, and thence across Laurel Hill.

Many of the so-called roads were nothing more than paths through the woods, for at this period Western Pennsylvania was almost an unbroken forest, no fencing having as yet been introduced to bar the traveler's way, which was generally a direct course. A century has wrought many changes in Springhill in regard to highways. From one or two, aggregating some twenty miles in length, many cross her territory in all directions, affording easy access to and from every part of the township.

EARLY MANUFACTURES.

Quite a number of individuals had engaged in the manufacture of flour and whisky as early as 1786 in Springhill township. At that period John Hardin, Sr., had a grist-mill assessed at £100, located near Lewis Hunter's present residence; Richard Robins a grist-mill taxed at £120, and James Gray a grist-mill assessed at £150; one saw-mill on Georges Creek, owned by John Hune (or Hoon), valued at £50.
Three years later (1789) two saw-mills were returned by the assessor, owned by John Hune and George and John Wilson. The saw-mill belonging to Hune stood near the site of Crow's mill. George and John Wilson's was farther down Georges Creek. John Hardin's mill, in this assessment, passed to Henry Hardin. The Willson grist-mill was on Georges Creek, upon a tract of land called "Appendix," now the property of Robert H. Ross. The James Gray mill was the "River Mill," the remains of which may still be seen on the Monongahela River, in New Geneva. In 1786 eighteen stills were assessed, and three years afterwards twenty-two. The distillers were Joseph Caldwell, Nicholas Crowshore, Richard Evans, Hugh Evans, David Frame, Charles Griffin, Jacob Gannits, Albert Gallatin, Ezekiel Moore, Hugh Marshall, John McFarland, Paul Larsh, John Linch, Philip Pierce, Theophilus Phillips, Nicholas Pock, James Robinson, Thomas Tobin, William Wells. These were all returned as distillers in 1789.

The distillers were divided into three classes, and each class taxed at a different rate per gallon made. The tax rate on first class was 5s. per gallon; second class, 3s. 6d. per gallon; third class, 2s. 6d. per gallon. Those rated as first class were Thomas Ramsey, 100 gallons; Jacob Ghance, 70 gallons; Robert Hardin, 66 gallons; John Linch, 70 gallons; Abraham Hardin, 74 gallons; Joseph Caldwell, 75 gallons; David Frame, 35 gallons; John McFarland, 66 gallons; Charles Griffin, 105 gallons; and his partner, James Neally, 49 gallons; Philip Pierce, 96 gallons; and his partner, John Wade, 49 gallons. Second class: Ezekiel Moore, 50 gallons; James Gray, 65 gallons; John Hoon, 32 gallons. Third class: Dennis Nevil, 80 gallons; Nicholas Pock, 40 gallons; William Wells, 80 gallons. Aggregating a daily yield of one thousand two hundred and two gallons. To transport this large amount of whisky to market induced several enterprising individuals to engage in boat-building at the mouth of Georges Creek, which had received the name of Wilson Port, in honor of Col. George Wilson, whose sons, William, George, and John, were citizens of Springfield for many years after his death. The Port, as it was called, soon became a noted shipping-point, not only of merchandise, but also of emigrants for Kentucky and Ohio. The boats were called keel-boats, flat-boats, and Kentucky boats. This industry flourished until the advent of steamboats, and for many years afterwards upon a smaller scale. In addition to flour and whisky, iron and glass were added in 1795 to the list. Hon. Andrew Stewart, in his early life, shipped from this port. The whisky business was the most general business until after 1800. The next class of boats built at Wilson Port were steamboats by Albin Mellier, in 1837. Of these there were two named "Albert Gallatin" and "Napoleon Bonaparte."

In 1794 glass and iron were manufactured, the first by Albert Gallatin & Co., the latter by Robert Jones.

The establishment of the glass-factory, near where New Geneva was soon after built, was due to Albert Gallatin. Two stories are related concerning its establishment, one by grandchildren of the founders, the other by neighbors. The first, being the most credible, is as follows: Christian Kramer, Adolph Eberhart, Lewis Reitz, John George Reppert, Baltzer Kramer, and John Christian Gabler, German glass-blowers from Frederick Town, Frederick Co., Md., had left their home for the purpose of establishing a glass-factory in Kentucky, near where Louisville now stands. Having reached the Ohio River, they embarked in a canoe, and had arrived near Wheeling, when, stopping for the night, they were joined by a stranger, who, speaking their language, was soon on the best of terms with them. The stranger was Albert Gallatin. Having been informed of their journey and its object, he succeeded in persuading them to return to his farm on Georges Creek, where the necessary facilities for manufacturing glass-ware were to be had almost for nothing. After some little talk he finally agreed to furnish everything and they do the blowing. The terms were accepted, and in 1794 the company began the manufacture of glass. The other account is that the same Germans were crossing the mountains in wagons, having their provisions with them, and that they would stop at some public-house and borrow cooking utensils to cook their food. Having reached Tomlinson's stand, they put up for the night. After supper they amused themselves with music, several being excellent performers. Being a great lover of music, Mr. Gallatin (who was there) inquired of the landlord who they were. Being informed, he introduced himself, and the whole company spent the evening in drink and music. Having discussed the glass question in all its phases, he gave them a letter to his manager at Friendship Hill, urging him to offer better terms than he himself had to induce them to stay. Three accepted at once, but the others continued their journey. Upon their arrival at Louisville they found the location unsuitable, and returned and joined their companions.

The building erected for the glass-works was a frame, forty by forty feet dimensions, three sides frame and one stone. This interesting establishment was situated a little over a mile above New Geneva, on the south bank of Georges Creek, on land purchased by Albert Gallatin of John Calboun. It was an eight-pot factory, used wood for melting, and ashes instead of soda. The potash was manufactured by Patrick Brawley. The clerk of the works was Andrew Hoover; book-keeper, James W. Nicholson. There was a difference of opinion in regard to the price at which the glass was to be sold, Gallatin advocating a fair price, fearing that a high one would bring a great competition. The price agreed upon was fourteen dollars per box. The style of the company was Gallatin & Co. In a few years it was changed to "New Geneva Glass-Works." In 1807 the company erected new and more commodious works in Greene County, where success continued to reward their efforts. They still retained the name "New Geneva Glass." In 1858, Christian Kramer died, at the age of eighty-five years. He was the last survivor of the original members of the glass-works company, and was the father of Allen Kramer, banker, of Pittsburgh.

The old glass-factory in Springhill has been demolished, but all the houses built by the company as dwellings are still standing.

Not long after having established the glass-factory, Albert Gallatin offered inducements to any one who would engage in carding, spinning, and weaving. The saw-mill he had built a short distance from the glass-factory was fitted up in a suitable manner for the intended industry, and the necessary machinery bought. When all was completed a Mr. Collins was employed, who for many years continued the business. Several years afterwards, Ellis Stephenson erected works higher up Georges Creek, and carried on the manufacture of wool in all its branches, but the business finally languished and was abandoned.

The old Springhill Furnace was built by Robert Jones, who became a settler in Springhill in 1792, as already mentioned. In 1794 he and his brother Benjamin commenced iron-making at this furnace. It was afterwards sold to Jesse Evans (father of Col. Samuel Evans, of North Union township), who ran it for more than thirty years. This old furnace has been mentioned at length in the article on iron-works in the general history of the county. The location is at the foot of the mountain, some four miles eastward from the cross-roads. Besides the furnace buildings, there is a Presbyterian church, post-office, and store.

Northwest of the Springhill Furnace site, on Georges Creek, was the "Sylvan Forge," built in 1796 by John and Andrew Oliphant. In connection with their iron-works, they built a large stone grist-mill, now the property of Samuel Hunter, Esq.

The only manufacturing done in Springhill outside of the iron business is the making of stoneware. Mr. James Eneix has a small establishment south of Friendship Hill, where a good article is made, but little capital is invested. All the turning is done by himself. The number of kilns burnt is eight annually, yielding twelve thousand gallons of ware.

SPRINGHILL CIVIL LIST.

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE.

1 In the September term of court of Fayette County, 1797, a committee which had been appointed in June previous made this report, that "the committee met on Tuesday, the 12th inst., and having viewed the ground from Springhill Furnace, by way of Sylvan Forge, to the frame meeting-house, are of opinion that a public road is necessary," etc., which shows that the Sylvan Forge was then in existence.

2 It is stated that Thomas Williams, Esq., held the office of justice of the peace from 1797 to the time of his death in 1837, a period of forty years.

AUDITORS.

ASSSESSORS.

1 Prior to this date the office had been held by appointment; after 1840 the justices were elected by the people.

Springhill has no towns or villages, Point Marion, Morris' Cross-Roads, and Springhill Furnace are the chief centres. Point Marion (named in honor of Gen.
Francis Marion) is located in the “Forks of Cheat,”—that is, on the south side of that stream, at its junction with the Monongahela River. It dates back to February, 1843. It contains forty-three dwellings, a Methodist Episcopal Church (a branch of the Greensboro', Greene Co., Methodist Church), with a considerable membership; a town hall, school-house, two stores, shoe-shop, two blacksmith-shops, cabinet-shop, post-office, two planing-mills, two saw-mills, two saw and building-furnishing firms. The first manufacturing company, Franklinberry & Co., was organized in 1867. The most important now is Kei'er, Franklinberry & Co., organized 1880; capital, twelve thousand dollars.

The other company is John A. Clark and Ira N. Burchinal, established July 31, 1875, planing- and saw-mill, and sash and door manufacturers.

Morris' Cross-Roads was named for Absalom Morris, who was an inn-keeper here for many years. It is located where the New Geneva and Springhill Furnace road intersects the Uniontown and Morgantown roads. It is the polling-place of the township, and has been since the year 1816. Prior to that time Springhill, Georges, and German voted at the house of Nicholas Rifle, but the inconvenience was so great that the polling-places were changed. The last joint election was at the time of the first election of James Monroe as President, in the year named. Morris' Cross-Roads contains a post-office, store, public-house, and blacksmith-shop.

SCHOOLS.

The first house built for school purposes in Springhill was the one near Morris' Cross-Roads, erected near the close of the eighteenth century. The Mount Moriah church building, built in 1773, was also used for school purposes. There were also school-houses at Bear Wallow and Forks of Cheat. Another, near the "old glass-works" on Georges Creek, was built at a very early day. To give the names of all the teachers who taught in these old houses is now impossible. Only a few have been ascertained, viz.: Alexander Clare, Thomas Clare, Jeptha Curtis, John Lynch, Samuel Kinkaid, — McCarty, Salva Crosby, Esther Gans, John Knox McGee, Thomas Couser, Henry O'Neal, — Coburn, and Singleton.

Since the introduction of the free school system the following school buildings have been erected, numbered and named in the following order: Ross', Fallen Timber, Forks of Cheat, Lutheran, Sheets', Morgan's, Dunker Hill, and Mountian. The school property (houses, furniture, and sites) is valued at eight thousand dollars. Following are the school statistics of Springhill for the school year ending June, 1881, viz.: Number of children on school-roll, 374; daily attendance, 257; tax levied in 1880, $1198.06; State appropriation, $369.69; balance from 1879, $88.83.

CHURCHES.

The Mount Moriah church edifice in Springhill belongs to the Presbyterians, who purchased four acres of ground upon which it stands of Joseph Caldwell. According to the court records it was in process of erection in July, 1793. The church was dedicated by Rev. James Power, of New Castle Presbytery, in 1774.
In 1776 he brought his family and lived upon Georges Creek for two years. The elders were McLain, Pollock, Frame, Abrams, Hill, Crow, Dils, Phillips, and Ramsey. In 1778 James Dunlap preached for this church.

This continued to be the chief Presbyterian Church until the organization of the "Old Frame," as it is generally called, in 1788. Its history from that time is so completely blended with that of the younger church that the reader is referred to the history of the churches in Nicholson township.

The St. John's Evangelical Lutheran Church, located near Morris' Cross-Roads, is a branch of the "Old Dutch Church" of German township, organized by the Rev. John Stough, a Reformed Lutheran, in the latter part of 1738. The mother-church made arrangements in 1854–55 to provide a house of worship nearer the residences of certain members in Springhill. The building was ready to be occupied Jan. 4, 1856, and was then dedicated. Rev. J. K. Melhorn was in charge of these congregations for several years (before and after the building of the new house), and to his efforts Springhill is largely indebted for the continuance and prosperity of this church. The elders are Conrad Emery and Michael Baker.

In the Forks of Cheat the Methodists have a neat frame church. The congregation is under the charge of Rev. McCurdy, of the Greensboro', Greene Co., Methodist Church, of which it is a branch.

The old "Free Church," near where the Church of the Disciples now stands, was built about the year 1825 by a union of professed Christians. Freeman Lewis, on his (1832) map of Fayette County, has it named the "New Lights' Church." The history of this church has been given by A. W. Scott, from which the following is taken. In 1820 a stranger registered himself at a tavern in Uniontown as Peter T. Lashley, Christian minister. As soon as it was discovered that he was a preacher he was invited to preach in the court-house, which he did to the great edification of the people. He next preached in Smithfield, where his sermons created considerable excitement. His doctrine took hold, and members from nearly all denominations professed it. The Ganses, who were Dunkards, with many others, joined and built the Free Church. The elders were William Gans, William Saddler, and Joseph Bowers. The house burnt down in 1853. Near it the Disciples have erected a frame house of worship. The only surviving elder is A. W. Gans. The church was erected in 1861.

SPRINGHILL SOLDIERS.

In the war of 1812–15, Springhill sent a considerable number of soldiers to the army. Among these were men who enlisted in Capt. John Phillips' company, which numbered one hundred and twenty-five men when he marched them across the Monongahela River on their way to Pittsburgh. Capt. Peter Hertzog was from Springhill. His company was styled a "rifle company," and served in the Northwest under Gen. Harrison. The names of the men who went from Springhill in these companies have not been found.

In the war of the Rebellion a great number of men from Springhill entered the army of the United States, serving in various regiments of Pennsylvania and West Virginia. Among them were those named below, viz.: Ashbel G. Duncan, in Capt. George W. Gilmore's company, mustered into the service of West Virginia; afterwards raised a company, and became its captain, in a cavalry regiment, Fourteenth Pennsylvania. In the Eighty-fifth Pennsylvania Regiment, Robert H. Ross, Martin Eberhart, William Eberhart, Charles B. Eneix, David R. Sturgis, Phineas Sturgis, George A. Burchinal, Thomas Moser, Jesse Jones. In the One Hundred and Sixty-first Pennsylvania Regiment, Richard Stephenson, Samuel Le Clare, Jackson Dougherty. In the One Hundred and Sixty-eighth Pennsylvania Regiment, John Thompson. In regiments not known, Michael Clemmer, George Ganoe, John Ganoe, Alexander Dougherty, Ephraim Provence, Adolph Provance, Abner McLain, Alfred Swearingin, Charles O'Neil, Calvin Ruble, Willey Burchinal, James T. Dougherty, Allen Frankinberry.

Capt. George W. Gilmore's cavalry company was raised in Fayette County. The company was accepted in July, 1861. They were denominated the "Pennsylvania Dragoons," and attached to the First Virginia Cavalry. Capt. Gilmore is a son of Hon. David Gilmore, and well known in Fayette County. He was born June 7, 1832, near McClellandtown. He at present resides in Dade County, Mo.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

HON. ALBERT GALLATIN.

Albert Gallatin, who was nominally a resident of Fayette County for fully forty years in the last part of the eighteenth and the first quarter of the nineteenth century, and who actually lived here during a considerable portion of that period, might, perhaps, in view of the high offices he held and the distinguished public services he performed, be regarded as the most illustrious citizen of Fayette during the almost century of its existence as a county. He was a native of Switzerland, born at Geneva, Jan. 29, 1761. His ancestor, John Gallatin, secretary to the Duke of Savoy, emigrated to Geneva early in the sixteenth century, and, having embraced the Reformation, was one of the city magistrates when Switzerland became a republic. The family was one of no little note, embracing among those allied to it the celebrated Madame de Stael and her distinguished father, Necker, the famous French minister of finance.

Albert Gallatin graduated at Geneva in 1779, and in 1780, when in his twentieth year, he emigrated to America, being attracted here by the great struggle for liberty that was then in progress. Landing at Boston, one of his first acts after his arrival was to offer his services to the American Congress, which were accepted, and he was assigned to duty in the defense of Passamaquoddy, where, as well as at Machias, he served under Col. John Allen. He did not, however, long remain in the military service. In 1782 he came into possession of a moderate patrimony in Switzerland, and immediately after the close of the Revolution he was located in Richmond, Va., as the agent of a European commercial house. While there he became acquainted with a number of prominent men, and among these was Patrick Henry, Governor of the State; and it was in accordance with the advice of Governor Henry that he purchased lands in the West, in the valleys of the Ohio and Monongahela, which resulted in his becoming a resident in the south part of Fayette County. While in Richmond he became acquainted with an Italian lady, Madame Allegre, and her daughter Sophia, who was the acknowledged belle of the city. The young people became mutually attached to each other, and this resulted (May 14, 1789) in the marriage of Gallatin to Sophia Allegre, though it was done against the violent and determined opposition of her mother. The young couple removed to the valley of the Monongahela, and occupied a log house in Springhill township. Three weeks later the bride died, and her remains were interred at "Friendship Hill," where they still repose, in a grave unmarked by any memorial stone (in accordance with her dying request to Gallatin), but which in later years was inclosed by a neat fence, by direction of the then proprietor of the estate, the Hon. John L. Dawson.

Five years prior to his first marriage he had visited the West to purchase lands, and in 1787 his name appears for the first time on the assessment rolls of Springhill township, he being assessed on the "Friendship Hill" lands, purchased from Nicholas Blake in the previous year. For a few years after his first coming here his residence was somewhat migratory, being a part of the time in Springhill, and sometimes at Morgantown, Va. Upon his marriage he made his home (intended to be permanent) at "Friendship Hill." In October, 1789, he was chosen a delegate, with John Smilie, of Fayette, to the convention which framed the constitution of 1790. It was in that body that he was first brought to public notice as a talented debater, though then but twenty-nine years of age. In 1790 he was elected, with Judge James Finley, to the Pennsylvania Assembly, where he served in 1791, '92, and '93. The high qualities he there displayed caused his election by the Legislature, at the session of 1792-93, to the Senate of the United States, though a majority of the members were opposed to him in politics, he being a member of the Republican—soon afterwards known as the Democratic—party. He took his seat in the Senate in December, 1793, but a question was raised as to his eligibility to the office, as he had not been for a sufficient length of time a citizen of the United States. The question was referred to a committee, who reported adversely, and in February, 1794, he was unseated by a strict party vote of fourteen to twelve. It was during this visit to the East in his senatorial capacity that he was married to Hannah Nicholson, as before mentioned. In May, 1794, he returned to Springhill, and purchased from John and William George Wilson the site of the village of New Geneva, and started the enterprise of the old glass-works, as elsewhere noticed. It was also at this time that he became unfortunately identified with the insurgent party in the "Whiskey Insurrection," but he afterwards deeply regretted the course he had at first taken, and did all in his power to quench the flame he had to some extent been instrumental in kindling.

At the close of the Whiskey Insurrection (in October, 1794), Mr. Gallatin was again elected to the Assembly of Pennsylvania, and was also at the same time elected a member of Congress. The Congress to which he was thus elected did not meet till December, 1795, and he served through that session, and was re-elected in 1796, 1798, and 1800 from the same district, composed of the counties of Allegheny, Washington, and Greene, the latter county having been erected in 1786. His service in Congress embraced the last two years of Washington’s administration and the whole of the administration of President John Adams. It was during this period that Mr. Gallatin, with others, established the old gun-factory near New Geneva.

When Thomas Jefferson became President, in March, 1801, he indicated to Mr. Gallatin his wish to appoint him Secretary of the Treasury. There existed, however, an obstacle in Mr. Gallatin’s connection with the Fayette gun-factory, which held contracts to furnish arms to the government. Mr. Gallatin therefore returned to New Geneva, sold out all his interest in the factory and the contracts to Mr. Baker, and was appointed to the Secretaryship May 14, 1801. He remained at the head of the Treasury Department through both of Mr. Jefferson’s Presidential terms, through Mr. Madison’s first, and in his second term until February, 1814, though in the mean time (April, 1813) the President had appointed him a plenipotentiary, jointly with John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, and James A. Bayard, of Delaware, to sign a treaty of peace with Great Britain, which it was then hoped would be effected through the friendly mediation offered by the Emperor of Russia. On this mission the President had sent him to Europe, but without allowing him to relinquish the Secretar-ship of the Treasury. The Senate refused to confirm his appointment, on the ground that the two offices of Secretary of the Treasury and peace commis-missioner or minister were incompatible. He was not, however, recalled. England rejected the czar's mediation, but offered to treat untrammeled. Thereupon Mr. Gallatin, having been relieved of the Secretar-ship, was appointed, Feb. 9, 1814, one of the commissioners in the treaty negotiations, which resulted in the conclusion of a treaty of peace, signed at Ghent, in Belgium, Dec. 24, 1814. In 1815, Mr. Gallatin was appointed minister to France, where he remained from 1816 to 1823, during which time he was in trust with special and important missions to England and to the Netherlands. On his return to the United States, in 1824, he declined a seat in the Cabinet, also the candidacy of his party for Vice-President. The new mansion at Friendship Hill had been provided for his reception, and there he took up his abode soon after his return from Europe, and there in 1825 he received the memorable visit of his illustrious friend, the Marquis de Lafayette, "the like of which old Springhill had never seen, may never see again."

In 1826, Mr. Gallatin was sent as minister plenipo-tentary to the court of St. James, where he remained over a year, and successfully accomplished all the objects of his mission. He returned to the United States in December, 1827, but never again resided in Fayette County. He lived a short time in Baltimore (which was the place of residence of two of Mrs. Gallatin's sisters), but soon removed to the city of New York, where he spent the remainder of his long and brilliant life, devoting himself chiefly to literature, science, historical and ethnological researches.

He was mainly instrumental in founding and became the first president of the Ethnological Society, and he was from 1843 until his death president of the New York Historical Society. He was perhaps the best talker of the century, at home on all topics, with a wonderful memory for facts and dates. He died at the residence of his son-in-law, at Astoria, L. I., on Sunday, Aug. 12, 1849, in the eighty-ninth year of his age.

Col. John Morgan.

The late Col. John Morgan, of Springhill, was of Welsh parentage. His father and mother married in Wales, and had two or three children before they migigrated to America, and here they had more, to the number of ten in all, of whom Col. John, born in Springhill township, Aug. 8, 1790, was the seventh. Col. Morgan's father, David Morgan, was one of the first settlers of the southwestern part of Fayette County. At the time of his arrival in the county it was inhabited by the Indians, with whom he had many encounters. He was one of the founders of Mount Moriah Baptist Church at Smithfield, and was noted for his piety. He died in 1798, aged fifty-four years.

When a young man Col. Morgan learned blacksmithing, and was an apprentice in the same shop with the late Hon. Andrew Stewart. He worked at his trade for a few years, and then engaged in flat-boating down the Monongahela and Ohio Rivers, which he followed for three years or more, and then settled upon the old homestead, where he spent the remainder of his long life, except while occupied with public business. He was a soldier of the war of 1812, but obtained the title of colonel in the State militia, being commissioned as such by Governor Simon Snyder. He was a member of the State Legislature for Fayette County in 1843, and was re-elected in 1844 and 1845. Col. Morgan was an earnest advocate of the public school system of the State, and was one of the first school directors of his township, and held other township offices. He died Jan. 5, 1880.

March 12, 1817, Col. Morgan married Elizabeth Lyons, of Springhill township, and by her had seven children,—four sons and three daughters. The sons all became farmers, and the daughters married farmers. At the time of his death Col. Morgan's possessions consisted chiefly in lands. He was strong of body, possessing wonderful powers of endurance, and had an abundance of good hard sense. He was not a church-member. He was always a sound Democrat, and was highly esteemed by all who knew him. In short, his was a rare character, and he filled up the measure of his years ably and honorably.

Lebbeus Biglow Gans.

Lebbeus Biglow Gans was born in Springhill township, Fayette Co., Pa., March 31, 1825. He is the fifth son of William and Magdalene Gans, whose parents were among the early settlers of Southern Fayette County. William Gans' parents emigrated from German on account of religious persecution, and settled near Antietam, Md., and in the year 1785 came to Springhill township and pre-empted the beautiful tract of land near Morris' Cross-Roads on which they lived and died, and now owned by L. B. Gans. Mag-alene, wife of William Gans, was the daughter of George Custer, who was a first cousin of Gen. George Washington, they being sisters' children. He was the fourth son of Paul Custer, and his mother was Sarah Ball, the daughter of Col. Ball, of Lancaster County, Pa. Her sister, Mary Ball, was married to Mr. Augustine Washington, by whom she had six children, the eldest being the renowned commander-in-chief of the Revolutionary army and the first President of the United States. George Custer was born in Philadelphia, Pa., Dec. 3, 1774, and died on his farm in Georges township, Fayette Co., Pa., in 1829, aged eighty-five years and two days. He was a large, healthy man, with abundant means, and was the father of fifteen children. L. B. Gans received a common-school education, and is a farmer by profession. He has been twice married. His first wife, Elizabeth J. Ramsay, was the daughter of James G. Ramsay, Esq., whom he married Jan. 6, 1848, and by whom he had three children,—one son, who died in infancy; and two daughters, both living. The elder, Dorcas Anna, is married to T. F. Protzman, a merchant at Morris' Cross-Roads, Pa. The younger, Elizabeth J., is married to W. Morgan Smith, of Mount Pleasant, Westmoreland Co., Pa. His first wife, Elizabeth J., died March 25, 1857. He married his second wife, Emily S. Goe, daughter of Henry B. Goe, of Allegheny City, Oct. 15, 1868, by whom he has three sons and one daughter. Mr. Gans is an active, thrifty business man. In addition to the homestead, which has always been considered the standard in making real estate assessments in the township, he owns one hundred and thirty-four acres immediately adjoining it on the east, making in all three hundred acres, which is the best farm in Southern Fayette County. The farm is well improved and in an excellent state of cultivation. This farm is noted for its extensive maple-sugar orchard, containing about two thousand trees, which yields an average annual income of eight hundred dollars. In late years Mr. Gans has not made a specialty of agriculture, but is engaged in grazing stock. Mr. Gans is a member of the Presbyterian Church, and is held in high esteem by his neighbors and fellow-citizens. In all his business relations he is remarkable for candor and integrity. His domestic and social relations are of the most pleasant and agreeable character. He lives in good style, enjoys life, the society of home and friends, and the fellowship of the community.

NEALPHAEUS WILLSON SCOTT.

Alpheus W. Scott, of Springhill township, is of Scotch-Irish and Welsh descent, and was born at Morris' Cross-Roads, Sept. 30, 1822. Having received a good common-school education he commenced teaching in 1843, and continued in the profession the greater part of the time until 1867. On the 6th of March, 1846, he was married to Miss Martha E. Gans. In 1861 he entered the military service of the United States in the war of the Rebellion, and was commissioned captain of Company I, Seventy-seventh Pennsylvania Volunteers, March 3, 1862, and stationed at Chambersburg, Pa., in the recruiting service. He resigned Oct. 1, 1862, but was afterwards in the service in the One Hundred and Sixty-eighth Pennsylvania Regiment, where he held the rank of quartermaster sergeant, but performed all the duties of quartermaster, on account of the sickness of that officer, during his nine months' term of service. On the 12th of March, 1864, he re-enlisted at Greensburg, Westmoreland Co., and was assigned to the One Hundred and Twenty-first Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, yet he never did any duty with the regiment. In the fall of 1864, at City Point, Va., he was, by special order from army headquarters, assigned to duty on the commission of exchange of prisoners under Gen. John E. Mulford. On the occupation of Richmond by the Union forces in April, 1865, he went to that city, and remained there in the office of Gen. Mulford until the following August, when he was honorably discharged and mustered out of the service. For the past fifteen years he has been chiefly employed as a newspaper correspondent, in which vocation he displays marked ability.

STEWART TOWNSHIP.

This township is on the eastern border of the county, the second from the south line, and on both sides of the Youghiogheny River. On the north are the townships of Dunbar and Springfield; east is Somerset County; south is Henry Clay; and south and west is Wharton. The township has within its limits the Laurel Hills and Chestnut Ridge, and its general surface presents a mountainous aspect. In the southeastern part is Sugar-Loaf Mountain, with an altitude several hundred feet greater than the surrounding hills; and in other localities are well-defined peaks. The sides of the hills are usually broken and covered with large rocks, but the summits are mainly level, somewhat of the nature of a plateau, and containing some fine farming lands. The soil is good but not strong or enduring, and but a small proportion has been brought to cultivation, the greater part of the country being yet covered with timber.

The Youghiogheny River has a tortuous course through the township, and is a rapid, turbulent stream, affording a magnificent water-power at Falls City, where are a series of falls or rapids, aggregating about thirty-six feet of descent. It includes a distinct fall of sixteen feet, to which the name of "Ohio Pile" has been given. The valley of the river is narrow, and is closely enorined by high hills. Its affluents from the north are Drake's, Sherman's, Bear, and Laurel Runs, all small but unfailling streams, heading in the mountains. On the opposite side the tributaries are Jonathan's Run, Great Meadow Run, with its branches, Laurel and Beaver Runs, and Cucumber Run. The latter makes a precipitous fall near its mouth, forming a beautiful cascade nearly forty feet high. These streams yield limited water-power, which has been utilized. Most of them have deep, narrow valleys, but the lower hillsides are usually quite fertile. Along these streams are many signs of prehistoric occupation, a line of earthworks being traceable all through the township. One of the largest of these forts was on Bear Run, several miles below the Ohio Pile Falls. It was circular in form, inclosed about ten acres, and was surrounded by a trench. In it, many years ago, was found, under a heap of stones, a neatly-constructed grave. It was nearly square, and about four feet in depth. The sides and bottom were lined with flag-stones, forming a box-like cavity; a large skull was found inclosed, and other evidences indicated that it was the sepulchre of some mighty man among this little-known people. On Harris' Hill was another fort of large proportions, and along Meadow Run were, in the early settlement of the township, a series of earthworks so arranged that communication by signals was possible among them, plainly indicating that among these rough hills once dwelt a people of greater intelligence than that of the American Indian.

But little of the large area of Stewart was purchased for actual settlement when other parts of the county became the homes of the hardy pioneers. The lands in many instances were warranted, but were held by non-residents. These afterwards passed into other hands, a very large proportion of them becoming the property of the Hon. Andrew Stewart, who at one time owned more than half the township, and whose family yet maintains possession of many thousands of acres. These circumstances and the uninviting appearance of the country deterred a general settlement at an early period, and many of the beginnings in the township have a recent origin.

PIONEER SETTLERS.

It is hard to determine who was the first permanent settler. John Stewart, a Scotch-Irishman, lived on the Elijah Mitchell place as early as 1772, and set out an orchard which bore signs of age in 1800. He was buried on his farm, and his family removed, leaving no descendants in the township. He had sons named James, Andrew, John, and Thomas. It was at the house of the latter that the old soldier, Tom Fossitt (who was said by some to have killed Gen. Braddock), died, and was buried on the present Jacob H. Rush farm, which was settled by a man named Taylor. Many years after Fossitt's death a rude headstone was erected to his memory reciting the time of his death and age.

In the same locality Paul Stull and Peter Brunner settled soon after the Revolution. The latter moved to Springfield township, where he is more fully noted.

In the southern part of the township, on the present Harvey Morris farm, David Askins settled after the close of the Revolution. There is a tradition that he came from the eastern part of the State, and was on his way to the Kentucky country, which was at that time regarded as the land of promise, when he was persuaded to cast his lot among the pioneers of Fayette County. He made a tomahawk claim of ten square miles of land, and jestingly said that it was his "Little Kentucky." This, it is said, was the origin of the term as used in the township and applied to churches and schools. Askins finally limited his land claims to the Morris, Thorpe, and Mitchell farms, and on the former farm he was buried at his death. He had sons named Thomas, David, and Samuel, all of whom removed to the West soon after 1800.

Reuben Thorpe purchased one hundred and fifty acres of the Askins tract for $100. He was born in New Jersey in 1755, and became a weaver by trade. In the Revolution he served under the immediate command of Washington, and in 1782 came to Fayette County. He had seven sons and two daughters, namely, David, Reuben, Job, Wallace, who moved to Perry County, Ohio; James, who opened a farm on the north side of the Youghio^heny, where he yet resides at an advanced age; Asa, lived on the William Taylor farm, and was the father of Andrew Thorpe, yet living in the township. Several of his sons died in the Rebellion. William, the youngest of Reuben Thorpe's sons, lived on the homestead until his death. The farm is now owned by his son, Thomas Thorpe, Esq., of Falls City. Other sons are Reuben, living west of Falls City; David, in Dakota; W. Brown, the cashier of the Butler County (Nebraska) Bank; and Elisha, who died in the army in 1863. On the old Thorpe farm was an orchard of early bearing, which was almost wholly destroyed by a storm in July, 1851. Some of the trees were taken up and carried a distance of half a mile, and nearly everything in the line of the storm was destroyed. Reuben Thorpe formerly had a public-house, and carried on a distillery in the days when the old Turkey Foot road was one of the lines of travel from Somerset to Uniontown.

The Mitchells were among the earliest settlers of Stewart. James Mitchell lived in the Kentucky district, on the farm which is now occupied by his grandson, Elijah M. His sons were Benjamin, James J., Abner, John A., and Ralph, the youngest, who left no family at his death. The first three named opened farms near the homestead, and the two first died there. Abner moved to Wisconsin about 1846. He was a Baptist minister; and James J. also served in that calling. John A., the other son, made his home in Somerset County. Thomas Mitchell, a brother of James, purchased a part of the Askins tract, which had been owned before by Moses Mercer. He had served in the Revolution, and was under Daniel Boone in Kentucky. He died about 1824. His sons were Josiah, who lost his life at the old Laurel Furnace while attempting to rescue a furnace-man who was overcome by the fire in the stack; Thomas, who removed to Illinois; John, who lived in Greene County, Pa., and who was one of the greatest athletes in that part of the State; Lewis, who removed to Illinois; James H., born in 1798, and yet a citizen of the township; Elijah and Elisha, removed to Illinois. Some of these were great hunters, and had many stirring adventures with wild animals. The three daughters of Thomas Mitchell married James Spencer, William Thorpe, and Isaac Haney. The latter removed to the West; he was an early settler.

Not long after the Revolution, in which he served, John Potter, a native of New Jersey, moved to Henry Clay township, where he lived until his death in the fall of 1826. Eleven of his children grew to mature years, but all of his sons except Amos and Samuel removed to the West. The former resides in Wharton, and the latter is a well-known citizen of Stewart, and is the father of John B., George B., Charles, Amos, and Thomas T. Potter, all but Amos residing in the township. Samuel Potter was born in 1805, and as a young man was active in building mills and making other improvements, some of which are yet owned by the family.

Benjamin Leonard was reared in the family of Reuben Thorpe, and after attaining manhood made an improvement on the bottoms below the mill owned by Potter. He afterwards cleared up the farm which is now owned by his youngest son, Robert. Other sons were Eli, Amos P. (a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church), Reuben, Christmas, and Robert. Nearly all of these continue to reside in the township.

On what is well known as the Joseph Price place, Peter Briner, a German, settled about 1800, and reared a family, but removed to the West more than fifty years ago. Among his sons was Andrew, who also cleared a farm on Cucumber Run, and lived there until his death in 1861. One of his sons, Samuel, yet resides near Falls City. Joshua Briner, the oldest of Andrew's sons, resided at Uniontown at the age of eighty years. John Briner, another son, resides in Dunbar. The deep place in the Youghiogheny River near Cucumber Run, noted as abounding with fish, took its name from this family.

William Williams came from Bedford County to Connellsville in 1805, but in 1830 settled in Stewart, locating on Meadow Run, where he died in 1848. He reared sons named John, Isaac, James, Samuel, William D., and Joseph, the latter two being the only ones living in the township, Joseph for the past twenty-four years being a merchant in Stewart. William Williams was one of the parties who had a contract to open the clay pike in 1810.

In the Sugar-Lick District among the early settlers were the Shipley family, Henry McClatchey, and Henry Gilmore, all of whom removed early. Guyson Morrison came at a later day and settled on the Hall farm on the Turkey Foot road, and a mile south William Morrison made some improvements about 1830. David Woodmansee has lived in that locality since 1850, and is now one of the oldest settlers there. Garrett Hall was a settler earlier on the place yet occupied by his family. Abram Tumbly lived on the Thomas Mitchell place as early as 1790. He removed to Confluence.

North of the Yough, David Thorpe improved the James Thorpe farm as early as 1805. The Peter Tissue farm was commenced by Jacob Streight, and farther east were James Fulton, the Marietta, Zarley, and Minor families as pioneers.

CIVIL ORGANIZATION.

At the October term of Court of Quarter Sessions in 1854 a petition for a new township was presented, to be composed of parts of Wharton, Henry Clay, and Youghiogheny townships, with bounds as set forth in the petition. The court appointed Thomas R. Davidson, Alexander McClean, and Daniel Downer viewers, the order for their appointment bearing date Nov. 10, 1854. The order was renewed at the June session in 1855, and continued in August of the same year. At the September court in 1855 the commissioners reported:

"That having gone upon the premises and made an examination of the same, according to law, we are of the opinion that a new township should be made within the following described boundaries, viz.: Beginning at a point where the Somerset County line strikes the Youghiogheny River, thence to Garrett Hall's, at the Cold Glade Ridge; thence to Z. Luddington's yard, by Henry Morris' to Joseph Bodkin's; thence to the Dunbar line, near Centre Furnace; thence to the said Dunbar line to the Youghiogheny River; thence to the Springfield line, near the stone meeting-house, and thence by the Springfield line to the Somerset line, and thence by the said line to the Youghiogheny River, the place of beginning. And that the lower end of Youghiogheny struck off be added to Springfield township."

Nov. 17, 1855, the view and report were confirmed, and the new township ordered to be called Stewart, the name being given it in compliment to the Hon. Andrew Stewart. The first election after the organization of Stewart as a separate township was held at the house of Theophilus Keller, March 21, 1856, and the following officers elected: Justice of the Peace, Thomas Burgess; Constable, James Leonard; Assessor, James Morrison; Auditor, John B. Potter. The officers elected in succeeding years are named below, viz.:

The Turkey Foot road, the oldest thoroughfare in the township, was opened about 1803 as a highway between Uniontown and Somerset. All the other roads have a recent origin. The Stewarton post-office was established in August, 1871, with John W. Moon as postmaster. He was succeeded in the fall of 1873 by Andrew Stewart, Jr., and the office was kept in a store which Moon had opened, and which was destroyed by fire in 1874. It was removed about this time to a station farther down the road in Springfield township, known before that time as Yough, retaining the name it bore when established. Peter B. Halfhill was appointed postmaster, and his successors have been E. A. Harbaugh and the present, Joseph Herwick. The office has daily mails, and is the terminus of the Springfield mail-route. The former station of Stewarton received the name of Yough, but since the removal of the saw-mill and the destruction of the store the place has been forsaken, and the station has passed into disuse.

FALLS CITY.

This is the only village in Stewart, and is situated near the centre of the township, on both sides of the Youghigheny, and at the noted Ohio Pile Falls. It is a station on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, midway between Pittsburgh and Cumberland, being about seventy-five miles from either city. There are several hundred inhabitants, four hotels, stores, etc., as detailed in the following pages.

Although Falls City has a pleasant location, and the romantic surroundings have given it a favorable reputation among pleasure-seekers as a summer resort, its chief claim to distinction lies in its possession of the Ohio Pile Falls, a water-power of the first rank. Concerning these falls a commission of military engineers, consisting of Col. W. McKee, Col. Roswell Lee, and Maj. George Talcott, who were appointed in 1825 to select a "site for a national armory on the Western waters," reported:

"The Youghigheny River at this place makes a circuit of nearly two miles around a neck or tongue of land about three-fourths of a mile in length that projects from the foot of a mountain in its rear. At the upper side of this tongue, and near the extreme point of the mountain, is the commencement of the Ohio Pile rapids and falls, which terminate at the lower side opposite the point at which they begin, and six hundred yards distant from it in a straight line. The whole descent is eighty-seven and a half feet. The ground on the lower side, next the foot of the rapids, is advantageously disposed in steps or benches of sufficient width and at convenient distances below each other for the erection of buildings, and the successive application of the water to machinery in any manner that may be desired. Forty feet of the whole fall may thus be employed at a trifling expense. The bank then becomes steep and perpendicular, and the remaining part of the fall could not be conveniently used without extensive rock excavation. To convey the water to this site from above the falls will require a canal of seven hundred feet in length. The first four hundred feet will pass through a strip of river bottom. The deepest cutting along the whole route is thirty feet, and occurs in passing a narrow ridge near the middle of the neck, consisting principally, as is supposed, of rock. A dam four feet high across the river will be necessary to procure a depth of water at the head of the canal sufficient to prevent it from being choked with ice, or obstructed by drift of any kind. The quantity of water which the river furnishes at this place during an extreme dry season perhaps exceeds one hundred cubic feet per second during the uncommon drought of 1823.

"If we regard the site of these falls, in reference to the security of the works that might be erected upon it, from freshets, the perfect command of its water-power, and the cheapness with which it may be employed, it surpasses any that has ever come under our observation. An additional excavation of ten thousand five hundred cubic feet of earth and nine hundred feet of rock would enlarge the canal sufficiently to convey the whole volume of the river to the works at low water, which would furnish three times the power requisite for the armory, and still leave unemployed a fall of more than forty feet. This estimate is for three breast and two over-shot wheels.

"To these advantages is opposed its want of convenient communication, surrounded on all sides by mountains, the adjacent country but sparsely settled, and, with the exception of fuel, including stone-coal, few or no resources for an armory: it is without the means of water conveyance, and, as yet, without roads. How far the weight of this objection ought to be lessened by the probability of any future canal across the mountains, passing down the valley of the Youghigheny River, is a consideration that does not properly come within the province assigned us."

The objection to the inaccessibility to the falls has been removed by the opening of the Pittsburgh,
Washington and Baltimore Railroad, which has here established an important station, with extensive sidings; while the idea of water communication has not been wholly abandoned, an appropriation for the survey of a canal route having recently been made. The power of the Ohio Pile Falls has been utilized to a limited extent. A further improvement for manufacturing purposes will probably be made at an early day. The falls and nearly all the adjacent lands are the property of the heirs of the Hon. Andrew Stewart, and Falls City was laid out for the Stewart estate in 1865 by Albert Stewart. The plat embraces about two hundred acres of land, a considerable portion of which is on the south side of the Youngstown, connection being made with the northern part by means of a substantial wooden bridge. In the latter part much of the village survey is included within the peninsula formed by the river, which is about three-fourths of a mile in length and elevated a hundred feet above the level of the stream. It is bordered by cliffs, on which grow ferns in the greatest profusion, and this beautiful tract of land has not been inappropriately named Fern Cliff Park. Occupying a commanding position in the park is the fine hotel which was erected by the Stewart estate in the summer of 1879, and which was opened for the accommodation of summer visitors in May, 1889, under the management of M. W. Lambert. Fern Cliff Park Hotel is a stately-looking frame, thirty-three by one hundred and one feet, four stories high, and surrounded by a mansard roof. There are fifty rooms for guests, supplied with gas, water, and electric annunciators, and the hotel throughout contains the most approved modern appliances. In the grounds are shady rambles, pleasant walks, and several fountains, which are fed by a reservoir on a hill eighty feet above the hotel. This is filled from the Youngstown by means of a large water-power force-pump. The encouraging patronage given the hotel has induced the proprietors to entertain a proposition to enlarge the house to thrice its present capacity, making it one of the foremost summer resorts in the western part of the State.

The first public-house in the place was kept opposite the grist-mill, in the south part of the village, by Elijah Mitchell, about 1858. Subsequent landlords were Theophilus Keller, J. H. Mitchell, Moses Ferrin, Nathan Joliffe, Jesse Hardin, and Redmond Bunting, during whose occupancy the house was destroyed by fire.

The completion of the railroad in 1871, and the urgent demand for hotel accommodations, caused Andrew Stewart to transform a large farm building into a public-house. It received the name of the "Ohio Pile House," and was opened by W. Brown and John Shepard. It is at present kept by Kimmel Hardin. Daniel Conghour has been the keeper of a public-house for the past four years, and others have entertained the public for shorter periods.

The first goods at Falls City were sold by Thomas Jackson, for Andrew Stewart, in the old hotel building some time about 1856. A. E. Meason & Co. next had a store at the tannery, where they were succeeded by Samuel Price, Moses Freeman, Potter & Browning. In 1871, F. T. Browning built his present store-house, which he has since occupied for mercantile purposes. The same year Joseph Williams began trading at the Falls, moving here from Meadow Run, where he had kept a store for fifteen years, being the first in the township. Since 1878 he has occupied his present building. George D. Livingston has also been in trade since 1872, and George W. Anderson since 1875, each having a respectable trade.

The railroad station at Falls City, called Ohio Pile, was opened in March, 1871, by Samuel Potter, Jr., as agent, with Thomas Armstrong as telegrapher. The latter was appointed to both offices in 1872, and was relieved in 1873 by Lewis Johnson. In April, 1875, B. R. Field became the agent, but was relieved July, 1877, by E. A. Jordan. He served until June 22, 1879, when the present agent, C. L. Harrington, was appointed. Soon after the railroad was opened the Adams Express Company established an office at Ohio Pile, with Thomas Thorpe as agent. Since 1875 the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad has carried on the express business in connection with its railroad interests. The shipments at Ohio Pile are chiefly lumber and other wood exports. The entire business aggregates fifteen hundred dollars per month.

For many years the settlers of Stewart received their mail matter from Bryant's, on the National road, and later from Farmington, on the same road. The post-office at Falls City was established about 1856, with the name of Pile Falls, and Samuel Price as postmaster, who kept it at the store of Meason & Co. He was succeeded by Samuel Potter, Jr., who in 1871 removed the office to the railroad station. About this time the name of the office was changed to Falls City. Potter was succeeded, in May, 1878, by the present postmaster, Thomas Thorpe. The mail service is by railroad twice per day. Previously the mails were carried on horseback from Farmington to Donegal several times per week.

The first physician regularly located in Stewart was Dr. H. Y. Brady, who came to Falls City in the fall of 1869, and has since been a practitioner there. He graduated at the Jefferson Medical College in 1863, and practiced, previous to locating here, at Youngstown and Latrobe. For two years from 1874, Dr. Hugh Nicolay was in practice at the Falls, and for a few months in 1879, Dr. D. O. Bassett. For the past year Dr. S. D. Woods has practiced dentistry at Falls City.

Various Industries of the Township.

Agriculture and lumbering are the chief pursuits of the people of Stewart, many of the citizens being engaged in carrying on both. The mountain streams afford many water-powers, which were early sought out and improved to meet the wants of the pioneers. Nearly every neighborhood had its saw- and grist-, or rather corn-mills, which have gone to decay so long since that in many instances no authentic account of them can be given. The latter were generally "tub" mills, a simple arrangement whereby the stone was caused to revolve as often as the wheel, and the grinding capacity was consequently small. To this class belonged the mills of Aman Shipley, on Laurel Run; David Askins, on Meadow Run; and the McGrew mill, on Jonathan's Run, all built some time about 1790. With the increase of population came better facilities, and soon good mills were built on the sites of the old ones, or on other seats on the same streams. On Laurel Run were the mills of Henry Gilmore and Isaac Hutchinson, both of small capacity. In 1832 Samuel Potter built a grist-mill on Meadow Run, which was supplied with two sets of stones, and was in every respect an improvement on the mills previously in the township. A saw-mill was also built by Potter, and both were operated by him until 1852, when they became the property of John B. Potter, his son, who yet carries them on, although both mills have been much improved, the former having now three runs of stones, and being reputed a first-class mill.

On the same stream the manufacture of splint chairs is carried on by George P. Potter. The factory has been in successful operation since 1850, and several hundred fine chairs are made annually. Below that point, also on Meadow Run, Reuben and Christmas Leonard carry on a splint-chair factory; and more than sixty years ago their father, Benjamin Leonard, carried on this industry in the township, some of the chairs he then made being yet in use.

On Beaver Run, a branch of Meadow, James Dean had a saw-mill at an early day, to which Samuel Potter ingeniously added a grist-mill about 1828, the stones being taken from a neighboring hillside.

On Cucumber Run, Andrew Briner had saw- and grist-mills of small capacity forty years ago, which have not been operated for the past twenty-five years. At the forks of the same stream Joseph Price had a mill, which has not been used for a score of years; and above the Andrew Briner mill Joshua Briner had a saw-mill, which was discontinued about 1865.

On Jonathan's Run, among the mills of a later period, were those of B. Rush, built about 1868, and which are now operated by Patton Rush. On the upper waters of that stream are the mills of Matthew McMillan.

A number of portable steam-saw-mills have been erected at various points in Stewart, and have been very useful in working up the heavy timber in the localities where they were located. Several of these were at the "low place" on Meadow Run. In 1874, for a few years, Samuel Halderbrant had a good mill in operation there, when he removed it to Bear Run, where it was operated a few years longer. The Browning mill was at the "low place" next, and was removed from there to Falls City. Its cutting capacity was five thousand feet per day. A year later John Wesley Moon erected the third mill at the "low place" and engaged largely in the manufacture of all kinds of lumber, staves, and headings. He constructed a tramway to the "long hollow," two and a half miles distant, for the purpose of conveying logs to his mill, and cut up an immense amount of timber. The tramway yet remains, but the mill has been removed to Somerset County. At Stewarton, four miles below Falls City, Andrew Stewart, Jr., had a large and well appointed saw-mill in operation several years after 1871, the logs being conveyed thither by a long tramway; but the mill has been removed and the interest there abandoned.

Henry Fry attempted the first improvement of the water-power at the Ohio Pile Falls on the Youghiogheny, now the site of Falls City. Forty years ago he built a hewed-log dam nearly across the stream a short distance above the falls and put up the frame of a saw-mill, but before he got it in operation a freshet swept away his dam, causing him to abandon his project. Hon. Andrew Stewart made the next improvement, putting up saw- and grist-mills. A dam was built four hundred feet above the falls, and a wooden trunk laid to convey the water to the mills, which were destroyed by fire before being set in motion. The buildings were immediately restored, and the grist-mill yet remains, the saw-mill above it having been removed. The former had first an overshot and the latter a flutter wheel, but in 1865 Albert Stewart supplied their places with three Rainey turbine-wheels, increasing the power to one hundred and thirty horses. The grist-mill was also supplied with more machinery, and is now adapted to the new process of grinding. It is operated by Albert Stewart, and the planing-mill, which he built in 1865, has also since been kept in operation by him. The latter is supplied with good machinery, but has a limited capacity. Both mills are well patronized.

The Falls City Pulp-Mill was put in operation in September, 1879, by the present proprietor of the works, Wilson W. Hartzell. Having secured a lease of a large water-power from the Stewart estate, on the site of an old saw-mill above the falls, he increased the already large power by building a dam across the river four hundred feet in length. A building thirty by eighty feet was erected and supplied with two American turbine-wheels of three hundred horse-power to operate machinery to reduce spruce and poplar wood to pulp for paper-making by the Otterson & Taylor process. From three to four cords of wood are consumed each day, and the capacity of the works enable the production of three car-loads of pulp per week, aggregating about ninety thousand pounds. Employment is given to twelve men when the works are run day and night, and a good market is afforded for an abundance of wood which was heretofore comparatively worthless. The raw material is brought to the works in cord-wood size, freed from bark, the heart, and black knots, and is reduced to two-foot lengths. It is next sawed into blocks half an inch in thickness, when it is ready for the crusher. After crushing, the material is by successive processes reduced to a smooth pulp, so finely worked as to be almost impalpable. From the last of these processes it comes out in even sheets like thick paper and of a whitish color. These sheets are put up in sixty-pound bales and shipped to market.
The pulp is used in the manufacture of paper, by mixing with other materials, as straw and rag pulp, producing a good quality of printing-paper at a smaller cost than paper made wholly of rags or straw.
The superintendent of the works is William V. G.
White.

The Falls City Shook-Factory is owned and carried on by M. Weakland, of Confluence. At the latter place the manufacture of shooks for the West India trade was begun about ten years ago, and has since been carried on at other points at Falls City since 1875. That year Matthias Smith opened a shop in which five men were employed, and which, after a few years' operation, became the property of M. Weak-land. Shooks have also been made on Jonathan's Run by Matthias Smith and Benjamin Guptell, and the yearly product in the township has been about 2000 shooks, made chiefly out of the best oak. It may here be explained that the term "shook" is applied to an unfinished or skeleton barrel or hoghead. The staves, after being riven from the log, about thirty-six inches long, and duly seasoned, are shaved into the desired size, then bent into shape and regularly set up, as for a barrel; but instead of being headed up they are knocked down, the staves, being numbered, are baled together, the bundle forming a "shock," which, with the addition of heads and hoops, are quickly transformed into barrels or hogheads in a country where stave materials do not abound. In other words, the skeleton barrel is shipped to the West Indies from the United States, and is returned filled with rum or molasses.

The Falls City Spoke- and Hub-Works, Brison
Rush and John Meeks proprietors, occupy a building thirty by thirty-six feet and two stories high.
The factory was erected in the summer of 1875, work being commenced August 8th of that year. Sixteen days later the establishment was burned to the ground, but was rebuilt so that work was resumed in October, 1875, and the factory has since been successfully carried on. The building is supplied with a sixteen horse-power engine, which operates a spoke-lathe, hub-machine, mortising-machines, etc., which enable the production of 225 sets of spokes and 200 sets of hubs per month. The firm also manufactures incline rollers for coal roads, and gives employment to five men.

The Fayette Tannery, at Falls City, was built in 1853 by the firm of Fuller, Breading & Meason, the latter being the only resident partner. The buildings were put up by Samuel Potter, and the tannery placed in charge of Aaron Walter, as foreman of the twelve or fifteen hands employed. In time Alfred Meason bought Breading's interest, and the business was carried on by him, with Charles Stone as foreman. Next came the firm of Meason, Wade & Co., who carried on the tannery until 1873, Harlan Hickland being the foreman. For a period the tannery was idle, but in April, 1877, the firm of James Callary & Co. succeded to the business, but were followed, in June, 1879, by the present manufacturer, Owen Sheekley, as lessee from the Wade estate. Originally the tanner was operated by the waters of Meadow Run, but its diminishing volume caused the substitution of steam in 1869, and the motive-power is at present furnished by a sixteen horse-power engine. The building remains much the same as when erected, the tannery proper being one hundred feet square and three stories high. The bark-house is fifty by one hundred feet. In all there are seventy vats for tan-ing belting-, hose-, and sole-leather with oak bark, one hundred heavy hides per week being tanned. In connection with the tannery is a convenient office, half a dozen dwellings, and a business house, in which the proprietors of the tannery had stores years ago, when this place was the centre of business at the Falls.

Potter's coal-mine, opened in 1877, and operated by Thomas Potter, is about one mile southwest from Falls City, and on the mountain-side, four hundred feet above the level of the Youghiogheny. The vein is about five feet in thickness, and the main entry has been driven to the length of five hundred feet. The mine has ten sideways, each about one hundred feet long, and the yearly product is about thirty thousand bushels of good mountain coal, free from sulphur and burning freely. The mine is underlaid with a stratum of fine limestone, which is rarely found in the township, and the presence of fire-clay and iron is also noted. Although the Potter mine is the only one in Stewart which has been developed to any extent, coal is found in many localities, and small banks have been opened on the south and the west of the Yonghiogheny by Martin Mitchell, Reuben Thorpe, Hugh Corriston, Summers McCrumb, John Potter, George
B. Potter, and others. On the north side of the river, Harrison Weaver, Emanuel Bisel, and others have coal-banks, but in most instances the demand for their products is very limited.

Within the past few years considerable attention has been directed to fruit culture, and orcharding promises to become an important industry. The orchard of Francis M. Cunningham, two miles southwest from Falls City, is the largest in the township.
He began fruit culture in 1874 with an orchard of twenty apple-trees, to which he has added from year to year until his orchard at present embraces 1200 apple, 650 quince, 350 pear, and 290 peach-trees, all thriving and vigorous. These orchards will be enlarged to double the present size, and will then be one of the largest interests of this nature in the county. The cultivation of the small fruits is also here carried on, and a vineyard containing 3000 vines of the Concord variety has been planted.

The manufacture of salt was an industry which once held an important place in the township more than half a century ago. On the north side of the Youghiogheny, three miles above the falls, were several acres of low ground, called by the pioneers "the meadows," where were saltlicks, which were much frequented by wild animals. When the water was low the incrustations of salt on the flat stones along the river's edge were so marked that the place presented a whitish appearance. Before 1800 some of the settlers gathered up the waters which oozed forth and made small quantities of salt, and later a man by the name of Rhodes dug a well some twenty feet deep, which gave him a greater supply of water, and enabled him to make salt in a small way. When he suspended work he allowed his kettles to remain, and some of the pioneers would occasionally go there to make a little salt for their own use. As the place was rather inaccessible from the east, on account of the steep hills, the river was usually forded by the people living on the south and the west at a point near the springs. This was always attended by danger, as the current is swift and strong, and when increased by heavy rains is especially treacherous. On one occasion, while a man named James Downard attempted to cross to make some salt, he was swept away and his lifeless body carried below the falls to the "Briner fishing-hole," four miles from where he met his sudden death.1 Thence but little was done at the salt springs until about 1812, when Thomas Meason conceived the idea of here making salt on a large scale. He secured a tax title for the land, which had been forfeited by Wilcox and Chew, of Philadelphia, and began operations on his works. The news coming to the ears of Mr. Wilcox, he came on from Philadelphia to redeem the land; but instead of doing so entered into a copartnership with Meason to carry on the salt-works. Later he sold his interests to William Pennock, of Uniontown, and by him and Meason the works were operated until their discontinuance, about 1819. They caused a well to be sunk several hundred feet deep, by means of a spring-pole operated by several men, which afforded them an abundant supply of water, yielding ten pounds of salt to the barrel. This was pumped to the surface by means of horse-power, and carried to the works, half a mile below, through wooden pipes, where it was evaporated in sixty-two kettles, arranged in pairs. These kettles were of heavy iron and were cast at the Dunbar Furnace, each holding about fifty gallons. Their transportation to the works, owing to the roughness of the country, was regarded as a hazardous undertaking, and was accomplished with great difficulty. Some three thousand bushels of salt were made, which sold readily at three dollars per bushel. When the price was reduced it was not found profitable to carry on the works, and they were abandoned at the time named. The kettles were sold to the farmers around the "works," and some of them are yet in use for boiling maple-sugar. The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad built its track over the furnace of the works, obliterating what few traces of it remained. But few people can be found who have even a recollection of the enterprise. James Thorpe and J. H. Mitchell, both among the oldest men of the township, were engaged at the works, and from them the writer gleaned the above account.

RELIGIOUS AND EDUCATIONAL.

THE LITTLE KENTUCKY BAPTIST CHURCH.

The first regular religious organization effected in Stewart township was that of the Baptists, the preliminary meetings which led to the formation of the society being held chiefly by the Rev. John Thomas, at the houses of some of the early members or in the rude school-houses, mainly in the Kentucky District. From this circumstance the society took its name. It was organized May 22, 1834, by the Revs. Benoni Allen, William Hall, and John Rockefeller, with the following members: James J. Mitchell, Abner Mitchell, Elijah Mitchell, Abel Hillborn, Jesse Mitchell, Hannah Mitchell, Maria Hillborn, Hannah Stull, Cynthia Mitchell, Reuben Thorpe, James Dean, Sarah Briner, Emeline Price, Nancy Mitchell, Charlotte Mitchell, Andrew Briner, William Thorpe, Sarah Mitchell, John Harbaugh, Huldah Thorpe, Fanny Bailey, James Thorpe, James K. Bailey, Jacob H. Rush, Benjamin Lister, Franklin Mitchell, Mary Briner, Margaret Birch, Mary Pearce, Sabina Mitchell, John Hyatt, Mary Hyatt, David Mitchell, and Reuben Rush. James J. Mitchell and James Thorpe were ordained as the first deacons, and Abner Mitchell was the first clerk. In 1831 the clerk of the church was Patton Rush, and the deacons were Jesse Rush and Jacob H. Rush. Other ordained deacons of the church were James R. Mitchell, Salathiel Mitchell, Benjamin Mitchell, and Joshua Briner.

The Rev. John Thomas became the first pastor of the church, his connection dating from May 16, 1835. About a year afterwards he was succeeded by the Rev. James J. Mitchell, one of the first deacons of the church, who served until July 18, 1840, when the Rev. Isaac Wynn became the pastor. The Rev. John Williams succeeded Mr. Wynn, his appointment

1 At "Briner's fishing-hole" Abraham Stewart, of Wharton, and James Bunner were drowned in August, 1841, while here engaged with a large party in fishing. Their bodies were found at the bottom of the hole by Samuel Hough. Both were well-known citizens, and the event cast a gloom over the entire country.
dancing March 31, 1860. Next in the pastoral office was the Rev. William P. Fortney, who assumed that relation March 19, 1876, and was succeeded, April 8, 1877, by the Rev. John Williams, who was the pastor for upwards of three years. The present pastor, the Rev. James K. Brown, has served since July 17, 1889.

The church has a membership of nearly one hundred, and notwithstanding the many removals is in a fairly flourishing condition. It has contributed some useful members to the ministry, and has within its bounds the Revs. Francis M. Cunningham and John Williams, pastors of neighboring churches. The house of worship is at Falls City, and was built in 1837, through the efforts of Abner Mitchell, David Briner, and David Mitchell as a committee. It is a plain frame, and having recently been repaired, serves the purpose for which it was erected.

MOUNT HOPE CUMBERLAND PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

Upwards of thirty years ago meetings of this religious sect were held at the stone school-house in the Kentucky District by the Rev. A. G. Osborne and others, and from a series of services held there by the former sprang the congregation which now bears the name of Mount Hope. The early membership embraced the names of Joseph Price, Cuthbert Wiggins, Greenbury Bosley, Harvey Morris, and most of the members of their families. Later the number was augmented by the addition of William Stull and wife, William D. Williams, his wife and several children, J. H. Wiggins and family, the total membership being about twenty. For a number of years meetings were held in school-houses, under the ministerial direction of the Revs. A. J. Swayne, J. S. Gibson, J. P. Beard, and other clergymen, sent hither by the Presbytery, who served this field in connection with other appointments, and for the past four years the pulpit has been supplied by the Revs. Coulter, Gibson, Bailey, Howard, Melville, and at present by Rev. James P. Beard. The growth of the village of Falls City caused the congregation to look to that place as the point where should be erected their house of worship. Accordingly, about 1873, meetings were held in the Baptist Church of that place, and soon thereafter a board of trustees was selected, composed of C. W. Saylor, Morris Morris, and D. W. Williams, who purchased a fine lot near the centre of the village, on which the building was to be erected. In about a year more the house was completed, and was formally dedicated by the Rev. J. H. Coulter, of Brownsville. It is a frame building of respectable proportions, and has an inviting appearance. The congregation has not largely increased in membership, but has generally maintained regular services. The ruling elders of the church have been Harvey Morris, Jonathan Bisel, and C. W. Saylor. In the summer a Sabbath-school, supported by the community at large, is maintained in this house, and had for its last superintendent George W. Moon.

MEADOW RUN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

Soon after 1800 the Methodist itinerants sought to establish a church in the township, holding meetings at the house of Moses Mercer, and at other hospitable mountain homes, and these efforts were rewarded by the accession of a few members to the faith, although not of sufficient number to form a class. Hence but occasional services were held until about 1839, when Mr. Elizabeth Potter, a member of the Methodist Church, moved to the Belle Grove neighborhood, and at her house preaching was again established. The class formed about this time had among its members Mrs. Potter and daughters, Westell Holland, and a few others, who soon joined as the fruits of a revival, among them being Reuben Leonard and wife. After 1840 the meetings were held at school-houses about once every three weeks, and generally on week-days. Among the preachers of this period were the Revs. McGowan, Sharp, Swazie, Tipton, White, and many others whose names have passed out of the recollection of the present generation, and no church records are accessible.

In 1850, while the Rev. Joseph Hill was the preacher in charge, the Meadow Run meeting-house was erected, largely through the efforts of Joseph Williams, at that time a resident of this locality, three miles south from Falls City, and in 1850 it was under the trusteeship of George Potter. The members of the church are about twenty in number. The church at present belongs to the Springfield Circuit, of which the Rev. J. J. Davis is the preacher in charge, and which embraces also the churches at Springfield, Mill Run, Sansom Chapel, Sandy Creek, and Tinker's Ridge. It previously belonged to Smithfield, Addison, Uniontown, and other circuits. The Rev. A. P. Leonard, of the Pittsburgh Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, originated from this society, which, though weak in numbers, has some active, faithful workers. Benjamin Leonard was for many years the superintendent of a Sunday-school which is at present in charge of Arthur Potter, and which is usually attended by about sixty scholars.

THE SUGAR-LOAF CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

In the early part of the present century this denomination (New Lights) held meetings in the township at the house of Thomas Mitchell, who was one of their chief members; but after his removal to the West the feeble interest manifested in maintaining these meetings was allowed wholly to decline, and years elapsed before meetings were again held. Some time about 1850 this faith was again proclaimed in the southeastern part of the township with so much success that a promising congregation was formed under the preaching of the Rev. Mr. Four. It embraced members from the Gilmore, Morrison, Jones, Lytle, and Hall families, with others, to the number of thirty or more. A house of worship being now needed, the citizens of that part of Stewart united to build one, which was completed in the fall of 1855. Although occupied by this and other denominations for religious purposes it has never been fully finished, and at present is somewhat out of repair. The preachers of this church who followed the Rev. Four were the Revs. Barney, Jennings, Kibler, Swaynse, and several others, but lately the denomination has not maintained regular services, and consequently the work has much declined. Noting this condition, the Church of God (Winebrennarians) began preaching here, and have succeeded in gathering a considerable membership. Among their ministers were the Revs. Long, Craft, and Bardlebaugh. The members at present adhering number fourteen.

Lately the Rev. C. E. Simmons, of the Methodist Church South, began preaching at this place and organized a small class, while ministers of other denominations also occasionally hold services here, but without gaining a numerous following.

SCHOOLS.

The recent formation of the township precludes the giving of any early statistics pertaining to the public schools, and the mountainous condition of the country has somewhat retarded the cause of education. Since the organization of Stewart the following-named persons have been elected school directors of the township:

1837.—David Fulton, A. E. Mason.
1838.—Samuel Potter, James M. Dixon.
1860.—David Woodmansee, Robert Cunningham.
1861.—Reuben Thorpe, David Fulton.
1863.—H. M. Corriston, Cyrus Edmundson, David Woodmansee.

TYRONE—UPPER AND LOWER TOWNSHIPS.

As Upper and Lower Tyrone have existed as separate townships for less than five years, while the territory composing both had previously remained undivided in old Tyrone for considerably more than a century, it is evidently the most proper, as well as the most convenient, way to write the history of the two as that of Tyrone township—with reference to early settlements and some other matters—down to the time of their separate organization. This course will therefore be pursued in the following pages.

TYRONE—UPPER AND LOWER TOWNSHIPS.

1 Before the erection of Fayette County, Tyrone was one of the townships of Westmoreland, and prior to the erection of that county it existed under the same name as one of the townships of Bedford.
The principal streams are the Youghiogheny River and Jacob's Creek, forming respectively the southern and northern boundaries of the townships; Broad Ford Run, which flows in a southerly direction through Upper Tyrone, and enters the Youghiogheny at Broad Ford; and Hickman's Run, which flows nearly in the same direction through Lower Tyrone, and enters the river a short distance above Dawson village. Several smaller streams enter the river at points below in Lower Tyrone. Along the margins of the river and Jacob's Creek are narrow bottoms, from which the land rises in both directions to a high ridge which extends in an eastward and westward direction through the central portions of both townships.

Upper Tyrone is entirely underlaid with coal, which is mined in immense quantities, and largely used in the manufacture of coke, as will be noticed hereafter. The same is the case in the eastern part of Lower Tyrone, but the greater portion of that township lies upon the "barren measure," the outcrop ceasing at the month of Hickman's Run, and only reappearing several miles farther down the river, and beyond the limits of the township. Both townships have excellent railway facilities, as will be noticed elsewhere.

By the census of 1880 the population of Upper Tyrone was 3306 (largely made up of miners), and of Lower Tyrone 1976, including Jimtown.

EARLY SETTLEMENTS.

In the surveys of land located in 1769 in the territory now known as Tyrone township there are but four entries. One of the first was made by Alexander Vance, who took up three hundred acres, upon which a warrant was issued April 3, 1769, but which was not surveyed until April 11, 1788, nearly twenty years later.

John Vance, the father of Moses Vance, settled upon a tract of land here in 1766, still his name does not appear among these first surveys, and the land which he then occupied was first warranted Sept. 4, 1790, to Benjamin Whalley, and surveyed November 18th of the same year. At that time the property was named "Federal Hill." John Vance, whose ancestors came from Scotland and Ireland, was himself a native of Virginia, from whence he came in the year mentioned in company with Col. William Crawford, his sister's husband. His wife was Margaret White, whom he married in Virginia, and with whom he lived until 1772, when he died, and was buried in the Vance cemetery.

The family of John and Margaret Vance numbered six children—David, William, Moses, Jane, Elizabeth, and Maria. After her husband's death, Margaret Vance kept the original property for many years, in the mean time caring for and bringing up her family of little children. Among the records of property is one where, under date of Jan. 10, 1781, Margaret Vance, widow of John Vance, reported the list of her registered slaves,—"one female, named Priscilla, aged twenty-seven years, and two males, Harry and Daniel, aged respectively seven and three years." Priscilla and Harry afterwards became the property of the daughter, Jane Vance, who was married to Benjamin Whalley. The son David settled in Kentucky, and William remained on the old place until middle life, when he died, never having married. Moses Vance also stayed upon the homestead, and when, in 1790, the land upon which his father's family had lived so long was warranted to Benjamin Whalley, two hundred and fifty acres of it was transferred to him, and upon that he resided until his death.

Moses Vance's wife was Elizabeth, a daughter of Jacob Strickler, and they reared a family of seven sons and two daughters,—John, Jacob, Samuel, Francis, William, Crawford, George, Margaret, and Eliza. John still lives on the old Gamer place, Jacob is in Lower Tyrone, and William's home is in Connellsville. Before leaving his native town, Tyrone, William held the office of justice of the peace for some years. George Vance removed to Illinois, and Samuel, Francis, Crawford, and Margaret are dead.

April 3, 1769, Absalom Kent took up, by warrant No. 1179, a piece of land in this section comprising 79 acres, which was surveyed April 11, 1788. In the year 1800 he owned the John Stewart tract, called "Pleasant Garden." The township records show Mr. Kent to have been auditor during the years 1793-96 and 1800. He and his descendants have now all passed away, and the family has become extinct in this section.

Benjamin Whalley, who warranted the tract of land called "Federal Hill," settled in this section at a very early date, and was among the number that owned slaves. He was an officer in the Revolutionary war. His son, Capt. James Whalley, one of his large family of six sons and six daughters, was born at "Federal Hill," March 20, 1788. In the war of 1812, Capt. James Whalley took out a company of soldiers from Connellsville in Col. Robert Patterson's regiment, and later went out in the Northwestern expedition on the Indian frontier. After his return home he removed to Uniontown, living there until his death, May 22, 1869.

In 1770, Moses Smith warranted two tracts of land, containing respectively 178 and 164 acres, in Tyrone. It was about this time that the Cunningham, Torrance, and other families came here, and the Smiths were classed with the settlers of that day. They continued to live upon the farms they had located, and in 1774 became connected with the Tyrone Church, which was situated very near their property. In 1800, William Smith was chosen one of the trustees of the church. At the present time none of the family remain in the township, and the land has passed into other hands.

Like very many other of the pioneers of this town ship, Barnett Cunningham came here and settled on land by tomahawk improvement. His advent was in 1770, and he held his land for the first seventeen years of his residence under that right. A part of the land is now in the possession of his descendants. In 1787 he took a warrant for three hundred and sixteen acres, with allowance, paying for it twelve pounds six shillings, and received a patent therefor in 1795. In 1784, Mr. Cunningham was superintendent of highways, and in 1808 he died, in the seventy-third year of his age. His children and grandchildren all settled near his early home. April 18, 1829, Barnett Cunningham's daughter Mary received a warrant for one hundred and eighty-three and three-quarters acres of land, and Feb. 1, 1831, his son Joseph received a warrant for one hundred and fifty and three-quarters acres, both tracts being surveyed March 22, 1831. Joseph's wife was Agnes Huston. His land was at the head-waters of Smilie's Run, and there he spent his life, leaving two sons, Joseph and William. Joseph, Jr., settled upon his father's farm, and married a daughter of Matthew Gant. He (Joseph Cunningham) was justice of the peace for many years, and also county commissioner. His children were two sons also, Matthew and William, the former succeeding his father upon the old farm. Matthew Cunningham's children are Ezekiel, Sample, and Jennings, and a daughter who married James Ward. William Cunningham, son of Joseph, and grandson of Barnett Cunningham, sold his portion of the old farm, and entered business at Connellsville. Afterwards he returned to his home in Tyrone and died here, leaving a large family, most of them still residing in Fayette County.

James Torrance was a half-brother of Barnett Cunningham. They were both natives of Ireland, emigrating from that country to Peach Bottom Valley, on the Susquehanna River, and from there to Tyrone township. Torrance came about 1772, making a tomahawk improvement, as did Cunningham, for which he received a patent in 1795. During the years of 1789-97 and 1800, James Torrance officiated as township auditor, and his name appears upon the books as late as 1808. His family was quite large, and when he died, in 1826, he was eighty-three years old. Of his children, Hugh, the eldest, settled on a part of the old farm; Cunningham, a half-brother of Hugh, took another portion; and Joseph Huston Torrance, another half-brother, took the remainder of the homestead, and the part upon which stood the old log house. This he soon replaced with a handsome frame building. Hugh Torrance married a Miss McKee, of McKeeport, and together they reared a family of twelve children. Of these, Hugh, Jr., lived in his native town until he reached manhood, when he removed West. Robert engaged in mercantile business at Connellsville, and David settled on his father's farm. He is the only son left in the township. Cunningham Torrance's family all emigrated to the West, settling in Iowa, and his land, which was first sold to William Homer, has passed to strangers. The children of Joseph Huston Torrance were twelve, but only four are left,—Joshua, Samuel, Carrie, and James. They all live within or near Tyrone, Joshua occupying the homestead.

John Stephenson and Mary Stephenson came to Tyrone about the time the families of Vance, Cunningham, and Torrance did, and settled on land very near theirs, John receiving a warrant for seventy-six and one-quarter acres, and Mary for three hundred acres.

One of the earliest of the pioneers of this section was Valentine Crawford, a brother of Col. William Crawford. He was in correspondence with Gen. Washington during the time from 1773 to 1776 in reference to the Washington Bottom lands. As nearly all his letters were dated at Jacob's Creek, they show his residence to have been in this county at that time, still it is known that for a while at least he lived on the Westmoreland County side.

Near the year 1772, Capt. Joseph Huston, with his family, came from Peach Bottom, Va., to this vicinity, and settled upon a tract of land containing two hundred and seventy-seven acres, for which he took out a warrant in 1786. His wife was Margery Cunningham, the eldest sister of Barnett Cunningham, who followed them thither within a year or two. Upon the land which he located Capt. Huston built a cabin for his family, wherein they lived prosperous and contented. In 1782 the father accompanied Col. Crawford upon his expedition which proved so disastrous. Before leaving home he gave to the township a piece of land which has always been known as the Cochran graveyard. Soon after returning from the Crawford expedition Capt. Huston died, and his remains were the first to be carried to the cemetery for which he had made provision, and where so many of those ancient families now lie.

William Huston, the oldest son of Capt. Joseph Huston, was born east of the mountains in 1754. He was but a boy of eighteen when his father crossed the range to make his home upon the western side. April 14, 1791, he warranted twenty-seven acres of land adjoining that of his father, the survey being made April 30th of the same year. William Huston had two sons, William, Jr., and Joseph, who both lived and died upon the old place. William Huston, Jr., had three sons,—Lewis, Eli, and Boyd. The first two are still living in Tyrone township. Joseph Huston, the second son of William, Sr., had a daughter Kersey, who became the wife of James Cochran, usually called "Little Jim," and their home is upon the old Huston homestead. John Huston, a son of old Capt. Joseph, was born in 1757, while the family still lived upon the east side of the mountains. He was at one time a resident of Dunbar township, afterwards he kept a tavern in Uniontown, and later went to Kentucky, where he died. His son, John, Jr., or Judge Huston, was born in Dunbar, and went to Kentucky with his father. When nineteen years old he returned to Tyrone, his father's home, and entered the employ of his uncle Joseph, as clerk in the Huston Forge and Old Redstone Furnace. He afterwards became possessor of the property, and conducted it until his death. Agnes, a daughter of Capt. Huston, was born in 1700, and was the wife of Joseph Cunningham. They lived and died in the town of Tyrone, leaving many descendants. Sarah, another daughter, married Mr. Nesbitt, and with him removed to Kentucky. Joseph Huston, son of Capt. Joseph Huston, was born in 1763. During his younger years he led a roving life, but after reaching maturity settled in Uniontown, where he built the first brick house the place boasted, and where he was elected sheriff of Fayette County in 1790. Later he purchased land on Redstone Creek, in North Union, and built a forge. In 1804 he became proprietor of the Redstone Furnace, which he operated until his death in 1824. His wife was a daughter of John Smitle.

William Chain was an early resident in Tyrone, settling here at the time the families of Vance, Cunningham, and Torrance did, and living two miles west of them. He had three sons,—Robert, John, and William. Robert lived on the homestead, John very near him, and William went into Westmoreland County. Hugh Chain, a son of one of these brothers, built the Chain mills, situated on Jacob's Creek. William Chain, Sr., was auditor in Tyrone in 1789, '94, '96, '98.

The land on which John Torrance located in 1780 was a tract of 193 acres, which is now the farm of David Galley. The warrant for it was made Feb. 11, 1790, and the survey but thirteen days later. John Torrance's sons were James, Barnett, and Joseph, the last named having served three years (1787, '88, and '89) as sheriff of Fayette County.

James Blackstone was a native of Maryland, and must have located in Fayette County prior to 1784, as in that year he is recorded as "apraiser of damages." He located upon the land called "The Summit," in Tyrone township, which now belongs to William and Presley Moore. April 13, 1798, James Blackstone was appointed a justice of the peace. His family consisted of one son and three daughters. Two of the daughters married James and Thomas Hurst, leaving near Mount Pleasant, and the other became the wife of Judge Boyd Mercer, of Washington County. The son, James, Jr., removed to Connellsville in the year 1805, building for his home a brick house on Water Street, which is now known as the Dean House. He also carried on a general store in this building. Of his two children, both sons, Henry, the oldest, is a civil engineer, now in the employ of the government. James, the younger, has lived upon a farm near Connellsville for the last forty years. The land which was originally taken up by the elder Blackstone, spoken of as the property of William and Presley Moore, came to these gentlemen through their grandmother, Mrs. James Hurst, the daughter to whom Blackstone gave it by will. The 208 acres of land adjoining the Blackstone property was taken up by Joseph Copper before 1786. He afterwards sold the property and emigrated West.

The Stewart family are found by the records to have been connected with the history of the Tyrone Church some ten years prior to the date of their land patents. A deed is upon record reciting that on Nov. 19, 1785, Edward Rice, of Tyrone, sold to Jacob Stewart, of the county of York, Pa., three hundred and fifty-three acres of land,—consideration five hundred pounds. On May 12, 1787, Jacob Stewart received a patent for three hundred and ninety-four acres. The tract of three hundred and fifty-three acres was purchased by Edward Rice of John Stephens, April 28, 1773, and Dec. 22, 1791, Jacob Stewart sold the entire three hundred and ninety-four acres to Jacob Strickler. Jacob Stewart was a brother of Abraham Stewart, the father of Andrew Stewart, who was generally known as "Tariff Andy."

The ancestors of the Stewarts of Fayette County lived among the Grampian Hills of Scotland, whence the grandfather of Jacob and Abraham Stewart emigrated to America, and settled first in New Jersey, removing afterwards to York County, Pa. In that county the father of Jacob Stewart married a German woman named Snyder. They had four sons—Jacob, John, Abraham, and David—and three daughters. They were all educated in German schools. All settled in Fayette County except John, who settled on the Muskingum, in Ohio, and Barbara, who married William Morris, and remained at York, Pa.

In 1791, when Judge Nathaniel Breading contracted with the government to survey the "depreciated lands" up the Allegheny River, he employed Jacob and Abraham Stewart to make the survey. They were occupied on the work all the summer of that year, and in the following winter Jacob completed the calculations and plans. In 1797 he, with a man named Mowry, established the first newspaper in Fayette County, the Fayette Gazette and Union Advertiser, published at Uniontown. Jacob Stewart was never married. He was a justice of the peace for many years, being first appointed to that office March 31, 1787. The people of Tyrone township and the vicinity considered him an excellent adviser, and many disputes which would otherwise have gone into the courts were adjusted amicably through his influence and arbitration. David Stewart, brother of Jacob and Abraham, also lived for some years in Tyrone, but removed to Connellsville, where he followed the trade of cabinet-maker, and where he resided until the time of his death. He left two sons, Abraham and Hamilton. Two of the sisters of David and Jacob Stewart married John and Jacob Strickler. They both lived in Tyrone and reared large families. Philip Meason received (Oct. 3, 1785) a warrant for two hundred and seventy-two acres of land lying in Tyrone township. It was surveyed Jan. 14, 1786, by the name of “Union,” and a patent granted upon it March 17, 1786. Mr. Meason disposed of this property Oct. 14, 1797, to Abraham Newcomer and Andrew Schallenberger. May 4, 1799, these men divided the tract, and Schallenberger conveyed one hundred and a half acres to Philip Galley.

John Smilie took up, by warrant dated in 1786, a tract of land, which was surveyed to him in the same year under the name of “Prospect.” This tract contained three hundred and sixty-eight acres, and included the site of the present borough of Dawson. This land, which he left by will to his son, was sold in December, 1852, by Robert P. Smilie, trustee of John Smilie. It was divided into three parcels, of which one was purchased by Stewart Strickler, and the others by George Dawson, of Brownsville, father of the Hon. John L. Dawson. Through this tract the route of the Pittsburgh and Connellsville Railroad was located, and on it was established “Dawson’s Station,” around which there grew up a village, which was afterwards incorporated as the borough of Dawson, an account of which will be found farther on in this history of the township.

The dwelling of John Smilie was on the hill back of the site of the present town. One of his daughters became the wife of Joseph Huston, a well-known ironmaster. Another married Mr. Bryson, and, as his widow, was again married, becoming the wife of George Dawson. John Smilie was one of the most prominent men of Fayette County in public life, and a more extended sketch of his career will be found on another page of this work.

Abraham Strickler was one of the early settlers in Tyrone, taking up by warrant 294½ acres of land. On the 22d of December, 1791, Jacob Strickler bought of Jacob Stewart, his brother-in-law, a tract of land containing 394 acres, whereon he lived and brought up his large family of children. His daughter Elizabeth married Moses Vance, and his daughter Mary became the wife of Alexander Long. Jacob, his son, after his marriage settled on Redstone Creek, near the Sharpless paper-mills, but afterwards came to Tyrone, and settled upon the farm now owned by the Hickman Coke-Works. His son Stewart lived upon the place many years after his father’s death, and first established the coke-works there. Stewart Strickler married a daughter of John Newcomer, Sr., and is now in Tennessee, where he removed some twelve years ago. David Strickler, another son of Jacob, was a cabinet-maker.

Valentine Sterritt, Oct. 5, 1790, took up by warrant 198 acres of land, which was surveyed to him Feb. 11, 1791. This tract was in what is now Lower Tyrone, and is situated on Jacob’s Creek, adjoining the Perry line. About the same time he took up other lands in Perry township. He had lived upon them for years, and they are still in possession of his descendants.

Matthew Gaut must have located near Jacob’s Creek, in what is now Lower Tyrone, some time before 1792, as we find him mentioned as auditor of accounts in that year. His sons were James, John, Matthew, Joseph, and Samuel. The daughters after marriage were Mrs. Love, Mrs. Espey, and Mrs. Cunningham. All the sons save Joseph early emigrated to the West. Joseph remained all his life upon the homestead, and died there. He had a family of seven children, viz.: Matthew, a physician in New York; Robert, a physician in Westmoreland County; and William, who kept the home-farm. The daughters, four in number, married George and Henry Newmeyer, John Gallatin, and David Sherbondy. They all lived in Tyrone township, where their children and grandchildren now reside.

John W., Christopher, and Martin Stauffer were natives of Tyrone, their father having settled here early in life. John W. owned for a time a grist-mill at Scottsdale, on the Westmoreland side of Jacob’s Creek, but returned again to this township. Christopher lived in Upper Tyrone, between Jacob’s Creek and Bulskin. Martin also settled in Tyrone, near the Valley Works, where he passed his whole life. Martin Stauffer’s sons were John G., of Mount Pleasant, and Abraham, who settled near his father, about a mile below the iron bridge, where he lived and died, and where his son Joseph now lives. John W. Stauffer’s daughter married Solomon Keister, who owns a grist-mill on Jacob’s Creek, and is also interested with James Cochran in the coke-works.

James Sterritt was early in the township, and in 1797 was township auditor, still the name of Sterritt does not appear upon the books after 1801. He lived upon the land now owned by the heirs of Alexander Boyd. The daughter of James Sterritt became the wife of James Power, of the family of Rev. James Power.

Oct. 14, 1797, Abraham Newcomer and Andrew Schallenberger together purchased a tract of land in this section. Newcomer, who was a native of Germany, lived and died upon his portion of the farm, as did his son Uriah, and their descendants still own it. John, another son of Abraham, purchased the property known as the Smith place, but later sold it to Mr. Overholt and moved West.

Christian and John Newcomer came to Tyrone before 1800 with their father, who was also born in Germany. Christian bought the property formerly known as “Poverty Neck,” which was the bottom-land on the north bank of Youghiogheny River. Christian’s son Jonathan now lives at Connellsville, and his daughter lives in the West. David Newcomer, Christian’s son by a second marriage, lives on a part of the Jacob Newcomer tract. John Newcomer, the brother of Christian, purchased a farm of 200 acres near Hickman’s Run, and quite near the Tyrone Church. This tract was originally patented by John Stewart, Oct. 3, 1787, under the title of "Pleasant Garden," and in 1800 was the property of Absalom Kent. John Newcomer's children were nine,—four boys and five girls. Jacob, the oldest, lived until his death upon the homestead, which was then sold, and is now owned by E. H. Reid. Dr. George Newcomer, of Connellsville, is a son of Jacob Newcomer. Of the other sons of John Newcomer, John, Jr., also lives at Connellsville; Joseph is a resident of Dayton, Ohio; and Samuel is in Westmoreland County. Polly, one of the daughters, married Stewart Strickler, and lives in Tennessee; Barbara married Joseph Strickler, and resides in South Union; Catharine, who was the wife of John Newcomer, and Sarah, who married Thomas Boyd, are both dead.

Philip Galley was a native of Lancaster County, Pa., and went from there to Frederick County, Md. In 1799 he purchased one hundred and a half acres of land of Andrew Schallenberger, in this township, a portion of the original Meason warrant, and immediately after his marriage in Lancaster County came here to reside. His family of eight sons and three daughters all reached maturity, married, and reared families of their own in and near Tyrone. The daughters were Catherine, who married Jacob Smith, of Connellsville; Elizabeth, who became Mrs. Jesse Gleece; and Barbara, the youngest, who married Henry Snyder, of Westmoreland County. Philip Galley first lived on the land now belonging to the Morgan Coal- and Coke-Works. He was the first fruit-raisers in this region, and continued to be largely engaged in the cultivation of fruit-trees until 1835. In 1820 he sold his farm to his eldest son, Peter, and purchased that of Joseph Huston, in the township of Franklin, living there until his death, which occurred in 1852. This farm, lying on the river, and on the line between the townships of Franklin and Dunbar, is now owned by his son Henry. John Galley, another son of Philip, lives on Dickison Run, in Dunbar township, his property joining that of his brother Henry. Peter lived and died upon a part of the old homestead in Tyrone. Jacob, a fourth son, had the other portion, upon which he lived and followed the business of a weaver. Below is a notice of that business, which appeared in the Genio of Liberty Oct. 9, 1827, which is of interest in this connection:

"Jacob Galley informs his friends that he has commenced the business of coverlet-weaving at his residence in Tyrone township, one mile from the Youghiogheny River, near the road leading from the Broad Ford to Hurst's mill on Jacob's Creek, where he is prepared to weave all kinds of coverlets, carpeting, and table linen, according to the most fashionable patterns."

In 1828, Jacob Galley was killed at Broad Ford by the overturning of a boat. Of his family, his daughter married Henry Newcomer, of Tyrone township, and moved to Missouri, where she now lives; David lived and died upon a portion of the old Matthew Gaut tract, in Lower Tyrone; Samuel settled near Uniontown, where he lived for twenty years, and then went West and now resides in Nebraska; Jonathan lives in German township, in this county; Abram, the youngest of the family, lives on a farm adjoining Henry Galley, in Franklin township.

Alexander Long and his wife, as early as 1800, lived on the land first patented by the Stevensons, and now owned by the Tinsmans. Of their large family of children only one, the daughter Mary, is living at this time. She married James B. Hurst, and after his death became the wife of James Cunningham. Jacob, one of the sons, lived on Redstone Creek, near Brownsville, but afterwards returned to his father's place. David, another son, went to Clarion County and died there.

Samuel Cochran was born in Chester County, Pa., and lived until manhood in the eastern part of the State. His profession was that of a surveyor, and he served in the war of the Revolution. At the close of the war he removed to Chambersburg, Pa., where he married Esther, a daughter of Daniel Johns.1 When Samuel Cochran came to this section he lived for a time on the Washington Bottoms, in Perry township. After a while he purchased in Tyrone township, of Capt. Joseph Huston, three hundred acres of land, on which he built a log cabin, the usual style of a home at that day. In 1811 he built the large stone house still standing upon the old place, where he dwelt the remainder of his days. By will the property of Samuel Cochran passed to two of his sons, Mordecai and James, the homestead part falling to Mordecai. Upon it he built a large brick house, and was one of the first to engage in the manufacture of coke, which business has since increased to such magnitude. He died Dec. 29, 1880, aged eighty-three years. The other children of Samuel Cochran were James, Samnel, Jr., John, Thomas, Isaac, and a daughter, Esther, who married John Strickler. James was a bachelor, who lived in Tyrone all his life, dying in August, 1875, at the great age of ninety-four years. Samuel, Jr., went to Beaver County, in this State, where his family are now numerous. John settled on Jacob's Creek, in Westmoreland County, at Chain's Mills, and many of his family are still there. Thomas married and remained in Tyrone, dying when about forty years old. His immediate family have all moved West. Isaac was a farmer in Tyrone, and his sons were Samuel, Isaac, Jr., Sample, James, and John M.

Mordecai Cochran, Jr., a son of Mordecai, Sr., and grandson of old Samuel Cochran, is a lawyer in Uniontown. James W., called "Big Jim," is another son, who lives in Tyrone and is quite exten-term of that year took the following action in reference to the erection of Tyrone as a township of Fayette, viz.

"In consequence of the late addition to this County the Court divide the Township of Tyrone and part of the Township of Donegal, annexed by that addition, into two Townships, as follows: A Township to begin at the Broad ford on Youghiiogeni river, and by the new road from thence to Hannastown, to the crossing of Jacob's Creek; thence by the said Creek to the mouth thereof; thence by the River Youghiiogeni to the beginning. To be hereafter known by the name of Tyrone Township."

In 1839 a part of the territory of Tyrone was taken off and given to Perry in the formation of the latter township (see particulars in history of Perry). Subsequently (in 1845) a change was made in the boundary line between Tyrone and Perry. At the September term of court in 1842 there was presented "a petition of sundry inhabitants of Perry township for an alteration of the line between said township and the township of Tyrone." On this petition an order was issued appointing "viewers," who made their final report to the court at the June term in 1845. The cause of so long a delay does not appear on the record, but the report is as follows:

"We, the undersigned viewers, appointed according to the above order, met on the 8th day of January, 1845, and after being duly qualified according to law, proceeded to view the line proposed for an alteration in the above-named line between the townships of Perry and Tyrone as near as possible so as to embrace the whole of the school district specified in the above order, viz.: Beginning at a point in Jacob's Creek, about four rods above Turnbull's old mill, on the land of Henry Sweitzer, running thence south five degrees east one hundred and ninety perches to a point where the road from Robinson's old mill intersects the road from Perryopolis to Connellsville; thence south twenty-five degrees west three hundred and twenty perches to the margin of the Youghiiogeni River at the Great Falls of said river, near the foot of said falls, on the land of Abraham Layton; thence up the said river to the mouth of Virgin's Run, said run being the present dividing line between the townships of Perry and Franklin. In testimony whereof we have hereunto set our hands the date above written.

"William Davidson.

"William Abraham.

"John H. Bebe."

The record shows the following as the action of the court upon the report: "And now, to wit, June 6, 1845, the above report having been read at the times and in the manner prescribed by law, the court approve and confirm the same, and order it to be entered of record."

The list of township officers of Tyrone for 1784 embraces the following: John Stewart, constable; Bernard Cunningham and Moses Smith, supervisors of highways; Samuel Glasgow and William Huston, overseers of the poor.

The list of 1785 shows the following officers for Tyrone and Bullskin, viz.: John White, constable; Zachariah Connell and James Torrance, overseers of brick. James Cochran, a son of Isaac, and familiarly termed "Little Jim," married Kersey, a daughter of Joseph Huston. He owns eleven hundred acres of valuable coal lands on the west side of the Youghiiogeni River, and for seventeen years has been largely engaged in the development of the coal and coke interests of this vicinity. John M., his brother, made his home in Mount Pleasant, where he died in May, 1880, leaving a valuable coke property.

Joseph Martin, now eighty-four years old, lives in Tyrone, about half a mile from the mouth of Laurel Run. He came to this county when a young man, locating for a time near East Liberty, and at that time worked with Joseph McCoy in a sickle-factory. In 1849 he purchased a farm in this town, where he has since lived, and his family of children have all settled near him.

Daniel McDonald was not one of the earliest settlers in this township. His land was located on Smilie Run, adjoining the farm of Squire Joseph Cunningham on the south. His children were Daniel, Margaret, and James. The latter lived upon the farm of his father, and held the office of justice of the peace for twenty-five years. In 1873 he was elected county treasurer, but died during the first year of his incumbency. Daniel died young, and Margaret became the wife of A. J. McGill, who owns a farm adjoining the homestead. Malcolm McDonald, of Franklin township, is a brother of Daniel McDonald, and Mordecai and John K. McDonald, of Dawson, are sons of Malcolm. In 1869, and again in 1872, John K. McDonald was elected prothonotary of Fayette County, serving both terms with credit and satisfaction to the people.

The following list, taken from the assessment-rolls of Tyrone for several years,—from 1757 to 1791, inclusive,—gives some idea of the business enterprises of the township in that period, viz.:

1757.—J. Eager, grist-mill; Rebekah Hutchinson, distillery; William Huston, distillery; Thomas Mounts, distillery; Alexander McClintock, grist- and saw-mill; J. Strieker, distillery.

1758.—William Chain, Samuel Breden, Jasper Bredkour; John Eager, David Mitchell, and J. Strieker were all assessed on distilleries.

ERETION OF TYRONE AS A TOWNSHIP OF FAYETTE COUNTY, CHANGES OF TERRITORY, AND LIST OF OFFICERS.

Immediately after the annexation of territory northeast of the Youghiiogeni to Fayette County, in 1784, the Court of Quarter Sessions at the March the poor; Henry White and David Lindsey, supervisors of roads; Benjamin Wells and James Blackstone, appraisers of damages.

For several years after 1755 the jurisdiction of the justices of the peace was Tyrone and Bullskin. The earliest justices for Tyrone of whom any record is found were Jacob Stewart (term commenced March 31, 1757) and James Blackstone, April 18, 1758. After Blackstone's, the following names of justices having jurisdiction in Tyrone prior to 1840 are gathered from records in the recorder's office, viz.:

Stewart H. Whitehill, Bullskin and Tyrone, Aug. 12, 1823; Hugh Torrance, Bullskin, Tyrone, and Connsville, March 17, 1824; Herman Gebhart, Bullskin, Tyrone, and Connsville, April 20, 1829; Henry W. Lewis, Bullskin, Tyrone, and Connsville, Aug. 16, 1831; Matthew Wray, Bullskin, Tyrone, and Connsville, May 4, 1837.

From the year 1840 the list is much more nearly complete, but by no means entirely so, on account of the obscurity of records and election returns. It is as follows:

The duties of these officers were identical with those of the "Auditors of Accounts," which were elected after 1860. Until that time they acted jointly for Tyrone and Bullskin. This list, which has been gathered from the election returns in the prothonotary's office and from the court records, is much nearer complete for the early years than those of the other township officers.

And therefore praying the court to appoint proper persons to view the same, etc.

On the 16th of September, 1876, the court appointed A. G. Gilmore, Blair Francis, and Thomas J. Bettermore commissioners to inquire into the propriety of granting the prayer of the petitioners. An order was issued to the commissioners Nov. 14, 1876, and returned December 16th the same year with their report and plat attached marking the proposed division of the township as prayed for. On the 13th of March, 1877, remonstrances were filed and continued until June session of court 1877. At this session the commissioners made a return of their proceedings to December session, 1876, at which time they were continued to March session, 1877, and again continued to June session, 1877. The return was favorable to the division of the township of Tyrone, and the commissioners reported that in their opinion it would be an advantage and convenience to the inhabitants of the township to divide it by the following lines, viz.:

"Beginning at a point on the Youghiogheny River at the mouth of a small stream at the upper end of Brown & Cochran’s coke-works; thence north 11° west 732 perches to a locust-tree on the top of a hill in Joseph Strickler’s field, north of his house; thence north 11° west 293 perches to a point on Jacob’s Creek, the last line running north 11° west, if continued into Westmoreland County would run into a frame house owned and occupied by John Cottum. The court orders a vote of the qualified electors of said Tyrone township on the question of the division of said township according to said line; and the court further orders that the election officers of said township shall hold an election for that purpose at the place fixed by law for holding township elections in said township on the 17th day of August, 1877, between the hours of 7 o’clock A.M. and 7 o’clock P.M., and make return of said election according to law."

In accordance with this order of the court an election was held with the following result, viz.: For a division of the township, two hundred and eighty-one votes; against a division thereof, one hundred and seventy-eight votes. Thereupon, on the 5th of September, 1877, the court ordered and decreed that said township be divided agreeably to the line marked and returned by the commissioners, and, further, "that the name of the township lying in the east of said division line shall be Upper Tyrone, and that the name of the township lying in the west of said division line shall be Lower Tyrone."

The following-named persons were and have been elected to the offices indicated in the two townships from their organization to the present time:

Religious Worship. Tyrone Presbyterian Church

Among the early settlers in this part of Western Pennsylvania were many of the Scotch-Irish, a brave, industrious, thrifty, independent people, with strong Presbyterian attachments. When Rev. James Power first visited this region on his missionary tour in 1774 he found the Smiths, the Vances, the Chains, the Stewarts, and others. Among them were three sons and two daughters of one godly woman who was married twice in Cumberland County, Pa., where she died. Her oldest son, Barnett Cunningham, came from Peach Bottom Valley, A.D. 1770, with his wife, Anna Wilson, to whom he had then been married ten years. He had been preceded a short time by his eldest sister, Margery, wife of Col. Joseph Huston, and the mother of a numerous family. About 1770 to 1772 their half-brother, James Torrance, followed with his wife and one small child. Of the family, William Cunningham and Ann, wife of Robert Clark, probably came about the same time. The farms of a number of these were contiguous to each other, and near where the church now stands, and perhaps this fact, as much as any other, determined the site of the first house of worship, if not the very existence of Tyrone Church.

That Dr. Power preached here on his missionary tour there is little doubt, but the statement published in the Presbyterian Advocate in October, 1854, that he "then organized Tyrone Church, baptized Barnett Cunningham's child, and ordained him and his half-brother, James Torrance, elders," must be incorrect, for Dr. Power himself was not ordained until August, 1776.

When Dr. Power removed his family "to the western part of the province," 1 in October, 1776, he fixed his residence for some time at Dunlap's Creek. He occupied himself chiefly in missionary labors among the sparse settlements, organizing a number of churches, to all of which he was "a sort of missionary pastor." 2 Among these were Dunlap's Creek, Laurel Hill, Mount Pleasant, Unity, Sewickly, and Tyrone. "The extent and variety of his labors may be inferred from one incident connected with the Cross Creek Church, in the northwestern part of Washington County, Pa. On his first visit there, on the 14th of November, 1778, Dr. Power preached the first gospel sermon ever heard there under an oak-tree, just outside the gate at Vance's Fort, in the presence of a military company about to go forth on an expedition against the Indians. After the sermon he baptized twenty-one children, among whom was Sarah, eldest daughter of Mr. Thomas Marquis, who was afterwards called to a ministry of holy baptism in the same place. This child lived to become the wife of Rev. Joseph Stevenson, and mother of Rev. John McMillan Stevenson, D.D., now senior secretary of the American Tract Society," and grandmother of the present pastor of Tyrone Church.

This incident, related by Dr. Brownson in his address at the Mount Pleasant centennial reunion, gives a key to the origin of a number of the oldest Presbyterian Churches in Western Pennsylvania. Dr. Power was accustomed during the three years he lived and preached at Dunlap's Creek to visit frequently the "settlements," preaching, "catechizing," baptizing the children of such as were church-members in the East, and (we may well suppose) administering the Lord's Supper to his people in the wilderness, admitting many to seal ordinances upon their profession of their faith in Jesus Christ and ordaining elders in many places.

As Tyrone lies directly on the road from Dunlap's Creek by Laurel Hill to Mount Pleasant and Sewickly, where it is known he was at this time establishing congregations, it is believed that he preached here often, visiting and catechising as was his manner, and thus gathered and established his congregation.

It is not probable that this church was ever formally organized according to the present mode of proceeding. Indeed it was not possible that it should be, for like "many of the oldest churches, it enjoyed the pastoral labors and care of a minister years before the erection of the mother Presbytery."

Tyrone was the first of all the churches to be recognized in Presbytery under the dignity of a "congregation." In the records of the second meeting of the Presbytery of Redstone, at "Delap's Creek," Oct. 23, 1782, is the following minute: "A supplication for supplies from Tyrone congregation was brought in and read. Request was granted, and Mr. Power was appointed to supply the second Sabbath in December, and Mr. Dunlap the third Sabbath in March."

In February, 1784, according to the statement of a woman in the congregation who was then married by him, Mr. Power was preaching one-fourth of his time at Tyrone. How long this continued cannot now be ascertained, but in October, 1783, Tyrone appears again in Presbytery asking for supplies. A Rev. Moore and Rev. Samuel Porter were each appointed one Sabbath. During the next eleven years Tyrone appears in Presbytery, not regularly, but frequently.

Upon the organization of the Synod of Pittsburgh, in the year 1802, Tyrone was reported in the list of churches "vacant and unable to support a pastor."

The only additional evidence found of stated services in Tyrone at any time during eighteen years preceding the above date was in a paper until very recently in the possession of the family of Elder James Torrance. It contained a subscription for the purpose of securing a portion of the services of Dr. Dunlap, who was for twenty years previous to 1803 pastor of Laurel Hill Church. Neither the date of that paper, the portion of service it secured, nor the time the arrangement continued is now known, but it must have been near the close of his pastorate at Laurel Hill, for Mr. J. Huston Torrance (son of James), born in the year 1795, distinctly remembers hearing Dr. Dunlap at the "tent" under that large hickory-tree on the spot where tradition says the church was organized.

Without doubt Dr. Power in the year 1774 preached the first sermon ever heard here, and there is no evidence that any but he preached here during the eight years that intervened before the first meeting of the Presbyterian of Redstone, when Tyrone was recognized as an established "congregation." Nor can there be any doubt that to his abundant labors more than of all others is Tyrone indebted for whatever pastoral care it enjoyed during the twenty-eight or thirty years it had no pastor. In the grateful acknowledgments of these years of unchronicled privations and hardships and perils, next to Dr. Power, comes Dr. Dunlap. Before reviewing the unbroken pastorate of fifty-seven years which followed it is proper to mention the successive houses in which this congregation has worshipped.

Tyrone congregation has erected four churches on the parcel of ground now occupied by the church and graveyard. The lot, containing two acres, is part of a tract for which John Stewart took out a patent, dated Oct. 3, 1787, under the significant title of "Pleasant Garden." This interesting and suggestive document is now in the possession of Mr. E. H. Reid, to whom that portion of the original tract which surrounds the church ground now belongs. The title by which the congregation held this lot having been lost through the vicissitudes incident to frontier life, in 1800, Abraham Kent and Tabitha, his wife, then possessed of the original tract, executed a new deed, securing to "Matthew Gaut, William Chain, and William Smith, trustees, and to their successors in office forever, said lot for the use of Tyrone Church." 3

The first house built by Tyrone congregation 4 was a fair specimen of the primitive "meeting-houses" in Western Pennsylvania, and corresponded with the cabins of the pioneers. "It was simply a cabin of a larger size," Dr. Eaton's description of "an early church" 3 is probably almost literally true of the first meeting-house at Tyrone. "Trees were felled of the proper size, cut to the desired length, notched at the corners, and laid up, log upon log, to the desired height. For the gable ends of the logs were chopped off to give the proper inclination to the roof, and logs placed across to receive the clapboards. These clapboards were split out of straight oak, placed in order on these logs, and kept in place by weight- poles. The doors and windows were then cut out, the floor was laid with puncheons split from straight logs, the door made from the same, with pins and wooden hinges, and the windows filled with oiled linen or paper. In some cases neither nail nor bit of sawed lumber were employed. Instances are recorded where churches were built in a single day, and without the outlay of a single dollar."

This house had no floor but the earth. "The seats were logs split and elevated on wooden logs." The pulpit was arranged with two upright puncheons, and a third across to hold the books. Another puncheon, supported by two stout pins in the wall, served for the minister's seat. Thirteen years ago the remains of this first house, which stood on the highest spot between the present church building and the burial-ground, were little more than a heap of rubbish, which gradually disappeared.

The second house of worship was built between 1800 and 1805, probably about the time when Rev. James Guthrie became pastor. It stood just between the present house and the lower corner of the lot, with a gable towards the spring. It was of hewn logs, with a clapboard roof, and about thirty feet square at first. The pulpit was in the lower side of the house. Two aisles, terminating in a door at either end, save where the pulpit stood, crossed each other at right angles near the middle of the house. The seats (there were no pews) in the half of the house in which the pulpit was located were placed parallel with the one aisle, so that those sitting to the right and left of the pulpit faced each other and the minister; while in the other half of the house the seats ran parallel with the cross aisle. At length the house was enlarged by a "lean-to" addition at the side opposite to the pulpit, and the roof, which was extended with diminished pitch, shed-like, to cover it, came down almost to the lintel of the door that opened under its eaves, giving to the structure a peculiar and very unchurchlike appearance.

After serving for more than half a century this house was superseded by one built of brick upon the same site. The first sermon in this, the third house of worship, was preached by Rev. Ross Stevenson on Friday, June 4, 1852. After a while the foundation gave way, and the wall cracked, so that it became necessary to repair or rebuild. A meeting of the congregation was called. Rev. John McMillan, D.D., preached from Neh. ii. 17: "Then said I unto them, Ye see the distress that we are in, how Jerusalem lieth waste, and the gates thereof are burned with fire: come, and let us build up the wall of Jerusalem, that we be no more a reproach." Thus exhorted they resolved to build. A subscription was begun at once, and after four months the contract for building the fourth church edifice was awarded to Mr. J. L. White for $8500 and the old house, valued at $500. Then the first brick house, after only nineteen years' service, was demolished.

During the next eighteen months the homeless congregation worshipped in school-houses, occasionally accepting the kindly professed hospitality of their Methodist Episcopal neighbors, and holding communion services in their churches until they occupied their present sanctuary, which is a model of rural simplicity and taste, and which fully maintains the ratio of excellence by which each of the former ones surpassed its predecessor. On Sabbath, May 4, 1873, under these grand old oaks, in whose shade the fathers, generation after generation, for a hundred years had worshiped Jehovah, this beautiful house was solemnly dedicated to the worship of the true and living God.

2 It is stated in the "History of Centre Church [Ohio]. With an Introduction, Giving the Rise of Other Churches, by Robert A. Sherrard, 1839," that the Tyrone Presbyterian Church was organized in 1774 by the Rev. James Power; that its first meeting-house was built in 1778, and was used by the congregation for about seventy years. It is evident that the last part of Mr. Sherrard's statement is incorrect, and that he includes in his period of seventy years the time that the first two houses were in use.

Turning to the pastors and stated supplies who have served this church, we find for the first thirty years no pastor, and but two who for any time administered statedly the ordinances, namely, Drs. Power and Dunlap. A history of Tyrone Church would be incomplete without at least a brief sketch of Rev. James Power, D.D. He was born in Chester County, Pa., educated at Princeton, and licensed by the Presbytery of New Castle in the year 1772. The following year he received a call from the united congregations of Highbridge, Cambridge, and Oxford, in Botetourt County, Va. Perhaps the fact that many of Mrs. Power’s acquaintances and friends (among them her father, Philip Tanner, one of Rev. James Finley’s elders) had recently emigrated west of the mountains determined Mr. Power to decline that call and visit the new settlements. Accordingly, in the summer of 1774, he crossed the Allegheny Mountains, and spent three months in itinerant labors “in what are now Westmoreland, Allegheny, Washington, and Fayette Counties, Pa.” Late in the fall of 1776 he again crossed the mountains, this time bringing his family with him, consisting of his wife and four daughters. “They were mounted on horses, his wife on one, he on another, his oldest daughter behind him, his youngest, almost a babe, seated on a pillow in front of him, the other two comfortably and cozily seated in a sort of hamper-baskets, one on each side of a led horse.” An explanation of his fixing his first residence on Dunlap’s Creek is found in the fact that there Mrs. Power would be among friends and near her father during the frequent and long absences of her husband.

After three years of a “sort of missionary pastorate” throughout the settlements, Dr. Power removed his family to Mount Pleasant, in 1779, and became pastor of Mount Pleasant and Sewickley Churches, and for a while Unity and Tyrone shared in his regular labors. Although never regularly installed, he fulfilled with marked fidelity the office of pastor in Sewickley until 1777, and in Mount Pleasant thirty years longer, when age and infirmity compelled him to cease. “Thirteen years more he lingered, profoundly revered by his descendants and the people of his charge, until Aug. 5, 1830, when, in the eighty-fifth year of his age, his released spirit joined the redeemed company of his fellow-laborers, and his body was laid quietly down in a hallowed grave to await the resurrection of the just.”

The Rev. James Dunlap, D.D., was born in Chester County, Pa., in 1774. He was graduated at Princeton, studied theology with Rev. James Finley, was licensed by the Presbytery of Donegal, 1776 to 1781. He was ordained “sine titulo” by the Presbytery of New Castle, and came West with his theological preceptor the same year. In October, 1782, he received the first call which passed through the hands of Redstone Presbytery. This call, which was from the churches of “Delap’s Creek” and Laurel Hill, he accepted, but was never installed, this formality being of more recent date. Dr. Dunlap remained pastor of both churches for seven years, and of Laurel Hill for fourteen years more, and near the close of this period was stated supply at Tyrone for some part of his time. From 1803 till 1811 he was president of Jefferson College, and died in Abingdon, Pa., Nov. 11, 1818, in the seventy-fifth year of his age.

He was no doubt the finest scholar in the Presbytery. It is an interesting fact that the two men who nursed this little church in the wilderness were the first of the pioneer ministers whose talents and scholarship were recognized by academic honors. In 1807 Mr. Dunlap received from Jefferson College its first honorary degree of “Divinitatis Doctor,” and the next year Mr. Power’s name was placed second on the list now grown so long.

The Rev. James Guthrie, the first pastor of Tyrone congregation, was born in Westmoreland County, Pa. He was a child of the covenant, and his Scotch-Irish parents carefully instructed him in the duties and doctrines of religion. Their faithfulness was rewarded by the early conversion of their son, whose mind was soon turned to the gospel ministry. With this in view he entered Dickinson College. Upon his graduation he commenced the study of theology with one of the pastors of the Presbytery. In October, 1801, he appears in Presbytery, and the following minute was made in the record: “Mr. James Guthrie offered himself to be taken on trial as a candidate for the gospel ministry. Presbytery having received testimonials of his good moral character, of his being in full communion of the church, and having taken a regular course of literature, proceeded to converse with him on his experimental acquaintance with religion and the motives which induced him to desire the office, and, having received satisfaction, agreed to take him on further trial, and assigned him an exercise on the following theme: ‘Quomodo miraculae probant Scripturas Sacras esse Divinas,’ and an homily on 1 John iv. 9: ‘In this was manifested the love of God towards us, because that God sent his only begotten Son into the world that we might live through him.’ Both to be delivered at the next meeting of Presbytery.”

These duties were satisfactorily performed, as were all others that were assigned, until, “having passed through all the parts of trial required by the book, Mr. Guthrie was, on the 19th of March, 1803, at Laurel Hill, licensed in regular form as a probationer for the gospel ministry,” and opportunity was given him to make full proof of his ministry in the following list of appointments: “The first Sabbath in May, at Pitt township [Beulah]; the second, Salem; third, at Wheatfield; fourth, Queenmaling; fifth, Somerset.

[1 Old Redstone, p. 225.]
First Sabbath in June, Turkey Foot [Confluence], first, Morgan-town, Va.; second, Morgan-town, Va.; third, Middletown, Va.; fourth, Clarksburg, Va. First Sabbath in August, Tygart's Valley, Va.; second, Morgan-town; third, Monongahela Glades, Va.; fourth, Sandy Creek, Pa.; fifth, Turkey Foot. First Sabbath in September, Turkey Foot; second, Quemahoning; third, Wheatfield; fourth, Salem; and first Sabbath in October, Pitt township.

This formidable list of appointments kept the young licentiate the greater part of the summer in the saddle. For weeks together zigzagging in and out among the mountains, climbing perilous steeps, fording unbridged rivers, often threading his way through dense forests along lonely bridle-paths, we have displayed some of those elements of character which marked and made successful the long pastorate of Mr. Guthrie. At the “fall meeting” of Presbytery he was appointed to supply as missionary for the space of two months in the southern departments of Presbytery,—in January, 1804, at discretion; at Laurel Hill the second Sabbath in February, and at Tyrone the third. This was Mr. Guthrie's first Sabbath at Tyrone. These appointments, like the former ones, were all fulfilled, and Presbytery recorded their approbation of his fidelity and ability, and judged “his mission very successful.”

In April, 1804, a call from the congregations of Laurel Hill and Tyrone was presented to Mr. Guthrie. He requested “permission to hold the call under consideration, and leave to itinerate without the bounds of Presbytery for three months.” In October, 1804, Mr. Guthrie signified his acceptance of the call, and arrangements were made for his installation the next April. As no more appointments were made for him than for the pastors in the Presbytery, it is probable that Mr. Guthrie at once entered upon his labors here. According to the above arrangement, Presbytery met at Laurel Hill, April 17, 1805; proceeded to ordain Mr. Guthrie, “and did, by prayer and the imposition of hands, solemnly set him apart to the holy office of the gospel ministry, and install him in the united congregations of Laurel Hill and Tyrone,” and for the first time in its history this church had a pastor. On this interesting occasion the Rev. George Hill, father, or perhaps grandfather, of Rev. George Hill, D.D., preached “the ordination sermon,” and the Rev. Joseph Henderson presided. There is no record of any charge to pastor or people, and the installation was not repeated here.

This relation continued almost forty-six years, until the death of Mr. Guthrie, Aug. 24, 1850, in the seventy-fourth year of his age. The oldest members of this congregation remember and venerate Mr. Guthrie as a father. He baptized them in their infancy, catechized them in their youth, received them into the church in maturer years, married them, baptized their children, and buried their parents. He is remembered as a small man of ruddy complexion and nervous temperam; kind, genial, benevolent; a devoted pastor and a warm friend. The Rev. Joel Stoneroad, his colleague and successor, says, “The general traits of the Scotch-Irish marked the character of Mr. Guthrie.” He was four times married. His first wife was the daughter of Joseph Torrance, Esq., a member of Laurel Hill Session. His second wife was Miss Gallaher, of Dunlap's Creek. His third wife was a Widow Hunter, daughter of William Smith, an elder at Tyrone. His fourth wife was Mrs. Beeson, of Uniontown, who, after the death of Mr. Guthrie, married Mr. Johnston Van Kirk, of Dunlap's Creek. All Mr. Guthrie's wives had the reputation of being truly excellent women, being well suited to their place and station.

“Mr. Guthrie's mental character, though not extraordinary, was quite respectable. His talents partook chiefly of the practical rather than the speculative, which made him all the more useful as a preacher and pastor. As to his ministerial character, it was perfectly stainless through his long pastorate of forty-six years. The integrity of his religious character was never questioned, even by his enemies. He was truly a whole-souled man, generous to a fault. Frequently when his people had fallen into arrears he would cancel his claim rather than report them in Presbytery as delinquents, and this when his salary from both congregations never exceeded four hundred dollars.”

The Rev. Joel Stoneroad, the second pastor of Tyrone, was born in Mifflin County, Pa., in the year 1806; graduated at Jefferson College in 1827, and at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1830. He labored one year as a domestic missionary at Morgantown, Va., and vicinity; was pastor of Uniontown Presbyterian Church from 1832 to 1842, then pastor of Cross-Roads Church, Presbytery of Washington, for eight years. In the spring of 1850 he removed to Laurel Hill, and on the 5th of June was installed collegiate pastor with Rev. James Guthrie in the united congregations of Laurel Hill and Tyrone. Under the able and energetic labors of the junior pastor, who brought to the field the rich experience of nineteen years in the work of the ministry, the congregation prospered. Two elders were added to the session the first year. Just two years, lacking a day, from the installation of the second pastor the congregation entered their first brick house of worship, and the regular additions to its membership witnessed a healthy spiritual life. In April, 1861, Laurel Hill asked and obtained the whole of Mr. Stoneroad's time, and Tyrone became vacant for the first time in fifty-seven years.

Father Stoneroad still lives at Laurel Hill, where, abundant in labors, he has proclaimed the gospel of salvation for twenty-six years, though not now so much a "Boanerges" as a "Barnabas." The oldest of her living pastors, Tyrone affectionately greets him to-day, and thanks God for his presence.

A vacancy occurs from April, 1861, to 1864, during the greater part of which time the pulpit was irregularly supplied. The principal exception was in the summer of 1862, when the talented, consecrated, but now lamented George Paul, then a licentiate, under appointment as a foreign missionary, labored here for some months, and his name is still "as ointment poured forth." In April, 1864, a call for part of the pastoral services of Rev. William Logan Boyd, then pastor of Sewickly Church, promising two hundred dollars a year for one-third of his time, was presented in Presbyterian. The call was accepted, and on the first Monday in June following the first installation services ever witnessed in Tyrone were performed. The Rev. Joel Stoneroad preached the sermon, the Rev. W. F. Hamilton, D.D., presided, proposed the constitutional questions, and charged the pastor, and Rev. N. H. G. Fife delivered the charge to the people.

This pastorate lasted just three years, and was marked by a healthy growth in the church, although the distance at which Mr. Boyd resided in Sewickly greatly increased his labors, and at the same time diminished their apparent results, and perhaps largely influenced him to seek a release. Then occurred another vacancy, extending from 1867 to 1871. For the first eighteen months the pulpit was supplied occasionally by different ministers. In November, 1868, Rev. Morehead Edgar was elected "stated supply till the ensuing spring," at which time he was again elected stated supply for two-thirds of his time. Early in the summer, however, he ceased to serve.

Another season of occasional supplies followed until December, 1870, when the Rev. Thomas S. Parke preached as a candidate. He continued to supply most of the time until April 2, 1871, when he was elected pastor. This call, which was presented in Presbyterian at its spring meeting, was accepted, and on the 27th of July following he was installed at Tyrone pastor of the united churches of Tyrone and Harmony. The Rev. Joel Stoneroad again preached the sermon. On this occasion he also presided and proposed the "constitutional questions." Rev. Henry Fulton charged the pastor, and A. Bronson, D.D., the people.

Mr. Parke married, built a house in Dawson, and fixed his residence there. Then, for the first time in ninety-four years, Tyrone congregation had their pastor and his family living among them.

During this pastorate two additional elders were ordained and installed, the present beautiful house of worship was built and dedicated, and forty-one members were received and thirty-one dismissed to form the church at Dawson. This relation continued with Harmony for two years, and with Tyrone about four, terminating May 28, 1875.

The old church, weakened by the organization at Dawson, now entered into an alliance with Sewickly, each agreeing to pay half the salary of a minister. On the 17th of the ensuing October the Rev. J. H. Stevenson, by invitation of the session, preached his first sermon here, and afterwards regularly served the church, dividing the time equally between Tyrone and Sewickly. In October of the following year Tyrone and Scottdale were formed into a pastoral charge and placed under him, and he has remained in charge as pastor to the present time (1881).

Of the elders of the old Tyrone Church, the first bench consisted of Barnett Cunningham, born June 29, 1796, and his half-brother, James Torrance, born Feb. 15, 1744. They emigrated from Peach Bottom Valley, on the Susquehanna, the former in the spring of 1770, the latter within two years of that date. They secured for seventeen years, by what was known as a "tomahawk right," and then for eight years more by a surveyor's warrant, and afterwards, in 1795, by patent, lands, part of which have been in possession of their families ever since. The price paid by Mr. Cunningham for three hundred and sixteen acres, with "an allowance of one-sixteenth for roads," was twelve pounds six shillings,—nearly seventeen cents per acre. "They left the old settlements for the new," says one who wrote of it twenty years ago, "in full membership in the Presbyterian Church, but had no opportunity of hearing the gospel preached or its ordinances dispensed until Dr. Power visited them in 1774."

The same author, the late Robert A. Sherrard, of Steubenville, Ohio, fixed this as the date of their ordination, but unless Dr. Power, while yet a licentiate, exercised all the functions of an ordained minister, this could not be. It is probable that on his first visit here after his ordination, say in the fall of 1776, he ordained these noble men to their holy office. Of their efforts to gather a congregation, and secure the services of a minister, though it might be but for a single sermon, and that on a week-day or evening, in some cabin, or oftener in the woods, of the religious meetings they themselves held, of their trials and discouragements, their self-denial and sacrifices to secure a house of worship, their "faith and patience," the only record is on high. For more than thirty years these noble brothers, to whom perhaps this church owes its existence, carried the responsibilities their office involved without any addition to the session, without a pastor, and for the greater part of the time without even a stated supply to assist them. But they both lived to see the old cabin church, with its earthen floor, split-log benches, and unglazed windows, give way to the comparatively comfortable "meeting-house," with floor and glass windows and a pulpit, and at length even the luxury of a fire. Each of them was permitted to see his sons sitting in the seat of the elders, and the flock they had tended so long and so anxiously fed and cared for by a faithful under-shepherd.

Barnett Cunningham departed this life Sept. 13, 1898, in the seventy-third year of his age. Four of his sons and three of his grandsons have been called to the same office, and the session has never been without one or more of his family on their roll.
James Torrance died May 12, 1826, at the age of eighty-three years, having served this church as an elder fifty years. Three of his sons and three of his grandsons have been ordained to the office, and the husband of a great-granddaughter is now in the session. Of Robert Smith, James Goudy, John Cunningham, and John Cooly little is known, save that, having served in the office of ruling elder for a longer or shorter period, they all removed out of the church bounds, and that Mr. Smith has also this enviable distinction, that he and William Smith educated each a son for the ministry.

William Huston, eldest son of Margery Cunningham, and nephew of the two senior elders, was born east of the mountains, A.D. 1751, and died Sept. 6, 1827, aged seventy-six years. He came to the West before he was sixteen years old, and with his rifle by his side for protection against the Indians, cultivated the hills around what is now known as "Cochran's graveyard." His father, Capt. Joseph Huston, gave the land for it just before starting with Col. Crawford on his disastrous expedition against the Indians. Capt. Huston soon returned to die, and was the first to claim a resting-place within its sacred ground.

Frank Vance was born in Ireland about 1766, and died aged about eighty years.

Joseph Huston Cunningham, son of Barnett, was ordained in Tyrone in 1818. He served in Connellsville for a few years prior to 1851, when he returned to Tyrone, and was the same day unanimously re-elected and reinstalled. Having borne the office for forty years, on the 18th of April, 1858, "he slept with his fathers," and Barnett, his son, ruled in his stead.

Hugh Torrance, eldest son of James, was born in Cumberland County, Pa., June 29, 1779, and carried over the mountains on horseback while an infant. He was the father of Robert, who was ordained an elder at Connellsville, and of David, who served the church of Altona, Ill., in the same office. Having attained the age of seventy-three years, he died Sept. 7, 1848.

Alexander Johnston came from Ireland about 1807. His first connection with the church was at Cross Creek, Pa., under the ministry of Rev. Thomas Marquis. He came to Connellsville about the year 1811, and became a member of Tyrone Church, which then included Connellsville in its bounds. How long he was an elder here prior to 1831 there is no record to show, but at that time he was "set off" to the new organization. Of this he was the only elder for one year, and continued a "pillar" in the church until age and infirmity laid him aside. He died Sept. 3, 1864, aged about eighty-three years.

Cunningham Torrance, also son of James, was born June 7, 1789, ordained in Tyrone, 1833, removed to Missouri, 1847, and died soon after.

Nathaniel Hurst was a nephew of Dr. Power's son-in-law, and elder of that name, whose piety, intelligence, and practical wisdom adorned the office he so ably filled at Mount Pleasant. Mr. Hurst was ordained in Tyrone in 1833, and served until Feb. 29, 1869, when, having lived upon earth fifty-nine years, he was transferred from the church militant to the church triumphant.

John Stauffer was "selected" from the original members of Harmony Church by the committee of Presbytery appointed to complete that organization, and on the 27th day of June, 1849, was ordained and installed the only elder in that church. Two years later he removed to Tyrone, where he was elected and installed, and where he continued an elder until he departed this life, May 7, 1857, in the forty-seventh year of his age.

Joseph Gaut was ordained with Cunningham Torrance and Nathaniel Hurst, in 1833, by the first pastor of this church. For forty-three years he ruled in Tyrone without reproach, by the purity of his life commanding the respect of all, by the gentleness of his spirit securing the affection of his brethren, and most loved by those who knew him best. He was permitted to see two of his sons ordained and installed elders in this congregation. He died July 17, 1877, aged seventy-five years.

Barnett Cunningham, son of Joseph H., and grandson of Barnett, was ordained in 1843, and served the church with fidelity and acceptance until a few years since, when, in the providence of God, through bodily and mental affliction, he became unable to fulfill the duties of his office. He died July 3, 1877, in his seventy-second year.

Joseph Cunningham, descended by both father and mother from the old pioneer Cunningham-Torrance family, was a nephew of William Huston the elder. He was ordained with his cousin Barnett in 1845, and, like him, served in the church faithfully and long. He died April 8, 1877, in his seventy-seventh year.

William V. Hurst (nephew of Nathaniel) and Robert F. Gaut (son of Joseph) were ordained and installed Dec. 6, 1871. Mr. Gaut soon removed of this congregation without serving in the office.

Henry C. Boyd, Jonathan Merritt, and William Gaut were elected Dec. 4, 1875, and on the 19th of the same month Mr. Boyd and Mr. Gaut were ordained, and, with Mr. Merritt, who had been ordained in the Dawson Presbyterian Church at its organization in 1874, were installed ruling elders in Tyrone congregation.

T. Robb Deyarmon was elected elder, and installed in June, 1881. The present (1881) session is composed of William V. Hurst, Jonathan Merritt, William F. Gaut, and T. Robb Deyarmon.

The original territory of Tyrone congregation was large. Extending to Laurel Hill, Rehoboth, Sewickly, and Mount Pleasant, it embraced Connellsville and the "regions beyond," and at one time included several families on Indian Creek, fifteen miles away. Its first house of worship was for a long time the only meeting-house of any denomination within its wide bounds, where now stand nineteen Protestant Churches, not counting those in Connellsville or across the Youghiogheny River. Notwithstanding its wide territory, the membership of the church in its early years was not large. But when we know that the pioneers had no carriages, almost no wagons, and very few horses, that the young people of many families, male and female, habitually walked four, five, even six miles, generally barefoot in the summer, carrying their shoes and stockings in their hands till they came near the church, that Jacob's Creek had no bridges, and that pedestrians from the neighborhood of Ragantown were accustomed to come together to the creek and wait for those who rode to "ferry" them over; when we know that some of the families lived so remote that they could attend the few meetings at the church but irregularly, that the Cummings, the McCunes, and others on Indian Creek often started (as has been related by old Mr. Fleming, who remembers seeing them) before daylight in order to reach the church in time for the service, and remember that for so many years they had no pastor, and when they had a stated supply it was only for a brief period, and he always resided at a distance, it is a wonder that at the first call of the Presbytery of Redstone for statistics in 1808, Tyrone reported ninety members, and three years later one hundred and eight,—below very few churches in the Presbytery.

From this time no record is found of the membership, but the growth seems to have been steady. The pastor preached at Connellsville occasionally until the year 1831, when, at the request of the members residing in the village and vicinity, the Presbytery of Redstone authorized the organization of the Connellsville Church, and Alexander Johnston (elder), Margaret and N. C. Johnston, William and Mary Little (or Lytle), Isaac and Mary Taylor, Sarah Turner, Joseph and Elizabeth Rogers, Mary and Louisa Norton, Margaret Francis, Harriet Fuller, Mary Barnett, Samuel and Mary Finley, with Samuel and Elizabeth McCormick, were dismissed for that purpose.

After Mr. Johnson had served alone one year, Isaac Taylor, Joseph Rogers, and William Lytle, formerly members at Tyrone, with Joseph Paull and Samuel Russell, members at Laurel Hill, were added to the session. Thus Tyrone furnished nineteen of the twenty-two original members of the church at Connellsville, and four of the six elders who composed its first session. The vigor of this offshoot from Tyrone may be inferred from its subsequent history. After only fourteen years, in 1845, Indian Creek Church was organized, embracing some of the original members of the Connellsville Church, who came from Tyrone. Dr. Joseph Rogers was long its principal, perhaps its only, elder. Nineteen years later, in 1874, eighty-six members of Connellsville Church were included in a new organization at Dunbar. In its first session we find Tyrone represented by Isaac Taylor's eldest son. Indian Creek reports fifteen members, Dunbar one hundred and fifty, and Connellsville three hundred and sixty-three.

Perhaps the parent organization has never entirely overcome the withdrawal of so important a part of her life and strength, and the cession of so much of her most populous territory; but her order and vigor are manifested in the significant fact that in the last seventy-two years she has been only six without a pastor or stated supply.

In the year 1849, Tyrone furnished just one-half of the original members of Harmony Church, namely, Nathan, Marjory, Henry, and Margaret Smith, Eli and Susan Hendricks, and John Stauffer, who was for some time the only elder.

The youngest offspring of the parent congregation of Tyrone was the church at Dawson, which was organized in 1874, embracing in its membership twenty-four persons who had received certificates from Tyrone for the purpose. After about three years, however, the congregation disintegrated, and the members returned to the mother-church of Tyrone, which now (1881) numbers one hundred and sixty members.

THE GERMAN BAPTIST OR DUNKARD CHURCH OF TYRONE.

About the year 1799, Martin Stuckman and Ludwig Snyder came from Hagerstown, Md., to Fayette County, Pa., and settled in what was then, and is now, the township of Bullskin, where for more than ten years they held meetings for religious worship in private dwellings. About the year 1812 they removed to a new location in the present township of Lower Tyrone. There they held religious meetings in private houses for about five years; but after 1817 they were held in a stone school-house which was built in that year on land of Philip Lucas, the people living in that vicinity being principally of the German Baptist or Dunkard denomination. A church was soon after organized with Martin Stuckman as chief bishop, Ludwig Snyder as under-bishop. The first elder of the congregation was Frederick Blocher, whose son Samuel, and also his son-in-law, Isaac Shoemaker, were also elected elders. George Shoemaker, a brother of Isaac, was also a bishop or preacher. Following is a list of the elders of this church (all elders being also preachers) from that time to the present, viz.: Michael Myers, Jacob Murray, Eli Horner, Martin Coder, John Nicholson, John Murray, David Ober, Jacob Freed, Samuel Gallatin, Joseph Freed, Jacob

1 George Shoemaker, after preaching a number of years, became dissatisfied with the manner of worship in the Dunkard Church, and therupon broke off his connection and started a new sect, which (for lack of a better name) were called "Shoemakerites." He had a son named Jacob, who became quite distinguished as an abolitionist. He lived in Philadelphia, and died there in 1879.
Snyder, and John Gallatin. The present preacher to this congregation is Frederick Winner.

About the year 1840 the edifice known as the German Baptist meeting-house (a stone structure, plastered outside as well as inside) was built, and from that time became the house of worship of the Dunkard congregation, which had previously met in the stone school-house on the farm of Philip Lucas.

The congregation at one time numbered over one hundred members, but on account of divisions, deaths, and removals the number has become reduced to a total of from twenty to twenty-five members.

BETHEL CONGREGATION OF THE DISCIPLES,

This was organized in May, 1845, with thirty members. Jacob Newmyer, Peter Galley, and John Taylor were elected elders, and Nathan Reece and Jacob Newcomer deacons. A lot was donated by Jacob Newmyer from his farm, and on this lot the congregation erected a church edifice of stone, thirty by forty-five feet in dimensions. This was replaced in August, 1880, by a frame church, thirty-six by fifty feet, built on the same site, but an addition was made to the grounds for church and cemetery purposes.

Among those who have ministered to this congregation may be mentioned the Revs. James Dorsey, A. S. Hale, L. M. Streeter, H. B. Carleton, M. L. Streeter, J. D. Benedict, J. W. Kemp, Charles C. Berry, J. Grigsby, and L. C. McClane, the present pastor. The congregation now numbers one hundred and twenty. A Sabbath-school in connection with it contains thirty-five scholars, under William B. Chain as superintendent.

BRYAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

This church was organized in 1856 with about eighty members. A house of worship was erected, at a cost of about nine hundred dollars, on the property of James Bryan. The first pastor was the Rev. Sylvester Burt. Among his successors in the pulpit of this church there have been the Revs. — McAlier, W. A. Steward, — Moffatt, — Appleton, J. Mansell, — Taylor, — Eaton, and S. Lane, the present pastor. The church is now in a flourishing condition, with about forty members. It is out of debt, and its house of worship is in good repair. It has a Sabbath-school of seventy-five scholars, with Irvin Cotton as superintendent.

SCHOOLS.

It is not known precisely when or where the first school was taught in Tyrone. One of the earliest school-houses was a log building erected more than seventy-five years ago in the present township of Lower Tyrone, on a site embraced in the farm of Samuel Cochran. Among those who attended the schools in that house were the children of the families of Cunningham, Torrance, Newcomer, Cochran, Ross, Galley, Lyttle, Gallatin, and McDonald. The first teacher was an Irishman named Craig. His ordinary modes of punishment were by the “dunce-block,” fool’s cap, and leather spectacles, but in many cases he used the heavy ruler with great severity, if not brutality. So say some of his yet surviving pupils. Besides this school there were others taught near Jacob’s Creek, at Overholt’s, and on the Quay farm, near the bottoms on the Youghiogheny. Mr. Henry Galley recollects that the stone school-house on land of Philip Lucas was built in or about 1817.

Under the operation of the public school law of 1834, the first school directors (appointed by the court in January, 1835) for Tyrone were Jacob Newmyer and William Espey. The township was reported to the county treasurer as having accepted the provisions of the law Jan. 3, 1838. The first appportionment of money to the township under that law was from the State, $647.27; from the county, $129.57.

Prior to the division of old Tyrone, the township contained nine districts (which have been very little changed since), as follows:

In the extreme western end, the Quay District extends entirely across the township from the Youghiogheny to Jacob’s Creek. The school-house is near the centre of it.

East of and adjoining the Quay District are the Cunningham and Gaut Districts, which join near the centre of the township. The former lies on the Youghiogheny River, and extends up that stream nearly to the borough of Dawson. The Gaut District lies on Jacob’s Creek.

The Cochran District borders on the river for a short distance, embracing the borough of Dawson, and extends northeasterly to include a part of Hickman’s Run. Its northern boundary is nearly all on the Gaut District.

The Taylor District lies in the bend of the river above the Cochran District, and embraces the mouth of Hickman’s Run. All the districts above named lie wholly in the present township of Lower Tyrone, as do also a part of each of the three next mentioned.

The Strickler District lies on the river next above the Taylor District, and extends easterly to the east line of Upper Tyrone.

The Ridge District lies north of the Strickler, and extends from the east line of Upper Tyrone westward to the Cochran District.

The Washington District lies along Jacob’s Creek, and extends south to the Ridge District, east to the east line of Upper Tyrone, and west to the Gaut District.

The Walnut Hill District embraces the northwestern corner of Upper Tyrone, extending from the township line on the east to Jacob’s Creek on the northwest, and joining Washington District on the south.

The report for the school year of 1880–81 shows in Upper Tyrone seven hundred and sixty pupils and seven teachers. Total expenditure for schools, 82452.99; valuation of school property, $86,000. The same report gives for Lower Tyrone four hundred and ten pupils and seven teachers. Total expenditure for school purposes, $14,254.44; valuation of school property, $80,000,

Dawson Borough.

The land forming the site of the borough of Dawson was included in the original tract, called "Prospect," which was warranted to John Smilie in 1786, but for eighty years after that time no attempt was made to centralize business and settlements at this place other than the erection of a steam saw-mill by two sons of John Smilie, Robert and John, who did something of a business there in sawing lumber for the construction of keel- and flat-boats for the transportation of iron, coal, and sand.

The Smilie farm, except the river bottom, was sold to Stewart Strickler. The bottom land was sold to George Dawson, who used it for purposes of cultivation. The Pittsburgh and Connelsville Railroad was located through the tract, and upon the opening of the line Dawson's Station was established at this point. A post-office was established at the same time.

The property passed, in the division of the Dawson estate, to Mrs. Alfred Howell, and in 1866 a town plat was laid out and surveyed by Martin Dickson for Mr. Howell. The brick building now known as the Ebbert House was built by Henry H. Galley in 1868. The first store was opened by Samuel Smouse.

For some reason the new town received the name of "Bloomington," and held it, without entirely superseding the railroad designation of Dawson's Station, until the incorporation of the borough, which was effected in 1872, upon a petition of certain freeholders presented to the court of Fayette County at the March term of that year. The court ordered the petition to be laid before the grand jury, which body reported the next day (March 7th) that after a full investigation of the case a majority of the said jury "do find that the conditions prescribed by the acts of the Assembly relating thereto have been complied with, and believe that it is expedient to grant the prayer of the petitioners."

The report of the grand jury was confirmed on the 8th of June, 1872, and the court decreed "that the said town at Dawson's Station be incorporated into a borough in conformity with the prayer of the petitioners; that the corporate style and title thereof shall be the borough of Dawson," giving the boundaries in detail. It was further provided that the first election should be held at the school-house in the said borough on the 31st day of August, 1872. At the time designated the following-named officers were elected, viz.: Justices of the Peace, William Lent, M. McDonald; Burgess, Alexander B. Luce; Assessors, W. W. Luce; School Directors, Joseph Newmyer, James Mosser, William Luce, Jacob Oglevees, Frank Snyder, Henry Newmyer; Council, Joseph Newmyer, Frank Snyder, Daniel Wurtz, James Fairfield, John McGill, Isaac Cochran; Auditor, John Orbim.

The list of succeeding borough officers to the year 1881 is as follows:

CHURCHES.

THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH AT DAWSON.

The organization of this church was effected about 1870, and in 1872 the present church edifice of the congregation was erected and dedicated, the dedication sermon being preached by the Rev. Charles Smith.

From the organization of the church to the present time it has been served by the following named preachers, viz.: the Revs. Garrett Wakefield, Mitchell, Stewart, Taylor, Emerson, Reynolds, Appleton, Moffatt, Eaton, Stafford, Storr, and S. Lane, the present pastor.

The church has now (1881) a membership of sixty-five, and is one of four charges under the pastor. Bryan Church is in the connection, and Pleasant Grove, near Layton Station, which has a membership of thirty, is also within this charge.

Presbyterian Church at Dawson.

In 1874 a Presbyterian Church was formed and organized in the borough of Dawson, with forty-two members, among whom were the following named persons, who joined on certificates from the old Tyrone Church, viz.: Solomon Baker, M. E. Baker, Lewis Huston, Rebecca Huston, Rachel Suverin, Milton Jenkins, Susan Jenkins, Margaret Newmyer, Kate Newmyer, Mary Stauffer, Jonathan Merritt, Mary M. Merritt, William Lint, Mary J. Lint, Andrew McElhaney, Anna McElhaney, Emma McElhaney, Mary Shoffer, A. C. McCune, Nora McCune, Mordecai McDonald, Jane McDonald, Parthenia Patterson, and Ellen Keppe. Jonathan Merritt, William Lint, and Solomon Baker were elected ruling elders. The Rev. Thomas S. Park became their pastor, and remained as long as the church was continued. No church edifice was erected, and after about three years the church organization was dissolved, and the congregation returned to the mother-church of Tyrone, under the pastoral care of the Rev. J. H. Stevenson.

The Baptist Church at Dawson.

This church was organized in 1874, under charge of the Rev. William Ellis. Services were at first held in the school-house. A church edifice was commenced in June of the same year, but was not completed till November, 1878. At the dedication, delegates were present from the Baptist Churches of Flatwood, Connellsville, Pennsville, Scottsdale, and Uniontown. The dedication sermon was preached by the Rev. R. C. Morgan.

Prior to the dedication of the church the pulpit was supplied, in 1875, by the Rev. W. R. Patton, and in 1876 by the Rev. Robert Miller. The Rev. O. B. Stanger was called to the pastorate for one year, beginning Oct. 13, 1878, but resigned April 6, 1879. From that time the pulpit was occasionally supplied by the Rev. R. C. Morgan and others for about two years, until May, 1881, when the Rev. Amos Hutton was called to the pastoral charge. The church now contains about fifty members, and has in connection with it a Sabbath-school of seventy pupils.

Societies and Orders.

It has at present sixty-five members. The officers for 1881 are as follows: T. Robb Deyarmon, P. G.; Henry Newmyer, N. G.; Henry Thrasher, V. G.; Henry Malliston, Sec.; John Coder, Treas.

Hodenausnee Tribe, No. 164, I. O. of R. M., was organized in the 17th Sun of the Cold Moon, G. S. D. 351, to bear date 29th Sun of the Hunting Moon, G. D. 380. The charter members of this tribe were John Coder, Solomon Baker, John C. Knight, John R. Dunham, Jesse A. Ogley, Charles Cherrey, William Harberger, Frank Snyder, Alexander Davenport, William Randolph, Jasper N. Colbert, George McBurney, David Randolph, Isaac Colbert, Daniel Wirt, John Hartwick, Lutellus Cochran, William L. Luce, and Edward E. Strickler. Meetings are held in Odd-Fellows' Hall.

The lodge has at present seventy-eight members.

The public hall in Dawson was erected by the Odd-Fellows. In this hall the meetings of the several societies are held.

The borough now contains two churches (Methodist and Baptist), a post-office, railroad depot, express-and telegraph-offices, school-house, Odd-Fellows' Hall, steam grist-mill, spoke-factory, saddler-shop, shoe-shop, tin-shop, a silversmith-shop, three hotels, five stores, a drug-store, and three physicians, viz.: Dr. J. C. Henry, Dr. G. M. Campbell, and Dr. H. Dravo. The population of the borough by the United States census of 1880 was four hundred and fifty-three.

JIMTOWN.

This mining settlement has grown up from the very extensive coke-works in the vicinity, and is entirely made up of the homes of miners. It is reported in the census of 1880 as having a population of six hundred and fifty-three.

COKE MANUFACTURE.

From Broad Ford north to the county line is an almost continuous succession of coke-works, extending along the Mount Pleasant Branch Railroad, half of which in number (and more than half in number of ovens) are owned by the H. C. Frick Coke Company. The Henry Clay Works, at Broad Ford, were commenced by the H. C. Frick Company about 1872, and have been in operation since that time. At this place the company has one hundred ovens in blast, and eighteen new tenements have been recently erected for occupation by the laborers employed about the works. The coal taken from this mine is hauled up a slope; all the others farther up the road are worked in drifts. The H. C. Frick mines are next north from the Henry Clay. They were started about 1870, and have now one hundred and six ovens, employing eighty-five men.

The Morgan Coke-Works were commenced about 1866 by Sidney and James Morgan and A. J. Crossland, and about 1878 were sold to the H. C. Frick Coke Company, who now have in use at this place one hundred and sixty-four ovens and employ one hundred and twenty men. They have here ten blocks of tenement-houses and shops, in which they build all the cars, wagons, and wheelbarrows used in the extensive operations carried on along this line of railway.

The "White" mines, late the "Hutchinson Globe," were started by A. C. Hutchinson & Brother, and came into possession of the H. C. Frick Coke Company in January, 1881. They have one hundred and forty-eight ovens now in operation at this place.

The Foundry Mines and Coke-Works were put in operation about 1869 by Strickler & Lane, commencing with a few ovens and gradually increasing the number. They now comprise seventy-four ovens, owned and operated by the H. C. Frick Coke Company, who employ here a force of fifty men.

The Eagle Mines were put in operation by Markle, Sherrick & Co., about 1868. A few years later they sold to the H. C. Frick Coke Company, who have now in operation eighty ovens and employ fifty-five men.

The Summit Mines were opened by Cochran & Keister, in 1873. In February, 1889, they were sold to the H. C. Frick Coke Company. There are now here in operation one hundred and forty-two ovens, and ninety men are employed. Forty-four tenements are near the mines. The company own one thousand acres of land on the south side of the Mount Pleasant Branch, and four hundred acres on the north side.

The Franklin Mines, owned by B. F. Keister & Co., are next above the "Summit." Here are in operation one hundred and thirty ovens.

The Tip-Top Coke-Works were started by Charles Armstrong about eight years ago. In 1879 they were sold to the H. C. Frick Coke Company, the present owners. Fifty-six ovens are in operation at the Tip-Top.

The Clinton Mines are next above the Tip-Top, and owned by James Cochran & Co. Forty-four ovens are in active operation at these mines, and five cars are daily loaded with coke from them.

The Valley Mines were started by Wilson, Boyle & Playford, about 1870. At the time of sale to the H. C. Frick Coke Company, in April, 1880, they had one hundred ovens in operation. They have since been increased to one hundred and fifty-two, the number in operation at the present time.

The Hope Mines and Coke-Works, called until recently the Sherrick Mines, are situated about half a mile east of Everson Station, and also east of both the Southwest Pennsylvania and Mount Pleasant Branch Railroads. They were put in operation about ten years ago by Jacob Sherrick, and were sold by him in March, 1881, to the present proprietor, Joseph R. Stauffer, for about eighteen thousand dollars. The property embraces about thirty-one and a half acres of coal as yet untouched (as shown by a survey made in the spring of 1881). The proprietor has in operation at this place twenty ovens, with a daily capacity of thirty tons of coke. He has here all the necessary buildings and appliances for the business,—tank, office, and dwellings for the employés. The works are so favorably situated with regard to drainage that no pumping is required. The number of persons employed by the works is fifteen.

The Charlotte Furnace Company's Coke-Works embrace sixty ovens, located on the Fayette County side of Jacob's Creek, directly opposite their furnace and rolling-mill at Scottsdale, Westmoreland County. The Keifer Coke-Works were started by W. A. Keifer, who built five ovens here in 1871, and shipped the first coke over the Mount Pleasant Branch Railroad. He subsequently built a large number of ovens additional to the first "plant," but all of them were afterwards demolished and about forty new ones erected, which are now in operation, producing coke for the use of the Charlotte Furnace Company, and operated by W. A. Keifer. The coal is mined by drift, and about sixty tons of coke produced per day. The works give employment to thirty men. They are located on a line with those of the Charlotte Furnace Company, and are in fact a part of these works.

The Fountain Coke-Works are located next above the Keifer Works. They have fifty ovens, producing about seventy tons of coke per day, and are owned and operated by J. D. Boyle.

The Dexter Mines and Coke-Works, owned and operated by J. R. Stauffer & Co., are located on the Stauffer farm, and are the next coke-works above the "Fountain," on the Mount Pleasant Railroad.

The property connected with the works embraces one hundred acres, of which about thirty acres has been exhausted, leaving about seventy acres of coal untouched. The works were built in 1873 by the brothers Stauffer. The coal is taken out by drifting. Forty ovens are in operation here, producing sixty-five tons of coke daily. They are well equipped, having a store-house twenty by thirty-six feet in dimensions, two tanks, the necessary sidings, and eight dwelling-houses for operatives. The works have $25,000 invested in them, exclusive of the land, for which no outlay was required, as it belonged to the Stauffer homestead property. A view of the Dexter Coke-Works, as also of the flouring-mills of J. R. & A. Stauffer, is given herewith.

The Painter Coke-Works are next above the Dexter, on the Mount Pleasant Railroad. These works were put in operation in 1873 by Col. Israel Painter, the location being upon land which he had owned for some time previously. Col. Painter built seventy ovens, and carried on the works till 1878, when he sold the work to McClure & Co., of Pittsburgh, the present proprietors, who added one hundred and fifty-eight ovens, making a total of two hundred and twenty-eight, the number now in operation at these works. The coal is mined by drift, and is of excellent quality for coking.

The Diamond Coke-Works, the most northerly of the works in Fayette County, on the line of the Mount Pleasant Railroad, were started in 1874 by Louison & Stauf, who then erected twenty-five ovens, and manufactured coke here until 1879, when they sold the works to the Diamond Coke Company. That company built twenty additional ovens, and carried on the works until 1880, when they sold the property to McClure & Co., who built additional ovens, bringing the whole number to sixty-six, as at present. About eight car-loads of coke are produced here daily. Both the "Diamond" and the "Painter's" Works (owned by the same proprietors) are under the superintendence of J. H. Culler.

The mines and coke-works above mentioned are all located in Upper Tyrone township, except the "Henry Clay" Mines, which are in Connellsville.

The H. C. Frick Coke Company own eleven miles of railroad and twenty-nine miles of pit-track, and keep in operation two hundred and nineteen cars, owned by themselves. The company have in their possession about twelve square miles of coal lands and surface in this section, and operate several hundred more, besides buying the coke produced by about two hundred and fifty other ovens. They have stores for supplying their miners at Broad Ford, Morgan, and the Summit, and blocks of tenement-houses for miners' occupancy at all their mines. They are now (June, 1881) laying water-pipes for the purpose of furnishing their works with an unlimited supply of water.

The Spurgeon (formerly Spring Grove) Mines and coke-ovens in connection, are located on Hickman Run, near its mouth. They were commenced in 1864 by Cochran & Keister, their present owners, who have one hundred ovens in operation, and ship ten car-loads of coke daily. They have a store and tenement-houses for their workingmen and laborers at the mines.

The Jintown Coke-Works (next above the Spurgeon) are owned by J. M. Schoonmaker. Three hundred and three ovens are now in operation here, and thirty car-loads of coke are shipped daily. A store and tenement-houses for the operatives are owned by the proprietors of these works. J. R. Laughrey is superintendent of these, as well as of the Sterling Mines and Coke-Works, located on the Youghiogheny River.

Next above Jintown are the "Cora Coke-Works," erected in 1880 by Jacob Newmyer & Sons, comprising forty-two ovens in active operation.

For the accommodation of the above-mentioned works on Hickman Run there has been built a railroad, called the Hickman Run Branch, connecting with the main track of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad near the mouth of the run.

Along the Youghiogheny River above Dawson, on the line of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, are a number of mines and coke-works. The first of these (passing from Dawson towards Broad Ford) is the Fayette Coke-Works, now owned by James Cochran, the size required, when the proper quantity of plastic clay is added, making the whole mass into a pasty substance. It is taken out of the pan and moulded and dried on a hot floor made for that purpose, then the brick are set in kilns and burned about five days and nights. They are then ready for the market. It is also necessary in making some of these brick to calcine a part of the clay before using it. The business is carried on extensively by Joseph Soisson and Worth Kilpatrick, a view of whose works is shown in this book. They are located about two miles from Connellsville, at Moyer Station, on the Southwestern Pennsylvania Railroad. These gentlemen are thoroughly posted in their business, and have been obliged to increase the capacity of their works several times during the last three years. They send some of their bricks six and seven hundred miles from the place of manufacture, which is an indication that they are becoming widely known as thorough, progressive, and responsible business men.

The fire-brick works of J. M. & L. Cochran are on the line of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, between Dawson and Layton Station. They have a capacity for manufacturing ten thousand bricks per day. They are used chiefly in the construction of coke-ovens.

RAILROADS.

The main line of the Pittsburgh and Connellsville Railroad (now under lease to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company) runs the entire length of the south boundary line of the two townships on the north bank of the Youghiogheny River. It has stations at Broad Ford, Dawson, Laurel Run, and Miltenberger. Branches connect with this main line; one, the Hickman Run, connects at a short distance above Dawson, and is entirely used for the transportation of coke from the coke-works in that region. The other is the Mount Pleasant Branch, which connects at Broad Ford and extends to Mount Pleasant. This branch is used largely for coke, but also has a heavy passenger traffic. Along the entire line of this road are located coke-ovens, and the amount of coke shipped daily is immense. The stations in Upper Tyrone are Broad Ford, Morgan, Tinstman's, Fountain, Overton, and Everson, at the iron bridge.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

JAMES COCHRAN.

James Cochran, of Dawson Station, is one of the most remarkable of the self-made men of Fayette County, a man of clear understanding, of great energy and indomitable will, but of a generous nature, tender-hearted withal, and, in short, a fine example of robust, hearty manhood. He is in both lines of Scotch-Irish extraction. Both his paternal grandfather, Samuel Cochran, and his maternal one, Ezekiel Sample, came to America from the north of Ireland. The latter settled in Westmoreland County, and died there. The former settled near Lancaster, Pa., and moved into Fayette County when Isaac, the father of our James, was quite young. About 1815 Isaac Cochran married, in Westmoreland County, Rosanna, daughter of Ezekiel Sample, before named, and took her to his home in Tyrone township, where he led the life of a farmer, and where his family of five sons, of whom James was the fourth in number, and four daughters were all born, James being born Jan. 15, 1823.

James attended in childhood the subscription schools till he was about thirteen years of age, when his mother died, and he then left home and went out to shift for himself, to try "the battle of life" in the school of experience, which Mr. Cochran emphatically declares to be "the best school that anybody ever attended." At the outset he engaged himself to a farmer to help him "put in seeding,"—that is, to sow his fields; and for pay the farmer gave him "an old, worn-out, long-tailed blue coat," which the boy's pride would not allow him to wear. So he went home across the fields in shame and anger. He would work for that farmer no more. He next bought, on credit, some red flannel for a "wa'mus,"—i.e., a sort of buttonless wrapper,—and got, also on credit, from Sample Cochran, his brother, lumber for a flat-bottomed boat large enough to carry a hundred tons of sand, built the boat, and sold one-half of it to Sample to pay the lumber bill, and then went into partnership with him in washing sand at their uncle's bank near the present village of Dawson, preparatory to carrying it to the glass-makers at Pittsburgh. For this load they got two dollars a ton; and they sold the boat, and had as the result about a hundred dollars apiece in pocket, which sum, Mr. Cochran says, was more of a fortune in his young mind then than are now to him all his present possessions. They continued boating, carrying sand, glass-stone, cinders, etc., mostly to Pittsburgh, for several years. Thereafter he and his brother and uncle, in the summer of 1842, feeling quite rich, leased two coke-ovens at what is now styled Fayette Works, and made two boat-loads of twenty-four-hour coke, having themselves previously made two boats, which they loaded. A boat held 6000 bushels. With their loaded craft they left for Cincinnati, Ohio, April 1, 1843, without money, and with no shelter over their heads, and with no place to lie for rest except on the coke. At Pittsburgh they bought, on credit, provisions, for which they paid on their return. Below Pittsburgh the coke got on fire (from a fire built for cooking purposes upon a quantity of sand laid over the coke), and they found that the more water they poured upon it the lower the fire went, and they were obliged to dig down and get out the embers. At this period little was known about the "character" of coke and how best to handle it. Having gathered lumber along down the river, when they arrived at Wheeling they made a shanty over the coke and so secured shelter. Arrived at Cincinnati, they were obliged to lie there for several days before they could dispose of the coke, and allow Miles Greenwood, a foundryman, to try it. He used the same quantity which he had before used of the Monongahela coke, and finding theirs much better than the latter kind, bought both loads, paying seven cents a bushel, half down, and giving for the other half his notes, which he paid before maturity. This was the first of the Connellsville coke ever sold for money.

Mr. Cochran has ever since been engaged in manufacturing coke. He is the principal of the firm of Cochran & Keister, owning the Spring Grove Works, of one hundred ovens, on the old Huston farm, at Dawson. He is also owner of a large interest in the Fayette Works (one hundred ovens), which he has conducted since 1806, and is interested in the Jackson Mines, in Tyrone township, his son, John T., being in charge of the same. He is concerned in two works in Upper Tyrone, the Franklin Mines and the Clinton Mines, both of coking coal. In company with John H. and George R. Shoemaker, Solomon Keister, N. A. Rist, and his three sons, John, Philip G., and H. T. Cochran, he owns in Dunbar township over twelve hundred acres of bituminous coal lands, lying mainly on the line of the new Pittsburgh and Lake Erie Railroad, now in process of building.

As an item of interest in the history of navigation on the Youghiogheny River, it should not be overlooked that during a portion of his life, extending from about 1846 forward for twenty-five years or so, or as long as boating was done on that stream, Mr. Cochran safely piloted boats down its dangerous channel, on occasion, three or four times a year. This was a work which but very few men had sufficient skill to do.

Feb. 24, 1848, Mr. Cochran married Miss Clarissa Huston, daughter of Joseph and Mary Ann Hazen Huston, of Tyrone township, by whom he has had eleven children, seven of whom, six sons and one daughter, are living.

STEWART STRICKLER.

Stewart Strickler, the only son of Jacob Strickler, a farmer of Fayette County, was born at New Salem, near Unisontown, Feb. 17, 1812, and received a common-school education. When he was sixteen years old his mother died, and his father breaking up housekeeping, Stewart and his eight sisters, all younger than himself, were scattered among their relatives. In the spring of 1830, Stewart hired out to John Smiley, a farmer, at six dollars per month, and stayed with him till Christmas, after which he began peddling chickens and eggs, which he carried down along the Youghiogheny River in a very simply-constructed boat made by himself of boards, giving away the boat when he had sold his merchandise, and walking back, making such a trip every few weeks during the year 1831. Early in 1832 he began working about for different persons at making rails and washing sand (which was taken to Pittsburgh to the glass-makers).

In the latter part of 1832 Mr. Jacob Strickler got his children together again, Stewart with the rest joining him on the old place, known as the Jimtown farm, where he (Stewart) remained till 1835, when he married Mary Newcomer, of Tyrone township, and bought a piece of land from his father at Jimtown, and built thereon a house and barn and commenced farming. In 1837 the great financial panic came, and found Stewart badly in debt for his farm (he says times were then so hard that he had to pay fifty cents in "shinplasters" to see a quarter in silver). He struggled on till about 1840, when times began to improve, but farming being poor business, he found it necessary to exercise his brain-power, and began to conjure up ways to enable him to pull through and get out of debt. Here let us remark that in an early day there had been an iron furnace at the mouth of Jacobs' Creek, known as Turnbull Furnace, but then long abandoned and in ruin. Near it was a huge pile of cinders, containing a great amount of iron unextracted from the ore. Mr. Strickler conceived the notion of taking the cinder to iron-works in Pittsburgh, bought it for fifty cents a ton, built a large flat-boat, on which he carried the cinder to the city, and there sold it for four dollars and a half a ton, and afterwards sold his boat, making something on it. This enterprise stimulated him to plot and plan still further, and early in 1842 he bought ten acres of coal land on the Youghiogheny River, at the point now called Sterling Coal-Works, built six ovens, and began making coke, which he shipped by flat-boats to Cincinnati, Ohio. He carried on this business successfully for several years. About the same time there were others engaged in the business, but they were not successful, and became discouraged and gave it up. About 1855 Mr. Strickler bought eighty acres of coal land, known as the John Taylor farm, and began improving it with the intent to carry on the coal business as before, but on a larger scale.

In 1857 the Pittsburgh and Connellsville Railroad was completed, and Mr. Strickler put into operation on his place eighty coke-ovens. At this time he built a side-track from his works to the main line of the railroad, for the purpose of shipping coke and coal to Graff, Bennett & Co., of Pittsburgh, keeping their furnace going from 1860 to 1864, with two thousand bushels per day. He then sold a third-interest in his business to the above-named firm for $85,000, a few months afterwards selling the balance to Shoenberger & Co. for $45,000.

Somewhere between 1835 and 1840 Mr. Strickler bought all of his father's old farm, paying $30 per acre. In the spring of 1864 he sold it to J. K. Ewing for $200 per acre, the latter afterwards selling it for over $400 an acre.

In 1867, Mr. Strickler removed with a portion of his family to Middle Tennessee, near the Cumberland Mountains. He is the father of eight children, two sons and six daughters, the eldest of whom, Mrs. Caroline Hill, died in March, 1879. His wife and the rest of his children are living. Three of the daughters reside in Tennessee. Two sons and two daughters live on the farm formerly owned by John Smiley, for whom and where Mr. Strickler worked in 1839, as above related. The children living in Fayette County are Mrs. Maria Boyd, Lyman, Dempsey, and Mrs. Martha Herbert. Those in Tennessee are Mrs. Harriet Ramsey, Mrs. Kate Thompson, whose husband is a physician, and Miss Deccie F. Strickler, the latter residing with her parents.

Mr. Strickler is now over seventy years of age, and notwithstanding his serious labors in life and many dangers encountered, from some of which he barely escaped with his life, he is in good health and in full possession of intellectual vigor. He is respected by his wide circle of acquaintance as a man of strict integrity and of nobility of heart. Not only can he look back upon a life well spent, triumphant over early and great difficulties, but he is also entitled to enjoy the reflection that through his excellent judgment, advice, and influence not a few persons in the region where he spent his most active days are also successful, enjoying, many of them, the blessings of wealth.
WASHINGTON TOWNSHIP.

WASHINGTON, occupying the northwestern corner of the county, is, with regard to territorial area, one of the smallest of Fayette's townships; but it is one of the largest with regard to population, if we include with it the boroughs of Belle Vernon and Fayette City, both of which lie within its boundaries. The population of the township proper, however, was but twelve hundred and fifty-seven by the census of 1880, while that of the two boroughs was by the same census two thousand and thirty-one, Belle Vernon having eleven hundred and sixty-four, and Fayette City eight hundred and sixty-seven inhabitants.

The boundaries of Washington township are the Westmoreland County line on the north, Jefferson township on the south, Jefferson and Perry on the east, and the Monongahela River on the west. The assessed valuation of the township in 1881 was $413,460, or a gain of $15,000 over the valuation of 1880.

Rich in agriculture, Washington has also valuable coal deposits, that await only the creation of railway transportation within the township borders to be made available. At present coal-mining is confined to the river district, where the mining and shipment of coal has been a profitable business for upwards of forty years. The only noticeable mill-stream in Washington is the Little Redstone, which empties into the Monongahela just above Fayette City.

Important by reason of his connection with the history of Washington township and Fayette County, and also with that of the nation, Col. Edward Cook deserves first mention in the chronicle of Washington's early settlement. He was born in Chambersburg in 1741, and in 1770 made his first journey west of the mountains in search of lands, for he was at that time the possessor of considerable means. He brought with him also a stock of goods. When he made his location, near the present line between Fayette and Westmoreland Counties, he built a log cabin near the present home of his grandson, John Cook, and in one corner of it opened a small store. The country was new then and stores were not easy to reach, so that when the opening of Cook's store became known among settlers within a radius of many miles they gladly gave to him their patronage. Cook kept also a house of entertainment, where such few travelers as happened that way might find rest and refreshment. Under the law he charged six and a half cents for a horse's feed, and twelve and a half cents for feeding a man. In 1772 he began the erection of a pretentious mansion, constructing it entirely of the limestone that was found in abundance on his land. In 1776 he moved his family into it, and there it still stands a substantial edifice. After Col. Cook's death, his son James occupied the mansion as his home, and now James' son, William E., lives in it.

Edward Cook was one of the most extensive of land-owners in Southwestern Pennsylvania. He had altogether about three thousand acres, located in Washington, Westmoreland, and Fayette Counties, and occupied now in part by the farms of Joseph Brown, John B. Cook, William E. Cook, Mrs. John Brown, Mr. Montgomery, the site of Fayette City, and numerous other tracts. The patent for the tract called "Mansion" was issued to Col. Cook, and described the tract as four hundred and two acres, situated in Fayette and Westmoreland Counties, surveyed in pursuance of a warrant issued to Col. Cook, Dec. 17, 1784. A patent for "Mill Site," on the forks of William Lynn's run, was issued in 1796. Col. Cook was a resident of the county from 1771 until his death, in 1812, and during that time achieved considerable public distinction. He was a member of the Provincial Congress convened in Carpenter's Hall, Philadelphia, June 18, 1776, that drafted the first declaration of independence presented to Congress, June 25, 1776 (see "Journal of Congress," vol. ii. p. 290); was a member of the State Constitutional Convention that convened Sept. 28, 1776; was the first commissioner of exchange, and appointed sub-lieutenant of Westmoreland County March 21, 1777. He was one of the founders of Rehoboth Church, a member of its first session, its first representative to the Redstone Presbytery, and the Presbytery's first representative to the General Assembly. Jan. 5, 1782, he was appointed lieutenant 1 of Westmoreland County, to succeed Col. Archibald Lochry (who had been captured and killed while on an Indian expedition). It was from this appointment that Col. Cook received his military title. He aided in fixing the boundaries of Fayette County, and was a member of the commission that located the county-seat. Nov. 21, 1786, he was appointed justice of the peace, with a jurisdiction that reached into Washington County. April 8, 1789, he was appointed president of the Court of Common Pleas and Quarter Sessions; was associate judge of Fayette County in 1791, and from 1796 to 1798 treasurer of Westmoreland County.

It will be seen that Col. Cook's public record was a remarkable one for that or any day, and in its brief chronicle tells in unmistakable terms that he must have been very high indeed in public esteem to have won such distinction. He was one of the foremost men of his time in southwestern Pennsylvania. His landed and other interests were extensive, and these he looked after closely despite the pressure upon his time by his official cares. He built a saw-mill and grist-mill on Cook's Run, laid out Freeport (afterwards Cookstown, and now Fayette City), and was largely engaged at his home-farm in distilling. He was conspicuous in the Whiskey Insurrection, and having been prominent in some of the meetings of the insurgents, his arrest was ordered, but in the mean time, before any action could be taken, he appeared (Nov. 6, 1794) before Thomas McKean, chief justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, and in presence of William Bradford, Attorney-General of the United States, voluntarily entered into recognition to the United States for his appearance before the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States at the next special session of the Circuit Court held for the district of Pennsylvania, "then and there to answer to such charges of treasonable and seditious practices and such other matters of misdeemeanor as shall be alleged against him in behalf of the United States, and that he will not deport that court without license." Having taken this bold and honorable course, he quietly awaited the result, which was simply that nothing was found against him, and he was not molested in person, but some cavalrmen belonging to the army that came out to quell the insurrection visited his home, and did considerable damage, nearly demolishing his distillery, knocking in the heads of the lever casks, and spilling a vast amount of whisky.

Col. Cook was one among Gen. Washington's personal friends, and on two occasions at least entertained Washington in the old stone mansion now the home of William E. Cook. On one of the occasions named Washington was journeying that way to visit his lands in Washington County, and stopped at Col. Cook's for a brief rest. Cook was at that time engaged in reviewing a body of militia near by, and knew nothing of the arrival of his distinguished guest. Word of the arrival was whispered to the men before it reached the colonel, and when he, observing the commotion, learned what was in the wind, he relaxed all discipline and set off unceremoniously for the house. The militiamen followed at the double-quick, and hurralling enthusiastically for Gen. Washington, brought him to the porch, and evoked from him in reply a good-natured, fatherly speech, which the soldiers cheered to the echo.

Col. Cook had but one son, James, who married Mary Bell. The colonel's yearning ambition was to become a grandfather, and when the news came to him that he had a grandson his joy knew no bounds. In the exuberance of his delight he waited upon his old friend, Joseph Downer, and insisted upon his drafting a will, in which all the Cook estate should be left to the grandson Edward, and it was only by persistent effort that Downer persuaded him from the project, and convinced him that as there might be more grandchildren such an act would be one of injustice.

Col. Cook died in the old stone mansion, Nov. 6, 1812, and his remains rest in Rehoboth churchyard. His widow survived him twenty-five years. She died in 1837, aged upwards of ninety. Col. Cook's son James had a family of six sons and one daughter. The daughter, Martha, lives now in West Newton. Of the sons, Edward, James, Joseph, and Michael are dead. John B. and William E. occupy portions of the homestead farm.

One of Col. Cook's early friends and neighbors was Andrew Lynn, who made his first settlement in southwestern Pennsylvania, on the Redstone, about 1761. He was driven away by the Indians, but returned not long afterwards to remain permanently. He bought land not only on the Redstone, but a tract below there, in what is now Washington township, and lived a while upon the last-mentioned tract. The Washington land, now owned and occupied by Denton Lynn, was sold to old Andrew by Thomas Pearce, and conveyed to him by deed dated Aug. 20, 1769. Thomas Pearce entered an application for the tract April 3, 1769. A warrant was issued to Pearce. An order of survey was issued to Andrew Lynn June 3, 1788, and a patent for one hundred and thirty acres granted March 1, 1790. The tract was called Sedgy Fort, from an Indian or prehistoric fort that stood on it.

This fort was located upon an elevation close to the present site of Denton Lynn's barn. There was a large space inclosed, having within it a spring and some Indian graves. Near at hand was a fine sugar-bush, whose near presence may have accounted for the location of the fort upon that site. The field was called, and is yet called, "Old Fort Field." Indian relics and skeletons have been frequently turned up from that field by Mr. Denton Lynn. In 1839 he came upon several skeletons, and upon investigation concluded that the bodies must have been buried two deep. Each body appeared to have been surrounded with earthenware dishes, composed of baked mussel-shells and clay. One of the skeletons proved to be that of a man fully eight feet in height. Some of the skeletons were so placed as to give the impression that the bodies had been interred in a sitting position. When Andrew Lynn came to the place (in 1774) the line of the old fort was marked by a growth of thick bushes and straggling stone heaps. Andrew Lynn,
Jr., son of the Andrew Lynn first named, inherited the lands to which he came with his father in his eighth year, or in 1774. He told the present Denton Lynn, his grandson, there was then no clearing on the tract. Being out in a field with Denton one day, Andrew, Jr., said to him, "Denton, in this field was built the first cabin put up on the Lynn farm." Denton replied, "Well, grandfather, it seems queer to me that, whoever the man was, he should have put up his house here upon low ground, while he could have chosen a dozen higher and better spots." "The reason was," remarked old Andrew, "that the man had only his wife to assist him in putting up the cabin, and his chief desire, therefore, was to get where trees were handy. That's why he selected a low spot." The first Andrew Lynn increased his original lands by the purchase of an adjoining tract that had been tomahawked by William Lynn,—not related to Andrew. The entire farm of four hundred and fifty acres came into the possession of Andrew Lynn, Jr., who lived upon it from 1774 until his death in 1855, at the age of eighty-nine. Three hundred and twenty of the four hundred and fifty acres are now owned by Denton Lynn.

Andrew Lynn, Jr., was a man of local note, and among other things was distinguished for having served as justice of the peace forty years. He built in 1790 a stone mansion, fashioned after the one built by Col. Edward Cook in 1772, but it did not turn out to be as durable an edifice as Cook's. The latter stands yet and serves its original purpose, while Lynn's, abandoned as a human habitation in 1886, is fast falling to ruin. Near the Lynn mansion stands a famous locust-tree, under whose wide-spreading branches Gen. Washington, Andrew Lynn, and Col. Edward Cook are said to have met and tarried for some time in social intercourse. The tree is reckoned to be at least one hundred and sixty years old. Its circumference near the ground is nearly twenty feet. Its lower branches, blown down some years ago, measured fully one hundred feet from tip to tip.

About 1788, Joseph Downer, a resident of Boston, Mass., moved westward in search of a location for trade, and finding it on the Monongahela River at Elizabethtown, opened a store there and sold goods until 1794, when he came to Washington township and bought a tract of land of Col. Edward Cook, situated on a fork of the stream now called Downer's Run. Here he set up a store near Col. Cook's. In 1799 he built a mill and began to make flour on the present Cooper mill-site, about a mile below the Col. Cook mansion. When the mill was fairly in operation he gave up his store business and devoted himself exclusively to milling. He had not been on the spot long before he concluded to move farther down the stream to Col. Cook's newly laid-out village of Freeport, and on the present Hamer mill-site erected a second grist-mill, and still below there put up a saw-mill, of which the ruins may yet be seen. The grist-mill he equipped with the machinery of the first mill, and moved his family into a house that he built in Freeport, on the site now occupied by the Roscoe Thirkield mansion. About 1820, Downer sold the abandoned mill on the Cooper place to John Roe, an Englishman, who agreed to fit it up as a cotton-factory, and upon his part Downer agreed to take an interest in the enterprise through his son. Samuel Roe made the start as agreed, but failing to make the payments to Downer as contracted was obliged to relinquish the property to the latter. Samuel Downer thereupon conducted the business for his father, but the work proving unprofitable was given up after a few years. Mr. Downer died in Cookstown in 1838. Further notice of Mr. Downer will be found in the history of Fayette City borough.

Mention of the Downer organ is called for, however, here. Mr. Downer possessed all his life a strong musical taste, as well as much mechanical genius. When he left Boston for the West he carried with him a crude impression of the mechanism of a pipe organ, intending when he reached his new home to construct one for his own use. Upon settling at Elizabethtown he selected a lot of black walnut timber and seasoned it thoroughly. During such odd hours as he could snatch from his business duties he spent his time in the construction of the organ, and at the end of about a year finished it. It measured ten feet in height and five feet across each side. Every part of it was composed of black walnut, even to the keys and pipes, of which latter there were three hundred and sixty-five. The face of it was handsomely ornamented with scroll-work, the which he fashioned with a pocket-knife. To all the country round about it was an object of curious interest, and from far and near people frequently came to see it and to hear Mr. Downer play upon it. It possessed an excellent tone and volume, and to play it was one of Downer's greatest delights.

The organ is still in the possession of Mr. Downer's daughter, Mrs. Thompson, of Fayette City, and although nearly a hundred years old is not only an ornament, but yet makes very good music. Mr. Downer constructed also for Col. Cook a small pipe-organ containing a chime of bells, now in the possession of Eliphalet Downer, of Monongahela City. His art ran also to painting, and as achievements in that direction he painted his own portrait from a looking-glass reflection, and executed also what were called most excellent portraits of Col. Cook and his wife.

Adjoining Andrew Lynn, Jr., on the river lived a colored man known as London Derry, who in company with Andrew Lynn and about sixty others went on a land-looking expedition to Marshall County, Va. They were attacked en route by a body of Indians, and compelled to seek safety in a flight which included the swimming of the Ohio. Lynn's escape was so narrow that he lost a portion of his scalp, while Derry saved himself by burrowing beneath the roots of a tree.

Michael Springer, likewise one of Andrew Lynn's near neighbors, was a German. He bought his land from the man who had tomahawked it, and gave in exchange a shot-gun and a hog.

Levi Stephens, of Bucks County, was a government surveyor, who in 1769 assisted in surveying Southwestern Pennsylvania. He was so well pleased with the land lying along the southern border of what is now Washington township that he made a purchase there of a large land tract, and there concluded to make his home. Although after that busily engaged on his land, he found opportunities to do considerable surveying from time to time as his services were called for. The compass used by Mr. Stephens is still in the possession of his descendants. His sons were four in number, and named Nathaniel, John, Levi, Jr., and Thomas. Of Nathaniel's sons Nathaniel, Jr., Levi, and Joshua are living. Of Levi, Jr.'s, sons the living are Jehu, Israel, Johnson, and James. David is the only living son of Thomas. The widow of Levi Stephens, Jr., now resides in Washington township, aged eighty-five years. Nathaniel, the eldest son of Levi Stephens, the surveyor, was a noted river trader. The Stephens were long-lived. Levi, the surveyor, died in 1808, aged sixty-four, two years after the death of his father, John, who lived to be ninety-one; Levi Stephens, Jr., was eighty-seven at his death in 1878; and Nathaniel eighty-seven when he died in 1869. All those named were buried in the cemetery at Little Redstone Methodist Episcopal Church.

Contemporaneous with Levi Stephens in Washington was John Reeves, who served as a colonel in the Revolution, as did also his father. John lived on the farm now occupied by John Stevens, upon which once stood a famous red oak that measured eleven feet in diameter.

John Brightwell, a Marylander, lived where J. B. Stephens now resides. Brightwell's wife was a brave-hearted woman, and although ninety-nine years old at her death was active and hearty to the last. During her early life in Washington she not only crossed the mountains once or twice to visit Eastern friends, but made a memorable horseback-trip to Cincinnati alone, and brought her niece with her on the return journey. Such an undertaking, involving a ride of about six hundred miles through a wild and unsettled country for a great part of the way, was no trifling task. Its accomplishment was something unusual for even a pioneer's wife. Along with the Stewarts, the early settlers in the Stephens neighborhood included the Piersols (one of whom captured the last bear seen in this section), William Nutt, Thomas Coon, Thomas Taggart, the Jeffries, Parkers, Peter Marston, and Jacob Harris. Robert Galloway, one of the early settlers on Dunkap's Creek, was also an early comer to Washington. He bought the mill-site originally owned by Col. Cook, and later by Mr. Kyle and Andrew Brown, and for years was known as the proprietor of Galloway's Mills. The Houseman place, adjoining Galloway's, was the home of John Patterson some little time before 1800. Just when he became a resident is not known, but it is remembered that Patterson was fond of telling how there was not, when he came, a clearing "big enough to lay the broad of his back on." Patterson built the stone house now on the Joseph Houseman place, and inscribed over the door "J. P. 1800," yet to be seen. He was a blacksmith by trade, and had a shop on his farm. For strength, endurance, and rapid work in the harvest-field he was noted. He worked hard and saved his money until he was looked upon as a wealthy man. In an evil hour he joined others in the glass-manufacturing business at Perryopolis, and lost all he had. In his old age he was very poor. Not only he but other well-to-do farmers in Washington were ruined by the disastrous results attendant upon the Perryopolis glass-works enterprise. William Nichols lived near Patterson, but nothing has been preserved to show who he was or what he did.

Joseph Patton was the owner of a large land tract over towards the Perry line, where his grandchildren now live. In 1780 Andrew Brown bought of Col. Edward Cook the place upon which his grandson, Andrew Brown, now lives. Brown bought also the adjoining mill-site, and carried on the mill some years, as well as a distillery near by. Mr. Brown's children were seven daughters and three sons. Of the latter only John lived to grow to manhood. He died on the old farm April 15, 1872, and there his widow still lives with her son Andrew.

In 1771, John Willson landed in Virginia from Ireland, and from Virginia in 1788 he removed to Washington township, Fayette Co., to occupy a two-hundred-acre tract bought for him by his sons Hugh and John, living respectively in Allegheny County and Perry township, where they had then been residing some time. The two hundred acres, lying on the line between Westmoreland and Fayette Counties, were bought for Willson from one Jones, and into the house Jones had put up Willson moved with his family. In 1804, Mr. Willson replaced the Jones cabin with the log house now standing on the place. Three sons came with him in 1788. They were James, Robert, and David. James died in Washington in 1827, Robert moved to Ohio, and David, inheriting the homestead, died there in 1863, at the age of ninety years, after a residence of seventy-five years on the farm. John, the father, died in 1807, aged eighty-two years. It is worthy of mention that three of his sons—Hugh, John, and Robert—saw service in the Revolution. Of the children of David, the living ones are John R., Mary J., and James M.

Allen Farquhar (a Quaker) came from Maryland about 1790, and located upon a farm of which his grandson, Robert Farquhar, now owns a portion.
With Allen Farquhar came his three married sons, Robert, William, and Samuel. Allen, the father, bought two hundred and nineteen acres of Levi Stephens, and divided the tract between his three sons. Robert, the only one to remain permanently in Washington, died in 1828. His brothers William and Samuel moved to Ohio, and died there. Robert had nine children, of whom three were sons,—Joseph, Robert, and William. Joseph died in his youth, Robert and William settled and died in Washington.

David Hough, one of the early millers in Fayette County, built a mill on the Little Redstone, but moved, after a brief time, to Jefferson, where he died. In 1801, John Hough bought one hundred and eight acres of Hieronimus Eckman for £220 18s. 9d. Two years before that Eckman bought the land for $100. The patent for the tract was granted in 1788 by the State to Josiah Kerr, who had previously built a saw-mill upon it and called it "Minoria." Martin Lutz settled about 1800 on Lutz's Run, near the Westmoreland County line. There he died. His six sons were named George, Martin, David, Henry, Barnet, and William. All but George and William are still living. John McKee, traveling westward in 1809, stopped on one of Col. Cook's farms, and remained there as a reenter. McKee was an ex-Revolutionary soldier, and boasted an honorable record of service. His son John, aged nearly ninety, is still a resident of Washington township. On the place occupied by J. B. Gould, near Belle Vernon, the Wiley family lived as early as 1806, and after them George Haselbaker, who lived in a log house on the bank of the river. Farther up was his brother Jacob, a shoemaker, and beyond Jacob was John Dinsmore. J. B. Gould, who was teaching school at Cookstown in 1828, bought the Wiley place that year, and since then has made it his home. Mr. Gould is now in his eighty-sixth year. In 1810 he came to Fayette County with his father, who settled then near the Red Lion, in Jefferson township, a noted tavern in its day, the fame of which penetrated even into far-off New England.

TOWNSHIP ORGANIZATION AND CIVIL LIST.

Upon the division of the county into townships, at the December session of the Court of Quarter Sessions in 1783, the court ordered the laying out of "a township beginning at the mouth of Spear's Run; thence by the line dividing the counties of Westmoreland and Fayette to the mouth of Jacob's Creek; thence by the river Youghiogini to the mouth of Washington Mill Run; thence up the same to the head of the south fork; thence by a line to be drawn to the head of a small branch of Crab-Apple Run, known by the name of Hardistus branch; thence down the same to Crab-Apple Run; thence down Crab-Apple Run to Redstone Creek; thence down said creek and Monongahela River to the place of beginning; to be known hereafter by the name of Washington township." March, 1839, the court created the township of Perry from portions of Tyrone, Franklin, and Washington. In June, 1840, Jefferson township and Cookstown borough were erected from Washington, and Belle Vernon in 1863, leaving to Washington the territory it now contains.

Imperfect records forbid the presentation of a complete civil list for Washington. Such as could be obtained are here given, viz.:

At the September sessions in 1785 a petition for a road from Col. Cook’s mill to his landing, and to the road to Cherry’s Mills, was granted, as was the petition for a road from Col. Cook’s to Thomas Fossett’s. A report of a road from the mouth of Little Redstone to James Rankin’s farm was made at the September sessions in 1795 by Thomas Patterson, James Finney, Francis Lewis, Chas. Chaftant, and Samuel Davis. The road began at the Monongahela River, a little below the mouth of the Little Redstone Creek, crossed the road leading from Col. Cook’s to Uniontown and the road from Col. Cook’s to Fossett’s, and at James Rankin’s intersected the road from Brownsville to the Broad Ford. September, 1790, a road from Barzillai Newbold’s to the forks of the Little Redstone was reported as viewed by William Goe, George Espy, William Elliott, Michael Shilling, and Moses Davison. In June, 1795, a road from the mouth of the Little Redstone to the mouth of Spear’s Run was viewed by William Cunningham, George Espy, Samuel Becket, Michael Shilling, John Seward, and Andrew Brown. The distance was reckoned at three miles and one quarter and sixty-nine perches.

LITTLE REDSTONE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

The only house of public worship in Washington township is the Little Redstone Methodist Episcopal Church, located at the forks of the road, just west of John Stevens’ residence. The neat and substantial brick edifice rears its modest front within a small but well-kept churchyard, where many of Washington’s pioneers have slept for many years. The Baptists built a log church at that point forty years or more ago, and maintained an organization and periodical worship for some time. The Methodists held occasional meetings in the Baptist meeting-house, as well as at the neighboring school-house and houses of members. The first Methodist meetings were held at the houses of Nathaniel Stephens, Robert Stephens, and Hugh Ford. The brick church was built in 1857, and dedicated by Rev. J. G. Sanson, presiding elder of the Redstone Circuit. At that time the preachers in charge were Revs. Griffin and McIntyre. Some of the earliest preachers after 1857 were Revs. Wakefield, Mansell, Johnson, Kendall, and Stewart. The present pastor is Rev. Josiah Mansell, who preaches at Little Redstone every Sunday. The membership is now (May, 1881) sixty-five. The class-leader is Albert Gaddis. The trustees are David Stephens, Jehu Luce, John Smith, and John Taggart. The superintendent of the Sunday-school is Jehu Luce.

COAL AND COAL-MINING.

The coal deposits in Washington are extensive and valuable, but lack of railway facilities forbids the development of the interest except along the river-front, where mining has been going forward for upwards of forty years.

In 1840, John Garr and Richard Knight opened a mine on the London Derry tract, above the Fremont Works, owned by the Clarks. The Clarks (Samuel being the first) began to mine at the latter place as early as 1847, and have mined there more or less ever since, although just now the works are idle.

Frazier & Frye, the largest operators on the river in Washington, have been engaged in mining at their present location since 1873, where coal was taken out.
for shipment down the river in flat-boats as early as 1834. Frazer & Frye bought, in 1873, a tract of two hundred and twenty-three acres of coal, of which there are yet about one hundred and sixty acres undeveloped. They employ eighty-five men, pay out seven thousand dollars monthly for wages, etc., and take out seven thousand five hundred bushels of coal daily. They have on the river a front of one-third of a mile, running up from the mouth of the Little Redstone Creek. On their property they have a store and fourteen tenements.

J. H. Rutherford has been mining on the river since 1866. He is now operating in Washington township near Fayette City. He has forty acres of coal and a river-front of two hundred and fifty yards. Twenty-five to thirty men are employed, and three thousand bushels of coal mined daily.

The Connecticut Coal-Works, adjoining Rutherford's mines, have been idle since 1871. There are there about two hundred acres of coal, belonging to the Wheeler & Wilson Sewing-Machine Company. They came into possession in 1870, and after working there about a year abandoned the mines, and have suffered them to lie idle ever since. The property is as valuable as ever, but the company seems but little concerned about it.

BELLE VERNON BOROUGH.

On the east bank of the Monongahela, about forty miles above Pittsburgh, lies Belle Vernon borough, of which the population in June, 1881, was eleven hundred and sixty-four, its chief claim to distinction being the presence within its limits of the largest window-glass manufactory in America. The borough proper reaches to the Westmoreland County line, where it is joined by the borough of North Belle Vernon, located in the county last named, and possessing lumber-manufacturing and boat-building interests that contribute materially to the business prosperity of Belle Vernon. The business part of the town lies along the river bottom, at the foot of a stretch of hilly country, upon which many of the townspeople dwell, and from which may be obtained a fine prospect of river, hills, and plains. River packets plying between Pittsburgh and Geneva touch at Belle Vernon four times daily, and there is, moreover, railway communication with all points in the Pittsburgh, Virginia and Charleston Railroad passing along the western shore of the Monongahela. The town is an active business centre aside from its manufacturing enterprises, and maintains a private banking institution, founded by its present owners, S. F. Jones & Co., in 1872.

Belle Vernon was laid out by Noah Speer in 1813 upon a portion of a tract of land located by his father, Henry, in 1772, who with his wife came to the Monongahela in that year and bought considerable land, of which the greater portion, and his own home, were in what is now Westmoreland County. Henry Speer was killed by the kick of a horse in 1774. As originally platted the town contained three hundred and sixty lots, and covered a considerable area in Westmoreland County. The streets were Water, Main, Solomon, Wood, Market, First, Second, Third, and Fourth. The alleys were Long, Pleasant, Locust, Strawberry, and Flint.

The following advertisement appeared in the columns of the Reporter, published at Washington, Pa., of July 12, 1812:

"TOWN LOTS.

"For Sale in the Town of Bellevernon.—They are laid out in Fayette and Westmoreland Counties; each lot is 75 feet in front and 100 feet back. The streets are 2300 feet in length and 40 in breadth, cross streets 40 and one 50 feet in breadth. Bellevernon is situated on that beautiful river bottom on the east side of the Monongahela River, two miles below Freeport. The bank is high, and water sufficiently deep for loaded boats at low-water mark. Outlots on a level soil will shortly be prepared for sale. Ground will be given gratis for a school-house; also it is nearly centraile to the four counties, and the most agreeable situation near the centre. If a new county should be struck off and laid thereon, ground will be given gratis for a court- and market-house, and the sum of 2000 dollars for the purpose of erecting public buildings, besides a generous subscription is expected from the neighboring citizens. There is also for sale 100,000 elegant brick of the best quality. . . . It is expected a steam-mill will be built on one of said lots, and the foundation to be raised this fall above common high-water mark, so that the work may go on early next spring. Those who wish to have a share in said mill are desired to meet at James Hazlips, in Freeport, on Saturday, the 29th of July.

"NOAH SPEERS.

"June 22, 1812."

The first sale of lots was held April 18, 1814, and a premium of ten dollars was offered to the purchaser who should build the first house. Thomas Ward, a carpenter, of Westmoreland County, claimed the prize, having put up his house at the corner of Main and Second Streets. That, the first house erected in Belle Vernon, is now occupied by James Lewis. The second house was built by William Hornbeck at the corner of Main Street and Cherry Alley, and opened by him as a tavern. In the spring of 1816, Morris Corwin, a cooper, came from Westmoreland County, and built upon Main Street the third house in Belle Vernon. He constructed it of the lumber contained in the house that had been his home in Westmoreland County. Corwin set up a cooper's shop in a part of the house, and worked at his trade more or less until his death in 1855. His widow, hearty and active at the age of ninety-one, still lives in the old home.

When the Corwins became residents of Belle Vernon, the present business portion of the town was a fine sugar-camp. The village grew slowly, and during 1816 there were added but three families,—those of Nathaniel Everson, a cooper, Bud Gaskill, a gunsmith, and Joseph Billeter, a boat-builder. Before the year 1816, Billeter was living along the river below the town and building flat-boats. In 1816, Noah Speer built the present Brightwell House, and started his son Solomon there as a store-keeper. Solomon was the village trader for many years, until his removal to the far West. Belle Vernon was for a long time a dreary village, and did not rise above the dignity of a backwoods settlement. The sugar-camp was not cleared until some time after 1813, and then in its place Noah Speer planted the town to corn, so that Main Street was that season nothing but a path through a corn-field, with other thoroughfares equally primeval and contracted. The next season rye and timothy covered the town-site, and made the place look like a farm with a half-dozen or more houses dotting it here and there. The inhabitants told Noah Speer that it was all very well for him to make a grain-field of the village, but they must have a few streets, and threatened to throw down fences so that there might be free communication at least from one part of the town to another. Speer heeded not their complaints, but when he found his fences pulled down again and again, he made up his mind that it would be perhaps well enough to open a few streets.

Mr. Hornbeck, who kept a poor sort of tavern and dealt largely in whisky, set up a carding-machine, but gave it up after a brief experiment. Thomas Ward, the pioneer settler in Belle Vernon, moved to the far West eventually. Rebecca Lenhart, his dughter, living now in the village, is Belle Vernon’s oldest inhabitant,—that is, she has lived longest of any in the place. Next comes the widow of Morris Corwin, whose residence in the town covers a period of sixty-five years, or two years less than that of Mrs.
Lenhart.

There was no store but Solomon Speer’s for a long time. The second store was opened on Water Street by William Reeves. In 1816 the shoemaker for the village was Jacob Hazelbaker, who lived near J. B.
Gould’s present residence. His brother George, the hatter, lived in the house now the home of Rebecca Lenhart. William Rees established in 1839 the only tannery Belle Vernon ever had. It was owned successively by Alexander and John Bingham, John Mr. Drum sold it to George Lang, who uses it now as a storage-house.

In 1833, Solomon Speer and Morgan Gaskill built the first steamboat constructed at Belle Vernon.
They were sub-contractors under Capt. Samuel Walker, of Elizabeth, who received the contract from Capt. James May. Gen. Isaac Hammet drafted the plan of the boat at Elizabeth, and “laid it down” on the floor of a stable in Belle Vernon, in the rear of where Alexander Brown now lives.

A ferry was established by Henry Speer at the Belle Vernon crossing as early as 1772. The first ferryman of whom there is any knowledge was Andrew Bryce, the shoemaker. The first ferryman after the town was laid out was Joseph Billeter. The first horse-boat was built at Fredericktown and named the “Swan.” The second horse-boat was called the “Belle Vernon,” and received its motive-power from the chestnut horse Barney and the mousse-colored davey. They grew old in the service, and became well-known animals in that part of the country.
The “Belle Vernon” was succeeded by the steam ferry-boat “Polly South,” built and run by Capt.
James French, now a resident of Belle Vernon. The traffic was too small to make a steam ferry profitable, and as a consequence the present rope-ferry was put on. The ferry privilege at Belle Vernon has always been owned by a Speer, and is now in the hands of Noah Speer. Belle Vernon languished until the founding of the glass-manufacturing industry in the village by William Eberhard in 1836. At that time Solomon Speer and William Reeves were the village store-keepers, and John Wright the tavern-keeper. Solomon Speer was the first postmaster at Belle Vernon, but when the office was established cannot now be told, probably not before 1830. In 1836, Speer was succeeded by Uriah Ward; to him succeeded William Eberhard, Robert Boyle, L. R. Boyle, and James Davidson, the present incumbent, who was commissioned in 1869. Since 1875 Belle Vernon has been a money-order office.
Three mails are received and the same number dispatched daily.

The town enjoyed the luxury of a village newspaper for a brief season from April, 1874, to the spring of 1878, but the enterprise was at no time a profitable one. E. A. Hastings, who started the Belle Vernon Patriot in April, 1874, published it as an independent journal two years, and then gave up the undertaking as a losing one. J. T. McAlpin, thinking there might be profit in a local newspaper notwithstanding Hastings’ experience, started the Belle Vernon Courier. Its fate was about the same as that of the Patriot, and when it terminated its career, in 1878, then terminated also the newspaper history of Belle Vernon.

Belle Vernon’s first resident physician was Dr.
Horner, the date of whose coming cannot be fixed.
Succeeding him as village physicians were Drs. Kirk,
Hubbs, Johnson, Eagan, and Roberts. Dr. John S.
Van Voorhis came to the town to practice in 1847, and found here Dr. James Eagan and Dr. H. F.
Roberts. After 1847 the list of physicians in Belle Vernon included W. L. Creigh, Charles B. Chalfant, David Fetz, H. B. Rupp, S. A. Conklin, J. A. Hazlitt, and J. B. Eno. With the exception of a three-years’ absence, Dr. Van Voorhis has been in the constant practice of his profession at Belle Vernon from 1847 to the present time (1881). Besides him the borough physicians are J. A. Hazlitt and J. B. Enos.

The oldest merchant in Belle Vernon is Amon Bronson. Among other prominent village traders may be mentioned Schmertz & Co., J. L. Courtney, C. Reppert & Sons, J. B. Zeh, W. H. Brightwell, W.
C. Kittle, J. C. Cunningham, C. A. Patterson, H.

SCHOOLS.

For some time after Belle Vernon received its first inhabitants the village children were obliged to go a long distance to attend school. Morris Corwin thought something should be done to establish a school in the village, and announced that his wife would give up her kitchen to school uses if a teacher were provided. The proposition met with general favor, and in Mrs. Corwin's kitchen Belle Vernon's first school was started. The teacher was John Haselbaker, of Wash-

Belle Vernon missionary

In 1850, Rev. J. G. Sanborn, attached to the Redstone Methodist Episcopal Circuit, held church services in the village in the house now owned by W. P. Mackey, on Main Street. In 1841, on the 15th of October, Rev. J. H. Ebert, of the Redstone Circuit, organized a Methodist class in a house on Main Street, then belonging to Samuel Reeves, and now owned by James Davidson. The Redstone Circuit extended then from Elizabeth to Upper Middletown. Rev. Robert Hopkins (now of Pittsburgh) was the presiding elder, and Revs. J. H. Ebert, Warner Long, and Isaac N. Macabee the preachers in charge. The organizing members of the first class were Barnet Corwin, John Corwin, Eleanor Corwin, Sabina Gaskill, Morgan Gaskill, Catharine Ward, Jane Corwin, Rebecca Jacobs, and Grace McFall. The first and last named are still living in the vicinity of Belle Vernon. Rev. Mr. Ebert was the leader at first, and after him Robert Demain. Nov. 14, 1894, William Hutchinson joined the class and brought the aggregate membership up to ten. For the first Conference year the missionary contributions of the class amounted to seventy-three cents. In a little while the Belle Vernon class was joined by a class from the country, and both met in the village school-house. Jesse Fell was the leader for many years.

In 1841 a brick church was built at the lower end of Main Street, but the building proving short of the requirements as stipulated in the contract for its erection, the congregation gave it up to the contractor after meeting in it but a few times. In 1843 purchase was made of William Eberhard’s warehouse on Water Street, and in that building, remodeled, worship was held until 1859, when a framed edifice was built on Water Street, above the old site, at a cost of $1050. The church built in 1859 is now occupied by the Disciples.

In 1866, the congregation having grown in strength and wealth, measures were inaugurated looking to the erection of a costlier and more commodious house of worship. The result was the erection of the fine brick edifice now occupied. It cost $15,000, and will seat five hundred people. June 10, 1867, the cornerstone was laid in the presence of a numerous assembly by Mrs. Emma Weaver and the Misses Maggie, Emma, and Lydia Davidson. In that year the church society was first incorporated. The church property includes the church building and a parsonage. The entire indebtedness is but $1200. In 1850, Belle Vernon and Cookstown were made a separate circuit. In 1870,

The present school building was completed in 1873, and opened Jan. 12, 1874. The cost of the edifice was thirty thousand dollars. Coulter & Taggart were the contractors. It has two stories, with four rooms in the first and three in the second. In January, 1874, Professor J. W. Gibbons was the principal, and H. F. Bailey, Theodore J. Allen, and Miss Hattie Davidson, assistants. In April, 1881, Thomas S. Lackey was the principal, and C. E. Peck, Miss Sallie Williams, and Miss Kate Veech assistants.

The annual report for the school year ending June 7, 1880, furnishes details as follows touching the Belle Vernon schools:

| Whole number of schools | 4 |
| Number of male teachers | 2 |
| " female " | 2 |
| Average salaries of males per month | $45.00 |
| " females " | $30.00 |
| Number of male scholars | 194 |
| " female " | 138 |
| Average number attending school | 214 |
| Total tax levied for building and school purposes | $3119.64 |
| State appropriation | $48.10 |
| Receipts from taxes and all other sources except State appropriation | $3864.34 |
| Total receipts | $3224.44 |
Belle Vernon was constituted a charge by itself, from 1850 to 1860 the preachers in charge were Revs. J. F. Nesley, P. F. Jones, J. Burbidge, D. H. Rhodes, John Williams, J. Horner, J. C. Brown, George Crook. Belle Vernon Church now has membership of two hundred and forty, and four classes. The leaders are James Davidson, Amon Bronson (two classes), and C. Reppert. The pastor is Rev. A. P. Leonard, and the Sunday-school superintendent J. B. Zeh. The trustees are William Jones, James Davidson, Amon Bronson, N. Q. Speers, W. H. Brightwell, J. B. Zeh, John Reeves, D. P. Houseman, and Samuel Sutton.

FREE-WILL BAPTIST CHURCH.
April 22, 1843, a Free-Will Baptist Church was organized in the village school-house by Elders Joshua Newbold, S. G. Smutz, and David Smutz. The organizing members were Roger Jordan and wife, Isaac Free and wife, Mrs. Hannah Jordan, Eliza Baldwin, Daniel Springer, Rachel Springer, William Jacobs and wife, Lydia Springer, and Eliza Jordan. The first deacons were Isaac Free and Daniel Springer, and Daniel Springer the first superintendent of the Sunday-school. In September, 1844, a house of worship was built, and was dedicated by Rev. Mr. Newbold. It was used until 1872, and is now the residence of Mr. Morrison. In 1872 the house now in use was completed, and in April of that year was dedicated by Rev. James Coulter. Its cost was about $5000. Rev. Joshua Newbold, the first pastor, has had as successors in the pastorate Revs. Edward Jordan, David Smutz, Mr. Winton, J. W. Planet, Patrick Readon, Henry Cook, Mr. Blakey, James Springer, J. C. Nye, Wellington Joy, John Rogers, and B. H. Fish. Mr. Fish, the present pastor, returned in October, 1880, for his second term of service. The church membership was seventy in May, 1851. The deacons are John Hixenbaugh, J. W. Corwin, Christopher Amalong, James McCoy. The trustees are J. W. Corwin, Denton Lynn, and John Fell.

CHURCH OF CHRIST.
The Disciples at Belle Vernon met occasionally for worship as early as 1840, and engaging a preacher in conjunction with the brethren of Cookstown, had services once a fortnight. Of both churches the prominent members were J. B. Gould, of Belle Vernon, and James Hamer, of Cookstown. Hamer was about the only one who came regularly every other Sunday from Cookstown to church at Belle Vernon, and Gould the only one who attended regularly from the latter at the former place. In 1844 the Belle Vernon Disciples built a church, and in 1869 exchanged it to R. C. Schertz & Co., for the old Methodist Episcopal Church building on Water Street, then owned by Schertz & Co. The church built by the Disciples is now used by Schertz & Co. as an office. Mr. Poole was the first preacher, and J. B. Gould, James Hamer, and James Ferry the first elders. Mr. Poole is said to have been an eloquent man in the pulpit, but in ordinary life and conversation a far from impressive person. Asking a lady once what she thought of him, he received as a reply, "Well, when you are in the pulpit I often think you ought never to leave it, but when you are out I feel sure you ought never to enter it." There has been no regular preacher since 1876, the last one being Lyman Streator. The membership is now about forty. J. B. Gould, James Morgan, and Andrew Graham are the elders, and Charles Corwin, Thomas Fawcett, and James Haggerty the deacons.

BELLE VERNON PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.
About 1836, or before, Rehoboth Church appointed Michael Finley and William Bigham to visit Belle Vernon and inquire into the propriety of erecting a church in that village. They reported adversely, but recommended occasional preaching in the town and neighborhood. Rev. Robert Johnson preached at long intervals at the house of Abner Reeves, whose wife was a member of the Presbyterian Church. Later, Rev. N. H. Gillett held occasional services in the old Eberhard warehouse on Water Street.

For some years the only member of the Presbyterian Church in Belle Vernon was William Hasson. In April, 1848, Dr. Van Voorhis and wife were received into the church, and then Belle Vernon held three members of that faith. Revs. James R. Hughes and L. Y. Graham preached successively in the house now used by the Disciples and then by the Methodists, but no further effort was made to organize a church until the summer of 1868, when Rehoboth appointed J. B. Cook, E. F. Houseman, and L. M. Speer to "go on and inquire into the expediency of building a house in Belle Vernon." The committee made a report favoring the project, but to this day no action has been taken by Rehoboth upon the report, nor has the committee yet been discharged. In 1869 members of Rehoboth living in Belle Vernon and vicinity took steps towards building a church, and August 7th of that year laid the first stone upon a lot donated by L. M. Speer, who gave also liberally toward the work of building, and himself provided for the completion of the spire. Dec. 19, 1869, the church was dedicated free of debt. Jan. 2, 1870, a Sabbath-school was organized with Dr. J. S. Van Voorhis as superintendent. It was not, however, until 1873 that a church organization was formed.

In December of that year the Redstone Presbytery appointed Revs. G. M. Hair and Gailey and Elder Rankin to act as a committee to organize a church at Belle Vernon. The organization was accordingly effected December 11th, when the following were received on certificates from Rehoboth, to wit: D. B. Johnson, Sarah Johnson, James French and wife, Dr. J. S. Van Voorhis, E. S. Van Voorhis, L. M. Speer, F. L. Speer, C. G. Speer, S. F. Jones, S. E. Jones, R. J. Linton, C. S. Linton, Nancy Smock, Belle Vernon Glass-Factory.

The interest of glass-manufacture is a very important one at Belle Vernon. It was founded in 1834, and has continued since 1836 to be a conspicuous element in the industries of the town. R. C. Schmertz & Co., have been the manufacturers at this point since 1865, and have there to-day the largest window-glass manufacture in the world. In 1834, George Kendall, of Cookstown, and Thomas Patton, of Perrysville, began the erection of glass-works upon the site of Schmertz & Co.'s factory, but before they reached the point of manufacture failed and abandoned the enterprise. The buildings remained in an unfinished condition until 1836, when William Eberhard came into possession of the property, and promptly completing an eight-pot furnace engaged at once in the production of glass. At the first the largest rollers he made would flatten out a sheet measuring twenty-one by twenty-five. He made ninety-five rollers to a blower. His first glass-cutter was Griffith Wells, now residing at Fayette City. During Mr. Eberhard's possession he brought the works up to a capacity of sixteen pots. He appeared to be driving a flourishing business, and did doubtless for some years, but while pushing matters at what seemed a remarkably brisk rate, in 1853, he suddenly failed, to the great consternation of the community, and the loss of many who had looked upon the glass-works as upon a secure foundation. The failure was most disastrous, and from its effects the town was slow to recover. The property was not, however, suffered to remain idle very long. George A. Berry & Co. soon became the owners and speedily revived the old-time activity. In 1869 Berry bought out his partner, and having an immense stock of glass on hand at the outbreak of the rebellion, made his fortune.

In 1865, Berry disposed of his interests to the present owners, R. C. Schmertz & Co., who remodeled the works and added a ten-pot furnace. Their factory covers now about two acres, and has in connection with it a fine store and thirty-six tenements. Lime and sand were formerly obtained at Belle Vernon, but these materials are now brought from Layton and Mapleton. Coke is burned near the works. Two hundred and thirty hands are ordinarily employed, and upwards of $15,000 paid out monthly as wages. They have an aggregate of twenty-six pots, consume annually 300,000 bushels of coal, 80,000 bushels of coke, 2200 tons of sand, 650 tons of lime, 850 tons of soda, and 500 tons of other materials. One million feet of lumber are used yearly for the manufacture of boxes. Their freight tonnage each year is 1200 tons. The annual production of glass reaches about 80,000 boxes. Mr. Schmertz, the senior member of the firm, resides at Pittsburgh, but exercises a general supervision over the works at Belle Vernon, as well as over the firm's works at Columbus, Ohio. The managing and resident partner at Belle Vernon is Mr. R. J. Linton, who entered Mr. Schmertz's employ in 1855, and in a few years was admitted as a partner.

Belle Vernon Saw- and Planing-Mill Company (Limited).

Just over the borough line in Westmoreland County this company represents a valuable industry. The officers are Amon Bronson, president; William Jones, vice-president; A. A. Taggart, manager; S. F. Jones, treasurer; J. S. Jones, secretary. The main building is one hundred by forty feet. It contains a 66-inch circular saw, capable of sawing 30,000 feet of lumber in ten hours. Adjoining the mill is the boat-yard of William McFall, who turns out yearly a good many river craft of various kinds.

FAYETTE CITY BOROUGH.

Fayette City, a thriving borough of about nine hundred inhabitants, located upon the Monongahela, twelve miles below Brownsville, ranks among the old towns of Fayette County. Founded about 1800 by Col. Edward Cook as Freeport, it was known as Cookstown from 1825 to 1854, when its name was changed by legislative act to Fayette City. It is a point of considerable shipment, via the Monongahela River, of apples, wool, grain, etc., and derives a brisk mercantile trade from the surrounding agricultural community and adjoining coal-mining districts. Manufacturers are confined to the product of window-glass and woolen goods. There is communication with all points via river packets that touch at the wharf four times daily, and by railway on the Washington side of the river.

The bottom lands upon which the chief portion of Fayette City lies were once the site of an Indian village. Col. Edward Cook, who in 1768 came to the neighborhood and bought a large tract of about three thousand acres, lying now in Washington, Westmoreland, and Fayette counties, then became the owner of the site of Fayette City and the country about it for some distance. The first improvement of consequence upon the present site of Fayette City was made by Joseph Downer, shortly after 1800. Mr. Downer, who had from 1794 been living near Col. Cook's, in Washington township, moved first to the present Cooper mill-site, and later to where James Hamer's woolen-factory now stands. At the latter point he built a flouring-mill, and lower down on the run a saw-mill, of which the ruins may still be seen. At the saw-mill he built a framed dwelling-house, on the site of the Thirkield mansion. The grist-mill Mr. Downer himself managed, while the saw-mill interest was in charge of his father-in-law, Stephen Hall.

At the time of Mr. Downer's location upon the village site, about 1806, there was upon the tract but one house, which stood on the river-bank, the log cabin of one Fankus, a boat-builder, who soon afterwards went to New Orleans, and was never heard of. Previous to 1807, Col. Cook had laid out a town where Fayette City now is and named it Freeport. Tradition has it that he and Mr. Downer surveyed the streets and marked off the lots with a clothes-line. The original plat of the town shows that fifty-one lots were set off, that the streets were named Fording, Market, Cook, Union, Front, Second, Third, and Fourth, and that the triangular piece of land upon which the school-house now stands was donated for public use. Upon the plat is written the following:

"Plan of the town of Freeport, 1 on the Monongahela River, in Washington township, Fayette County, State of Pennsylvania. Laid out by Edward Cook, Esq." The lots were made sixty feet by one hundred and twenty, but in order to prevent disputes in the measurement six inches were allowed by Mr. Cook in each line on the ground, so that the lots were actually sixty-six feet six inches by one hundred and twenty feet six inches. Market Street is forty-five feet wide; the other streets thirty feet wide. The first trader at Freeport was Andrew Hunter, who, not far from 1805, came to the place with his daughters, Jane and Margaret, and erected at the corner of Market and Front Streets a framed building, in which he opened a small store and made his residence. His daughter Jane was a woman of great force of character and good business talent. She soon became the owner of the store, and, with her sister Margaret, carried it on for many years. Before the advent of the Hunters, William D. Mullin (who in 1786, at the age of four years, had come with his adopted father, William Patterson, to Washington township) located in Freeport upon his marriage, in 1806, and set up a hatter's shop (his trade he had learned with Jones, of Bridgeport) on a lot he had bought of Morris Dunlevy. The deed for the property, now in the possession of R. G. Mullin, recites that for the consideration of twenty dollars Edward and Martha Cook conveyed to Morris Dunlevy lot No. 4 in Freeport, situated in the tract known as Whisky Mount, patented to Edward

1 Name of the town changed to Cookstown about 1825.
Cook by the State in 1796. The deed bears date Nov. 12, 1802. William D. Mullin carried on the hat-making business until 1857. He died in Fayette City in 1876, aged ninety-one years. The house he lived in is now the residence of John Kennedy. The hat-shop that stood close to it long since disappeared.

In 1806, Alexander Crane kept on Water Street the principal store in Freeport. Aaron Bugher, who went to the Legislature afterwards, was a boat-builder, and in his yard built quite a lot of flat- and keel-boats. The first steamboat built at Freeport was launched about 1829 by James Woods. After an extended business career at Freeport, Bugher removed to Cincinnati, where he died. William Larimer, who succeeded him as a boat-builder at Cookstown, remained until about 1860. Since his departure but little in the way of boat-building has been done at this place.

Thomas Beard (an Irish refugee), one of the pioneer traders, kept a dry-goods store on Second Street near Union (where J. C. King's furniture-shop is), and Daniel Ferry kept a general store on Second Street. At the corner of Market and Second, James P. Stewart was an early trader, as was Job Kitts at the corner of Union and Water. U. C. Ford had a tannery at the corner of Market and Main Streets, on the site of McEwan's drug-store. About 1829, John Baldwin, a miller on the opposite side of the river, put on a ferry, much to the convenience of the people, for fording had previous to that been the common means of crossing. One Romans was Freeport's pioneer blacksmith. His shop was on Main near Market Street. James McCrory was one of the village blacksmiths about that time, and since then a McCrory has always been one of the blacksmiths of the place. Adam Weaver (with whom Samuel Larimer was an apprentice) was a cabinet-maker in a shop on the present Baldwin House lot. James Enos, living on the hill, was the first wheelwright as well as the first postmaster. William McRain was a shoemaker on Second Street, between Union and Market. James Hezlip kept the first tavern near the corner of Market and Second Streets. The second tavern was opened by Henry Calver on Second Street. He was succeeded in that establishment by a Mr. McNab, Beriel Taylor, and Thomas McCrory. McCrory was its last landlord, and kept it for some years as McCrory's Inn, by which name it was widely and favorably known. In 1845, William Evans built the tavern now known as the Baldwin House. Justus Blaney had a pottery in the upper portion of the village now called Sisletown. He made common ware and shipped it down the river to market. John Britson, another ancient worker in clay, made clay pipes in Cookstown as early as 1821.

In 1827, William E. Frazer (chosen to the State Senate in 1855 and canal commissioner in 1859) came to Cookstown from Luzerne township for the purpose of following his trade as turner and wheelwright. Mr. Frazer says Cookstown had in 1827 three stores, of which the principal one was kept by Thomas Beard, near the corner of Second and Union Streets. Alexander Crane had a store on Water (or Front) Street, and the Hunters had one at the corner of Market and Water Streets. Daniel Ferry was a wagon- and plow-maker, and William Baldwin was the village tailor. Mr. Frazer opened a wheelwright's shop near to where he now lives, and remained seven years. He retired for a while to a farm, but soon returned, and still resides in Fayette City, a highly honored and worthy citizen.

R. G. Mullin, now the oldest of Fayette City's merchants, embarked in trade in 1837 upon the lot where he was born and where he has continued to live to this day. Next in rank as to date of establishment in the village comes William Troth, who came to Cookstown in June, 1847, and opened a saddler's shop. In 1849 he purchased William E. Frazer's hardware business, and in that trade has continued uninterruptedly ever since. The third oldest merchant, John Mullin, has sold goods in this town continuously since 1852.

Cookstown's first resident physician was Dr. David Porter, who lived when a lad with the family of Capt. Woolsey, of Westmoreland County. Dr. Porter practiced for a year or two in Freeport about 1815, and then retiring to the country, did not return until about 1836, when he opened an office on Water Street. After a stay of a few years he retired once more to a farm, and removing subsequently to Union-town, remained there until his death in 1875. Dr. Joseph Thoburn, who succeeded Dr. Porter at Freeport, moved eventually to Wheeling. Dr. Nathan Hubbs was a practitioner in Freeport in 1822, and after a service of twenty-six years, died in the village in 1848. During Dr. Hubbs' time Dr. Thornton Fleming was one of the village doctors. He is especially remembered because of his sudden departure from the place. He is supposed to be living now at Galesburg, Ill. Dr. James Eagan came to the town in 1830, and in 1847 appeared Drs. Charles Conley and O. D. Todd. Dr. Todd, who lived opposite Cookstown, in Washington County, had an office in the village from 1847 until his death in 1880. Dr. J. M. H. Gordon, who located in Cookstown in 1849, has been in village practice continuously ever since. Dr. H. F. Roberts came as early as 1847, and practiced at irregular periods as a local physician until 1876. He lives now in Uniontown. Dr. F. M. Yost was in the field from 1852 to 1854. Drs. Reisinger and Penny were but briefly village practitioners. Dr. Cookling came in 1870, and died here in 1873. Besides Dr. J. M. H. Gordon, the borough physicians are John W. Gordon (here since 1877) and J. V. Porter (since 1880).

A post-office appears to have been established at Freeport as early as 1812. The first postmaster was James Enos, the wheelwright, who lived on the hill. In 1820 he was succeeded by William D. Mullin, and Mullin by Samuel Larimer in 1829. Larimer served until 1840, when Job Kitts was appointed, and in 1840 gave place to Edward Martin. Following Martin, to 1860, the incumbents were R. G. Mullin, William R. Campbell, and John Stoff. Hugh Connelly had the office from 1860 to 1870, and Lewis K. Hamilton from 1870 to 1880. S. B. Hamilton, the present incumbent, was commissioned in 1880, although he has been the acting postmaster since 1870. Fayette City post-office was made a money-order office in July, 1875. Four mails are received and four forwarded daily.

Joseph Downer, already noticed as Freeport's first inhabitant, was a man of great business enterprise and much respected. Reference to his early settlement in Fayette County, and to some of his manufacturing enterprises on Downer's Run, will be found elsewhere in the history of Washington township, as also a notice of the somewhat famous Downer organ. After his removal to Freeport he lived on the lot now occupied by the residence of Mrs. Roscoe Thirkield, his granddaughter. There he lived until his death, Feb. 14, 1838. His children numbered thirteen, of whom six were sons. The last of the sons was James C. Downer, who died in Louisiana. Three of the daughters are yet living. They are Louisa Roberts, in Michigan; Mrs. Thompson and Mrs. Thirkield, in Fayette City. Samuel Larimore, known prominently in connection with Cookstown's history, was an apprentice to Adam Weamer, the cabinet-maker, and all his life afterwards a carpenter in the town. He died in 1878, aged eighty years. His father, James, was one of Freeport's early boat-builders, and according to an old record still in the possession of Samuel Larimer's widow, was, on the 25th of July, 1798, "a member of the eighth class of the fifth company of Col. Thomas Johnson's battalion."

The manufacture of glass has been an important feature of Fayette City's industries since 1831. There were at one period no less than three glass-works within the limits of the town, but for many years the manufacture of glass at this point has been confined to one establishment. The business was founded here in 1831 by John Martin and John Baker, who in that year erected what were long known as the "upper works," containing an eight-pot furnace. Moderate success attended the enterprise from the first, but a change in proprietorship brought a change in fortune, and through various proprietary changes there were several failures until 1846, when the works were abandoned permanently. The buildings lay idle for years, until they were demolished to make room for the erection of dwelling-houses upon the site. In 1833 George Whiting built an eight-pot furnace on the "Point," and with William Eberhart, Sr., conducted the business for a short time. They were, however, compelled by financial reverses to abandon the works to others. In 1850, Whiting again obtained control, and, in company with John Emery, carried on the business until 1856, when they failed. William Eberhard, Jr., succeeded them and continued until 1857, when he too failed. After that no one ventured to take hold of the enterprise, and its history ended with the close of the year last named.

The glass-works now owned and operated by George Wanhoff & Co., of Pittsburgh, were built by John Bezill and Samuel Kyle in 1844, the building contractor being Edward Mansfield. The furnace was supplied with eight pots, and, all told, about fifty hands were employed. Bezill sold his interest to Kyle, who in turn disposed of the works to William Eberhard, Jr. William Eberhard, Sr., succeeded in 1852, and continued until 1857. Adam Blair, previously an employee at the works, became proprietor, and after a three years' experience failed in 1860. After lying idle a time the factory was bought and revived by D. Harman & Co., of Brownsville. In 1865 they were succeeded by Zimmerman & Co., who in 1872 sold out to Joseph Torrance & Co. In 1872, Torrance & Co. suspended work. John King & Co. were their successors, but stopped work in 1873. The Iron City Company were the next in possession, and in 1877 the present proprietors took the property. In 1879 they revived the works, and since that time have operated them with profitable success. Their employes number about sixty. Their weekly product of manufactured glass aggregates three hundred and fifty boxes, or nearly twenty thousand boxes annually. Their sand is obtained from Belle Vernon, and their lime from Tyrone. The annual consumption of materials in the manufacture is about one hundred thousand bushels of coal, twenty-five thousand bushels of coke, seven hundred tons of sand, two hundred tons of lime, two hundred and sixty tons of soda.

BOROUGH ORGANIZATION AND OFFICERS.

A petition for the erection of Cookstown into a borough was presented Dec. 5, 1839, and laid over until the March session of court. The report was then made by the grand jury favorable to the erection of the borough, and at the term held in March, 1840, the court confirmed the report of the grand jury and decreed that Cookstown should be erected into a borough or body corporate by the name and style of the borough of Cookstown, agreeably to the boundaries and draft annexed to the petition. September, 1847, a petition was presented to the court for an extension of the line of the said borough agreeably to certain designated courses and distances, and to change the day for the election of borough officers to the day prescribed by law for choosing township officers. A favorable report being made upon the petition the court confirmed the report, December, 1847.

Although the borough was organized in 1849, no mention can be found in either county or borough records of the names of borough officials elected prior to 1847. From that period to 1854, when an act of Legislature changed the name of the borough from Cookstown to Fayette City, the following named have been chosen among the borough officials, the incomplete records giving, however, no mention of either burgess or councilmen except in 1848:

The children of Cookstown were taught in 1812, and before, in a stone school-house that occupied a spot upon the present site of Mount Auburn Cemetery, where at that time there was a graveyard. Three teachers now remembered to have presided there were De Wolf, Hazlip, and Bosley. In 1816 a school was established in the village in a building on Water Street near Union. The structure is now the residence of Mr. Ziba Whiting. Among those who taught there were Isaiah Alden, a Presbyterian preacher, and Maria Dinsmore. In 1818 the people of the town built upon the site of the present school-house a framed edifice, to be free for the holding of a school and for the use of all religious denominations choosing to worship therein. Jacob Woods was the builder; William D. Mullin and U. C. Ford were the trustees. Some of the earlier teachers in that building were Mr. McCormick, Mr. Bosely, Thomas Tomlinson, Samuel Griffith, Francis McKee, John Wilson, and John B. Gould. Mr. Gould gave up teaching there in 1828, and removed to Belle Vernon, where he still lives at the age of eighty-six years. The house was used for school purposes until 1839, when a brick building was put up and used chiefly for a public school. The basement was used as a public hall. School was held in the brick house until 1870, when the present fine building was completed. It was commenced in 1869, and first occupied in the fall of 1870. Wesley Larimer was the contractor for the mason-work. The edifice is two stories in height, measures fifty by sixty feet, and is surmounted with a substantial bell-tower, whose top is seventy-four feet from the ground. The entire cost of the building was fifteen thousand dollars. There are six rooms and four school departments. In charge of these are Elisha Porter (principal), Miss Maria Larimer, Miss Mary Malone, and Miss Hattie Harman. The school directors for 1881 are J. D. Carr, H. B. Frye, Samuel Mansfield, A. D. Barker, Thomas Maude, J. M. H. Gordon. CHURCHES. Cookstown had no regularly appointed place of worship until 1818, when the citizens built a framed house and set it apart to the free use of schools and churches, or members of any religious denomination desirous of having public devotional exercises. THE METHODIST EPISCopal CHurch was doubtless the first religious organization effected in the town. A class was formed as early as 1815 and attached to the Redstone Circuit, and until 1820 meetings were held in the stone school-house on the hill, in Crane's old store-house on the river's bank, and in the houses of members. Among the most prominent of the latter were W. B. Mullin and wife, Adam Weaver, U. C. Ford, and Margaret and Jane Hunter. Mr. Mullin was one of the first class-leaders, and probably the first. In that capacity he officiated at times until his death. In 1829 the Union church building was occupied by the Methodists in common with other denominations, and until 1842 it was the place of meeting. In that year a brick Methodist Episcopal Church was built. Its dimensions are forty by sixty feet, and its seating capacity about six hundred. Among the early pastors of the church may be named Revs. James Sanson, Fleming, Slicer, and Brockeooner. The present pastor is Rev. Mr. Mansell; the class-leader, John Mullin; the Sunday-school superintendent, J. D. Carr; and the trustees, R. G. Mullin, John Mullin, J. D. Carr, Samuel Brown, and William Beatty. The membership is sixty-five.
FREE-WILL BAPTIST CHURCH.

About 1820, Elder John Williams, who had before that been preaching to the Free-Will Baptists of Cookstown, organized them into a church, and after that preached to them in the Union church building. Under Elder Williams' misrepresentations the organization flourished apace, and in 1845 had grown so strong that upwards of a hundred people were regularly present in the congregation each Sabbath. In that year a house of worship was built, and matters went on prosperously. By and by Elder Williams found some disfavor among his people, who considered he was growing somewhat dictatorial and aggressive in some respects. Construing their expressions into signs of unwarranted interference with him and his methods, he exhibited a decided independence that eventually led to his retirement from the charge. In 1853 he resigned, after a service of upwards of thirty years. That Elder Williams was the mainstay of the organization after all, is proved by the fact that after his departure the church slowly but surely saw its strength and influence waning. Dissensions and differences multiplied, and as a result a final dissolution took place in 1869. The meeting-house was sold to the Presbyterians, and the Free-Will Baptist Church of this place became extinct.

THE CHURCH OF CHRIST was organized Oct. 9, 1836, by Rev. James Dorsey, in the village school-house. Who the organizing members were cannot now be told, but among the names appearing earliest upon the records may be given those of Ralph Whitsett, Abbia Allen, William Sowers, Daniel Torry, Nathan G. Hubbs, Edmund and Samuel Hubbs, Daniel Springer, Robert Stogdall, Sarah Sowers, Mary Hubbs, Sarah Stam, Polly Allen, Deborah Stogdall, Sister Whitsett, Sarah Springer, Rachel Hubbs, James Dorsey, William Munnell, Charlotte Allen, Maria Allen, Barbara Allen, and Elizabeth Hubbs. The records of the church history are vague and imperfect, and afford but little information. It is known that the Union church building was used as a meeting-house to 1869, and that in that year the present church edifice on Second Street was erected. The membership now aggregates about one hundred and twenty-five. The elders are Wesley Larimer, Edward W. White, Thomas Maude, Samuel Mansfield, and James Hamer; the deacons, George Whiting, John Coldren, James L. Krepps, and William W. Whitsett. Samuel Mansfield is superintendent of the Sunday-school.

FAYETTE CITY PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.

The Presbyterian Church of Fayette City was organized about 1870 by members of Rehoboth Church, and purchase made of the house of worship built by the Free-Will Baptists and abandoned by them about 1869. Rev. Mr. Gailey was the first regular pastor. The subscribers to the fund for the support of the pastor in 1872 are named herewith, and in that list, it is fair to assume, appear the names of all or nearly all of the church-members at that period. They were William Bank, Nancy J. Sisley, Mary Conrad, Mrs. Sisley, Dit Church, Dr. Stone, J. C. King, Celia McKee, M. Sloterbeck, Mrs. McKee, D. H. Hough, W. A. McCune, Daniel Pfeilhardt, Mrs. Fulton, Mrs. Stone, Dr. Conklin, Samuel Galloway, Samuel Clark, J. R. Wilson, George Clark, Nancy Wilson, Mr. Dunlevy, John Brown, A. Dunlevy, H. F. Bythe, H. Patton, Sarah Patton, S. Downs, K. B. Brown, Mrs. Torrence, Mrs. M. A. Kuntze, J. L. McFeter, Sallie Hunter, Ely Allen, L. J. Jeffries, R. C. Santee, William McCrory, R. G. Mullin, William Lenhart, Mrs. Mullin, J. Dinsmore, Cyrus Hough, W. McCrory, Hugh McCrory, Joseph Brown, Mr. Powers, J. Wykoff. The pastor now in charge is Rev. A. B. Lowes, also in charge of the church at Belle Vernon. The elders are M. Sloterbeck and J. C. King. J. C. King is superintendent of the Sabbath-school. The church membership is thirty-two.

FAYETTE CITY WOOLEN-FACTORY.

This manufacturing enterprise, located on Downer's Run, near the borough limits, was founded in 1840 by its present owner, James Hamer. In 1838, Mr. Hamer and James Pilling manufactured woolen goods at Cook's Mills, and in 1835, the firm dissolving, Hamer moved to the Little Redstone, and in 1840 to Cookstown. His manufactured product embraces chiefly woolen goods and yarns for local supply and country trade. The factory is supplied with three carding-machines, one spinning-jack, and one hundred and fifty spindles. Five hands are usually employed.

BANK.

The only banking-house ever possessed by Fayette City was founded by Biuns, Cope & Brown in 1873, who are still the owners of the institution. It is a private enterprise, but transacts a general banking business upon an ample capital.

MOUNT AUBURN CEMETERY.

This handsomely adorned home of the dead, located upon a commanding eminence that overlooks the town, is owned by Samuel Mansfield. It fronts the State road, and contains four acres, apportioned into three hundred and thirty-five burial-lots in the form of a parallelogram. The entrance is through an arched gateway surmounted with the figure of Hope. There are neatly-kept paths, bright-looking lawns, and many tasteful monuments.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

JOHN BELL COOK.

John Bell Cook, of Washington township, is of the third generation of that name in this locality. He was born Aug. 26, 1808, upon the old Cook homestead in that township. His early education was received in the common schools. He learned the business of farming, and resided with his father until his marriage with Matilda Cunningham, of Washington township, Fayette Co., Oct. 18, 1837, and then moved to a farm on the Monongahela River near Fayette City, where he resided sixteen years. Here all of his children, below named, were born: James was born May 14, 1840, and followed farming until September, 1862, when he entered the army. He died at City Point, Aug. 16, 1864, from injuries received in the service. His remains were removed in November of that year to Rehoboth Presbyterian Cemetery. Sarah A. was born Aug. 23, 1842. She was educated in the common schools and Blairsville Female Seminary, married Andrew M. Fulton, Esq., of Greensburg, Jan. 14, 1874, and died December 12th of the same year. William Johnson, the third child, was born July 4, 1844, and died in infancy. Joseph A. was born Dec. 11, 1846. He is a farmer, and resides with his father. He married Violette H. Elliott, of Jefferson township, Sept. 20, 1876; they have two children, Ada and Sallie. The youngest child, Robert Johnson, was born March 21, 1849. He received his early education in the common schools, entered Yale College in 1872, and graduated in 1876. He began the study of law in Greensburg with A. M. Fulton, Esq., in 1877, and completed his course in the office of Hon. John H. Baily, of Pittsburgh. He was admitted to the bar in 1878, and was married April 26, 1881, to Annie Wells, of Pittsburgh, and sailed for Europe. He is now in Leipzig, Germany, studying. They have one child, born in Germany. He was captain of the Yale boat crew from 1873 until 1876. He was sent by Yale to England in 1873 to learn the English stroke.

Mr. Cook has never held a political office outside of the township, and never sought one. He has been a member of the Presbyterian Church for many years. His father, James Cook, was born Aug. 13, 1772, upon the Cook homestead, and was a farmer. May 6, 1806, he married Mary Bell, who was born in Ireland, and emigrated to this country when eleven years old. They had six children,—five sons and one daughter. John was the second. The sons were all farmers. The daughter married a farmer. Only three of the children are living,—John B., William E., and Martha Hough.

Mr. Cook's grandfather, Col. Edward Cook, was the pioneer of civilization in this region. He moved here in 1770 from Conoococheague, Franklin Co., where he married Martha Crawford. They had but one child, James Cook. To his character the legends of the times say that the inscription upon his tombstone (composed by the Rev. William Wylie, pastor of the Rehoboth Church of Rostraver township, Westmoreland Co., from 1803 to 1815), is a fitting tribute. It is, "In memory of Col. Edward Cook. He died on the 27th of November, 1808, in the seventy year of his age. Few men have deserved and possessed more eminently than Col. Cook the consideration and esteem of the people in the Western country. In public spirit, disinterestedness, and zeal for the general welfare he was excelled by none. In private life, his unsullied integrity, his liberality, and the amiable benevolence of his temper endeared him to his friends, and marked him as a sanctuary to which the poor might confidently resort for relief. Through a long life of piety and active exertion to promote the interests of the Christian religion he had learned to set his heart upon a nobler inheritance than that of this world. He therefore received the approach of his dissolution with resignation and composure, under a lively hope that the end of life here would be to him but the beginning of infinite happiness."

Col. Edward’s wife was born Dec. 25, 1743, and died April 20, 1837.

John B. Cook possesses many of the virtues of his grandsire.

SAMUEL C. GRIFFITH.

Samuel C. Griffith was born in Westmoreland County, Pa., Nov. 28, 1715. When young his father moved to Washington township, Fayette Co., and located upon the farm which his son afterwards owned, and upon which his widow now resides. Mr. Griffith’s early years were spent in farm-work, factory-work, and attending the district schools.

When seventeen years of age he engaged in school-teaching. For forty years he continued in this work during the winter season, only missing one winter. He was one of the best and most widely-known surveyors in the county, and spent much of his time, when not engaged in teaching, in surveying. His father, William Griffith, becoming involved by indorsing for some of his neighbors, the farm was sold by the sheriff, and Samuel bought it; that was in 1822. He was married March 27, 1823, to Esther Farquhar, of Washington township, Fayette Co., Pa. They had seven children, six of whom are living,—Mary, married to Levi B. Stephens; Elimira, married to David P. Stephens; Emlyn B., married to Margaret A. Guffey, and again to Elizabeth Crouch; Enclid C., married to Martha Stephens; Sarah, married to Thomas Watson; and Esther F., married to Thomas C. Griffith.

Mr. Griffith was a member of the Quaker meeting till the time of his marriage. He was turned out for marrying out of the Society.

He was a justice of the peace for many years, and was a general business man, wrote and acknowledged many deeds, married people, wrote articles of agreement, etc.

His widow thinks his father’s people came from Wales. His moral status, like that of all Quakers, was good. He was a jovial man, and a valuable and respected citizen. He was industrious, always engaged in some useful work. He was much above the average in intelligence, a great student of mathematics and history. He was a careful workman. His penmanship was elegant. All of his work was done well. He died July 11, 1873, mourned by the entire community. His remains rest in Little Redstone Methodist Cemetery.

LEVI B. STEPHENS.

Levi B. Stephens was born Oct. 28, 1821, on the old Stephens homestead, in Washington township, Fayette Co., Pa., where he grew to manhood. His education was limited to the district schools of his native township, where he laid the foundations for an active and successful business life. On the 10th day of April, 1845, he was joined in marriage to Miss Mary Griffith, daughter of Samuel C. and Esther (Farquhar) Griffith. She was born in Washington township, Fayette Co., Pa., Jan. 25, 1824. Their union has been blessed with three children, as follows: Elmira, born Jan. 26, 1846, married John Luce, Oct. 19, 1865; Esther J., born Oct. 1, 1848, married June 29, 1870, to John W. Smith (Esther died Sept. 17, 1878); and Adeline, born March 14, 1851, married Dec. 6, 1877, to James H. McKnight. Arrived at man’s estate, Mr. Stephens first bought the farm now owned by John Patterson, in Perry township. This he sold, and in 1859 moved upon the farm in Washington township, still belonging to his estate. He afterwards purchased another farm, which he owned at his death, which occurred Dec. 29, 1874. He is spoken of by his neighbors as a man of sterling qualities, one whose word was as good as a bond, and one who, in his dealing with his fellow-men, always remembered the golden rule, “Do unto others as you would have them do unto you.” Mr. and Mrs. Stephens were for many years members of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

LEVI STEPHENS.

The Stephens family is one of the oldest and largest in Fayette County. The first of whom the family here have any account was one John Stephens, who emigrated from Wales when seventeen years of age, and settled in Eastern Pennsylvania, probably in Bucks County. He had a son Levi, who came to Fayette County when about eighteen years of age, as a government surveyor. He took land for his services, and owned all the lands now in possession of his progeny. He married Elizabeth Brown, of Chester County, Pa. They had seven children,—Nathaniel, Sarah, John, Levi, Nancy, Elizabeth, and Thomas,—who grew to manhood and womanhood and married. Two of their children died in infancy.

Levi, the last surviving member of this family, was born Sept. 10, 1790. He spent his early life tilling his father's farm and attending the district school of the neighborhood. In 1813 he was married to Mary Farquhar, of Washington township, Fayette Co. They located upon the farm where his widow now resides, and his entire life was spent here as a farmer. He died Jan. 13, 1878. His widow survives him, aged eighty-six. They have had nine children. Six are now living. Robert, Esther, and Aaron are dead. Jehu, Israel, Johnson, Rachel, James, and Mary are living, married, and have families.

Levi Stephens never had time to hold an office. He was a busy farmer, and gave all his children a pecuniary start in life. He was an amiable, benevolent gentleman. He was not a member of the church, but his moral standing was excellent, according to the testimony of his discreetest neighbors.

JOHN BROWN.

The first of the family of the late Mr. John Brown, of Washington township, and who died April 15, 1872, of whom there is any special record at hand was Andrew Brown, who was born in Ireland in 1759. He emigrated to America in 1779, and settled on West Conococheague Creek, in Franklin County, Pa. His wealth at that time consisted of one shilling. He remained there just long enough to make the money to bring him to Fayette County. When he came here he settled on Mill Run, one and a half miles east of Fayette City, where he bought a farm from Col. Edward Cook. He engaged in farming, and continued in that occupation all his life. April 24, 1788, he married Jane Bigham, of Westmoreland County, Pa. They had seven daughters and three sons. Of the children, Hester and Andrew died young; Elizabeth married Hugh C. Ford; Nancy died single; Polly married Capt. Duncan Campbell; Jane married John Moore; Martha C. died single; Margaret married James Torrance.

John was the seventh child, and the only one of the sons who grew to manhood. He was born April 1, 1805. His early life was passed upon his father's farm. His opportunities for early education were limited, being confined to the common schools. The little learning he gathered there was supplemented by extensive reading in after-years. His father died in 1823, and the management of the farm devolved upon him. He proved himself a successful manager, and although a liberal giver to all benevolent causes, he added largely to what he inherited from his father.

He was married Dec. 12, 1844, to Sarah H. Power, of Allegheny County, Pa. They had five children. Ada and Anna died at two years of age; Nannie J. died at the age of twenty; Mary Emma, married to M. M. Wilson, of Westmoreland County. They have one child living, Andrew Brown Wilson.

Andrew Brown, the only son, resides with his mother upon the old homestead. John Brown held the office of justice of the peace for a number of years. He was a man of peace. He rarely charged anything for his services, and always counseled an amicable settlement of difficulties between neighbors. He was for many years an active member and liberal supporter of the Rehoboth Presbyterian Church. His family are all members of the same communion. He left his family valuable possessions, a good name, lands, etc.

His family and friends bless his memory, and love to tell of his charities, gentleness, lowliness of heart, and many other Christian graces. His virtues were many.

Andrew Brown, Sr., was for fifty years an elder in the Presbyterian Church of Rehoboth. He died March 27, 1823. Jane, his wife, departed this life April 7, 1833, aged sixty-nine years.

DENTON LYNN.

Denton Lynn, of Washington township, is of Irish descent, and was born upon the farm where he now resides fifty-one years ago. His education was received in the common schools. He early learned the business of farming, and had been engaged in it ever since. He was married Feb. 8, 1857, to Margaret A. Corwin, of Belle Vernon. She died May 22, 1881. There were born to them eleven children, all of whom are living,—Sylvania, married to Johnson Hough, Joanna, Olive R., John C., Charles Sumner, Joseph Denton, Robert Finley, Martha D., George E., Nellie, and Mary Emma.

Mr. Lynn has held the usual township offices. His father was John Lynn, who was born in 1794, and lived and died upon this farm. He married Drusilla Curry, of Fayette City. They had eight children. Denton is the youngest. His grandfather's name was Andrew Lynn. He was born on Town Creek, Alleghany Co., Md., Sept. 29, 1766. When very young his father, whose name was Andrew, settled upon Big Redstone, in Redstone township, upon the farm which James M. Lynn now owns. Soon after settling there Andrew (1st) purchased the land owned now by Denton Lynn from the Indians. He added to his first purchase a farm of 150 acres, owned by one Pearce. The deed was made in 1790, and bears the name of Thomas Mitflin, first Governor of Pennsylvania. Upon this tract are some of the largest locust-trees in the State, one, measuring twenty feet in circumference, and known to be nearly two centuries old, is probably the progenitor of all the living locusts of this region. It also contains the remains of "Fort Sedgley." The tract was known by that name. The fort consisted of a strong stone wall about four feet high, built in the shape of a horseshoe. Many relics have been found here, such as tomahawks, skeletons, etc.

One human skeleton here found measured eight feet in length.

Mr. Lynn’s possessions are chiefly lands, and he has added considerably to what he inherited. He is a prudent business man, and has a comfortable home. He is noted for his sobriety, industry, and honesty. Mr. Lynn’s great-grandfather, Andrew Lynn, was a colonel in the Revolutionary war, and served during the entire struggle.

WHARTON TOWNSHIP.

Wharton is one of the nine townships into which Fayette County was originally divided by the first court for the county, at December sessions, 1783. After naming eight of the townships the records mention Wharton, the ninth, in the following language: "The residue of the county, being chiefly mountainous, is included in one township, known as Wharton township." Wharton, in order of size, is first; in order of age is the fifth, and in order of designation is the ninth of the twenty-three townships into which the county is now divided. It is bounded on the north by Dunbar, on the east by Stewart and Henry Clay, on the south by Mason and Dixon’s line, on the west by Springhill, Georges, South Union, and North Union. It is the southwestern of the five mountain townships of the county. Its greatest length from north to south is eleven and one-half miles, and its greatest width from east to west is thirteen and one-quarter miles.

Wharton lies in the southern part of the Ligonier Valley, between two ranges of the Allegheny Mountains, but in reality presents very little appearance of a valley. Its surface is broken, and high hills with abrupt slopes extend through the centre. On the west the deep cut made by the waters of Big Sandy only prevents Laurel Hill Ridge from uniting with the high hills of the centre. In the southeast a small portion of the township is an elevated plain known as the Glades. Wharton is from 1800 to 2000 feet above the level of the sea.

The township at the time of its settlement was heavily timbered, lacking the heavy undergrowth so abundant,—on the hills, oak; on the mountain ridges, oak and chestnut; on the creek bottoms, oak, pine, poplar, sugar, and cherry. The timber has been greatly, and in many cases needlessly, cut off to supply furnaces and tanneries, yet the township is well timbered to-day.

The soil is clay loam on the hills, and sand loam on the chestnut ridges, streams, and glades, and the surface in some places rough and rocky. The township is admirably adapted to stock- and sheep-raising, the only bar to agriculture being the length of the winter season. Over 2000 feet above the level of the sea, the climate is healthy, with pure air and excellent water, with short summer and long winter seasons.

In 1840 coal was hardly known here; now ten different coal-beds have been opened, varying from one and a half to nine feet in thickness, on Big Sandy, Little Sandy, Stony Fork, and Great Meadow Run.

Limestone was thought twenty-five years ago only to exist in mountain ridges, but now has been discovered in many places in the township. On Big Sandy Creek a vein of ten feet has been found, and a vein twenty feet thick one mile from Wharton Furnace. The Morgantown sandstone shows twenty feet thick near Wharton Furnace, and is a splendid building stone. It weathers dull gray, splits well, and is abundant. Fire-clay exists in several places, but contains lump iron ore.

Iron ore is abundant and of excellent quality. There are many legends of zinc, lead, and silver-mines, and traces of these metals have actually been found, but upon examination proved not to be in paying quantities,—lead above Elliottsville, silver in Little Sandy, near Gibbons’ Glade, zinc on Mill Run, near Victor’s old mill. Water-power is abundant. Big Sandy and its branches, Little Sandy, and Great Meadow Run afford many locations for saw-mills, flouring-mills, and factories. Mineral springs of reported curative properties exist in several places,—a large red sulphur spring at Baumgardener’s, near Gibbons’ Glade, chalybeate springs at William

By Samuel T. Wiley
Smith’s, on the turnpike, a very strong sulphur spring near Farmington, and the celebrated Fayette Springs, near Chalk Hill, on the National road, where some summer seasons from two hundred to three hundred persons have been boarders to try its virtues.

In July, 1783, Wharton was erected a township of Westmoreland County, comprising all of Springhill township east of the top of Laurel Hill to the Youghiogheny River. It included all of what is now Henry Clay, and all of that part of Stewart west of the Youghiogheny River, with all of Dunbar south of Laurel Hill. The first court of Fayette County, December sessions, 1783, held it out as a township of Fayette. In 1793 that part of Dunbar south of Laurel Hill was taken from Wharton and added to Franklin. In January, 1823, Henry Clay was erected from Wharton. In November, 1855, Stewart, west of the Youghiogheny, was erected, including that part of Wharton. Afterwards a small portion of Henry Clay was added to Wharton on the east side.

The township contains three villages,—Farmington, Gibbons’ Glade, and Elliottsville. Farmington is in the northeastern part on the National road. Gibbons’ Glade, six miles from Farmington, is in the southern part on Little Sandy, and on a weekly mailroute from Farmington to Brandonville, W. Va. Elliottsville is in the western part on Big Sandy, at the junction of the Haydentown and Uniontown roads, and is four miles northwest of Gibbons’ Glade, and five miles southwest of Farmington.

In 1796 Wharton contained 34,319 acres; its valuation was $41,567. In 1870 its population was 1478. In 1889, as shown by the census of that year, its population was 1704, with over 400 farms.

The Indians, it seems, never had any villages in Wharton, and only came into the township to hunt. At Dennis Holland’s, on the Old Braddock road, in a deep hollow head, some years ago the marks of wigwams were to be seen near a spring. It was supposed to have been a hunting-camp. Some stone piles on Sandy and back of Sebastian Rush’s on the pike, mark Indian graves, while flint arrow-heads and spear-points are found all over the township. Nemacolin’s path or trail, running east and west, passed through Wharton, leading from the “Forks of the Ohio” (Pittsburgh) to Wills’ Creek (Cumberland). Its route afterwards became the Braddock road. Another Indian trail (running north and south) came past Delaney’s Cave and down Big Sandy into West Virginia. Just beyond the Wharton line (below Mason and Dixon’s line cemetery) was a camp, and a short distance west of the trail, where the Tuttle school-house stands, was supposed to be an Indian burying-place. The remainder of the township was used only for hunting purposes, and no trails were made through any portion of it.

HISTORIC SPOTS.

Jumonville’s camp is nearly half a mile south of Dunbar’s Camp, and five hundred yards east of the Old Braddock road. One-quarter of a mile south of Dunbar’s Camp is Dunbar’s Spring, and nearly one-quarter of a mile down the run from the spring, about ten feet from the right bank, is the spot supposed to be Jumonville’s grave; then west about twenty yards in a straight line is the camp, half-way along and directly under a ledge of rocks twenty feet high and covered with laurel, extending in the shape of a half-moon half a mile in length in the hill and sinking as it approaches, and dipping into the earth just before it reaches Dunbar’s Spring. Thus situated in the head of a deep hollow, the camp was almost entirely concealed from observation. Here in the dawn of morning light Washington fired the first gun of a great war that swept New France from the map of the New World and established the supremacy of the English-speaking race in North America.

Fort Necessity.—Authorities differ on the shape of the fort. Col. Bard says in his journal in 1759 the fort was round, with a house in it. In 1816, Freeman Lewis made a survey of it, and says the embankments were then near three feet high, and the shape and dimensions as follows: An obtuse-angled triangle of 105 degrees, base on the run eleven perches long. About the middle of the base it was broken, and two perches thrown across the run. One line of the angle was six and the other seven perches long, embracing near one-third of an acre. Outside the fort the trenches were filled up; inside ditches about two feet deep still remained. Sparks, who saw it in 1830, makes the fort to have been a diamond shape. At the present time it presents the shape of a right-angled triangle. It was a stockade fort or inclosure, hastily constructed under Washington's direction by Capt. Stobo, engineer. The French demolished it, and five years elapsed before Col. Bard visited it, and some of its outlines may have been indistinct by that time, and seeing ruins on both sides of the run, may have concluded the fort was round. Mr. Facenbaker, the present occupant, came to the property in 1856, and cut a ditch, straightening the windings of the run, and consequently destroying the outline. The ditch is outside the base-line, through the outthrown two perches. A lane runs through the southeast angle. The ruins of the fort or embanked stockade, which it really was, is three hundred yards south of Facenbaker's residence, or the Mount Washington stand, in a meadow, on waters of Great Meadow Run, a tributary of the Youghiogheny. On the north, 200 yards distant from the work, was wooded upland; on the northwest a regular slope to high ground about 400 yards away, now cleared, then woods; on the south, about 250 yards to the top of a hill, now cleared, then woods, divided by a small spring run breaking from a hill on the southeast 80 yards away, then heavily, and still partially, wooded. A cherry-tree stands on one line and two crab-apples on the other. The base is scarcely visible, with all trace gone of line across the run. Mr. Geoffrey Facenbaker says he cleared up a locust thicket here, and left a few trees standing, and that it was the richest spot on his farm. About 400 yards below, in a thicket close to his lower barn, several ridges of stone were thrown up, and here he thinks the Indians buried their dead. He found in the lane in ditching logs five feet under ground in good preservation.

In 1854, W. H. N. Patrick, editor of the Democratic Sentinel, urged a celebration on the 4th of July, 1854, and a monument at the site of the old stockade. A celebration was held by Fayette Lodge, No. 228, A. Y. M., of Uniontown, and citizens. Col. D. S. Stewart laid the corner-stone of a monument, but nothing more has ever been done since towards its erection. Mr. Facenbaker says no plow shall ever turn a sod on the site of the old stockade while he owns the land, and he would give an acre of land and the right of way to it if any parties would erect the monument and fence the ground.

Braddock's Grave.—A few yards west of the Braddock Run stand, on the north side of the road, is the grave of Gen. Braddock. When the road was being repaired in 1812 human bones were dug up a few yards from the road on Braddock's Run; some military trappings found with them indicated an officer of rank, and as Gen. Braddock was known to have been buried on this run, the bones were supposed to be his. Some of them were sent to Peale's Museum in Philadelphia. Abraham Stewart gathered them up as well as he could secure them, and placed them under a tree, and a board with "Braddock's Grave" marked on it. In 1872, J. King, editor of the Pittsburgh Gazette, came out to Chalk Hill, cut down the old tree, inclosed the spot with the neat fence now standing, and planted the pine-trees now standing round the grave. He procured from Murdock's nursery a willow, whose parent stem drooped over the grave of Napoleon at St. Helena, and planted it over the supposed remains of Braddock, but it withered and died over the grave of England's brave but ill-fated general.

Pioneers and Early Settlements.

In September and November, 1766, the Penn and Grant patented tracts of lands in what is now Wharton township to B. Chew and a man by the name of Wilcocks. These tracts were north of Braddock's road, and along the Henry Clay line, now owned by Joseph Stark and others. In 1767, Gen. Washington acquired a claim to a tract of two hundred and thirty-four acres called "Mount Washington," and situated on Big Meadow Run, including Fort Necessity. It was confirmed to him by Pennsylvania, and surveyed on warrant No. 3383 for Lawrence Harrison, in right of William Brooks, and was patented to Gen. Washington, and devised by his will to be sold by his executors, who sold it to Andrew Parks, of Baltimore, who sold it to Gen. Thomas Meason, whose administrators sold it to Joseph Huston in 1816. Col. Samuel Evans bought it for taxes in 1823, and in 1824 Judge N. Ewing bought it at sheriff's sale as Huston's property, and sold it to James Sampey, whose heirs sold it to Geoffrey Facenbaker in 1856. In 1769, "Prosperity," a tract of land, was taken up, running from the Old Braddock road to the pike. G. W. Hansel owns and resides on it.

About 1778, Jacob Downer and his wife, whose maiden name was Elizabeth Stinner, or Stiner, was moving from Lancaster County to Kentucky, and winter coming on, they stopped near the Old Orchard and near Braddock's Run, and occupied a log cabin by a spring. They came from Germany to Lancaster County. They stayed here about two years and raised grain. Elizabeth, their oldest daughter, had married a man by name of Brubaker in Philadelphia, and they had their other five children with them,—Katy, Susan, Daniel, John, and Jonathan. Jacob Downer left his family here and went on a flat-boat to Kentucky to look out a place, but he was never again heard from. His wife and children then moved to Uniontown. Elizabeth Downer lived to be one hundred and five years old. Of her children, Katy married Cornelius Lynch; Susan married one Harbaugh, and after his death married Squire Jonathan Rowland; Daniel was drowned in trying to cross the Yough at the Ohio Pile Falls; John was a surveyor. He purchased land in Uniontown in 1780, on which he built a tavern. He went to Morgantown, W. Va., and finally to Kentucky. Jonathan married Drusilla Springer, and lived in Uniontown from 1785 till 1813, and came back and built his tavern stand. He kept on the Old Braddock, and afterwards moved to the National road and built the Chalk Hill stand. He was born in 1754 and died at seventy-nine years of age, a highly-respected citizen. His wife died in 1843. They had thirteen children,—Levi, William, Ann (who married H. N. Beeson), Jacob (who was in the war of 1812), Elizabeth (who married Jonathan Allen, and is still living), Daniel, David, Drusilla (who married Jonathan West), Hiram (who was in the Mexican war and died on the Ohio River on his way home), Sarah, Rachel, Springer, and Ruth, who is still living at Chalk Hill, an amiable, pleasant, and intelligent old lady.

The Revolutionary war stopped settlements. At its close emigration pushed westward, and the Old Braddock road was naturally one of its great routes across the mountains, and men adventurous and daring located along the road in the wilderness. Thomas Inks came out and built a tavern-house where Eli Leonard now lives about 1780. He came from England. His wife's name was Nancy Leasure. They raised a large family. Thomas, one of his sons, born in 1784, here lived ninety-two years, married Susan Flannegan, from Bedford, raised a family, and lived on the old road as a tavern-keeper. George, another son, married Elizabeth Jonas, and followed tavern-keeping on the old road and on the pike. John, another son, was in the war of 1812. He had five daughters,—Rachel, who married Samuel Spaun, and mother of Thomas Spaun, near Farmington; Elizabeth, who married John Carrol and went West; Nancy, who married James Hayhurst, a son of Hayhurst, the old tavern-keeper, and went West; Mary, who married James Wares and went West; and Rachel, who married Peter Hager.

In 1786, Daniel MePeck was living near Gibbons' Glades. In 1783 Tom Fossit was on the old road at the junction of Dunlap's road and Braddock's, close to the Great Rock, a few feet west of Fred Hamrer's house. He kept a house for travel. He was a tall, large, grim, savage-looking man. He died in 1818, at one hundred and six years of age. He came from the South Branch, in Hardy County, W. Va. Next came Isaac Cushman, and kept the Cushman stand, one mile south of Fossit's. On the 14th of November, 1787, we find him near Gibbons' Glade, taking out a patent for four hundred and twenty-three acres, where George H. Thomas now lives. He was a great hunter, and one winter when a hard crust froze on the snow and the deer broke through and could not run, Cushman and others killed them nearly all off. Cushman had two sons, Thomas and Isaac.

About 1783 the Moores came from Ireland and settled west of MePeck's. Robert was at Jacob Prinkey's, and patented land in 1786. Thomas Moore, another brother, was on Sandy Creek, on the State line, at the old James place, now owned by D. Thornton. John, another brother, was where Squire Isaac Armstrong resides. He had five sons,—Col. Andrew, Robert, Archibald, Thomas, and William, who went West; and one daughter, Sarah, who died in the township.

John Moore built a one and a half story log house near where the log tenant house of I. Armstrong stands, and there kept tavern. He died and his widow kept it a while, but went West in 1812. Col. Andrew Moore served in the war of 1812. He kept tavern and a small stock of goods in one room of the house. He married Nancy Williams, and the late Samuel Moore was one of their sons.

In January, 1786, John Cross patented three hundred acres on Mill Run near R. Kingham's, and afterwards built a tub-mill near it. In 1787, Henry Fern patented land by name of Cherry Valley, where Alexander Rush now lives.

In 1788, John Inks received a patent for a tract of land where J. H. Wiggins lives, and sold it to a man by name of Newbern. David Young came about this time, and built two cabins and a house a mile or so back from William Smith. The two cabins were burned. Also about this time came Alexander McDowell into Wharton near Tom Fossit's; he was an old Indian-hunter, and was captured once after being shot through, and sold to British traders for a gallon of rum and a silver half-dollar. He got well and came to Wharton, where he was a great hunter. He came from Ireland, and was the ancestor of the McDowells in Wharton; he was a large, muscular, fearless man, kind and generous. His sons used to get out millstones near Meadow Run and take them to Brownsville, where they were shipped to Kentucky.

Capt. Levi Griffith came to this county soon after the Revolution, took up a tract of mountain land of about four hundred acres in Wharton township, where he lived till his death. He was a lieutenant in Wayne's Indian expedition, but acted as captain. He was the only man in this county who was a member of the Society of the Cincinnati, a society of Revolutionary officers. He held the badge and star. He received a pension from the government, and every six months went to Uniontown for his pension. Then he would invite his old friends to dinner, generally at Dr. McClure's tavern; among these were Col. James Pail, Maj. Uriah Springer, Col. Thomas Collins, and William McClelland.

About 1785 the Deans came to Wharton. Thomas Dean started, but died on the way with smallpox. He was from Germany, and had served through the Revolutionary war. Samuel, his son, had served two years in that war. He and his mother kept on into Wharton, settling close to William Smith's. Samuel F. married a New Jersey lady of the name of Camp, and raised a large family. Thomas and Edward, his sons, were on the pike. Thomas is still living, nearly eighty years old, and a lively, pleasant old gentleman, with a good recollection of events of sixty years ago. Samuel's mother went to Ohio, and died there at over one hundred years of age. Charles, another son, lives near Elliottsville. Samuel died at an old age. He was the ancestor of the Deans in Wharton.

About 1789, James Hayhurst was at Braddock's Run keeping tavern. Abraham Stewart was in Wharton in 1790, and kept tavern afterwards. He raised Peter Hagar, who married Rachel Inks and settled the Hagar farms, now owned by his descendants.

In 1790, Daniel and William Carrol came from Ireland. William settled on Old Braddock road, on the bank of Braddock's Run, and kept tavern. Daniel Carrol, when twenty-five years old, settled the glade named after him. He married a widow, Barbara Cogswell, and by her had four sons and one daughter,—Daniel, who married a sister of James Sampay and went West; James, who went West; William, who married a Miss Conaway and went West; Joseph, who married Nancy Scott, and remains, an old and intelligent man, in possession of the glade; and Margaret, who married a man named Castel and went West.

In 1797, James Hayhurst came from Braddock's road and settled near Potter's school-house, and bought from William McClelland, who had patented under name of "Bellevue" and "Land of Cakes."

In 1800, David Flaugh settled near Elliottsville, and Enos and Eber West, half-brothers, came from Maryland and settled near the junction of Mill Run and Sandy Creek, on the Rowland tract, patented in 1785. Eber West kept a tavern on the Moore road for many years near the mouth of Mill Run, and then moved up the hill and built a tavern stand where A. Crutchman now lives. He raised a large family, and they all went to Ohio.

Enos West, half-brother of Eber, settled where Jacob Suney lives. His wife was the Widow Black, previously a Rowland. He raised a large family. One daughter, Mrs. Rachel Fields, is still living near Smithfield. Jonathan, one of his sons, went to Uniontown, and his son, Enos West, came back to Wharton in 1835, and built a saw-mill near Wharton Furnace, where he now lives. Old Enos West emigrated to the Western country, came back on a visit and died, and was buried at Smithfield. His wife had one daughter, Sarah Black, who married the Rev. William Brownfield.

About 1800, John Slack was on the Braddock road, and in 1810, Benjamin Elliott, from Greene County, bought out David Flaugh, who lived near Brown's Church. He raised a family of four daughters and two sons,—Solomon, who emigrated, and S. D. Elliott, the present owner of his farm. He built a saw-mill and the flouring-mill at Elliottsville in 1817 and 1818. Benjamin Elliott was born in 1781, and died in 1863.

In 1814, John Tuttle came from German township to Wharton, where his son, Eli Tuttle, now lives. Squire Benjamin Price and James Snyder came about 1815. After the pike was built James McCartney, from Maryland, lived in a log house just back of the Presbyterian Church at Farmington. He married John Marker's widow, whose daughter, Sarah Marker, married Charles Rush. James McCartney's son Nicholas was well known as a tavern-keeper, a good talker, and a leading Democrat. His daughter Mary Ann married Squire Burke; another daughter was Mrs. Ellen Brown; and Diana, another daughter, married Atwell Holland, who was killed by a negro. She is now Mrs. Thomas, living in Greene County.

Col. John McCullough came shortly after McCartney. His sons Nicholas and James are well known along the road. Squire James Bryant, or, as some called him, Bryan, also Sebastian, John, Charles, and Levi Rush, Jr., sons of Levi Rush, of Henry Clay, came and located in Wharton. John, Charles, Samuel, and Sebastian Rush (called "Boss" Rush) were on the road as tavern-keepers. Charles Rush was on the pike at Searight's in 1856. Samuel Rush keeps the Rush House, opposite the Union Depot, Pittsburgh. Sebastian Rush married Margaret, a daughter of James Beard. Thomas, one of his sons, is a merchant at Farmington, and C. H. Rush, another, is a merchant at Uniontown. Sebastian Rush for years was the leading Republican of Wharton township, while Col. John McCullough and Nick McCartney were the leading Democrats.

In 1822 Col. Cuthbert Wiggins came to Wharton from Uniontown. His son, Joseph H. Wiggins, has the finest house in Wharton, one-half mile from Chalk Hill, and it is called by sportsmen the "fox-hunter's paradise."

The Moyers about 1820 were clearing farms in the western part of the township. Their ancestors, Samuel and Jacob, came from Hagerstown. Philip Moyer, who lives near Elliottsville, and Barbara, widow of Samuel Moore, are children of Jacob Moyer, whose wife was Catherine Manst. Nancy, one of his daughters, married Samuel Morton, of West Virginia, who built a saw-mill at Gibbons' Glade.

Peter Kime came to Potter's place in Wharton about 1825. In 1833 G. W. Hansel came from Maryland, and the Chutechmans came to West Place. In 1836 Jacob Workman and his brother came from Maryland and settled near Peter Hager. In 1840 Amos Potter came from Henry Clay, and bought the Kime property, and still resides on it. He is over seventy years old, a kind, affable, intelligent old man, who has held many offices in the township, and for years has been one of its leading and most useful citizens.

About 1840, Isaac Armstrong came from West Virginia, and bought the old Moore property, on which he now resides. He has been justice of the peace heretofore, and holds this office at the present time. In the western part of the township we find, about 1850, Jonas Haines and John Wirsing, from Somerset County, Pa., and John Myers, from West Virginia.

ROADS AND TAVERNS.

The Braddock road is the oldest road in the township. The Sandy Creek road is the next, and was the second or third road laid out in Fayette County, in 1783, running from Ten-Mile Creek past Haydewntown to Sandy Creek settlement, past Daniel McPeck's, who lived near Gibbons' Glade. It is not known whether it came by Gibbons' Glade from Haydewntown, or by the Bear Wallow to Brucetown, W. Va.; it is supposed to have come by Three-Mile Spring from Haydewntown past Gibbons' Glade. The next road was from Selby'sport to the Moore settlement, and branching to Braddock's road. The next was the Turkey Foot road, coming past where Robert Dalzell (the father of Private Dalzell, of political fame) lives, and intersecting Braddock's road at Dunbar's Camp. Next was the National road. Next, in 1823, was a road from Downer's tavern (Chalk Hill) to Jonathan's Run (near Stewart), and Samuel Little, Col. Andrew Moore, John Griffin, and Jacob Downard, viewers. Next was a road from Snyder's, on the pike, past Eliott's Mill to West Virginia, and then a road from Farmington to Falls City. The Sandy Creek road was afterwards known as the Moore or Cumberland road.

The Old Braddock road entered Wharton from Henry Clay, on the farm now owned by McCarion, then by Eli Leonard's to the Widow Dean's, back of Farmington, then to Dennis Holland's, then by Fort Necessity through the Facenacker farm, crossing the National road at Braddock's Run, near the house of James Dickson's heirs, then along a ridge back of Chalk Hill, through the Johnson farm to the top of the mountain, to Frederick Hamerer's place, then by Washington's Spring through the Kenedy farm, and two miles beyond crossing the township line to Dunbar's Camp. On this old road there were a number of taverns stands within the boundaries of Wharton township, and a brief mention is here made of them.

The Burnt Cabin stand, just west of the Henry Clay line, was a cabin, where about 1790 a man by name of Clark lived. The cabin was afterward burnt, hence the name. David Young kept tavern in it in 1796. A few old apple-trees mark its site on McCarion's farm.

The old Inks tavern was about one mile west of the Burnt Cabin, where Eli Leonard now lives. Thomas Inks built the first part of the house now standing, and in 1783 kept tavern in it. George Inks, his son, followed him in keeping the house till the road was shut up. Near is Dead Man's Run, so named from two brothers-in-law quarreling at Inks', and having left together, young Thomas Inks soon after started to mill, and driving across the run found one of them lying dead in the run.

Old Graveyard tavern, a large log house, stood two miles west of Inks', on the Widow Dean's place, just back of Farmington. It was supposed to have been built about 1783 for a tavern. Afterward Henry Beall and Plummer kept it, then Abraham Stewart, father of Hon. Andrew Stewart, next Clemmens. It was so called from a graveyard but a few yards away. The house has long been gone. The old trees and graveyard remain.

The Rue England tavern was about one mile west of the Old Graveyard tavern, where Dennis Holland now lives, on land owned by G. W. Hansel. It was a log house, supposed to have been built about 1796, and was kept awhile by young Thomas Inks.

The Freeman tavern stood a short distance west of the Rue England. It was a log tavern, built about 1800, and kept by Benjamin Freeland and young Thomas Inks. Jackson Facenbaker lives at the place. Benjamin Freeland had five children, —Mahula, Phoebe, John, Isaac, and Mary. The father died in Uniontown. John and Phoebe went to New Orleans, where she taught school, married, and died.

The Old Orchard tavern, near where the Braddock's road crosses the National road, was a log house kept by Hayhurst in the Old Orchard. It was supposed to have been built about 1786, and was kept by William Carrol after 1790.

The Downer tavern was about one mile back of Chalk Hill, and was kept by Jonathan Downer, who came to it in 1813. Thomas Inks, Jr., kept here at one time.

The Cushman tavern stood one mile north of Downer's. It was a log tavern, kept about 1784 by Cushman. About 1787, Tom Fossit (the old soldier who, as some said, killed Gen. Braddock) kept here. The house has long been gone. The Johnsons now own the property.

About half a mile north from Cushman's is a ledge of rocks where a peddler was said to have been killed in early days for his money and wagon-load of goods. The place is called "Peddler's Rocks."

Slack's tavern was one mile north of Cushman's.

Tom Fossit built a log house and kept tavern in 1783 on the top of the mountain at the Great Rock, close to the junction of the Burd and Braddock roads. Fossit soon left, and John Slack built a large log house; it was called Slack's tavern. The old Slack tavern is gone, but about ten feet from it stands the house of Fred Hamerer, who owns the place. The Great Rock is about twenty-five feet from his house, but a quarry being worked in it some years ago has greatly changed its appearance. About two hundred and fifty yards from it, just below the Old Braddock road, on the Kennedy farm, where Allen Humphreys lives, is Washington's Spring, at which he once made his night camp. North of the Great Rock fifty rods is a high, projecting point on a hillside where the Half-King had his camp.

About a mile and a half east of the Great Rock are the Three Springs, within a circle of two hundred yards, on Trout Run, a head of Great Meadow Run. On the right of the run is the Sand Spring, twenty-five feet in diameter, water boiling up from clear white sand. A rail twelve feet long has been pushed down and no bottom reached. Next, a few yards lower on the same side, is Blue Spring, about twenty-five feet in diameter and ten feet deep, with a beautiful rock bottom. Then on the left, higher up, and really the head of the run, is Trout Spring, about twenty-five feet in diameter and about four feet deep, the water clear and cold and containing trout.

The National road was built through Wharton township in 1817-18. In February, 1817, the part of the road from the Henry Clay line to Braddock's grave was included in a contract from David Shriver, superintendent of the eastern division, to Ramsey & McGravey, one section; John Boyle, one section; Daniel McGravey and Bradley, one section; and Charles McKinney, one section; and in May of the same year it was let to the Wharton line, and from Braddock's grave to Uniontown. Hagan & McCann and Mordecai Cochran were contractors on the road to the summit of Laurel Hill, the township line. They had many sub-contractors under them. From Chalk Hill the road was to follow the Old Braddock road to the top of Laurel Hill and then to Uniontown, but the superintendent changed it to the present route.

The first tavern stand on the National road was near Fielding Montague's. This stand is a matter of dispute. Old Thomas Dean has no recollection of Leonard Clark having three cabins here that were burnt, and thinks, as Leonard Clark kept at the Burnt Cabin, on the old Braddock road, and David Young had two cabins burnt back of William Smith's, on the road, hence this mistake of making them Clark's, and locating them on the road as the Bush tavern. All old people agree in making this first stand to have been the Noe's Gland stand, a story and a half log house, west of Fielding Montgomery's some three hundred yards, kept by Flannigan and John Collier and George Bryant. Some of these parties were not licensed. James Beard afterwards bought the house and lived in it a while, and it was then torn down.

McCullough stand, a two-story stone building and a stage-house, was built and kept by — Bryant, somewhere about 1828, and Bryant's post-office was kept here about 1824. Next Henry Vanpelt, a son-in-law of Bryant, kept the house. After him came John Risler, James Sampey, Adam Yeast, William Shaw, Alexander Holmes, and Nicholas McCortney in 1845, then Col. John McCullough bought the property and kept till his death in 1855. His widow then kept a while and married Squire I. N. Burke, who now occupies the property. Col. John McCullough was a stock-driver from Ohio, and liking the country as a business place, settled here. He was a man of stalwart proportions, a good talker, and a great champion of Democracy. At this house, when Nick McCortney kept, Atwell Holland was killed on the 4th of July, 1845, by a negro escaping from slavery. The negro, passing over the road was stopped by McCortney as a runaway at the suggestion of some wagoners. McCortney took the negro to the house, gave him something to eat, and leaving the house for a time left the negro under the care of Atwell Holland, who had married his sister Diana a month previously. The negro watching a favorable opportunity, sprang out the open door and ran. Several of the wagoners and Holland, against the entreaties of his wife, pursued him. The negro soon distanced them all, but Holland, who was a very fleet runner, overtook him. The negro turned and stabbed him three times and then con-continued his flight. The knife was a long dirk. Holland fell, and his companions came up and bore him back to the house. The impulsive and eccentric Lewis Mitchel, a preacher, knelt by his side, and while stanching his wounds with grape-leaves offered a prayer for the dying man. He expired in a few moments in the arms of his young wife. It was said that when Holland breathed his last a party formed, went to the Turkey's Nest, and laying in wait that night, intercepted the negro on his way to Union-town and shot him and concealed the body.

The third stand on the road was a two-story frame house, about a quarter of a mile east of McCullough's, and built by Bryant, who lived in it after keeping at McCullough's. Col. John McCullough built an addition to it, and kept it. He was succeeded by Morris Mauler, William Shaw, and Adam Yeast. A few years ago Nicholas McCullough repaired the buildings, and kept a year. The property is now occupied by a Mr. Glover.

The Rush stand was a large two-story frame house, built by — Bryant for his son. Charles Rush bought it in 1838, and building to it, opened a house for the traveling public. He kept till his death in 1846. He was a genial and generous landlord, bestowing many a free meal on hungry and penniless applicants. His widow kept for a time, and afterwards married William Smith. Mr. Smith kept Adams & Green's express line wagons and other travel until the road went down, and he still occupies the property.

The "Bull's Head" was at the foot of the hill west of the Rush stand, a frame building built by Thomas Dean in 1824. Selling liquor and feed to drovers was its principal business, and at night from the old stands near a jolly crowd would gather to pass an hour or so with song and drink and the music of the violin. Stephen Dean continued a while after Thomas. The house has been enlarged and improved into a fine residence, and is now occupied by John Stark.

The "Sheep's Ear," next west, is a frame building, which was kept by Edward Dean in the same manner as the "Bull's Head." It was built about 1824 by Samuel Dean for a shop, and enlarged by his son Edward for the accommodation of the public with liquor and food, and was resorted to for amusement as the "Bull's Head." It was kept by Dean & Bogle, F. H. Oliphant, the great ironmaster, put a line of teams on the road, and they made a stopping point at Edward Dean's. There is no account of how or why these two Dean houses received their peculiar names. The property is now occupied by Akerman.

The Old Inks stand was next west from the Sheep's Ear, and within one mile of Farmington. It was a frame two-story building, built by George Inks about 1829, if not earlier, and kept by George Inks, Heckroth, John Risler, Samuel Clemmens, and Nick McCartney. The property is now occupied by the Widow McCartney.

The Farmington stand was a log house, built here by Squire James Bryant. It was kept by Bryant, Connor, Tautlinger, and his widow until 1837, when Judge Nathaniel Ewing bought the property and built the present large and commodious stone and brick structure. A man by the name of Amos first kept it, and then Sebastian Rush, Sr., bought and kept it until the time of his death, in 1878. The property is now occupied by his widow. The old log tavern stood on the site of the present building, and was supposed to have been built about 1818. The present building was a stage stand, and was the stopping-place of the Stockton mail line when kept by "Boss Rush." Mr. Rush once pointed out to the writer, when stopping with him, a room in which Gen. Jackson, Harrison, Taylor, and Scott had slept, and told him that Sam Houston, Henry Clay, Tom Corwin, and Jenny Lind had lodged under his roof.

The Frazer stand was west of Farmington one-quarter of a mile. It was a two-story frame building, supposed to have been built by Samuel Spau, kept by his widow, and then by Samuel Frazer. It was a wagon stand. The property is now owned and occupied by G. W. Hansel, who came from Maryland to it in 1863.

The John Rush stand is a two-story frame building, about one-quarter of a mile west of the Frazer stand, built by John Rush in 1845, when the pike was beginning to decline; kept by John Rush and H. Clay Rush. He sold the property to his brother, "Boss Rush," whose son, Sebastian Rush, Jr., now occupies it.

The first building of the Mount Washington stand was an old log house, kept by Edward Jones and Mitchel. The present large brick house was built by Judge Ewing about 1825, who sold the property to Henry Sampay. Kept by Henry Sampay, and after his death by his widow, then by his sons-in-law, Foster and Moore. It was a stage stand, The Good Intent stage line stopped here. The property is now owned and occupied by Geoffrey Facenbaker, who came to it in 1856. It is about half a mile west of the John Rush stand.

The toll-house, next west, is an angular stone structure, built in 1829. Hiram Seaton was the first keeper. He was elected county treasurer twice, and died in Missouri. One of his sons, Charles S. Seaton, was elected to the Legislature, and resides in Union-town, a prominent merchant. Robert McDowell was the next. He was commonly called "Gate Bob," as there were several Robert McDowells. Although crippled by rhenatism, he was considered a rough customer in a fight, tall, angular, and severe in appearance. He ran for county commissioner in 1834, but was defeated. The old toll-house has a keeper no more, and no tolls to collect. The property is owned by Dr. R. M. Hill, and is occupied by a family as a residence.

The Monroe Spring stand is next west of the tollhouse, and was built by W. S. Gaither for McKinney, a contractor on the road, in 1821. It is a two-story log house, weather-boarded, kept by W. S. Gaither, James Frost, Samuel Frazer, Germain D. Hair, John Shuff, John Longanecker, Sebastian Rush (who went from here to Chalk Hill); William McClean, John Rush, Morris Manler, John Dillon, P. Ogg, Peter Turney, and John Foster. The old house still stands, but has gone to wreck. The property is now owned by Dr. R. M. Hill. At the spring close to the house John Hagan, a contractor on the road, gave President Monroe a dinner. The President, throwing wine in the water, christened it Monroe Spring, from which the house soon built derived its name. W. S. Gaither, who built the house, had a contract on the road. He came from Baltimore.

The Braddock Run stand is next west of Monroe Spring House. A two-story stone house, built about 1820 by Charles McKinney, a contractor on the road, who afterwards went to Ohio. It was a wagon stand, and derived its name from being near Braddock's Run. It was kept by Charles McKinney, James Sampey, Samuel Frazer, John Risler, — Springer, William Shaw, and Noble McCormick. Squire James Dixon bought the property of Henry Gaddis, a son-in-law of Springer, and Dixon's heirs now occupy the property.

Fayette Springs Hotel is next west of Braddock Run stand. It is a large two-story stone house, which was built under direction of Hon. Andrew Stewart for a fashionable summer resort, and not for a regular stand. Col. Cuthbert Wiggins built the hotel in 1822. It was kept by Col. Wiggins (who came from Uniontown), William McMillen, John McMullen, John Risler, John Rush, Earl Johnson, Brown Snyder, Samuel Lewis, Darlington Shaw, J. H. Wiggins (son of Col. Wiggins), Redding Bunting, C. W. Downard, and Capt. John Messmore, and is now occupied and kept by A. G. Messmore.

The Chalk Hill stand is a large two-story frame building, with commodious stabling attached, being ample comfort to man and beast. It is next west of Fayette Springs Hotel. The oldest part of the building was erected by Jonathan Downer in 1818, when he moved from his stand on the Old Braddock road. It was a wagon stand, and was kept by Jonathan Downer, Springer Downard, William Neal, Sebastian Rush (1840), Judge Samuel Shipley (who went to Monroe in 1847), William Shipley, and Milford Shipley. John Olwine bought the property in 1869, and kept until 1875. Marion Arnett kept in 1875, and from 1876 until the present William J. Olwine, son of John Olwine, has had charge and accommodated the traveling public. When the road was built the workmen shovelfed up here a white-looking earth and called it chalk; hence the name of Chalk Hill. Gen. Jackson and his nieces stopped here overnight, and the general returning home from his second term, stopped to see David Downard, who was sick. Gen. Harrison stopped here, also Black Hawk when going to Washington. Two of Chalk Hill's landlords ran for associate judge,—Samuel Shipley on the Democratic, and Sebastian Rush on the Republican ticket. The county being Democratic, Shipley was elected.

Snyder's stand is next west of Chalk Hill, at the eastern foot of Laurel Hill. It is a two-story frame building, the first part of which was built by David Jones in 1829, who kept and rented to James Snyder. Jones had taken up the land as vacant on which the buildings stood, but a man by name of McGrath in Philadelphia and Snyder bought from him and built an addition and kept it. He rented it two years, then taking charge himself again. He is the last of the pike landlords in Wharton. He is now over ninety years of age, and the oldest man in the township. He was elected county commissioner almost without opposition, and was a surveyor for many years, and has been a very prominent citizen of Wharton. He came from Brown's Run, in Georges township, near Unioitantown, where he married Mary Brown, his wife. They had four children,—Simon, Stephen, Lewis, and Margaret.

Squire Benjamin Price's cake- and beer-shop was next west of Snyder's stand, on the side of Laurel Hill. Price built a stone and frame house, its chimneys being but little above the bed of the pike; on the hillside below the pike he planted an orchard, and kept cakes for sale. The house has gone to ruin. The squire was a tall, heavy-set, broad-faced man, light complexioned, with blue eyes and light hair. As justice of the peace, he fined the wagoners and drovers when they swore in passing his place, and they in return annoyed him by throwing clubs and stones on his roof, and, it is said, once on a time a couple of drovers threw a crippled swine down his chimney, for which they received a sound beating at the squire's hands.

The Summit House is at the summit of Laurel Hill, almost on the western boundary of Wharton. Col. Samuel Evans built a two-story frame building and several outbuildings, intended for a summer resort. It was kept by Ephraim McClean, who went to Illinois, by Henry Clay Rush in 1855, Brown Hadden, S. W. Snyder, John Snyder, William Boyd, and Nicholas McCullough, the present occupant. Mollie Wharton's cake-shop stood close to the Summit House. It was a rude cabin or shanty, in which the old woman sold cakes and beer. When the Summit House was built Old Mollie was dispossessed of her cabin, which was then torn down, and she disappeared from the great thoroughfare.

Fayette Springs.—About a quarter of a mile south of Chalk Hill is the celebrated Fayette Springs, whose chalybeate waters have cured many sick and afflicted. Dr. Daniel Marchant, of Unioitantown, came up to Downard's about 1814, examined the spring, and reported it valuable. A man of the name of Marshall built a log house to accommodate visitors. The Hon. Andrew Stewart built a large building here, which burned down a few years ago. Brown Hadden at present is keeping a summer resort in the house that was built in place of the building burned down.

VILLAGES—MAIL SERVICE—BUSINESS ENTERPRISES.

Farmington.—A log tavern was the first house here, and Mr. Connor kept a few goods in it. A. L. Crane kept store next, and two houses were built. Peter T. Laisly kept goods, and Mrs. Andrew L. Crane; then Mr. Sterling kept a store, and the place was called Sterling’s Cross-Roads. Morgan Jones came next, and the village was given its present name. Sebastian Rush came in charge of the Farmington stand and built up the place. In the mercantile business Daniel Withrow succeeded Jones, and was followed by S. Rush, James Dixon, C. H. Rush, Hatfield, and Thomas Rush. Farmington consists of ten houses.—T. Crutchman, farmer; Dr. S. W. Newman; John Taylor, farmer; Alfred Fisher, laborer; Thomas Rush, merchant; Mrs. S. Rush, hotel; J. Turney, laborer; Adam Spaul, farmer; G. Cunningham, blacksmith; and James McCartney, farmer. A new store is being fitted up by Camp & McCann. From Farmington Morgan A. Jones removed to Philadelphia, where he became a broker. His brother David removed to Wisconsin, and became Lieutenant-Governor of that State; S. E. Jones went to Colorado, where he was elected judge; John Jones removed hence to Kentucky, where he became an extensive ironmaster. Thomas Rush, the postmaster, served credibly in the war of 1861–65.

The village of Farmington is located at the intersection of the old National road and the Falls City road. It is surrounded by a good farming country, and is regarded as a pleasant summer resort.

Gibbons’ Glade.—At this place about 1847, Samuel Morton, from Virginia, built a saw-mill and log house. Christian Harader bought of him, and in 1849 built the flouring-mill and three dwelling-houses. A man named Sanborn lived here, and people called the place Sanbortown, and from that nicknamed it “Shimbone,” and the post-office was at first so called. On the waters of Gibbons’ Run, the post-office was changed to Gibbons’ Glade in 1873, and the village was named the same. Its location is at the junction of two roads, and on the run. It has five dwellings,—S. Thomas, mill-owner; J. Fike, farmer; John Cooling, blacksmith; Daniel Johnson, distiller; Joseph Guiler, clerk. The mill was built by C. Harader, and sold to Jacob Fike, by him to John Harader, by him to Abraham Thomas in 1855, by him to John Umble in 1860, by him to Thomas Frederick, and by him to Sylvanus and William Thomas in 1869.

The store was first kept by Jacob Zimmermann: he was succeeded by S. Griffith, P. McClellan, H. Harner (who built present store-house), Carrol & Harader, John W. Carrol, J. Hardini, J. Campbell, Inks & Umble, Inks & Prinkey, Chidester, Daniel Johnson, and John O’Neil.

Elliottsville.—Benjamin Elliott in 1817–18 built the saw- and flouring-mill here. His son, S. D. Elliott, succeeded him and made improvements. In 1845 he opened a stock of goods. He was succeeded by Meyers & Kennedy, Hagar & Dice, J. E. Patton, S. D. Elliott, Benjamin Elliott (who built the present store-house), S. D. Richey, and Dr. R. M. Hill, at present, with a stock of dry-goods and drugs. Situated at the junction of two roads, the village has two streets, Water and Farmington, with nine dwellings. It is favorably located for a business place, and is the centre and voting-place of the Wharton Independent School District, formed by decree of court Dec. 9, 1864, on report of Adam Canan, Robert McDowell, Jr., and John Snyder.

Dr. R. M. Hill, of Elliottsville, was born in Washington County, Pa., in 1842; attended Hoge’s and Georges Creek Academies; entered the service in the war of the Rebellion under Col. M. S. Quay, Co. C, 134th Penn. Vols.; fought at Second Bull Run, South Mountain, and Shepherdstown, and was wounded in the left side and right arm at Chancellorsville. After the war he read medicine with Dr. Chalfant. He attended the Western Reserve Medical College, and received his diploma from Jefferson College. He located at Farmington with a good practice, and at present is located at Elliottsville. In 1876 he was elected to the Legislature by a large majority, running in advance of his ticket, and serving meritoriously in the Legislature of 1877–78.

S. D. Elliott, the founder of the village (born in 1809), has long been identified with the interests of Wharton, holding at different times nearly every elective office in the township.

Mail Service.—At the opening of the National road, in 1818, Bryant post-office was established, with James Bryant as postmaster. Bryant moved to Squire Burk’s, and removed the office with him. It was moved back to Farmington, and in 1838 Morgan Jones named the place Farmington, and the post-office was changed from Bryant to Farmington. The successors in the post-office have been Andrew L. Crane, Joseph Sterling, Morgan Jones, Daniel Withrow, Hair, S. Rush, C. H. Rush, James Nixon, and the present postmaster, Thomas Rush, and until 1860 it was the only office in the township. In 1860, Chalk Hill post-office was established, William McMillen, postmaster. After him were John McMillen, John Rishler, Robert Sproul, William Sproul, and Margaret Downer. It was changed to Fayette Springs post-office, and moved to Fayette Springs Hotel; postmasters, Alice Bunting, C. W. Downer, Capt. John Messmore, and A. G. Messmore, present postmaster. In 1879, Shimbone post-office was established through the instrumentality of Hon. John Covode, and Sylvanus Thomas was appointed postmaster. In 1875 the name of the office was changed to Gibbons'. In 1881, Thomas resigned, and Joseph Guiler was appointed postmaster.

Mail Routes.—The Farmington route from Union-town to Farmington was established after the pike went down, instead of the old through route from Wheeling to Washington. S. Rush for many years was contractor, then McCullough a year, and Calvin Dean at present is contractor.

Farmington and Brandonville (W. Va.) route, No. 8013, was established 1870, with Fielding Montague contractor, who has had the route ever since.

Distilleries.—In early days a man by the name of Miller had a distillery in Wharton. There was no market for grain, and people took grain to this distillery, and got their whisky in kegs, and carried it on pack-horses east, and traded for iron, salt, and store-goods.

After Miller's still-house went down Jacob Sailor built one near it. John Rutter passed it on his way to the McCollum place in West Virginia, lost his way in a snow-storm, and was frozen to death. In 1861, Zarl Hart built a distillery, then in Henry Clay, but now in Wharton. In 1872, Daniel Carues came in possession, and ran it until 1876, with C. W. Dow-ner gauger, and John Farmer, of Nicholson, store-keeper. From 1876 to 1878, Capt. John Bierer ran it, with Robert McCracken gauger and store-keeper. From 1878 to 1881, Philip Dennis ran it, with McCracken as gauger and store-keeper. Daniel Johnson has bought the machinery, and will move it to Gibbons' Glade, to be placed in a distillery to be erected there.

Mills.—A Mr. Cross had a tub-mill near Kingham's, on Mill Run, in an early day, about 1790. Jacob Beeson built a tub-mill for Richard Cheney (near Simon Hager's place) about 1795. But the oldest mill in the township seems to be Cross' tub-mill, near the Stewart line, on Bissel's place, formerly owned by Harvey Morris. Thomas Dean recollects it in 1814, and it then was called "the old mill," and was the great mill for corn, while they went for wheat to Selbysport. The Carrol mill was an old mill. Benjamin Elliott built his mill on Sandy in 1818, and Joseph Victor built a mill in 1830 on Mill Run, which burned down. The mill was built with the intention of starting a furnace. The property is now owned by Beeson & Snyder.

The Gibbons' Glade mill was built in 1849 by C. Harader, this and Elliott's being the only two mills now in the township. Peter Kime had a mill and carding-machine where Asbury Carrol lives, but it went down about 1830.

Tanneries.—There was a small tannery at John Moore's about 1890. The next tannery was Beaver Creek tannery, started in 1840 by Z. Ludington, next run by Kane & Cope, then William Armstrong, and now by Levi Byerly. It is in Tinker Ridge settlement, close to the Stewart line. Syler's tannery, on Mill Run, was started about 1860, and is still running.

Wharton Furnace.—In 1839, Hon. Andrew Stewart completed Wharton Furnace, and put it into blast and ran it several years; he then rented to John D. Crea, of Brownsville, then to Kenedy Duncan, who employed Alexander Clair as his manager. Col. D. S. Stewart then ran a short time. After him came a succession of proprietors, by whom it was run till about 1873, when it was finally abandoned. Hon. Andrew Stewart's heirs still own the property. Ore and coal are plenty, but the distance, over bad roads, to haul the metal is the great trouble in running the Wharton Furnace.

Stores.—John More kept a few goods near Squire Isaac Armstrong's, and this was the first store in the township. Andrew L. Crane kept goods at Mount Washington about 1829, and moved his store next Washington Hansel's house, where a thief came down the chimney and robbed him. About the same time one Conner kept a few goods at Farmington, in the old log tavern. Crane next kept at Farmington, about 1835. Squire S. D. Elliott opened out a stock of goods at his mill in 1845, and Jacob Zimmerman, about 1856, put a stock of goods at Gibbons' Glade.

Physicians.—Dr. Hasson was at the Inks stand about 1800, and Dr. Dunham at Gibbons' Glade about the same time. Dr. Lewis came next to Farmington, followed by Dr. R. M. Hill, and Dr. S. W. Newman in 1889, while Dr. L. W. Pool was at Elliottsville from 1874 to 1876, and then removed to Grant County, W. Va.

Schools.

There is no account of who taught the first schools in Wharton, which were private, or pay-schools by the quarter. An old log school-house stood on the pike near Farmington, and another on the Lake farm beyond Elliottville. Aug. 19, 1837, is the first record of a school board under the free school system. A meeting was then held to locate school-houses. They located ten school districts, and ordered that Miss M. A. Reynolds teach at Elliott's, Joseph Conner at Moore's, James McCartney at Dean's, and Benjamin Payton at Carroll's. The sum of $810 was appropriated to build one school-house, and $816 to build another. Teachers' wages were, for females, $10; males, $15 per month; and three months' terms were taught. In 1841 the school tax was $293. From 1840 to 1860 the leading teachers of the township were William Smith, Amos Potter, — Stuller, George Matthews, and John E. Patton. The school-tax is heavier than in most townships of the county, showing a deep interest by the citizens in their schools. During the winter of 1875-76 the teachers of the township met at Farmington and organized a literary society, whose debates of more than ordinary interest drew crowded houses. A. C. Holbert and J. M. Harbaugh, on the part of the teachers, and Dr. J. T. Beazel and Dr. R. M. Hill were the leading spirits, whose ingenious arguments will long be remembered.

The following statistics are from the school report made in 1880:

Number of districts (running, 12; vacant, 2; ind., 1). 15
Number of school-houses, frame. 15
Number of teachers employed. 15
Amount paid teachers, $1,258, Wharton ind., $1,060.

RELIGIOUS DENOMINATIONS.

For years after the settlement of the township religious services were conducted at private houses by ministers of different denominations.

Presbyterian.—The first denomination to effect an organization was the Presbyterian. The Presbytery of Redstone, on March 24, 1842, organized the church of Mount Washington, electing Seth Hyatt and Simon Snyder ruling elders. The following thirty-two persons constituted the organization: Benjamin Elliott, Solomon Elliott, S. D. Elliott, Mrs. Mary Elliott, Miss Mary Elliott, Eunice Elliott, John Robinson and wife, Seth Hyatt and wife, Mrs. Susan Crutchman, Miss Esther Conaway, Mrs. Lizzie Long, Mrs. Sophia Tuttle, Mrs. Shafer, Mrs. Reynolds, Miss Belinda Reynolds, Mrs. James McCarty, Mrs. James Matthews, Mrs. John Risler, Mrs. W. A. Gaither, Miss Elizabeth Gaither, William Gaither, Mrs. Hill, Christina, Jane, Nancy, Robert, and John Hill, Simon Snyder, Miss Sarah Stewart, and Morgan H. Jones.

In May, 1842, the first fifteen named persons organized Brown’s Church near Elliottsville. Both churches were log buildings, but in 1857 at Mount Washington a neat frame church was erected. Rev. J. Stoneroad was instrumental in founding the churches and was their minister, succeeded by Rev. Rosborough and other occasional supplies until 1850; from 1850 to 1870, Rev. J. Stoneroad; from 1870 to 1878, Rev. R. T. Price; from 1878 to 1881, Rev. S. S. Bergen. Elders: in 1846, S. D. Elliott was elected; 1861, John Snyder; 1866, G. W. Hansel, Robert O. Jones, and James McCann. Brown’s Church is now unfit for holding services in, and the members attend when practicable at Mount Washington.

Methodist Episcopal.—In 1841, Amos Potter, Mr. and Mrs. Harned, Mr. and Mrs. Hair, Mr. and Mrs. Carl formed a class at Potter’s school-house. Rev. David Hess was one of the first ministers. Services were held at several places in the township, and in fall of 1855, Rev. Eaton, from Petersburgh, held a meeting near William Smith’s, on the National road, and formed a class. Nicholas McCartney, Mary A. McCullough, John, Thomas, Samuel, Stephen, Jane, Sally, and Catherine Dean, John, Joseph, Sarah, and Lavina Stark, and twenty-seven others (forty in all) formed this class. It organized itself as the Sansom Chapel (Methodist Episcopal) Church, and built in 1857 the Sansom chapel building on the National road. Tinker’s Ridge class was organized in 1860 (with Stephen Dean class-leader); Chalk Hill in September, 1859, but went down; Fairview class at Haines’ school-house in 1863, with John Wising as class-leader, members from West Virginia belonging, but they withdrawing in 1873 the class went down. Rev. Cooper was the first minister after Sansom Chapel was built, followed by Rev. James Hill, Thomas Storer, James Hollingshead, John Robinson, Z. Silbaugh, P. Burnworth, and others. The Rev. Daniel J. Davis is at present in charge.
Baptist.—On Dec. 3, 1846, at Potter's school-house, Nathaniel West, Eli Tuttle, John Detwiler, James Williams, M. Fry, Gabriel Cook and wife, and others organized Bellevue (Baptist) Church; they removed to near Elliottsville, and held services in Brown's Church and the school-house. John Detwiler and Nathaniel West were elected deacons. Rev. Lewis Sammons was their pastor from June 21, 1851, to April, 1854; Rev. John Williams from 1854 to 1865. In 1858 they built a small neat church near Elliottsville, which was destroyed by fire in 1874. The Rev. W. P. Fortney was pastor in 1874 and 1875.

German Baptist, or Brethren.—About 1850 the Brethren held services at Canan school-house, near Gibbons' Glade, and at Workman school-house, under Elder Jacob Thomas. In 1871, Solomon Workman, one of the members, objected to using the (Workman) school-house as a place of worship because the polling-place had been removed from Sickle's to the school-house, and though not a wealthy man, rather than violate his conscience by worshipping in a house where elections were held he built out of his own means a neat frame church near the school-house and called it Bethel, though some of the young men called it Solomon's Temple. The arched ceiling of the building renders it the best building in the township for public speaking. The Revs. Jacob Beegley, James A. Ridenhour, and J. C. Meyer have since held services, and at this time (1881) Elder Solomon Bucklew has charge of Bethel and Canan. Canan still uses the school-house at Gibbons' Glade, and both are in Sandy Creek District.

Cumberland Presbyterian.—In 1845 the Rev. Andrew Osborn formed a branch of this church at Potter's, Mrs. Amos Potter, Daniel Carrol and wife, Mr. Sampey, John Patterson, and others constituting the organization. Rev. Osborn held services till 1860, Rev. J. P. Baird afterwards for a few years, and he then removing to a distance, the organization being feeble and without a pastor became scattered.

Catholic.—For many years members of this church have been residents of the township, and the Rev. Fathers Develin, Gallagher, and Duffee have held services at different points in the township, and the members at one time prepared to erect a church on the National road.

Evangelical Association, or Albright Methodist.—In 1850 this denomination organized at Potter's school-house, the Cupps and Hauingers being among the first members. Revs. Doll, Bishman, and Hyde were the early ministers. They held service at the Armstrong and Independent school-houses. The preacher from 1878 to 1880 was the Rev. Joseph White; 1881, the Rev. Dazell.

Methodist Protestant.—Dr. Rutledge and Rev. J. G. McCarty held services at Wharton Furnace, but there is no organization. Rev. D. H. Myers, of this church, resides in the western part of the township.

Biographical Sketches.

Sebastian Rush. The late Sebastian Rush, known far and wide as "Boss" Rush, and also popularly designated as the "King of the Mountains," filled a large place in his locality, Farmington, Wharton township, as farmer, businessman, and friendly adviser of a wide circle of acquaintances who sought his counsel, and particularly as the genial host of "Boss Rush's hotel" on the line of the National pike, and over which he presided from 1840, when he bought the hotel, until he died, Feb. 9, 1878. This hotel was a favorite stopping-place of many of the great men of other days. Henry Clay, Tom Ewing, President Polk, etc., when journeying over the National road, and Jenny Lind, in her famous tour through the country with the great showman, Barnum, tarried overnight at "Boss's hotel," and Mr. Rush while living, as does Mrs. Rush, who now conducts the house, made his more distinguished guests "twice happy" by honoring them with lodgings in Jenny Lind's room (a species of sagacity as well as gallantry worthy of imitation by publicans in general).

Mr. Rush was an ardent politician, early in life an old-line Whig, afterwards a Republican, and wielded a great influence in his region, putting into local office whom he would when his party was in power, and was a Presbyterian in religion, which fact doubtless added to his success as a politician. He amassed a large property, owning at the time of his death about twelve hundred acres of good land adjacent to his house, as well as several outlying farms of considerable size, besides the country "store" opposite the hotel, and which he for a long time conducted in connection with his other business and other property. He was also an extensive stock-raiser. Though noted for his unusually good sense and "clear head" in mature life, Mr. Rush enjoyed but meagre advantages of study in his childhood, but in after-life was notable as a reader.

He was a man of great physical strength, and during the latter portion of his life of ponderous size, weighing sometimes two hundred and fifty pounds. When he arrived at about twenty-two years of age he was made a constable, and for years filled his office with more than usual ability, but for the first year or so he was obliged to execute its duties on foot, lacking a horse to ride through pecuniary inability to buy one. From such a beginning his great energy and sound sense built up for him the fortune he afterwards enjoyed.

He was the son of Levi Rush (born 1783), who came to Fayette County from Somerset County late in the eighteenth century. His mother was Mary Kemps, a native of New Jersey, but living in Henry Clay township when she married. "Boss" Rush was born in the same township, Nov. 20, 1808, and in No-
SEBASTIAN RUSH.
November, 1829, married Margaret Baird, a girl of fifteen years of age (born 1814), a daughter of James Baird, a native of County Derry, Ireland. This was a "runaway match," and though it proved a happy one, Mrs. Rush, a vigorous and intelligent lady, now conducting the hotel, as she and her husband so long and successfully carried on the business, is emphatic in pronouncing against "runaway matches," among children especially. Mr. Rush died leaving seven children, four sons and three daughters, three other children having died before him, two in childhood.

GEORGE W. HANSEL, ESQ.

George W. Hansel, a prosperous farmer and stock-raiser, and since 1877 the principal trying justice of the peace in this section of Fayette County, is a highly-esteemed citizen of Farmington, Wharton township, where he resides. He was born in Alleghany County, Md., of German stock. His father, George, came with his family, among whom was

George W., in 1833 to Farmington, when the latter was about seven years old, he having been born July 4, 1826. George Hansel, the father, died in 1844, at the age of forty-two, leaving six children, and was buried on the old farm, where George W. has resided since his father's death, and which about 1850 he bought,—a valuable farm of about four hundred acres, lying along the line of the old National road. Mr. Hansel has since made considerable additions to the old homestead,

Mr. Hansel is in religion a Presbyterian, an elder of Mount Washington Presbyterian Church of Farmington, and though not ardent in politics, belongs to the Republican party, and was formerly an old-line Whig. He has always taken deep and intelligent interest in the common schools of his town, having belonged to the board of school directors since he arrived at his majority.

Mr. Hansel married in 1852 Miss Mary Romesburgh, daughter of Mr. John Romesburgh, of Farmington, by whom he has had thirteen children, all living,—eight boys and five girls.
